When a court decides whether securities law precludes antitrust law, it is deciding whether, given context and likely consequences, there is a "clear repugnancy" between the securities law and the antitrust complaint--or whether the two are "clearly incompatible." Moreover, in finding sufficient incompatibility to warrant an implication of preclusion, the United States Supreme Court has treated the following factors as critical: (1) the existence of regulatory authority under the securities law to supervise the activities in question; (2) evidence that the responsible regulatory entities exercise that authority; and (3) a resulting risk that the securities and antitrust laws, if both applicable, would produce conflicting guidance, requirements, duties, privileges, or standards of conduct. In prior decisions, the possible conflict affected practices that lie squarely within an area of financial market activity that the securities law seeks to regulate.

But the SEC would permit a firm to allocate initial public offering shares to a customer because the customer has separately retained the firm for other services, when the customer has not paid excessive compensation in relation to those services.

Decision

[*145] Federal securities laws held to implicitly preclude application of antitrust laws to allegedly illegal conduct of underwriters during initial public offerings of shares of some companies.

Summary

Procedural posture: Respondent investors filed antitrust class-action lawsuits against petitioner underwriters under the Sherman Act, the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, and state antitrust laws. The district court dismissed the complaints based on incompatibility with securities laws. The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reversed and reinstated the complaints. The underwriters' petition for certiorari was granted.

Overview: The investors alleged that the underwriters, during initial public offerings, unlawfully agreed with one another that they would not sell shares of a popular new issue to an investor unless that investor committed (1) to buy additional shares of that security later at escalating prices ("laddering"), (2) to pay unusually high commissions on subsequent security purchases from the underwriters, or (3) to purchase from the underwriters other less desirable securities ("tying"). The Court determined that the securities laws implicitly precluded the application of the antitrust laws to the conduct alleged because the securities laws were "clearly incompatible" with the application of the antitrust laws in this context since (1) the conduct was squarely within the heartland of securities regulations, (2) the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) had a clear and adequate authority to regulate the conduct, (3) the SEC actively enforced the rules and regulations regarding the conduct, and (4) there was a serious conflict between the antitrust and regulatory regimes. An [146] antitrust action in this context would be accompanied by a substantial risk of injury to the securities markets.

Outcome: The Court reversed the appellate court's judgment.

STATUTES §248.5 > REGULATORY STATUTES -- ANTITRUST > Headnote:
LEdHN[1][] [1]

Where regulatory statutes are silent in respect to antitrust, courts must determine whether, and in what respects, they implicitly preclude application of the antitrust laws. Those determinations may vary from statute to statute, depending upon the relation between the antitrust laws and the regulatory program set forth in the particular statute, and the relation of the specific conduct at issue to both sets of laws. STATUTES §248.5 > ANTITRUST LAWS -- IMPLIED REPEAL -- SECURITIES STATUTES > Headnote:

Where possible, courts should reconcile the operation of both antitrust and securities statutory schemes rather than holding one completely ousted. The United States Supreme Court has set forth a standard, namely that repeal of the antitrust laws is to be regarded as implied only if necessary to make the Securities Exchange Act work, and even then only to the minimum extent necessary. STOCK AND COMMODITIES EXCHANGES §5 > SECURITIES EXCHANGE COMMISSION -- EXCHANGE RULES > Headnote:
LEdHN[3][] [3]

The United States Supreme Court has noted that the Securities and Exchange Commission lacks jurisdiction under the securities law to review particular instances of enforcement of exchange rules and that nothing has been built into the regulatory scheme which performs the antitrust function of insuring that rules that injure competition are nonetheless justified as furthering legitimate regulatory "ends." An "implied repeal" of the antitrust laws will be found only where there is a plain repugnancy between the antitrust and regulatory provisions. The securities law gives the Securities and Exchange Commission direct regulatory power over exchange rules and practices with respect to the fixing of reasonable rates of commission. Syllabus [*149] Respondent investors filed suit, alleging that petitioner investment banks, acting as underwriters, violated antitrust laws when they formed syndicates to help execute initial public offerings for several hundred technology-related companies. Respondents claim that the underwriters unlawfully agreed that they would not sell newly issued securities to a buyer unless the buyer committed (1) to buy additional shares of that security later at escalating prices (known as "laddering"), (2) to pay unusually high commissions on subsequent security purchases from the underwriters, or (3) to purchase from the underwriters other less desirable [*2] securities (known as "tying"). The underwriters moved to dismiss, claiming that federal securities law impliedly precludes application of antitrust laws to the conduct in question. The District Court dismissed the complaints, but the Second Circuit reversed.

Held: The securities law implicitly precludes the application of the antitrust laws to the conduct alleged in this case. Pp. 4-20.

(a) Where regulatory statutes are silent in respect to antitrust, courts must determine whether, and in what respects, they implicitly preclude the antitrust laws' application. Taken together, Silver v. New York Stock Exchange, 373 U.S. 341, 83 S. Ct. 1246, 10 L. Ed. 2d 389; Gordon v. New York Stock Exchange, Inc., 422 U.S. 659, 95 S. Ct. 2598, 45 L. Ed. 2d 463; and United States v. National Assn. of Securities Dealers, Inc., 422 U.S. 694, 95 S. Ct. 2427, 45 L. Ed. 2d 486 (NASD), make clear that a court deciding this preclusion issue is deciding whether, given context and likely consequences, there is a "clear repugnancy" between the securities law and the antitrust complaint, i.e., whether the two are "clearly incompatible." Moreover, Gordon and NASD, in finding sufficient incompatibility to warrant an implication [*3] of preclusion, treated as critical: (1) the existence of regulatory authority under the securities law to supervise the activities in question; (2) evidence that the responsible regulatory entities exercise that authority; and (3) a resulting risk that the securities and antitrust laws, if both applicable, would produce conflicting guidance, requirements, duties, privileges, or standards of conduct. In addition, (4) in Gordon and NASD the possible conflict affected practices that lie squarely within an area of financial market activity that securities law seeks to regulate. Pp. 4-10.

(b) Several considerations--the underwriters' efforts jointly to promote and sell newly issued securities is central to the proper functioning of well-regulated capital markets; the law grants the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) authority to supervise such activities; and the SEC has continuously exercised its legal authority to regulate this type of conduct--show that the first, second, and fourth conditions are satisfied in this case. This leaves the third condition: whether there is a conflict rising to the level of incompatibility. Pp. 10-12.

(c) The complaints here can be read as attacking the manner in [*4] which the underwriters jointly seek to collect "excessive" commissions through the practices of laddering, tying, and collecting excessive commissions, which according to respondents the SEC itself has already disapproved and, in all likelihood, will not approve in the foreseeable future. Nonetheless, certain considerations, taken together, [150] lead to the conclusion that securities law and antitrust law are clearly incompatible in this context. Pp. 12-19.

(1) First, to permit antitrust actions such as this threatens serious securities-related harm. For one thing, a fine, complex, detailed line separates activity that the SEC permits or encourages from activity that it forbids. And the SEC has the expertise to distinguish what is forbidden from what is allowed. For another thing, reasonable but contradictory inferences may be drawn from overlapping evidence that shows both unlawful antitrust activity and lawful securities marketing activity. Further, there is a serious risk that antitrust courts, with different nonexpert judges and different nonexpert juries, will produce inconsistent results. Together these factors mean there is no practical way to confine antitrust suits so that [*5] they challenge only the kind of activity the investors seek to target, which is presently unlawful and will likely remain unlawful under the securities law. Rather, these considerations suggest that antitrust courts are likely to make unusually serious mistakes in this respect. And that threat means that underwriters must act to avoid not simply conduct that the securities law forbids, but also joint conduct that the securities law permits or encourages. Thus, allowing an antitrust lawsuit would threaten serious harm to the efficient functioning of the securities market. Pp. 14-17.

(2) Second, any enforcement-related need for an antitrust lawsuit is unusually small. For one thing, the SEC actively enforces the rules and regulations that forbid the conduct in question. For another, investors harmed by underwriters' unlawful practices may sue and obtain damages under the securities law. Finally, the fact that the SEC is itself required to take account of competitive considerations when it creates securities-related policy and embodies it in rules and regulations makes it somewhat less necessary to rely on antitrust actions to address anticompetitive behavior. Pp. 17-18.

(3) [*6] In sum, an antitrust action in this context is accompanied by a substantial risk of injury to the securities markets and by a diminished need for antitrust enforcement to address anticompetitive conduct. Together these considerations indicate a serious conflict between application of the antitrust laws and proper enforcement of the securities law. The Solicitor General's proposal to avoid this conflict does not convincingly address these concerns. Pp. 18-19.

A group of buyers of newly issued securities have filed an antitrust lawsuit against underwriting firms that market and distribute those issues. The buyers claim that the underwriters unlawfully agreed with one another that they would not sell shares of a popular new issue to a buyer unless that buyer committed (1) to buy additional [*7] shares of that security later at escalating prices (a practice called "laddering"), (2) to pay unusually [151] high commissions on subsequent security purchases from the underwriters, or (3) to purchase from the underwriters other less desirable securities (a practice called "tying"). The question before us is whether there is a "'plain repugnancy'" between these antitrust claims and the federal securities law. See Gordon v. New York Stock Exchange, Inc., 422 U.S. 659, 682, 95 S. Ct. 2598, 45 L. Ed. 2d 463 (1975) (quoting United States v. Philadelphia Nat. Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 350-351, 83 S. Ct. 1715, 10 L. Ed. 2d 915 (1963)). We conclude that there is. Consequently we must interpret the securities laws as implicitly precluding the application of the antitrust laws to the conduct alleged [*268] in this case. See 422 U.S., at 682, 689, 691, 95 S. Ct. 2598, 45 L. Ed. 2d 463; see also *United States v. National Assn. of Securities Dealers, Inc., 422 U.S. 694, 95 S. Ct. 2427, 45 L. The underwriting practices at issue take place during the course of an initial public offering (IPO) of shares in a company. An IPO presents an opportunity to raise capital for a new enterprise [*8] by selling shares to the investing public. A group of underwriters will typically form a syndicate to help market the shares. The syndicate will investigate and estimate likely market demand for the shares at various prices. It will then recommend to the firm a price and the number of shares it believes the firm should offer. Ultimately, the syndicate will promise to buy from the firm all the newly issued shares on a specified date at a fixed, agreed-upon price, which price the syndicate will then charge investors when it resells the shares. When the syndicate buys the shares from the issuing firm, however, the firm gives the syndicate a price discount, which amounts to the syndicate's commission. See generally L. Loss & J. Seligman, Fundamentals of Securities Regulation 66-72 (4th ed. 2001).

At the heart of the syndicate's IPO marketing activity lie its efforts to determine suitable initial share prices and quantities. At first, the syndicate makes a preliminary estimate that it submits in a registration statement to the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC). It then conducts a "road show" during which syndicate underwriters and representatives of the offering firm meet potential [*9] investors and engage in a process that the industry calls "bookbuilding." During this time, the underwriters and firm representatives present information to investors about the company and the stock. And they attempt to gauge the strength of the investors' interest in purchasing the stock. For this purpose, underwriters [*269] might well ask the investors how their interest would vary depending upon price and the number of shares that are offered. They will learn, among other things, which investors might buy shares, in what quantities, at what prices, and for how long each is likely to hold purchased shares before selling them to others.

On the basis of this kind of information, the members of the underwriting syndicate work out final arrangements with the issuing firm, fixing the price per share and specifying the number of shares for which the underwriters will be jointly responsible. [152] As we have said, after buying the shares at a discounted price, the syndicate resells the shares to investors at the fixed price, in effect earning its commission in the process.

In January 2002, respondents, a group of 60 investors, filed two antitrust class-action lawsuits against petitioners, [*10] 10 leading investment banks. They sought relief under § 1 of the Sherman Act, ch. 647, 26 Stat. 209, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 1; § 2(c) of the Clayton Act, 38 Stat. 730, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, 49 Stat. 1527, 15 U.S.C. § 13(c); and state antitrust laws. App. 1, 14. The investors stated that between March 1997 and December 2000 the banks had acted as underwriters, forming syndicates that helped execute the IPOs of several hundred technology-related companies. Id., at 22. Respondents' antitrust complaints allege that the underwriters "abused the . . . practice of combining into underwriting syndicates" by agreeing among themselves to impose harmful conditions upon potential investors--conditions that the investors apparently were willing to accept in order to obtain an allocation of new shares that were in high demand. Id., at 12.

[2389] These conditions, according to respondents, consist of a requirement that the investors pay "additional anticompetitive charges" over and above the agreed-upon IPO share price plus underwriting commission. In particular, these additional [*270] charges took the form of (1) investor promises "to place [*11] bids . . . in the aftermarket at prices above the IPO price" (i.e., "laddering" agreements); (2) investor "commitments to purchase other, less attractive securities" (i.e., "tying" arrangements); and (3) investor payment of "non-competitively determined" (i.e., excessive) "commissions," including the "purchas[e] of an issuer's shares in follow-up or 'secondary' public offerings (for which the underwriters would earn underwriting discounts)." Id., at 12-13. The complaint added that the underwriters' agreement to engage in some or all of these practices artificially inflated the share prices of the securities in question. Id., at 32.

The underwriters moved to dismiss the investors' complaints on the ground that federal securities law impliedly precludes application of antitrust laws to the conduct in question. (The antitrust laws at issue include the commercial bribery provisions of the Robinson-Patman Act.) The District Court agreed with petitioners and dismissed the complaints against them. See In re Initial Public Offering Antitrust Litigation, 287 F. Supp. 2d 497, 524-525 (SDNY 2003) (IPO Antitrust). The Court of Appeals for the Second [*12] Circuit reversed, however, and reinstated the complaints. 426 F.3d 130, 170, 172 (2005). We granted the underwriters' petition for certiorari. And we now reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeals.

Sometimes regulatory statutes explicitly state whether they preclude application of the antitrust laws. Compare, e.g., Webb-Pomerene Act, 15 U.S.C. § 62 (expressly providing antitrust immunity) with § 601(b)(1) of the Telecommunications Act of 1996, 47 U.S.C. § 152 (stating that antitrust laws remain applicable). See also Verizon Communications Inc. v. Law Offices of Curtis V. Trinko, [153] LLP, 540 U.S. 398, 406-407, 124 S. Ct. 872, 157 L. Ed. 2d 823 (2004) (analyzing the antitrust saving clause of the [*271] Telecommunications Act). HN1[] LEdHN[1][] [1] Where regulatory statutes are silent in respect to antitrust, however, courts must determine whether, and in what respects, they implicitly preclude application of the antitrust laws. Those determinations may vary from statute to statute, depending upon the relation between the antitrust laws and the regulatory program set forth in the particular statute, and the relation of the specific conduct at issue to both sets of laws. Compare [*13] Gordon, 422 U.S., at 689, 95 S. Ct. 2598, 45 L. Ed. 2d 463 (finding implied preclusion of antitrust laws); and NASD, 422 U.S., at 729-730, 95 S. Ct. 2427, 45 L. Ed. 2d 486 (same), with Otter Tail Power Co. v. United States, 410 U.S. 366, 374-375, 93 S. Ct. 1022, 35 L. Ed. 2d 359 (1973) (finding no implied immunity); Philadelphia Nat. Bank, 374 U.S., at 352, 83 S. Ct. 1715, 10 L. Ed. 2d 915 (same); and Silver, 373 U.S., at 360, 83 S. Ct. 1246, 10 L. Ed. 2d 389 (same). See also Phonetele, Inc. v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., 664 F.2d 716, 727 (CA9 1981).

Three decisions from this Court specifically address the relation of securities law to antitrust law. In Silver the Court considered a dealer's claim that, by expelling him from the New York Stock Exchange, the exchange had violated the antitrust prohibition against group "boycott[s]." 373 U.S., at 347, 83 S. Ct. 1246, 10 L. Ed. 2d 389. The Court wrote that, HN2[] LEdHN[2][] [2] where possible, courts should "reconcil[e] the operation of both [i.e., antitrust and securities] statutory schemes . . . [2390] rather than holding one completely ousted." Id., at 357, 83 S. Ct. 1246, 10 L. Ed. 2d 389. It also set forth a standard, namely, that "[r]epeal [of the antitrust laws] is to be regarded as implied only if necessary to make the Securities Exchange [*14] Act work, and even then only to the minimum extent necessary." Ibid. And it held that the securities law did not preclude application of the antitrust laws to the claimed boycott insofar as the exchange denied the expelled dealer a right to fair procedures. Id., at 359-360, 83 S. Ct. 1246, 10 L. Ed. 2d 389.

In reaching this conclusion, HN3[] LEdHN[3][] [3] the Court noted that the SEC lacked jurisdiction under the securities law "to review particular instances of enforcement of exchange rules"; that "nothing [was] built into the regulatory scheme which performs the antitrust function of insuring" that rules that injure [*272] competition are nonetheless "justified as furthering" legitimate regulatory "ends"; that the expulsion "would clearly" violate "the Sherman Act unless justified by reference to the purposes of the Securities Exchange Act"; and that it could find no such justifying purpose where the exchange took "anticompetitive collective action . . . without according fair procedures." Id., at 357-358, 364, 83 S. Ct. 1246, 10 L. Ed. 2d 389 (emphasis added).

In Gordon the Court considered an antitrust complaint that essentially alleged "price fixing" among stockbrokers. It charged that members of the New York [*15] Stock Exchange had agreed to fix their commissions on sales under $ 500,000. And it sought damages and an injunction forbidding future agreements. 422 U.S., at 661, and n 3, 95 S. Ct. 2598, 45 L. Ed. 2d 463. The lawsuit was filed at a time when regulatory attitudes toward fixed stockbroker commissions were changing. The fixed commissions challenged in the complaint were applied during a [154] period when the SEC approved of the practice of fixing broker-commission rates. But Congress and the SEC had both subsequently disapproved for the future the fixing of some of those rates. See id., at 690-691, 95 S. Ct. 2598, 45 L. Ed. 2d 463.

In deciding whether antitrust liability could lie, the Court repeated Silver's general standard in somewhat different terms: It said that HN4[] LEdHN[4][] [4] an "implied repeal" of the antitrust laws would be found only "where there is a 'plain repugnancy between the antitrust and regulatory provisions.'" 422 U.S., at 682, 95 S. Ct. 2598, 45 L. Ed. 2d 463 (quoting Philadelphia Nat. Bank, supra, at 350-351, 83 S. Ct. 1715, 10 L. Ed. 2d 915). It then held that the securities laws impliedly precluded application of the antitrust laws in the case at hand. The Court rested this conclusion on three sets of considerations. For one thing, the securities law "gave the [*16] SEC direct regulatory power over exchange rules and practices with respect to the fixing of reasonable rates of commission." 422 U.S., at 685, 95 S. Ct. 2598, 45 L. Ed. 2d 463 (internal quotation marks omitted). For another, the SEC had "taken an active role in review of proposed rate changes during the last 15 years," and had engaged in "continuing [*273] activity" in respect to the regulation of commission rates. Ibid. Finally, without antitrust immunity, "the exchanges and their members" would be subject to "conflicting standards." Id., at 689, 95 S. Ct. 2598, 45 L. Ed. 2d 463.

This last consideration--the conflict--was complicated due to Congress', and the agency's, changing views about the validity of fixed commissions. As far as the past fixing of rates was concerned, the conflict was clear: The antitrust law had forbidden the very thing that the securities law had then permitted, namely, an anticompetitive ratesetting process. In respect to the future, however, the conflict was less apparent. That was because the SEC's new (congressionally authorized) prohibition of (certain) fixed rates would take effect in [2391] the near-term future.

And after that time the SEC and the antitrust law would both likely prohibit [*17] some of the ratefixing to which the plaintiff's injunction would likely apply. See id., at 690-691, 95 S. Ct. 2598, 45 L. Ed. 2d 463.

Despite the likely compatibility of the laws in the future, the Court nonetheless expressly found conflict. The conflict arose from the fact that the law permitted the SEC to supervise the competitive setting of rates and to "reintroduc[e] . . . fixed rates," id., at 691, 95 S. Ct. 2598, 45 L. Ed. 2d 463 (emphasis added), under certain conditions. The Court consequently wrote that "failure to imply repeal would render nugatory the legislative provision for regulatory agency supervision of exchange commission rates." Ibid. The upshot is that, in light of potential future conflict, HN5[] LEdHN[5][] [5] the Court found that the securities law precluded antitrust liability even in respect to a practice that both antitrust law and securities law might forbid.

In NASD the Court considered a Department of Justice antitrust complaint claiming that mutual fund companies had agreed with securities broker-dealers (1) to fix "resale" prices, i.e., the prices at which a broker-dealer would sell a mutual fund's shares to an investor or buy mutual fund shares from a fund investor (who wished to [*18] redeem the shares); (2) to fix other terms of sale including those related [*274] to when, how, to whom, and from whom the broker-dealers [155] might sell and buy mutual fund shares; and (3) to prohibit broker-dealers from freely selling to, and buying shares from, one another. See 422 U.S., at 700-703, 95 S. Ct. 2427, 45 L. Ed. 2d 486.

The Court again found "clear repugnancy," and it held that the securities law, by implication, precluded all parts of the antitrust claim. Id., at 719, 95 S. Ct. 2427, 45 L. Ed. 2d 486. In reaching this conclusion, the Court found that antitrust law (e.g., forbidding resale price maintenance) and securities law (e.g., permitting resale price maintenance) were in conflict. In deciding that the latter trumped the former, the Court relied upon the same kinds of considerations it found determinative in Gordon. In respect to the last set of allegations (restricting a free market in mutual fund shares among brokers), the Court said that (1) the relevant securities law "enables [the SEC] to monitor the activities questioned"; (2) "the history of Commission regulations suggests no laxity in the exercise of this authority"; and hence (3) allowing an antitrust suit to proceed that is "so directly [*19] related to the SEC's responsibilities" would present "a substantial danger that [broker-dealers and other defendants] would be subjected to duplicative and inconsistent standards." NASD, 422 U.S., at 734-735, 95 S. Ct. 2427, 45 L. Ed. 2d 486.

As to the other practices alleged in the complaint (concerning, e.g., resale price maintenance), the Court emphasized that (1) the securities law "vested in the SEC final authority to determine whether and to what extent" the relevant practices "should be tolerated," id., at 729, 95 S. Ct. 2427, 45 L. Ed. 2d 486; (2) although the SEC has not actively supervised the relevant practices, that is only because the statute "reflects a clear congressional determination that, subject to Commission oversight, mutual funds should be allowed to retain the initiative in dealing with the potentially adverse effects of disruptive trading practices," id., at 727, 95 S. Ct. 2427, 45 L. Ed. 2d 486; and (3) the SEC has supervised the funds insofar as its "acceptance of fund-initiated restrictions for more than three decades . . . manifests an informed administrative [*275] judgment that the contractual restrictions . . . were appropriate means for combating the problems of the industry," id., at 728, 95 S. Ct. 2427, 45 L. Ed. 2d 486. [*20] The Court added that, in these respects, the SEC had engaged in "precisely the kind of [2392] administrative oversight of private practices that Congress contemplated." Ibid.

As an initial matter these cases make clear that Justice Thomas HN6[] LEdHN[6][] [6] is wrong to regard §§ 77p(a) and 78bb(a) as saving clauses so broad as to preserve all antitrust actions. See post, p. 287, 168 L. Ed. 2d, at ____ (dissenting opinion). The United States advanced the same argument in Gordon. See Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae in Gordon v. New York Stock Exchange, Inc., O. T. 1974, No. 74-304, pp 8, 42. And the Court, in finding immunity, necessarily rejected it. See also NASD, supra, at 694, 95 S. Ct. 2427, 45 L. Ed. 2d 463 (same holding); Herman & MacLean v. Huddleston, 459 U.S. 375, 383, 103 S. Ct. 683, 74 L. Ed. 2d 548 (1983) (finding saving clause applicable to overlap between securities laws where that "overlap [was] neither unusual nor unfortunate" (internal quotation marks omitted)). Although one party has made the argument in this Court, it was not presented in the courts below. And we shall not reexamine it.

[*156] This Court's prior decisions also make clear that, HN7[] LEdHN[7][] [7] when a court decides whether securities law precludes antitrust [*21] law, it is deciding whether, given context and likely consequences, there is a "clear repugnancy" between the securities law and the antitrust complaint--or as we shall subsequently describe the matter, whether the two are "clearly incompatible." Moreover, Gordon and NASD, in finding sufficient incompatibility to warrant an implication of preclusion, have treated the following factors as critical: (1) the existence of regulatory authority under the securities law to supervise the activities in question; (2) evidence that the responsible regulatory entities exercise that authority; and (3) a resulting risk that the securities and antitrust laws, if both applicable, would produce conflicting guidance, requirements, [*276] duties, privileges, or standards of conduct. We also note (4) that in Gordon and NASD the possible conflict affected practices that lie squarely within an area of financial market activity that the securities law seeks to regulate.

These principles, applied to the complaints before us, considerably narrow our legal task. For the parties cannot reasonably dispute the existence here of several of the conditions that this Court previously regarded as crucial [*22] to finding that the securities law impliedly precludes the application of the antitrust laws.

First, the activities in question here--the underwriters' efforts jointly to promote and to sell newly issued securities--is central to the proper functioning of well-regulated capital markets. The IPO process supports new firms that seek to raise capital; it helps to spread ownership of those firms broadly among investors; it directs capital flows in ways that better correspond to the public's demand for goods and services. Moreover, financial experts, including the securities regulators, consider the general kind of joint underwriting activity at issue in this case, including road shows and bookbuilding efforts essential to the successful marketing of an IPO. See Memorandum Amicus Curiae of SEC in IPO Antitrust, Case No. 01 CIV 2014 (WHP) (SDNY), pp 15, 39-40, App. D to Pet. for Cert. 124a, 138a, 155a-157a (hereinafter Brief for SEC). Thus, the antitrust complaints before us concern practices that lie at the very heart of the securities marketing enterprise.

Second, the law grants the SEC authority to supervise all of the activities here in question. Indeed, HN8[] LEdHN[8][] [8] the SEC possesses [*23] considerable power to forbid, permit, encourage, discourage, tolerate, limit, and otherwise regulate virtually every aspect of the practices in which underwriters engage. [2393] See, e.g., 15 U.S.C. §§ 77b(a)(3), 77j, 77z-2 (granting SEC power to regulate the process of bookbuilding, solicitations [*277] of "indications of interest," and communications between underwriting participants and their customers, including those that occur during road shows); § 78o(c)(2)(D) (granting SEC power to define and prevent through rules and regulations acts and practices that are fraudulent, deceptive, or manipulative); § 78i(a)(6) (similar); § 78j(b) (similar). Private individuals who suffer harm as a result of a violation of pertinent statutes and regulations may also recover damages. See §§ 78bb, 78u-4, 77k.

Third, the SEC has continuously exercised its legal authority to regulate conduct of the general kind now [157] at issue. It has defined in detail, for example, what underwriters may and may not do and say during their road shows. Compare, e.g., Guidance Regarding Prohibited Conduct in Connection with IPO Allocations, 70 Fed. Reg. 19672 (2005), with Regulation M, [*24] 17 CFR §§ 242.100-242.105 (2006). It has brought actions against underwriters who have violated these SEC regulations. See Brief for SEC 13-14, App. D to Pet. for Cert. 136a-138a. And private litigants, too, have brought securities actions complaining of conduct virtually identical to the conduct at issue here; and they have obtained damages. See, e.g., In re Initial Pub. Offering Securities Litigation, 241 F. Supp. 2d 281 (SDNY 2003).

The preceding considerations show that the first condition (legal regulatory authority), the second condition (exercise of that authority), and the fourth condition (heartland securities activity) that were present in Gordon and NASD are satisfied in this case as well. Unlike Silver, there is here no question of the existence of appropriate regulatory authority, nor is there doubt as to whether the regulators have exercised that authority. Rather, the question before us concerns the third condition: Is there a conflict that rises to the level of incompatibility? Is an antitrust suit such as this likely to prove practically incompatible with the SEC's administration of the Nation's securities laws?

A

Given the [*25] SEC's comprehensive authority to regulate IPO underwriting syndicates, its active and ongoing exercise of that authority, and the undisputed need for joint IPO underwriter activity, we do not read the complaints as attacking the bare existence of IPO underwriting syndicates or any of the joint activity that the SEC considers a necessary component of IPO-related syndicate activity. See Brief for SEC 15, 39-40, App. D to Pet. for Cert. 138a, 155a-157a. See also IPO Antitrust, 287 F. Supp. 2d, at 507 (discussing the history of syndicate marketing of IPOs); App. 12 (complaint attacks underwriters "abus[e]" of "the preexisting practice of combining into underwriting syndicates" (emphasis added)); H. R. Rep. No. 1383, 73d Cong., 2d Sess., 6-7 (1934); S. Rep. No. 792, 73d Cong., 2d Sess., 5 (1934) (law must give to securities agencies freedom to regulate agreements among syndicate members). Nor do we understand the complaints as questioning underwriter agreements to fix the levels of their commissions, whether or not the resulting price is "excessive." See Gordon, 422 U.S., at 688-689, 95 S. Ct. 2598, 45 L. Ed. 2d 463 (securities law conflicts with, and therefore precludes, antitrust attack [*26] on the fixing of commissions where the SEC has not approved, but later might approve, the practice).

We nonetheless can read the complaints as attacking the manner in which the underwriters jointly seek to collect "excessive" commissions. The complaints attack [2394] underwriter efforts to collect commissions through certain practices (i.e., laddering, tying, collecting excessive commissions in the form of later sales of the issued shares), which according to respondents the SEC itself has already disapproved and, in all likelihood, will not approve in the foreseeable future. In respect to this set of claims, they contend that there is no possible "conflict" [158] since both securities law and antitrust law aim to prohibit the same undesirable activity. Without a [*279] conflict, they add, there is no "repugnance" or "incompatibility," and this Court may not imply that securities law precludes an antitrust suit.

We accept the premises of respondents' argument--that the SEC has full regulatory authority over these practices, that it has actively exercised that authority, but that the SEC has disapproved (and, for argument's sake, we assume that it will continue to disapprove) the conduct [*27] that the antitrust complaints attack. Nonetheless, we cannot accept respondents' conclusion. Rather, several considerations taken together lead us to find that, even on these prorespondent assumptions, securities law and antitrust law are clearly incompatible.

First, to permit antitrust actions such as the present one still threatens serious securities-related harm. For one thing, an unusually serious legal line-drawing problem remains unabated. In the present context only a fine, complex, detailed line separates activity that the SEC permits or encourages (for which respondents must concede antitrust immunity) from activity that the SEC must (and inevitably will) forbid (and which, on respondents' theory, should be open to antitrust attack).

For example, HN9[] LEdHN[9][] [9] in respect to "laddering" the SEC forbids an underwriter to "[s]olici[t] customers prior to the completion of the distribution regarding whether and at what price and in what quantity they intend to place immediate aftermarket orders for IPO stock," 70 Fed. Reg. 19675-19676 (emphasis deleted); 17 CFR §§ 242.100-242.105. But at the same time the SEC permits, indeed encourages, underwriters (as part of the "bookbuilding" [*28] process) to "inquir[e] as to a customer's desired future position in the longer term (for example, three to six months), and the price or prices at which the customer might accumulate that position without reference to immediate aftermarket activity." 70 Fed. Reg. 19676.

[*280] It will often be difficult for someone who is not familiar with accepted syndicate practices to determine with confidence whether an underwriter has insisted that an investor buy more shares in the immediate aftermarket (forbidden), or has simply allocated more shares to an investor willing to purchase additional shares of that issue in the long run (permitted). And who but a securities expert could say whether the present SEC rules set forth a virtually permanent line, unlikely to change in ways that would permit the sorts of "laddering-like" conduct that it now seems to forbid? Cf. Gordon, supra, at 690-691, 95 S. Ct. 2598, 45 L. Ed. 2d 463.

Similarly, HN10[] LEdHN[10][] [10] in respect to "tying" and other efforts to obtain an increased commission from future sales, the SEC has sought to prohibit an underwriter "from demanding . . . an offer from [its] customers of any payment or other consideration [such as the purchase of a different [*29] security] in addition to the security's stated consideration." 69 Fed. Reg. 75785 (2004). But the SEC would permit a firm to "allocat[e] IPO shares to a customer because the customer has separately retained the firm for other services, when the customer has not paid excessive compensation in relation to those services." Ibid., and n 108. The [2395] National Association of Securities Dealers (NASD), over which the SEC exercises supervisory authority, [159] has also proposed a rule that would prohibit a member underwriter from "offering or threatening to withhold" IPO shares "as consideration or inducement for the receipt of compensation that is excessive in relation to the services provided." Id., at 77810. The NASD would allow, however, a customer legitimately to compete for IPO shares by increasing the level and quantity of compensation it pays to the underwriter. See ibid. (describing NASD Proposed Rule 2712(a)).

Under these standards, to distinguish what is forbidden from what is allowed requires an understanding of just when, in relation to services provided, a commission is "excessive," indeed, so "excessive" that it will remain permanently forbidden, [*281] see Gordon, 422 U.S., at 690-691, 95 S. Ct. 2598, 45 L. Ed. 2d 463. [*30] And who but the SEC itself could do so with confidence?

For another thing, evidence tending to show unlawful antitrust activity and evidence tending to show lawful securities marketing activity may overlap, or prove identical. Consider, for instance, a conversation between an underwriter and an investor about how long an investor intends to hold the new shares (and at what price), say, a conversation that elicits comments concerning both the investor's short and longer term plans. That exchange might, as a plaintiff sees it, provide evidence of an underwriter's insistence upon "laddering" or, as a defendant sees it, provide evidence of a lawful effort to allocate shares to those who will hold them for a longer time. See Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 27.

Similarly, the same somewhat ambiguous conversation might help to establish an effort to collect an unlawfully high commission through atypically high commissions on later sales or through the sales of less popular stocks. Or it might prove only that the underwriter allocates more popular shares to investors who will help stabilize the aftermarket share price. See, e.g., Department of Enforcement v. Respondent, Disciplinary Proc. [*31] No. CAF030014, (NASD Hearing Mar. 3, 2006), pp. 12-13 (redacted decision), called for review, Complaint No. CAFD30014 (NASD Nat. Adjudicatory Council, Apr. 11, 2006).

Further, antitrust plaintiffs may bring lawsuits throughout the Nation in dozens of different courts with different nonexpert judges and different nonexpert juries. In light of the nuanced nature of the evidentiary evaluations necessary to separate the permissible from the impermissible, it will prove difficult for those many different courts to reach consistent results. And, given the fact-related nature of many such evaluations, it will also prove difficult to ensure that the different courts evaluate similar fact patterns consistently. The result is an unusually high risk that different [*282] courts will evaluate similar factual circumstances differently. See Hovenkamp, Antitrust Violations in Securities Markets, 28 J. Corp. L. 607, 629 (2003) ("Once regulation of an industry is entrusted to jury trials, the outcomes of antitrust proceedings will be inconsistent with one another . . .").

Now consider these factors together--the fine securities-related lines separating the permissible from the impermissible; the need for securities-related expertise (particularly to determine whether an SEC rule is [*32] likely permanent); the overlapping evidence from which reasonable but contradictory inferences may be drawn; and the risk of inconsistent court results. Together these factors mean there is no practical way to [160] confine antitrust suits so that they challenge only activity of the kind the investors seek to target, activity that is presently unlawful and will likely remain unlawful under the securities law. Rather, [2396] these factors suggest that antitrust courts are likely to make unusually serious mistakes in this respect. And the threat of antitrust mistakes, i.e., results that stray outside the narrow bounds that plaintiffs seek to set, means that underwriters must act in ways that will avoid not simply conduct that the securities law forbids (and will likely continue to forbid), but also a wide range of joint conduct that the securities law permits or encourages (but which they fear could lead to an antitrust lawsuit and the risk of treble damages). And therein lies the problem.

This kind of problem exists to some degree in respect to other antitrust lawsuits. But here the factors we have mentioned make mistakes unusually likely (a matter relevant to Congress' determination of which [*33] institution should regulate a particular set of market activities). And the role that joint conduct plays in respect to the marketing of IPOs, along with the important role IPOs themselves play in relation to the effective functioning of capital markets, means that the securities-related costs of mistakes is unusually high. It is no wonder, then, that the SEC told the District Court (consistent [*283] with what the Government tells us here) that a "failure to hold that the alleged conduct was immunized would threaten to disrupt the full range of the Commission's ability to exercise its regulatory authority," adding that it would have a "chilling effect" on "lawful joint activities . . . of tremendous importance to the economy of the country." Brief for SEC 39-40, App. D to Pet. for Cert. 157a.

We believe it fair to conclude that, where conduct at the core of the marketing of new securities is at issue; where securities regulators proceed with great care to distinguish the encouraged and permissible from the forbidden; where the threat of antitrust lawsuits, through error and disincentive, could seriously alter underwriter conduct in undesirable ways, to allow an antitrust lawsuit would threaten [*34] serious harm to the efficient functioning of the securities markets.

Second, any enforcement-related need for an antitrust lawsuit is unusually small. For one thing, the SEC actively enforces the rules and regulations that forbid the conduct in question. For another, as we have said, investors harmed by underwriters' unlawful practices may bring lawsuits and obtain damages under the securities law. See supra, at 276-277, 168 L. Ed. 2d, at 156-157. Finally, HN11[] LEdHN[11][] [11] the SEC is itself required to take account of competitive considerations when it creates securities-related policy and embodies it in rules and regulations. And that fact makes it somewhat less necessary to rely upon antitrust actions to address anticompetitive behavior. See 15 U.S.C. § 77b(b) (instructing the SEC to consider, "in addition to the protection of investors, whether the action will promote efficiency, competition, and capital formation"); § 78w(a)(2) (the SEC "shall consider among other matters the impact any such rule or regulation would have on competition"); Trinko, 540 U.S., at 412, 124 S. Ct. 872, 157 L. Ed. 2d 823 ("[T]he additional benefit to competition provided by antitrust enforcement will tend to be small" where other laws [*35] and regulatory structures [161] are "designed to deter and remedy anticompetitive harm").

[*284] We also note that Congress, in an effort to weed out unmeritorious securities lawsuits, has recently tightened the procedural requirements that plaintiffs must satisfy when they file those suits. To permit an antitrust lawsuit risks circumventing these requirements by permitting plaintiffs to dress what is essentially a securities complaint in antitrust clothing. See generally Private Securities Litigation Reform Act of 1995, 109 Stat. 737; Securities Litigation [2397] Uniform Standards Act of 1998, 112 Stat. 3227.

In sum, an antitrust action in this context is accompanied by a substantial risk of injury to the securities markets and by a diminished need for antitrust enforcement to address anticompetitive conduct. Together these considerations indicate a serious conflict between, on the one hand, application of the antitrust laws and, on the other, proper enforcement of the securities law.

We are aware that the Solicitor General, while recognizing the conflict, suggests a procedural device that he believes will avoid it (in effect, a compromise between the differing positions that the SEC and Antitrust [*36] Division of the Department of Justice took in the courts below). Compare Brief for Dept. of Justice, Antitrust Division, as Amicus Curiae in Case No. 01 CIV 2014, p 23 (seeking no preclusion of the antitrust laws), with Brief for SEC 39-40, App. D to Pet. for Cert. 155a-157a (seeking total preclusion of the antitrust laws). He asks us to remand this case to the District Court so that it can determine "whether respondents' allegations of prohibited conduct can, as a practical matter, be separated from conduct that is permitted by the regulatory scheme," and in doing so, the lower court should decide whether SEC-permitted and SEC-prohibited conduct are "inextricably intertwined." See Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 9, 26. The Solicitor General fears that otherwise, we might read the law as totally precluding application of the antitrust law to underwriting syndicate behavior, even were underwriters, say, overtly to divide markets.

[*285] The Solicitor General's proposed disposition, however, does not convincingly address the concerns we have set forth here--the difficulty of drawing a complex, sinuous line separating securities-permitted from securities-forbidden conduct, the [*37] need for securities-related expertise to draw that line, the likelihood that litigating parties will depend upon the same evidence yet expect courts to draw different inferences from it, and the serious risk that antitrust courts will produce inconsistent results that, in turn, will overly deter syndicate practices important in the marketing of new issues. (We also note that market divisions appear to fall well outside the heartland of activities related to the underwriting process than the conduct before us here, and we express no view in respect to that kind of activity.)

The upshot is that all four elements present in Gordon are present here: (1) an area of conduct squarely within the heartland of securities regulations; (2) clear and adequate SEC authority to regulate; (3) active and ongoing agency regulation; and (4) a serious conflict between the antitrust and regulatory regimes. We therefore [162] conclude that the securities laws are "clearly incompatible" with the application of the antitrust laws in this context.

The Second Circuit's contrary judgment is reversed.

Justice Kennedy took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

Concur

Justice Stevens, [*38] concurring in the judgment.

When investment bankers cooperate in underwriting an initial public offering (IPO), they increase the amount of capital available to firms producing goods and services and make additional securities available for purchase. By agglomerating networks of investors and spreading the risk of overvaluation, syndicates make positive contributions to the economy that could not be achieved through independent action. See 426 F.3d 130, 137-138 (CA2 2005). [2398] In my view, agreements [*286] among underwriters on how best to market IPOs, including agreements on price and other terms of sale to initial investors, should be treated as procompetitive joint ventures for purposes of antitrust analysis. In all but the rarest of cases, they cannot be conspiracies in restraint of trade within the meaning of § 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1.

After the initial purchase, the prices of newly issued stocks or bonds are determined by competition among the vast multitude of other securities traded in a free market. To suggest that an underwriting syndicate can restrain trade in that market by manipulating the terms of IPOs is frivolous. See United States v. Morgan, 118 F. Supp. 621, 689 (SDNY 1953) [*39] (Medina, J.) ("[T]he syndicate system has no effect whatever on general market prices, nor do the participating underwriters and dealers intend it to have any. On the contrary, it is the general market prices of securities of comparable rating and quality which control the public offering price . . . . The particular issue, even if a large one, is but an infinitesimal unit of trade in the ocean of security issues running into the billions, which constitutes the general market"); see also Hovenkamp, Antitrust Violations in Securities Markets, 28 J. Corp. L. 607, 615-618 (2003). It is possible, of course, that the practices described in the complaints in these two cases may have enabled the underwriters to divert some of the benefits of the offerings from the issuers to themselves, thus breaching the agents' fiduciary obligations to their principals. But if such an injury did occur, it is not an "antitrust injury" giving rise to a damages claim by investors. See Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 489, 97 S. Ct. 690, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977).

Nor do I believe that the so-called "laddering" and "tying" described in the complaints constitute vertical restraints that [*40] violate either the Sherman Act or § 2(c) of the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 13(c). Given the magnitude of the market these practices are alleged to have influenced, I think it obvious as a matter of law that there has [*287] been no injury to any relevant competition. Unlike in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007), there is no need to [163] engage in discovery to determine whether there is any merit to the plaintiffs' claims. See id., at 593-595, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 1974-1989(Stevens, J., dissenting).

The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim on the ground, among others, that the plaintiffs' claims challenge "the ordinary activities of participants in underwriting syndicates, which are recognized to be completely lawful and procompetitive." Record, Doc. 98, p 72. I agree and would hold, as we did in Parker v. Brown, 317 U.S. 341, 351-352, 63 S. Ct. 307, 87 L. Ed. 315 (1943), that the defendants' alleged conduct does not violate the antitrust laws, rather than holding that Congress has implicitly granted them immunity from those laws. Surely I would not suggest, as the Court did in Twombly, and as it does again today, [*41] that either the burdens of antitrust litigation or the risk "that antitrust courts are likely to make unusually serious mistakes," ante, at 282, 168 L. Ed. 2d, at 160, should play any role in the analysis of the question of law presented in a case such as this.

Accordingly, I concur in the Court's judgment but not in its opinion.

Dissent by: Thomas

Dissent

Justice Thomas, dissenting.

The Court believes it must decide whether the securities laws implicitly preclude application of the antitrust laws because [2399] the securities statutes "are silent in respect to antitrust." See ante, at 271, 168 L. Ed. 2d, at 153. I disagree with that basic premise. The securities statutes are not silent. Both the Securities Act and the Securities Exchange Act contain broad saving clauses that preserve rights and remedies existing outside of the securities laws.

Section 16 of the Securities Act of 1933 states that "the rights and remedies provided by this subchapter shall be in addition to any and all other rights and remedies that may exist at law or in equity." 15 U.S.C. § 77p(a). In parallel [*288] fashion, § 28 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 states that "the rights and remedies provided by this chapter shall be in addition to [*42] any and all other rights and remedies that may exist at law or in equity." § 78bb(a). This Court has previously characterized those clauses as "confirm[ing] that the remedies in each Act were to be supplemented by 'any and all' additional remedies." Herman & MacLean v. Huddleston, 459 U.S. 375, 383, 103 S. Ct. 683, 74 L. Ed. 2d 548 (1983).

The Sherman Act was enacted in 1890. See 26 Stat. 209. Accordingly, rights and remedies under the federal antitrust laws certainly would have been thought of as "rights and remedies" that existed "at law or in equity" by the Congresses that enacted that Securities Act and the Securities Exchange Act in the early 1930's. See § 77p; § 78bb. Therefore, both statutes explicitly save the very remedies the Court holds to be impliedly precluded. There is no convincing argument for why these saving provisions should not resolve this case in respondents' favor.

The Court's opinion overlooks the saving clauses seemingly because they do not "explicitly state whether they preclude application of the antitrust laws." Ante, at 270, 168 L. Ed. 2d, at 152; see also Brief for Petitioners [164] 33, n 5. [1] As the Court observes, some statutes contain saving clauses specific to antitrust. See, [*43] e.g., Verizon Communications Inc. v. Law Offices of Curtis V. Trinko, LLP, 540 U.S. 398, 406, 124 S. Ct. 872, 157 L. Ed. 2d 823 (2004)("'[N]othing in this Act or the amendments made by this Act shall be construed to modify, impair, or supersede the applicability of [*289] any of the antitrust laws' (quoting Telecommunications Act of 1996, § 601(b)(1), 110 Stat. 143, note following 47 U.S.C. § 152")). But the mere existence of targeted saving clauses does not demonstrate--or even suggest--that antitrust remedies are not included within the "any and all" other remedies to which the securities saving clauses refer. Although Congress may have singled out antitrust remedies for special treatment in some statutes, it is not precluded from using more general saving provisions that encompass antitrust and other remedies. Surely Congress is not required to enumerate every cause of action--state and federal--that may be brought. When Congress wants to preserve all other remedies, using the word "all" is sufficient.

[1] The Court suggests that the argument advanced in my opinion was not preserved by respondents. See ante, at 275, 168 L. Ed. 2d, at 155. Respondents' principal contention in the Court of Appeals below was that "[t]he federal securities laws do not expressly immunize Defendants' alleged conduct from prosecution under the federal antitrust laws." See, e.g., Brief for Appellants in No. 03-9288 (CA2), pp 15-16. Because a full reading of the securities laws is essential to analyzing respondents' central argument, I do not consider arguments based on the saving clauses unpreserved. Cf. United States v. Morton, 467 U.S. 822, 828, 104 S. Ct. 2769, 81 L. Ed. 2d 680 (1984) ("[W]e read statutes as a whole").

[44] Petitioners also argue that the saving clauses should not apply because the clauses did not play a role in the Court's prior securities-antitrust pre-emption cases. Brief for Petitioners 33, n 5 ("[N]either [2400] provision was found to bar immunity in Gordon [v. New York Stock Exchange, Inc., 422 U.S. 659, 95 S. Ct. 2598, 45 L. Ed. 2d 463 (1975),] or United States v. National Assn. of Securities Dealers, Inc., 422 U.S. 694 , 95 S. Ct. 2427, 45 L. Ed. 2d 486 (1975)]"). Be that as it may, none of the opinions in Silver v. New York Stock Exchange, 373 U.S. 341, 83 S. Ct. 1246, 10 L. Ed. 2d 389 (1963), Gordon, or NASD--majority or dissent--offered any analysis of the saving clauses. Omitted reasoning has little claim to precedential value. Absent any indication that these omissions were the product of reasoned analysis instead of inadvertent oversight, I would not allow the Court's prior silence on this issue to erect a perpetual bar to arguments based on a full reading of the statute's relevant text.

Finally, it might be argued that the saving clauses preserve only state-law rights and remedies. This argument has no textual basis. If Congress had intended to limit the clauses to state law, it surely would [*45] not have phrased them to preserve "any and all" rights and remedies. Other provisions in both Acts, including a later sentence in the section containing the Securities Exchange Act's saving clause, [*290] suggest that Congress explicitly referred to States when it intended to impose a state-law limitation. See, e.g., 15 U.S.C. § 77v(a) (referring to "State and Territorial courts"); § 78bb(a) (referring to the "securities commission . . . of any State"); cf. 17 U.S.C. § 301(b) ("Nothing in this title annuls or limits any rights or remedies under the common law or statutes of any State . . ."). Given Congress' demonstrated ability [165] to limit provisions of the securities laws to States and the lack of any such limitation here, the saving clauses cannot be understood as limited only to state-law rights and remedies. [2]

[46] A straightforward application of the saving clauses to this case leads to the conclusion that respondents' antitrust suits must proceed. Accordingly, we do not need to reconcile any conflict between the securities laws and the antitrust laws. I respectfully dissent.

HN1[] Standards of Review, De Novo Review

The appellate court reviews a grant of summary judgment de novo, viewing the record in the light most favorable to the non-movant. Summary judgment is appropriate when there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and the moving party is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law. Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c). To avoid summary judgment, a non-moving party must allege specific facts supported by evidence sufficient to allow a reasonable jury to return a verdict in its favor; a mere "scintilla of evidence" will not suffice.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Scope > General Overview

HN2[] Sherman Act, Scope

The Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, prohibits every contract, combination or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce. The United States Supreme Court has long accepted that Congress does not intend a literal interpretation of that language, and it has read the law as prohibiting only those practices that impose an unreasonable restraint on competition. The burden of proving the unreasonableness of a restraint lies with a plaintiff.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN3[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

Some antitrust plaintiffs face a lighter burden than others, depending upon the nature of the restraint at issue. Plaintiffs challenging restraints subject to the "per se rule" enjoy the lightest burden of proving unreasonableness. Judicial experience has proven certain types of restraints to be so strongly linked with anti-competitive activity, and their economic impact so immediately obvious, that we presume unreasonableness and deem them unlawful restraints of trade per se. When challenging such naked restraints, the plaintiff meets its burden of proving the unreasonableness of the restraint merely by proving the existence and substance of the restraint itself.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN4[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

In a limited number of cases, the restraint on trade appears pernicious enough on its face to fall within the category of restraints that are unlawful per se, but judicial inexperience with the particular type of restraint warrants a "quick look" at the relevant market and the defendant's alleged justifications for imposing the restraint. This amounts to an abbreviated analysis of whether the restraint was unreasonable (though not as abbreviated as an outright condemnation of the restraint as unlawful per se).

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN5[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

The per se and "quick look" standards are exceptional and their application is reserved for the most patently anticompetitive restraints. Given the danger of applying truncated modes of analysis too freely, most antitrust claims are analyzed under a "rule of reason," according to which the finder of fact must decide whether the questioned practice imposes an unreasonable restraint on competition, taking into account a variety of factors, including specific information about the relevant business, its condition before and after the restraint was imposed, and the restraint's history, nature, and effect.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Per Se Rule Tests > Manifestly Anticompetitive Effects

HN6[] Per Se Rule Tests, Manifestly Anticompetitive Effects

Due to the number of variables involved, including the type of restraint, the nature of the market at issue, and the level of judicial experience with a particular type of restraint in any given case, determining which mode of analysis is appropriate rarely allows for the mechanical application of precedent: There is generally no categorical line to be drawn between restraints that give rise to an intuitively obvious inference of anticompetitive effect and those that call for more detailed treatment. What is required, rather, is an appropriate inquiry given the facts of the case, looking to the circumstances, details, and logic of a restraint. The object is to see whether the experience of the market has been so clear, or necessarily will be, that a confident conclusion about the principal tendency of a restriction will follow from a quick (or at least quicker) look, in place of a more sedulous one.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Per Se Rule Tests > Manifestly Anticompetitive Effects

HN7[] Per Se Rule Tests, Manifestly Anticompetitive Effects

United States Supreme Court precedent holds either the per se or "quick look" modes of analysis improper when the alleged substance of the restraint and any purported justifications for it did not create the obvious impression that the restraint would be unreasonably anticompetitive.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Market Definition > Relevant Market > Geographic Market Definition

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Market Definition > Relevant Market > Product Market Definition

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Per Se Rule Tests > Manifestly Anticompetitive Effects

HN8[] Relevant Market, Geographic Market Definition

The antitrust plaintiff's burden begins with the task of properly defining the relevant market. The plaintiff must define both the relevant product market, which includes all reasonably interchangeable products, and the relevant geographic market, which consists of the area in which consumers can practically seek alternative sources of the product. After properly defining the market, the rule of reason also requires the plaintiff to show that the restraint has "detrimental effects" upon the competitiveness of the market.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Per Se Rule Tests > Manifestly Anticompetitive Effects

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > Relevant Market

HN9[] Per Se Rule Tests, Manifestly Anticompetitive Effects

An antitrust plaintiff may satisfy the "detrimental effects" element of its burden in one of two ways. First, a plaintiff may put forth evidence of actual, sustained adverse effects on competition in the relevant market. If the plaintiff cannot submit such evidence, it is relegated to the more challenging course of proving detrimental effects on competition by making an inquiry into market power and market structure designed to assess the restraint's actual effect. A defendant or cartel of defendants has market power if it has the ability to raise price above the competitive level without losing so many sales so rapidly that the price increase is unprofitable and must be rescinded.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Per Se Rule Tests > Manifestly Anticompetitive Effects

HN10[] Per Se Rule Tests, Manifestly Anticompetitive Effects

Only after satisfying the "detrimental effects" requirements does the antitrust plaintiff's burden shift to the defendant to justify its conduct by reference to rational, procompetitive economic principles. If the defendant can do so, the burden returns to the plaintiff to show that the defendant can achieve the same rational, procompetitive ends through means less likely to harm overall competition in the market. If so, the court will ultimately balance the harms and benefits to determine if the behavior is reasonable on the whole.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Per Se Rule Tests > Manifestly Anticompetitive Effects

HN11[] Per Se Rule Tests, Manifestly Anticompetitive Effects

The proven ability to act collectively to exercise influence over trade publication advertising policies does not demonstrate an ability to act collectively to raise price above the competitive level without losing so many sales so rapidly that the price increase is unprofitable and must be rescinded.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Per Se Rule Tests > Manifestly Anticompetitive Effects

HN12[] Per Se Rule Tests, Manifestly Anticompetitive Effects

Demanding certain standards for advertising that exclude some competitors may make the exercise of market power more feasible, but such acts do not alone prove the possession of market power.

MELLOY, Circuit Judge.

Plaintiff Craftsmen Limousine, Inc. ("Craftsmen") brought an antitrust claim against vehicle manufacturers Ford Motor [2] Company ("Ford") and the General Motors Corporation ("GM"), the Limousine Industry Manufacturers' Organization ("LIMO"), and numerous coachbuilding companies engaged in the business of stretching Ford and GM vehicles into limousines. Over the course of the lawsuit, Craftsmen reached settlements with and/or voluntarily dismissed all defendants except Ford and American Custom Coachworks ("American Coach"), one of the coachbuilding companies. In an initial trial, the district court found that an alleged conspiracy between Ford and American Coach to influence the advertising and trade-show policies of two trade publications constituted a per se antitrust violation, and the jury returned a verdict for Craftsmen.

Ford appealed to this court, and we reversed the judgment. Craftsmen Limousine, Inc. v. Ford Motor Co. ("Craftsmen I"), 363 F.3d 761 (8th Cir. 2004). We held that the district court erred in applying a per se rule to the alleged antitrust violation; it instead should have applied the rule of reason. We remanded the case and instructed the district court to apply the rule of reason to Craftsmen's antitrust claim.

After further discovery, the district court [3] [2] granted Ford's motion to exclude Craftsmen's expert witness under Federal Rule of Evidence 702 and granted the motions of Ford and American Coach for summary judgment in their favor. Craftsmen now appeals those decisions. We affirm.

I. BACKGROUND

A. Pre-Litigation Background

The factual background is fairly extensive, and we presented it at length in our first opinion in this case. Craftsmen I, 363 F.3d at 764-71. We will not reiterate it in full here, but we discuss those facts necessary to understand the nature of the claim at issue. Because the district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment in this case, we present the facts in the light most favorable to Craftsmen. Bathke v. Casey's Gen. Stores, Inc., 64 F.3d 340, 343 (8th Cir. 1995).

Craftsmen is a Missouri corporation engaged in the business of stretching [4] standard [*383] base vehicles into limousines and buses. This process involves cutting the base vehicle in two, inserting structural pieces between the two halves of the base vehicle, and welding the parts back together to create a "stretched" limousine. In general, longer structural inserts (and, accordingly, longer stretched limousines) add weight and create greater stress upon the vehicle frame. Craftsmen, however, asserts that its specialized rebuilding process allows for the conversion of base vehicles, including the Ford-manufactured Lincoln Town Car, into very long limousines without sacrificing safety.

The National Highway Traffic Safety Administration requires coachbuilders to self-certify that their limousines meet federal safety standards and to provide some objective basis for that belief. Federal authorities began investigating the safety of limousines following a well-publicized crash and other incidents in the late 1980s. Ford sought to protect its image and, at the same time, to increase its share of the market for base vehicles. In 1990, while Craftsmen was actively engaged in the business of building stretched limousines, Ford formed a vehicle certification program that [5] provided guidelines for the conversion of its vehicles into limousines that met national safety standards. Ford would certify a participant in the program as a "Quality Vehicle Modifier" ("QVM") if it abided by Ford guidelines for converting limousines and purchased insurance naming Ford as the insured. The guidelines limited the conversion options of coachbuilders. Among Ford products, coachbuilders could only convert Lincoln Town Cars, and there were limits upon the total weight of the resulting limousines and the length to which they could be stretched (no more than 120 additional inches). Coachbuilders that followed the guidelines gained some assurance that their vehicles met federal standard standards, and they received cash incentives from Ford for their participation in the QVM program. GM adopted a similar but separate program in 1992, the Cadillac Master Coachbuilders ("CMC") program. Coachbuilders who wished to stretch a vehicle in a manner that did not conform to QVM guidelines could retain QVM membership only if they submitted independent test data regarding vehicle safety to Ford. Most coachbuilders, including all of the original defendants in this case, participated in [6] one or both of the QVM and CMC programs.

Craftsmen was one of a minority of American coachbuilding companies that chose not to participate in either program. Many of Craftsmen's conversions at the time resulted in vehicles longer than the limits imposed by the QVM and CMC programs (hereinafter "specialty limousines"), and joining the QVM program would have required Craftsmen to abandon its practice of building specialty limousines or to seek costly independent safety analysis. In addition, Craftsmen was already using techniques described in the QVM guidelines, and Craftsmen's owners had no reason to believe that the company's converted vehicles were unsafe. A federal inspection of its converted vehicles in the early 1990s resulted only in some minor, federally-mandated safety modifications.

Ford was also a nonvoting member of LIMO, an industry group of coachbuilders that formed in 1989 to pool resources for product testing and to promote consumer confidence in limousines. American Coach was a voting member. Among coachbuilders, LIMO membership was open only to those businesses who participated in the QVM and/or CMC programs; eventually, LIMO amended its bylaws to allow non-participating [7] coachbuilders to join if they submitted independent crash-test data. Craftsmen did not join either program or perform independent crash tests, and [*384] therefore it was ineligible to become a member of LIMO.

Ford, American Coach, and other LIMO members soon began to act through the organization to exert influence over marketing outlets in the limousine industry. In 1995, LIMO received a commitment from one trade publication to remove all non-QVM and non-CMC advertisers and to deny non-QVM and non-CMC coachbuilders access to its trade show. In a 1996 LIMO teleconference, its members unanimously agreed that they would "not endorse or participate in any publication which continues to promote non-CMC/QVM limousine manufacturers" or "any limousine trade show which promotes the interests of non-CMC/QVM products." By 1996, both of the major trade publications in the limousine industry had adopted restrictive policies that barred coachbuilders that did not participate in the QVM or CMC programs from placing advertisements unless they submitted independent crash-test data to prove that their vehicles complied with federal safety standards. Non-participating coachbuilders also faced restrictions [8] upon their participation in the publications' annual trade shows. In the face of these limitations, Craftsmen's business suffered. It found creative ways to market its company name, such as promoting its ability to customize buses and stretch sport-utility vehicles (neither of these services were subject to advertising restrictions). Craftsmen also maintained a company Web site for marketing purposes, and Craftsmen was able to remain profitable in 1995 and 1996. In 1997--the first year since at least 1991 in which Craftsmen did not turn a profit--Craftsmen began to advertise in a new trade publication that did not require proof of certification or QVM/CMC participation. Craftsmen's expert concedes that, by some point in 1998, any adverse impact of the advertising ban upon Craftsmen's business had evaporated. The same year, Craftsmen filed suit against Ford, American Coach, and several other defendants in the United States District Court for the Western District of Missouri. Craftsmen alleged, inter alia, that the defendants engaged in a conspiracy in restraint of trade in violation of federal antitrust law, 15 U.S.C. § 1, and that this conspiracy harmed Craftsmen's [9] business from 1995 to 1998.

B. Trial, First Appeal, and Craftsmen I

Craftsmen's claims against Ford and American Coach proceeded to a jury trial in 2002. The jury returned a verdict of favor of Craftsmen for more than $ 2 million in damages, which the district court tripled pursuant to 15 U.S.C. § 15(a). Ford and American Coach appealed to this court, arguing that the evidence was insufficient to establish a conspiracy among them, Craftsmen I, 363 F.3d at 771, and that the district court erred in finding that the alleged restraint of trade constituted a per se antitrust violation. Id. at 772. We disagreed with the first contention and held that Craftsmen submitted evidence sufficient for a reasonable jury to conclude that Ford and American Coach acted through LIMO to exclude Craftsmen and other specialty coachbuilders from advertising in trade publications and participating in trade shows. Id.

We agreed with Ford and American Coach, however, that these actions did not amount to a per se violation of antitrust law. Id. at 772-76. We came to this conclusion because restrictions upon coachbuilders that [10] had not submitted particular evidence that their products met certain safety standards are not necessarily anti-competitive: "[T]he creation and enforcement of standards, including safety standards, often has pro-competitive effects. For example, having unsafe limousines in [*385] the market could tend to undercut consumer confidence in all limousines, and thereby decrease overall limousine sales." Id. at 774. In short, we found that "the economic impact of safety standards is not immediately discernable." Id. Therefore, the case demanded a more thorough analysis than the abbreviated one employed by the district court to determine whether the restraint was unreasonable. Id.

We held that the district court should have instead applied the rule of reason to determine whether the actions of Ford and American Coach unreasonably restrained trade in the industry. Id. at 776. Under the rule of reason, the factfinder probes more deeply into the relevant circumstances to determine whether the actions at issue created an unreasonable restraint on competition. Id. at 772-73. Because this question was never posed to the jury, we remanded the [11] case to the district court. Id. at 777. We also ruled that the testimony of Craftsmen's expert, David Cole, was inadmissible insofar as it purported to prove an antitrust violation or measure damages arising out of assumed anticompetitive conduct. Id. While Cole was qualified and provided expert testimony with regard to Craftsmen's damages, his testimony was not helpful to a jury in a rule-of-reason case because he "assumed that Craftsmen's alleged lost growth from 1995 through 1998 was caused by [the] defendants' alleged conspiracy. He did not determine whether other factors . . . may have affected Craftsmen's growth rate. Under the rule of reason analysis, which should have been applied in this case, such an analysis was required." Id.

C. Post-Remand Proceedings

Upon its return to the district court, Craftsmen retained economist John Scoggins to perform expert analysis consistent with our opinion in Craftsmen I. To carry out this task, Scoggins used statistical models to show what the demand for Craftsmen limousines should have been during the years at issue and noted that the actual demand was significantly smaller. He identified several variables [12] that could have caused the reduced demand, such as the national economy or competition from other coachbuilders. After running regressions to determine the impact of these variables, he found that none could account for Craftsmen's disappointing sales figures from 1995 to 1998. Therefore, by process of elimination, he concluded that the advertising and trade-show restrictions must have been the primary cause of the dampened demand for Craftsmen's services during that period. Through the use of a dummy variable to gauge this impact, he was able to estimate the total amount of sales that Craftsmen lost as a result of the restrictions.

Craftsmen merely asked Scoggins to analyze the impact of the behavior of Ford and American Coach upon Craftsmen's net income from 1995 to 1998, and to specifically look into alternative causes for disappointing sales for Craftsmen during the years in question. He performed that task, and went no further. He did not explore whether the restraints had or could have an anti-competitive impact upon the limousine industry as a whole. He did, however, undertake some research into the limousine industry as a whole insofar as it related to Craftsmen's damages, [13] and he found that the number of competitors in the industry had not changed significantly over a thirteen-year period. He also acquired limited, anecdotal evidence of the adverse impact of the advertising and trade-show restrictions upon the sales figures of one other specialty limousine manufacturer during the same time period.

Ford moved to exclude Scoggins's testimony under Federal Rule of Evidence 702, [*386] and both Ford and American Coach moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions. It concluded that Scoggins's opinion would not "assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue," Fed. R. Evid. 702, because Scoggins did not analyze whether the restraints at issue were anti-competitive under the rule of reason; he merely analyzed their effect upon Craftsmen. Further, the district court took issue with Scoggins's definition of the relevant market. Scoggins claimed that he analyzed the effects of the allegedly anti-competitive behavior upon the "specialty limousine market"--that is, a market for limousines stretched beyond QVM and CMC limits. He acknowledged [14] that QVM- and CMC-compliant limousines and specialty limousines are substitute products and manufacturers of each type "do compete at some level," but he asserted that they are not "close substitutes." Scoggins offered no empirical support for this market definition. Therefore, the district court found his testimony inadmissible under Rule 702.

The district court also noted that Craftsmen's opposition to summary judgment depended upon the admissibility of Scoggins's testimony. It therefore granted the motions of Ford and American Coach for summary judgment in the case.

II. DISCUSSION

Craftsmen appeals, arguing that the district court erred in excluding Scoggins's opinion under Rule 702 and in granting summary judgment in favor of Ford and American Coach. The issues are closely related, and we need not address them both. The reasons for the district court's determination that Scoggins's opinion would not assist the trier of fact, if valid, would be the same reasons that his opinion cannot save Craftsmen from an adverse summary judgment ruling in this case. Therefore, we review the question of whether summary judgment was appropriate in light of the record as a whole, including [15] Scoggins's opinion.

A. General Principles of Law

HN1[] We review a grant of summary judgment de novo, viewing the record in the light most favorable to the non-movant. Bathke, 64 F.3d at 343. Summary judgment is appropriate when "there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and . . . the moving party is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c). To avoid summary judgment, a non-moving party must allege specific facts supported by evidence sufficient to allow a reasonable jury to return a verdict in its favor; a mere "scintilla of evidence" will not suffice. Rolscreen Co. v. Pella Prods. of St. Louis, Inc., 64 F.3d 1202, 1211 (8th Cir. 1995).

HN2[] The Sherman Act prohibits "[e]very contract, combination . . . or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce." 15 U.S.C. § 1. The Supreme Court has long accepted that Congress did not intend a literal interpretation of that language, and it has read the law as prohibiting only those practices that "impose[] an unreasonable restraint on competition." Arizona v. Maricopa County Med. Soc'y, 457 U.S. 332, 342-43, 102 S. Ct. 2466, 73 L. Ed. 2d 48 (1982). [16] The burden of proving the unreasonableness of a restraint lies with the plaintiff. United States v. Arnold, Schwinn & Co., 388 U.S. 365, 374 n.5, 87 S. Ct. 1856, 18 L. Ed. 2d 1249 (1967), overruled on other grounds by Continental T.V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania Inc., 433 U.S. 36, 58-59, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568 (1977); Paschall v. Kansas City Star Co., 727 F.2d 692, 701-02 (8th Cir. 1984); United States v. Empire Gas Corp., 537 F.2d 296, 308 (8th Cir. 1976).

HN3[] [*387] Some antitrust plaintiffs face a lighter burden than others, depending upon the nature of the restraint at issue. Plaintiffs challenging restraints subject to the "per se rule" enjoy the lightest burden of proving unreasonableness. Judicial experience has proven certain types of restraints to be so strongly linked with anti-competitive activity, and their economic impact so immediately obvious, that we presume unreasonableness and deem them unlawful restraints of trade per se. State Oil Co. v. Khan, 522 U.S. 3, 10, 118 S. Ct. 275, 139 L. Ed. 2d 199 (1997); Nat'l Collegiate Athletic Ass'n v. Bd. of Regents, 468 U.S. 85, 100, 104 S. Ct. 2948, 82 L. Ed. 2d 70 (1984). When challenging such [17] naked restraints, the plaintiff meets its burden of proving the unreasonableness of the restraint merely by proving the existence and substance of the restraint itself. See Nat'l Soc. of Prof. Eng'rs v. United States, 435 U.S. 679, 692, 98 S. Ct. 1355, 55 L. Ed. 2d 637 (1978) ("In the first category are agreements whose nature and necessary effect are so plainly anticompetitive that no elaborate study of the industry is needed to establish their illegality--they are 'illegal per se.'"). The district court applied this approach to the advertising restrictions at issue here prior to our opinion in Craftsmen I.

HN4[] In a limited number of other cases, the restraint appears pernicious enough on its face to fall within the category of restraints that are unlawful per se, but judicial inexperience with the particular type of restraint warrants a "quick look" at the relevant market and the defendant's alleged justifications for imposing the restraint. Craftsmen I, 363 F.3d at 773; see also Calif. Dental Ass'n v. FTC, 526 U.S. 756, 769-71, 119 S. Ct. 1604, 143 L. Ed. 2d 935 (1999) (acknowledging the existence of the "quick look" mode of analysis). This amounts to an abbreviated [18] analysis of whether the restraint was unreasonable (though not as abbreviated as an outright condemnation of the restraint as unlawful per se).

HN5[] These two standards are exceptional, however, and their application is reserved for the most patently anticompetitive restraints. Given the danger of applying those truncated modes of analysis too freely, State Oil Co., 522 U.S. at 18, "most antitrust claims are analyzed under a 'rule of reason,' according to which the finder of fact must decide whether the questioned practice imposes an unreasonable restraint on competition, taking into account a variety of factors, including specific information about the relevant business, its condition before and after the restraint was imposed, and the restraint's history, nature, and effect." Id. at 10.

HN6[] Due to the number of variables involved, including the type of restraint, the nature of the market at issue, and the level of judicial experience with a particular type of restraint in any given case, determining which mode of analysis is appropriate rarely allows for the mechanical application of precedent:

> [T]here is generally no categorical line to be drawn [19] between restraints that give rise to an intuitively obvious inference of anticompetitive effect and those that call for more detailed treatment. What is required, rather, is an [appropriate inquiry given the facts of] the case, looking to the circumstances, details, and logic of a restraint. The object is to see whether the experience of the market has been so clear, or necessarily will be, that a confident conclusion about the principal tendency of a restriction will follow from a quick (or at least quicker) look, in place of a more sedulous one.

[*388] B. The Scope of Craftsmen I

In Craftsmen I, we held that the district court erred in applying a per se mode of analysis to the restraint at issue in this case. We noted that the restraint appeared to be an attempt to alter the competitive field in the limousine industry: "[i]n essence, defendants' alleged restraint was an attempt to force Craftsmen to either comply with QVM guidelines or stop selling limousines." Craftsmen I, 363 F.3d at 774. We also found, however, that the defendants' plausible safety justifications for pursuing the restrictive [20] advertising standards could have procompetitive effects and therefore an abbreviated analysis of its anticompetitive impact was inappropriate. Id. at 776. This decision followed a line of recent HN7[] Supreme Court precedent holding either the per se or "quick look" modes of analysis improper when the alleged substance of the restraint and any purported justifications for it did not create the obvious impression that the restraint would be unreasonably anticompetitive. See, e.g., Calif. Dental Ass'n, 526 U.S. at 781; State Oil Co., 522 U.S. at 19, 21-22. Under that reasoning, we held in Craftsmen I that the experience of the market and the type of restraint at issue in this case were not so clearly anticompetitive that the district court could properly substitute an abbreviated analysis "in place of a more sedulous one." Calif. Dental Ass'n, 526 U.S. at 781.

Therefore, on remand, Craftsmen had the burden of proving the unreasonableness of the restraint given "a variety of factors" under the rule of reason, State Oil Co., 522 U.S. at 10; it would not enjoy a presumption of unreasonableness based solely [21] upon the existence of the restraint itself. HN8[] This burden begins with the task of properly defining the relevant market. Double D Spotting Serv., Inc. v. Supervalu, Inc., 136 F.3d 554, 560 (8th Cir. 1998). The plaintiff must define both the relevant product market, which includes "all reasonably interchangeable products," and the relevant geographic market, which consists of the "area in which consumers can practically seek alternative sources of the product." Id. After properly defining the market, the rule of reason also requires the plaintiff to show that the restraint has "detrimental effects" upon the competitiveness of the market. FTC v. Ind. Fed'n of Dentists, 476 U.S. 447, 460-61, 106 S. Ct. 2009, 90 L. Ed. 2d 445 (1986) (quotation omitted).

HN9[] A plaintiff may satisfy the "detrimental effects" element of its burden in one of two ways. First, a plaintiff may put forth evidence of "actual, sustained adverse effects on competition" in the relevant market. Id. at 461. If the plaintiff cannot submit such evidence, it is relegated to the more challenging course of proving detrimental effects on competition by making "an inquiry into market power [22] and market structure designed to assess the [restraint]'s actual effect." Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 768, 104 S. Ct. 2731, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628 (1984). A defendant or cartel of defendants has market power if it has the ability "'to raise price above the competitive level without losing so many sales so rapidly that the price increase is unprofitable and must be rescinded.'" Midwestern Mach. Co. v. Nw. Airlines, Inc., 392 F.3d 265, 274 (8th Cir. 2004) (quoting William A. Landes & Richard A. Posner, Market Power in Antitrust Cases, 94 Harv. L. Rev. 937, 937 (1981)).

HN10[] Only after satisfying the above requirements does the burden shift to the defendant to "justify its conduct by reference to rational, procompetitive economic principles." Flegel v. Christian Hosp., Ne.-Nw., 4 F.3d 682, 688 & n.4 (8th [*389] Cir. 1993) (quotation omitted). If the defendant can do so, the burden returns to the plaintiff to show that the defendant can achieve the same rational, procompetitive ends through means less likely to harm overall competition in the market. Id. at 688. If so, the court will ultimately balance [23] "'the harms and benefits to determine if the behavior is reasonable'" on the whole. Id. (quoting Bhan v. NME Hosp., Inc., 929 F.2d 1404, 1413 (9th Cir. 1991)).

Contrary to Craftsmen's assertions on the present appeal, none of the elements of this burden were addressed or decided in Craftsmen I. Indeed, we could not have decided them, because Craftsmen's case had never gone before a factfinder charged with deciding the dispute under the rule of reason approach. Craftsmen I did discuss the procompetitive justifications of Ford and American Coach, but only insofar as they related to the question of which analysis to apply to the case: per se, "quick look," or rule of reason. We did not purport to actually apply the proper approach (the rule of reason), and we did not address the procompetitive justifications in that context.

C. The Propriety of Summary Judgment on Remand

For the following reasons, we hold that Craftsmen failed to produce evidence sufficient to allow a reasonable jury to conclude that it satisfied its burden of proof as defined above. Therefore, the district court did not err in granting summary judgment to Ford and American Coach.

1. [24] Market Definition

The parties do not appear to dispute the relevant geographic market in this case, but they contest the relevant product market. Ford and American Coach claim that the relevant product market consists of the market for limousines generally, while Craftsmen argues for the existence and relevance of a smaller sub-market for longer specialty limousines. The district court found Craftsmen's definition unavailing, and so do we. Craftsmen's attempt to define the relevant product market as the "specialty limousine market" lacks any evidentiary support aside from Scoggins's bald assertions and is inconsistent with Craftsmen's overall claim. As such, no reasonable juror could find that the specialty limousine market is the relevant product market for this antitrust claim.

Craftsmen defines the specialty limousine market as the market for limousines stretched longer than QVM standards (120 inches) or CMC standards (130 inches) during the time frame at issue. Under that definition, a Lincoln Town Car stretched by 85 inches competes in the same product market as one stretched by 120 inches, while a Town Car stretched by 120 inches competes in a separate market from one stretched [25] by 121 inches. Further, a Town Car stretched by 85 inches would compete in the same market as a Cadillac DeVille stretched by 130 inches, while a Town Car stretched by 125 inches would compete in a separate market than a DeVille stretched by the exact same length. Any reasonable juror would find it implausible that consumers would make such arbitrary and illogical distinctions when buying limousines, and Craftsmen presented no evidence that consumers act in such a manner. Put simply, no reasonable juror could find that Town Cars stretched by 120 and 121 inches, respectively, were not "reasonably interchangeable products," Double D Spotting Serv., Inc., 136 F.3d at 560, particularly given that Craftsmen maintains that Town Cars stretched by 120 and 85 inches are reasonably interchangeable.

[*390] Even if Craftsmen had sufficient evidence to support such an apparently arbitrary definition of the product market, we note that it would ultimately undermine Craftsmen's claim. The restrictions at issue arguably aided QVM and CMC members to the general detriment of Craftsmen and all other specialty limousine builders. Assuming those facts to be true, the restrictions certainly harmed [26] some of the competitors within the specialty limousine market. There is no evidence, however, that the restrictions harmed competition within that market. See NYNEX Corp. v. Discon, Inc., 525 U.S. 128, 135, 119 S. Ct. 493, 142 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1998) (stating that, when the rule of reason applies, a plaintiff "must allege and prove harm, not just to a single competitor, but to the competitive process, i.e., to competition itself"). From the record, it does not appear that the restrictions gave any particular competitor or cartel of competitors within the specialty limousine industry the power to profitably raise prices above or restrict output below a competitive level. To the extent they did, Craftsmen was a likely beneficiary of any anti-competitive environment within the specialty limousine industry; the restrictions may have discouraged upstart coachbuilders from engaging in the process of building specialty limousines and clearly barred QVM and CMC members from serving that allegedly separate market. Thus, the restrictions insulated well-established coachbuilders like Craftsmen from competition in the specialty limousine market. In short, if the restrictions created [27] the risk of an anti-competitive environment within some discrete market for specialty limousines, that risk did not stand to harm Craftsmen. Indeed, under the market definition Craftsmen proposes, Craftsmen would have been the beneficiary--not the victim--of reduced competition and artificially high prices within that market.

2. Detrimental Effects

Even though we hold that no reasonable jury could find that Craftsmen properly defined the market as the "specialty limousine market," Craftsmen contends that it presented sufficient evidence of an antitrust violation to avoid summary judgment regardless of whether the relevant product market is defined as the market for specialty limousines or the market for limousines generally. Therefore, we proceed to examine whether Craftsmen presented evidence sufficient for a jury to find detrimental effects on competition in the correct product market--the market for limousines generally.

We first look to whether Craftsmen submitted evidence of "actual, sustained adverse effects on competition" in the general market for limousines. Ind. Fed'n of Dentists, 476 U.S. at 461. Craftsmen points to no evidence that such effects occurred [28] in the limousine industry as a result of the restrictions. Craftsmen did not show an increase in limousine prices above the competitive level during that time period, nor a decrease in the total number of competitors, nor a reduction in overall limousine output, nor some other economic indicator that the coachbuilding industry as a whole suffered anticompetitive consequences due to the advertising restrictions. The mere fact that the restrictions may have reduced demand for specialty limousines relative to their shorter counterparts does not, without more, show an actual, sustained adverse effect on competition in the market as a whole. Any action that a profit-seeking business takes could increase its market share relative to some other segment of that market; indeed, most rational businesses actively take such steps at every available opportunity. Such steps impact competitors, but that alone does not prove [*391] an adverse impact upon the competitive process.

There may have been other conceivable avenues of proving detrimental effects upon the competitive process in this case. For example, Craftsmen may have been able to show that the restrictions stifled industry research and development [29] by effectively forcing innovative coachbuilders to perform costly independent safety testing of vehicles that did not comply with QVM or CMC guidelines. If Craftsmen offered more than a scintilla of evidence that the restrictions were so detrimental to the survival of non-QVM/CMC participants and independent testing so cost-prohibitive that the defendants created an artificial and illegitimately high barrier to competition by means of innovation, then Craftsmen's case might survive summary judgment. Cf. Allied Tube & Conduit Corp. v. Indian Head, Inc., 486 U.S. 492, 495-98, 108 S. Ct. 1931, 100 L. Ed. 2d 497 (1988) (describing a jury verdict for the plaintiff on facts similar to those hypothesized above); Radiant Burners, Inc. v. Peoples Gas Light & Coke Co., 364 U.S. 656, 659-60, 81 S. Ct. 365, 5 L. Ed. 2d 358 (1961) (per curiam) (reversing the dismissal of the plaintiff's antitrust claim based upon allegations that the defendants refused to offer their seal of approval for the plaintiff's product and effectively forced it from the market for anticompetitive reasons). Craftsmen does not direct our attention to any such evidence, and facts that do appear in the record would not permit [30] a reasonable jury to find that the advertising restraints had "actual, sustained adverse effects on competition" of the type hypothesized above. Ind. Fed'n of Dentists, 476 U.S. at 461.

Because Craftsmen cannot directly prove actual adverse effects on competition during the years at issue, we turn to the question of whether it has presented evidence to prove those effects indirectly through "an inquiry into market power and market structure." Copperweld Corp., 467 U.S. at 768. We find that Craftsmen did not submit evidence sufficient to satisfy its burden of proof under this alternative means of proving the detrimental, anticompetitive effects of the advertising restrictions, and therefore it cannot avoid summary judgment.

First, it is clear that Ford and American Coach, acting independently, do not wield power in the limousine market; that is, neither one has the ability "to raise price above the competitive level without losing so many sales so rapidly that the price increase is unprofitable and must be rescinded." Midwestern Mach. Co., 392 F.3d at 274 (quotation omitted). Ford sells motor vehicles, a tiny percentage of which are [31] converted into limousines (as are a tiny percentage of vehicles sold by other car manufacturers). It does not sell limousines, and therefore it can individually affect the competitiveness of the limousine market only by unilaterally raising the prices of its pre-conversion vehicles or by entering into an agreement to sell a certain line of vehicles solely to a certain coachbuilder, thus making that coachbuilder the exclusive dealer of limousines converted from that particular base vehicle. The common-sense realities of the market show that Ford lacks the ability to profitably take either step. If Ford were to raise the prices of its motor vehicles generally above competitive levels, it would lose sales to competitors in the much larger market for off-the-lot vehicles, as well as the market for base vehicles to be converted into limousines. Ford also lacks the ability to profitably sell an existing line of vehicles exclusively to a particular coachbuilder, even if it made those sales at a price far above the competitive level. According to Scoggins, there were only 2,250 limousine conversions of any vehicle [*392] make in the United States in 1994. If Ford were, for example, to make its Lincoln [32] Town Cars unavailable to the public and sell them exclusively to one coachbuilder, the loss in profits from sales to individuals and other businesses would obviously outweigh the marginal profits of making and selling far fewer Town Cars at a higher price. Craftsmen presents no evidence to contradict these apparent realities of the market.

American Coach does compete in the limousine industry, but the record reveals that it by no means dominates that market. It is merely one of many competitors engaged in the business of coachbuilding, and therefore any attempt to unilaterally increase its prices above competitive levels would be thwarted by consumer flight to American Coach's competitors.

Because neither Ford nor American Coach has the ability to wield market power on their own, we must assume that Craftsmen's theory of the case depends upon the concerted actions of Ford, GM, and the members of their QVM and CMC programs, including American Coach. Acting together, these businesses could conceivably exercise market power in the industry. If a broad cartel of QVM and CMC members agreed to collectively raise prices above competitive levels, the action could be profitable due in large [33] part to advertising restrictions that would have made it more difficult for consumers to learn about competitively-priced alternatives to doing business with cartel members. In other words, through price-fixing and cutting off the means for non-members to compete effectively, the cartel could collectively act as a monopoly within the coachbuilding industry.

This theory, if proven, could support a finding of market power and an antitrust violation in this case. On the record before us, however, no reasonable jury could find such market power, particularly given the structure of the limousine market. Craftsmen's only evidence of market power is the fact that Ford, GM, and several QVM and CMC coachbuilders acted collectively through LIMO to pressure trade publications into restricting marketing opportunities for coachbuilders who did not belong to the QVM or CMC programs and did not perform independent crash testing. HN11[] This proven ability to act collectively to exercise influence over trade publication advertising policies does not demonstrate an ability to act collectively "to raise price above the competitive level without losing so many sales so rapidly that the price increase is unprofitable [34] and must be rescinded." Midwestern Mach. Co., 392 F.3d at 274 (quotation omitted). We noted in Craftsmen I that Craftsmen had presented sufficient evidence to prove an agreement among the defendants to set advertising standards; it had not proven that such an agreement was unreasonably anticompetitive. We did not find that the agreement at issue, without more, was sufficient evidence of market power, and we do not make that finding now. We note thatHN12[] demanding certain standards for advertising that exclude some competitors may make the exercise of market power more feasible, but such acts do not alone prove the possession of market power.

Craftsmen did not fill this evidentiary void on remand. The record offers no other evidence to show that these coachbuilders formed a cartel with the ability to collectively exercise market power. For example, there is no evidence that these coachbuilders exchanged price or output information or took some other step that would facilitate price-fixing among them. There is also no evidence that the structure of the coachbuilding market would allow for a well-disciplined cartel. Indeed, the record suggests that the market consists [35] [*393] of a large number of small coachbuilding firms who engage in individually negotiated sales for customized products, facts that make the detection and punishment of firms that "cheat" on any price-fixing agreement difficult if not impossible. There appear to be low costs to entry into and exit from the market, and the minimum efficient scale within the industry appears to be fairly small; both facts weigh against the sustainability of any anticompetitive cartel because its membership would necessarily consist of a large number of firms who would face new and frequent price competition from upstart firms. For example, a small-scale cartel member selling vehicles to livery operators in St. Louis and Kansas City above the competitive price (per an agreement with the cartel) would be hard-pressed to remain faithful to that agreement if a new, non-cartel firm took advantage of the ease of entry into the limousine market and began marketing directly to those same livery operators through personal visits, phone calls, mailings, or advertisements in sources other than trade shows or the two major trade publications. Multiply this likely scenario many times over for the numerous small-scale [36] firms in the industry, and it becomes clear that the structure of the limousine market during the years at issue in this case made the attainment and exercise of market power nearly impossible.

Finally, even if Craftsmen could show the feasibility of such a cartel that would have market power, Craftsmen has identified no motive for Ford to engage in such a conspiracy. Ford makes motor vehicles; it does not convert them into limousines. Any anticompetitive agreement among coachbuilders would likely reduce output in the limousine industry and therefore hurt Ford's sales of base vehicles without any apparent benefits to Ford. In sum, Craftsmen simply has not submitted sufficient evidence of the existence of some entity--whether an individual defendant or the defendants acting as a cartel--with the means to exercise market power in the limousine industry.

III. CONCLUSION

As we noted in Craftsmen I, the advertising restrictions in this case may be legitimately procompetitive insofar as they protect both consumers and the public image of the limousine market generally. Craftsmen I, 363 F.3d at 774-75. Thus, the restrictions could promote consumer confidence [37] in the industry as a whole, as well as avoid a situation in which the entire market for limousines--safe and unsafe alike--would be dampened due to an accident involving a limousine made by a single coachbuilder that did not adequately test the safety of its vehicles.

At the same time, the circumstances surrounding the adoption of the restrictions in this case are somewhat troubling, and we wish to make clear that our decision today does not foreclose plaintiffs from succeeding in antitrust suits for similar restrictions in future cases. LIMO members may very well have had anticompetitive motives in mind when they sought the restrictions at issue here, and those restrictions may have had some detrimental effects upon competition in the limousine industry. Craftsmen simply did not offer proof sufficient for a reasonable jury to make such a finding. Therefore, we affirm the judgment of the district court.

It is well ingrained in the law that subject-matter jurisdiction can be called into question either by challenging the sufficiency of the allegation or by challenging the accuracy of the jurisdictional facts alleged. If the defendant challenges only the legal sufficiency of the plaintiff's jurisdictional allegations, the court must take all facts alleged in the complaint as true and draw all reasonable inferences in favor of plaintiff. If the parties present factual evidence that is relevant to the jurisdictional question, the court may consider such evidence. The district court must consider facts outside the pleadings if resolution of a proffered factual issue may result in the dismissal of the complaint for want of jurisdiction. The party asserting subject-matter jurisdiction bears the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence that jurisdiction exists.

HN10[] International Law, Individuals & Sovereign States

The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit recently explained that the revenue rule is a longstanding common law doctrine providing that courts of one sovereign will not enforce final tax judgments or unadjudicated tax claims of other sovereigns. The revenue rule was originally created by eighteenth-century English courts as what amounted to a subsidy for British trade: English courts refused to enforce foreign customs laws that would have had the effect of interfering with or diminishing British trade. More recently, federal courts have found that the revenue rule should continue to be applied to serve separation of powers and sovereignty concerns.

HN11[] Authority to Regulate, International Regulation of Taxation

A court will not recognize those liabilities arising in a foreign state, if they run counter to the "settled public policy" of its own. Thus a scrutiny of the liability is necessarily always in reserve, and the possibility that it will be found not to accord with the policy of the domestic state. To pass upon the provisions for the public order of another state is, or at any rate should be, beyond the powers of a court; it involves the relations between the states themselves, with which courts are incompetent to deal, and which are intrusted to other authorities. It may commit the domestic state to a position which would seriously embarrass its neighbor. Revenue laws fall within the same reasoning; they affect a state in matters as vital to its existence as its criminal laws. No court ought to undertake an inquiry which it cannot prosecute without determining whether those laws are consonant with its own notions of what is proper.

The revenue rule is implicated whenever the substance of the claim is, either directly or indirectly, one for tax revenues, such that the whole object of the suit is to collect tax for a foreign revenue, and that this will be the sole result of a decision in favour of the plaintiff. What matters is not the form of the action, but the substance of the claim.

Because (1) claims by a foreign sovereign for damages sustained in its capacity as a commercial actor do not raise the same policy concerns as claims brought by a foreign sovereign in its sovereign capacity and (2) foreign sovereigns are subject to suit in the federal courts for claims arising out of commercial actions, claims brought by a foreign sovereign in a commercial capacity do not constitute the kind of direct enforcement of a foreign revenue law that is barred by the revenue rule.

HN18[] Authority to Regulate, International Regulation of Taxation

There is a continuum along which a claim will require a court to consider or "pass on" a foreign tax law. At the least problematic end of the continuum is the mere recognition of a foreign tax law. At the next point along the continuum, a court must apply such a foreign law. Next, a claim might require a court to rule on the validity of a foreign tax law. Finally, a claim might require a court to explicitly enforce a foreign revenue law. The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit cases make clear that the revenue rule clearly bars explicit enforcement. However, whether lesser forms of consideration of a foreign revenue law--recognition, application, and determination of validity--are permissible depends on the extent to which the consideration of the foreign revenue law raises separation of powers and sovereignty concerns.

HN19[] Authority to Regulate, International Regulation of Taxation

In the typical case where a court will have to rule on the validity of a foreign tax law, the court will have to determine whether the law is consistent with its own public policy. The revenue rule bars such a determination in most, if not all, circumstances.

The approach to the revenue rule--allowing a federal court to assess the policy implications of considering, applying, and determining the validity of a foreign revenue law before determining whether a claim that triggers such consideration is barred by the revenue rule--is most consistent with the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit's recent revenue law jurisprudence.

The revenue rule is designed to address two concerns: first, that policy complications and embarrassment may follow when one nation's courts analyze the validity of another nation's tax laws; and second, that the executive branch, not the judicial branch, should decide when our nation will aid others in enforcing their tax laws. These twin concerns for sovereignty and separation of powers are important to the revenue rule analysis, because they imply certain exceptions to the rule.

Sales of liquor in a national or international market can be made by a government agency authorized to sell liquor by the government's constitution, a private entity that is authorized by a law permitting (or the absence of a law prohibiting) any private individual to sell liquor, a private entity that was granted corporate status by the sovereign, or a private entity that was specially licensed by the sovereign to sell liquor. Although the regulation of liquor distributing and sale is clearly a sovereign act, a sovereign's participation in a liquor manufacturing and distribution market is a purely commercial act. The fact that the sovereign may have decided to enter the liquor business itself as opposed to allowing or licensing others to enter the business in no way transforms the sale of liquor into a sovereign act.

The test whether a law is penal, in the strict and primary sense, is whether the wrong sought to be redressed is a wrong to the public or a wrong to the individual. Wrongs are divisible into two sorts or species: private wrongs and public wrongs. The former are an infringement or privation of the private or civil rights belonging to individuals, considered as individuals and are thereupon frequently termed "civil injuries;" the latter are a breach and violation of public rights and duties, which affect the whole community, considered as a community, and are distinguished by the harsher appellation of crimes and misdemeanors.

HN38[] Conflict of Law, Forum Selection

The principle of forum non conveniens is simply that a court may resist imposition upon its jurisdiction even when jurisdiction is authorized by the letter of a general venue statute. The decision as to whether to dismiss a case on forum non conveniens grounds is trusted to the sound discretion of the trial court. The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit has explained that district courts should follow a three-step process when exercising this discretion: At step one, a court determines the degree of deference properly accorded the plaintiff's choice of forum. At step two, it considers whether the alternative forum proposed by the defendants is adequate to adjudicate the parties' dispute. Finally, at step three, a court balances the private and public interests implicated in the choice of forum.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Dispute Resolution > Conflict of Law > Forum Selection

Civil Procedure > Preliminary Considerations > Venue > Forum Non Conveniens

HN39[] Conflict of Law, Forum Selection

Step one in considering whether to dismiss a case on forum non conveniens grounds requires the court to determine what degree of deference should be afforded to the plaintiff's choice of forum. When a plaintiff selects her home as a forum, the plaintiff should be given "great deference," but when a foreign resident selects a United States forum, the plaintiff is entitled to "less deference." In order to determine how much deference a plaintiff should be accorded, the court must determine the extent to which the plaintiff's choice of forum was based on legitimate convenience concerns and to what extent the choice constitutes mere forum shopping.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Dispute Resolution > Conflict of Law > Forum Selection

Civil Procedure > Preliminary Considerations > Venue > Forum Non Conveniens

HN40[] Conflict of Law, Forum Selection

In considering whether to dismiss a case on forum non conveniens grounds the more it appears that a domestic or foreign plaintiff's choice of forum has been dictated by reasons that the law recognizes as valid, the greater the deference that will be given to the plaintiff's forum choice. Stated differently, the greater the plaintiff's or the lawsuit's bona fide connection to the United States and to the forum of choice and the more it appears that considerations of convenience favor the conduct of the lawsuit in the United States, the more difficult it will be for the defendant to gain dismissal for forum non conveniens. Thus, factors that argue against forum non conveniens dismissal include the convenience of the plaintiff's residence in relation to the chosen forum, the availability of witnesses or evidence to the forum district, the defendant's amenability to suit in the forum district, the availability of appropriate legal assistance, and other reasons relating to convenience or expense.

HN41[] Conflict of Law, Forum Selection

In considering whether to dismiss a case on forum non conveniens grounds, the more it appears that the plaintiff's choice of a U.S. forum was motivated by forum-shopping reasons--such as attempts to win a tactical advantage resulting form local laws that favor the plaintiff's case, the habitual generosity of juries in the United States or in the forum district, the plaintiff's popularity or the defendant's unpopularity in the region, or the inconvenience and expense to the defendant resulting from litigation in that forum--the less deference the plaintiff's choice commands and, consequently, the easier it becomes for the defendant to succeed on a forum non conveniens motion by showing that convenience would be better served by litigating in another country's courts.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Dispute Resolution > Conflict of Law > Forum Selection

Civil Procedure > Preliminary Considerations > Venue > Forum Non Conveniens

HN42[] Conflict of Law, Forum Selection

At step two in considering whether to dismiss a case on forum non conveniens grounds , the plaintiff bears the burden of establishing that an adequate alternative forum exists. An alternative forum is adequate if the defendants are amendable to service of process there, and if it permits litigation of the subject matter of the dispute.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Dispute Resolution > Conflict of Law > Forum Selection

Civil Procedure > Preliminary Considerations > Venue > Forum Non Conveniens

HN43[] Conflict of Law, Forum Selection

In considering whether to dismiss a case on forum non conveniens grounds, in the event the court determines that an adequate alternative forum exists, the court proceeds to step three, which requires the court to balance two sets of factors to determine which forum is best suited to adjudicate the case. The first set of factors are the "private interest" factors, which are designed to assess which forum is most convenient for the parties: the relative ease of access to sources of proof; availability of compulsory process for attendance of unwilling, and the cost of obtaining attendance of willing, witnesses; possibility of view of premises, if view would be appropriate to the action; and all other practical problems that make trial of a case easy, expeditious, and inexpensive.

HN44[] Conflict of Law, Forum Selection

In considering whether to dismiss a case on forum non conveniens grounds, in making the private interest analysis, the court should focus on the precise issues that are likely to be actually tried. In a suit alleging negligence, for example, the court might reach different results depending on whether the alleged negligence lay in the conduct of actors at the scene of the accident, or in the design or manufacture of equipment at a plant distant from the scene of the accident.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Dispute Resolution > Conflict of Law > Forum Selection

Civil Procedure > Preliminary Considerations > Venue > Forum Non Conveniens

HN45[] Conflict of Law, Forum Selection

In considering whether to dismiss a case on forum non conveniens grounds, the court must also consider the following public interest factors: Administrative difficulties follow for courts when litigation is piled up in congested centers instead of being handled at its origin. Jury duty is a burden that ought not to be imposed upon the people of a community which has no relation to the litigation. In cases which touch the affairs of many persons, there is reason for holding the trial in their view and reach rather than in remote parts of the country where they can learn of it by report only. There is a local interest in having localized controversies decided at home. There is an appropriateness, too, in having the trial of a diversity case in a forum that is at home with the state law that must govern the case, rather than having a court in some other forum untangle problems in conflict of laws, and in law foreign to itself.

International comity is the recognition which one nation allows within its territory to the legislative, executive or judicial acts of another nation, having due regard both to international duty and convenience. Whatever its precise contours, international comity is clearly concerned with maintaining amicable working relationships between nations, a shorthand for good neighbourliness, common courtesy and mutual respect between those who labour in adjoining judicial vineyards. The doctrine of international comity provides that, in certain circumstances, a federal court will (1) recognize or provide res judicata effect to foreign judgments and/or (2) dismiss a case before it in deference to a parallel action pending in a foreign jurisdiction.

International Law > Dispute Resolution > Comity Doctrine > General Overview

HN54[] Dispute Resolution, Comity Doctrine

Ordinarily, parallel proceedings in a foreign jurisdiction do not warrant dismissal: The mere existence of parallel foreign proceedings does not negate the district courts virtually unflagging obligation to exercise the jurisdiction given them. The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit has described international comity's boundaries as "amorphous" and "fuzzy" and has declined to articulate a precise set of factors that district courts should consider in determining whether to dismiss an action in deference to an action pending in a foreign court. However, the Second Circuit has explained that in the context of parallel proceedings in a foreign court, a district court should be guided by the principles upon which international comity is based: the proper respect for litigation in and the courts of a sovereign nation, fairness to litigants, and judicial efficiency. Proper consideration of these principles will no doubt require an evaluation of various factors, such as the similarity of the parties, the similarity of the issues, the order in which the actions were filed, the adequacy of the alternative forum, the potential prejudice to either party, the convenience of the parties, the connection between the litigation and the United States, and the connection between the litigation and the foreign jurisdiction. This list is not exhaustive, and a district court should examine the totality of the circumstances, to determine whether the specific facts before it are sufficiently exceptional to justify abstention.

HN60[] Justiciability, Political Questions

The United States Supreme Court has identified those situations in which an issue is non-justiciable under the political question doctrine. Prominent on the surface of any case held to involve a political question is found (1) a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department; or (2) a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving it; or (3) the impossibility of deciding without an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for nonjudicial discretion; or (4) the impossibility of a court's undertaking independent resolution without expressing lack of the respect due coordinate branches of government; or (5) an unusual need for unquestioning adherence to a political decision already made; or (6) the potentiality of embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question.

Because the nonjusticiability of political questions is primarily a function of the constitutional separation of powers the dominant consideration in any political question inquiry is whether there is a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department. Dismissal under the political question doctrine is inappropriate in the absence of an issue whose adjudication would likely result in improper judicial encroachment upon the foreign relations power committed to the coordinate political branches.

Under the plain language of this section, a violation of § 1962(a) consists of investing income derived from a pattern of racketeering activity to acquire an interest in, establish, or operate an enterprise; the violation is not established by mere participation in predicate acts of racketeering. Under the "operation or management" test, one is liable under RICO if he participated in the operation or management of the enterprise itself. Individuals participate in the operation or management of an enterprise when they serve as lower rung participants in the enterprise who are under the direction of upper management or are others associated with the enterprise who exert control over it as, for example, by bribery.

In order to state a claim under 18 U.S.C.S. § 1962(d), the complaint should state with specificity what the agreement was, who entered into the agreement, when the agreement commenced, and what actions were taken in furtherance of it. Conclusory allegations concerning the conspiracy are insufficient. Recently, in the analogous antitrust context, the United States Supreme Court held that stating a conspiracy claim requires a complaint with enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest that an agreement was made it simply calls for enough fact to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of illegal agreement.

Under the civil Racketeering Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) statute, which requires a plaintiff to establish that he was injured "by reason" of a RICO violation, 18 U.S.C.S. § 1964(c), plaintiffs must establish that their injuries were proximately caused by the alleged violation. Proximate cause reflects ideas of what justice demands, or of what is administratively possible or convenient and requires some direct relation between the injury asserted and the injurious conduct alleged.

In order to recover for a civil Racketeering Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) claim, the compensable injury flowing from a violation of RICO necessarily is the harm caused by predicate acts sufficiently related to constitute a pattern, for the essence of the violation is the commission of those acts in connection with the conduct of an enterprise.

The proximate cause element has a different meaning in the Racketeering Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act context than it does in the common law context. At common law, so long as the plaintiff category is foreseeable, there is no requirement that the risk of injury to the plaintiff, and the risk of the harm that actually occurred, were what made the defendant's actions wrongful in the first place. With statutory claims, the issue is, instead, one of statutory intent: was the plaintiff (even though foreseeably injured) in the category the statute meant to protect, and was the harm that occurred (again, even if foreseeable), the "mischief" the statute sought to avoid.

When factors other than the defendant's fraud are an intervening direct cause of a plaintiff's injury, that same injury cannot be said to have occurred by reason of the defendant's actions. In certain cases, civil Racketeering Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act claims are barred when it is difficult to ascertain the amount of a plaintiff's damages attributable to the violation, as distinct from other independent factors such as poor business practices or plaintiff's failure to anticipate developments in the financial markets.

First, the less direct an injury is, the more difficult it becomes to determine what portion of the damages are attributable to the Racketeering Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) violation as distinct from other, independent, factors. Second, if recovery by indirectly injured plaintiffs were not barred, courts would be forced, in order to prevent multiple recovery, to develop complicated rules apportioning damages among groups of plaintiffs depending on how far each group was removed from the defendant's underlying RICO violation. Third, there was no need to permit indirectly injured plaintiffs to sue, as directly injured victims could be counted on to vindicate the aims of the RICO statute, and their recovery would fix the injury to those harmed as the result of the injury they suffered.

The complaint must also identify the purpose of the mailing within the defendant's fraudulent scheme. The purpose of Rule 9(b) is threefold--it is designed to provide a defendant with fair notice of a plaintiff's claim, to safeguard a defendant's reputation from improvident charges of wrongdoing, and to protect a defendant against the institution of a strike suit.

However, the plaintiff must provide some minimal factual basis for conclusory allegations of scienter that give rise to a strong inference of fraudulent intent. At this time, the case law in the Second Circuit leaves some ambiguity as to precisely what constitutes a "new and independent injury."

Where plaintiff has actual notice of all the information in the movant's papers and has relied upon these documents in framing the complaint the necessity of translating a Rule 12(b)(6) motion into one under Rule 56 is largely dissipated.

[*375] MEMORANDUM & ORDER

GARAUFIS, United States District Judge:

The Republic of Colombia, Colombia's Capital District of Bogota, and a number of Departments of the Republic of Colombia (collectively, "Plaintiffs") bring a civil Racketeering Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act ("RICO") claim and common law claims against Diageo North America Inc., United Distillers Manufacturing Inc., Diageo PLC, Seagram Export Sales Company Inc., Pernod Ricard USA LLC, and Pernod-Ricard S.A. (collectively, "Defendants"). Essentially, Plaintiffs allege that Defendants are members of a RICO enterprise composed of illegal narcotics traffickers and Defendants' distributors for the purpose of laundering the proceeds of illegal narcotics sales and illegally smuggling liquor into Colombia.

At this time, Defendants Diageo North America Inc., United Distillers Manufacturing Inc., Seagram Export Sales Company Inc., and Pernod Ricard USA LLC move for dismissal on a number of grounds. [1] First, Defendants assert that the action is barred by the revenue and penal rules. Second, Defendants move [4] for dismissal under the doctrine of forum non conveniens. Third, Defendants request [*376] that this court abstain from hearing the action under the doctrine of international comity. Fourth, Defendants assert that this case is barred because it presents non-justiciable political questions. Fifth, Defendants argue that Plaintiffs' RICO claim should be dismissed because RICO should not be applied extraterritorially to the alleged conduct, which largely occurred outside of the United States. Sixth, Defendants argue that the RICO claim should be dismissed because the Second Amended Complaint fails to plead adequately a RICO claim. Finally, the Defendants assert that Plaintiffs' RICO claim is barred by the statute of limitations. For the reasons described below, Defendants' motion to dismiss on the ground that the revenue rule bars the instant action is granted in part and denied in part. Defendants' other motions are denied.

[5] I. FACTUAL BACKGROUND

Defendants move to dismiss under Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 12(b)(1) and 12(b)(6). HN1[] With respect to Defendants' Rule 12(b)(6) motion, the court must accept all factual allegations in Plaintiffs' pleadings and must draw inferences from those allegations in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs. United States v. The Baylor Univ. Med. Ctr., 469 F.3d 263, 267 (2d Cir. 2006). HN2[] With respect to Defendants' Rule 12(b)(1) motion, the court must accept all undisputed factual allegations as true and draw all reasonable inferences in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs. Robinson v. Malaysia, 269 F.3d 133, 140 (2d Cir. 2001). To the extent the parties dispute facts relevant to Defendants' Rule 12(b)(1) motion using evidentiary submissions, the court will consider the submitted evidence and, if necessary, decide the disputed factual questions. See id. at 140 n.6 (in context of motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, district court "must" consult factual submissions [6] "if resolution of a proffered factual issue may result in the dismissal of the complaint for want of jurisdiction"). With very few exceptions, the material facts are undisputed. Where the court makes a factual finding, it will do so explicitly. That being said, this statement of facts is not intended to be a comprehensive description of all of the factual issues relevant to this motion. Rather, this section is limited to a description of Plaintiffs' claims. Other factual issues are discussed in detail in subsequent sections.

Plaintiffs

Plaintiffs are various Columbian national and regional governmental agencies. The Plaintiff Departments of the Republic of Colombia possess a "constitutional monopoly on the domestic manufacture and sale of liquor products." (Second Amended Complaint ("SAC") P 1.) Some Plaintiffs manufacture and/or distill liquor and some of the Plaintiffs sell and distribute liquor in Colombia. (Id.) Plaintiffs "are by far the largest sellers and producers of liquor products within the Republic of Colombia." (Id.)

Defendants

Defendant Diageo North America is a Connecticut corporation authorized to do business in the State of New [7] York. (Id. P 11.) Defendant United Distillers Manufacturing is a Delaware Corporation authorized to do business in the State of New York with a principal place of business in Stamford, Connecticut. (Id. P 12.) Diageo PLC is a British corporation that purchased United Distillers in 1997. (Id. P 13.) Defendant Seagram Export Sales Co., Inc. is a New York corporation. (Id. P 14.) Defendant Pernod Ricard USA, LLC is an Indiana corporation with a principal place of business in White Plains, New York. (Id. P 15.) Defendant Pernod-Ricard S.A. is a French corporation with a principal place of business in [*377] France. (Id. P 16.) Defendants manufacture, distill and/or distribute liquor

[1] Defendants Diageo PLC and Pernod-Ricard S.A. do not move for dismissal at this time. However, all of the parties have stipulated that Diageo PLC and Pernod-Ricard S.A. (1) will be bound by the court's decision with respect to the instant motions and (2) may move for dismissal on grounds not raised in the instant motions once they are decided.

and other alcoholic beverages on an international scale, including such well-known brands as Tanqueray gin, Smirnoff vodka, Seagram's 7, Guinness stout, and Baileys Original Irish Cream. (Id. P 16; Declaration of Carlos Acevedo ("Acevedo Decl.") Exh. 2 at 9.)

The Enterprise

Plaintiffs allege that all of the Defendants were part of a single RICO enterprise. (SAC P 108.) Although Defendants competed with each other, "they were well aware of each other's activities, copied [8] each other's strategies when they were successful, and in most cases utilized the same distributors to conduct their illegal sales." (Id. P 26.) Defendants' "co-conspirators, in the money laundering schemes, including associated distributors, shippers, currency dealers, wholesalers, money brokers, and other participants" were also members of the enterprise. (Id. P 108.)

The Second Amended Complaint alleges that Defendants knowingly entered into a money-laundering enterprise with narcotics traffickers and, at all times, controlled the enterprise. Defendants "controlled every aspect of the financial transactions involving the purchase of their liquor products." (SAC P 28.) "Defendants also controlled the exact methods and means by which they were paid for the liquor products." (Id.) Defendants controlled the distribution channels through which their liquor traveled. (Id. P 30.) Defendants worked with their co-conspirators to create a "complex web of companies located in Aruba and Panama to disguise the true nature and origin of the criminal proceeds" that were being laundered. (Id. P 31, 35.) "Defendants and their co-conspirators knew that the purpose and design [9] of this system of seemingly unrelated parties to the financial transaction was to conceal, hide and/or disguise the true nature of the criminal proceeds they were accepting." (Id. P 27(d).)

Although the Second Amended Complaint consists of 180 pages and 227 paragraphs, the Plaintiffs essentially allege that Defendants are part of illegal RICO enterprise engaged in money laundering, smuggling, tax evasion, as well as wire and mail fraud.

The Scheme

The alleged scheme begins with the United States Dollars or other currency that a Colombian narcotics trafficking organization obtains from illegal drug sales. (Id. P 27(c); Acevedo Decl. Exh. 6 at 13.) At least some of these moneys are deposited into bank accounts in the United States in small amounts. (SAC P 27(c).) "A large percentage of the narcotics laundering process that occurs in regard to these narcotics sales occur in the Eastern District of New York. By virtue of demographics, population, and other factors, a large percentage of individuals involved in laundering these narcotics proceeds reside in and conduct their money-laundering activities in the Eastern District of New York." (Acevedo Decl. Exh. 6, [10] Affidavit of Alvin C. James ("James Aff.") P 12.) These cash deposits are in sufficiently small amounts so as to avoid detection by law enforcement authorities. (SAC P 27(c).) A large number of individuals called "smurfs" are used to make these small bank deposits. "The key to the 'smurf' system is the use of a lot of accounts--and a lot of smurfs." (Id.)

At this point, the Colombian narcotics organization must find a way to convert its United States Dollars into Colombian pesos without disclosing its illegal operation to law enforcement authorities. (James Aff. PP 5-6.) Because currency and banking laws preclude drug dealers from laundering their money through banks or other [*378] financial institutions, the drug traffickers and money launderers launder their unlawfully obtained funds primarily through the purchase and sale of commercial goods. (Id. P 6.)

Ultimately, the proceeds from the illegal narcotics sales are transferred to Defendants. (SAC P 27.) Precisely how this occurs is far less clear. Often, multiple intermediaries are used. (Id. PP 27(a), 29.) Defendants' Aruban distributors often serve as intermediaries. (Id. PP 27(f), 30.) Checks drawn from U.S. accounts [11] in which cash proceeds from narcotics sales were deposited in small amounts appear to be paid directly to Defendants. (See id. P 27(c) ("Checks are then drawn on these accounts--which represent narcotics proceeds--and these checks are then exchanged by Colombian criminal organizations for liquor products manufactured by the Defendants.").)

This transfer of the narcotics proceeds is one aspect of an informal currency exchange known as the Black Market Peso Exchange ("BMPE"). (James. Aff. PP 2-7.) Plaintiffs have retained Alvin C. James, the former Senior Policy Advisor for Money Laundering of the United States Treasury Department's Financial Crimes Enforcement Network ("FinCEN") and founding chairman of the Treasury Department's BMPE working group. (James Aff. P 2.) James states that, prior to his retirement in 2000, he "was the Treasury Department's leading authority on money laundering via international trade financing." (Id.) In his testimony before the Senate Caucus on International Narcotics Control, James explained the BMPE:

> The Colombian narcotics trafficker has a constant need to repatriate a large part of his drug sale proceeds to Colombia in the form of Colombian [12] pesos. He needs these pesos to operate his illicit business, attempt to avoid government intervention in his activities, and maintain his wealthy lifestyle. It is important to note that the narcotics trafficker's situation is the opposite of the Colombian dollar/peso broker, since the trafficker has dollars in the U.S. and needs pesos in Colombia; the peso broker has pesos in Colombia and needs dollars in the U.S.
> The trafficker sells the dollars to the broker. The broker pays for the dollars with pesos in Colombia. . . .
> . . . .
> The dollar/peso broker uses two parallel bank accounts to facilitate the sale of dollars to the Colombian importer. The first was a peso account in Colombia. The second was [a] U.S. dollar account in the United States. The dollar/peso broker takes an order for U.S. dollars and receives payment in pesos in Colombia. The dollars are not delivered to the Colombian purchaser, but instead at the time of order, the purchaser instructs the dollar/peso broker to deliver the U.S. dollars to the trade goods supplier to whom he owes payment. These suppliers are often in the U.S., although they may also be in Panama or other ports of trade in Asia or [13] Europe. The trade goods are shipped to Colombia and smuggled into the country to avoid tariffs and taxes[.]

(Acevedo Decl. Exh. 2 at 20-21.)

In their brief, Plaintiffs assert that tax evasion is not a purpose of the alleged RICO enterprise. (See Pl. FNC Opp. at 18 ("Defendants' buyers cannot use the legitimate importation system, not because they don't want to pay taxes, but because they cannot risk having their use of narcotics-derived funds discovered by the Colombian authorities. . . . In other words, Defendants' coconspirators are not selling illegally in order to avoid taxes, they are selling illegally in order to avoid detection of their use of laundered funds derived from narcotics trafficking.")) Plaintiffs [*379] cite only Alvin James's Affidavit in support of this proposition. The court has carefully reviewed the James Affidavit, however, and finds that at no point does James dispute that tax evasion is a purpose or effect of the alleged enterprise.

Further, James's testimony before United States House of Representatives Subcommittee on General Oversight and Investigations of the Committee on Banking and Financial Services and the United States Senate Caucus on International [14] Narcotics Control, which is attached to James's affidavit, [2] confirms that both tax evasion and money laundering are purposes and functions of the smuggling scheme alleged by Plaintiffs. James testified that Colombian importers need U.S. dollars to purchase foreign goods, and Colombian laws prevent importers from obtaining U.S. dollars legally without paying the "high Colombian tariffs and taxes." (Acevedo Decl. Exh. 6 at 20.) James also testified that the Colombian importer "needs to obtain these [U.S.] dollars discreetly so that he can evade the duties and taxes applicable to his imports." (Id. at 12.) Similarly, James testified that the BMPE provides a means through which Colombian narcotics traffickers can launder the proceeds of illegal drug sales: "[O]nce the trafficker has sold the dollars located in the United States and has received his pesos in accounts in Colombia, he has effectively laundered those dollars." (Id. at 21; see also James Aff. P 6.)

[15] One significant aspect of the BMPE is that the narcotics trafficker is willing to sell each dollar for less than a dollar because he values the service of having his dollars laundered: "[T]he narcotics trafficker sells the currency to the dollar/peso broker at a substantial discount, often amounting to as much as 30 percent. . . . As a result, the dollar/peso broker is now able to offer his clients, notably Colombian importers, not only a [discreet] source of U.S. dollars, but at a rate significantly less than the rate offered by the Colombian central bank." (Acevedo Decl. Exh. 6 at 21.)

[2] The exhibits to the James Affidavit are not set off from the James Affidavit with tabs. However, both the James Affidavit and exhibits thereto are Exhibit 6 of the Acevedo Declaration. As a result, the court will cite to exhibits to the James Affidavit as "Acevedo Decl. Exh. 6."

Plaintiffs allege that Defendants benefit from their RICO enterprise in three distinct ways. First, Defendants are able to charge the Colombian importers higher prices than they would be able to charge in a legal market because the importers obtain the U.S. dollars that they use to purchase the goods at a discount, i.e., the importers purchase each U.S. dollar for less than one dollar. (James Aff. P 7.) Second, because the enterprise allows importers to obtain a very large amount of U.S. dollars at a price that is lower than the importers would pay in the absence of the enterprise, the enterprise [16] permits importers to sell large quantities of liquor to consumers at below-market prices. (Id.) In doing so, Defendants increase their market share and their profits by selling a far larger quantity of liquor to Colombian consumers at reduced prices. (Id.) Third, Defendants assert that "because liquor demand is relatively elastic, the manufacturers are able to change demographic buying patterns, so that, for example, consumers will purchase more Johnny Walker or Lucky Strike and less rum or a domestic cigarette brand, because the Johnny Walker and the Lucky Strike are relatively cheaper than they would be if legitimately imported and sold." (Id.) Although it is not entirely clear how this the third alleged benefit is materially different from the second alleged benefit, for purposes of [*380] this motion, the court accepts all three allegations as true.

Damages

Plaintiffs seek numerous categories of damages. Only a few key categories will be discussed here. First, Plaintiffs seek "the total amount of criminal proceeds laundered by the Defendants." (SAC P 104.) Second, Plaintiffs seek to recover "large amounts of money [expended] in their efforts to stop money [17] laundering and to recoup funds that they have lost as a result of the activities of the Defendants[.]" (Id. P 105.) Third, Plaintiffs, as liquor manufacturers and distributors, seek compensation for the revenues and profits lost as a result of the Defendants' enterprise. (Id. P 103(a).)

Alleged Relationship between Plaintiffs' Lost Sales and Profits and Defendants' Money Laundering and Tax Evasion

Defendants dedicate a lot of time, energy, and words to their argument that the Second Amended Complaint asserts claims for damages resulting from tax evasion and smuggling as opposed to money laundering. (E.g., Def. FNC Rep. at 18-19.) I find that the Second Amended Complaint states a claim for damages resulting from both money laundering and tax evasion.

The alleged enterprise permits the Colombian importers to purchase liquor from Defendants and/or their agents with U.S. dollars that are acquired at a discounted price, i.e., because each dollar is acquired for less than one dollar. (James Aff. P 6.) Some portion of this discount clearly results from the amount of the Colombian taxes that the importers are unlawfully evading through the enterprise. (Acevedo [18] Decl. Exh. 6 at 12.) Another portion of the discount (if not the remainder of the discount) results from the fact that narcotics traffickers are willing to "sell" their U.S. dollars for less than their face value, i.e., drug dealers sell each dollar for less than one dollar. (Acevedo Decl. Exh. 6 at 20-21.) In effect, the narcotics dealers are paying, as a money laundering fee to the enterprise, the difference between the face value of the money and the price which they are paid for the money. This means that some portion of the discounted price at which the Colombian importers are purchasing the Defendants' liquor results from tax evasion (the "tax evasion discount") and some portion of the discounted price at which the Colombian importers are purchasing the Defendants' liquor results exclusively from laundering the proceeds from narcotics sales (the "money-laundering discount" or the "narco-laundering discount").

The Second Amended Complaint alleges that the price discount that Colombian importers pay for their goods is passed along to consumers. (SAC P 103(c).) The discounted retail prices cause Colombian consumers to purchase more of Defendants' liquor than they would otherwise [19] purchase. This increase in consumption of Defendants' products leads (1) to a decrease in consumption of Plaintiffs' competing liquor and/or (2) Plaintiffs to decrease their prices so as to be able to compete with Defendants. Either way, the enterprise causes Plaintiffs to lose revenues and profits. (Id. PP 103(a), (c), (d).)

II. STANDARD OF REVIEW

A. Rule 12(b)(1) Motions

On a number of different grounds, Defendants move to dismiss the Second Amended Complaint for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(1). HN3[] "It is well ingrained in the law that subject-matter jurisdiction can be called into question either by challenging the sufficiency of the allegation or by challenging the accuracy of the jurisdictional facts alleged." *Gwaltney of Smithfield, Ltd. v. Chesapeake Bay [381] Found., Inc., 484 U.S. 49, 68, 108 S. Ct. 376, 98 L. Ed. 2d 306 (1987) (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (citations omitted; emphasis in original). "If the defendant challenges only the legal sufficiency of the plaintiff's jurisdictional allegations, the court must take all facts alleged in [20] the complaint as true and draw all reasonable inferences in favor of plaintiff." Robinson, 269 F.3d at 140 (internal citations and quotation marks omitted). If the parties present factual evidence that is "relevant to the jurisdictional question," the court may consider such evidence. Id.; accord Goonewardena v. New York, 475 F. Supp. 2d 310 (S.D.N.Y. 2007). The district court must consider facts outside the pleadings "if resolution of a proffered factual issue may result in the dismissal of the complaint for want of jurisdiction." Robinson, 269 F.3d at 141 n.6. The party asserting subject-matter jurisdiction bears the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence that jurisdiction exists. Makarova v. United States, 201 F.3d 110, 113 (2d Cir. 2000); accord Goonewardena, 475 F. Supp. 2d at 310.

The parties dispute whether Defendants' motion to dismiss the Second Amended Complaint on the basis of the revenue rule and Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' RICO claims on the ground of extraterritoriality are properly brought under Rule 12(b)(1), as opposed to Rule 12(b)(6). Plaintiffs [21] cite Arbaugh v. Y&H Corporation, 546 U.S. 500, 126 S. Ct. 1235, 163 L. Ed. 2d 1097 (2006), in support of the proposition that both of these motions may be brought only under Rule 12(b)(6). In Arbaugh, the Supreme Court held that whether the employer had a sufficient number of employees to satisfy the definition of "employer" under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 was merely an element of a Title VII claim as opposed to a jurisdictional prerequisite. The Arbaugh court held that HN4[] "[t]he basic statutory grants of federal-court subject-matter jurisdiction are contained in 28 U.S.C. §§ 1331 and 1332," and other statutory requirements for recovery should not be treated as jurisdictional unless "the Legislature clearly states that a threshold limitation on a statute's scope shall be jurisdictional[.]" Id. at 514-15, 126 S. Ct. at 1244-45.

With respect to Defendants' revenue rule motion, irrespective of whether the revenue and penal rules are characterized as limitations on subject-matter jurisdiction or abstention doctrines, Rule 12(b)(1) is an appropriate basis on which to make such a motion. See *United States v. Portrait of Wally, 99 Civ. 9940 (MBM), 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6445, 2002 WL 553532, [22] at 6 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 12, 2002) (motion to dismiss on the basis of the act of state, international comity, and political question doctrines heard on a Rule 12(b)(1) motion even though "[t]hose doctrines go to justiciability rather than to jurisdiction"); 5B Wright & Miller § 1350 ("Courts have recognized a variety of other defenses that one normally would not think of as raising subject matter jurisdiction questions when considering a Rule 12(b)(1) motion, including claims that . . . the subject matter is one over which the federal court should abstain from exercising jurisdiction").

With respect to Defendants' motion to dismiss the RICO claim on the ground of extraterritoriality, I find that the standard of review will be the same whether it is brought under Rule 12(b)(1) or Rule 12(b)(6). Although the Second Circuit treated civil RICO's territoriality requirement as jurisdictional prior to Arbaugh, see North South Fin. Corp. v. Al-Turki, 100 F.3d 1046, 1050-51 (2d Cir. 1996), at least one court has questioned whether Arbaugh requires courts to treat civil RICO's territorial requirement as merely an element of the claim. See *Ayyash v. Bank Al-Madina, No. 04 Civ. 9201 (GEL), 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9677, [*382] 2006 WL 587342, at 4 n.2 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 9, 2006) [23] ("The Supreme Court's decision in Arbaugh may require that the Court of Appeals review its treatment of the question of RICO's extraterritorial effect."). This court agrees that there is, in the least, a serious question as to whether, in the civil RICO context, the territoriality requirement can be considered jurisdictional under Arbaugh.

In this case, there is no reason to resolve the question of whether RICO's territoriality requirement goes to the court's subject-matter jurisdiction. Defendants have made clear that they "do not rely upon material outside of the Complaint for" their motion to dismiss on the basis of extraterritoriality. (Def. RICO Rep. at 2.) Nor do Plaintiffs seek to introduce facts outside of the Second Amended Complaint for purposes of this motion. As a result, whether the motion on this ground is brought under Rule 12(b)(1) or Rule 12(b)(6), the court is required to treat the allegations in the Second Amended Complaint as true and to draw reasonable inferences on the basis of such allegations. See Robinson, 269 F.3d at 140 (HN5[] "If the defendant challenges only the legal sufficiency of the plaintiff's jurisdictional [24] allegations, the court must take all facts alleged in the complaint as true and draw all reasonable inferences in favor of plaintiff.") (citations and quotation marks omitted).

B. Rule 12(b)(6) Motions

With the exception of the mail and wire fraud predicate RICO acts, which are subject to a heightened pleading requirement under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 9(b), the Second Amended Complaint is subject to the liberal pleading requirement set forth in Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8. After briefing and oral argument on this motion were complete, the Supreme Court clarified the pleading standards under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8 and the standard under which Rule 12(b)(6) motions are reviewed. In Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 1974, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007), the Court explained that HN6[] plaintiffs must allege "enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." If they "have not nudged their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible, their complaint must be dismissed." Id.; see also Goldstein v. Pataki, 488 F. Supp. 2d 254, No. 06-CV-5827 (NGG), 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 41216, 2007 WL 1654009, at *33 (E.D.N.Y. June 6, 2007) [25] (Garaufis, J.) (discussing Twombly).

Since Twombly, the Second Circuit has explained that Twombly imposes a plausibility requirement on pleadings under Rule 8, but does not, as a general matter, change the Rule 8 pleading standard:

> After careful consideration of the Court's [Twombly] opinion and the conflicting signals from it that we have identified, we believeHN7[] the Court is not requiring a universal standard of heightened fact pleading, but is instead requiring a flexible "plausibility standard," which obliges a pleader to amplify a claim with some factual allegations in those contexts where such amplification is needed to render the claim plausible.

Iqbal v. Hasty, 490 F.3d 143, 2007 U.S. App. LEXIS 13911, at *35 (2d Cir. June 14, 2007). In another post-Twombly decision, the Second Circuit confirmed that HN8[] "the district court must accept as true all of the factual allegations set out in plaintiff's complaint, draw inferences from those allegations in the light most favorable to plaintiff, and construe [26] the complaint liberally." Roth v. Jennings, 489 F.3d 499, 2007 U.S. App. LEXIS 13035, 2007 WL 1629889, at *11 (2d Cir. June 6, 2007).

Of course, courts in this Circuit have noted that HN9[] RICO claims "'must be reviewed with appreciation of the extreme sanctions it provides so that actions traditionally brought in state courts do not gain access to treble damages and attorneys fees in federal court simply because they [*383] are cast in terms of RICO violations.'" Leung v. Law, 387 F. Supp. 2d 105, 112-13 (E.D.N.Y. 2005) (Garaufis, J.) (quoting Mathon v. Marine Midland Bank, N.A., 875 F. Supp. 986, 1001 (E.D.N.Y. 1995)). In this vein, it has also been said that "courts should strive to flush out frivolous RICO allegations at any early stage of the litigation." Burnett v. Al Baraka Inv. & Dev. Corp. (In re Terrorist Attacks on September 11, 2001), 349 F. Supp. 2d 765, 827 (S.D.N.Y. 2005) (quotation marks omitted).

III. REVENUE RULE

A. Background

HN10[] The Second Circuit recently explained that "[t]he revenue rule is a longstanding common law doctrine providing that courts of one sovereign will not enforce final tax judgments [27] or unadjudicated tax claims of other sovereigns." Attorney General of Canada v. R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Holdings, Inc. (hereinafter, "Canada"), 268 F.3d 103, 109 (2d Cir. 2001). The revenue rule was originally created by eighteenth-century English courts as what amounted to a subsidy for British trade: English courts refused to enforce foreign customs laws that would have had the effect of interfering with or diminishing British trade. Id. at 110. More recently, federal courts have found that the revenue rule should continue to be applied to serve separation of powers and sovereignty concerns. Id. at 109-115. Courts continue to refer to Judge Learned Hand's explanation of the rationale for the revenue rule:

> HN11[] [A] court will not recognize those [liabilities] arising in a foreign state, if they run counter to the 'settled public policy' of its own. Thus a scrutiny of the liability is necessarily always in reserve, and the possibility that it will be found not to accord with the policy of the domestic state. . . . To pass upon the provisions for the public order of another state is, or at any rate should be, beyond the powers [28] of a court; it involves the relations between the states themselves, with which courts are incompetent to deal, and which are intrusted to other authorities. It may commit the domestic state to a position which would seriously embarrass its neighbor. Revenue laws fall within the same reasoning; they affect a state in matters as vital to its existence as its criminal laws. No court ought to undertake an inquiry which it cannot prosecute without determining whether those laws are consonant with its own notions of what is proper.

Moore v. Mitchell, 30 F.2d 600, 604 (2d Cir. 1929) (L. Hand, J., concurring).

Both this court and the Second Circuit recently addressed the revenue rule in the European Community cases. See European Community v. Japan Tobacco, Inc. (hereinafter, "Amazonas"), 186 F. Supp. 2d 231, 243 (E.D.N.Y. 2002) (Garaufis, J.), aff'd in part and rev'd in part sub nom., European Community v. RJR Nabisco, Inc. (hereinafter, "European Community I"), 355 F.3d 123 (2d Cir. 2004), cert. granted, judgment vacated and remanded, 544 U.S. 1012, 125 S. Ct. 1968, 161 L. Ed. 2d 845 (2005), on reconsideration following [29] remand, 424 F.3d 175 (2d Cir. 2005) (hereinafter, "European Community II"), cert. denied, 546 U.S. 1092, 126 S. Ct. 1045, 163 L. Ed. 2d 858 (2006).

HN12[] "The revenue rule is implicated whenever the substance of the claim is, either directly or indirectly, one for tax revenues, such that the whole object of the suit is to collect tax for a foreign revenue, and that this will be the sole result of a decision in favour of the plaintiff." European Community I, 355 F.3d at 131 (emphasis added; internal citations and quotation marks omitted). "What matters is not the form of the action, but the substance of the claim." Canada, 268 F.3d at 130.

[*384] 1. Direct Enforcement

HN13[] "A suit directly seeks to enforce foreign tax laws when a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs would require the defendants to reimburse them for lost tax revenues." European Community I, 355 F.3d at 131. Defendants argue that "the Revenue Rule bars Plaintiffs' claims regardless of whether these Colombian sovereign government entities sue for sovereign or commercial losses resulting from sovereign revenue law issues." (Def. FNC Rep. at 28.) In other words, Defendants [30] are arguing that the instant claims for lost sales and profits are barred by the revenue rule because Plaintiffs are directly seeking compensation for lost revenues. Plaintiffs argue that the revenue rule bars only claims that a sovereign brings in its sovereign capacity and does not preclude claims by a sovereign in its commercial capacity. (Pl. FNC Opp. at 28-33.)

Plaintiffs cite Banco Frances e Brasileiro S.A. v. Doe, 36 N.Y.2d 592, 331 N.E.2d 502, 370 N.Y.S.2d 534 (1975) in support of this proposition. In Banco Frances, a private Brazilian bank brought a fraud claim against individuals, alleging that the individuals submitted false currency-exchange applications to the bank in violation of Brazilian currency regulations, thereby causing the bank to improperly exchange Brazilian cruzeiros into travelers checks in United States dollars. The Court of Appeals distinguished Banco Do Brasil v. A.C. Israel Commodity Co., 12 N.Y.2d 371, 190 N.E.2d 235, 239 N.Y.S.2d 872 (1963), and found that the revenue rule did not bar the plaintiff's claims for a variety of reasons, including as follows:

> The [Banco Do Brasil] case relied upon by the Appellate Division is quite distinguishable. [31] There the Government of Brazil, through Banco do Brasil, a government bank, sought redress for violations of its currency exchange regulations incident to a fraudulent coffee export transaction. Here, the plaintiff is a private bank seeking rescission of the fraudulent currency exchange transactions and damages. [] [N]o case has come to our attention where a private tort remedy arising from foreign currency regulations has been denied by the forum as an application of the revenue law rule and we decline so to extend the Banco do Brasil rationale. Thus, in the instant case we find no basis for reliance upon the revenue law rule to deny a forum for suit.

Banco Frances, 36 N.Y.2d at 598-99, 331 N.E.2d at 506-07. Without question, at least portions of the Banco Frances decision are no longer good law in federal courts. Above all else, the Banco Frances court's conclusion that the revenue rule is not "analytically justifiable" is clearly inconsistent with the Supreme Court's decision in Pasquantino v. United States, 544 U.S. 349, 125 S. Ct. 1766, 161 L. Ed. 2d 619 (2005), and the Second Circuit's decisions in Canada and the European Community cases. [32] That being said, Banco Frances does support the proposition that a commercial actor may bring a private tort claim even though the claim involves a foreign revenue law.

Defendants rely on Banco Do Brasil, 12 N.Y.2d at 377, 190 N.E.2d at 237, and Ludlow v. Van Rensselaer, 1 Johns. 94 (N.Y. 1806). These cases are inapposite. Banco Do Brasil is inapposite because, as the Banco Frances court observed, the plaintiff-sovereign was clearly suing in its sovereign capacity as opposed to its capacity as a commercial actor. Banco Do Brasil, 12 N.Y.2d at 377, 190 N.E.2d at 237 (holding that the action by Brazil for damages caused by defendant's evasion of foreign currency exchange laws was barred by revenue rule). Ludlow is a very old and curious decision. In Ludlow, a breach of contract action between two private parties, [*385] the court held that the revenue rule barred the court from considering a defense based on a French stamp tax law. Ludlow seems to stand for the proposition that, where a claim constitutes a justiciable cause of action to which there exists a potentially meritorious defense based on a foreign tax law [33] that the revenue rule precludes the courts from considering, the court should hear the action and ignore the defense. In this way, Ludlow appears to be inconsistent with those Second Circuit cases that state that the revenue rule precludes a court from hearing a claim that would require the court to consider the validity of a foreign tax law. In European Community I, the Second Circuit explained that foreign tax laws "embody the political and social judgments of the sovereign and its people" and that:

> judicial examination and enforcement of foreign tax laws at the behest of foreign nations may conflict with the other branches' policy choices with respect to cooperation in tax enforcement, and create the risk that the judiciary will be drawn into issues and disputes of foreign relations policy that are assigned to--and better handled by--the political branches of government.

European Community I, 355 F.3d at 131 (internal quotation marks omitted).

The Second Circuit's Canada decision strongly supports the conclusion that a claim constitutes proscribed direct enforcement of a revenue law only when the sovereign is seeking damages it sustained [34] in its capacity as sovereign. In considering which types of damages are barred by the revenue rule, Canada recognized a distinction between damages that a government suffers in its sovereign capacity and damages that a government suffers as a commercial actor. See Canada, 268 F.3d at 132. Thus, Canada could not recover law enforcement costs that the defendants' unlawful acts caused Canada to incur in part because they were a cost that Canada had incurred in its capacity as a sovereign:

> Law enforcement costs incurred to secure taxes for the sovereign are qualitatively different from the damages suffered by a private individual; they fall within the class of acts that are "jure imperii," that is, that are expressions of a foreign sovereign's will or are carried out by virtue of that sovereign authority. United States courts have traditionally been reluctant to enforce foreign laws that are "jure imperii."

Id. at 132 (internal citation omitted). The Second Circuit continued to explain that costs that are jure imperii are distinct from those that are jure gestionis: "An example of a private, 'jure gestionis' act [35] is operating a business." Id. at 132 n.41.

This distinction between a sovereign suing in its sovereign capacity as opposed to in its capacity as a private actor is consistent with Canada's reading of the purpose of the revenue rule. In Canada, the Second Circuit explained that suits involving a foreign sovereign's revenue laws are problematic because they raise public policy concerns that go to the heart of sovereignty:

> Tax laws embody a sovereign's political will. They create property rights and affect each individual's relationship to his or her sovereign. They mirror the moral and social sensibilities of a society. Sales taxes, for example, may enforce political and moral judgments about certain products. Import and export taxes may reflect a country's ideological leanings and the political goals of its commercial relationships with other nations.

Id. at 111. Under this reasoning, tax laws are problematic not because they raise revenue for the government and the government may use such revenues for a controversial purpose, but because the laws, in and of themselves, embody policy choices [*386] that are infused with moral and political [36] judgments. As a result, Canada's reading of the revenue rule strongly supports the proposition that the rule is not triggered by every foreign law that causes a foreign sovereign to generate revenue; rather, the rule is targeted to those revenue-generating statutes that involve moral and political judgments. [3]

A sovereign's commercial activities do not involve the kind of moral and political judgments that the tax or revenue laws typically involve. A sovereign engages in commercial activity for the same reason a private individual or corporation participates in such activity--to [37] turn a profit. A sovereign's decision to drill for oil, manufacture airplanes, or provide postal services is not infused with the kinds of moral and political judgments necessarily involved in taxing cigarettes or providing a tax credit for higher education spending.

To read the revenue rule to prohibit sovereigns from bringing damages claims irrespective of the nature of the damages claim would have extremely troubling consequences. As Plaintiffs urged at oral argument, if the revenue rule prohibits sovereigns from bringing all claims for damages, then the Venezuelan government could not bring a claim arising out of a contract dispute with an American corporation concerning Venezuela's oil business. (Feb. 2, 2007 Oral Argument Transcript at 40.) If the United Kingdom had such a revenue rule, the United States Postal Service could not bring a contract claim in the United Kingdom against a British corporation that it had retained to deliver American mail in the U.K. Such an interpretation of the revenue rule would (1) make it very difficult for sovereigns to participate in commercial activities and (2) provide strong disincentives for foreign sovereigns to do business with United States [38] corporations. Such a reading of the revenue rule would cause these problems while achieving absolutely no public policy purpose: prohibiting sovereigns from bringing claims arising out of purely commercial activities would in no way serve the separation of powers or extraterritoriality concerns that currently motivate federal courts to recognize the revenue rule.

Further, if the revenue rule barred suits by foreign sovereigns suing in their commercial capacity, foreign sovereigns would find themselves at a unique disadvantage in federal courts. HN14[] Under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act ("FSIA"), a foreign sovereign is subject to jurisdiction in federal courts with respect to actions arising out of a commercial activity carried on by the foreign state, provided that there is some connection between the commercial activity and the United States. See Republic of Argentina v. Weltover, Inc., 504 U.S. 607, 611, 112 S. Ct. 2160, 2164, 119 L. Ed. 2d 394 (1992). Thus, under Defendants' reading of the revenue rule, a private plaintiff could sue a foreign sovereign in United States courts for claims arising out of commercial activity but the foreign sovereign could not bring a counterclaim arising [39] out of that same course of conduct. Such an outcome would be manifestly unjust.

HN15[] Because (1) claims by a foreign sovereign for damages sustained in its capacity as a commercial actor do not raise the same policy concerns as claims brought by a foreign sovereign in its sovereign capacity [*387] and (2) foreign sovereigns are subject to suit in the federal courts for claims arising out of commercial actions, I conclude that claims brought by a foreign sovereign in a commercial capacity do not constitute the kind of direct enforcement of a foreign revenue law that is barred by the revenue rule. Of course, such a claim may require a court to rule upon the validity of a foreign revenue law. In those circumstances, such a claim could still constitute indirect enforcement of a foreign revenue law that is barred by the revenue rule.

[3] As discussed in detail below in the Section addressing the penal law rule, the distinction between injuries that a sovereign suffers in its sovereign capacity and injuries a sovereign suffers in a commercial capacity is also supported by federal case law addressing the penal law rule. As the penal law rule and revenue rule are analogous, the penal law jurisprudence supports such a distinction in the context of the revenue rule.

2. Indirect Enforcement

The reality is that "[i]ndirect enforcement is . . . easier to describe than to define[.]" Pasquantino, 544 U.S. at 368, 125 S. Ct. at 1778-79 (internal quotation marks omitted). The parties vigorously contest precisely what constitutes indirect enforcement of a revenue law. Defendants argue that any claim that would [40] require the court to have to consider, apply or otherwise pass on a foreign tax law is barred by the revenue rule. (E.g., Def. FNC Rep. at 7-8.) Plaintiffs argue that the revenue rule bars only claims that seek to collect unpaid foreign taxes. (Pl. FNC Opp. at 25.) According to Plaintiffs, whether a claim requires a court to rule on the validity of a foreign tax law is irrelevant. (Id.)

What is clear is that HN16[] the revenue rule bars claims for costs resulting from enforcement of foreign tax laws because such claims seek indirectly to enforce the laws. See European Community II, 424 F.3d at 179; Canada, 268 F.3d at 132. However, much as other aspects of the revenue rule presented in this case, no binding authority has clarified the extent to which the revenue rule prohibits courts from considering the validity of or recognizing foreign tax laws. The Canada and the European Community courts did not have occasion to determine whether a federal cause of action that is substantively unrelated to foreign tax laws but requires the federal court to recognize and apply foreign tax laws is the kind of indirect enforcement that runs afoul of the [41] revenue rule. There is language in Canada that could be read to mean that a federal court may not hear any claim that requires the court to recognize and apply a foreign tax law:

> Additional considerations reinforce our determination that Canada's claim for law enforcement costs must be dismissed. To proceed with the law enforcement costs claim, we would have to examine the tax laws at issue in order to assess the causation aspect of this claim. For example, we would have to assess whether the law enforcement costs were in fact spent on achieving the cessation of cigarette smuggling. So doing, we would have to examine whether, when and to what extent the smuggling existed, which would require a determination that tax laws were applicable to defendants. These inquiries could draw the courts into troubled waters.

Id. at 133; see also Amazonas, 186 F. Supp. 2d at 237 (quoting some of this same language).

The Attorney General of Canada specifically argued that "the revenue rule may prohibit the enforcement of Canadian tax laws, but not their recognition in order to calculate damages." Id. at 133. In support of this proposition, [42] the Attorney General of Canada cited In re State of Norway's Application (Nos. 1 and 2), [1990] A.C. 723, 724 (H.L.) and Regazzoni v. K.C. Sethia (1944) Ltd., [1956] 2 Q.B. 490, 515-16 (C.A.), aff'd [1957] 3 All. E.R. 287 (H.L.). The Second Circuit explained that:

> In both of these cases, the court permitted recognition but not enforcement of foreign revenue laws. However, in neither Norway nor K.C. Sethia was the [*388] British court called upon to allow damages that would serve as a substitute for previously unpaid taxes to be paid in the United Kingdom to a foreign sovereign.

Canada, 268 F.3d at 133-34. In concluding that Norway and K.C. Sethia were distinguishable, the Second Circuit did not reject the distinction between recognition and enforcement of a foreign tax law. Further, in Pasquantino, the Supreme Court suggested that a distinction was to be made between recognition of a foreign tax law and enforcement, stating "[i]ndirect enforcement is . . . easier to describe than to define, and it is sometimes difficult to draw the line between an issue involving mere[] recognition of [43] a foreign law and indirect enforcement of it." Pasquantino, 544 U.S. at 368, 125 S. Ct. at 1778-79 (emphasis added and internal quotation marks omitted).

In the European Community cases, this court stated that HN17[] "any action in which the court 'will have to pass on[] the validity of [foreign] revenue laws and their applicability [to the claims at bar]' constitutes 'enforcing [foreign] revenue laws,' and thereby triggers the revenue rule." Amazonas, 186 F. Supp. 2d at 235. That passage quoted a portion of the Second Circuit's decision in Canada, 268 F.3d at 108, that, in turn, quoted the district court's decision in Canada, Attorney General of Canada v. RJ Reynolds Tobacco Holdings, Inc., 103 F. Supp. 2d 134, 143 (N.D.N.Y. 2000). As the claims in the European Community cases were essentially identical to the claims in Canada, in Amazonas, I did not confront the issue I confront here: whether a claim that requires a court to recognize, apply, or consider the validity of a foreign tax law is barred by the revenue rule. Further, I did not dismiss the Amazonas plaintiffs' money laundering claims [44] on the basis of the revenue rule. In Amazonas, I found only that the smuggling claims were barred by the revenue rule. Amazonas, 186 F. Supp. 2d at 236 ("In this [revenue rule] section of the opinion, the court will consider the RICO claims pursuant to smuggling grounds. The court will consider the claims in light of the money laundering grounds at Part IV of this opinion."). Other than the dicta relied upon by Defendants, nothing in Amazonas supports the proposition that any time an action forces a court to consider a foreign revenue law, the action constitutes an attempt to indirectly enforce a foreign revenue law that is proscribed by the revenue rule.

As I am now explicitly confronted with this issue, this is my first opportunity to clarify the extent to which consideration of a foreign revenue law violates the revenue rule. HN18[] There is a continuum along which a claim will require a court to consider or "pass on" a foreign tax law. At the least problematic end of the continuum is the mere recognition of a foreign tax law. At the next point along the continuum, a court must apply such a foreign law. Next, a claim might require a court to rule on the [45] validity of a foreign tax law. Finally, a claim might require a court to explicitly enforce a foreign revenue law. The Second Circuit cases make clear that the revenue rule clearly bars explicit enforcement. However, I find that whether lesser forms of consideration of a foreign revenue law--recognition, application, and determination of validity--are permissible depends on the extent to which the consideration of the foreign revenue law raises separation of powers and sovereignty concerns.

I recognize that the Second Circuit cases and the language in this court's Amazonas decision make clear that ruling upon the validity of a foreign law will raise significant policy concerns in many, if not all, cases. As Judge Learned Hand explained, "[n]o court ought to undertake an inquiry which it cannot prosecute without determining whether those laws are consonant [*389] with its own notions of what is proper." Moore, 30 F.2d at 604 (L. Hand, J., concurring). HN19[] In the typical case where a court will have to rule on the validity of a foreign tax law, the court will have to determine whether the law is consistent with its own public policy. The revenue rule bars such a determination [46] in most, if not all, circumstances. See Canada, 268 F.3d at 113 ("Addressing the public policy concerns raised by the imposition of such foreign taxes could embroil United States courts in delicate issues in which they have little expertise or capacity"); see also Kelley v. CINAR Corp. (In re CINAR Corp. Secs. Litig.), 186 F. Supp. 2d 279, 293 n.9 (E.D.N.Y. 2002) (revenue rule "mandates that courts refrain from adjudicating cases where they will have to pass upon the validity of the revenue laws of foreign nations"; holding that the revenue rule did not apply where "[t]he Court would not be commenting on the validity of the Canadian incentive scheme, but rather deciding whether the defendants' admitted abuse of that scheme defrauded American investors.")

HN20[] This approach to the revenue rule--allowing a federal court to assess the policy implications of considering, applying, and determining the validity of a foreign revenue law before determining whether a claim that triggers such consideration is barred by the revenue rule--is most consistent with the Second Circuit's recent revenue law jurisprudence. The Canada court explicitly held that determining whether the revenue [47] rule barred a claim required both an analysis of the facts of the case and the policy concerns behind the revenue rule:

> We do not suggest that the revenue rule always bars United States courts from furthering the tax policies of foreign sovereigns. . . . These concerns about sovereignty and [extraterritoriality] are therefore not absolute, and are not implicated in every case involving foreign tax laws. However, as explained below [], the particular facts of this case--most notably, the fact that a foreign sovereign plaintiff is directly seeking to enforce its tax laws, and that our government has negotiated and signed a treaty with this sovereign providing for limited extraterritorial tax enforcement assistance but stopping well short of the assistance requested here--lead us to be wary in this instance of becoming the enforcer of foreign tax policy.

Canada, 268 F.3d at 113.

Similarly, in the European Community cases, the Second Circuit reaffirmed that HN21[] determining whether a claim involves proscribed indirect enforcement of a revenue law requires an analysis of the facts of the case and policy concerns behind the revenue rule. In European [48] Community I, the court's very definition of indirect enforcement incorporated the policy concerns motivating the revenue rule: HN22[] "[I]ndirect enforcement occurs when a foreign state seeks a remedy that would give extraterritorial effect to its tax laws; for instance, a suit seeking damages based on law enforcement costs is an attempt to shift the cost of enforcing the tax laws onto the defendants, and would therefore require the court indirectly to enforce the tax laws." European Community I, 355 F.3d at 131. The Second Circuit continued to explain that "HN23[] [t]he revenue rule is therefore not absolute. Even if the substance of the claim invokes foreign tax laws, the revenue rule will not be triggered where the sovereignty and extraterritoriality concerns that inform the rule's application are not present." Id. at 131-32. Similarly, the European Community court explained that the argument that the revenue rule is discretionary "is also foreclosed by Canada, which clearly establishes that, once the sovereignty and separation of powers concerns that inform the rule are implicated by the substance of a plaintiff's claims, the court may not hear [49] those claims absent [*390] evidence that the rule has been abrogated." European Community I, 355 F.3d at 138. In re-evaluating the Circuit's revenue rule jurisprudence in the wake of Pasquantino, the Second Circuit continued to hold that the scope of the revenue rule would be informed by the dual policy concerns motivating the rule:

> We stressed in our [Canada] opinion that HN24[] the revenue rule is designed to address two concerns: first, that policy complications and embarrassment may follow when one nation's courts analyze the validity of another nation's tax laws; and second, that the executive branch, not the judicial branch, should decide when our nation will aid others in enforcing their tax laws. These twin concerns for sovereignty and separation of powers are important to the revenue rule analysis, because they imply certain exceptions to the rule.

European Community II, 424 F.3d at 180 (citation omitted).

This is consistent with the Eleventh Circuit's approach to the revenue rule, in that HN25[] the Eleventh Circuit also considers the policy implications of a claim in determining whether it is barred by the revenue rule. See Republic of Honduras v. Philip Morris Cos., 341 F.3d 1253, 1257 (11th Cir. 2003) [50] ("The Republics' complaints make clear that their tax laws embody anti-smoking policies directed at protecting their citizens from the health hazards of smoking, both by attempting to discourage smoking by raising the price of cigarettes and by providing revenue for anti-smoking programs. . . . Because the tax laws underlying the Republics' RICO claims embody specific policy choices, we hold that the revenue rule applies to these claims and prevents us from considering them.") (emphasis added).

As a result, HN26[] determining whether a claim for damages that requires a court to recognize, apply, or rule on the validity of a foreign sovereign's tax laws constitutes the kind of indirect enforcement that is proscribed by the revenue rule requires both an analysis of the facts of the case and the policy concerns motivating the revenue rule.

B. Analysis

Although Defendants do not characterize them as such, Defendants have two central arguments as to why the revenue rule bars the instant claims. First, Defendants argue that the instant claims are an effort to directly enforce the Colombian revenue law providing that the Colombian government shall have a monopoly on certain liquor manufacturing [51] and distribution businesses by awarding Plaintiffs revenues to which they are allegedly entitled under the monopoly law. Second, Defendants argue that the instant claims constitute impermissible indirect enforcement of Colombian revenue laws because they require the court to "pass on" Colombian revenue laws. Each of these arguments will be considered in turn.

1. Direct Enforcement

Colombian law provides that the Colombian government shall have a monopoly on certain liquor manufacturing and distribution businesses. Defendants argue that the instant claims are an effort to directly enforce this law by awarding Plaintiffs revenues to which they are allegedly entitled under the monopoly law. As discussed above, determining whether the instant claims constitute proscribed direct enforcement of a revenue law depends on whether Plaintiffs are suing in their sovereign capacity or in a purely commercial capacity. Defendants argue that Plaintiffs are suing in their sovereign capacity because they engage in the following sovereign acts: "(1) monopolizing the entire liquor industry; (2) collecting revenues to be placed in the government coffers for the general health and welfare of the [52] Colombian people; [*391] (3) collecting a 'consumption' tax on liquor that is given to the Departments [of the Colombian Government]; and (4) enacting and charging discriminatory taxes." (Def. FNC Rep. at 29.) Defendants point to the fact that Colombia's Constitution requires that revenues generated by government monopolies must be used for the public welfare and that "[r]evenues obtained through the exercise of liquor monopolies shall be used preferably for health care services and education." (Declaration of Mauricio A. Plazas Vega ("Plazas Decl.") PP 11-12 (quoting the Colombia Constitution).) Defendants are partially correct.

Two categories of claims are clearly barred. First, to the extent Plaintiffs are stating claims for damages resulting from lost liquor taxes, such claims are barred by the revenue rule and are dismissed. See European Community I, 355 F.3d at 132 (HN27[] RICO claims seeking lost taxes are barred by revenue rule); Canada, 268 F.3d at 131 (same). In this case, lost liquor taxes include both the consumption taxes charged on imported liquor and the so-called "monopoly participations." [4] [53] Second, to the extent Plaintiffs are seeking damages that they suffered in their sovereign capacity, such claims are also barred by the revenue rule. HN28[] A sovereign suffers harms in its sovereign capacity when its injury concerns activity undertaken by the government "by virtue of [its] sovereign authority." Canada, 268 F.3d at 132 (holding that revenue rule barred plaintiffs' claim for law enforcement costs because such costs were suffered by plaintiffs in their sovereign capacities).

The Second Amended Complaint is extremely lengthy and identifies countless forms of injury. On pages 31 and 32 of their Reply Brief, Defendants have identified eighteen allegations of injury that they believe are objectionable. [5] At this [*392] time, the court will address only those eighteen alleged injuries. The court agrees that at least sixteen of the eighteen forms of injury are injuries that Plaintiffs could suffer only in their sovereign capacity and, as a result, are barred by the revenue rule. However, two of the eighteen identified forms of injury are not necessarily barred by the revenue rule: (1) "adverse economic impact" of the Colombian "underground economy;" and (2) harm

[4] Although the exact nature of the so-called "monopoly participations" is not clear, they appear to be another consumption tax. Under Colombian law, each Department has the choice of (1) exploiting its liquor monopoly or (2) imposing a consumption tax on liquor. (Plazas Decl. P 15.) If a Department opts to exploit its liquor monopoly, it "may collect a 'participation' from liquors instead of the consumption tax[.]" (Id. P 23.) Although Plazas's description of the "monopoly participation" is less than clear (perhaps because of an imperfect translation of Plazas's declaration), Defendants explain that a monopoly participation is essentially a consumption tax by another name: "Where a Department chooses to exploit the monopoly, the Department will charge a monopoly 'participation' on every bottle of liquor introduced into its territory 'instead of the consumption tax.'" (Def. FNC Mem. at 19 (quoting, Plazas Decl. P 23).) Colombian law requires the monopoly participation to be no lower than the consumption. (Plazas Decl. P 23 n.10.) In fact the only distinction between the consumption tax and the monopoly participation that the court can discern is that a centralized Colombian government agency collects the consumption tax, whereas the individual Departments collect the monopoly participations.

[5] These eighteen categories of injury are: failure of Defendants' smuggled products to bear labels with the information required by Colombian law; "adverse economic impact" of the Colombian "underground economy;" "eros[ion] of the stability and credibility" of the Colombian peso; "[d]istortion of the [m]oney supply;" distort[ion] [of] the official balance of payments;" "permeation of the Colombian border and the Territory of the Republic;" threat to the "safety, security, and well-being of governmental personnel and property;" interference with "the regulatory system and authority of the Republic;" "disruption of public services;" "expenses to stabilize unstable political situations in entire regions of Colombia;" damage to the Colombian "trade and the economy;" "interfere[nce] with use by the public of a public space;" "endanger[ment] and injur[y] [to] the property, life, health, safety, and comfort of a considerable number of persons;" "injur[y] [to] the economic well being of the citizens of the Republic of Colombia and the Departments;" "creat[ing] great dangers to the community, including Plaintiffs' economic and non-economic interests;" and "fraud on the public." (Def. FNC Rep. at 31-32.)

resulting [54] from Defendants' failure to properly label goods. Each of these two types of injury will be considered in turn.

[55] First, the "adverse economic impact" of the Colombian "underground economy" is simply too general and vague a term to encompass only injury that is barred by the revenue rule. For instance, Plaintiffs' lost sales and profits resulting from Defendants' money laundering are presumably included within the "adverse economic impact" of the Colombian "underground economy." Although the claim for such "adverse economic impact" does not run afoul of the revenue rule, this allegation, read independently, is too vague to withstand Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8's liberal pleading requirements and, thus, is dismissed. Specific allegations of injury that fall within the category of "adverse economic impact" survive, however. For instance, Plaintiffs have pled a claim for lost sales and profits, which is an injury Plaintiffs suffer in a commercial as opposed to a sovereign capacity.

Second, harm resulting from Defendants' failure to properly label their goods is arguably a harm that Plaintiffs suffer in a commercial capacity. Although Plaintiffs may bring the improper labeling claim in a purely commercial capacity, such a claim may still be barred by [56] the revenue and/or penal rules if it requires the court to enforce Colombian labeling laws. In any event, at this time, the court will dismiss on revenue rule grounds only the sixteen harms that are clearly suffered by Plaintiffs in their sovereign capacities.

However, Plaintiffs' claims for lost revenues and profits seek redress for a harm that Plaintiffs allegedly suffered in a commercial--as opposed to sovereign--capacity and, as a result, do not constitute the kind of direct enforcement of foreign revenue laws that runs afoul of the revenue rule. HN29[] Manufacturing and/or selling liquor is not "within the class of acts that are 'jure imperii,' that is, that are expressions of a foreign's sovereign's will or are carried out by virtue of that sovereign authority." Canada, 268 F.3d at 132. Sales of liquor in a national or international market can be made by a government agency authorized to sell liquor by the government's constitution, a private entity that is authorized by a law permitting (or the absence of a law prohibiting) any private individual to sell liquor, a private entity that was granted corporate status by the sovereign, or a private entity that was specially [57] licensed by the sovereign to sell liquor. Although the regulation of liquor distributing and sale is clearly a sovereign act, a sovereign's participation in a liquor manufacturing and distribution market is a purely commercial act. The fact that the sovereign may have decided to enter the liquor business itself as opposed to allowing or licensing others to enter the business in no way transforms the sale of liquor into a sovereign act.

The fact that Colombian law appears to provide that Plaintiffs' profits from the liquor business are to be used for [*393] the health and welfare of Colombian citizens in no way changes this conclusion. (Plazas Decl. PP 11-12.) HN30[] How the profits of a business are used is irrelevant in determining whether the act is an inherently sovereign act or an inherently commercial act. For purposes of the revenue rule, the sale of liquor to the general public is not one of the jure imperii of which the Second Circuit spoke in Canada. As a result,HN31[] an action seeking to recover lost revenues and profits Plaintiffs suffered in their commercial capacity as participants in the liquor manufacturing and distributing businesses does not seek the kind of direct enforcement [58] of a foreign revenue law that is prohibited by the revenue rule. [6]

[6] Although no party has made this argument, an economist might argue that, at least in some contexts, a sovereign's decision to create a state-owned monopoly for a particular good is functionally equivalent to enacting a sales tax on that good: in a state-owned monopoly, the government can set prices so as to obtain a monopoly profit, whereas a sales tax may be simply another means of receiving revenue that is often similar or equal in value to the monopoly profit. As a result, under this court's reading of the revenue rule, foreign sovereigns may be able to do an end run around the revenue rule by creating a state-owned monopoly that sells a good or service as opposed to taxing a good or service. In certain markets, creating a state-owned monopoly and charging a monopoly price may be able to provide the sovereign with the same or similar net revenue and have similar effects on supply, demand, and other market characteristics as would charging a sales tax. This problem is more theoretical than real. The political and public policy issues surrounding a sovereign's decision as to whether to tax a good or service or simply create a state-owned monopoly are typically of far greater importance than whether a foreign sovereign can bring claims related to that good or service in United States federal courts. It is very hard to imagine a scenario in which a sovereign would create a state-owned monopoly for the exclusive purpose of bringing an action concerning that business in federal court.

[59] 2. Indirect Enforcement

Whether Plaintiffs' claim for lost revenues and profits constitutes the kind of indirect enforcement proscribed by the revenue rule is a close question. Neither Canada nor the European Community cases confronted the precise question presented by the instant claims: whether the revenue rule bars a civil RICO claim brought by a party other than the United States for damages resulting from an enterprise's money laundering when the enterprise is simultaneously engaged in money laundering and tax evasion, both of which caused the plaintiff's alleged damages.

As a preliminary matter, nothing about the instant claims requires the court to pass on the validity of the Colombian laws authorizing the government to manufacture and sell liquor. Defendants repeatedly argue that, in order to rule on Plaintiffs' claims for lost revenues and profits, "this Court would have to examine Colombia's revenue laws, including its constitutional authorization of a revenue-raising liquor monopoly to further Colombia's public policy[.]" (Def. FNC Mem. at 52-54 (emphasis added).) Defendants do not argue that adjudicating the instant case will require the court [60] to rule on the validity of the rules authorizing the Colombian liquor monopolies. Defendants have not articulated any claim, argument or defense raised by or in response to the Second Amended Complaint that would require the court to consider the validity of laws authorizing Plaintiffs' involvement in the liquor business. This conclusion is further supported by the fact that, although Defendants have brought numerous actions in Colombia challenging various aspects of Colombia's liquor laws, none or virtually none of these Colombian actions challenge the legality of Plaintiffs' monopolies. As discussed in [*394] greater detail in Section VI(B), the court has carefully reviewed (1) the Declaration of Juan Rafael Bravo Arteaga, which describes these Colombian actions, and (2) the description of these cases contained in Defendants' briefs (Def. FNC Mem. at 19-22). Based on the substantial materials submitted by Defendants concerning the Columbian cases, it is clear that nothing about the instant claims will require this court to consider the validity of Colombian laws authorizing Plaintiffs to manufacture and sell liquor. [7]

[61] Further, it is of no moment that Colombian law appears to provide that Plaintiffs' profits from the liquor business are to be used for the health and welfare of Colombian citizens. (Plazas Decl. PP 11-12.) How Plaintiffs decide to spend the proceeds from a judgment or settlement in this case is no more relevant to the adjudication of this case than how a private plaintiff intends to spend the proceeds from a judgment or settlement would be to a civil case. Whether a plaintiff will use an award to open a factory that illegally employs child labor or will donate the award to a university to found a children's hospital has no bearing on whether the plaintiff's claims have merit.

As discussed above, Plaintiffs' claims for lost revenues result from two different aspects of the alleged enterprise: Defendants can charge lower prices, and in doing so increase sales and profits, because they benefit from a (1) tax evasion discount and (2) narco-laundering discount. Permitting Plaintiffs to bring a claim for lost revenues and/or profits for that portion of their losses which results from the alleged enterprise's tax evasion would permit Plaintiffs to bring an indirect claim for lost tax revenues; [62] however, Plaintiffs' claim for that portion of their lost revenues and/or profits resulting from the alleged enterprise's money laundering does not constitute an indirect claim for lost tax revenues.

(a) Damages Resulting from Tax Evasion

[7] It is important to note one apparent inconsistency between this court's analysis of the direct and indirect enforcement components of the revenue rule. With respect to direct enforcement, the court concludes that revenues the Colombian government earns from its liquor monopoly are earned by the government in a commercial as opposed to a sovereign capacity. In effect, the court concludes that revenue generated by the monopoly law is not "revenue" within the meaning of the revenue rule. With respect to indirect enforcement, however, this court treats the law that authorizes the liquor monopoly as a "revenue" law for purposes of the revenue rule: the court's analysis strongly suggests that, if Plaintiffs' claims required the court to pass on the validity of the monopoly law, the revenue rule would be violated. Despite appearances, there is no inconsistency here. As discussed above, application of the revenue rule must be based on the policy purposes underlying the rule. There are no policy concerns with allowing the foreign sovereign to bring a claim for damages suffered in its commercial capacity. There are, however, policy concerns with a federal court's passing on the validity of a foreign law that authorizes a state-owned monopoly.

Plaintiffs' claims for lost revenues and profits resulting from the alleged enterprise's tax evasion clearly constitute indirect enforcement of Colombian tax laws and, as a result, are barred by the revenue rule. These claims are nothing more than an attempt to use a United States tort claim to seek compensation for harms suffered as a result of the evasion of a foreign sovereign's tax laws. There is no question that hearing these claims would give extraterritorial effect to Colombian liquor tax laws. As the Second Circuit explained in European Community I, HN32[] "indirect enforcement occurs when a foreign state seeks a remedy that would give extraterritorial effect to its tax laws; for instance, a suit seeking damages based on law enforcement [*395] costs is an attempt to shift the cost of enforcing the tax laws onto the defendants, and would therefore require the court indirectly to enforce the tax laws." European Community I, 355 F.3d at 123.

[63] Permitting Plaintiffs to recover the portion of their lost revenues and/or profits resulting from Defendants' tax evasion is particularly problematic in this case because it would draw this court into a dispute that is currently the subject of heated litigation in Colombia, namely, whether the Colombian taxes on liquor are legal. Defendants argue that if Plaintiffs' claims are allowed to proceed, Defendants will assert that the Colombian taxes on liquor are illegal and, as a result, Defendants' scheme to evade them does not give rise to a RICO claim. (Def. FNC Mem. at 19-22, 47.) Plaintiffs have not challenged Defendants' assertion that a determination that the Colombian taxes on liquor are illegal would not serve as at least a partial defense to Plaintiffs' claims for lost revenues and/or profits. Although Plaintiffs have not explicitly briefed the issue, this court is aware of no reason why the illegality of the liquor taxes would not be a meritorious defense to the tax evasion portion of Plaintiffs' claims: Plaintiffs would not be entitled to recover damages for lost revenues and profits resulting from Defendants' evasion of liquor taxes that were illegal in the first place. [64] Cf. United States v. Pierce, 224 F.3d 158, 166-68 (2d Cir. 2000) (reversing wire fraud conviction for scheme to defraud the Canadian government of taxes to which it was entitled where prosecution failed to introduce any evidence that Canadian government was actually entitled to the taxes at issue).

(b) Damages Resulting from the Laundering of Proceeds of Narcotics Sales

In contrast to Plaintiffs' claims for lost revenues and profits resulting from the enterprise's smuggling and tax evasion, the revenue rule does not bar Plaintiffs' claims for lost revenues and profits resulting from the enterprise's money laundering. First, the European Community cases and Canada do not bar such claims. Those cases addressed only tort claims by foreign governments that would have had the effect of compensating the foreign governments for taxes that should have been paid and the related costs of collecting such taxes. European Community I, 355 F.3d at 132 ("Because plaintiffs' claims arise exclusively from tax-related losses and costs, adjudicating these claims would implicate the concerns discussed in Canada, requiring the court to evaluate the [65] policies behind the relevant foreign tax laws, interpret their provisions, and enforce them by awarding damages."); Canada, 268 F.3d at 131-32. In both cases, the Second Circuit held that such claims were barred by the revenue rule. European Community I, 355 F.3d at 132; Canada, 268 F.3d at 131-32.

Because (1) Plaintiffs are seeking damages to their liquor manufacturing and distribution businesses resulting from Defendants' enterprise, (2) Defendants' enterprise causes Plaintiffs' damages by (a) evading taxes and (b) laundering proceeds from illegal narcotics sales, and (3) Plaintiffs are entitled to recover damages resulting only from the money laundering aspect of Defendants' enterprise, the Plaintiffs' claims will require the factfinder to distinguish which of Plaintiffs' lost revenues and profits result from narcotics laundering and which result from tax evasion. As a result, the factfinder will be forced to recognize the existence of Colombian tax laws and, to some extent, evaluate the effects that evasion of such taxes had and are having on both Plaintiffs' and Defendants' liquor revenues and profits.

[*396] The pure narcotics-laundering [66] claim will not, however, require the court to pass on the validity of the Colombian tax laws. At this time, there are actions pending in Colombia in which the Diageo companies have alleged that some or all of the Colombian taxes on liquor are invalid. (Def. FNC Mem. at 19-22.) The illegality or invalidity of the tax laws will not serve as a defense to the pure narcotics-laundering claim because it would be irrelevant to determining Plaintiffs' lost revenues and profits resulting from Defendants' narcotics-laundering enterprise. This court's consideration of Colombian tax laws will be limited to recognizing their applicability and determining their economic effect. The fact that the parties dispute the legality of the tax laws is irrelevant; the only question this court will have to answer is which taxes were actually levied (legally or illegally) during the relevant period.

Admittedly, in the event the instant claims were to reach trial, Defendants may very well introduce factual evidence that Plaintiffs' failure to enforce their own tax laws (e.g., through de facto validation of the Sanandresitos--local Colombian markets in which smuggled goods are sold) led to the development [67] of the BMPE and the alleged smuggling enterprise. (Def. FNC Mem. at 25.) In effect, Defendants are suggesting that they should not be liable for engaging in money laundering; instead, Plaintiffs should be liable for Defendants' money laundering because Plaintiffs should have stopped Defendants from engaging in such misconduct. The fact that Plaintiffs' acts and omissions led to the alleged enterprise, even if true, is in no way a defense to claims relating to Defendants' decision to join that enterprise by laundering narcotics revenues. That Plaintiffs could have done a better job of enforcing their tax and other laws in no way means that Defendants are somehow less liable for money laundering. Thus, although Plaintiffs' claim for lost revenues and profits resulting from Defendants' narcotics laundering requires the court to recognize the existence of Colombian tax laws and analyze their effects, it does not require the court to consider the validity of such laws. [8]

[68] In this case, the mere recognition of Colombian tax laws and their economic effects does not trigger the revenue rule. As discussed above, Canada and the European Community cases leave open the possibility that a court could consider a tort claim that requires it to recognize a foreign tax law without running afoul of the revenue rule. The recognition and consideration of Colombian revenue laws required by Plaintiffs' claims for lost revenues and profits resulting from the narco-laundering discount simply do not raise sufficient policy concerns to warrant application of the revenue rule.

As a preliminary matter, the policy and political problems resulting from the mere recognition of a foreign tax law and its effects are far smaller in magnitude than those in the core revenue rule case in which the court must rule on the validity of the foreign law. Long ago, Judge Learned Hand explained that HN33[] "a court will not recognize those [liabilities] arising in a foreign state, if they run counter to the 'settled public policy' of its own. . . . No court ought to undertake an inquiry which [*397] it cannot prosecute without determining whether those laws are consonant with its own notions [69] of what is proper." Moore, 30 F.2d at 604 (L. Hand, J., concurring). More recently, in the European Community cases, the Second Circuit explained that "policy complications and embarrassment may follow when one nation's courts analyze the validity of another nation's tax laws." European Community II, 424 F.3d at 180 (emphasis added). In hearing the pure narcotics-laundering claim, this court will not be required to make any value-laden judgment as to whether Colombia's tax laws are consistent with American public policies.

Instead, those claims will require the factfinder to measure certain effects of Colombia's tax laws. In distinguishing which of Plaintiffs' lost sales result from Defendants' evasion of Colombian taxes and which of Plaintiffs' lost sales result from Defendants' narco-laundering scheme, the factfinder will most likely make certain judgments as to the effect that Colombian liquor taxes have on overall liquor consumption in Colombia, Plaintiffs' liquor sales and, possibly, Defendants' liquor sales. These are determinations that can in many contexts, including perhaps this context, be very sensitive to both Colombia and the [70] United States. See Canada, 268 F.3d at 113 (discussing this sensitivity and noting that taxes on tobacco could be entirely consistent with New York public policy but entirely inconsistent with the public policy of a tobacco-growing state). The court is not aware of the extent to which liquor taxes are or will become a political issue in Colombia. Nor does this court know whether the Executive or Legislative branches of the United States government have an interest in Colombia's liquor taxation laws. [9] It is entirely possible that one of these branches has taken a position with respect to the economic effects of the Colombian liquor scheme and the factfinder in this case may very well reach a determination that is inconsistent with that position.

[71] However, the policy concerns presented by this recognition and consideration of the Colombian tax laws and their effects are not sufficient to warrant applying the revenue rule in this case. There are federal causes of action that, even if brought by a private party, would require a federal court or jury to make the same analyses of the effects of Colombian liquor taxes that may very well need to be made in this case. For instance, if a liquor manufacturer brought an antitrust claim against another manufacturer alleging that the defendant had monopolized an international liquor market that included Colombia, the federal court would have to reach conclusions about the nature of Colombian liquor sales, including elasticity of demand, effects of Colombian taxes, and the extent of evasion of Colombian taxes. The fact that the factfinder in this case may have to make certain determinations as to the economic effects of Colombia's taxes simply does not create policy concerns of sufficient magnitude to justify applying the revenue rule in this case.

Further, applying the revenue rule in this case would raise extremely troubling policy implications for RICO and other federal efforts to stop [72] illegal narcotics trafficking. If Defendants' enterprise was involved exclusively in laundering the proceeds [*398] of narcotics sales, the instant claims would not trigger the policy concerns associated with recognizing and considering Colombian liquor tax laws, which will probably be necessary in order to distinguish which of Plaintiffs' lost sales resulted from tax evasion and which resulted from narco-laundering. However, the alleged enterprise is engaged in both tax evasion and money laundering. Defendants are, in effect, asserting as follows: if our enterprise paid the taxes that it owed and was exclusively engaged in the laundering of proceeds of narcotics sales, Plaintiffs' claims would not indirectly enforce a foreign revenue law; however, because the enterprise was engaged in tax evasion and money laundering, claims concerning the enterprise are barred by the revenue rule. Defendants go so far as to argue that "[m]oney laundering--like transportation, storage, corruption of border guards and false customs documents--is merely a logistical component of smuggling contraband into Colombia." (Def. FNC Rep. at 19.) To deny Plaintiffs an opportunity to bring claims for damages resulting [73] from the enterprise's money laundering merely because the enterprise is also engaged in tax evasion creates an obvious perverse incentive and moral hazard: individuals engaged in a money-laundering enterprise could shield their conduct from civil RICO claims by expanding their enterprise to include evading a foreign sovereign's taxes. [10]

[9] Colombia and the United States do appear to be negotiating a trade agreement. (See Trade Promotion Agreement, U.S.-Colomb., draft of May 8, 2006 ("Trade Draft"), available at http://www.ustr.gov/Trade_Agreements/Bilateral/Colombia_FTA/Draft_Text/Section_Index.html; see also Def. FNC Rep. at 101-02.) It is not possible, however, to divine the Executive or Legislative branch's position, if any, on Colombian liquor taxation from this draft treaty.

[10] Defendants also argue that tax agreements between Columbia and the United States, which do not provide for United States courts to hear adjudicated or unadjudicated Colombian tax claims, further suggest that the revenue rule bars this claim. (Def. FNC Mem. at 47.) Defendants are correct about the existence and substance of tax agreements between Colombia and the United States. (Plazas Decl. P 24, n.11.) Defendants may be correct that, when a court is considering a revenue rule issue, the existence of such tax agreements is noteworthy:

> It seems to us that the usual absence in our negotiated tax conventions of any provision for the extraterritorial enforcement of a sovereign's tax judgments or claims cannot be not accidental, but instead must reflect the considered policy of the political branches of our government. Thus, the political branches of our government have clearly expressed their intention to define and strictly limit the parameters of any assistance given with regard to the extraterritorial enforcement of a foreign sovereign's tax laws. In this area of foreign relations policy where the political branches have primacy, courts must be wary of intruding in a way that undermines carefully conceived and negotiated policy choices.

Canada, 268 F.3d at 119. This reasoning, however, was called into question in the Supreme Court's decision in Pasquantino. See European Community II, 424 F.3d at 182 n.9. In any event, as this court concludes that Plaintiffs' claims for damages resulting only from the alleged enterprise's laundering of proceeds of narcotics sales neither constitutes enforcement of a Colombian tax law nor requires the court to consider the validity of Colombian tax or revenue laws, this point is inapposite.

[74] In the final analysis, nothing about Plaintiffs' claims for lost revenues and profits will in any way lead this court to "indirectly enforce" Colombia's tax or revenue laws. As discussed in detail above, the Second Amended Complaint alleges that Plaintiffs have lost sales as a result of Defendants' money laundering and tax evasion scheme. In this action, Plaintiffs will only be able to recover for lost sales resulting from Defendants' money laundering. Presumably, one of the primary factual issues in this case will be the extent to which Plaintiffs can prove that their lost sales were caused by Defendants' money laundering as opposed to some other cause. As a result, Plaintiffs will have every incentive to show that Defendants (1) are engaged in little or no tax evasion, and/or (2) tax evasion has little or no effect on Plaintiffs' sales. In contrast, Defendants will have every incentive to show [*399] that tax evasion in Colombia is rampant and that the tax evasion is the primary if not exclusive cause of Plaintiffs' lost sales. As the nature of this action requires Plaintiffs to attempt to disprove the existence and effects of Defendants' tax evasion, the argument that Plaintiffs are using [75] this action to "indirectly enforce" Colombian tax law fails.

In short, Plaintiffs' claims for taxes and other damages suffered in Plaintiffs' sovereign capacity is dismissed as barred by the revenue rule. Plaintiffs' claims for damages suffered in Plaintiffs' commercial capacity resulting from Defendants' tax evasion are also barred by the revenue rule. Plaintiffs claims for damages suffered in a commercial capacity resulting from Defendants' money laundering are not barred by the revenue rule. [11]

IV. PENAL LAW RULE

A. Background

The penal law rule is very similar [76] to the revenue rule.HN34[] It provides that federal courts do not possess jurisdiction over an action to enforce the penal laws of a sovereign state: "By the law of England and of the United States the penal laws of a country do not reach beyond its own territory except when extended by express treaty or statute to offenses committed abroad by its own citizens; and they must be administered in its own courts only, and cannot be enforced by the courts of another country." Wisconsin v. Pelican Ins. Co. of New Orleans, 127 U.S. 265, 289-90, 8 S. Ct. 1370, 1374, 32 L. Ed. 239 (1888).

Defendants argue that the revenue and penal law rules are parallel and that the penal law rule prevents this court from hearing actions that directly or indirectly enforce a foreign sovereign's penal laws to the same extent that the revenue rule prevents this court from hearing actions to enforce a foreign sovereign's revenue laws. (Def. FNC Rep. at 35-45.) Defendants are correct.

The policy concerns underlying the penal law rule are the same as those that drive the revenue rule. As Judge Learned Hand explained in Moore v. Mitchell, "[t]o pass upon the provisions for the public order of another state . . . involves the relations between the states themselves, with which courts are incompetent to deal, and which are intrusted to other authorities." Moore, 30 F.2d at 604 [77] (L. Hand, J., concurring). Judge Hand went on to write that "[r]evenue laws fall within the same reasoning[.]" Id. More recently, the Supreme Court stated that, "[s]ince the late 19th and early 20th century, courts have treated the common-law revenue rule as a corollary of the rule that, as Chief Justice Marshall put it, '[t]he Courts of no country execute the penal laws of another.'" Pasquantino, 544 U.S. at 360-61, 125 S. Ct. at 1774 (quoting The Antelope, 23 U.S. 66, 10 Wheat. 66, 123, 6 L. Ed. 268 (1825)). In fact, "[t]he basis for inferring the revenue rule from the rule against foreign penal enforcement was an analogy between foreign revenue laws and penal laws." Pasquantino, 544 U.S. at 361, 125 S. Ct. at 1775.

[11] Defendants argue that the Republic of Colombia, the Bogota Capital District, and those Departments that do not exercise their right to a liquor monopoly suffer no competitive harm. (Def. RICO Mem. at 29-31.) To the extent these Plaintiffs suffer no injury in their commercial capacity--as defined in the revenue rule section of this opinion--these Plaintiffs' claims are barred by the revenue rule and, as a result, are dismissed.

Because there are even fewer recent cases discussing the penal law rule than there are discussing the revenue rule, the exact scope of the penal law rule is far from clear. The Supreme Court has held [*400] that the rule can apply to laws that are civil:

> HN35[] The rule that the courts of no country execute the penal laws of another applies, not only to prosecutions and sentences for crimes and misdemeanors, but to all suits [78] in favor of the state for the recovery of pecuniary penalties for any violation of statutes for the protection of its revenue, or other municipal laws, and to all judgments for such penalties.

Wisconsin, 127 U.S. at 290, 8 S. Ct. at 1374. HN36[] Nothing about the penal law rule, however, prohibits foreign sovereigns from bringing a civil cause of action that is not penal in nature: "A foreign sovereign, as well as any other foreign person, who has a demand of a civil nature against any person here, may prosecute it in our courts." Id. (internal quotation marks omitted). Long ago, HN37[] the Supreme Court announced the standard for determining whether an action is one for violation of a "civil" wrong as opposed to one to enforce a "penal" law:

> The test whether a law is penal, in the strict and primary sense, is whether the wrong sought to be redressed is a wrong to the public or a wrong to the individual, according to the familiar classification of Blackstone: ["]Wrongs are divisible into two sorts or species: private wrongs and public wrongs. The former are an infringement or privation of the private or civil rights belonging to individuals, considered as individuals [79] and are thereupon frequently termed 'civil injuries;' the latter are a breach and violation of public rights and duties, which affect the whole community, considered as a community, and are distinguished by the harsher appellation of 'crimes and misdemeanors.["] 3 Bl. Comm. 2.

Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U.S. 657, 668-69, 13 S. Ct. 224, 228, 36 L. Ed. 1123 (1892). See also Banco Nacional de Cuba v. Sabbatino, 376 U.S. 398, 413 n.15, 84 S. Ct. 923, 933, 11 L. Ed. 2d 804 (1964) ("As appears from the cases cited, a penal law for the purposes of this doctrine is one which seeks to redress a public rather than a private wrong."). In light of the shared origins and purposes of the revenue and penal law rules, I read this distinction between "private" and "public" wrongs to be entirely coterminous with the distinction between harms that are jure gestionis and jure imperii.

B. Analysis

The parties vigorously contest the extent to which the instant claims are barred by the penal law rule. Just as in the context of the revenue rule, the penal law rule bars claims for damages that Plaintiffs suffer in their sovereign capacity, but permits claims for damages that Plaintiffs [80] suffer in a commercial capacity.

Plaintiffs' alleged lost revenue and profit is a harm that Plaintiffs suffer in their private capacity as commercial actors and, as a result, claims based on that harm are not barred by the penal law rule. Such claims are for damages suffered by Plaintiffs' liquor businesses. Defendants cite Oklahoma ex rel. West v. Gulf, Colorado, & Santa Fe Railway Co., 220 U.S. 290, 31 S. Ct. 437, 55 L. Ed. 469 (1911), for the proposition that a sovereign's civil claim for violation of a variety of liquor laws--including violation of a state-owned liquor monopoly--is barred by the penal law rule. Oklahoma is inapposite. In Oklahoma, the State of Oklahoma brought suit to enjoin corporations from violating a variety of Oklahoma state liquor laws by importing liquor into the state. Id., at 291-95, 31 S. Ct. at 438-440. One of the laws that the defendants were accused of violating was a law that granted the State of Oklahoma a monopoly over liquor sales. Id., at 297, 31 S. Ct. at 439-40. The court concluded that the action was barred by the penal law rule: "The present suit, [*401] although in form one of a civil nature is, in its [81] essential character, one to enforce by injunction regulations prescribed by a state for violations of one of its penal statutes, and is therefore one of which this court cannot take original cognizance at the instance of the state." Id. at 300, 31 S. Ct. at 441. The instant claim for lost revenues and profits is distinguishable because such claims are for damages suffered by Plaintiffs in their commercial capacities by Defendants' money-laundering enterprise, whereas the plaintiff in Oklahoma was suing in its sovereign capacity to enforce Oklahoma's liquor laws.

With respect to their penal law rule motion, Defendants make a number of arguments that, understandably, are similar or identical to arguments they made in the context of the revenue rule motion. These arguments fail for the same reasons described in the discussion of the revenue rule motion. First, nothing about Plaintiffs' RICO or other claims requires this court to pass on the validity of Colombian penal laws. Second, Defendants' argument that Plaintiffs "are seeking to enforce a public right granted to the Departments under the Colombian Constitution, which permits the Departments to sell liquor as [82] no private entity can, for the public benefit" (Def. FNC Rep. at 44) also fails. Plaintiffs, in their commercial capacity, bring federal and state civil tort claims. This suit does not involve the laws authorizing the Colombian liquor monopoly any more than does a suit by a specially licensed liquor retailer involve the laws that authorized the retailer to sell liquor. Third, nothing about Plaintiffs' claims for lost revenues and profits constitutes an impermissible effort to indirectly enforce Colombia's penal laws. The fact that Defendants' conduct that allegedly violates federal and state law may also violate Colombian law is of no consequence: the mere fact that a defendant's conduct happens to violate the laws of some foreign sovereign (in addition to U.S. law) is no defense to a federal civil claim. Any other rule would create the perverse incentives to violate foreign laws.

Defendants are correct, however, that the Second Amended Complaint appears to identify certain types of damages claims that constitute an attempt to directly enforce Colombian penal laws. Above all else, Plaintiffs appear to state that they are seeking to enforce the Colombian law providing that the Colombian [83] government may seize instrumentalities of crime: "Under the laws of the Republic of Colombia, the Republic of Colombia and the Departments of the Republic of Colombia possess title in, or have a right to, any property used in the commission of a crime conducted within their borders, including money and goods, including illegal liquor products." (SAC P 103(g).) This claim is an attempt to directly enforce a Colombian law that constitutes a penal law within the meaning of the penal law rule and, as a result, is dismissed. As this court has already determined that the revenue rule bars most of the other categories of damages that Defendants assert violate the penal law rule, there is no reason to address them again in the context of the penal law rule. (See, e.g., Def. FNC Rep. at 43 (Colombian government's expenditures to prevent money laundering, law enforcement costs, damages other than lost revenues are profits that result from violation of Colombia's borders).) Defendants' motion to dismiss the Second Amended Complaint on the ground that it is barred by the penal law rule is granted in part and denied in part, to the same extent as their motion based on the revenue rule.

[84] V. FORUM NON CONVENIENS

A. Background

HN38[] "The principle of forum non conveniens is simply that a court may [*402] resist imposition upon its jurisdiction even when jurisdiction is authorized by the letter of a general venue statute." Gulf Oil Corp. v. Gilbert, 330 U.S. 501, 507, 67 S. Ct. 839, 842, 91 L. Ed. 1055 (1947). The decision as to whether to dismiss a case on forum non conveniens grounds is trusted to the sound discretion of the trial court. Iragorri v. United Techs. Corp., 274 F.3d 65, 72 (2d Cir. 2001). The Second Circuit has explained that district courts should follow a three-step process when exercising this discretion:

> At step one, a court determines the degree of deference properly accorded the plaintiff's choice of forum. At step two, it considers whether the alternative forum proposed by the defendants is adequate to adjudicate the parties' dispute. Finally, at step three, a court balances the private and public interests implicated in the choice of forum.

Norex Petroleum Ltd. v. Access Indus., Inc., 416 F.3d 146, 153 (2d Cir. 2005) (internal citations omitted).

HN39[] Step one requires the court to determine [85] what degree of deference should be afforded to the plaintiff's choice of forum. Iragorri, 274 F.3d at 71. When a plaintiff selects her home as a forum, the plaintiff should be given "great deference," but when a foreign resident selects a United States forum, the plaintiff is entitled to "less deference." Id. In order to determine how much deference a plaintiff should be accorded, the court must determine the extent to which the plaintiff's choice of forum was based on legitimate convenience concerns and to what extent the choice constitutes mere forum shopping:

> HN40[] The more it appears that a domestic or foreign plaintiff's choice of forum has been dictated by reasons that the law recognizes as valid, the greater the deference that will be given to the plaintiff's forum choice. Stated differently, the greater the plaintiff's or the lawsuit's bona fide connection to the United States and to the forum of choice and the more it appears that considerations of convenience favor the conduct of the lawsuit in the United States, the more difficult it will be for the defendant to gain dismissal for forum non conveniens. Thus, factors that argue against forum non [86] conveniens dismissal include the convenience of the plaintiff's residence in relation to the chosen forum, the availability of witnesses or evidence to the forum district, the defendant's amenability to suit in the forum district, the availability of appropriate legal assistance, and other reasons relating to convenience or expense. On the other hand, HN41[] the more it appears that the plaintiff's choice of a U.S. forum was motivated by forum-shopping reasons--such as attempts to win a tactical advantage resulting form local laws that favor the plaintiff's case, the habitual generosity of juries in the United States or in the forum district, the plaintiff's popularity or the defendant's unpopularity in the region, or the inconvenience and expense to the defendant resulting from litigation in that forum--the less deference the plaintiff's choice commands and, consequently, the easier it becomes for the defendant to succeed on a forum non conveniens motion by showing that convenience would be better served by litigating in another country's courts.

Iragorri, 274 F.3d at 71-72 (footnote omitted).

HN42[] At step two, the plaintiff bears the burden of establishing that [87] an adequate alternative forum exists. Norex, 416 F.3d at 157. "'An alternative forum is adequate if the defendants are amendable to service of process there, and if it permits litigation of the subject matter of the dispute.'" Id. (quoting Pollux Holding [*403] Ltd. v. Chase Manhattan Bank, 329 F.3d 64, 75 (2d Cir. 2003)).

HN43[] In the event the court determines that an adequate alternative forum exists, the court proceeds to step three, which requires the court to balance two sets of factors to determine which forum is best suited to adjudicate the case. Iragorri, 274 F.3d at 73. The first set of factors are the "private interest" factors, which are designed to assess which forum is most convenient for the parties: "'the relative ease of access to sources of proof; availability of compulsory process for attendance of unwilling, and the cost of obtaining attendance of willing, witnesses; possibility of view of premises, if view would be appropriate to the action; and all other practical problems that make trial of a case easy, expeditious, and inexpensive.'" Id. at 73-74 (quoting Gilbert, 330 U.S. at 508). HN44[] In [88] making this private interest analysis, > [T]he court should focus on the precise issues that are likely to be actually tried. . . . In a suit alleging negligence, for example, the court might reach different results depending on whether the alleged negligence lay in the conduct of actors at the scene of the accident, or in the design or manufacture of equipment at a plant distant from the scene of the accident.

Id. at 74. HN45[] During this third step, the court must also consider the following public interest factors:

> Administrative difficulties follow for courts when litigation is piled up in congested centers instead of being handled at its origin. Jury duty is a burden that ought not to be imposed upon the people of a community which has no relation to the litigation. In cases which touch the affairs of many persons, there is reason for holding the trial in their view and reach rather than in remote parts of the country where they can learn of it by report only. There is a local interest in having localized controversies decided at home. There is an appropriateness, too, in having the trial of a diversity case in a forum that is at home with the state law that [89] must govern the case, rather than having a court in some other forum untangle problems in conflict of laws, and in law foreign to itself.

Id. (quoting Gilbert, 330 U.S. at 508-09).

B. Analysis

Both parties' submissions on the forum non conveniens issue appear far more like treatises exhaustively prepared for the purpose of cataloguing every conceivable forum non conveniens argument than like focused "briefs" designed to cut to the heart of the forum non conveniens issue. As a result, I will not take the time to identify each of the arguments made by the parties. Instead, I note that the court has reviewed the briefs very carefully and will address the most relevant arguments presented. Although it is a close question, I conclude that the instant case should not be dismissed under the doctrine of forum non conveniens. My analysis follows the three-step approach the Second Circuit announced in Iragorri.

1. Deference to Plaintiffs' Choice of Forum

Plaintiffs argue that their choice of the instant forum is entitled to a "strong presumption of correctness" (Pl. FNC Opp. at 52 (internal quotation marks omitted)), while the Defendants [90] argue that Plaintiffs' choice of forum should be "accorded little deference" (Def. FNC Mem. at 58). The answer lies somewhere in between. After considering all of the factors described in the Second Circuit's decision in Iragorri, the court finds three factors are most influential in this case and, thus, warrant further discussion here.

[*404] First, the parties agree that Plaintiffs are foreign entities. Plaintiffs do not argue that their liquor businesses have any connection to the United States. This factor weighs in favor of attaching little deference to their choice of forum. See Base Metal Trading SA v. Russian Aluminum, 253 F. Supp. 2d 681, 693-98 (S.D.N.Y. 2003), aff'd 98 F. Appx. 47 (2d Cir. 2004) (plaintiffs' choice of U.S. forum is entitled to "little deference" where seven of ten plaintiffs were foreign, three plaintiffs that were U.S. citizens were shell corporations, the conduct at issue did not occur in the United States, and, with one exception, forum selection clauses in relevant contracts choose foreign fora, confirming that the United States was not a convenient forum for the parties).

Second, the four Defendants that are seeking [91] dismissal on the ground of forum non conveniens are United States corporations with offices near this courthouse. As described in greater detail above, Plaintiffs allege that Defendants masterminded a money-laundering enterprise from offices a few miles from the Brooklyn Bridge. While it is possible that Plaintiffs could have brought claims against a number of other entities that are alleged to be a part of the enterprise (e.g., Defendants' distributors or drug dealers whose revenues are being laundered), Plaintiffs have decided--as is their right to do--to seek compensation exclusively from Defendants. In order to most efficiently gather evidence against Defendants, it would make sense to bring a claim in a United States forum that is geographically proximate to Defendants' witnesses and documents. While it certainly would be possible to obtain at least some evidence from Defendants by bringing suit in Colombia, Plaintiffs may have reasonably concluded that the easiest way to obtain evidence from American Defendants is to retain American lawyers to seek discovery from them in an American court.

A significant amount of evidence essential to Plaintiffs' case that may be located [92] in Colombia. This includes evidence describing (1) the effects of Defendants' money laundering on the Colombian liquor market and (2) Plaintiffs' injuries. However, Plaintiffs may have reasonably concluded that they are already in possession of many if not all of the documents in the latter category and therefore do not require discovery to obtain them. With respect to documents concerning the effects of Defendants' money laundering, Plaintiffs may intend to rely upon documents already in their possession and/or documents to be obtained from Defendants in discovery. As a result, this factor suggests that Plaintiffs selected the instant forum because it was convenient, as opposed to purely for the sake of forum shopping. [12] See Pollux, 329 F.3d at 74 [*405] ("[HN46[] A] plaintiff's choice to initiate suit in the defendant's home forum--as opposed to any other where the defendant is also amenable to suit--only merits heightened deference to the extent that the plaintiff and the case possess bona fide connections to, and convenience factors favor, that forum.").

[12] It appears that Colombian courts may not possess personal jurisdiction over the two non-U.S. Defendants, Pernod-Ricard S.A. and Diageo PLC. No party has asserted that Colombian courts possess personal jurisdiction over them. Of course, these two Defendants, which are not parties to the instant motions, assert that this court does not possess personal jurisdiction over them. In the event this court determines it possesses personal jurisdiction over these two Defendants, Plaintiffs' decision to bring suit in this forum would be supported by yet another legitimate consideration. See Norex, 416 F.3d at 155 ("Notably, it appears doubtful from the record that [plaintiff] could have perfected jurisdiction over all defendants in either of its presumptively convenient home forums, Canada or Cyprus, or even in defendants' preferred forum, Russia. Thus, [plaintiff's] decision to litigate in New York,

[93] Third, the fact that RICO permits successful Plaintiffs to recover treble damages suggests that Plaintiffs may have selected this forum purely for tactical reasons. See Norex, 416 F.3d at 155 ("[W]e recognize that the possibility of a RICO treble damages award might have made the choice of a United States forum attractive to [plaintiff] regardless of convenience.")

After considering all of the Iragorri factors, I find that this case falls somewhere in between those cases where courts accord "little deference" to the plaintiff's choice of forum and those in which courts accord "substantial deference." Compare Pollux, 329 F.3d at 71-72 (foreign plaintiff with only minimal connections to U.S. forum entitled to "lesser degree of deference") with Norex, 416 F.3d at 155 (where "it appear[ed] doubtful from the record that [plaintiff] could have perfected jurisdiction over all defendants in either of its presumptively convenient home forums" and much evidence was located in New York forum, plaintiff's choice of forum was entitled to significant deference). As a result, this court will accord reasonable, but not substantial, deference [94] to Plaintiffs' choice of forum. See Giaguaro S.p.A. v. Amiglio, 257 F. Supp. 2d 529, 535-37 (E.D.N.Y. 2003) (foreign plaintiffs' choice of New York forum "entitled to some weight" where defendant was New York resident and defendant alleged to have committed fraud and breach of contract in New York).

2. Adequate Alternative Forum

Plaintiffs' only argument that Colombia is not an adequate alternative forum is that Defendants have failed to adduce evidence that Colombia courts could and would entertain claims against the French and United Kingdom Defendants, Pernod-Ricard S.A. and Diageo PLC. (Pl. FNC Opp. at 48.) Plaintiffs' argument appears to go to both the subject-matter and personal jurisdiction of the Colombian courts.

As a preliminary matter, the court notes that, HN47[] where Colombian courts have subject-matter jurisdiction over a matter and personal jurisdiction over the parties to a dispute, the Colombian courts have the procedures required to constitute an adequate alternative forum. See, e.g., In re Bridgestone/Firestone, Inc. Tires Prods. Liab. Litig., 190 F. Supp. 2d 1125, 1134 (S.D. Ind. 2002); Iragorri v. United Techs. Corp., 46 F. Supp. 2d 159, 162-63 (D. Conn. 1999), [95] vacated on other grounds, 274 F.3d 65 (2d Cir. 2001).

The parties have submitted conflicting evidence as to whether Colombian courts possess subject matter jurisdiction over this matter. Plaintiffs' expert, Rafael Nieto Navia, who has been a judge on various international courts (including those of Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia) and a professor of international public law, states, "I believe that Colombian judges do not have jurisdiction to hear this case." (Acevedo Decl. Exh. 7 ("Nieto Decl.") P 9.) This appears to be because "Colombian law does not apply extraterritorially. The general rule is that Colombian judges do not have jurisdiction over events that occur abroad[.]" (Id.)

Plaintiffs' other expert, Alfonso Miranda Londono, who teaches, studies, and practices competition law in Colombia, testified that Colombian courts do have subject matter jurisdiction over the instant matter: Colombian courts "would surely take cognizance [*406] of the case, since some of the effects of the conduct[] described took place in Colombian territory." (Acevedo Decl. Exh. 8 ("Miranda Decl.") P 11.) This conclusion is consistent with both Miranda's and Defendants' expert's [96] description of the scope of Colombian courts' subject matter jurisdiction. Miranda testified that "[i]f the act of unfair competition has been carried out abroad, the judge of the place in which the act produced its effect shall also have jurisdiction." (Id. P 10(b)(iv).)

Defendants' expert is Jorge Santos Ballesteros, a professor of law who has practiced law in Colombia and served as a Justice and the President of the Colombian Supreme Court Civil Division. (Declaration of Jorge Santos where all defendants were amenable to suit (and where some reside or are incorporated) is properly viewed as a strong indicator that convenience, and not tactical harassment of an adversary, informed its decision to sue outside its home forum.").

Ballesteros ("Santos Decl.") P 1.) According to Santos, Colombian courts possess "jurisdiction over a defendant in situations, such as those described in the [instant] Complaint, in which the defendant is alleged to have engaged or assisted in wrongdoing that caused injury in Colombia. This is true even if the defendant's actions took place outside of Colombia and had effects in Colombia." (Id. P 21.)

The bulk of the evidence clearly supports the conclusion that Colombian courts possess subject matter jurisdiction over the instant dispute. Only Nieto's testimony contradicts this conclusion. I do not credit Nieto's testimony on this point because (1) Nieto specializes in public international [97] law as opposed to the private tort law at issue in this case and (2) Nieto's testimony on this point fails to address the doctrine that Colombian courts will hear tort claims that cause injuries in Colombia. As a result, I conclude that Colombian courts possess subject-matter jurisdiction over the instant dispute.

Plaintiffs also argue that Colombian courts do not possess personal jurisdiction over Pernod-Ricard S.A. and Diageo PLC. These two Defendants have indicated that they will consent to the jurisdiction of the Colombian courts if this case is dismissed under the doctrine of forum non conveniens. (Def. FNC Rep. at 55 n.42 ("Should this Court determine that the forum non conveniens dismissal depends on the Foreign Defendants consenting to jurisdiction in Colombia, they also are prepared to so consent.").) This willingness to consent disposes of the personal jurisdiction issue. See Norex, 416 F.3d at 157 ("In urging Russia as an adequate alternative forum for [plaintiff's] claims, defendants satisfied the [amenable-to-service-of-process-in-Russia] prong of [the forum non conveniens] test by representing that they would all submit to the jurisdiction [98] of Russian courts in any comparable action field against them by plaintiff."); Jota v. Texaco Inc., 157 F.3d 153, 159 (2d Cir. 1998) (reversing dismissal for forum non conveniens where defendant was not amenable to suit in alternative forum and remanding for, inter alia, determination as to whether defendant would consent to suit in alternative forum); *Skelton Fibres Ltd. v. Canas, No. 96 Civ. 6031 (DLC), 1997 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2365, 1997 WL 97835, at 4 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 6, 1997) ("The first prong of the forum non conveniens test is satisfied as defendants represented to this Court . . . that the American defendants consent to the jurisdiction of the Spanish courts.").

As the Colombian courts possess subject matter over the matter and the British and French Defendants have consented to the Colombian courts exercising personal jurisdiction over them, the Colombian courts constitute an adequate alternative forum.

3. Interest-Balancing

It would be a gross understatement to say that the parties have "over-briefed" the interest balancing issue. Although the court has carefully considered each and every of the seemingly countless arguments [*407] included in both parties' [99] briefs, the court will address only those factors that are the most significant. First, the private interest factors will be considered. A discussion of the public interest factors will follow.

(a) Private-Interest Factors

(I) Location and Convenience of Evidence and Witnesses

This factor favors neither the instant forum nor the Colombian forum. There are two significant categories of evidence that are present in the United States. First, Plaintiffs allege that Defendants masterminded a money-laundering enterprise from offices within a few miles of this courthouse. Plaintiffs allege that Defendants "controlled" the money-laundering enterprise at issue in this case. (SAC PP 2, 28-30.) Further, Plaintiffs continue to allege that "[m]any of the activities of the Defendants that are the subject matter of this complaint, including management decisions and direction of the schemes, are conducted by the Defendants in the United States and, more particularly, from the Defendants' offices in the State and City of New York." (Id. P 100.) The Second Amended Complaint contains numerous specific allegations of money laundering. (E.g., PP 27(c), 32, 37.) This suggests [100] that Plaintiffs already possess significant evidence that money laundering occurred. As a result, the most important aspect of discovery in this case will be an examination of whether and, if so, in what ways and to what extent, Defendants were involved in the money laundering. As Defendants are alleged to have managed the money-laundering enterprise from the United States, this category of evidence will most likely be found in the United States.

Defendants argue that the evidence that is in Defendants' possession in the United States would be just as accessible to Plaintiffs if this case is heard in Colombia as if it is heard in the United States because the Colombian court will have the power to order the Defendants to turn over any evidence in their possession to which Plaintiffs are entitled, irrespective of where it is located. (Def. FNC Rep. at 66-67.) Defendants argue that "[w]hat is most relevant for the forum non conveniens analysis is the location of evidence in the hands of non-parties who may not be subject to the jurisdiction of the court that ultimately hears this case." (Id. at 67 (emphasis in original).) To some extent, this may be true. However, [101] the fact that evidence in Defendants' possession is already located here suggests that it may be cheaper and more expeditious to litigate the dispute here.

Second, Plaintiffs allege that the initial stages of the money laundering occurred in the United States. (James Aff. P 12.) Also, Plaintiffs have stated that at least some of the narcotics traffickers who are alleged to be involved in the enterprise currently reside in the United States. (Pl. FNC Opp. at 65 ("[T]o the extent that the Defendants actually believe that they may call some of the narcotics traffickers and money launderers as witnesses in this case, it happens that now most of them reside in the United States as guests of the United States government.").) As a result, at least some evidence of money laundering is also likely to be located here.

Similarly, there are two categories of evidence that are likely to be located in Colombia. First, the overwhelming majority of evidence of how Defendants' enterprise affected Colombian liquor market(s) and injured Plaintiffs is likely to be in Colombia. This is an extremely significant body of evidence. Adjudicating Plaintiffs' claims in this court will require distinguishing [102] the extent to which Plaintiffs' sales were reduced by (1) money laundering, (2) tax evasion, and/or (3) other economic [*408] factors, such as consumer preferences and elasticity of demand. Although it is possible that Defendants possess such evidence in their United States facilities (e.g., Acevedo Decl. Exhs. 2-5), the bulk of this evidence is most likely found in Colombia.

Second, it appears that a significant amount of the money laundering process occurred in Colombia and, as a result, documents concerning and witnesses to those stages of the money laundering process will be located in Colombia. (Acevedo Decl. Exh. 6 at 13.)

In addition to evidence in Colombia and the United States, the Second Amended Complaint states that Defendants' enterprise conducted much of their activities in Aruba. (E.g., SAC PP 27(f), 30.) As a result, it appears that there will be a substantial amount of evidence and number of witnesses located in the Caribbean. Similarly, two of the Defendants are located in Europe, and, irrespective of whether the court finds that it possesses personal jurisdiction over these European Defendants, some evidence and witnesses will presumably be located there. There [103] is no reason to believe the instant forum or a Colombian forum is more accessible to these Caribbean and European witnesses and evidence.

Finally, I note that Defendants assert that numerous additional categories of evidence are located in Colombia. (Def. FNC Rep. at 62-65.) Although I will not address each category individually, it is sufficient to state that those categories that I have not mentioned are either irrelevant or of far less relevance to the instant claims than the categories that have been discussed herein. [13]

[104] Overall, the evidence in this case is scattered across the United States, Colombia, the Caribbean, and Europe. As a result, Colombia and the instant forum are equally accessible and convenient to the evidence in this case. See Maritima Aragua, S.A. v. M/T Trade Resolve, 823 F. Supp. 143, 147 (S.D.N.Y. 1993) ("[T]he evidence and witnesses to be produced by the U.S. corporations, combined with the possibility of evidence to be produced from Germany, England, or Greece prevent the convenience of witnesses and the location of the evidence from being [particularly] determinative of the appropriate forum").

[13] Defendants identify several categories of damages included in the Second Amended Complaint that are based virtually exclusively on evidence that is to be found in Colombia. (Def. FNC Mem. at 73.) As discussed above in the Section addressing the revenue rule, virtually all (if not all) of these categories of damages are barred by the revenue rule. As a result, evidence concerning these categories of damages will not be relevant to the adjudication of this case. Similarly, as discussed in the revenue rule Section, this case does not require the court to pass upon the validity of Colombian tax laws and, as a result, evidence concerning the validity of such laws is not pertinent. (See Def. FNC Mem. at 74.)

(ii) Compulsion of Attendance of Unwilling Witnesses

Defendants argue that key non-party witnesses are located in Colombia and that Colombia does not have any procedural device for compelling the testimony of a witness to a case pending in this court. (Def. FNC Mem. at 78-81.) Defendants note that, HN48[] pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1782, United States courts can compel third-party witnesses to a proceeding before a Colombian court. (Def. FNC Mem. at 78 n.41.) For the most part, Defendants appear to already be in possession of evidence concerning [105] the Colombian liquor market and the related tax evasion. Further, Plaintiffs undoubtedly possess a significant amount of evidence on the same subject. This court is, of course, capable of requiring Plaintiffs to produce employees located in Colombia for depositions [*409] and/or trials. This eliminates any concern that adjudicating the dispute in the instant forum will prevent Defendants from obtaining evidence that Plaintiffs' revenue and profits losses are the result of their own inefficiency and mismanagement as opposed to Defendants' money laundering.

The one significant category of third-party witnesses to whom Defendants may not have access in this forum is money launderers located in Colombia. Such individuals could conceivably provide evidence that Defendants were not involved in those individuals' money laundering. Two factors diminish the significance of this shortcoming of the American tribunal. First, even if this action were tried in Colombia and the money launderers could be compelled to testify, the money launderers are unlikely to provide truthful testimony concerning their money laundering. Second, the Second Amended Complaint clearly alleges a transnational money-laundering [106] enterprise. Thus, money launderers located in the United States, the Caribbean, or Colombia could provide evidence that Defendants were involved in the laundering. The fact that money launderers in Colombia were not familiar with Defendants or believed Defendants were not involved in the laundering is far from dispositive. In the final analysis, this factor slightly favors dismissal.

(iii) Joinder of Additional Parties

Defendants argue that there are several categories of third-party plaintiffs that Defendants will be able to implead in Colombia but not in this court, including Defendants' distributors and importers, Defendants' "criminal customers," and Colombian and Venezuelan individuals and entities involved in money laundering. (Def. FNC Rep. at 74.) Plaintiffs argue that Defendants' vague argument on this ground is largely theoretical because "[t]here is no chance that either in Colombia or the United States, the liquor companies are going to implead into this case their criminal coconspirators, the distributors, narcotics traffickers, and money launderers. To do so would only prove the Plaintiffs' case of the close collaboration between these Defendants and those [107] criminal groups." (Pl. FNC Opp. at 66-67.) Plaintiffs are largely correct.

There can be no question that this is a highly significant factor. Had Defendants identified specific third-parties that they wish to implead, this would weigh heavily in favor of dismissal under the doctrine of forum non conveniens. However, Defendants do not appear to be sincere in their assertion that there are essential third-parties in Colombia. Defendants have not identified a single such third party despite the fact that they are almost certainly familiar with the identities of the individuals and/or entities that compose their distribution chain. Further, Defendants have not requested an opportunity to conduct discovery to identify potential third parties against whom they wish to bring suit. In light of the vagueness of Plaintiffs' argument concerning impleading third parties, I will accord this factor significantly less weight than I ordinarily would. [14] See Massaquoi v. Virgin Atl. Airways, 945 F. Supp. 58, 63

[14] In Piper Aircraft Company v. Reyno, 454 U.S. 235, 258, 102 S. Ct. 252, 267, 70 L. Ed. 2d 419 (1981), the Supreme Court explained that HN50[] a defendant need not "submit affidavits identifying the witnesses they would call and the testimony these witnesses would provide if the trial were held in the alternative forum" but the defendant "must provide enough information to enable the District Court to balance the parties' interests." Of course, identifying third-party witnesses is different from

*[410] (S.D.N.Y. 1996) ("HN49[] While the inability to implead a third party is a factor that weighs in defendant's favor, it is not conclusive and courts have refused to dismiss actions [108] on such grounds."); see also Murray v. British Broad. Corp., 81 F.3d 287, 293 n. 2 (2d Cir. 1996) (dismissal on forum non conveniens grounds appropriate even though joinder of third-party may be "impede[d]" where third-party "is not essential to the adjudication of the core issues.").

[109] (iv) View of Premises

There is no question that the Colombian forum would have a better perspective on the alleged enterprise's effects on Plaintiffs and the Colombian liquor market. The instant forum has a better perspective on Defendants' United States conduct and the early stages of the money laundering process, which allegedly largely occurred here. This factor is not particularly significant in this case, however, because in a money laundering case, there is little if any benefit to conducting a physical inspection of any of the stages of the money laundering. Cf. In re Union Carbide Corp. Gas Plant Disaster at Bhopal, India, 634 F. Supp. 842, 860 (S.D.N.Y. 1986) (finding that a physical inspection of an industrial plant in which a serious accident had occurred "would probably not be of utmost importance"). Overall, this factor is neutral.

(b) Public Interest Factors

Again, the parties dedicate many pages to this issue and the court has carefully considered each of their arguments carefully. The relevant factors are addressed below.

(I) Colombia's and the United States' Interest in the Dispute

HN51[] "There is a local interest in having [110] localized controversies decided at home." Gilbert, 330 U.S. at 509, 67 S. Ct. at 843. Of course, claims arising out of the alleged international money-laundering enterprise are not "localized controversies." Both Colombia and the United States have an interest in the controversy because the parties are Colombian and American. See Capital Currency Exch., N.V. v. Nat'l Westminster Bank PLC, 155 F.3d 603, 611 (2d Cir. 1998) (United States had an interest in a case to which a New York corporation was a party, and the United Kingdom had an interest in the case because it involved two English banks).

Defendants are correct that Colombia has a far greater interest than the United States in the Colombian liquor market. Further, the fact that this action requires the court to consider the effects (albeit not the validity) of the Colombian liquor taxation system potentially raises politically sensitive issues in which Colombian courts are more interested than United States courts. Although Defendants are correct that Plaintiffs have alleged significant harm to Colombian society as a whole (Def. FNC Rep. at 82-83), as discussed above, this court will entertain [111] only claims concerning Plaintiffs' injuries as liquor manufacturers and distributors.

The instant forum has a far greater interest than Colombia in determining whether United States corporations are engaged in the laundering of proceeds from illegal narcotics sales that are occurring in the United States. [15] See *Alfadda v. [411] Fenn, 159 F.3d 41, 47 (2d Cir. 1998) (United States has an interest in applying RICO and securities laws to international financial transactions; this is one factor that should be considered in Gilbert analysis). Congress's enactment of a private RICO cause of action predicated on international money laundering evinces a determination that federal courts should hear such claims, which will almost universally involve evidence located abroad. There are obvious difficulties in weighing whether Colombia has a greater interest in regulating its identifying third parties that a defendant wishes to implead. This is particularly true in this case where Defendants appear to be aware of the identities of narcotics traffickers and other individuals and entities within their distribution chains.

[15] Defendants cite Usha (India), Ltd. v. Honeywell Int'l, Inc., No. 03 Civ. 0494 (DC), 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4236, 2004 WL 540441 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 17, 2004), for the proposition that the fact that a United States corporation controlled foreign business activities does not mean that the United States has an interest in the dispute. (Def. FNC Rep. at 87.) Usha is distinguishable because "Usha's claims are based on issues of Indian corporate governance, the duties between shareholders of Indian corporations, and the duties between joint venture partners under Indian partnership law." *Usha, 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4236, 2004 WL 540441, at 7. In contrast, this case is about whether Defendants violated U.S. money laundering and related laws.

liquor market than the United States has in prohibiting American corporations from laundering the proceeds of illegal U.S. narcotics sales. And it is of no small moment that our federal courts are overrun with criminal cases involving conspiracies to import illegal drugs. Allegations that domestic corporations [112] are complicit in such wrongdoing weigh in favor of accepting jurisdiction. Overall, however, the instant forum has a slightly greater interest in adjudicating the instant dispute than does Colombia.

(ii) Law Governing the Instant Dispute

Although the court will not at this preliminary [113] stage reach any definitive conclusions as to any choice of law issues in this case, it appears that United States law predominates in this dispute. The primary claim is a RICO claim, which clearly raises questions of federal law. Similarly, as Defendants are alleged to have masterminded the tortious conduct that caused Plaintiffs' damages from the United States, it is likely that Plaintiffs' common law claims (fraud, public nuisance, unjust enrichment, negligence, negligent misrepresentation, conversion, and money had and received) are governed by the laws of one or more of the United States. Because Defendants' conduct is alleged to have largely occurred in the United States, the law of the state in which the conduct occurred often applies. See Curley v. AMR Corp., 153 F.3d 5, 12 (2d Cir. 1998) (New York choice of law rules apply and, under New York's "interest analysis," where the claim is brought under a conduct-regulating law, the law where the conduct occurred generally applies).

As discussed above, although Defendants argue that the instant claims require this court to pass upon the validity of Colombia's tax laws (Def. FNC Mem. at 90), nothing about the instant [114] claims will require such consideration. However, the instant claims will most likely require this court to calculate the amount of Colombian taxes owed on various liquor products. Such a determination requires the application of Colombian law. This entails only a relatively modest and purely mechanical application of Colombian law. Overall, this factor weighs in favor of the dispute being heard in the instant forum. See Daventree Ltd. v. Republic of Azerbaijan, 349 F. Supp. 2d 736, 756 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) ("HN52[] Public interest ordinarily favors the enforcement of the federal law, such as the RICO statutes, in the United States courts[.]").

(iii) Judicial Burden

Defendants argue that hearing the instant case in this forum would create an unfair and disproportionate burden on the court and a jury selected from the residents of this District. There is no question that this case has already required and will continue to require significant judicial resources. If the case ultimately proceeds to a jury trial, the cost will be borne by residents of this District in addition to the court. Whether this burden is unfair in some way really depends on (1) [*412] the two fora's [115] relative interests in the dispute and (2) how congested the two courts are. As this court has already determined that the Colombian and American fora have relatively similar interests in the dispute, there is nothing unfair about this court bearing the burden resulting from this litigation. Further, although this District and, specifically, this court are clearly highly congested, it is not clear from the record whether Colombian courts are any more or less congested. This factor is neutral.

Whether this case should be dismissed under the doctrine of forum non conveniens is a very close and difficult question. With respect to the private interest analysis, two factors weigh slightly in favor of dismissal and two factors are neutral. With respect to the public interest analysis, two factors support retaining the case and one factor is neutral. Overall, the Gilbert analysis suggests the factors favoring retaining the case and the factors favoring retention of the case are in equipoise. Plaintiffs' choice of the instant forum is entitled to reasonable deference. The balance of interests are neutral and, as a result, do not overcome Plaintiffs' choice of forum. See Peregrine Myanmar Ltd v. Segal, 89 F.3d 41, 46-47 (2d Cir. 1996) [116] (foreign plaintiffs' selection of New York forum entitled to deference where some witnesses located in New York and other witnesses were located in the Far East, defendant resides in New York, and critical events occurred in New York). Defendants' motion for dismissal on this ground is therefore denied.

VI. INTERNATIONAL COMITY

A. Background

HN53[] International comity is "the recognition which one nation allows within its territory to the legislative, executive or judicial acts of another nation, having due regard both to international duty and convenience." Hilton v. Guyot, 159 U.S. 113, 164, 16 S. Ct. 139, 143, 40 L. Ed. 95 (1895). "Whatever its precise contours, international comity is clearly concerned with maintaining amicable working relationships between nations, a 'shorthand for good neighbourliness, common courtesy and mutual respect between those who labour in adjoining judicial vineyards.'" JP Morgan Chase Bank v. Altos Hornos de Mexico, S.A. de C.V., 412 F.3d 418, 423 (2d Cir. 2005) (quoting British Airways Bd. v. Laker Airways Ltd., [1984] E.C.C. 36, 41 (Eng. C.A.)). The doctrine of international comity provides that, in certain circumstances, [117] a federal court will (1) recognize or provide res judicata effect to foreign judgments and/or (2) dismiss a case before it in deference to a parallel action pending in a foreign jurisdiction. See Royal and Sun Alliance Ins. Co. of Canada v. Century Int'l Arms, Inc., 466 F.3d 88, 92 (2d Cir. 2006). In this case, Defendants seek dismissal based only on the latter branch of international comity.

HN54[] Ordinarily, parallel proceedings in a foreign jurisdiction do not warrant dismissal: "The mere existence of parallel foreign proceedings does not negate the district courts' 'virtually unflagging obligation . . . to exercise the jurisdiction given them.'" Id. at 92 (quoting Colorado River Water Conservation Dist. v. United States, 424 U.S. 800, 817, 96 S. Ct. 1236, 47 L. Ed. 2d 483 (1976)). In fact, "exceptional circumstances" must exist in order to warrant dismissal in deference to a foreign action. Royal and Sun Alliance, 466 F.3d at 93.

HN55[] The Second Circuit has "described [international comity's] boundaries as 'amorphous' and 'fuzzy'" and has declined to articulate a precise set of factors that district courts should consider in determining [118] whether to dismiss an action in deference to [*413] an action pending in a foreign court. Id. at 92-93. However, the Second Circuit has explained:

> In the context of parallel proceedings in a foreign court, a district court should be guided by the principles upon which international comity is based: the proper respect for litigation in and the courts of a sovereign nation, fairness to litigants, and judicial efficiency. See Turner Entm't Co. v. Degeto Film GmbH, 25 F.3d 1512, 1518 (11th Cir. 1994); see also United Feature Syndicate, Inc. v. Miller Features Syndicate, Inc., 216 F. Supp. 2d 198, 212 (S.D.N.Y. 2002). Proper consideration of these principles will no doubt require an evaluation of various factors, such as the similarity of the parties, the similarity of the issues, the order in which the actions were filed, the adequacy of the alternative forum, the potential prejudice to either party, the convenience of the parties, the connection between the litigation and the United States, and the connection between the litigation and the foreign jurisdiction. See, e.g., [Finova Capital Corp. v. Ryan Helicopters U.S.A., Inc., 180 F.3d 896, 898-99 (7th Cir. 1999); [119] see also Bigio v. Coca-Cola Co., 239 F.3d 440, 454 (2d Cir. 2000).] This list is not exhaustive, and a district court should examine the "totality of the circumstances," Finova Capital Corp., 180 F.3d at 900, to determine whether the specific facts before it are sufficiently exceptional to justify abstention.

Id. at 94.

B. Analysis

The overwhelming majority of the factors identified by the Royal and Sun Alliance court have already been addressed above in the context of the forum non conveniens motion. There is no reason to repeat a discussion of those factors here. Instead, the court will address those factors that are specific to the international comity question.

1. Similarity of the Issues and Parties

HN56[] "For two actions to be considered parallel, the parties in the actions need not be the same, but they must be substantially the same, litigating substantially the same issues in both actions." Id. at 94. Defendants argue that twenty-seven actions filed in Colombian courts beginning in 2000 involve parties and issues similar to those in this case. (Def. FNC Mem. at 102-04.) Plaintiffs vigorously dispute this. [120] (Pl. FNC Opp. at 77-79.)

Similarity of Issues. The instant case and the Colombian Actions do not raise similar issues. Defendants argue that the validity of Colombian tax laws is at issue in both. (Def. FNC Mem. at 100.) Defendants' primary argument appears to be that Plaintiffs are not entitled to recover damages for lost taxes if the taxes themselves were void because of their illegality. As discussed in Section III above, to the extent that Plaintiffs are seeking lost taxes, all claims for lost taxes are dismissed. Thus, this argument fails.

Defendants also appear to be arguing that Plaintiffs are not entitled to recover lost profits because they lack a valid right under Colombian law to sell liquor: "If a Department's ordinances and decrees implementing the monopoly are null and void, because they do not comply with national law, for example, the Department cannot complain of lost profits to its illegal business." (Def. FNC Mem. at 100.) As a preliminary matter, Defendants' brief provides a detailed description of the Colombian Actions. (Def. FNC Mem. at 19-22.) That detailed description identifies the arguments that the Diageo companies are making in the Colombian [121] Action; nowhere does it suggest that the Diageo companies [*414] are asserting that the Plaintiffs' liquor monopolies are not legal.

This conclusion is confirmed by the Declaration of Juan Rafael Bravo Arteaga ("Bravo Decl."), which describes twenty-seven Colombian Actions that Diageo companies have filed against Plaintiffs. (Bravo Decl. PP 6-13.) Bravo is an attorney licensed to practice law in Colombia, is the Universidad del Roario's Chair of Tax Law, and has served, inter alia, as the Director of National Taxes at the National Directorate of Taxes, President of the Colombian Institute of Tax Law, and President of the Board of Directors of Banco de Colombia. (Id. PP 3-4.) Bravo's testimony indicates that the Colombian Actions have two primary purposes: (1) to "challenge[] the discriminatory tax treatment of foreign liquors as compared with Colombian national liquors" and (2) to "challenge[] the Departments' ordinances in effect at the time the suits were instituted that permitted the Departments to collect simultaneously the monopoly participation and the consumption tax." (Id. PP 7, 8.) Bravo describes all of the suits motivated by these two purposes, and it is [122] clear that they are aimed at challenging the validity of liquor taxes charged by Colombian government agencies. None of these suits challenges the legality of Plaintiffs' monopoly. As a result, these Colombian Actions neither affect the outcome of this case nor bear any relevant similarity to the instant case. [16]

[123] Bravo also testifies that, in three of the Colombian Actions, "the Diageo Companies challenged the Departments whose ordinances or decrees were in effect prior to the passage of Law 223 of 1995 which were not changed to comply with the law once it entered into force." (Id. P 9.) Only one of the instant Plaintiffs, the Department of Vichada, is involved in those three actions. (Id. at page 5 n.3.) Bravo's Declaration does not appear to describe Law 223 of 1995 or identify which of the Department of Vichada's "ordinances or decrees" are alleged to be invalid. To the extent that one or more of these three Colombian Actions challenges Vichada's power to manufacture or distribute liquor, it is similar to the instant case because it addresses an argument that could potentially serve as a defense to the instant action. Given the Defendants' extraordinary investment of resources in preparing the instant moving papers, it is highly unlikely that one or more of the Colombian Actions address such an argument without Defendants describing the Colombian Action(s) and the argument in great detail. In any event, at most, the Colombian Actions address whether one of the twenty-four instant [124] Plaintiffs is authorized to manufacture and/or distribute liquor. As far as the court can tell, there is no reason to conclude that the Department of Vichada's alleged damages are greater than those of any of the other twenty-three Plaintiffs. As a result, even if one to three of the Colombian Actions addresses the Department of Vichada's authority to manufacture and/or distribute liquor, such an action would be similar to the instant action [*415] only in that it addresses a potential defense to the claims of one of the twenty-four instant Plaintiffs' claims. This very narrow similarity between the instant case and the Columbian Actions--even if true--in no way suggests the actions are parallel.

[16] Defendants also point to an action pending in the Andean Court of Justice that "has considered the Colombian taxation scheme and found it to be anti-competitive." (Bravo Decl. P 13.) However, Defendants acknowledge that nothing about that case suggests that Defendants' liquor monopoly is somehow inconsistent with Colombian or international law: "The Andean Court of Justice ruled that, given their nature as a mechanism for raising public revenue, the mere constitutional authorization of liquor monopolies did not itself violate Andean Community law, but that the Colombian taxation regime and the manner in which the sale of imported goods is made 'more difficult or more costly than goods produce nationally,' did violate Colombian law proscriptions on anticompetitive discrimination against imported goods." (Def. FNC Mem. at 21-22.)

Otherwise, the Colombian Actions appear to bear no relationship to the instant claims. Defendants have not introduced any evidence that Plaintiffs have raised RICO, fraud, competition, or other tort claims in the Colombian Actions. In fact, with the exception of the three actions against the Department of Vichada, there is no evidence that the Colombian Actions raise any issue relevant to the instant RICO and common law claims.

It is telling that there are twenty-seven pending and decided Colombian [125] Actions and not one of them addresses Plaintiffs' claims. Defendants assert that Plaintiffs could bring tort claims akin to those raised in this case in Colombia. Yet, Plaintiffs have not. This confirms that Plaintiffs strongly prefer the instant forum.

Similarity of the Parties. The instant case and the Colombian Actions involve relatively similar parties. Eighteen of the twenty-four instant Plaintiffs are also parties to the Colombian actions. (Bravo Decl. at footnotes 1 and 2.) Further, the Colombian actions were filed by Guinness UDV Colombia S.A., United Distillers & Vinters (Florida), Inc., and United Distillers and Vintners (ER) Limited (the "Colombian Actions Plaintiffs"), which are all affiliates of two of the instant Defendants--Diageo North America, Inc. and Diageo PLC. (See Def. FNC Rep. at 95.) HN57[] Courts have found that two parties are "similar" for purposes of international comity when one party is a subsidiary of the other or one party has a substantial ownership interest in the other. See Goldhammer v. Dunkin' Donuts, Inc., 59 F. Supp. 2d 248, 253 (D. Mass. 1999) (for purposes of international comity, one party that owns a two-thirds interest [126] in another party is similar to the other party); Caspian Investments, Ltd. v. Vicom Holdings, Ltd., 770 F. Supp. 880, 884 (S.D.N.Y. 1991) (Irish action has similar parties to U.S. action where holding company was party to Irish action and holding company and its subsidiary were parties to the U.S. action). Although the exact relationship between Diageo North America, Inc. and Diageo PLC and the Colombian Actions Plaintiffs is not made clear in the papers submitted in support of and opposition to the instant motions, they are affiliated in some way. As a result, the parties are relatively similar.

2. Temporal Sequence of Filings

The Colombian Actions were filed over a period of time beginning in late 2000, whereas the instant case was filed in 2004. (Bravo Decl. P 6.) The fact that the first-filed foreign action was filed four years before the U.S. action weighs in favor of dismissing the action in favor of the foreign forum. See Dragon Capital Partners L.P. v. Merrill Lynch Capital Servs. Inc., 949 F. Supp 1123, 1128 (S.D.N.Y. 1997) (deferring to foreign action where it was filed eighteen months before American suit); *Advantage Int'l Mgmt., Inc. v. Martinez, No. 93 Civ. 6227 (MBM), 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12535, 1994 WL 482114, [127] at 3 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 7, 1994) (defendant's choice of forum entitled to "judicial deference" where foreign suit commenced more than three years before American suit).

Plaintiffs argue that the Colombian Actions were filed as a result of a race to the courthouse: they assert that the filing of the Actions was a purely procedural maneuver designed to gain a tactical advantage. (Pl. FNC Opp. at 81.) They assert that the actions were filed and then permitted to "sit dormant for six years." In their lengthy briefs, they point to no factual citation to support the proposition that [*416] the Actions have sat dormant for six years, making it impossible for this court to conclude as a factual matter that the Actions did, in fact, sit dormant. Further, even if there were evidence in the record suggesting that the Colombian Actions sat dormant for several years, it would be difficult to find that actions challenging the legality of Colombian taxes were filed in Colombia merely for the purpose of procedural fencing.

After considering the "totality of the circumstances," including all of the factors mentioned in Royal and Sun Alliance, the court finds that dismissal under the doctrine of [128] international comity in deference to the Colombian Actions is not appropriate. Above all else, the instant action and the Colombian Actions simply involve different claims and issues. As a preliminary matter, because the issues in the instant and Colombian actions are not substantially similar, the instant and Colombian actions are not parallel. HN58[] The doctrine of international comity may require that a foreign pending action be parallel to the United States action in order to dismiss the case pending in federal court in deference to the pending foreign action. Cf. Royal and Sun Alliance, 466 F.3d at 95 ("The existence of a parallel action in an adequate foreign jurisdiction must be the beginning, not the end, of a district court's determination of whether abstention is appropriate. . . . [T]he mere existence of an adequate parallel action, by itself, does not justify the dismissal of a case on grounds of international comity abstention.") (emphasis added); Turner Entmt. Co. v. Degeto Fil, GmbH, 25 F.3d 1512, 1518 ("The issue is whether a federal court, which properly has jurisdiction over an action, should exercise its jurisdiction where parallel [129] proceedings are ongoing in a foreign nation and a judgment has been reached on the merits in the litigation abroad"); European Community v. RJR Nabisco, Inc. (hereinafter, "RJR Nabisco"), 150 F. Supp. 2d 456, 476 (E.D.N.Y. 2001) (Garaufis, J.) ("international comity is not at issue because there is no need for this court to defer to the legislative or judicial acts of a foreign sovereign"). The court, however, need not reach this question.

HN59[] Assuming arguendo that a pending parallel foreign action is not necessary for dismissal under the doctrine of international comity, Defendants must still show that exceptional circumstances justify dismissal:

> [C]ircumstances that routinely exist in connection with parallel litigation cannot reasonably be considered exceptional circumstances. . . . Additional circumstances must present--such as a foreign nation's interest in uniform bankruptcy proceedings--that outweigh the district court's general obligation to exercise its jurisdiction.

Royal and Sun Alliance, 466 F.3d at 95. Defendants have failed to identify any "exceptional circumstances" that warrant dismissal on the ground of international [130] comity. Id. Defendants make two arguments in favor of dismissal: (1) the Colombian courts should be given an opportunity to adjudicate the Colombian Actions "without duplication or interference;" and (2) judicial efficiency will be served by ensuring the issues are only adjudicated once and preventing inconsistent decisions on the same legal and factual questions. (Def. FNC Mem. at 100-107.) However, each of these arguments fails because the Colombian Actions and the instant action do not raise the same issues. Dismissal on the ground of international comity simply is not warranted in this case. See Royal and Sun Alliance, 466 F.3d at 94-95 (dismissal not warranted even where district court found existence of parallel Canadian action and that Canadian judicial procedures were adequate); *Bigio v. Coca-Cola Co., [417] 448 F.3d 176, 178-79 (2d Cir. 2006) (dismissal of damages dispute between Canadian citizens and United States company not warranted even though claims may "require some modest application of Egyptian law").

VII. POLITICAL QUESTION DOCTRINE

A. Background

HN60[] The Supreme Court has identified those situations in which an issue [131] is non-justiciable under the political question doctrine:

> Prominent on the surface of any case held to involve a political question is found [1] a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department; or [2] a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving it; or [3] the impossibility of deciding without an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for nonjudicial discretion; or [4] the impossibility of a court's undertaking independent resolution without expressing lack of the respect due coordinate branches of government; or [5] an unusual need for unquestioning adherence to a political decision already made; or [6] the potentiality of embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question.

Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 217, 82 S. Ct. 691, 7 L. Ed. 2d 663 (1962). Although the Supreme Court has identified these six separate contexts in which the political question doctrine applies, HN61[] "[b]ecause the nonjusticiability of political questions is primarily a function of the constitutional separation of powers . . . the dominant consideration in any political [132] question inquiry is whether there is a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department." 767 Third Avenue Assocs. v. Consultate Gen. of Socialist Fed. Rep. of Yugoslavia, 218 F.3d 152, 160 (2d Cir. 2000) (internal quotation marks omitted). Dismissal under the political question doctrine is inappropriate "in the absence of an issue whose adjudication would likely result in improper judicial encroachment upon the foreign relations power committed to the coordinate political branches." RJR Nabisco, 150 F. Supp. 2d at 475-76.

B. Analysis

Defendants argue that this action is barred by the political question doctrine because: (1) it requires the court "to enforce anti-competitive foreign laws and support an anti-competitive monopoly regime;" (2) it requires the court to review Colombia's role in "facilitating" liquor smuggling and money laundering; (3) it requires the court to review "corruption and mismanagement in the Departments' monopolies that are the principal cause of their financial difficulties;" (4) the United States Constitution assigns the Executive and Legislative branches power over [133] foreign relations, and Colombia and the United States are negotiating a treaty that will impact the Colombian government's liquor monopoly and Colombian liquor taxes; (5) Colombian courts "are providing decisions essential to this matter;" (6) to the extent this case requires the court to rule on Colombian constitutional issues and "esoteric applications" of other Colombian laws, the case presents "a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resol[ution];" and (7) the case presents "the potentiality for multifarious pronouncements by various departments of the [U.S. government] on one question." (Def. FNC Mem. at 110; Def. FNC Rep. at 101-03.)

As discussed extensively above, the instant case is a commercial dispute. One liquor business is alleging that other liquor businesses have injured it by engaging in money laundering. The fact that the Plaintiffs' liquor businesses are owned [*418] by the Colombian government is irrelevant to the merits of the dispute. The fact that the Colombian government's liquor business are authorized by Colombian law, including the Colombian Constitution, is of no moment. Foreign entities whose very existence depends on foreign law, such [134] as corporations, routinely bring claims in federal courts without the federal court having to analyze the foreign law that creates or authorizes the creation of the foreign corporation. As a result, Defendants' first argument fails. Similarly, Defendants' sixth argument fails because (1) this case does not raise questions that arise under Colombian law (except to the extent that Plaintiffs' common law claims arise under Colombian law) and (2) even if it does to some extent arise under Colombian law, federal courts routinely consider questions under foreign law.

As discussed above, Defendants' second argument fails because the fact that the Colombian government could have done more to enforce smuggling and money laundering laws is irrelevant to the instant dispute.

Defendants' third argument fails even though the instant action may require substantial adjudication of the profitability of Plaintiffs' liquor businesses. This will include consideration of any "corruption and mismanagement." Although, as a practical matter, this could entail some embarrassment to the Colombian government and resulting complications for the Executive and Legislative branches' administration of Colombian [135] foreign policy, (1) there is no "textually demonstrable constitutional commitment" of foreign governments' commercial injuries to the Executive or Legislative branches, and (2) the resulting complications simply are not sufficient to make the dispute non-justiciable.

The fact that the Executive and Legislative branches are negotiating a treaty that addresses issues related to Plaintiffs' liquor monopoly and liquor taxation scheme in no way disposes of the question of whether Defendants' past conduct has caused Plaintiffs' cognizable injuries. Admittedly, this action may result in findings by the court or a jury as to the economic effects of Plaintiffs' liquor businesses and/or Defendants' money laundering. In theory, such findings could be inconsistent with positions that are being taken by the Executive and Legislative branches in the treaty negotiation. However, Defendants have not identified a single case in which a federal court found that the political question doctrine barred a commercial claim against private corporations. As a result, Defendants' fourth and seventh arguments fail.

Finally, Defendants' fifth argument fails because, as discussed above, the pending and decided [136] Colombian Actions have little or no relationship to the instant case. For these reasons, the instant claims are not barred by the political question doctrine. See RJR Nabisco, 150 F. Supp. 2d at 474-76 (political question doctrine does not bar foreign governments' claims against tobacco companies).

VIII. EXTRATERRITORIALITY

A. Background

Defendants argue that Plaintiffs' RICO claims constitute an impermissible attempt to apply the RICO law extraterritorially. HN62[] The RICO statute does not speak to whether or under what circumstances it should be applied extraterritorially and, as a result, the court "must ascertain whether Congress would have intended that federal courts should be concerned with specific international controversies." North South Fin. Corp. v. Al-Turki, 100 F.3d 1046, 1051 (2d Cir. 1996). "[T]he ultimate inquiry is . . . whether 'Congress would have wished the precious resources of United States courts and law enforcement agencies [*419] to be devoted to [foreign transactions] rather than leave the problem to foreign countries.'" Id. at 1052 (quoting Bersch v. Drexel Firestone, Inc., 519 F.2d 974, 985 (2d Cir. 1975) [137] (Friendly, J.)). The Second Circuit has, thus far, declined to determine the precise standard for determining whether a particular RICO claim has a sufficient connection to the United States. Id. at 1052. The Second Circuit has, however, applied the standards used in antitrust and securities cases to the civil RICO context. Id. at 1051-52; see also *Ayyash, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9677, 2006 WL 587342, at 6.

In securities cases, "analysis in the past has focused on whether one of two alternative tests has been satisfied: the 'conduct test' and the 'effects test.'" Al-Turki, at 1051; accord *Ayyash, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9677, 2006 WL 587342, at 4; *Roquette Am., Inc. v. Alymum N.V., No. 03 Civ. 0434 (DC), 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12297, 2004 WL 1488384, at 7 (S.D.N.Y. July 1, 2004). In securities fraud cases, the conduct test has been described as follows:

> [W]e entertain suits by aliens only where conduct material to the completion of the fraud occurred in the United States. Mere preparatory activities, and conduct far removed from the consummation of the fraud, will not suffice to establish jurisdiction. Only where conduct within the United States directly caused the loss [138] will a district court have jurisdiction over suits by foreigners who have lost money through sales abroad.

Al-Turki, 100 F.3d at 1051 (internal quotation marks omitted). This test is premised "on the theory that Congress did not want to allow the United States to be used as a base for manufacturing fraudulent security devices for export, even when these are peddled only to foreigners." Al-Turki, 100 F.3d at 1051 (internal quotation marks omitted).

In federal securities law, under the effects test, "the United States prohibition of securities fraud may be given extraterritorial reach whenever a predominantly foreign transaction has substantial effects within the United States. Transactions with only remote and indirect effects in the United States do not qualify as substantial." Al-Turki, 100 F.3d at 1051 (internal quotation marks and citation omitted).

In antitrust law, "the analysis proceeds along similar lines, but there is more emphasis on the effects of the relevant conduct in the United States and less emphasis on where that conduct took place." Al-Turki, 100 F.3d at 1051. Defendants argue that, in the [139] context of RICO, the effects test as understood in antitrust law is the more appropriate test. (Def. RICO Rep. at 6.) Defendants rely upon language in the Second Circuit's Al-Turki decision:

> It may be that the effects-oriented approach borrowed from antitrust cases is an equally or even more appropriate test, especially since the civil action provision of RICO was patterned after the Clayton Act.' Agency Holding Corp. v. Malley-Duff & Assoc., 483 U.S. 143, 150, 107 S. Ct. 2759, 2764, 97 L. Ed. 2d 121

> (1987). Moreover, RICO (like the antitrust laws) provides for treble damages, which heightens concerns about international comity and foreign enforcement. Compare 18 U.S.C. § 1964(c) with 15 U.S.C. § 15(a).

Al-Turki, 100 F.3d at 1052.

Despite this language in Al-Turki, post-Al-Turki decisions in this Circuit have held that HN63[] the territoriality requirement is met where either the effects or conduct tests is satisfied. See OSRecovery, Inc. v. One Groupe Int'l, Inc., 354 F. Supp. 2d 357, 366 (S.D.N.Y. 2005) (applying conduct and effects tests); Roquette, 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12297, 2004 WL 1488384, at *7 [140] ("Although the Second Circuit has not specified a precise standard, courts in this circuit have generally applied two alternative tests derived from transnational [*420] and antitrust cases in RICO extraterritoriality cases: the 'conduct test' and the 'effects test.' Because it is not clear which test should be used in the context of RICO, jurisdiction will exist where either test is satisfied.") (internal citations and quotation marks omitted); Johnson Elec. N. Am. Inc. v. Mabuchi Motor Am. Corp., 98 F. Supp. 2d 480, 486 (S.D.N.Y. 2004). This court agrees with other district courts that have continued to apply the effects and conduct tests in the alternative, despite the language in Al-Turki suggesting that there should be an emphasis on the effects test as it is applied in antitrust law.

B. Analysis

The Second Amended Complaint alleges that three types of conduct at the heart of the money-laundering enterprise occurred in the United States. First, Plaintiffs allege that Defendants controlled their money-laundering enterprise at least in part from the United States. The Second Amended Complaint alleges that Defendants "controlled every aspect of the financial [141] transactions involving the purchase of their liquor products." (SAC P 28.) "Defendants also controlled the exact methods and means by which they were paid for the liquor products." (Id.) Defendants controlled the distribution channels through which their liquor traveled. (Id. P 30.) Defendants worked with their co-conspirators to create a "complex web of companies located in Aruba and Panama to disguise the true nature and origin of the criminal proceeds" that were being laundered. (Id. PP 31, 35.) "Defendants and their co-conspirators knew that the purpose and design of this system of seemingly unrelated parties to the financial transaction was to conceal, hide and/or disguise the true nature of the criminal proceeds they were accepting." (SAC P 27(d).)

Plaintiffs have explicitly alleged that this management and control occurred in the United States: "Many of the activities of the Defendants that are the subject matter of this complaint, including management decisions and direction of the schemes, are conducted by the Defendants in the United States and, more particularly, from the Defendants' offices in the State and City of New York." (Id. P 100.)

Second, Plaintiffs [142] clearly allege that Defendants made communications and took other overt acts in furtherance of the enterprise while in the United States. Defendants maintained "direct ongoing relationships" with the money-laundering organizations. (Id. P 23(o).) An agent of the Seagram Defendants located in New York and Florida "directly serviced the accounts of the principal money launderers who were providing criminal proceeds to Seagram in exchange for Seagram products." (Id. P 53.) Defendants' employees made trips to Aruba to meet with known drug dealers. (Id. P 27(h).) "At such meetings both the Defendants' distributors and the criminal customers explained the criminal nature of the business in great detail including that narcotics proceeds were utilized to pay for the liquor[.]" (Id.) "Defendants' criminal customers were obtained, serviced, and supervised by [] Defendant employees in the United States, Panama, and Colombia[.]" (Id. P 27(l).) While in the United States, Defendants' employees, through U.S. wires and mail, requested and received information concerning shipments of the liquor. (Id.) Defendants' employees "were personally involved" in the alleged money [143] laundering. (Id. P 27(g).) On trips to Colombia, Defendants' "employees received large volumes of cash that they took into their personal possession or these employees were present when large volumes of cash and third party checks were turned over to" Defendants' distributors. (Id. P27(g).)

Again, even where these allegations do not specifically state that they occurred in [*421] the United States, this court is required to infer that at least some of these communications and other acts occurred in the United States.

To the extent these allegations state that Defendants' employees committed the acts outside the United States, the court is required to infer that these employees were often directed and controlled by Defendants' supervisory employees located in the United States.

Third, the Second Amended Complaint clearly alleges that the first steps of the complex money laundering process occurred in the United States. The money laundering chain begins with sales of illegal narcotics in the United States. (Id. P 27(c).) The cash revenues generated by these illegal sales are then deposited in small amounts in numerous bank accounts in the United States. (Id.) "Checks are then [144] drawn on these accounts--which represent narcotics proceeds--and these checks are then exchanged by Colombian criminal organizations for liquor products manufactured by the Defendants." (Id.) The Second Amended Complaint identifies three such checks, all of which were drawn from accounts at banks in the State of New York and then "smuggled into Colombia." (Id.)

All three categories of the conduct that is alleged to have occurred in the United States--controlling the money-laundering enterprise, communications and other overt acts in furtherance of the enterprise, and the initial stage of depositing proceeds from illegal narcotics sales into U.S. bank accounts and then withdrawing the funds using checks--are material to the alleged money-laundering enterprise. See Johnson, 98 F. Supp. 2d at 486 (sales in United States and use of U.S. mail to commit mail fraud satisfied the conduct test). None of these categories of conduct constitutes "[m]ere preparatory activities" or "conduct far removed from the consummation of the fraud." Al-Turki, 100 F.3d at 1051 (internal quotation marks omitted). Even if each of these categories of U.S. conduct was [145] not, in and of itself, material, the three are certainly material when considered as a whole.

As discussed in further detail below in the Section addressing proximate cause, whether these three categories of conduct "directly caused" Plaintiffs' injuries is a far closer question. Plaintiffs' allegation that Defendants "controlled" the money-laundering enterprise from the United States would appear to satisfy the "direct causation" requirement because, as discussed below, the money-laundering enterprise as a whole constitutes the factual and proximate cause of Plaintiffs' injuries.

Defendants argue that Plaintiffs have failed to satisfy their pleading burden:

> [A]ll of the United States conduct alleged by Plaintiffs falls into one of the following categories: (a) it is based on conclusory allegations with no supporting facts; (b) it dates from beyond the applicable limitations period and is therefore not actionable; (c) it is insubstantial and/or far removed from the alleged illegal activities; (d) it does not involve Defendants; or (e) it is not an essential part of the conduct that caused Plaintiffs' alleged losses.

(Def. RICO Rep. at 10.) Arguments (c), (d), and [146] (e) have already been considered and rejected.

Defendants' assertion that the allegations in the Second Amended Complaint concerning United States conduct are conclusory fails. Although some of the allegations are relatively general, they are supported by numerous highly specific allegations. This court is constrained by the Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8 pleading standards and Plaintiffs have satisfied them on this point.

Defendants' assertion that the allegations concern conduct that is no longer actionable because it gave rise to claims [*422] that are barred by the statute of limitations also fails. Assuming arguendo that the statute of limitations bars any claim for injury suffered prior to October 8, 2000 (Def. RICO Rep. at 10 n. 14), the Second Amended Complaint clearly states that the conduct at issue occurred continuously beginning in the early 1990s and continued to occur as of the filing of the Complaint. (SAC PP 27(e), 27(n) ("Since at least 1991, all the Defendants were selling liquor to individuals whom they knew were reputed narcotics traffickers."), 27(R).) As a result, even though the Second Amended Complaint makes reference [147] to conduct that occurred long before October 2000 (e.g., id. P 27(c)), the Second Amended Complaint is merely citing these as specific examples of conduct that is still occurring as of the filing of the Second Amended Complaint.

In short, in light of Rule 8's liberal pleading standard, this court is constrained to find that Plaintiffs have adequately alleged sufficient United States conduct by Defendants to satisfy the "conduct test." [17] As a result, Plaintiffs have adequately alleged territoriality at this stage. Nothing contained in this opinion precludes Defendants from re-raising the territoriality issue once discovery is complete in an appropriate motion.

IX. RICO ALLEGATION

A. Enterprise

1. Background

HN64[] Under RICO, an "enterprise" is "any individual, partnership, corporation, association, [148] or other legal entity, and any union or group of individuals associated in fact although not a legal entity." 18 U.S.C. § 1961(4). The Supreme Court has defined a RICO enterprise as "a group of persons associated together for a common purpose of engaging in a course of conduct[,]" the existence of which is proven "by evidence of an ongoing organization, formal or informal, and by evidence that the various associates function as a continuing unit." United States v. Turkette, 452 U.S. 576, 583, 101 S. Ct. 2524, 2528, 69 L. Ed. 2d 246 (1981). "The enterprise must be separate from the pattern of racketeering activity, and distinct from the person conducting the affairs of the enterprise." [18] First Capital Asset Mgmt., Inc. v. Satinwood, Inc., 385 F.3d 159, 173 (2d Cir. 2004) (internal citations omitted). A RICO enterprise can be a legal entity or a "discrete economic association existing separately from the racketeering activity." Id. (internal quotation marks omitted).

[149] HN65[] "[T]he existence of an association-in-fact is oftentimes more readily proven by what it does, rather than by abstract analysis of its structure." United States v. Coonan, 938 F.2d 1553, 1559 (2d Cir. 1991) (internal quotation marks omitted; emphasis in original). As a result, "[p]roof of racketeering activity may therefore be relied upon to establish the existence of an enterprise." Black Radio Network, Inc. v. NYNEX Corp., 44 F. Supp. 2d 565, 580 (S.D.N.Y. 1999) (citing Coonan, 938 F.2d at 1559-60).

Defendants argue that Plaintiffs have failed to plead a RICO enterprise because (1) Plaintiffs have failed to allege sufficiently an organizational structure for the enterprise, (2) Plaintiffs do not allege an enterprise that is separate and distinct from the pattern of racketeering activity, and (3) the alleged enterprise is implausible. (Def. RICO Mem. at 33-40.)

Defendants rely upon Amsterdam Tobacco Inc. v. Philip Morris Inc., 107 F. Supp. 2d 210 (S.D.N.Y. 2000), to support their argument that Plaintiffs have failed adequately to plead an organizational structure for the enterprise. In [150] Amsterdam, the plaintiffs, wholesale cigarette distributors, alleged that the defendant, Philip Morris, was involved in a RICO enterprise that smuggled cigarettes from Virginia to New York to evade New York taxes on cigarettes. Id. at 211-13. The plaintiffs alleged that "Philip Morris sold cigarettes to entities who then sold cigarettes

[17] As Plaintiffs have successfully satisfied the "conduct test," there is no reason for this court to reach the "effects test" or the "precious resources test." (See Pl. RICO Opp. at 15.)

[18] Plaintiffs cite World Wrestling Entertainment, Inc. v. Jakks Pacific, Inc., 425 F. Supp. 2d 484, 493-500 (S.D.N.Y. 2006), which read Turkette and a number of Second Circuit cases to state that a RICO plaintiff need not prove a RICO enterprise that is separate from a pattern of racketeering activity. (Pl. RICO Opp. at 39.) As it is not material to the outcome of this decision, the court will assume, without deciding, that Plaintiffs must establish both a pattern of racketeering activity and a RICO enterprise that is separate from that activity.

to cigarette smugglers[.]" Id. at 214. The court found that the plaintiffs had failed to allege adequately an organizational structure because "there [were] insufficient allegations of 'an ongoing organization' involving Philip Morris which functioned as a 'continuing unit.'" Id.

Amsterdam is distinguishable because the Second Amended Complaint contains many more allegations concerning organizational structure than did the complaint in Amsterdam. Plaintiffs describe the enterprise as follows:

> The Defendants, along with their co-conspirators in the money-laundering schemes, including associated distributors, shippers, currency dealers, wholesalers, money brokers, and other participants in the schemes identified above, were, at relevant times, an association-in-fact of individuals and corporations [151] . . . [and] constituted an "enterprise" within the meaning of 18 U.S.C. § 1961(4) (the "Defendants' Money-Laundering Enterprise"). These persons and entities were and are associated in fact for the purpose, among others, of illegally laundering criminal proceeds of criminal activity to the economic detriment of Plaintiffs. The Defendants' Money-Laundering Enterprise is an ongoing organization whose constituent elements function as a continuing unit for the common purpose of maximizing the sale of liquor products through illegal means and carrying out other elements of the Defendants' scheme. The Defendants' Money-Laundering Enterprise has an ascertainable structure and purpose beyond the scope of the Defendants' predicate acts and the conspiracy to commit such acts.

(SAC P 108.)

The Second Amended Complaint includes "concrete allegations to the effect that [the members of the enterprise] continued in 'the enterprise's hierarchy, organization, and activities[]'" throughout the duration of the enterprise. Black Radio Network, Inc., 44 F. Supp. 2d at 581 (quoting Coonan, 938 F.2d at 1560-61). First, the Second Amended [152] Complaint alleges that Defendants were at the top of the enterprise's hierarchy. Defendants "have directed, managed, and controlled" the enterprise. (SAC P 2.) Defendants "controlled every aspect of the financial transactions involving the purchase of their liquor products. The Defendants also controlled the exact methods and means by which they were paid for the liquor products." (Id. P 28.) Defendants "also dictated that their criminal customers route payments to them through intermediary distributors, shippers, and other cut outs." (Id. P 29.) Perhaps above all else, Defendants controlled the prices of the liquor at many, if not all, levels of the distribution chain. (Id. P 27(m).) Defendants' decision to create the distribution [*424] chain "was made at the highest executive levels." (Id. P 27(a).)

In addition to alleging that Defendants controlled the illegal enterprise, the Second Amended Complaint provides significant detail as to how Defendants exercised control over it. Defendants' employees were "personally involved" in the money laundering. (Id. P 27(g).) Defendants' employees would travel to Colombia in order to effect the money laundering by collecting large [153] amounts of cash. (Id.) While in Colombia, Defendants' employees also witnessed other aspects of the money laundering, including transmitting large volumes of cash and third-party checks to Defendants' distributors. (Id.) Defendants' employees would travel to Aruba for meetings with Defendants' customers, who were involved in narcotics trafficking. (Id. P 27(h).) Members of the enterprise had "regular communications" with Defendants' employees. (Id. P 27(l).) Defendants used the wires and mails to track distribution of their liquor products to consumers. (Id.) Defendants "maintained direct ongoing relationships with the money laundering organizations[,]" which were Defendants' customers. (Id. P 27(o).) Defendants utilized these relationships and communications "so as to keep a close eye on the market." (Id. P 30.)

Second, in addition to alleging how Defendants controlled the enterprise, the Second Amended Complaint describes the balance of the enterprise's membership and structure. Members of the enterprise include "the Defendants, the distributors, the shippers, the criminal customers, currency brokers, and the Defendants' agents and subsidiaries who [154] receive payment for the liquor products[.]" (Id. P 3.) "The activities of this core group constitute a conspiracy in law and in fact." (Id.) The enterprise is administered, in part, "by restructuring the corporate structure of the Defendants, to direct and implement their money-laundering schemes and to assist in the avoidance of detection by U.S. and Colombian law enforcement." (Id. P 6.) Although Defendants compete with each other in liquor markets, "they were well aware of each other's activities, copied each other's strategies when they were successful, and in most cases utilized the same distributors to conduct their illegal sales." (Id. P 26.) The enterprise uses "cut outs" and multiple layers of intermediaries to conceal the money laundering, including Romar, Mansur Trading Freezone, Manimex, Tansimex, Marlex, Litani, Mitani, Runam Holdings, Doubletree Investments, Cardgame, Ltd., and Licores Aruba. (Id. PP 27(a), (b), (p).) All of the Mansur group and Romar group entities used the same tactics for effecting the money laundering. (Id. P 27(c).)

Third, the Second Amended Complaint provides significant information about the enterprise's activities. In [155] the most general sense, the enterprise constituted a vertically integrated liquor manufacturing and distribution business. Defendants created and managed "umbrella operations," Colombian corporations ostensibly involved in legitimate businesses. (Id. P 27(j).) Defendants, through the umbrella operations, advertised and conducted other commercial activities in Colombia. (Id.) Defendants also illegally manipulated and controlled the prices, including retail prices, of their products that are sold in Colombia. (Id. P 27(m).) Defendants closely monitored the ways in which enterprise members used marketing allowances provided by Defendants. (Id. P 27(p).) Defendants conducted extensive advertising campaigns to promote their brands in Colombia. (Id. P 27(k).)

Finally, Plaintiffs have alleged that the enterprise has existed continuously for more than twelve years. (Id. PP 27(n), 122.) The continuity of the enterprise is [*425] also established by the fact that the enterprise is largely synonymous with the liquor distribution chain, which has been consistently distributing liquor to Colombia for the same period. (Id. P 27(n).)

Defendants are correct that the Second Amended [156] Complaint fails to detail certain aspects of the enterprise's organizational structure. Most notably, the Second Amended Complaint does not identify by name all of the participants in the enterprise and, other than explaining that Defendants control the enterprise, fails to explain how enterprise participants other than Defendants fit into the enterprise's hierarchy. (Def. RICO Mem. at 35-36.) However, Plaintiffs have essentially alleged that the entire vertical distribution chain is involved in the conspiracy, and, given the numerous other specific allegations about the enterprise's organization, this is sufficient to permit meaningful discovery. See Coonan, 938 F.2d at 1559. Overall, the Second Amended Complaint provides sufficient allegations concerning the enterprise's organization to withstand a Rule 12(b)(6) motion.

(a) Enterprise that Is Separate and Distinct from the Pattern of Racketeering Activity

HN66[] An enterprise "is proved by evidence of an ongoing organization, formal or informal, and by evidence that the various associates function as a continuing unit." Turkette, 452 U.S. at 583, 101 S. Ct. at 2528. In Stein v. N.Y. Stair Cushion Co. Cushion Company, No. 04-cv-4741 (DRH), 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 8410, 2006 WL 319300 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 10, 2006) [157] , relied upon by Defendants, the court found that the plaintiff failed to plead an enterprise separate from the course of conduct because the plaintiff did not allege that the [*426] "association-in-fact enterprise ha[d] any purpose other than the execution of [the illegal] scheme[.]" *2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 8410, [WL] at 4. As the Amsterdam court explained, HN67[] "[i]n assessing whether an alleged enterprise has an ascertainable structure distinct from that inherent in a pattern of racketeering, it is appropriate to consider whether the enterprise would still exist were the predicate acts removed from the equation." Amsterdam, 107 F. Supp. 2d at 215.

In contrast to Stein, in this case, many--if not all--of the members of the alleged enterprise formed a liquor-distribution chain. In addition to the illegal pattern of money laundering and fraud, the enterprise was engaged in the manufacturing and distribution of liquor. This manufacturing and distribution of liquor is a purpose that is separate from money laundering and fraud. Defendants controlled many aspects of this distribution chain, most notably [158] the prices of the liquor being distributed. To the extent that narcotics traffickers are alleged to be members of the enterprise, the narcotics traffickers are also a part of the distribution chain by converting Colombian Pesos into United States Dollars, a conversion that is required to make the distribution chain function. Even if Defendants did not engage in the alleged money laundering and fraud, they would still distribute their liquor through the distribution chain entities that comprise the alleged enterprise. See Amsterdam, 107 F. Supp. 2d at 215 (suggesting that courts pose this counterfactual question to determine whether a separate enterprise has been alleged). As a result, Plaintiffs have adequately alleged an enterprise separate and distinct from the racketeering activity. [19]

[159] (b) Defendants' Membership in a Single Enterprise

Defendants argue that the allegation of a single enterprise composed of companies that compete with each other is implausible and not adequately alleged. (Def. RICO Mem. at 38-40.) HN68[] "[F]or an association of individuals to constitute an enterprise, the individuals must share a common purpose to engage in a particular . . . course of conduct and work together to achieve such purpose[]." First Capital Asset Mgmt., 385 F.3d at 174 (quotation marks omitted). Defendants are correct that courts dismiss civil RICO cases when the complaint fails to allege adequately that defendants are part of a single enterprise. See, e.g., Nat'l Group for Commc'ns and Computers Ltd. v. Lucent Techs. Inc., 420 F. Supp. 2d 253, 271-72 (S.D.N.Y. 2006) (complaint alleging two separate schemes with different purposes failed to allege a single enterprise even though some defendants participated in both schemes); Doe I v. State of Israel, 400 F. Supp. 2d 86, 120 (D.D.C. 2005) ("Plaintiff's complaint never explains how the several groups of defendants associated or operated together, or were otherwise [160] organized into an enterprise with a shared decision-making infrastructure.").

Plaintiffs argue that they have adequately alleged that all Defendants are involved in a money-laundering scheme with the Mansur group and Roy and Milton Harms. (SAC PP 31-39.) Plaintiffs also allege that "[a]ll the Defendants share the common goal of increasing their market share in Colombia by selling their products through illegal means." (Id. P 27.) Of course, there are a variety of situations in which competitors do enter into horizontal agreements [*427] for the purpose of exploiting a market and, in doing so, increasing profits (e.g., horizontal price-fixing agreements). In this case, it is plausible that Defendants are engaged in a joint money-laundering enterprise because it is, for some reason, easier to launder the money collectively. For instance, it may be that there are a limited number of narcotics traffickers who work through an even more limited number of distributors.

The Second Amended Complaint also provides some specific allegations as to how the Defendants, which generally compete with each other, cooperate with each other in the Colombian market. First, the Diageo Defendants and [161] the Pernod Ricard Defendants have cooperated in the purchase and management of Seagram, which was formerly owned by Vivendi. (SAC PP 59-60.) The Diageo and Pernod Ricard Defendants, and entities affiliated with one or both of these groups, purchased Seagram from Vivendi. (Id. P 59.) Through the sale, the Diageo and Pernod Ricard Defendants each came to individually own certain Seagram assets. (Id.) However, the Diageo and Pernod Ricard Defendants retained joint ownership of certain assets, including the Seagram "umbrella operation" located in Colombia. (Id. PP 60-61.) Similarly, the Diageo and Pernod Ricard Defendants agreed to be jointly liable for "any liabilities arising out of claims made against Seagram entities for involvement in illegal activities in Colombia[.]" (Id. P 64.) The purpose of this joint liability and joint management "was and is to further the money-laundering scheme[.]" (Id. P 65.)

Second, all of the Defendants joined to form an industry association, the alleged purpose of which is to lobby the Colombian government and conceal Defendants' money-laundering scheme. (Id. PP 44-45.) The Second Amended Complaint does provide some detail [162] about who is involved in the industry association and how the association is used, and details specific deceptive communications that the association allegedly made to the Colombian government. (Id.) Overall, by alleging that (1) Defendants utilize the same distributors, (2) Defendants have formed an industry association, and (3) some of the Defendants have cooperated in the management of their Colombian business activities, Plaintiffs have adequately alleged a single enterprise composed of all Defendants.

B. Participation in the Enterprise

[19] *Dale v. Banque SCS Alliance S.A., No. 02 Civ. 3592 (RCC) (KNF), 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20967, 2005 WL 2347853, at 7 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 22, 2005), relied upon by Defendants, is also inapposite. In Dale, the court found that an association-in-fact enterprise was not separate from the pattern of racketeering activity where plaintiffs failed to allege as such.

1. Background

HN69[] In order to plead a RICO claim successfully, a plaintiff must allege that the defendant violated 18 U.S.C. §§ 1962(a), (b), (c), or (d). Section 1962(a) provides that "[i]t shall be unlawful for any person who has received any income derived, directly or indirectly, from a pattern of racketeering activity . . . to use or invest, directly or indirectly, any part of such income, or the proceeds of such income, in the acquisition of any interest in, or the establishment or operation of any enterprise which is engaged in, or the activities of which affect, interstate or foreign commerce. [163] " 18 U.S.C. § 1962(a). "Under the plain language of this section, a violation of § 1962(a) consists of investing income derived from a pattern of racketeering activity to acquire an interest in, establish, or operate an enterprise; the violation is not established by mere participation in predicate acts of racketeering." Ouaknine v. MacFarlane, 897 F.2d 75, 82 (2d Cir. 1990). See also United States Fire Ins. Co. v. United Limousine Serv., Inc., 303 F. Supp. 2d 432, 448-49 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) ("Claims under Section 1962(a) alleging injury resulting from racketeering activity alone, rather than from the investment of income so derived, are subject to dismissal.") [*428] "As a matter of law, reinvestment of racketeering income is insufficient to make out a cause of action under RICO." United States Fire Ins., 303 F. Supp. 2d at 449 (internal quotation marks omitted).

HN70[] Section 1962(b) provides that an individual violates RICO when he "acquire[s] or maintain[s], directly or indirectly, any interest in or control of any [RICO] enterprise[.]" In order to prevail under this section, the plaintiff must show "an acquisition [164] or maintenance injury separate and apart from the injury suffered as a result of the predicate acts of racketeering." United States Fire Ins., 303 F. Supp. 2d at 450 (internal quotation marks omitted). The purpose of Section 1962(b) is to prevent proceeds from racketeering activities to be used to takeover a legitimate business. Id.

HN71[] In order "to conduct or participate, directly or indirectly, in the conduct of [a RICO] enterprise's affairs" under 18 U.S.C. § 1962(c):

> [O]ne must have some part in directing those affairs. Of course, the word "participate" makes clear that RICO liability is not limited to those with primary responsibility for the enterprise's affairs, just as the phrase "directly or indirectly" makes clear that RICO liability is not limited to those with a formal position in the enterprise, but some part in directing the enterprise's affairs is required.

Reves v. Ernst & Young, 507 U.S. 170, 179, 113 S. Ct. 1163, 1170, 122 L. Ed. 2d 525 (1993) (internal footnote omitted; emphasis in original). Under the "operation or management" test, one is liable under RICO if he "participated in the operation or management [165] of the enterprise itself." Id. at 184, 113 S. Ct. at 1173. Individuals participate in the operation or management of an enterprise when they serve as "lower rung participants in the enterprise who are under the direction of upper management" or are "others 'associated with' the enterprise who exert control over it as, for example, by bribery." Id. at 184, 113 S. Ct. at 1173.

HN72[] Section 1962(d) makes it unlawful "to conspire to violate any of the provisions of subsection (a), (b), or (c) of this section." 18 U.S.C. § 1962(d). "A 'RICO conspiracy requires evidence that [a defendant] participated in the enterprise through a pattern of racketeering activity, or agreed to do so.'" FD Prop. Holding, Inc. v. U.S. Traffic Corp., 206 F. Supp. 2d 362, 373 (E.D.N.Y. 2002) (quoting United States v. Tellier, 83 F.3d 578, 581 (2d Cir. 1996)); accord United States Fire Ins., 303 F. Supp. 2d at 453 ("In order to allege a conspiracy under § 1962(d), the plaintiff must assert that each defendant by words or actions, manifested an agreement to commit two predicate acts in furtherance of the common [166] purpose of a RICO enterprise") (internal quotation marks omitted).HN73[] In order to state a claim under Section 1962(d), the complaint "should state with specificity what the agreement was, who entered into the agreement, when the agreement commenced, and what actions were taken in furtherance of it." FD Prop. Holding, 206 F. Supp. 2d at 373. Conclusory allegations concerning the conspiracy are insufficient. United States Fire Ins., 303 F. Supp. 2d at 453-54. Recently, in the analogous antitrust context, the Supreme Court held that stating a conspiracy claim "requires a complaint with enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest that an agreement was made . . . it simply calls for enough fact to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of illegal agreement." Twombly, 127 S. Ct. at 1959.

2. Analysis

With respect to § 1962(a), the Second Amended Complaint alleges that Defendants [*429] purchased legitimate Colombian importation and distribution entities. (SAC P 78.) Specifically, the Second Amended Complaint alleges that Defendants "first brought these legitimate importers/distributors to the brink of financial [167] insolvency by selling liquor products to them for 'legitimate' importation into Colombia while at the same time dumping large volumes of product on the illegal market." (Id.) Defendants would simultaneously sell the same product to illegitimate distributors who were part of Defendants' money-laundering and tax-evasion scheme. (Id.) They made these illegal sales "with the full knowledge that the product would cannibalize the legitimate importer/distributor's sales. After driving the Colombian importer/distributor to bankruptcy, the Defendants then purchased the importing/distributing entities." (Id.) Plaintiffs identified several specific legitimate importers/distributors that Defendants purchased: Rueda; Puyana & Cia.; and Fonandes. (Id.)

Similarly, the Second Amended Complaint alleges that the Diageo and Pernod Ricard Defendants agreed to purchase certain assets and liabilities of the Seagram spirits and wine business. (Id. PP 58, 59.) "The Diageo and Pernod Ricard Defendants agreed to purchase the Seagram Spirits and Wine Division to further their illegal and anti-competitive activities" and, in doing so, "knowingly acquired a money laundering enterprise." ([168] Id. P 60.)

As a result, Plaintiffs have specifically alleged that Defendants purchased new businesses to further their money-laundering enterprise. In doing so, they "acquire[d] an interest in, or the establishment" of a RICO enterprise. 18 U.S.C. § 1962(a). The Second Amended Complaint does not appear to state explicitly that Defendants used proceeds from the RICO enterprise to make these investments. However, given the lengthy allegations concerning the extent to which Defendants profited from the enterprise, the fact that at least some of the enterprise profits were used to make these investments can be reasonably inferred. Plaintiffs have successfully pleaded a Section 1962(a) violation.

These allegations concerning the purchase of the Colombian entities and the Seagram Spirits and Wine Division also satisfy Section 1962(b). Such allegations constitute a claim that Plaintiffs suffered "an acquisition or maintenance injury separate and apart from the injury suffered as a result of the predicate acts of racketeering[:]" Plaintiffs allege that the purchase of these businesses injured Plaintiffs by allowing Defendants to broaden and deepen the enterprise [169] and its effects. United States Fire. Ins., 303 F. Supp. 2d at 450 (internal quotation marks omitted). Defendants argue that it is unreasonable to infer that the Diageo and Pernod Ricard Defendants' purchase of the Seagram business lines was for the purpose of furthering the RICO enterprise. (Def. RICO Rep. at 38.) Assuming arguendo that Plaintiffs are required to plead that the purchases were for the purpose of furthering the enterprise, such an inference is warranted in this case.

The Second Amended Complaint also satisfies the operation and management test and, in doing so, successfully pleads a violation of Section 1962(c). As described in detail above, Plaintiffs have alleged that Defendants, with the knowledge and support of high-level executives, have controlled the enterprise. They have accomplished this through a variety of means, including setting prices, visiting Colombia and the Caribbean, being present when the money laundering was actually occurring, and having frequent communications with other participants in the RICO enterprise. This is not a case, as [*430] Defendants argue, in which Defendants are merely alleged to have provided essential goods [170] to the enterprise, engaged in a business relationship with the enterprise, aided and abetted the enterprise, or concealed the enterprise's illegal conduct. (Def. RICO Mem. at 45.)

With respect to Section 1962(d), the Second Amended Complaint provides significant information about the conspiracy alleged. First, the purpose of the conspiracy is to use the liquor manufacturing and distribution business to launder money. The geographic scope of the conspiracy includes Colombia but extends to other countries, including Aruba and Panama. Second, Defendants are alleged to have conspired with each other as well as with every person and entity beneath Defendants on their vertical distribution chain(s). Third, the conspiracy is alleged to have begun in the early 1990s and to continue to this day. Finally, the Second Amended Complaint identifies numerous instances of communications and other activities taken in furtherance of the conspiracy.

As discussed above, there are certain aspects of the conspiracy that receive less attention in the Second Amended Complaint. Above all else, in contrast to the numerous allegations concerning Defendants' communications and control over the vertical chain [171] through which their products are distributed, there are fewer factual assertions concerning the horizontal conspiracy amongst Defendants. Further, the allegations concerning specific transactions through which money was laundered are old and may fall outside of the statute of limitations. Even when these shortcomings are considered, however, the Second Amended Complaint adequately pleads a violation of Section 1962(d).

C. Proximate Cause

1. Background

Defendants assert that Plaintiffs have failed to adequately plead proximate cause. [20] HN74[] Under the civil RICO statute, which requires a plaintiff to establish that he was injured "by reason" of a RICO violation, 18 U.S.C. § 1964(c), Plaintiffs must establish that their injuries were proximately caused by the alleged violation. Holmes v. Sec. Investor Protection Corp., 503 U.S. 258, 265-68, 112 S. Ct. 1311, 1316-18, 117 L. Ed. 2d 532 (1992). Proximate cause "reflects ideas of what justice demands, or of what is administratively possible or convenient" and requires "some direct relation between the injury asserted and the injurious conduct alleged." Id. at 268 (internal quotation marks [172] omitted); see also Anza v. Ideal Steel Supply Corp., 547 U.S. 451, 126 S. Ct. 1991, 1998, 164 L. Ed. 2d 720 (2006) ("When a court evaluates a RICO claim for proximate causation, the central question it must ask is whether the alleged violation led directly to the plaintiff's injuries."); Commercial Cleaning Servs., L.L.C. v. Colin Serv. Sys., Inc., 271 F.3d 374, 381 (2d Cir. 2001) (Holmes "expressly warned against applying a mechanical test detached from the policy considerations associated with the proximate cause analysis at play in this case. We have accordingly turned to those policy considerations explained in Holmes to guide any application of the Court's direct relation test.") (internal citation omitted). HN75[] In order to recover [*431] for a civil RICO claim, the "compensable injury flowing from a violation of [RICO] necessarily is the harm caused by predicate acts sufficiently related to constitute a pattern, for the essence of the violation is the commission of those acts in connection with the conduct of an enterprise." Anza, 126 S. Ct. at 1996 (internal quotation marks omitted).

[173] There is significant uncertainty in the case law as to the RICO proximate cause requirement. Lerner v. Fleet Bank, N.A., 459 F.3d 273, 284 (2d Cir. 2006). It is clear, however, that HN76[] the proximate cause element has a different meaning in the RICO context than it does in the common law context:

> At common law, so long as the plaintiff category is foreseeable, there is no requirement that the risk of injury to the plaintiff, and the risk of the harm that actually occurred, were what made the defendant's actions wrongful in the first place. With statutory claims, the issue is, instead, one of statutory intent: was the plaintiff (even though foreseeably injured) in the category the statute meant to protect, and was the harm that occurred (again, even if foreseeable), the "mischief" the statute sought to avoid.

Id. (internal quotation marks and citation omitted).

Further, HN77[] "when factors other than the defendant's fraud are an intervening direct cause of a plaintiff's injury, that same injury cannot be said to have occurred by reason of the defendant's actions." First Nationwide Bank v. Gelt Funding Corp., 27 F.3d 763, 769 (2d Cir. 1994); [174] see also Amsterdam Tobacco Inc. v. Philip Morris Inc., 107 F. Supp. 2d 210, 218-20 (S.D.N.Y. 2000) (dismissing civil RICO claim on the ground that intervening factors were the proximate cause of plaintiffs' injuries). As the Supreme Court has explained, in certain cases, civil RICO claims are barred when it is difficult to "ascertain the amount of a plaintiff's damages attributable to the violation, as distinct from other independent factors" such as "poor business practices or [plaintiff's] failure[] to anticipate developments in the financial markets." Holmes, 503 U.S. at 269-73, 112 S. Ct. at 1318-20.

[20] In their initial moving brief, Defendants argued that Plaintiffs failed to allege that they had standing to bring a RICO claim. (Def. RICO Mem. at 21-22.) In their Reply brief, Defendants characterize very similar (if not identical) arguments as an assertion that Plaintiffs have failed to allege proximate cause. (Def. RICO Rep. at 14-15.) As a result, the court will treat this argument as a proximate cause argument.

2. Analysis

Defendants argue that Plaintiffs have failed to plead proximate cause as a matter of law because (1) Plaintiffs have not alleged a sufficient causal connection between Defendants' money laundering and the injury they suffer, (2) the alleged connection between money laundering and Plaintiffs' lost sales is too speculative, and (3) intervening acts break the causal chain between money laundering and Plaintiffs' lost sales. (Def. RICO Rep. at 14-26.) For the reasons discussed below, these arguments fail.

(a) Direct and Non-Speculative* [175] *Causal Connection

First, Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged that their injuries were caused by the stated predicate acts. Defendants argue that "the products with which the Departmental monopolies' products allegedly compete are the smuggled liquor products, not the laundered money, and thus it is only the smuggling that could even conceivably cause competitive harm." (Def. RICO Rep. at 18.) Defendants cite this court's Amazonas decision in support. In considering a money laundering claim that was similar to the instant claim, this court explained that:

> On the pleadings, the only apparent connection between the injury alleged and the allegations of money laundering is the harm visited by money laundering as a link in the smuggling chain. . . .
> . . . .
> [*432] Stripped of the harms suffered from smuggling, the complaint offers no additional, distinct causal connection between the allegations of money laundering and the injuries asserted. Simply put, Plaintiffs' complaint attacks a smuggling scheme. The money laundering claims are merely asserted as part of the overarching claims of injury from smuggling. Deprived of that context, Plaintiffs' particular money [176] laundering claims lose all connection to the injuries alleged. While there may yet exist a discreet connection between money laundering and harm suffered by Plaintiffs, this court cannot divine that connection.

Amazonas, 186 F. Supp. 2d at 243. As both parties have stated in their motion papers, and the published European Community cases make clear, the European Community cases, including Amazonas, primarily addressed smuggling claims as opposed to money laundering claims. Further, the Amazonas opinion makes clear that a causal connection between money laundering and the European Community plaintiffs might exist. Certainly, this court's initial decision in European Community to dismiss the money laundering claims without prejudice makes clear that the plaintiffs should have been given an opportunity to re-plead the causation element of their civil RICO claim. See Amazonas, 186 F. Supp. 2d at 245 ("Plaintiffs' RICO and common law claims predicated on Defendants' money laundering transactions are DISMISSED without prejudice to replead.").

In this case, the allegations concerning money laundering are far better developed [177] than they were in Amazonas. The Second Amended Complaint states that Defendants' laundering of narcotics proceeds and the associated mail and wire fraud enabled Defendants to sell their liquor at lower prices (the money-laundering discount) which, in turn, caused Plaintiffs to lose profits and revenues. Although this is a close case that falls somewhere in between the Supreme Court's decision in Anza v. Ideal Steel Supply Corp. and the Second Circuit's decision in Commercial Cleaning Services, L.L.C. v. Colin Service Systems, Inc., this case falls closer to Commercial Cleaning and, as a result, Plaintiffs have adequately pled a direct and non-speculative relationship between Defendants' money-laundering enterprise and Plaintiffs' injury.

In Anza, the Supreme Court held that a manufacturer of steel mill products failed to plead the proximate cause element of a civil RICO claim when it alleged that a competitor had harmed it by repeatedly failing to pay taxes. Anza, 126 S. Ct. at 1996-99. The plaintiff had asserted that, by evading sales taxes through an enterprise engaged in mail and wire fraud, the defendants reduced their prices without altering [178] their profit margin. Id. at 1994. The Court concluded that the "[t]he cause of [plaintiff's] asserted harms, however, is a set of actions (offering lower prices) entirely distinct from the alleged RICO violation (defrauding the State)." Id. at 1997. The court cited several factors in reaching the conclusion that no proximate cause existed: (1) New York State, which was defrauded of its sales taxes, was a direct victim of the enterprise, whereas the plaintiffs were not "direct" victims; (2) it would be very difficult to determine the extent to which the defendants' decrease in prices resulted from the defendants' tax evasion rather than other, independent reasons; (3) the fact that the defendants committed tax evasion did not necessarily mean that they would reduce their prices--they could have kept some of the money resulting from the tax evasion as profit or re-invested it into their corporation; (4) plaintiff's lost sales could have resulted from some fact other than tax evasion; (5) requiring a direct causal connection is "especially warranted" where the directly injured victim-- [*433] the State of New York--"can be expected to vindicate the laws by [179] pursuing its own claims;" and (6) it would be far easier to adjudicate a claim brought by the State of New York because it would require a simple calculation of the amount of the tax evasion. Id. at 1996-98; see also Gelt Funding, 27 F.3d at 770-72 (lender's civil RICO claim alleging it was fraudulently induced to make nonrecourse loans by intentionally inflated real estate valuations dismissed for failure to plead proximate cause where (1) the magnitude of the overstatement was unclear because the methodologies used by the plaintiff were faulty and (2) five-year interval between the plaintiff's losses and the defendants' misrepresentations coupled with the collapse of the real estate market at that time meant the nexus between the misrepresentation and the injury was too tenuous).

In Commercial Cleaning, the Second Circuit held that the plaintiffs had adequately plead the proximate cause element of a civil RICO claim where they alleged that the defendant obtained an unfair business advantage over its competitors in the cleaning services industry by knowingly hiring "[h]undreds of illegal immigrants at low wages." Commercial Cleaning, 271 F.3d at 378-79, 380-85. [180] Specifically, the plaintiffs alleged that the defendant's hiring of illegal immigrants permitted them to out-bid the plaintiffs on a lucrative cleaning contract to clean a specific facility. Id. at 379. As Commercial Cleaning was decided before Anza, the Commercial Cleaning court based its analysis on three factors cited in Holmes:

> HN78[] First, the less direct an injury is, the more difficult it becomes to determine what portion of the damages are attributable to the RICO violation as distinct from other, independent, factors. Second, if recovery by indirectly injured plaintiffs were not barred, courts would be forced, in order to prevent multiple recovery, to develop complicated rules apportioning damages among groups of plaintiffs depending on how far each group was removed from the defendant's underlying RICO violation. Third, there was no need to permit indirectly injured plaintiffs to sue, as directly injured victims could be counted on to vindicate the aims of the RICO statute, and their recovery would fix the injury to those harmed as the result of the injury they suffered.

Id. at 381-82 (citations to Holmes omitted). [181] The Commercial Cleaning court applied the three Holmes factors as follows: (1) although defendants may be able to argue that they won the head-to-head bid for the Pratt & Whitney contract for a variety of reasons other than the defendants' hiring of illegal immigrants (e.g., by providing higher quality services or having a better reputation), "the plaintiffs may well show that they lost contracts directly because of the cost savings defendant realized through its scheme to employ illegal workers;" (2) there was no risk that defendants would have to compensate multiple plaintiffs for the same injuries because each plaintiff would have to prove that defendant's hiring of illegal immigrants was the "but-for" cause of its losing a given contract; and (3) there was no other individual who was injured more directly than plaintiffs and could be counted on to bring a civil RICO claim to deter such conduct. Id. at 382-85.

The instant case is similar to Commercial Cleaning in that there is no person who has been injured more directly than Plaintiffs. As a result, if Plaintiffs are not permitted to bring the instant claim, it would appear that Defendants' money-laundering [182] enterprise would not give rise to an actionable civil RICO claim. See Commercial Cleaning, 271 F.3d at 385 ("There is no class of potential plaintiffs who have been more directly injured by the alleged RICO conspiracy than the defendant's [*434] business competitors, who have a greater incentive to ensure that a RICO violation does not go undetected or unremedied, and whose recovery would indirectly cure the loss suffered by these plaintiffs."). Defendants assert that Colombian tax authorities are directly injured by the alleged enterprise in the same way that New York State was directly injured in Anza. (Def. RICO Rep. at 28.) Defendants are certainly correct with respect to Plaintiffs' claims for lost taxes. As discussed above, such claims are being dismissed because they are barred by the revenue rule. With respect to Plaintiffs' money-laundering claims, however, Colombian tax authorities do not appear to be a victim. Defendants do not point to any financial harm that Colombian tax authorities suffer as a result of the money-laundering exterprise. Defendants argue only that "[j]ust as with tax laws, the Republic would be expected to enforce its own currency laws [183] and would be the direct victim." (Id.) Defendants' argument fails because Plaintiffs are alleging that they have been injured by Defendants' violation of United States money laundering laws as opposed to Colombia currency laws. [21] In this way, the case is distinguishable from Anza, where there was a third-party--the state--that directly lost tax revenues as a result of the defendants' tax evasion and, as a result, was better suited to bring a civil RICO claim.

HN79[] Congress has classified intranational and international money laundering as a predicate act that can give rise to RICO liability. See European Community I, 355 F.3d at 133-35 (describing [184] how the Patriot Act amended RICO to add additional money-laundering predicate acts). In doing so, Congress clearly created a private RICO cause of action predicated on money laundering. It is conceivable that, in contrast to the context of tax evasion addressed in Anza, in many money-laundering cases, a competitor of the defendant is the person that is most likely to be directly injured as a result of the money laundering. After all, other participants in the defendant's distribution chain are likely to benefit from the defendant's money laundering: the drug dealers obtain the benefit of having their money laundered; at best, consumers may benefit from cheaper prices resulting from the narco-laundering discount and, at worst, consumers should not be harmed. HN80[] In considering whether Plaintiffs have pled proximate cause, the Second Circuit requires this court to make the following determination: "was the plaintiff (even though foreseeably injured) in the category the statute meant to protect, and was the harm that occurred (again, even if foreseeable), the 'mischief' the statute sought to avoid[?]" Abrahams v. Young & Rubicam Inc., 79 F.3d 234, 237 (2d Cir. 1996). [185] Certainly, the instant claims appear to be well within Congress's core purpose in creating a RICO cause of action predicated on money laundering.

This case does, however, appear to fall closer to Anza than Commercial Cleaning in one respect: the instant claims will require the factfinder to sort out the extent to which Plaintiffs' losses result from money laundering as opposed to other factors. Plaintiffs' revenues and profits are directly related to the quantity of goods sold and the price at which they are sold. The price and quantity figures are, in turn, potentially based on a wide variety of factors, including consumer preferences, the extent of tax evasion, the extent of money laundering, manufacturing and shipping [*435] costs, effectiveness of Plaintiffs' management of their liquor businesses, and the values of United States Dollars and Colombian Pesos. As the Supreme Court explained in Anza, sorting out what portion of a plaintiff's losses resulted from a defendant's illegal acts can be difficult, particularly when the plaintiff and defendant are competitors:

> The injury [plaintiff] alleges is its own loss of sales resulting from [defendant's] decreased prices [186] for cash paying customers. [Defendant], however, could have lowered its prices for any number of reasons unconnected to the asserted pattern of fraud. It may have received a cash inflow from some other source or concluded that the additional sales would justify a smaller profit margin. Its lowering of prices in no sense required it to defraud the state tax authority. Likewise, the fact that a company commits tax fraud does not mean the company will lower its prices; the additional cash could go anywhere from asset acquisition to research and development to dividend payouts.
> There is, in addition, a second discontinuity between the RICO violation and the asserted injury. [Plaintiff's] lost sales could have resulted from factors other than petitioner's alleged acts of fraud. Businesses lose and gain customers for many reasons, and it would require a complex assessment to establish what portion of [plaintiff's] lost sales were the product of [defendant's] decreased prices. . . .
> Further illustrating this point is the speculative nature of the proceedings that would follow if [plaintiff] were permitted to maintain its claim. A court considering the claim [187] would need to begin by calculating the portion of [defendant's] price drop attributable to the alleged pattern of racketeering activity. It next would have to calculate the portion of [plaintiff's] lost sales attributable to the relevant part of the price drop. The element of [21] In a footnote, Defendants argue that "the United States is another entity that could be expected to pursue these Defendants." (Def. RICO Rep. at 28.) Although the United States could bring a criminal case against Defendants, the United States has not suffered a direct financial injury in the way that the State of New York had in Anza.

> proximate causation recognized in Holmes is meant to prevent these types of intricate, uncertain inquiries from overrunning RICO litigation. It has particular resonance when applied to claims brought by economic competitors, which, if left unchecked, could blur the line between RICO and the antitrust laws.

Anza, 126 S. Ct. at 1997-98.

In this same sense, the instant case is distinguishable from Commercial Cleaning where the plaintiff was claiming that defendants' hiring of illegal immigrants at very low wages permitted them to reduce their prices and, in doing so, secure a specific cleaning services contract with Pratt & Whitney. The Second Circuit explained that determining causation and damages is simpler in the context of head-to-head bidders:

> Where, as here, the parties have bid against each other, the difference between the lowest and second lowest bid is readily [188] discoverable. If [plaintiff] can prove that but for [defendant's] lower wage costs attributable to its illegal hiring scheme, [plaintiff] would have won the contract and would have earned a profit on it, it will have shown a proximately caused injury, compensable under RICO.

Commercial Lending, 271 F.3d at 382-83. Proving causation and damages will most likely be far more difficult in the instant case than in the head-to-head bidding context of Commercial Lending.

Even though this case may fall closer to Anza than to Commercial Lending with respect to how difficult it will be to prove causation and damages, dismissal at this time is not appropriate. As discussed above, (1) Plaintiffs state a reasonably direct claim that Defendants' illegal money-laundering [*436] enterprise caused Plaintiffs to lose revenues and sales and (2) there is no more direct plaintiff to bring a civil RICO claim against Defendants. At this early stage of the litigation, it is not possible to determine that, as a matter of law, Plaintiffs will not be able to prove to a reasonable degree of certainty that Defendants' money laundering caused Plaintiffs to lose revenues and [189] profits. At this time, the court has no way of knowing what facts will emerge in discovery or what methodologies the parties' experts will use to prove and disprove damages. For instance, it is entirely possible that Defendants possess market analyses that reach conclusions as to the effects of key market variables, such as consumer preferences, Colombian taxes, and elasticity of demand. To the extent Plaintiffs simply seek to use Defendants' real-time market analyses, it may be very simple for Plaintiffs to prove at least some level of damages. Similarly, it very well may be that Plaintiffs' and Defendants' experts share key assumptions or methodologies that greatly simplify many of the problematic issues raised in Anza. [22]

[190] (b) Intervening Acts

---

[22] Defendants' reliance on First Nationwide Bank v. Gelt Funding Corp., 27 F.3d 763 (2d Cir. 2004), is misplaced. In that case, the Second Circuit held that a civil RICO case alleging that a lender was fraudulently induced to make loans on the basis of intentionally inflated valuations should be dismissed under Rule 12(b)(6) because the plaintiff failed to plead proximate cause. Id. at 769-72. Gelt Funding is distinguishable on a number of grounds. First, the Second Circuit appeared to require the plaintiff to plead a methodology for calculating damages that was far more specific than is typically required on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion because the plaintiffs had lost money on real estate loans in the midst of a crash in the real estate market: "Given the complexity of the New York real estate market, and the fact that [plaintiff's] losses came in the wake of a downturn in the real estate market, [plaintiff] must allege loss causation with sufficient particularity such that we can determine whether the factual basis for its claim, if proven, could support an inference of proximate cause." Id. at 770. The court ultimately concluded that "[t]he methodology employed by [plaintiff] in determining the magnitude of the defendants' alleged[ly fraudulent] overstatements of income is so defective, and the conclusions reached so defy logic, that no 'reasonable inferences' can be drawn therefrom." Id. at 772. Here, there is no reason to require Plaintiffs to plead a specific methodology for proving causation and damages and, thus, the Plaintiffs are entitled to the benefit of all reasonable inferences. Second, in Gelt Funding, there was a five-year difference between the time of the alleged misstatements and the time of the losses whereas, in the instant case, the losses are alleged to occur more or less contemporaneously. Id. Finally, in Gelt Funding, the Second Circuit pointed to the real estate crash that had occurred in the relevant market during the relevant five-year period as an intervening factor that tended to disrupt any inference of proximate causation. Id. In the instant case, Defendants have not pointed the court to any intervening variable of even remotely similar magnitude.

Defendants argue that the following intervening acts break the chain of causation between Defendants' alleged conduct and Plaintiffs' injuries:

> (1) [T]he Republic creating Duty-Free Ports and Special Customs Regime Areas ("SCRAs") out of which liquor products can easily--and often legally--be brought into the interior of Colombia without payment of taxes; (2) the importers' selling liquor products to customers in Colombia's Duty-Free Ports and SCRAs; (3) the customers in the Duty-Free Ports and SCRAs smuggling the products or selling to others who smuggle the products into the interior of Colombia; (4) the custom agents overlooking or facilitating the smuggling of liquor products; (5) the Colombian distributors transporting smuggled liquor products throughout Colombia; (6) the retailers selling smuggled liquor products [*437] to retail customers in Colombia; (7) the retail customers choosing not to purchase Plaintiffs' products; (8) the business practices of the Departmental monopolies that may adversely impact their ability to compete; and (9) the Republic's protectionist policies, such as monopolies and high taxes, which create incentives to smuggle [191] liquor products.

(Def. RICO Mem. at 26-27.)

Several of these so-called "intervening" acts (1, 4, and 9) are nothing more than tax and money laundering laws and law-enforcement policies and practices. Defendants have not cited and this court is not aware of any precedent that stands for the proposition that an actor--such as a RICO enterprise--that engages in tax evasion or money laundering is not the proximate cause of injuries resulting from the evasion or laundering because the government whose laws are being violated "intervened" by not enacting optimal laws or not enforcing the laws that are being broken in an optimal way (or in the way that the actor believes is optimal). In effect, Defendants are arguing that they should not be liable because Defendants have enacted and enforced laws in such a way as to create economic incentives to violate the laws. This line of argument is without precedent and, without question, fails.

Several of the "intervening" acts to which Defendants point involve distributors and middle-men smuggling and selling the liquor after Defendants sell it to them. Defendants cite Amsterdam Tobacco Incorporated v. Philip Morris Incorporated for [192] the proposition that such smuggling and sales constitute intervening acts. (Def. RICO Mem. at 27-29.) In Amsterdam, the plaintiffs alleged that the defendant, Philip Morris, was a member of a RICO enterprise engaged in the following scheme: Philip Morris sold cigarettes to Virginia distributors; the distributors then smuggled the cigarettes to other states with cigarette taxes that are higher than those in Virginia; the distributors then sold the cigarettes to consumers in high-tax states without paying the higher cigarette taxes. Amsterdam, 107 F. Supp. 2d at 212-13. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendant, finding, inter alia, that the plaintiffs had failed to create a material question of fact as to whether the defendant had participated in the alleged enterprise and that the plaintiffs' injuries were proximately caused by the defendant's conduct. Id. at 216-20. The defendant did not participate in the RICO enterprise because the defendant did not "play[] a part by operating or managing [the enterprise's] affairs, either by being part of upper management or by exerting control over the enterprise." Id. at 216. [193] As a result, all of the sales that occurred downstream of the defendant constituted independent acts that intervened in the chain of causation between the defendant's initial sale of the goods and the ultimate purchase of the goods by the consumer. Id. at 218-20 ("The (direct) cause of Plaintiffs' lost profits was not any activity of Philip Morris'. Rather, the 'but for' cause of Plaintiff's alleged loss was, among other things, the smuggling activity and the decision by New York consumers not to purchase cigarettes from Plaintiffs."). The court also found that, as the Supreme Court did in Anza, when "the primary purpose of an alleged racketeering enterprise is to avoid paying taxes or otherwise defraud the government, indirectly injured parties do not have standing to bring RICO claims." Id. at 219.

In contrast to Amsterdam, the instant Plaintiffs allege that Defendants are actively managing an enterprise that is engaged in smuggling and downstream sales. The Second Amended Complaint alleges that "Defendants controlled every aspect of the financial transactions involving the purchase of their liquor products. The [*438] Defendants also controlled [194] the exact methods and means by which they were paid for the liquor products." (SAC P 28.) "Defendants also dictated that their criminal customers route payments to them through intermediary distributors, shippers, and other cut outs. This procedure, known in money-laundering jargon as 'layering,' is conducted for the sole purpose of concealing the payments' true source from Colombian and United States law enforcement." (Id. P 29.) Defendants' distributors "maintained [distribution] channels according to specific instructions from the Defendants, which included special handling instructions for shipments designated for Colombian customers that the Defendants knew were involved in criminal activities." (Id. P 30.) Defendants' representatives would visit Colombian customers along with distributors "so as to keep a close eye on the market." (Id.)

Because Defendants' actively managed the enterprise, unlike Amsterdam, Defendants may very well have managed, directed, and/or controlled downstream sales, particularly downstream sales to and by cut outs that Defendants were involved in creating for the exclusive or primary purpose of laundering money. Because Plaintiffs are [195] entitled to every reasonable inference, the Second Amended Complaint's allegation that "Defendants controlled every aspect of the financial transactions involving the purchase of their liquor products" constrains this court to find that, for purposes of this motion, Defendants controlled the entire distribution system up to and including the actual sale to the ultimate consumer. [23] As a result, in contrast to Amsterdam, Plaintiffs have successfully alleged that there were no intervening acts between their Defendants' conduct and Plaintiffs' injury.

[196] D. Predicate Acts

The Second Amended Complaint alleges four types of predicate acts: money laundering; wire fraud; mail fraud; and violation of the Travel Act. Defendants argue that the Second Amended Complaint fails to plead adequately each of these predicate acts. Each predicate act will be considered in turn.

1. Money Laundering

Plaintiffs allege the predicate act of money laundering under both 18 U.S.C. §§ 1956 and 1957. HN81[] Section 1956 requires that:

> (1) the individual conducted a financial transaction in interstate commerce, (2) with knowledge that the property involved in the transaction represented some form of unlawful activity, (3) with the transaction in fact involving the proceeds of specified unlawful activity, (4) with the purpose, in whole or in part, of concealing or disguising the nature, the location, the source, the ownership or the control of the illegally acquired proceeds.

Bernstein v. Misk, 948 F. Supp. 228, 236 n.2 (E.D.N.Y. 1997) (internal quotation marks omitted); see also United States v. Maher, 108 F.3d 1513, 1527-28 (2d Cir. 1997). HN82[] Section 1957 requires [197] that the defendant "(1) knowingly engaged or attempted to engage in a monetary transaction involving criminally derived property, (2) with such property being valued at more than [*439] $ 10,000, and (3) with such money actually being derived from specific criminal activity." Bernstein, 948 F. Supp. at 236 n.2.

Defendants argue that the Second Amended Complaint fails to allege money laundering as a predicate act because (1) Plaintiffs have failed to state that Defendants were furthering a specified unlawful activity, and (2) Plaintiffs have failed to state intent or knowledge. (Def. RICO Mem. at 51-56.) Defendants also argue that the allegations concerning these points were conclusory. (Def. RICO Rep. at 42-45.)

The Second Amended Complaint contains numerous allegations that Defendants had actual knowledge and intent and that Defendants were furthering illegal narcotics trafficking. Defendants "have directed, managed, and controlled a criminal scheme . . . by knowingly selling their products into illegal channels and receiving payment in the form of laundered proceeds from narcotics sales and other criminal activities[.]" (SAC P 2.) "Defendants knowingly sell their products [198] to organized crime, arrange for secret payments from organized crime, and launder such proceeds in the United States or offshore venues known for bank secrecy." (Id. P 4.) "Defendants created a circuitous and clandestine distribution chain so as to sell their liquor to criminal organizations and to [23] It is not entirely clear that Plaintiffs need to establish that Defendants controlled every sale in the distribution chain in order to recover: if Plaintiffs establish that Defendants controlled a sale to a distributor located in whole or in part in Colombia, Plaintiffs may be able to show that the enterprise caused Defendant to lose revenues and/or profits. At this time, the parties have not briefed this issue and there is no reason for the court to reach it.

receive payment for their products with criminal proceeds while at the same time concealing their activities from Colombian and U.S. law enforcement." (Id. P 27(a).)

Defendants' employees traveled to Aruba to meet with narcotics traffickers and, at such meetings, Defendants' "distributors and criminal customers explained the criminal nature of the business in great detail including that narcotics proceeds were utilized to pay for the liquor. . . . In spite of these detailed explanations of the criminal nature of the liquor sales, all these Defendants continued not only to conduct this business but to take all possible steps to expand this business." (Id. P 27(h).) The Second Amended Complaint describes the types of communications that Defendants had with their distributors concerning the Defendants' entire distribution chain(s) and avers that, "[i]n this way, the Defendants [199] knew who their ultimate customers were and knew that they were receiving criminal proceeds in payment for their products." (Id. P 27(l).) "Since at least 1991, all the Defendants were selling liquor to individuals whom they knew were reputed narcotics traffickers." [24] (Id. P 27(n).)

Defendants were aware that their Aruban distributors used numerous corporate entities to conceal the source of their funds: "Defendants, aware of the artifice and design of the Aruban distributors and the need to disguise the nature, source and origin of the narcotics and other criminal proceeds they were receiving, adapted themselves to and received payment continually from these various [cut out] companies and [200] the accounts they held." (Id. P 27(q).) In fact, "Defendants structured their payment schemes to maximize their own security from detection by United States and Colombian law enforcement." (Id. P 29.) "Defendants also dictated that their criminal customers route payments to them through intermediary distributors, shippers, and other cut outs." (Id.) With respect to the Colombian money-laundering transactions, intermediaries included Romar, Transimex, Licores Aruba, and brokers in Colombia, such as Victor Ojeda and Samuel Santander Lopesierra. (Id.) [*440] Defendants' employees would visit storage and distribution companies that were organized along product lines and would accompany representatives of such companies on trips to visit Colombian customers. (Id. P 30.) On such trips, Colombians would gain knowledge about the source of the illegal narcotics proceeds that they were receiving. (Id.)

Defendants correctly cite *Casio Computer Co., Ltd. v. Sayo, No. 98-cv-3772 (WK), 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 15411, 2000 WL 1877516, at 17 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 13, 2000) and Bernstein, 948 F. Supp. at 236 n.2, for the proposition that HN83[] a money-laundering claim cannot be plead with wholly [201] conclusory allegations. Here, however, the Second Amended Complaint provides substantial facts concerning the alleged money laundering: Defendants laundered the proceeds from illegal United States narcotics sales; at least some of the drug traffickers whose funds were being laundered are specifically identified; specifics as to the money-laundering process are provided, including how smurfs deposit funds in bank accounts and how various corporate entities are utilized for the purpose of concealing the nature of the transactions; Defendants learned of the source of the funds that they were receiving through their employees' trips to Aruba and Colombia and through close supervision of their distribution chain. Defendants are correct that the Second Amended Complaint fails to provide significant specifics as to each Defendant's money-laundering acts. Because, however, Plaintiffs allege that each of the Defendants is engaged in the same enterprise and each of the Defendants utilizes identical tactics, this defect is not fatal. The Second Amended Complaint adequately pleads money-laundering predicate acts.

2. Travel Act Violation

HN84[] In order to prove violation of The Travel Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1952 [202] , the plaintiff must show (1) travel in or use of the mail or any facility of interstate or foreign commerce, (2) "intent to 'facilitate the promotion, management, establishment, or carrying on, of any unlawful activity,'" and (3) performance of "an additional act in furtherance of the specified unlawful activity." United States v. Jenkins, 943 F.2d 167, 172 (2d Cir. 1991) (quoting 18 U.S.C. § 1952(a)).

[24] Although P 27(n) states at one point that Defendants 'knew or should have known' that one individual was a narcotics trafficker and that he used certain companies for money laundering, this paragraph also alleges that Defendants had actual knowledge that some of their customers were narcotics traffickers.

Other than this enumeration of the elements of a violation of The Travel Act, Defendants primarily cite cases outside the Second Circuit for a description of the scope of The Travel Act and the elements of a Travel Act violation. Plaintiffs have not argued that the cases from outside of the Second Circuit are inconsistent with Second Circuit case law. The court assumes, for purposes of this motion, that the cases cited by Defendants are consistent with Second Circuit case law.HN85[] The Seventh Circuit has held that "in a Travel Act prosecution, the interstate travel or use must relate significantly, rather than incidentally or minimally, to the illegal activity." United States v. McNeal, 77 F.3d 938, 944 (7th Cir. 1996) (internal [203] quotation marks omitted); see also United States v. Archer, 486 F.2d 670, 685 (2d Cir. 1973) ("[T]he overriding Congressional purpose [of The Travel Act] was to permit federal government to act against members of organized crime whose activity crossed state lines when local law enforcement officers were unable or unwilling to do so--not to extend federal power to deal with corruption in local prosecutors' offices by affording the corrupters an opportunity to use interstate or foreign telephone facilities in dealing with an undercover agent on any such 'casual and incidental basis' as here.") (quoting United States v. Corallo, 413 F.2d 1306, 1325 (2d Cir. 1969)).

HN86[] The Ninth Circuit has held that the mens rea element of The Travel Act requires [*441] the plaintiff to show that the defendant "in some significant manner associated himself with the . . . criminal venture for the purpose of its advancement." United States v. Gibson Specialty Co., 507 F.2d 446, 449 (9th Cir. 1974). HN87[] The Fifth Circuit has held that in order to state a Travel Act claim on the basis of an illegal narcotics business, the plaintiff must allege a narcotics "business [204] enterprise" within the meaning of 18 U.S.C. § 1952(b), which requires a "continuous course of conduct" as opposed to "sporadic casual involvement in a proscribed activity." United States v. Davis, 666 F.2d 195, 202 n.10 (5th Cir. 1982).

Defendants argue that the Second Amended Complaint fails to state a violation of The Travel Act because (1) the allegations are conclusory, (2) the conduct that is alleged to violate The Travel Act is "merely incidental" to the overall scheme, (3) intent is not adequately alleged, and (4) the stated connection between the conduct that violates The Travel Act and the narcotics trafficking is "only sporadic." (Def. RICO Mem. at 56-58.) Each argument will be considered in turn.

First, the Second Amended Complaint adequately alleges specific foreign travel. Two categories of trips are most notable: (1) Defendants' employees' trips to Aruba to meet with Defendants' distributors and criminal customers for the purpose of negotiating liquor prices and at which Defendants were advised that proceeds of narcotics sales were used to pay for the liquor (SAC P 27(h)); and (2) Defendants' employees trips to Colombia for the [205] purpose of monitoring Defendants' distribution chain, during which Defendants' employees on multiple occasions observed large amounts of cash changing hands (Id. P 27(g)). The allegations include specific facts about these trips, including the names of some of the individuals who participated in them and the substance of the discussions held. Such allegations are not conclusory. (Id. PP 27(g), (h).)

Second, these same two categories of trips are essential to the overall scheme. The alleged enterprise includes the entire chain through which Defendants' liquor is distributed to Colombia, and managing such an enterprise would ordinarily require significant foreign travel. The travel alleged in this case included a negotiation of prices (and, hence, the money-laundering discount) and an exchange of substantive information about the scope of the scheme. Such travel is in no way incidental to the enterprise.

Third, as described in Section IX(F)(1) above, the Second Amended Complaint adequately alleges that Defendants had the requisite intent because Defendants are alleged to have (1) actively managed the enterprise and (2) knowingly received the proceeds of illegal narcotics sales.

[206] Finally, the alleged money-laundering enterprise is claimed to have begun operating in the early 1990s and to have operated continuously through the filing of the complaint. As a result, it is a "continuous course of conduct" as opposed to "sporadic casual involvement." See Davis, 666 F.2d at 202 (Travel Act conviction upheld even where, although only one narcotics transaction was proved, the evidence showed that two individuals "had for some time engaged in a continuous business relationship in illegal drug trafficking").

3. Mail and Wire Fraud

HN88[] "'[A] complaint alleging mail and wire fraud must show (1) the existence of a scheme to defraud, (2) defendant's knowing or intentional participation in the scheme, and (3) the use of interstate mails or transmission facilities in furtherance of the scheme.'" Leung v. Law, 387 F. Supp. 2d 105, 115-16 (E.D.N.Y. 2005) (Garaufis, J.) (quoting S.Q.K.F.C., Inc. v. Bell Atl. TriCon Leasing Corp., 84 F.3d 629, 633 [*442] (2d Cir. 1996)). In order to state a RICO claim on the basis of wire or mail fraud, "[t]he use of the mails need not be essential to the fraudulent scheme as long as the mailing [207] is incident to an essential part of the scheme." Id. at 116 (quotation marks omitted). Fraud "require[s] a misrepresentation or concealment of material fact." Neder v. United States, 527 U.S. 1, 22, 119 S. Ct. 1827, 1840, 144 L. Ed. 2d 35 (1999) (emphasis in original). In the Second Circuit, a civil RICO plaintiff asserting a predicate act of mail or wire fraud must also show that the plaintiff or a third party relied upon the fraud. Ideal Steel Supply Corp. v. Anza, 373 F.3d 251, 257-64 (2d Cir. 2004), rev'd in part, vacated in part by, 547 U.S. 451, 126 S. Ct. 1991, 164 L. Ed. 2d 720 (2006) (the Second Circuit has "accepted the principle that a RICO claim based on mail fraud may be proven where the misrepresentations were relied on by a third person, rather than by the plaintiff"). [25] Irrespective of who relied on the fraud, the plaintiff must have been injured as a proximate result of the fraud in order to recover. Id. ("[A] plaintiff who is injured as a proximate result of fraud should be able to recover regardless of whether he or a third party is the one deceived") (quotation marks omitted).

[208] HN89[] In most cases, mail and wire fraud predicate RICO acts are subject to the heightened pleading requirements of Rule 9(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. E.g., Moore v. PaineWebber, Inc., 189 F.3d 165, 172-73 (2d Cir. 1999); McLaughlin v. Anderson, 962 F.2d 187, 190-91 (2d Cir. 1992). Generally, "[i]n the RICO context, Rule 9(b) calls for the complaint to specify the statements it claims were false or misleading, give particulars as to the respect in which plaintiffs contend the statements were fraudulent, state when and where the statements were made, and identify those responsible for the statements." Moore, 189 F.3d at 173 (internal quotation marks omitted). The complaint "must also identify the purpose of the mailing within the defendant's fraudulent scheme." Id. (quotation marks omitted). "The purpose of Rule 9(b) is threefold--it is designed to provide a defendant with fair notice of a plaintiff's claim, to safeguard a defendant's reputation from improvident charges of wrongdoing, and to protect a defendant against the institution of a strike suit." O'Brien v. Nat'l Prop. Analysts Partners, 936 F.2d 674, 676 (2d Cir. 1991) [209] (internal quotation marks omitted).

The parties dispute how Rule 9(b) should be applied in this case. Plaintiffs point to several district court decisions in this Circuit in which courts confronted with allegations of mail or wire fraud in the context of an underlying scheme have required only a particularized description of the underlying scheme and its connection to the mail or wire fraud. See In re Sumitomo Copper Litig., 995 F. Supp. 451, 456 (S.D.N.Y. 1998) ("In cases in which the plaintiff claims that the mails or wires were simply used in furtherance of a master plan to defraud . . . . a detailed description of the underlying scheme and the connection therewith of the mail and/or wire communications, is sufficient to satisfy Rule 9(b)"); Spira v. Nick, 876 F. Supp. 553, 559 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) ("we do not regard mailings in furtherance of the scheme, but which are not themselves false or misleading, as 'averments of fraud' within the language of Rule 9(b)"); Giuliano v. Everything Yogurt, Inc., 819 F. Supp. 240, 244 [*443] (E.D.N.Y. 1993) ("the complaint need not specify the time, place and content of each mail communication where the [210] nature and mechanics of the underlying scheme is sufficiently detailed, and it is enough to plead the general content of the misrepresentation without stating the exact words used[.]") (quotation marks omitted).

Defendants point to the fact that, in Leung v. Law, this court held as follows: "In order to satisfy the particularity standard set forth in Rule 9(b), a plaintiff's complaint must '(1) specify the statements that the plaintiff contends were fraudulent, (2) identify the speaker, (3) state where and when the statements were made, and (4) explain why the statements were fraudulent.'" Leung, 387 F. Supp. 2d at 112 (quoting Anatian v. Coutts Bank (Switz.) Ltd., 193

[25] In Anza, the Supreme Court specifically declined to reach the question of whether a RICO plaintiff had to show reliance. Anza, 126 S. Ct. at 1998 ("Because Ideal has not satisfied the proximate-cause requirement articulated in Holmes, we have no occasion to address the substantial question whether a showing of reliance is required."). As a result, this court remains bound by the Second Circuit's holding in Anza that a RICO plaintiff must show reliance by the plaintiff or a third party.

F.3d 85, 88 (2d Cir. 1999)). In Leung, however, this court was not confronted with the argument that, in cases where a mail or wire fraud scheme was alleged in detail, communications that traveled via mail and/or wire need only to be alleged with less particularity.

As Judge Kaplan explained in Spira:

> [I]t is difficult to see any useful purpose in requiring that a RICO complaint specifically allege each mailing in furtherance of a complex commercial scheme, [211] at least where, as here, the complaint alleges that numerous mailings of particular kinds were made in furtherance of the scheme. Once the plaintiff alleges with particularity the circumstances constituting the fraudulent scheme, neither the reputational interests nor the notice function served by Rule 9(b) would be advanced in any material way by insisting that a complaint contain a list of letters or telephone calls.

Spira, 876 F. Supp. at 559 (internal footnote omitted). The same is largely true in this case: irrespective of whether the fraud predicate acts are dismissed at this time, the court has found that Plaintiffs have adequately stated a claim against Defendants predicated on laundering proceeds of illegal narcotics traffickers; it is not clear to this court how Defendants suffer greater reputational harm if they have to face an allegation that, somewhere in the midst of this elaborate money-laundering scheme, Defendants made a fraudulent wire or mail communication. Further, irrespective of whether the money laundering predicate acts are dismissed, Plaintiffs will be entitled to seek discovery about the money-laundering scheme, including communications [212] that occurred through mail and wires and Defendants' understanding of such communications. As a result, it does not appear that declining to dismiss the fraud predicate acts will in any way reduce the very substantial discovery costs that this case forces Defendants to bear. In any event, as discussed below, even under the Rule 9(b) pleading standard, the court finds that the Second Amended Complaint adequately pleads the fraud predicate acts.

Defendants argue that the Second Amended Complaint fails to plead predicate acts of wire and mail fraud because: (1) the fraud identified in the Second Amended Complaint is not alleged to be essential to the overall scheme; (2) there is no allegation that Plaintiffs or some third party reasonably relied upon the fraudulent statements; (3) the Second Amended Complaint fails to particularize which Defendants committed which tortious conduct; (4) Plaintiffs fail to identify which Plaintiffs were the victim of which fraud; and (5) fraudulent intent has not been adequately plead. [26] Each argument will be considered in turn.

[*444] [213] First, Plaintiffs do allege fraud that is in furtherance of the scheme. Specifically, Plaintiffs allege that Defendants made false statements to Colombian authorities, including Plaintiffs, "to systematically misinform the Plaintiffs about their true role in the criminal money-laundering scheme, and to prevent the Plaintiffs from discovering the role of the Defendants in the money laundering enterprise." (SAC P 27(1). [27]) In fact, Plaintiffs allege Defendants purported to fight against Colombian black markets for the purpose of deceiving Plaintiffs as to [26] Defendants raise these arguments in two separate sections of their brief. (Def. RICO Mem. at 58-71.) In one of those sections in Defendants' moving brief, Defendants assert that the state law claims for fraud, negligent misrepresentations, conversion, money had and received, public nuisance, and unjust enrichment have not been plead with the particularity required under Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b). (Def. RICO Mem. at 63.) In their Reply Brief, Defendants appear to change their position, stating that the state law fraud claim is subject to Rule 9(b)'s pleading requirements, but that the claims for negligent representation, conversion, money had and received, public nuisance, and unjust enrichment "potentially" fall under Rule 9(b). (Def. RICO Rep. at 50.) In any event, other than these blanket statements, Defendants do not address the Plaintiffs' state law claims. Defendants do not identify the elements of these state law claims or explain how the Second Amended Complaint fails to plead them. On this basis, the court denies Defendants' motion to dismiss the state law claims on Rule 9(b) grounds.

[27] Paragraph 27(l) does not explicitly state that the communications alleged therein were made through United States mail or wires. Arguably, it is possible to read this allegation in connection with the numerous allegations concerning use of United States wires and mails and, in doing so, draw a reasonable inference that at least some of the false statements made to the Colombian government were made with the use of United States wires and mails. This court, however, need not reach this question because, as discussed below, the Second Amended Complaint contains numerous other allegations that specifically cite to use of the United States wires and mail.

the nature of such black markets. (Id.) The Second Amended Complaint alleges that all Defendants participated in an industry association called the Colombian Association of Importers of Liquor and Wines ("ACODIL"). (SAC P 44.) On June 30, 1998, ACODIL sent a letter to the Colombian Ministry of Foreign Trade entitled, "Proposal for the Fight against the Informal Market of Wine and Liquor." (Id. P 45.) The alleged purpose of this proposal was to conceal Defendants' money-laundering scheme and prevent Defendants from making efforts to interfere with the scheme. (See id.) Defendants argue that the June 1998 letter cannot [214] serve as the basis for a mail or wire fraud claim because the Second Amended Complaint does not explicitly state that this letter was sent through U.S. mails or wires. (Def. RICO Rep. at 52 n.56.) However, this court must read the allegations concerning this letter along with (1) the allegation that Defendants participated in hundreds of telephone conversations and faxes through U.S. wires and mails in furtherance of the scheme "on virtually a daily basis" (SAC P 122) and (2) the allegation that all of the Defendants had "External Affairs" divisions of their corporations for the purpose of lobbying the Colombian government and concealing their illegal activities (id. PP 79-80). When these allegations are considered collectively, it is clear that Plaintiffs have adequately alleged that Defendants used the U.S. wires and mails to communicate with each other and Colombian government officials in order to fraudulently conceal their enterprise.

[215] HN90[] The Second Circuit has held that lulling the victim of a fraud into believing that no fraud had been committed is a "necessary step in executing" the fraud and, thus, can serve as the basis for a mail or wire fraud claim." United States v. Angelilli, 660 F.2d 23, 36 (2d Cir. 1981). In fact, "[s]uch 'lulling' mailings are essential to the fraudulent schemes in cases . . . where the [*445] frauds are not isolated and unrelated swindles[.]" Id. at 37 (internal quotation marks omitted); see also Leung, 387 F. Supp. 2d at 116 ("It is therefore clear that if it appears from the face of [the] complaint that the alleged falsifications of the tax statements were made by the defendants, and subsequently mailed, with an eye toward keeping [the plaintiff] from discovering the defendants' fraudulent scheme, then the 'in furtherance' element of the mail fraud statute is present.").

Similarly, the Second Amended Complaint identifies numerous other mailings. Throughout the alleged scheme, checks reflecting proceeds of illegal narcotics sales, were deposited in Transimex's Interbank account and were wired or mailed from this account to Defendants. [216] (SAC P 27(e).) Details of the shipments of liquor were routinely sent through United States wires and mails. (Id. P 27(e).) Defendants' Aruban and Panamanian distributors "would constantly use the wires and mails to communicate every detail about their activities. They would send details of product movement of their own products, as well as information on the movement of competitor's products, including prices." (Id. P 30.) Plaintiffs also allege that "[i]n addition to using the mail and wire communications themselves to advance the money-laundering schemes, the Defendants[] caused the use of the U.S. mails and wires in furtherance of the money-laundering schemes by acting with knowledge that the use of the U.S. mails and/or wires would follow in the ordinary course of business and/or could be reasonably foreseen as a result of their activities." (Id. P 87.) Although not all of these allegations refer to mailings or wire transmissions that, in and of themselves, constitute fraud or contain a misrepresentation, they are alleged to be essential to the overall fraud scheme. HN91[] "[I]nnocent mailings--ones that contain no false information--may supply the mailing element. [217] . . . The relevant question at all times is whether the mailing is part of the execution of the scheme as conceived by the perpetrator at the time, regardless of whether the mailing later, through hindsight, may prove to have been counterproductive and return to haunt the perpetrator of the fraud." Schmuck v. United States, 489 U.S. 705, 109 S. Ct. 1443, 1448, 103 L. Ed. 2d 734 (1989) (holding that mailing of truthful vehicle information to state agency to transfer titles could serve as the basis for mail fraud because defendant knew that transferring title was an essential element of selling used vehicles whose odometers had been fraudulently rolled back). Similarly, in the instant case, Plaintiffs have alleged that Defendants' use of U.S. mail and wires--often to convey truthful communications--was essential to the overall fraud. As discussed below, to the extent such communications were reasonably relied upon by third parties that were not a part of the racketeering enterprise, such communications may constitute wire or mail fraud.

Second, Plaintiffs have adequately alleged reasonable reliance. The Second Amended Complaint clearly alleges that Plaintiffs relied upon misrepresentations [218] about Colombian black markets and/or Defendants' involvement in them. (SAC P 27(l).) Defendants argue that "Plaintiffs are government entities with a responsibility to halt smuggling and with the full arsenal of sovereign powers to enforce their own laws. They cannot have reasonably relied on alleged assurances from entities they suspected of being involved in smuggling as the basis for any inaction." (Def. RICO Mem. at 62.) Regulators and other government agencies routinely rely upon statements made by the entities that they regulate. Defendants have not cited any case in which a court held that reliance by a government agency upon a statement made by an entity subject to its [*446] jurisdiction is unreasonable as a matter of law. [28] Without a clear precedent, the court is not prepared, at this time, to find Plaintiffs' alleged reliance upon Defendants' statements unreasonable as a matter of law. Also, even though Plaintiffs are government agencies, they are also liquor manufacturers and distributors that compete with Defendants. Even if Plaintiffs, in their capacity as a sovereign, cannot rely upon a fraudulent communication as a matter of law, Plaintiffs, in their commercial capacities, [219] may still be entitled to rely on fraudulent communications.

[220] Further, Plaintiffs argue that third parties such as bankers, shippers, importers, and exporters may have reasonably relied upon shipping and other logistical information about the distribution of Defendants' products. (Pl. RICO Opp. at 53.) To the extent such individuals and entities were outside of the alleged enterprise, Plaintiffs may be able to prove their claim by demonstrating that they reasonably relied.

Third, the Second Amended Complaint's allegations concerning the conduct of individual Defendants is adequate to satisfy Rule 9(b). Defendants are correct that, HN92[] in the typical case in which multiple defendants are accused of fraud, Rule 9(b) requires at least some connection between the individual defendants and the fraud. See DiVittorio v. Equidyne Extractive Indus., Inc., 822 F.2d 1242, 1247 (2d Cir. 1987) (In most contexts, "[w]here multiple defendants are asked to respond to allegations of fraud, the complaint should inform each defendant of the nature of his alleged participation in the fraud."); Colony at Holbrook, Inc. v. Strata G.C., Inc., 928 F. Supp. 1224, 1232 (E.D.N.Y. 1996) (dismissing mail and wire fraud predicate acts in [221] part because "the amended complaint contains sweeping and general allegations of mail and wire fraud directed at all the defendants rather than connecting the alleged fraud to the individual defendants").

Defendants argue that the Second Amended Complaint improperly groups (a) competitors with each other and (b) parent and subsidiary corporations. Defendants are correct that the Second Amended Complaint could include far more specific allegations as to each Defendant. However, the Second Amended Complaint provides sufficient allegations as to each Defendant to survive a motion to dismiss. Plaintiffs allege that each of the Defendants participated in ACODIL and, in doing so, participated in fraudulent communications intended to deceive Plaintiffs and conceal Defendants' role in the alleged money-laundering enterprise. (SAC PP 44-45.) Similarly, Plaintiffs allege that [*447] each of the Defendants maintained lobbying divisions for the purpose of deceiving Plaintiffs about the alleged enterprise and generally concealing the existence of the enterprise. (Id. PP 79-80.) In doing so, Plaintiffs have adequately alleged that each Defendant was connected to the fraud.

Fourth, the Second Amended [222] Complaint's allegations concerning which statements were made to which Plaintiffs are adequate. HN93[] Where individual investors bring fraud claims against the same defendants, courts have required the investors to specify which statements were made to which investors. See Kolbeck v. Lit America, Inc., 923 F. Supp. 557, 568-69 (S.D.N.Y. 1996); Butala v. Agashiwala, 916 F. Supp. 314, 322 (S.D.N.Y. 1996). In contrast, in this case, Plaintiffs are agencies of the same government. Also, Plaintiffs' allegation that each of the Plaintiffs was defrauded by the same disingenuous communications satisfies Rule 9(b).

Fifth, Plaintiffs adequately plead fraudulent intent. HN94[] In order to state a claim for wire or mail fraud, the plaintiff must allege intent to defraud. Powers v. British Vita, P.L.C., 57 F.3d 176, 184 (2d Cir. 1995). "Because it would be unrealistic to expect a plaintiff to plead a defendant's actual state of mind, Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 9(b) permits plaintiffs to allege fraudulent intent generally while the circumstances amounting to fraud must be averred with particularity." Id. (internal [223] quotation marks and citations omitted). However, "the plaintiff must provide some minimal factual basis for conclusory allegations of scienter that give rise to a strong inference of fraudulent intent." Id. (internal quotation marks omitted). When the plaintiff alleges "a motive for committing fraud and a clear opportunity for doing so," the complaint gives rise to a sufficient inference of fraudulent intent. Id.

Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged motive and a clear opportunity. The Second Amended Complaint alleges that Defendants are engaged in a complex transnational money-laundering enterprise that launders the proceeds of illegal narcotics sales through the Colombian liquor market. Entities that engage in illegal conduct of such seriousness and scope have a clear and unequivocal incentive to go to great lengths to conceal the enterprise, including misleading government officials. As a result, Plaintiffs have pled a clear motive. Defendants' participation in ACODIL--an industry association that represents Defendants' interests in the Colombian liquor business--creates an excellent opportunity to mislead and conceal their conduct. In fact, Plaintiffs allege that the very [224] purpose of ACODIL was to "deceive and defraud the Colombian government." (SAC P 45.) As a result, the Second Amended Complaint adequately pleads fraudulent intent.

Defendants' assertion that Defendants have failed to plead the wire and mail fraud predicate acts is rejected.

E. Equitable Relief

Defendants argue that RICO does not permit equitable remedies for civil RICO plaintiffs. (Def. RICO Mem. at 71-73.) Plaintiffs argue that the court should not address the issue at this time because (1) the Supreme Court and Second Circuit have yet to determine whether RICO permits equitable remedies and either court may have determined the issue by the time this court grants relief (if ever) in this case, (2) Plaintiffs are entitled to equitable relief under their state law claims, and (3) declining to dismiss the claim for equitable relief will in no way affect discovery. (Pl. RICO Opp. at 61-62.) The court agrees with the Plaintiffs' first and third points. Further, Defendants fail to cite any authority [*448] for the proposition that Plaintiffs are not entitled to equitable relief on their state law claims. As a result, even if the court were inclined to determine at this early stage whether [225] RICO permitted equitable relief, the issue of whether Plaintiffs are entitled to equitable relief under the state law claims has not been adequately briefed and, thus, the court cannot reach a decision on the issue at this time. As a result, the court declines to address Defendants' motion to dismiss the claim for equitable relief at this time. Defendants are free to re-raise this argument in an appropriate motion at the conclusion of discovery.

X. STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS

A. Background

Defendants argue that Plaintiffs' RICO claims are barred by the statute of limitations and must be dismissed. The parties agree that Plaintiffs' HN95[] RICO claims are subject to a four-year statute of limitations. See Rotella v. Wood, 528 U.S. 549, 553, 120 S. Ct. 1075, 1079-80, 145 L. Ed. 2d 1047 (2000). Although the Supreme Court has yet to specify precisely when the RICO period of limitations begins to run, see id. at 554, 120 S. Ct. at 1080, the Second Circuit has held that it "begins to run when the plaintiff discovers or should have discovered the RICO injury." In re Merrill Lynch Partnerships Litig., 154 F.3d 56, 58 (2d Cir. 1998) (hereinafter, "Merrill [226] Lynch Partnerships").

HN96[] The Second Circuit "recognizes a 'separate accrual' rule under which a new claim accrues and the four-year limitation period begins anew each time a plaintiff discovers or should have discovered a new and independent injury." Id. at 59 (emphasis added). At this time, the case law in this circuit leaves some ambiguity as to precisely what constitutes a "new and independent injury." In Bingham v. Zolt, 66 F.3d 553, 561 (2d Cir. 1995), the Second Circuit held that a series of diversions of money and assets that were part of separate schemes each constituted a new and independent injury. In contrast, in Merrill Lynch Partnerships, the Second Circuit held that plaintiffs suffered a single injury when defendant, through a single scheme, fraudulently sold investments to them and then continued to make a number of false statements to plaintiffs as "continuing efforts to conceal the initial fraud." Merrill Lynch Partnerships, 154 F.3d at 59-60. Defendants argue that "to be a 'new and independent injury,' there must be a variety of different schemes." (Def. SOL Rep. at 13.) The Merrill Lynch Partnerships [227] court, however, clearly did not hold that all injuries suffered as a result of a single scheme are not "new and independent injuries" per se: "We recognize that HN97[] in some instances a continuing series of fraudulent transactions undertaken within a common scheme can produce multiple injuries which each have separate limitations periods." Merrill Lynch Partnerships, 154 F.3d at 59 (emphasis added). As a result, the Second Circuit case law appears to have made the following clear: injuries suffered as a result of separate schemes are "new and independent;" injuries suffered as a result of the same scheme are sometimes but not always "new and independent."

B. Analysis

Defendants argue that the RICO claims are barred by the statute of limitations because (1) Plaintiffs had actual or constructive knowledge of the instant RICO claims more than four years before they filed this case and (2) Plaintiffs allege a single injury. In order to prevail on their motion to dismiss the Second Amended Complaint on statute of limitations grounds, Defendants must show that they are entitled to judgment as a matter of law [*449] on both grounds. The court will consider the latter [228] argument first.

Defendants are correct that Plaintiffs have alleged a single RICO enterprise that engaged in a money-laundering scheme. (SAC P 108 ("The Defendants, along with their co-conspirators in the money-laundering schemes, including associated distributors, shippers, currency dealers, wholesalers, moneybrokers, and other participants in the scheme identified above, were, at relevant times, an association-in-fact of individuals and corporations engaged in, and the activities of which affected, interstate and foreign commerce, and thus constituted an 'enterprise' within the meaning of 18 U.S.C. § 1961(4).").) Plaintiffs have clearly alleged that this money-laundering scheme continuously caused them competitive injury beginning in the 1990s and through the 2004 filing of the instant case. The Second Amended Complaint, however, alleges that the enterprise was dynamic and significantly changed in the few years before Plaintiffs filed this case. In 2003, the Diageo Defendants and Pernod Ricard Defendants agreed to jointly purchase and manage Seagram's assets, which included money-laundering operations. (SAC PP 58-66.) This potentially involved a significant [229] substantive change in the activities and effects of the alleged enterprise. Further, the Second Amended Complaint claims that Defendants continued to launder proceeds of illegal narcotics sales by making additional sales of liquor from 2000 to 2004. (Id. PP 56, 70-76.)

In light of these allegations, it is impossible to conclude as a matter of law that Plaintiffs did not suffer any "new and independent" injuries between 2000 and 2004. This case is distinguishable from Merrill Lynch Partnerships, in which the plaintiffs' injury was complete the moment that they purchased the fraudulent investment. See Merrill Lynch Partnerships, 154 F.3d at 59-60. At the time of purchase, "the amount of damages was clear and definite, and the injury was ripe". Id. at 59 (internal quotation marks omitted). In this case, however, Plaintiffs continued to suffer additional losses each time Defendants' laundered money by making an additional sale to narcotics traffickers and their co-conspirators. At any given point in time, there is no way for Plaintiffs to know how much liquor Defendants will sell or how much money Defendants will launder in the future. [230] For this reason, the instant case is distinguishable from the other cases relied upon by Defendants. See Nat'l Group for Commc'ns and Computers Ltd. v. Lucent Techs. Inc., 420 F. Supp. 2d 253, 266 (S.D.N.Y. 2006) (no new and independent injury occurred where plaintiff was aware of damages it would suffer as a result of kickback scheme and defendants specified how much they would demand in kickbacks at the initiation of the scheme); *Pharr v. Evergreen Gardens, Inc., No. 03 Civ. 5520 (HB), 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 158, 2004 WL 42262, at 2 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 7, 2004) (no new and independent injury occurred where plaintiffs suffered an illegal increase in their rent at one point in time even though inflated rent bills were sent monthly).

Instead, at this very initial stage, this case appears to be more similar to AMA v. United Healthcare Corp., No. 00 Civ. 2800 (LMM), 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 93864, 2006 WL 3833440 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 29, 2006). In that case, plaintiffs alleged that defendants constituted a RICO enterprise that engaged in fraudulent schemes to send and wire false and misleading communications in order to obtain unlawful fees for health care services. *Id. at 3. The court concluded that [231] "the alleged injuries occurred each time the Defendants made a 'false [health care fee] reimbursement determination[],' and these multiple injuries cannot be said to have resulted from one initial event. Rather, they are 'new and independent' [*450] injuries within the meaning of the Second Circuit's rule of separate accrual." *Id. at 10 (internal citation omitted).

To be clear, the court is not, at this time, determining that each and every sale of liquor that Defendants made into the Colombian market(s) constitutes a new and independent injury for purposes of the statute of limitations. At this time, the court is merely concluding that it cannot determine as a matter of law that Plaintiffs suffered no new and independent injuries because (1) the enterprise is alleged to have changed significantly in the 2000-2004 time period and the exact nature and scope of such changes are not clear at this time, and (2) the Defendants are alleged to have continued to engage in additional money laundering acts through the 2004 filing of this case. Because the court cannot determine as a matter of law that Plaintiffs suffered no new and independent injuries after October 8, 2000, the court cannot [232] grant Defendants' motions to dismiss the RICO claims on the ground that they are barred by the statute of limitations.

In the alternative, Defendants request that this court limit Defendants damages to only those sustained after October 8, 2000, i.e., to those damages sustained during the four-year period prior to which this case was filed. (Def. SOL Rep. at 15-16.) In support of this alternative motion, Defendants argue that the following evidence demonstrates as a matter of law that Plaintiffs knew or should have known of the instant claims before October 8, 2000: (1) statements in the Second Amended Complaint that, in the 1990s, Colombian law enforcement officials were aware of liquor smuggling and related money laundering; (2) exhibits to Plaintiffs' opposition papers, including evidence of communications among Plaintiffs and (a) Defendants and (b) law enforcement authorities in other countries (such as the United States), placed Plaintiffs on notice of the scheme; (3) in correspondence between Plaintiffs' counsel and counsel for Diageo in the four months preceding the filing of this case, Plaintiffs requested an agreement to toll the statute of limitations, suggesting Plaintiffs [233] were aware of the scheme at least four months before this case was filed; (4) 1999 Congressional testimony by Colombia's Director of Revenue and Customs Service that "the problem of liquor contraband [in Colombia] focuses particularly on the major Scotch whisky brands sold by producers in the United Kingdom to distributors in Panama and Aruba" and that such liquor is "believed to be purchased with drug traffic dollars" (Laurie Uustal Matthews Aff. Exh. 9 at 82); and (5) in the years prior to October 8, 2000, the media published numerous reports about the smuggling of liquor products. (Def. SOL Rep. at 3-10.)

Plaintiffs respond by arguing that Defendants rely upon evidence that is extrinsic to the Second Amended Complaint and, therefore, may not be considered by the court on a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6). HN98[] Rule 12(b) unequivocally states that if, "matters outside the pleading are presented to and not excluded by the court, the motion shall be treated as one for summary judgment and disposed of as provided in Rule 56." This language has been read to mean that, on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, courts, without converting the motion to one under Rule 56, may consider "'documents attached [234] to the complaint as an exhibit or incorporated in it by reference . . . matters of which judicial notice may be taken, or . . . documents either in plaintiffs' possession or of which plaintiffs had knowledge and relied on in bringing suit.'" Republic of Ecuador v. ChevronTexaco Corp., 376 F. Supp. 2d 334, 375 (S.D.N.Y. 2005) (quoting Brass v. Am. Film Techs., Inc., 987 F.2d 142, 150 (2d Cir. 1993)); see also Watterson v. Page, 987 F.2d 1, 3-4 [*451] (1st Cir. 1993) (On Rule 12(b)(6) motions, courts will consider "documents the authenticity of which are not disputed by the parties; for official public records; for documents central to plaintiffs' claim; or for documents sufficiently referred to in the complaint[]" without converting the motion into one under Rule 56).

Defendants cite primarily to Cortec Indus., Inc. v. Sum Holding L.P., 949 F.2d 42, 47-48 (2d Cir. 1991), for the proposition that a court may rely on documents that are extrinsic to the complaint when the plaintiff has notice of the documents relied upon. (See Def. SOL Rep. at 16-17.) Defendants are correct that relying upon evidence that is extrinsic [235] to the complaint in ruling on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion is far less problematic when the plaintiff has notice of the evidence and an opportunity to respond:

> HN99[] A finding that plaintiff has had notice of documents used by defendant in a 12(b)(6) motion is significant, since, as noted earlier, the problem that arises when a court reviews statements extraneous to a complaint generally is the lack of notice to the plaintiff that they may be so considered; it is for that reason--requiring notice so that the party against whom the motion to dismiss is made may respond--that Rule 12(b)(6) motions are ordinarily converted into summary judgment motions. Where plaintiff has actual notice of all the information in the movant's papers and has relied upon these documents in framing the complaint the necessity of translating a Rule 12(b)(6) motion into one under Rule 56 is largely dissipated.

Cortec, 949 F.2d at 47-48. Defendants' argument that Plaintiffs had notice of all of the evidence upon which Defendants rely and that this notice resolves many of the policy concerns associated with considering evidence extrinsic to the complaint on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion is well-taken [236] and clearly supported by Cortec. In Cortec, the Second Circuit held that, in ruling on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, the district court could rely upon a stock-purchase agreement, an offering memorandum, and a warrant. Id. The court found that (1) each of these documents was "integral" to plaintiff's claim and (2) the plaintiff had notice of each of these documents. Id. Recently, the Second Circuit read Cortec in precisely this manner. See *Roth v. Jennings, __ F.3d __, 2007 U.S. App. LEXIS 13035, 2007 WL 1629889, at 10 (2d Cir. June 6, 2007) ("[E]ven if not attached or incorporated by reference, a document 'upon which [the complaint] solely relies and which is integral to the complaint' may be considered by the court in ruling on such a motion.") (quoting, Cortec, 949 F.2d at 47) (emphasis added by Roth court).

The instant case is different from Cortec in that Defendants ask the court to consider evidence that goes far beyond contracts and other similar documents that are at the heart of the dispute. That being said, it may still be possible to read Cortec and the other precedents cited by Defendants to permit this court [237] to consider the virtual mountain of extrinsic evidence that Defendants have submitted in support of their Rule 12(b)(6) motion. To do so, however, would be to carry a good joke too far.

Defendants do not argue that this court is required to consider evidence outside the pleadings on a motion under Rule 12(b)(6); Defendants merely argue that the court "may" consider evidence outside of the pleadings. (Def. SOL Mem. at 8 n.8; Def. SOL Rep. at 16-21.) Similarly, Cortec merely states that the district court "could" have considered documents in ruling on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion. Cortec, 949 F.2d at 48.

There is simply no reason to consider at this time the evidence outside of the pleadings that Defendants have submitted. The parties do not seem that far apart in their positions on the statute of limitations issue. [*452] Plaintiffs appear to acknowledge that their claims will be partially barred by the statute of limitations. Defendants' alternative request for relief is to limit Plaintiffs' damages to those suffered after October 8, 2000. At oral argument, Plaintiffs' counsel went so far as to acknowledge that "there are certain parts of the claim for the 90's that are going [238] to be barred because time has passed[.]" (Mar. 7, 2007 Oral Arg. Transcript at 97.) In another case, it might make sense to consider such a massive compilation of evidence at the motion to dismiss stage, such as if doing so might limit the scope of discovery, increase the likelihood of settlement, or achieve some other useful purpose. This, however, is not one of those cases and there are at least two reasons not to consider it at this time.

First, Defendants make this alternative argument almost exclusively in their Reply Brief. Defendants only reference to this argument in their moving brief was a single sentence towards the end of the brief. (See Def. SOL Mem. at 14-15.) It is not clear whether this single sentence saves Defendants from the rule that "[a]rguments raised for the first time in a reply brief are properly ignored." *In re Comverse Tech., Inc., No. 06-cv-1849 (NGG), 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 80195, 2006 WL 3193709, at 5 n.3 (E.D.N.Y. Nov. 2, 2006) (Reyes, M.J.); see also Mason v. Jews for

*Jesus, No. 06 Civ 6433 (RMB), 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 81707, 2006 WL 3230279, 5 n.3 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 8, 2006) ("HN100[] Arguments made for the first time in a reply brief need not be considered [239] by a court.").

Second, Defendants would have the court rely upon the following types of evidence in ruling on this Rule 12(b)(6) motion: (1) documents ranging from government reports to experts' declarations that were submitted by Plaintiffs; (2) correspondence between the parties' counsel; (3) Congressional testimony; and (4) news stories published in United States and foreign newspapers. Nothing about Defendants' request that this court find that Plaintiffs knew or should have known about their alleged injuries before October 8, 2000 resembles a Rule 12(b)(6) motion. The sheer breadth and volume of evidence submitted precludes any resemblance. As the Second Circuit recently explained, HN101[] "a ruling on a motion for dismissal pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) is not an occasion for the court to make findings of fact." *Roth, 2007 U.S. App. LEXIS 13035, 2007 WL 1629889, at 10. As a result, it simply does not make sense for the court to consider all of this evidence at this time.

Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' RICO claims on the ground that they are barred by the statute of limitations is denied in its entirety without prejudice.

XI. SUPPLEMENTAL JURISDICTION

Defendants request that [240] this court decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' state law claims in the event that the court dismisses Plaintiffs' RICO claims. (Def. RICO Mem. at 73-75.) As this court has not dismissed Plaintiffs' RICO claims, Defendants' request is premature and need not be considered.

XII. CONCLUSION

For the reasons set forth above, Defendants' motions to dismiss are GRANTED in part and DENIED in part. Specifically, Defendants' motions are denied with the following exceptions: Plaintiffs' RICO claims for lost taxes and other injuries suffered by Plaintiffs in their sovereign capacity are dismissed.

This case was filed on October 8, 2004 and discovery has yet to begin. [29] [241] The [*453] parties are to contact Magistrate Judge Viktor V. Pohorelsky immediately to schedule a discovery conference. [30]

[29] Shortly after this case was filed, the parties entered into a series of stipulations effectively staying this action while the United States Supreme Court and the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit considered the European Community cases and other cases involving the revenue rule. Oral argument on the instant motions was held in February and March of this year.

[30] The briefs filed in support of and opposition to this motion were unduly long. Any subsequent requests for an extension of the page limits contained in this court's Individual Rules should include (1) a brief but detailed description of why the legal and/or factual issues are sufficiently complex so as to justify the extension and (2) an estimate of how many pages will be dedicated to each legal issue.

An indictment is legally sufficient on its face if it contains all of the elements of the offense charged, fairly informs the defendant of the charges against which he must defend, and alleges sufficient information to allow a defendant to plead a conviction or acquittal as a bar to a subsequent prosecution.

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Possession of Weapons > Unregistered Firearm > Elements

HN6[] Unregistered Firearm, Elements

The government must prove three essential elements for an 18 U.S.C.S. § 922(g)(1) conviction: (1) the defendant previously was convicted of a crime punishable by a term of imprisonment exceeding one year; (2) he knowingly possessed a firearm; and (3) the firearm traveled in or affected interstate commerce. The 18 U.S.C.S. § 921(a)(20)(A) exclusion has not been included as an element of an 18 U.S.C.S. § 922(g)(1) offense. The exclusions of 19 U.S.C.S. § 921(a)(20) are legal definitions rather than elements of an 18 U.S.C.S. § 922(g)(1) violation. The government has no obligation to prove that the exclusion is inapplicable where the defendant does not proffer evidence that a prior conviction falls within the exception. 18 U.S.C.S. 921(a)(20) is a legal definition that defines "conviction for a term exceeding one year."

Whether a defendant's predicate convictions qualify under the 18 U.S.C.S. § 921(a)(20)(A) exclusion is a question of law for the court rather than one of fact for the jury. The definitional nature of the § 921(a)(20) exclusions places the responsibility on the court to determine as a matter of law whether the prior conviction qualifies as a "crime punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year" under 18 U.S.C.S. § 922(g)(1).

A trial judge must submit instructions to the jury on every element of the crime charged. By contrast, because the 18 U.S.C.S. § 921(a)(20)(A) exclusion is not an element of an 18 U.S.C.S. § 922(g)(1) offense, the jury is not required to be instructed on the exclusion.

Governments > Legislation > Interpretation

HN10[] Standards of Review, De Novo Review

A court of appeals applies de novo review to questions of federal law involving statutory interpretation.

Governments > Legislation > Interpretation

HN11[] Legislation, Interpretation

In examining the meaning of a statute, a court's inquiry begins with the statute's plain language. A court will avoid an interpretation of a statute that renders some words altogether redundant and should avoid a statutory construction that would render another part of the same statute superfluous.

Governments > Legislation > Interpretation

HN12[] Legislation, Interpretation

Qualifying words or clauses in a statute refer to the next preceding antecedent except when evident sense and meaning require a different construction.

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Weapons Offenses > Possession of Weapons > General Overview

HN13[] Weapons Offenses, Possession of Weapons

The qualifying clause "relating to the regulation of business practices" in 18 U.S.C.S. § 921(a)(20)(A) refers only to the preceding antecedent "other similar offenses" rather than functioning as descriptive of the commonalities between each of the enumerated offenses and as an indication of a congressional intent to exclude any business-related offense. Congress used the comparative term "similar" to modify "offenses," rather than saying "any other offenses" or simply "other offenses." The term "similar" indicates an intent to limit the business practices clause's reach to offenses which are "comparable" or "nearly corresponding" to the enumerated offenses. "Similar" is defined as having characteristics in common; very much alike; comparable; nearly corresponding; resembling in many respects; somewhat alike; having a general likeness. Thus, the general phrase "or other similar offenses relating to the regulation of business practices" refers back for its meaning to the three types of offenses Congress specifically enumerated--antitrust violations, unfair trade practices, and restraints of trade. Each enumerated offense is by definition an offense related to the regulation of business practices.

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Weapons Offenses > Possession of Weapons > General Overview

HN14[] Weapons Offenses, Possession of Weapons

The plain meaning of 18 U.S.C.S. § 921(a)(20)(A) indicates Congress's intent to limit the offenses that fall within the § 921(a)(20)(A) exclusion to those pertaining to antitrust violations, unfair trade practices, restraints of trade, or offenses similar to them.

Governments > Legislation > Interpretation

HN15[] Legislation, Interpretation

Ejusdem generis provides that where general words follow specific words in a statutory enumeration, the general words are construed to embrace only objects similar in nature to those objects enumerated by the preceding specific words.

HN16[] Weapons Offenses, Possession of Weapons

Congress chose to enumerate three types of offenses that qualify for the 18 U.S.C.S. § 921(a)(20)(A) exclusion and to add the residual clause "or other similar offenses relating to the regulation of business practices." Under the doctrine of ejusdem generis, the clause must be controlled and defined by reference to the enumerated offenses.

HN17[] Legislation, Interpretation

A court does not resort to the rule of lenity where it can otherwise resolve the ambiguity of a statute.

Governments > Legislation > Vagueness

HN18[] Legislation, Vagueness

In order not to be unconstitutionally vague, a statute, first, must provide adequate notice of the proscribed conduct, and second, not lend itself to arbitrary enforcement.

HN19[] Waiver, Triggers of Waivers

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Weapons Offenses > Possession of Weapons > General Overview

HN20[] Weapons Offenses, Possession of Weapons

In analyzing whether an offense qualifies under the 18 U.S.C.S., § 921(a)(20)(A) exclusion, courts have focused on whether the statute of conviction constitutes the type of offense enumerated in § 921(a)(20)(A), as evidenced by the primary purpose of the criminal statute and the elements the government must prove for conviction under it.

HN21[] Weapons Offenses, Possession of Weapons

For purposes of determining whether an offense qualifies under the 18 U.S.C.S. § 921(a)(20)(A) exclusion, the focus on the purpose and elements of the statute of conviction endures notwithstanding the possibility that a defendant's criminal conduct may also have incidentally hampered competition or had negative economic effects on consumers. The term "offenses" in the context of § 921(a)(20)(A) refers to the charged violation of law. Thus, the primary purpose of the statute of conviction and the elements that the government must prove for conviction under it, rather than the possible incidental effects of the defendant's actions, are the proper focus of the § 921(a)(20)(A) inquiry.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Trade Practices & Unfair Competition > General Overview

HN22[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Consumer Protection

Implicit in the term "unfair trade practices" is the requirement of an adverse economic effect on competition or consumers. The standard dictionary definition of the term supports the requirement of adverse economic effects. Although unfair trade can include generally any inequitable business practice, it especially applies to the act or an instance of a competitor's repeating of words in a way that conveys a misrepresentation that materially injures the person who first used the words, by appropriating credit of some kind earned by the first user. "Unfair competition" is defined generally as dishonest or fraudulent rivalry in trade and commerce but especially the practice of endeavoring to pass off one's own goods or products in the market for those of another by means of imitating or counterfeiting the name, brand, size, shape, or other distinctive characteristic of the article or its packaging.

Governments > Legislation > Interpretation

HN23[] Legislation, Interpretation

Under the doctrine of noscitur a sociis, which instructs that a word is known by the company it keeps, a court avoids ascribing to one word a meaning so broad that it is inconsistent with its accompanying words, thus giving unintended breadth to the Acts of Congress.

Antitrust & Trade Law > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Trade Practices & Unfair Competition > General Overview

HN24[] Regulated Practices, Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade

While the term "unfair trade practices" can apply broadly to any inequitable business practice, the meaning it carries under 18 U.S.C.S. § 921(a)(20)(A) must be determined by reference to the other two enumerated terms--antitrust violations and restraints of trade--both of which clearly involve negative economic effects on consumers or competition. "Antitrust law" is defined as the body of law designed to protect trade and commerce from restraints, monopolies, price-fixing, and price discrimination. "Restraint of trade" is defined as (1) a limitation on business dealings or professional or gainful occupations; (2) antitrust: an agreement between or combination of businesses intended to eliminate competition, create a monopoly, artificially raise prices, or otherwise adversely affect the free market. This choice of enumerated terms suggests that Congress intended to exclude from 18 U.S.C.S. § 922(g)(1)'s prohibition those felons convicted under criminal statutes addressing only economic harm to competition or consumers, but not to exclude those felons convicted under criminal statutes designed primarily to address other societal concerns.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Governments > Agriculture & Food > Meat Inspections

HN25[] Agriculture & Food, Meat Inspections

It is true that the statement of congressional findings at 21 U.S.C.S. § 602 includes concerns about the effects of unwholesome meat on competition and markets. These concerns, however, are subordinate to the Federal Meat Inspection Act's primary public-health purpose of protecting consumers from unsafe meat: It is essential in the public interest that the health and welfare of consumers be protected by assuring that meat and meat food products distributed to them are wholesome, not adulterated, and properly marked, labeled, and packaged. 21 U.S.C.S. § 602.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Governments > Agriculture & Food > Meat Inspections

HN26[] Agriculture & Food, Meat Inspections

Cases discussing the Federal Meat Inspection Act (FMIA), 21 U.S.C.S. § 601 et seq., uniformly describe the statute as concerned primarily with protecting public health. Congress expressly charged the United States Department of Agriculture with assuring that meat distributed to consumers is wholesome, not adulterated, and properly marked, labeled, and packaged. The purpose of the Meat Inspection Act of 1907, as amended, is to ensure a high level of cleanliness and safety in meat products. The Federal Meat Inspection Act has as its stated purpose, the enforcement of standards of sanitation throughout meatpacking plants. The Meat Inspection Act is, by its very terms, designed to protect the health and welfare of consumers. The primary purpose of the Wholesome Meat Act is to benefit the consumer and to enable him to have a correct understanding of and confidence in meat products purchased. Prohibitions against mislabeling are an integral part of this purpose. Thus, despite the fact that the FMIA statutory scheme necessarily involves regulating business and may have the effect of protecting consumers and competition from economic harm, the primary purpose of the FMIA is to protect public health from the effects of unwholesome meat.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Governments > Agriculture & Food > Meat Inspections

HN27[] Agriculture & Food, Meat Inspections

None of the provisions of the Federal Meat Inspection Act requires the government to prove an effect on competition or consumers as an element of the offense. More specifically, 21 U.S.C.S. §§ 605, 610, and 611 do not require the government to prove such effects. 21 U.S.C.S. § 605 requires inspection of meat products, 21 U.S.C.S. § 610 prohibits adulteration or misbranding of meat products, and 21 U.S.C.S. § 611 prohibits mislabeling.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Governments > Agriculture & Food > Meat Inspections

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Governments > Agriculture & Food > Packers & Stockyards Act

HN28[] Agriculture & Food, Meat Inspections

In comparing the Packers and Stockyards Act (PSA) with the Federal Meat Inspection Act (FMIA), 21 U.S.C.S. § 601 et seq., the statutes have quite different purposes. The FMIA is a public health statute, aimed at preventing the use in commerce of meat and meat food products which are adulterated. By contrast, the Stockyards Act is a fair trade practices law, and the chief evil at which it was aimed was the monopoly of the packers, enabling them unduly and arbitrarily to injure consumers and suppliers by controlling pricing. The PSA's explicit prohibition of activities commercially and economically harmful to competition or consumers stands in marked contrast to the FMIA's public-health related prohibitions, none of which requires proof of economic effects on competition or consumers.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Governments > Agriculture & Food > Meat Inspections

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Weapons Offenses > Possession of Weapons > General Overview

HN29[] Agriculture & Food, Meat Inspections

That a defendant's acts involved fraud and mislabeling does not transform an offense under the Federal Meat Inspection Act, 21 U.S.C.S. § 601 et seq., into an unfair-trade-practices offense or an offense similar to the enumerated offenses under 18 U.S.C.S. § 921(a)(20)(A), notwithstanding the fact that fraudulent conduct and mislabeling may be present in many unfair-trade-practices statutes.

Constitutional Law > Supremacy Clause > Federal Preemption

HN30[] Supremacy Clause, Federal Preemption

In assessing whether a federal law has preempted state law, courts start with the assumption that the historic police powers of the states were not to be superseded by a federal act unless that was the clear and manifest purpose of Congress. Congressional enactments may override state laws with which they conflict and where the state law stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes and objectives of Congress.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Governments > Agriculture & Food > Meat Inspections

Constitutional Law > Supremacy Clause > Federal Preemption

HN31[] Agriculture & Food, Meat Inspections

While it is true that the Federal Meat Inspection Act (FMIA) prohibits states from imposing marking, labeling, packaging, or ingredient requirements in addition to, or different than, those mandated under the FMIA, 21 U.S.C.S. § 678, nothing in the text of the FMIA indicates an intent to preempt state unfair-trade-practices laws in general.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Governments > Agriculture & Food > Meat Inspections

Constitutional Law > Supremacy Clause > Federal Preemption

HN32[] Agriculture & Food, Meat Inspections

21 U.S.C.S. § 678 prohibits the imposition of marking, labeling, packaging, or ingredient requirements in addition to, or different than, those made under the Federal Meat Inspection Act (FMIA). Meat ingredient standards, labeling and packaging have been preempted by the FMIA, and states cannot impose different or additional affirmative requirements on meat and meat food products. Jones v. Rath Packing does not, however, stand for the proposition that the FMIA has preempted state unfair-trade-practices laws in addition to state meat-product ingredient, labeling, and packaging laws.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Governments > Agriculture & Food > Meat Inspections

HN33[] Agriculture & Food, Meat Inspections

An "intent to defraud" is not required for conviction under the Federal Meat Inspection Act (FMIA). When an intent to defraud is present, the potential criminal punishment for the violation increases. 21 U.S.C.S. § 676(a) provides that any violation of any provision of the FMIA subjects a person to imprisonment for not more than one year, or a fine of not more than $ 1,000, or both such imprisonment and fine; but if such violation involves intent to defraud, such person shall be subject to imprisonment for not more than three years or a fine of not more than $ 10,000, or both.

Rudolph Stanko appeals his convictions for two counts of possessing firearms and ammunition by a prohibited person, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(1). On appeal, Stanko's primary argument is that the district court [1] erred in concluding that Stanko qualifies as a prohibited person under § 922(g)(1) because his 1984 conviction for violating the Federal Meat Inspection Act (FMIA) does not fall within the "business practices" exclusion of 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(20)(A). We disagree and affirm the convictions.

[2] I. BACKGROUND

In 1984, Cattle King Packing Co., Inc. and Stanko, an officer and shareholder of the corporation, were convicted after a jury trial of multiple counts of violating the FMIA, 21 U.S.C. § 601 et seq., and of conspiracy to violate the FMIA, 18 U.S.C. § 371. United States v. Cattle King Packing Co., 793 F.2d 232 (10th Cir. 1986). In its opinion affirming the conviction, the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals described the substantive counts against the defendants as: "(1) the fraudulent distribution of adulterated meat products; (2) the intentional circumvention of federal law requiring an inspection by a federal meat inspector of all shipments returned to Cattle King by dissatisfied purchasers; and (3) the fraudulent misbranding of meat shipments by stamping on the shipment a false production date." Id. at 235.

Ten years later, Stanko sought a declaratory judgment that he was not prohibited from possessing firearms under § 922(g)(1) because his conviction fell within the § 921(a)(20)(A) exclusion. After the United States District Court for the District of Montana denied relief on [3] the merits, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed with instructions to dismiss the case for lack of standing. Stanko v. United States, No. 95-35289, 1995 U.S. App. LEXIS 24556, 1995 WL 499524, *1-2 (9th Cir. August 22, 1995) (unpublished table decision).

In 2005, a federal grand jury for the District of Nebraska returned an indictment charging Stanko with one count of possession of firearms by a prohibited person and one count of possession of ammunition by a prohibited person, both in [*411] violation of 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(1), which provides:

[1] The Honorable Joseph Bataillon, Chief Judge, United States District Court for the District of Nebraska.

> HN1[] It shall be unlawful for any person--who has been convicted in any court of a crime punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year . . . to ship or transport in interstate or foreign commerce, or possess in or affecting commerce, any firearm or ammunition . . . .

18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(1). Both counts cited Stanko's FMIA convictions to establish his prohibited person status.

After a pretrial hearing on Stanko's motion to dismiss the indictment, the district court concluded that Stanko's FMIA conviction did not fall within the § 921(a)(20)(A) exclusion, which states in relevant part: [4]

> HN2[] The term "crime punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year" does not include--(A) any Federal or State offenses pertaining to antitrust violations, unfair trade practices, restraints of trade, or other similar offenses relating to the regulation of business practices.

18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(20)(A). The district court reasoned that: (1) the exclusion was "directed towards illegal restraints of trade, monopolies, and anti-competitive forces in the marketplace," not towards fraud-related convictions such as Stanko's; (2) for the "similar offenses" language to apply, the offense must be similar in nature to antitrust, restraint of trade, or unfair trade practices, and must also relate to regulation of business practices; and (3) the FMIA conviction did not depend on its effect on consumers or on competition. The district court summarized by saying, "Although in some respect the allegations . . . could be considered unfair trade practices, the gravamen of these charges are issues of food and drug safety and fraud, not unfair trade practices." At trial and over Stanko's objections, the district court declined Stanko's request to instruct [5] the jury on the exclusion and denied his motion for judgment of acquittal. The jury found Stanko guilty on both counts, and the district court sentenced him to 72 months in prison.

In addition to his substantive § 921(a)(20)(A) argument, Stanko contends on appeal that the indictment was fatally defective because it did not include the § 921(a)(20)(A) exclusion as an element of the charged offense and because the district court erred in treating his § 921(a)(20)(A) argument as a question of law for the court rather than one of fact for the jury. [2]

[6] II. DISCUSSION

Stanko raised his challenges to the indictment and to the district court's refusal to submit the § 921(a)(20)(A) exclusion issue to the jury in his motions to dismiss the indictment and for judgment of acquittal. HN4[] We review de novo the district court's denial of a motion to dismiss the indictment, United States v. Postley, 449 F.3d 831, 832 (8th Cir. 2006), and we also apply de novo review to the denial of a motion for judgment of acquittal, United States v. Cannon, 475 F.3d 1013, 1020 (8th Cir. 2007).

HN5[] An indictment "is legally sufficient on its face if it contains all of the elements of the offense charged, fairly informs [*412] the defendant of the charges against which he must defend, and alleges sufficient information to allow a defendant to plead a conviction or acquittal as a bar to a subsequent prosecution." United States v. Hernandez, 299 F.3d 984, 992 (8th Cir. 2002). HN6[] The Government must prove three essential elements for a § 922(g)(1) conviction: (1) the defendant previously was convicted of a crime punishable by a term of imprisonment exceeding one year; (2) he knowingly possessed a firearm; and (3) [7] the firearm traveled in or affected interstate commerce. United States v. Maxwell, 363 F.3d 815, 818 (8th Cir. 2004). We have not included the § 921(a)(20)(A) exclusion as an element of a § 922(g)(1) offense. In addition, several circuits have held that the exclusions of § 921(a)(20) are legal definitions rather than elements of a § 922(g)(1) violation. E.g., United States v. Bartelho, 71 F.3d 436, 439-40 (1st Cir. 1995) (holding that the § 921(a)(20) exclusion is a legal definition, not an element, and noting that the holding follows the approach taken by other circuits); United States v. Jackson, 57 F.3d 1012, 1015-17 (11th Cir. 1995); (rejecting the defendant's argument that § 921(a)(20) adds a new element to a § 922(g)(1) offense; holding that the government had no obligation to prove that the exclusion was inapplicable where the defendant did not proffer evidence that the prior conviction fell within the exception); United States v. Flower, 29 F.3d 530, 534 (10th Cir. 1994) (holding that § 921(a)(20) is a legal definition that defines "conviction for a term exceeding one year"). We agree and hold that [8] the indictment was not defective because the § 921(a)(20)(A) exclusion is not an element of a § 922(g)(1) offense. The indictment in this case contained each element of the offense, fairly informed Stanko of the charges, and alleged sufficient information to allow Stanko to plead a conviction or acquittal as a bar to a subsequent prosecution. Therefore, the district court did not err in refusing to dismiss the indictment.

[2] On appeal, in addition to his counseled briefs, Stanko has filed two pro se "Petition[s] for Great Writ of Habeas Corpus" in which he advances additional arguments as to why his convictions should be overturned. We construe these filings as supplemental pro se briefs and decline to address them. See United States v. Peck, 161 F.3d 1171, 1174 n.2 (8th Cir. 1998) (HN3[] "It is not our practice to consider pro se briefs filed by parties represented by counsel . . . .") (internal citation omitted).

Likewise, we conclude that HN7[] whether Stanko's predicate FMIA convictions qualified under the § 921(a)(20)(A) exclusion was a question of law for the court rather than one of fact for the jury. The definitional nature of the § 921(a)(20) exclusions places the responsibility on the court to determine as a matter of law whether the prior conviction qualifies as a "crime punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year" under § 922(g)(1). Bartelho, 71 F.3d at 440 (considering the § 921(a)(20) exclusion of a conviction which has been expunged or set aside, or for which a person has been pardoned or has had civil rights restored); see also United States v. Hayes, 482 F.3d 749, 2007 WL 1112797, at *1 (4th Cir. 2007) [9] (noting that questions regarding the definition of a predicate offense set forth in § 921(a)(33)(A) are questions of law); United States v. Bethurum, 343 F.3d 712, 716-17 (5th Cir. 2003) (holding that for purposes of § 922(g)(9), the trial judge rather than the jury should determine whether "a particular conviction is admissible as relevant evidence of a misdemeanor crime of domestic violence" as defined in § 921(a)(33); noting that numerous courts have treated questions regarding the definitions in § 921(a) as purely legal questions); United States v. Akins, 276 F.3d 1141, 1146 (9th Cir. 2002) ("Because § 921(a)(33)(B)(i)(I) is a legal definition, its application presents a question of law to be decided by the trial judge."); United States v. Daugherty, 264 F.3d 513, 514 (5th Cir. 2001) (HN8[] "The question whether a felony conviction may serve as a predicate offense for a prosecution for being a felon in possession of a firearm pursuant to § 922(g)(1) is purely a legal one.") (internal quotation omitted). We agree with these circuits and hold that whether a conviction falls within the exclusions defined [*413] in § 921(a)(20)(A) is a question [10] of law for the court. [3] Cf. United States v. Mincks, 409 F.3d 898, 901 (8th Cir. 2005) (noting that whether a prior conviction is a violent felony under the Armed Career Criminal Act "is distinctly a question of law for the court, not a jury"), cert. denied, 546 U.S. 1176, 126 S. Ct. 1345, 164 L. Ed. 2d 59 (2006). Therefore, the district court did not err in rejecting Stanko's argument that the issue should have been submitted to the jury.

[11] We now turn to the substantive question of whether the district court correctly concluded that Stanko's FMIA convictions do not fall within the § 921(a)(20)(A) exclusion, a question of first impression in this circuit. HN10[] This court "appl[ies] de novo review to . . . questions of federal law involving statutory interpretation." United States v. Bach, 400 F.3d 622, 627 (8th Cir.) (internal citation omitted), cert. denied, 546 U.S. 901, 126 S. Ct. 243, 163 L. Ed. 2d 223 (2005). We begin our discussion by considering Stanko's argument, based upon his reading of the § 921(a)(20)(A) clause "or other similar offenses relating to the regulation of business practices" ("the business practices clause"), that Congress intended to exclude convictions for all business-related offenses from qualifying a defendant as a prohibited person under § 922(g)(1). We then consider whether, even if we reject Stanko's interpretation of the business practices clause, his FMIA convictions fall within the specifically enumerated offenses.

HN11[] In examining the meaning of a statute, our inquiry begins with the statute's plain language. United States v. Cacioppo, 460 F.3d 1012, 1016 (8th Cir. 2006). [12] "The Court will avoid an interpretation of a statute that renders some words altogether redundant," United States v. Alaska, 521 U.S. 1, 59, 117 S. Ct. 1888, 138 L. Ed. 2d 231 (1997) (internal quotation omitted), and should "avoid a statutory construction that would render another part of the same statute superfluous," United States v. Gomez-Hernandez, 300 F.3d 974, 979 (8th Cir. 2002). Stanko argues that the enumerated offenses excluded by § 921(a)(20)(A)--antitrust violations, unfair trade practices, and restraints of trade--encompass a vast array of business-related offenses and that the business practices clause serves simply to emphasize that Congress viewed the three enumerated offenses as similar, namely as related to the regulation of business practices broadly speaking. As a result, Stanko contends, any offense related to the regulation of business practices falls within the exclusion.

[3] We also necessarily conclude that HN9[] Stanko's Sixth Amendment right to a trial by jury was not violated by the district court's refusal to instruct the jury on the § 921(a)(20)(A) exclusion. Stanko's reliance on United States v. Gaudin, 515 U.S. 506, 115 S. Ct. 2310, 132 L. Ed. 2d 444 (1995), is misplaced. Gaudin held that a trial judge must submit instructions to the jury on every element of the crime charged, which included the element of the "materiality" of Gaudin's false statements on Department of Housing and Urban Development loan documents. Id. at 511, 522-23. By contrast here, because the § 921(a)(20)(A) exclusion is not an element of a § 922(g)(1) offense, Gaudin does not require the jury to be instructed on the exclusion.

We do not agree with Stanko's broad interpretation of the business practices clause. First, HN12[] "[q]ualifying words or clauses refer to the next preceding antecedent except when evident sense and meaning require a different construction." United States v. Friedrich, 402 F.3d 842, 845 (8th Cir.), [13] cert. denied, 546 U.S. 961, 126 S. Ct. 495, 163 L. Ed. 2d 365 (2005). We do not find any evident sense or meaning in the statute that would require us to avoid applying [*414] this grammatical rule. Thus, HN13[] the qualifying clause "relating to the regulation of business practices" refers only to the preceding antecedent "other similar offenses" rather than functioning, as Stanko would have it, as descriptive of the commonalities between each of the enumerated offenses and as an indication of a congressional intent to exclude any business-related offense. [4] [15] Second, Congress used the comparative term "similar" to modify "offenses," rather than saying "any other offenses" or simply "other offenses." The term "similar" indicates an intent to limit the business practices clause's reach to offenses which are "comparable" or "nearly corresponding" to the enumerated offenses. See Webster's Third New International Dictionary 2120 (2002) (defining "similar" as "having characteristics in common: very much alike: comparable"); see also United States v. Lindsey, 782 F.2d 116, 117-18 (8th Cir. 1986) (per curiam) (discussing whether crimes were [14] of a similar character and defining "similar" as [n]early corresponding; resembling in many respects; somewhat alike; having a general likeness") (internal quotations omitted). Thus, we believe the general phrase "or other similar offenses relating to the regulation of business practices" refers back for its meaning to the three types of offenses Congress specifically enumerated--antitrust violations, unfair trade practices, and restraints of trade. Stanko's broad reading of the phrase would not only render the use of "similar" nonsensical, it would also render the enumerated terms superfluous because each enumerated offense is by definition an offense related to the regulation of business practices. Therefore, we conclude that HN14[] the plain meaning of the statute indicates Congress's intent to limit the offenses that fall within the § 921(a)(20)(A) exclusion to those pertaining to antitrust violations, unfair trade practices, restraints of trade, or offenses similar to them. [5] [4] Until a 1986 amendment to the statute, § 921(a)(20)(A) read "or similar offenses relating to the regulation of business practices as the Secretary may by regulation designate." 18 U.S.C. 921(a)(20)(A) (1968), amended by Pub. L. No. 99-308 (1986) (emphasis added). Our research has not revealed any offense so designated by the Secretary under this prior version, nor any indication of Congress's rationale for deleting that language.

[5] Even if we were to find ambiguity in the language of § 921(a)(20)(A), as suggested by Stanko, the application of the established maxim of statutory construction ejusdem generis would also support our interpretation. HN15[] Ejusdem generis provides that "[w]here general words follow specific words in a statutory enumeration, the general words are construed to embrace only objects similar in nature to those objects enumerated by the preceding specific words." Circuit City Stores, Inc., v. Adams, 532 U.S. 105, 114-15, 121 S. Ct. 1302, 149 L. Ed. 2d 234 (2001) (quotation omitted). In considering a phrase in the Federal Arbitration Act that excluded from the Act's coverage "contracts of employment of seamen, railroad employees, or any other class of workers engaged in foreign or interstate commerce," id. at 109, the Court concluded that the residual clause "should itself be controlled and defined by reference to the enumerated categories of workers which are recited just before it," id. at 115. The same principle would apply here. HN16[] Congress chose to enumerate three types of offenses that qualify for the § 921(a)(20)(A) exclusion and to add the residual clause "or other similar offenses relating to the regulation of business practices." Were we to assume that the business practices clause is ambiguous, we would still conclude under the doctrine of ejusdem generis that the clause must be "controlled and defined" by reference to the enumerated offenses. See id.

In addition, Stanko's argument that any ambiguity in the statute requires resolution in his favor under the rule of lenity misinterprets the reach of that rule. See Bernitt v. Martinez, 432 F.3d 868, 869 (8th Cir. 2005) (per curiam) (HN17[] "We do not resort to the rule of lenity where, as here, we can otherwise resolve the ambiguity of the statute."). We also reject Stanko's [*415] [16] Having concluded that the § 921(a)(20)(A) exclusion does not extend to all business-related offenses, we must now determine whether Stanko's FMIA offenses pertain to antitrust violations, unfair trade practices, restraints of trade, or "other similar offenses" so as to fall within the exclusion. Although Stanko briefly mentions antitrust violations and restraint of trade in his brief, he sets forth no substantive arguments that his FMIA convictions pertain to either. We therefore limit our discussion to whether they pertain to unfair-trade-practices offenses or are similar to antitrust violations, unfair trade practices, or restraints of trade collectively. See Chay-Velasquez v. Ashcroft, 367 F.3d 751, 756 (8th Cir. 2004) (noting that HN19[] claims not meaningfully argued in the opening brief are waived).

Only three courts have HN20[] analyzed whether an offense qualifies under the § 921(a)(20)(A) exclusion. Each of these courts has focused on whether the statute of conviction constitutes the type of offense enumerated in § 921(a)(20)(A), as evidenced by the primary purpose of the criminal statute and the elements the Government must prove for conviction under it. In Dreher [17] v. United States, after recounting the elements of the statute of conviction, the court held that convictions for mail fraud and conspiracy to commit mail fraud did not qualify under the exclusion "[b]ecause violations of §§ 371 & 1341 in no way depend on whether they have an effect upon competition." 115 F.3d 330, 332-33 (5th Cir. 1997). In United States v. Meldish, the court noted that none of the elements of the offense of bringing a wristwatch into the United States by means of a false customs declaration included effects on competition or consumers and that "[s]ection 542 does not concern itself with matters" related to unfair trade practices. 722 F.2d 26, 27-28 (2d Cir. 1983). Finally, in United States v. McLemore, the court held that a conviction for rolling back odometers, in violation of 15 U.S.C. §§ 1984 and 1990c(a), did qualify as an unfair trade practice because the statutes "are meant to punish an 'unfair trade practice' within the meaning of 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(20)" and explicitly referred to the need to protect consumers from unfair trade practices. 792 F. Supp. 96, 98 (S. D. Ala. 1992).

[18] Significantly, HN21[] the focus on the purpose and elements of the statute of conviction in these cases endures notwithstanding the possibility that the defendant's criminal conduct may also have incidentally hampered competition or had negative economic effects on consumers. For example, the Dreher court specifically rejected the argument that because Dreher's activities had destroyed the competitive billing process and injured his competitors, his offense should qualify under the § 921(a)(20)(A) exclusion. Dreher, 115 F.3d at 332. Instead, the court concluded that the plain meaning of "offenses" referred solely to the charged violation of law and not to the possible incidental effects of the defendant's activities. Id. We agree that the term "offenses" in the context of § 921(a)(20)(A) refers to the charged violation of law. Thus, the primary purpose of the statute of conviction and the elements that the Government must prove for conviction under it, rather than the possible incidental effects of the defendant's actions, are the proper focus of the § 921(a)(20)(A) inquiry.

We also agree with the Dreher and Meldish courts that HN22[] implicit in the term [*416] "unfair [19] trade practices" is the requirement of an adverse economic effect on competition or consumers. See Dreher, 115 F.3d at 332-33; Meldish, 722 F.2d at 28. The standard dictionary definition of the term supports the requirement of adverse economic effects. Although unfair trade can include generally any "inequitable business practice," it especially applies to "the act or an instance of a competitor's repeating of words in a way that conveys a misrepresentation that materially injures the person who first used the words, by appropriating credit of some kind earned by the first user." Black's Law Dictionary, 1564 (8th ed. 2004); see also id. at 1563 (defining "unfair competition" generally as "dishonest or fraudulent rivalry in trade and commerce" but especially "the practice of endeavoring to pass off one's own goods or products in the market for those of another by means of imitating or counterfeiting the name, brand, size, shape, or other distinctive characteristic of the article or its packaging"). Moreover, HN23[] under the doctrine of noscitur a sociis, which instructs that a word is "known by the company it keeps," Gustafson v. Alloyd Co., 513 U.S. 561, 575, 115 S. Ct. 1061, 131 L. Ed. 2d 1 (1995), [20] we "avoid ascribing to one word a meaning so broad that it is inconsistent with its accompanying words, thus giving unintended breadth to the Acts of Congress," id. (internal quotation omitted). Thus, HN24[] while the term "unfair trade practices" can apply broadly argument that the exclusion is unconstitutionally vague. See United States v. Bamberg, 478 F.3d 934, 937 (8th Cir. 2007) (HN18[] "The statute, first, must provide adequate notice of the proscribed conduct, and second, not lend itself to arbitrary enforcement.").

to any inequitable business practice, the meaning it carries here must be determined by reference to the other two enumerated terms--antitrust violations and restraints of trade--both of which clearly involve negative economic effects on consumers or competition. See Black's Law Dictionary, 104 (8th ed. 2004) (defining "antitrust law" as "[t]he body of law designed to protect trade and commerce from restraints, monopolies, price-fixing, and price discrimination."); id. at 1340 (defining "restraint of trade" as "1. A limitation on business dealings or professional or gainful occupations. 2. Antitrust. An agreement between or combination of businesses intended to eliminate competition, create a monopoly, artificially raise prices, or otherwise adversely affect the free market.") This choice of enumerated terms suggests that Congress intended to exclude from § 922(g)(1)'s prohibition those felons convicted under [21] criminal statutes addressing only economic harm to competition or consumers, but not to exclude those felons convicted under criminal statutes designed primarily to address other societal concerns.

Stanko argues that violating the FMIA is an unfair trade practice as a matter of clearly established law because one of the FMIA's main purposes is to protect the market from unfair competition and because the activities underlying his FMIA conviction harmed competition. He also argues that mislabeling products and committing business fraud constitute unfair trade practices by definition and that the FMIA must be an unfair-trade-practices law because it has preempted all state unfair-trade-practices laws.

We disagree with Stanko's characterization of the primary purpose of the FMIA as well as his reliance on the potential incidental adverse effects on competition and consumers resulting from his FMIA violations. HN25[] It is true that the statement of congressional findings at 21 U.S.C. § 602 includes concerns about the effects of unwholesome meat on competition and markets. These concerns, however, are subordinate to the FMIA's primary public-health purpose of protecting [22] consumers from unsafe meat: "It is essential in the public interest that the health and welfare of consumers be protected by assuring that meat and meat food products distributed to them are wholesome, not adulterated, [*417] and properly marked, labeled, and packaged." 21 U.S.C. § 602. Indeed, HN26[] cases discussing the FMIA uniformly describe the statute as concerned primarily with protecting public health. See, e.g., Nat'l Pork Producers Council v. Bergland, 631 F.2d 1353, 1361 (8th Cir. 1980) (noting that Congress expressly charged the USDA with assuring that meat distributed to consumers is wholesome, not adulterated, and properly marked, labeled, and packaged); United States v. Mullens, 583 F.2d 134, 139 (5th Cir. 1978) ("The purpose of the Meat Inspection Act of 1907, as amended . . . is to ensure a high level of cleanliness and safety in meat products."); Pac. Trading Co. v. Wilson & Co., 547 F.2d 367, 370 (7th Cir. 1976) ("The Federal Meat Inspection Act has as its stated purpose, the enforcement of standards of sanitation throughout meatpacking plants."); United States v. Articles of Food . . . Buffalo Jerky, 456 F. Supp. 207, 210 (D. Neb. 1978) [23] ("The Meat Inspection Act is, by its very terms, designed to protect the health and welfare of consumers: 'by assuring that meat and meat food products distributed to them are wholesome, not adulterated, and properly marked, labeled and packaged'.") (citing 21 U.S.C. § 602); Fed'n. of Homemakers v. Hardin, 328 F. Supp. 181, 184 (D.D.C. 1971) ("The primary purpose of the Wholesome Meat Act is to benefit the consumer and to enable him to have a correct understanding of and confidence in meat products purchased. Prohibitions against mislabeling are an integral part of this purpose."). Thus, despite the fact that the FMIA statutory scheme necessarily involves regulating business and may have the effect of protecting consumers and competition from economic harm, we conclude that the primary purpose of the FMIA is to protect public health from the effects of unwholesome meat.

Even more significantly, HN27[] none of the provisions of the FMIA require the Government to prove an effect on competition or consumers as an element of the offense. More specifically, none of the provisions under which Stanko was convicted required the Government to prove such effects. [24] See 21 U.S.C. §§ 605 (requiring inspection of meat products), 610 (prohibiting adulteration or misbranding of meat products), and 611 (prohibiting mislabeling). Instead, Stanko's mislabeling, misbranding, adulteration of meat, and deliberate avoidance of inspection alone ran afoul of the FMIA, independent of the incidental effects those actions may have had on competition or consumers.

An instructive contrast to the FMIA is the Packers and Stockyards Act (PSA), 7 U.S.C. § 192. Meatpackers run afoul of the PSA for such offenses as engaging in unfair, unjustly discriminatory or deceptive practices; apportioning supplies if such apportionment has the effect of restraining commerce or of creating a monopoly; and engaging in any course of business for the purpose or with the effect of manipulating or controlling prices. 7 U.S.C. § 192 (a), (c), (e). HN28[] In comparing the PSA with the FMIA, the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals has noted that "the statutes have quite different purposes. The FMIA is a public health statute, aimed at 'preventing the use in commerce of meat and meat food products which are adulterated.'" D&W Food Centers, Inc. v. Block, 786 F.2d 751, 755 (6th Cir. 1986) [25] (quoting 21 U.S.C. § 603(a)). By contrast, "the Stockyards Act is a fair trade practices law, and the chief evil at which it was aimed was the monopoly of the packers, enabling them unduly and arbitrarily to injure consumers and suppliers by controlling pricing." Id. (internal quotation omitted). The PSA's explicit prohibition of activities commercially and economically harmful to competition or consumers [*418] stands in marked contrast to the FMIA's public-health related prohibitions, none of which requires proof of economic effects on competition or consumers. Therefore, despite the potential for Stanko's criminal activities to have such incidental effects on competition and consumers, we find that none of the FMIA provisions under which Stanko was convicted requires the Government to prove an effect on competition or consumers as an element of the offense.

Having determined that the primary purpose of the FMIA is to protect public health and that the elements of Stanko's FMIA offenses of conviction do not involve an economic effect on competition or consumers, we find Stanko's additional arguments unavailing as well. HN29[] That Stanko's acts involved fraud and mislabeling [26] does not transform an FMIA offense into an unfair-trade-practices offense or an offense similar to the enumerated offenses, notwithstanding the fact that fraudulent conduct and mislabeling may be present in many unfair-trade-practices statutes. [6] In addition, Stanko's argument that the FMIA has preempted all state unfair-trade-practices laws and, therefore, must be one itself is meritless. HN30[] In assessing whether a federal law has preempted state law, courts "start with the assumption that the historic police powers of the states were not to be superseded by the Federal Act unless that was the clear and manifest purpose of Congress." Medtronic, Inc. v. Lohr, 518 U.S. 470, 485, 116 S. Ct. 2240, 135 L. Ed. 2d 700 (1996) (quotation omitted). Congressional enactments may "override state laws with which they conflict" and where the state law "stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes and objectives of Congress." Jones v. Rath Packing Co., 430 U.S. 519, 525-26, 97 S. Ct. 1305, 51 L. Ed. 2d 604 (1977). HN31[] While it is true that the FMIA prohibits states from imposing "[m]arking, labeling, packaging, or ingredient requirements in addition to, or different [27] than, those" mandated under the FMIA, 21 U.S.C. § 678, nothing in the text of the FMIA indicates an intent to preempt state unfair-trade-practices laws in general, nor have we found any cases supporting Stanko's claim that it does so. In Rath Packing, the Court held that where FMIA labeling requirements conflicted with California labeling requirements with respect to bacon, the FMIA requirements preempted California's. Id. at 532. The Court based its conclusion on HN32[] § 678's prohibition of "the imposition of '[m]arking, labeling, packaging, or ingredient requirements in addition to, or different than, those made under' the Act." Id. at 530 (quoting § 678); see also Animal Legal Defense Fund v. Provimi Veal, 626 F. Supp. 278, 286 (D. Mass. 1986) ("[M]eat ingredient standards, labeling and packaging have been pre-empted by the FMIA, and states cannot impose different or additional affirmative requirements on meat and meat food products.") (citation omitted). Rath Packing does not, however, stand for the proposition that the FMIA has preempted state unfair-trade-practices laws in addition to state meat-product [28] ingredient, labeling, and packaging laws.

Therefore we conclude, based on the primary purpose of the FMIA and the [*419] requirements for conviction under it, that Stanko's FMIA offenses do not pertain to "antitrust violations, unfair trade practices, restraints of trade, or other similar offenses relating to the regulation of business practices" under § 921(a)(20)(A).

[6] HN33[] An "intent to defraud" is not required for conviction under the FMIA. When an intent to defraud is present, as in Stanko's convictions, the potential criminal punishment for the violation increases. See 21 U.S.C. § 676(a) (any violation of any provision of the FMIA subjects a person to imprisonment "for not more than one year, or a fine of not more than $ 1,000, or both such imprisonment and fine; but if such violation involves intent to defraud . . . such person . . . shall be subject to imprisonment for not more than three years or a fine of not more than $ 10,000, or both . . . .").

Accordingly, [29] we hold that Stanko's FMIA convictions do not fall within § 921(a)(20)(A) exclusion and, as a result, that he was a prohibited person under § 922(g)(1). We therefore affirm his convictions.

Dissent

BRIGHT, Circuit Judge, dissenting.

It is ordinarily unlawful for anyone "who has been convicted in any court of, a crime publishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year" to possess a firearm or ammunition which has traveled in interstate commerce, 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(1), but the congressional enactment before us exempts certain individuals who commit business crimes, 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(20)(A). The exemption from the bar to gun ownership applies to persons convicted of "antitrust violations, unfair trade practices, restraints of trade, or other similar offenses relating to the regulation of business practices[.]" 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(20)(A) (emphasis added). Thus a person who has committed a felony may still own a gun if that person's felony relates to certain business crimes.

The majority speculates that Congress, on passing this legislation, excluded only a limited subset of business crimes, [30] and that the Stanko's Federal Meat Inspection Act ("FMIA") offenses, 21 U.S.C. § 601 et seq., are not "unfair trade practices" crimes or "similar offenses" within the scope of the exemption. The Gun Control Act of 1968 originally required the Secretary to designate the "similar offenses" that were within the scope of the exemption, 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(20) (Supp. V. 1969). The 1986 Firearms Owners' Protection Act, Pub. L. No. 99-308, 100 Stat. 449 (1986), however, eliminated the Secretary's role and left the courts to determine which business offenses are similar to antitrust violations, unfair trade practices, and restraints of trade.

A court's task of interpreting the exemption is complicated by the lack of Congressional commentary on § 921(a)(20)(A). Most recently, when Congress amended the Gun Control Act by enacting the Firearms Owners' Protection Act, the bill's sponsor, Senator James McClure, explained:

> [T]his bill [the Firearms Owners' Protection Act] has been painstakingly crafted to focus law enforcement on the kinds of Federal firearms law violations most likely to contribute to violent firearms crime . . . . We [31] must compel the enforcing agency to stop harassing honest people and to direct their efforts at the violent criminals who give all gun owners a bad name.

131 Cong. Rec. S23 (daily ed. Jan 3, 1985) (statement of Sen. McClure).

The statement seems to limit the prohibition on gun ownership only to "those who have demonstrated that 'they may not be trusted to possess a firearm without becoming a threat to society.'" Scarborough v. United States, 431 U.S. 563, 572, 97 S. Ct. 1963, 52 L. Ed. 2d 582 (1977) (quoting 114 Cong. Rec. 14773 (1968)) (explaining the intent of the prohibitions against felons possessing firearms contained in the Omnibus Crime Control Act of 1968).

Congress, by enacting § 921(a)(20)(A), has deemed criminals who commit a subset of business crimes outside the definition of those who "may not be trusted," but it has done little to outline the contours of that subset. The parties here have not suggested [*420] any legislative history explaining the original meaning of the § 921(a)(20)(A) exemption or the choice to remove the Secretary's role in defining its scope, and like the majority I have found none.

The result of Congress's abdication is a criminal statute [32] that is impermissibly vague. See Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352, 357, 103 S. Ct. 1855, 75 L. Ed. 2d 903 (1983); United States v. Bass, 404 U.S. 336, 348, 92 S. Ct. 515, 30 L. Ed. 2d 488 (1971); see also James v. United States, 127 S. Ct. 1586, 1601-03, 167 L. Ed. 2d 532 (2007) (Scalia, J., dissenting). The definitions contained in § 921, and those pertaining to the regulation of gun ownership generally, are loadstones for due process challenges predicated on vagueness. See, e.g., United States v. Smith, 171 F.3d 617, 622 (8th Cir. 1999); United States v. Decker, 446 F.2d 164, 166 (8th Cir. 1971); United States v. Nieves-Castano, 480 F.3d 597, 603 (1st Cir. 2007) (collecting cases); White v. DOJ, 328 F.3d 1361, 1368 (Fed. Cir. 2003). The challenges have thus far proved unsuccessful.

But here the vagueness of statute goes beyond, for example, the uncertainty inherent in defining a "violent felony" for purposes of 18 U.S.C. § 924(e)(2)(B) (codifying in part the Armed Career Criminal Act), see James v. United States, 127 S.Ct. 1586, 1598 n.6, 167 L. Ed. 2d 532 (2007), or a "misdemeanor [33] crime of domestic violence" for purposes of 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(9), see United States v. Pfeifer, 371 F.3d 430, 437 (8th Cir. 2004). I recognize that the enumerated crimes of § 921(a)(20)(A) likely do not lack constitutionally required specificity; they are no more vague than "violent felony" or "misdemeanor crime of domestic violence." And, the majority plausibly distinguishes Stanko's FMIA violations from the category of excluded "unfair trade practices" crimes because the FMIA is a public health statute in addition to an economic regulation. However, § 921(a)(20)(A)'s exemption of similar offenses clause lacks the same specificity.

The "similar offenses" clause of § 921(a)(20)(A) is crucial to this appeal. If, as the majority notes, this court is to obey a fundamental tenet of statutory interpretation, the clause must contemplate some crimes or be relegated to "mere surplusage." See Potter v. United States, 155 U.S. 438, 446, 15 S. Ct. 144, 39 L. Ed. 214 (1894). But the clause is, at the moment, hollow: the Secretary seemingly failed to designate any crimes prior to 1986 and I am not familiar with any precedent placing a crime within [34] its scope. Cf. United States v. McLemore, 792 F. Supp. 96, 98 (S.D. Ala. 1992) (crime of odometer tampering, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1984, 1990c(a), an "unfair trade practice" crime within the scope of § 921(a)(20)(A)). Courts have only, like the majority in this case, provided some guidance regarding crimes that are outside the clause. [7] See, e.g., United States v. Oldroyd, No. 97-30354, 1998 U.S. App. LEXIS 17501, 1998 WL 476395 (9th Cir. July 28, 1998) (unpublished opinion) (harboring illegal alien not offense relating to regulation of business practices); [*421] Dreher v. United States, 115 F.3d 330, 332 (5th Cir. 1997) (mail fraud and wire fraud not offenses excluded by § 921(a)(20)(A)); United States v. Kruckel, No. 92-611, 1993 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20777, 1993 WL 765648 (D.N.J. Aug. 13, 1993) (crime of filing false tax returns not within similar offenses clause). It may be that the district court in Dreher was correct when it described the similar offenses clause to include "violations of laws which likewise seek to enhance competition and prevent injuries to consumers and businesses." Dreher v. United States, 943 F. Supp. 680, 683 (W.D. La. 1996). [35] But, that judicially constructed definition may also be too restrictive to the extent that it excludes statutes--like the Federal Meat Inspection Act--that are primarily, or partially, designed to prevent evils beyond economic harm. Courts have yet to discover--or be presented with--an instance where the government sought to use such a purely economic crime, outside the three enumerated categories, to justify an 18 U.S.C. § 922 prosecution.

[36] The complete absence of Congressional guidance and scarcity of federal precedent leaves the meaning of the similar offenses clause unconstitutionally vague, and thus the class of individuals who may possess a firearm without the threat of prosecution is in part undefined. All persons, including those like Stanko, enjoy the right to live under a system of laws in which "a penal statute define[s] the criminal offense with sufficient definiteness that ordinary people can understand what conduct is prohibited and in a manner that does not encourage arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement." Kolender, 461 U.S. at 357. That right should not be jeopardized by an approach to statute drafting and interpretation that forces at least one individual (for each arguably economic crime) to learn, ex post, whether he has committed a crime by possessing a firearm. [8] See James, 127 S. Ct. at 1609-10 (Scalia, J., dissenting).

[7] The majority includes United States v. Meldish, 722 F.2d 26 (2d Cir. 1983) in its catalogue of cases that have examined § 921(a)(20)(A)'s exemption. Meldish held that the crime of importation by means of a false customs declaration, 18 U.S.C. § 542, is not an unfair trade practices crime, and that determination provides some guidance. But, the case is unhelpful as an example of crimes not included in the similar offenses clause because Meldish analyzed the § 921(a)(20)(A) exemptions prior to 1986, when the Secretary was the gatekeeper of the similar offenses clause. It is at least possible that a court, examining the crime today, could conclude that § 542 offenses do not prohibit an unfair trade practice but are within the judicially constructed set of similar offenses.

[37] The similar offenses clause of § 921(a)(20)(A) could be read as the majority determines, or otherwise, as contended by Stanko. Either is a plausible interpretation of the text. Stanko should not be convicted under a statute that is so uncertain as to its meaning, and therefore I respectfully dissent.

End of Document

[8] Stanko attempted but failed to get a final adjudication of his rights in a non-criminal setting. He sought a declaratory judgment that his FMIA offense was within the scope of § 921(a)(20), which a district court denied on the merits, but the Ninth Circuit vacated the court's order because Stanko had not, at that time, suffered a harm and thus lacked standing. See Stanko v. United States, No. 95-35289, 1995 U.S. App. LEXIS 24556, 1995 WL 499524 (9th Cir. Aug. 22, 1995) (unpublished opinion). The Ninth Circuit's decision highlights the concern I express in this dissent: our system of laws should not accept a statute so vague that an individual must suffer the harm of a § 922(g) conviction before learning from the courts whether his prior conviction falls within the scope of § 921(a)(20)'s exemptions.

Pursuant to 12 C.F.R. § 560.2(a), federal savings and loans are authorized to extend credit as authorized under federal law without regard to state laws purporting to regulate or otherwise affect their credit activities. 12 C.F.R. § 560.2(a).

Under 12 C.F.R. § 560.2(c), the list of state laws that are not preempted is designed merely to preserve the traditional infrastructure of basic state laws that undergird commercial transactions, not to open the door to state regulation of lending by federal savings associations. The list in subsection (c) is long and the categories it covers -- contract and commercial law, tort law, and so forth -- are very broad. It would not do to let the broad standards characteristic of such fields morph into a scheme of state regulation of federal savings and loans. Hence the statement in subsection (c) that state laws escape preemption only to the extent that they only incidentally affect the lending operations of Federal savings associations or are otherwise consistent with the purposes of paragraph (a) of this section.

Banking Law > ... > Banking & Finance > Federal Acts > Home Owners' Loan Act

Banking Law > ... > Banking & Finance > Regulators > US Office of Thrift Supervision

HN4[] Federal Acts, Home Owners' Loan Act

The Office of Thrift Supervision (OTS) has exclusive authority to regulate the savings and loan industry in the sense of fixing fees (including penalties), setting licensing requirements, prescribing certain terms in mortgages, establishing requirements for disclosure of credit information to customers, and setting standards for processing and servicing mortgages. 12 U.S.C.S. §§ 1462, 1463, 1464; 12 C.F.R. §§ 500.1, 500.10. But though it has some prosecutorial and adjudicatory powers ancillary to its regulatory functions, 12 U.S.C.S. § 1464(d); 12 C.F.R. § 509.1, the OTS has no power to adjudicate disputes between the savings and loans and their customers. So it cannot provide a remedy to persons injured by wrongful acts of savings and loan associations. Furthermore, the Home Owners' Loan Act (HOLA), 12 U.S.C.S. §§ 1461 et seq., creates no private right to sue to enforce the provisions of the statute or the OTS's regulations.

HN5[] State Law, Federal Preemption

The United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit reads 12 C.F.R. § 560.2(c) to mean that the Office of Thrift Supervision's assertion of plenary regulatory authority does not deprive persons harmed by the wrongful acts of savings and loan associations of their basic state common-law-type remedies.

[*641] POSNER, Circuit Judge. The defendants in this class action have been permitted to appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) from the district judge's refusal to dismiss, as preempted by the Home Owners Loan Act ("HOLA"), 12 U.S.C. §§ 1461 et seq., and implementing regulations promulgated by the Office of Thrift Supervision, 12 C.F.R. §§ 560.1 et seq., the plaintiffs' claims under California, Connecticut, Illinois, New Mexico, and Pennsylvania law. Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1367 (supplemental jurisdiction), the plaintiffs appended these state-law claims to their federal-law claims, upon which the district court's jurisdiction was premised; these are claims under the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1692 et seq., the Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act, 12 U.S.C. §§ 2601 et seq., and the Truth in Lending Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1601 et seq.

The complaint is a hideous sprawling mess, 40 pages in length with [3] 221 paragraphs of allegations. We have found it difficult and in many instances impossible to ascertain the nature of the charges. It would have been better had the defendants deferred their motion, and the district judge his ruling, until either the defendants served contention interrogatories designed to smoke out what exactly the plaintiffs are charging, or better, because quicker and cheaper, the judge told the plaintiffs to specify the acts of the defendants that they are complaining about so that he could decide how much of the complaint was preempted. Still, the defendants can hardly be blamed for wanting to strangle the monster in its crib.

Ocwen, the principal defendant and the only one we need discuss (the other defendant is a law firm charged with having assisted Ocwen in the misconduct of which the plaintiffs complain), was at the times relevant to this case a federal savings and loan association engaged in servicing home mortgages originated by other lenders. When a loan is secured by a mortgage, the borrower may be asked to sign various transfer agreements that allow the mortgagee to assign not only the mortgage itself but also or instead various rights that the mortgage [4] grants the mortgagee, such as the rights to collect monthly payments from the mortgagor, collect late payments from him, foreclose in the event of default, or place the mortgagor's payments for taxes and insurance premiums in escrow. The administration of these rights is called "servicing" the mortgage. If the firm doing the servicing, such as Ocwen in this case, exceeds its rights under the transfer agreements, the mortgagor's recourse is against that firm rather than against the original mortgagee or the current holder of the mortgage. See OTS Regulatory Handbook: Thrift Activities 571.1 (Jan. 1994), www.ots.treas.gov/docs/4/429128.pdf (visited June 5, 2007); "Mortgage Servicing Rights: Traded Like Baseball Cards?," www.mortgagenewsdaily.com/662005_Mortgage_Servicing.asp (visited June 5, 2007).

Enacted in 1933, HOLA is "a product of the Great Depression of the 1930's, [and] was intended 'to provide emergency relief with respect to home mortgage indebtedness' at a time when as many as [*642] half of all home loans in the country were in default ." Fidelity Federal Savings & Loan Ass'n v. de la Cuesta, 458 U.S. 141, 159, 102 S. Ct. 3014, 73 L. Ed. 2d 664 (1982) (citations omitted). [5] HOLA empowered what is now the Office of Thrift Supervision in the Treasury Department to authorize the creation of federal savings and loan associations, to regulate them, and by its regulations to preempt conflicting state law. Id. at 161-62. Ocwen has given up its federal thrift charter; but this does not affect its defense that when it committed the acts for which the plaintiffs are suing any state-law claims based on those acts were preempted.

One of OTS's regulations, the validity of which is not questioned, allows HN1[] federal S&Ls to "extend credit as authorized under federal law. . . without regard to state laws purporting to regulate or otherwise affect their credit activities." 12 C.F.R. § 560.2(a). The regulation goes on to provide:

> HN2[] (b) Illustrative examples [of what federal S&Ls can do without regard to state laws]. Except as provided in § 560.110 of this part, the types of state laws preempted by paragraph (a) of this section include, without limitation, state laws purporting to impose requirements regarding:

> (6) Any other law that OTS, upon review, finds:
> (i) Furthers a vital state interest; and
> (ii) Either has only an incidental effect on lending operations or is not otherwise contrary to the purposes expressed in paragraph (a) of this section.

Ocwen makes much of the fact that [8] the Office of Thrift Supervision has said that in applying the regulation a court should first decide whether the state law in question is listed in subsection (b) and, if so, Ocwen argues, that is the end of the case. "OTS Final Rule," 61 Fed. Reg. 50951, 50966 (Sept. 30, 1996). Well, of course. And the OTS's statement further explains that HN3[] subsection (c), the list of laws that are not preempted, is designed merely "to preserve the traditional infrastructure of basic state laws that undergird commercial transactions, not to open the door to state regulation of lending by federal savings associations." Id. The list in subsection (c) is long and the categories it covers -- contract and commercial law, tort law, and so forth -- are very broad. It would not do to let the broad standards characteristic of such fields morph into a scheme of state regulation of federal S&Ls. Hence the statement in subsection (c) that state laws escape preemption only "to the extent that they only incidentally affect the lending operations of Federal savings associations or are otherwise consistent with the purposes of paragraph (a) of this section." The line between subsections (b) and (c) is both intuitive and reasonably clear. HN4[] The Office of Thrift Supervision has exclusive authority to regulate the savings and loan industry in the sense of fixing fees (including penalties), setting licensing requirements, prescribing certain terms in mortgages, establishing requirements for disclosure of credit information to customers, and setting standards for processing and servicing mortgages. See 12 U.S.C. §§ 1462, 1463, 1464; 12 C.F.R. §§ 500.1, 500.10; "OTS Final Rule," supra, 61 Fed. Reg. at 50965. But though it has some prosecutorial and adjudicatory powers ancillary to its regulatory functions, 12 U.S.C. § 1464(d); 12 C.F.R. § 509.1; Simpson v. Office of Thrift Supervision, 29 F.3d 1418, 1422 (9th Cir. 1994), the [10] Office has no power to adjudicate disputes between the S&Ls and their customers. See OTS, "How to Resolve a Consumer Complaint" 1-2, www.ots.treas.gov/docs/4/480924.pdf (visited June 5, 2007). So it cannot provide a remedy to persons injured by wrongful acts of savings and loan associations, and furthermore HOLA creates no private right to sue to enforce the provisions of the statute or the OTS's regulations. Burns Int'l Inc. v. Western Savings & Loan Ass'n, 978 F.2d 533, 535-37 (9th Cir. 1992).

Against this background of limited remedial authority, HN5[] we read subsection (c) to mean that OTS's assertion of plenary regulatory authority does not deprive persons harmed by the wrongful acts of savings and loan associations of their basic state common-law-type remedies. Suppose an S&L signs a mortgage agreement with a homeowner that specifies an annual interest rate of 6 percent and a year later bills the homeowner at a rate of 10 percent and when the homeowner refuses to pay institutes foreclosure proceedings. It would be surprising for a federal regulation to forbid the homeowner's state to give the homeowner a defense based on [*644] the mortgagee's breach of contract. Or if [11] the mortgagee (or a servicer like Ocwen) fraudulently represents to the mortgagor that it will forgive a default, and then forecloses, it would be surprising for a federal regulation to bar a suit for fraud. Some federal laws do create such bars, notably ERISA, see 29 U.S.C. §§ 1132(a), (e), but this is recognized as exceptional. American Airlines, Inc. v. Wolens, 513 U.S. 219, 232, 115 S. Ct. 817, 130 L. Ed. 2d 715 (1995); Ingersoll-Rand Co. v. McClendon, 498 U.S. 133, 142-43, 111 S. Ct. 478, 112 L. Ed. 2d 474 (1990). Enforcement of state law in either of the mortgage-servicing examples above would complement rather than substitute for the federal regulatory scheme.

This is well explained in "Preemption of State Laws Applicable to Credit Card Transactions" P IIC (Opinion of OTS Chief Counsel, Dec. 24, 1996, 1996 WL 767462):

> State laws prohibiting deceptive acts and practices in the course of commerce are not included in the illustrative list of preempted laws in § 560.2(b). . . . The [Indiana] DAP [deceptive acts and practices] statute prohibits specified acts and representations in all consumer transactions without regard to whether [12] the transaction involves an extension of credit. Although not directly aimed at lenders, this law affects lending to the extent that it prohibits misleading statements and practices in loan transactions by a federal savings association. Accordingly, . . . a presumption arises that the DAP statute would be preempted in connection with loans made by the Association.
> The OTS has indicated, however, that it does not intend to preempt state laws that establish the basic norms that undergird commercial transactions. . . . The Indiana DAP falls within the category of traditional "contract and commercial" law under § 560.2(c)(1). While the DAP may affect lending relationships, the impact on lending appears to be only incidental to the primary purpose of the statute -- the regulation of the ethical practices of all businesses engaged in commerce in Indiana. There is no indication that the law is aimed at any state objective in conflict with the safe and sound regulation of federal savings associations, the best practices > of thrift institutions in the United States, or any other federal objective identified in § 560.2(a). In fact, because federal thrifts are presumed to interact with their [13] borrowers in a truthful manner, Indiana's general prohibition on deception should have no measurable impact on their lending operations. Accordingly, we conclude that the Indiana DAP is not preempted by federal law.

We must decide, insofar as it is possible to do so with only the complaint to go on, which claims fall on the regulatory side of the ledger and which, for want of a better term, fall on the common law side.

The first 19 pages of the 40-page complaint accuse Ocwen of a variety of skullduggery, but do not indicate which bad acts are being charged [14] as a violation of federal law and which as a violation of state law. Beginning at the bottom of page 19, however, the complaint lists the [*645] actual claims and indicates, though murkily, which are federal and which are state law claims. The first apparent state law claim is the third on the list and is entitled "fraudulent concealment." That term usually refers to a doctrine for tolling statutes of limitations, but the complaint seems to be using it to mean simply fraud. This claim alleges that Ocwen "concealed material facts" from the plaintiffs and the other members of the class, including "material terms of the loans." That sounds like a conventional fraud charge (though an implausible one -- how can the material terms of the loan be concealed, when they are set forth in the loan documents?), but there are also references to "unauthorized charges," and it is not indicated whether they are unauthorized by the loan agreements or forbidden by state law.

The breach of contract allegations are elaborated in the fifth claim (the fourth seeks restitution as a remedy for the third claim, the one we've just been discussing). Here we read that Ocwen assumed the obligations in the plaintiffs' [15] loan agreements when it took over the loans for servicing, that the "plaintiffs satisfied their obligations by making timely payments of principal and interest on their loans," but that nevertheless "by charging late fees on payments that were not late, Ocwen breached its contracts with Plaintiffs and the Class" and also did so by "increasing the monthly payment amount due without notice" and "demanding payment of attorneys' fees in connection with legal proceedings that have not commenced and/or have not yet been incurred" (meaning of course that the fees have not yet been incurred, though the literal antecedent is "legal proceedings").

Although these seem like conventional breach of contract allegations, Ocwen argues that they are preempted by subsection (b)(10) of the OTS regulation: "Processing, origination, servicing, sale or purchase of, or investment or participation in, mortgages" (emphasis added). At least so far as bears on this case, servicing refers to the exercise of rights that are conferred by a partial assignment of a mortgage by the mortgagee. Instead of assigning the entire mortgage to Ocwen, the mortgagee in this case assigned some of the rights created [16] by the mortgage contract -- the "servicing rights" -- to Ocwen, which according to the complaint proceeded to violate its contractual obligations. It is no different than if the original mortgagee, or an assignee of the entire mortgage, had violated the terms of the mortgage or defrauded the mortgagor. We would have a different case if state law purported to forbid servicing or prescribe the terms of the assignment -- suppose a state tried to limit the rights that the assignment conferred on the servicing S&L. But nothing like that is suggested here. HN6[] If an original mortgagee can be sued under state law for breach of contract, so may the partial assignee if he violates the terms of the part of the mortgage contract that has been assigned to him.

The sixth claim is that Ocwen violated a "duty of good faith and fair dealing." HN7[] Most state laws impose a duty of good faith performance of contracts, meaning that a party to a contract cannot engage in opportunistic behavior. Martindell v. Lake Shore Nat'l Bank, 15 Ill. 2d 272, 154 N.E.2d 683, 690 (Ill. 1958); Hentze v. Unverfehrt, 237 Ill. App. 3d 606, 604 N.E.2d 536, 539-40, 178 Ill. Dec. 280 (Ill. App. 1992); [17] Lockwood Int'l, B.V. v. Volm Bag Co., 273 F.3d 741, 745 (7th Cir. 2001) (Wisconsin law); Original Great American Chocolate Chip Cookie Co. v. River Valley Cookies, Ltd., 970 F.2d 273, 280 (7th Cir. 1992) (Illinois law) ("contract law imposes a duty. . . to avoid taking advantage of gaps in a contract in order to exploit the vulnerabilities [*646] that arise when contractual performance is sequential rather than simultaneous"). An example of such behavior, from the Lockwood case, is a liability insurance company's paying a person who has sued the insured to convert his claim to one not covered by the insurance policy.

The full name of the duty, both in the complaint and in the cases -- "duty of good faith and fair dealing " -- could be thought ominously open-ended. But the full name is merely what is called a "doublet," a form of redundancy in which lawyers delight, as in "cease and desist" and "free and clear." Bryan A. Garner, The Redbook: A Manual on Legal Style § 11.2(f) (2d ed. 2006). "Fair dealing" adds nothing to "good faith." See, e.g., Beraha v. Baxter Health Care Corp., 956 F.2d 1436, 1443-44 (7th Cir. 1992) (Illinois [18] law); Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 205 (1979).

The seventh claim charges Ocwen with "conversion of funds." If Ocwen converted borrowers' funds that it was holding in escrow to its own use, it would be guilty of the tort of conversion, but for all we can tell the claim may be nothing more than a rewording of the fraud claims.

The eighth claim is purely remedial; it seeks injunctive relief. Of course it is not a claim, that is, a cause of action, and should not have been labeled as such; it is a further example of how poorly drafted the complaint is.

The ninth claim alleges violations of the California Business & Professions Code §§ 17200 et seq. HN8[] Not all state statutes that might be invoked against a federal S&L are preempted, any more than all common law doctrines are; for remember that contract and commercial law are among the laws listed in subsection (c) of the regulation, and all states have adopted the Uniform Commercial Code. If the California Business & Professions Code is some modest supplement to the UCC, then presumably it is not preempted. But it may be more, since it forbids "unfair competition" [19] defined as "any unlawful, unfair or fraudulent business act or practice and unfair, deceptive, untrue or misleading advertising." Id. § 17200; see Committee on Children's Television, Inc. v. General Foods Corp., 35 Cal. 3d 197, 673 P.2d 660, 668, 197 Cal. Rptr. 783 (Cal. 1983); People v. Duz-Mor Diagnostic Laboratory, Inc., 68 Cal. App. 4th 654, 658, 80 Cal. Rptr. 2d 419 (1998). As interpreted by the complaint, this claim charges a gallimaufry -- a macedoine -- of unlawful acts, including failing to provide mortgagors with adequate monthly statements of their account balances, assessing "excessive" late fees, and "force placing insurance on properties that already have insurance coverage." There is no indication that these practices involve either breach of contract or misrepresentation, and it is apparent that prohibiting them could interfere with federal regulation of disclosure, fees, and credit terms.

Other allegations in the ninth claim may not be preempted, such as "failing to apply customers payments," "making improper negative reports about customers," or "forc[ing] customers to pay amounts they do not actually owe under threat of losing their homes." But [20] one would have to know more about the specific conduct being charged to make a judgment. For example, those customers who "do not actually owe" anything -- is this by virtue of the terms of the loan, or by virtue of some state law that regulates credit terms? In the latter event, this part of the claim would be preempted.

The ninth claim also charges a violation of a provision of HN9[] another California statute, which forbids imposing a late charge for an installment payment that is [*647] no more than ten days late. Cal. Civ. Code § 2954.4(a). It is clearly preempted.

The tenth claim is based on still another California statute, the Consumers Legal Remedies Act, Cal. Civ. Code §§ 1750 et seq. The plaintiffs interpret the statute to forbid deceptive practices, such as falsely representing sponsorship or approval of Ocwen's services. If this is like common law fraud, then it probably is not preempted. But is it? One cannot tell from the complaint whether, for example, the charge is limited to deliberate deception or whether as interpreted by the plaintiffs the Act creates a code of truthful marketing that would constitute the regulation of [21] advertising, which is one of the preempted categories listed in subsection (b).

The eleventh claim continues with the Consumers Legal Remedies Act but adds that Ocwen has engaged in "unfair" debt collection, specifically by misrepresenting that it incurred fees or other charges for which it is entitled to reimbursement under its loan contracts. But the specifics are offered merely as examples of Ocwen's "unfair" practices in violation of the Act, rather than as the entirety of the allegations. Again we don't know whether the charge goes beyond common law fraud.

The twelfth claim is based on the Connecticut Unfair Trade Practices Act, Conn. Gen. Stat. §§ 42-110a et seq. Some of the specific charges may well be preempted, such as that Ocwen charged more for replacement hazard insurance than what the insurance cost. If this is meant to suggest that the Act can be used to impose a cost-plus pricing scheme on federal savings institutions, it is preempted, but maybe the loan contracts at issue forbade the mortgagee to charge more than the cost of the insurance. The other allegations in this claim are of abusive debt-collection practices similar to those forbidden [22] by the federal Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, one of the plaintiffs' federal claims; it is unclear what the Connecticut Act adds that would not be preempted -- probably nothing. The claim that the plaintiffs "received exorbitant and usurious" mortgages is preempted. A mysterious claim that Ocwen knowingly concealed in its advertising "material facts about the deceptive mortgages" may not be preempted, depending however on what a "deceptive mortgage" is (probably a misprint).

The thirteenth claim repeats the charge of fraud, but this time under New Mexico's Unfair Trade Practices Act, New Mexico Stat. Ann. §§ 57-12-1 et seq. It goes on to charge "a gross disparity between the value received by the [class] members [in New Mexico] and the price paid," a charge that clearly is preempted.

The fourteenth claim is under the Illinois Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Business Practices Act, 815 ILCS 505/1 et seq., and complains that Ocwen "demand[s] [from the mortgagors] payments of fees for an entire foreclosure case at its inception." If this demand is forbidden by the loan contract, then the charge is not preempted; [23] otherwise, it probably is.

The fifteenth claim is under Pennsylvania's Uniform Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Law, 73 Pa. Stat. §§ 201-1 et seq., and contains a number of preempted claims, such as charging "unreasonable fees," failing to provide borrowers with itemizations, "coercing borrowers to remit payments through EZ Pay," and imposing "predatory loan charges," along with straight fraud claims that probably are not preempted and charges that cannot be classified because too little information is provided, such as "applying loan payments to wrongful fees and charges first."

The sixteenth claim is under another Pennsylvania statute, the Fair Credit Extension [*648] Uniformity Act, 73 Pa. Stat. §§ 2270.1 et seq. It is basically a claim of deceptive practices in collection, but the frequent references to "improper," "unfair," and "unconscionable" make classification impossible.

The seventeenth claim returns us to New Mexico law, but this time with charges of slander of title -- that, presumably to obtain repayment, Ocwen filed a lis pendens (a notice of litigation affecting real property, recorded in the registry [24] of deeds) without a valid basis. This would not be preempted.

The eighteenth claim is against a bank that is no longer a defendant, or at least not a party to the appeal.

The nineteenth claim alleges negligence, with no further explanation. The twentieth alleges fraud, and does not appear to be preempted, though this could depend on the nature of the fraud, which is unexplained. This and other claims of fraud may fail to comply with the requirement in Rule 9(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure that the complaint plead fraud with particularity, but the issue is not before us on this interlocutory appeal.

The twenty-first claim, which is similar to the seventeenth, charges Ocwen with having defamed some of the plaintiffs by falsely representing that they were delinquent in repaying their loans. A charge of defamation (which would require, however, that Ocwen have made the false representation to third parties, and not just to the borrowers) is a good example of claim that the regulation does not preempt.

The twenty-second claim charges fraud, but without specifying the misrepresentations (or misleading omissions) constituting the fraud [25] -- and thus almost certainly violates Rule 9(b). The twenty-third and last claim is federal.

This tedious recital shows that the case is largely unripe for a determination of preemption. Despite its length, the complaint is vague. Some of the charges are pretty clearly, even certainly, preempted, as we have tried to indicate. Others probably are not, though this may depend on particulars omitted from the complaint. Many of the charges are so vaguely worded that we cannot guess whether they are preempted or not.

The complaint was filed in April 2004 after the transfer of the various suits against Ocwen to the Northern District of Illinois. Rather than trying to rule on preemption on the basis of an uninformative complaint, the district judge should have required the plaintiffs to specify the acts of Ocwen that they contend violate state law. Three years have been wasted. On remand, the judge must focus on the acts alleged in the complaint, seeking clarification from the plaintiffs where necessary and deciding in accordance with this opinion which are preempted and which are not. He must avoid the further protraction of this unwieldy litigation.

He will also want to consider whether [26] any portions of the complaint should be dismissed for failure either to comply with Rule 9(b) or to comply with the recent pleading standard announced by the Supreme Court in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 1967-69, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). The Court held that HN10[] a complaint that charges an agreement between firms not to compete, in violation of antitrust law, must contain "enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest that an agreement was made. . . . An allegation of parallel conduct and a bare assertion of conspiracy will not suffice." The Court rejected the heretofore canonical formula of Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 45-46, 78 S. Ct. 99, 2 L. Ed. 2d 80 (1957), "that a complaint should not be dismissed for failure to state a claim unless it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his [*649] claim which would entitle him to relief." The Court was concerned that Conley 's formula might be invoked to condemn the defendant in an antitrust case to conducting expensive pretrial discovery, in order to demonstrate the groundlessness of the plaintiff's case. The present case is not an antitrust case, but the district court will want [27] to determine whether the complaint contains "enough factual matter (taken as true)" to provide the minimum notice of the plaintiffs' claim that the Court believes a defendant entitled to.

In the present posture of the litigation, however, the denial of the motion to dismiss the complaint must be

AFFIRMED.

HN1[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

An appellate court reviews a ruling on a motion to dismiss for the correction of errors at law. A dismissal will be affirmed only if the petition shows no right of recovery under any state of the facts.

A motion to dismiss tests the legal sufficiency of the challenged pleading. Iowa law bars recovery of derivative and remote injuries in a variety of situations. The remoteness doctrine is not based upon a factual inquiry to determine whether the damages claimed were foreseeable or whether they were a proximate cause; rather, it is a legal doctrine incorporating public policy considerations. In determining whether this doctrine precludes a plaintiff's antitrust claims, a court first examines whether recovery for derivative or remote injuries is permitted under Iowa's competition law.

HN7[] Standing, Requirements

To determine standing under antitrust law, a court will examine the plaintiff's harm, the alleged wrongdoing by the defendants, and the relationship between them. Courts focus on five factors to guide their examination: (1) whether the claim alleges a causal connection between the antitrust violation and the plaintiff's alleged harm; (2) whether the plaintiff's alleged injury is of a type sought to be redressed by the antitrust laws; (3) the directness or indirectness of the asserted injury; (4) whether denying a remedy is likely to leave a significant antitrust violation undetected or unremedied; and (5) whether the damages claimed are highly speculative or abstract.

TERNUS, Chief Justice.

[*193] The plaintiffs, Jeff Southard, Trish Southard, Jeffrey Stickel, Heather Stickel, Mel Lint, Keith Goodyk, and Greg Dana, [2] filed this class action on September 18, 2003, alleging the defendants, Visa U.S.A. Inc. and MasterCard International Inc., violated Iowa's competition law, Iowa Code chapter 553 (2003). They also sought relief against the defendants on the common-law ground of unjust enrichment.

The defendants filed a motion to dismiss the plaintiffs' action on the basis that under well-established, common-law principles the plaintiffs could not recover for derivative or remote injuries. The district court granted the defendants' motion and dismissed the plaintiffs' petition in its entirety.

The plaintiffs appealed. We affirm.

II. Background Proceedings.

The plaintiffs filed a detailed, forty-eight-page petition. In their petition, they allege they are and they represent consumers who purchased goods for cash or used Visa or MasterCard debit cards to make purchases from merchants who accept Visa or MasterCard credit cards as a form of payment. The plaintiffs contend the defendants required merchants who accepted Visa and MasterCard credit cards to also [4] accept Visa and MasterCard debit cards. Due to this tying arrangement, the plaintiffs allege, merchants were forced to pay inflated fees for processing debit transactions over the Visa and MasterCard networks. The plaintiffs assert these magnified costs were passed along to all consumers in the form of higher prices for the goods sold by the merchants.

The plaintiffs allege the tying arrangement orchestrated by the defendants was a violation of Iowa's competition law. See Iowa Code §§ 553.4, .5. They claim they and others in the class were injured by the defendants' illegal conduct because all consumers paid merchants artificially inflated prices for all merchandise. See id. § 553.12(2) (HN4[] "[A] person who is injured . . . by conduct prohibited under this chapter may bring suit to . . . [r]ecover actual damages resulting from conduct prohibited under this chapter.").

The plaintiffs also allege the same conduct of the defendants resulted in the defendants' unjust enrichment at the expense of the plaintiffs and other class members. The plaintiffs seek restitution of the monies received by the defendants as a result of the defendants' conduct. [1]

The defendants filed a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim upon which [*195] relief can be granted. See Iowa R. Civ. P. 1.421(1). They asserted the plaintiffs could not recover because the plaintiffs' injuries were derivative and remote. See Philip Morris Inc., 577 N.W.2d at 406-07 (explaining and applying the remoteness doctrine). They further contended the plaintiffs were not "indirect purchasers" who may sue under Iowa's antitrust law. See Comes, 646 N.W.2d at 451 (allowing suit by indirect purchasers under Iowa's competition law). Finally, the defendants argued the plaintiffs' unjust enrichment claim was unsupported by the facts alleged in [6] the petition.

[1] The plaintiffs also allege a claim for "money [5] had and received." This claim was ultimately dismissed by the district court, who concluded this theory was indistinguishable from the plaintiffs' unjust enrichment claim. On appeal, the plaintiffs state the district court erred in dismissing their claim for money had and received, but make no argument with respect to this theory and cite no authorities to support this statement distinct from their briefing of the unjust enrichment claim. We therefore do not separately consider or discuss the plaintiffs' theory of money had and received.

The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss. Employing the test set forth in Associated General Contractors v. California Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 103 S. Ct. 897, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723 (1983), the district court held the plaintiffs' injuries were too remote to support a claim under chapter 553. The court agreed with the defendants that the plaintiffs in this action were not indirect purchasers like the plaintiffs permitted to sue Microsoft in the Comes suit.

The district court also rejected the plaintiffs' claim of unjust enrichment. It concluded the same obstacles to recovery that existed with respect to the plaintiffs' statutory claim precluded their recovery under an unjust enrichment theory. The court further held that as a result of the merchants' previous recovery from the defendants for injuries the merchants sustained as a result of the defendants' illegal tying arrangement, the defendants had been stripped of their ill-gotten gains and no unjust enrichment remained. See In re Visa Check/MasterMoney Antitrust Litig., 297 F. Supp. 2d 503, 506-09 (E.D.N.Y. 2003), aff'd sub nom. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Visa U.S.A. Inc., 396 F.3d 96 (2d Cir. 2005). [7]

III. Issues on Appeal.

The plaintiffs claim the district court's dismissal of their antitrust claims due to the remoteness of their injuries was error. They maintain this court rejected such a limitation when we held in Comes that indirect purchasers could sue under Iowa's competition law. The plaintiffs argue that if we do not find Comes dispositive, we should use the "target area" test to analyze whether they can bring suit under the Iowa competition law, rather than the Associated General Contractors test employed by the district court.

The plaintiffs also claim the dismissal of their unjust enrichment claim constitutes error. They assert any deficiency in their antitrust claims should not impact the viability of their unjust enrichment theory. The plaintiffs further argue they have sufficiently alleged the required elements for this common-law claim. IV. Applicability of Comes.

We begin our analysis by addressing the plaintiffs' assertion that our decision in Comes--that indirect purchasers may bring suit under chapter 553--is dispositive of the present appeal. The premise underlying the plaintiffs' position is that this court in Comes held common-law rules barring recovery for remote [8] and derivative injuries do not apply to actions brought under chapter 553.

Admittedly, our Comes decision contains some expansive statements with respect to the reach of Iowa's antitrust statute. See, e.g., Comes, 646 N.W.2d at 445 ("Given the clear, broad language of the state antitrust law, we conclude the Iowa Competition Law creates a cause of action for all consumers, regardless of one's technical status as a direct or indirect purchaser."), 451 ("We conclude our antitrust law contemplates all injured consumers are authorized to bring suit to enforce our antitrust [*196] laws."). Nonetheless, these statements must be interpreted within the context in which they were made. As we stated in Comes: "The only issue on appeal is whether the United States Supreme Court case, Illinois Brick [Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (1977)], should be followed in interpreting the Iowa Competition Law." Id. at 442. It is appropriate, therefore, to briefly examine the holding in Illinois Brick.

In Illinois Brick, the Supreme Court held that "the overcharged direct purchaser, and not others in the chain of manufacture or distribution, is the party 'injured in his business [9] or property' within the meaning of [the federal antitrust law.]" 431 U.S. at 729, 97 S. Ct. at 2066, 52 L. Ed. 2d at 714. The Court pointed out that this issue was "analytically distinct from the question of which persons have sustained injuries too remote to give them standing to sue for damages" under federal law. Id. at 728 n.7, 97 S. Ct. at 2065 n.7, 52 L. Ed. 2d at 714 n.7.

In Comes, this court decided the Illinois Brick rule prohibiting indirect-purchaser suits should not be followed in interpreting Iowa's competition law. 646 N.W.2d at 450. Accordingly, we held "indirect purchasers may maintain an antitrust action in state court." Id. at 441. Because the plaintiffs in Comes qualified as indirect purchasers who had standing under state law, we had no need in that case to determine whether persons who were not indirect purchasers and who suffered injuries even more remote than those sustained by indirect purchasers had standing.

Thus, with respect to setting the outer limits of what injuries are compensable under Iowa's competition law, our decision in Comes is narrow. We simply rejected the federal rule barring claims by indirect purchasers. We certainly did not, as suggested [10] by the plaintiffs, determine there were no limits on who could sue under chapter 553. Cf. Kanne v. Visa U.S.A. Inc., 272 Neb. 489, 723 N.W.2d 293, 299-301 (Neb. 2006) (holding Nebraska decision rejecting Illinois Brick indirect-purchaser rule in antitrust suit against Microsoft did not reject all standing requirements).

Before discussing what limits exist with respect to who may sue under Iowa antitrust law due to the common-law remoteness doctrine, we address the plaintiffs' argument that they are indirect purchasers in the same position as the Comes plaintiffs. The plaintiffs in Comes had purchased computers that came with the Windows 98 operating system preinstalled. Comes, 646 N.W.2d at 441. As a precondition to the use of this operating system, the plaintiffs became end-user licensees of Microsoft. Id. at 441-42. The plaintiffs alleged in the class action filed on behalf of all end-user licensees of Windows 98 living in Iowa that "Microsoft maintained or used a monopoly in conjunction with its Windows 98 operating system for the purpose of excluding competition or controlling, fixing, or maintaining prices in violation of the Iowa Competition Law." Id. at 442. As a result of this illegal conduct, [11] alleged the plaintiffs, Microsoft charged a higher price for its Windows 98 system than what it would have been able to charge in a competitive market. Id.

The plaintiffs bringing suit in Comes were indirect purchasers of the Windows 98 operating system because "Microsoft did not directly sell its products [to the plaintiffs, but the plaintiffs] ultimately obtained the products through the stream of commerce." Comes v. Microsoft Corp., 696 N.W.2d 318, 320 (Iowa 2005). The plaintiffs in the present action are not in a comparable position because they did not purchase, directly or indirectly, the product that is the subject of anticompetitive [*197] activity by Visa and MasterCard--debit processing services. It is clear from the petition that the plaintiffs are nonpurchasers; they simply bought merchandise from businesses that used the defendants' debit processing services. Kanne, 723 N.W.2d at 301 (holding consumer plaintiffs in identical Nebraska antitrust suit were not indirect purchasers of Visa and MasterCard services). Consequently, our decision in Comes is not dispositive of the issue presented by the present appeal: can a nonpurchaser suffering a derivative injury recover under Iowa's [12] competition statute?

V. Recovery by Person Having a Derivative or Remote Injury.

HN5[] Iowa law bars recovery of derivative and remote injuries in a variety of situations. See, e.g., Philip Morris Inc., 577 N.W.2d at 406-07 (suit by State against tobacco manufacturers for State's payment of medical expenses for citizens' tobacco-related illnesses); Anderson Plasterers v. Meinecke, 543 N.W.2d 612, 613 (Iowa 1996) (suit by employer for its losses due to third-party's negligent injury of employee). As we explained in Philip Morris Inc., "The remoteness doctrine 'is not based upon a factual inquiry to determine whether the damages claimed were foreseeable or whether they were a proximate cause; rather, it is a legal doctrine incorporating public policy considerations.' " 577 N.W.2d at 406 (quoting Kraft Chem. Co. v. Ill. Bell Tel. Co., 240 Ill. App. 3d 192, 608 N.E.2d 243, 245, 181 Ill. Dec. 170 (Ill. App. Ct. 1993)).

In determining whether this doctrine precludes the plaintiffs' antitrust claims, we first examine whether recovery for derivative or remote injuries is permitted under Iowa's competition law. As we noted in Comes, the Iowa statute authorizes recovery by a very broad category of persons: "[A] person who is injured . . . [13] by conduct prohibited under this chapter may bring suit to: . . . [r]ecover actual damages resulting from conduct prohibited under this chapter." 646 N.W.2d at 443 (quoting Iowa Code § 533.12(2)). In part due to the broad language of the statute, this court in Comes rejected application of the federal rule barring suits by indirect purchasers. Id. at 445. Our decision was also based on the fact that although Iowa's competition law "took its cues from federal law," the indirect-purchaser rule was not a part of federal antitrust law at the time the Iowa general assembly enacted its statute. Id. at 447 (noting "six of the seven federal courts of appeals that considered this issue [had] held indirect purchasers could recover damages for antitrust violations"). We concluded, therefore, that "it was impossible for the legislature to have adopted a judicial construction which did not exist at that time." Id.

Obviously, in considering the application of the remoteness doctrine in the present case, we are dealing with the same broad statutory language interpreted in Comes. The history of federal antitrust law is, however, quite different with respect to the remoteness doctrine than it was with [14] respect to the indirect-purchaser rule. Prior to the enactment of the Iowa competition law in 1976, see 1976 Iowa Acts ch. 1224, the United States Supreme Court observed, "The lower courts have been virtually unanimous in concluding that Congress did not intend the antitrust laws to provide a remedy in damages for all injuries that might conceivably be traced to an antitrust violation." Hawaii v. Standard Oil Co., 405 U.S. 251, 264 n.14, 92 S. Ct. 885, 892 n.14, 31 L. Ed. 2d 184, 193 n.14 (1972).

As we determined in Comes, the interpretation given to the federal antitrust law at the time the Iowa competition law was adopted informs our search for legislative [*198] intent. Therefore, we conclude HN6[] the Iowa legislature did not intend to allow every person tangentially affected by a violation of the statute to have a remedy in damages. This conclusion leads us to consider whether the plaintiffs' injuries are too remote to be recoverable under chapter 553.

VI. Test to Determine Antitrust Standing.

Although lower courts had unanimously rejected claims for remote injuries prior to Iowa's adoption of its antitrust law in 1976, the United States Supreme Court did not directly address this issue until [15] its 1983 decision in Associated General Contractors. In that case, the Court noted the federal antitrust statute was "broad enough to encompass every harm that can be attributed directly or indirectly to the consequences of an antitrust violation," but concluded "Congress intended the Act to be construed in the light of its common-law background." Associated Gen. Contractors, 459 U.S. at 529, 531, 103 S. Ct. at 904-05, 74 L. Ed. 2d at 733. This common-law background encompassed constraints on who could recover, including limitations on recovery for remote injuries. Id. at 532 n.25, 103 S. Ct. at 905 n.25, 74 L. Ed. 2d at 734-35 n.25. In determining who could recover under the federal act, i.e., who has "antitrust standing," the Court focused on "the plaintiff's harm, the alleged wrongdoing by the defendants, and the relationship between them." Id. at 535, 103 S. Ct. at 907, 74 L. Ed. 2d at 736.

The defendants urge us to reject the Associated General Contractors (AGC) test and employ the "target area" test to analyze standing. Under the latter test, a plaintiff must simply be in the "target area" of the antitrust conspiracy, that is, "the area of the economy which is endangered by a [16] breakdown of competitive conditions in a particular industry." Id. at 537 n.33, 103 S. Ct. at 908 n.33, 74 L. Ed. 2d at 737 n.33. The United States Supreme Court rejected this test in Associated General Contractors, instructing courts to consider the multiple factors set forth in that decision. Id. Moreover, contrary to the defendants' claim the "target area" test is more widely accepted, it appears federal and state courts have uniformly applied the AGC test.

The "target area" test, which is in essence an analysis of foreseeability, is inconsistent with Iowa's common-law limitation on recovery for remote injuries, which is not based on the foreseeability of the plaintiff's damages. See Philip Morris Inc., 577 N.W.2d at 406 ("The remoteness doctrine 'is not based upon a factual inquiry to determine whether the damages claimed were foreseeable . . . .' " (quoting Kraft Chem. Co., 608 N.E.2d at 245)). We think the AGC test is more reflective of the legal context within which the Iowa legislature enacted Iowa's competition law. Therefore, we apply the AGC factors to determine whether the plaintiffs may recover under Iowa law.

VII. Application of the AGC Test.

HN7[] To determine standing under [17] our antitrust law, we will examine "the plaintiff's harm, the alleged wrongdoing by the defendants, and the relationship between them." Associated Gen. Contractors, 459 U.S. at 535, 103 S. Ct. at 907, 74 L. Ed. 2d at 736. In Associated General Contractors, the Court focused on five factors to guide its examination: (1) whether the claim alleges a causal connection between the antitrust violation and the plaintiff's alleged harm; (2) whether the plaintiff's alleged injury is of a type sought to be redressed by the antitrust laws; (3) the directness or indirectness of the asserted injury; (4) whether denying a remedy is likely to leave a significant antitrust violation undetected [*199] or unremedied; and (5) whether the damages claimed are highly speculative or abstract. Id. at 536-45, 103 S. Ct. at 908-12, 74 L. Ed. 2d at 737-43. We think the district court properly applied these factors in deciding the plaintiffs had no standing under Iowa's competition law.

It is not disputed the plaintiffs have alleged a causal connection between the defendants' illegal conduct and the plaintiffs' alleged injuries. On the other hand, the plaintiffs are neither consumers of the defendants' products nor competitors [18] of the defendants. Therefore, the plaintiffs are not "participants in the relevant market," and their injuries are not of the type sought to be compensated by antitrust laws. Id. at 538, 103 S. Ct. at 908-09, 74 L. Ed. 2d at 738. Clearly, the injuries alleged by the plaintiffs are not even indirect, as the plaintiffs are not in the chain of distribution. Their injuries are better described as derivative. Denying a remedy will not leave the alleged antitrust violation undetected or unremedied. Indeed, the action brought by merchants against Visa and MasterCard was settled by the defendants' payment of more than three billion dollars into a settlement fund and an agreement to abandon the alleged tying arrangements. See In re Visa Check/MasterMoney Antitrust Litig., 297 F. Supp. 2d at 506-09. Finally, a determination of the plaintiffs' damages would be a complex process at best and speculative at worst because many factors impact a retailer's decision-making process when setting prices on products sold to consumers. Considering the AGC factors, we hold the district court properly determined the plaintiffs' injuries were too remote to be compensable under Iowa's competition law. See Kanne, 723 N.W.2d at 298-99 [19] (affirming dismissal of identical action brought under Nebraska antitrust law, holding consumers' injuries were too remote under AGC test); Ho v. Visa U.S.A., Inc., 16 A.D.3d 256, 793 N.Y.S.2d 8, 9 (App. Div. 2005) (same).

VIII. Unjust Enrichment Claim.

The plaintiffs alleged in their petition that the defendants' illegal tying arrangements unjustly enriched the defendants at the plaintiffs' expense because the merchants who paid artificially high prices for the defendants' debit processing services passed those costs along to the plaintiff consumers. The district court dismissed this claim, concluding it suffered from the same remoteness-of-injury problem as the plaintiffs' antitrust claims and that there was no enrichment due to the defendants' settlement of the antitrust action brought by merchants.

Plaintiffs rely on the broad and open-ended nature of the equitable doctrine of unjust enrichment to support their claim. See State ex rel. Palmer v. Unisys Corp., 637 N.W.2d 142, 150 (Iowa 2001) (stating that HN8[] unjust enrichment "can stand on its own as an open-ended, broad theory of restitution"). Plaintiffs overlook that this common-law theory is subject to the common-law rule that bars recovery for [20] remote injuries. Relying on the remoteness doctrine, this court, in Philip Morris Inc., concluded the district court had correctly dismissed the State's claim for indemnity, a form of unjust enrichment. 577 N.W.2d at 406. See generally Unisys Corp., 637 N.W.2d at 149-50 (noting the theory of unjust enrichment has "given rise to specific derivative theories, such as contribution and indemnity"). We held the State's injury--payment of citizens' medical expenses made necessary by the defendants' conduct--was too remote to recover. Philip Morris Inc., 577 N.W.2d at 406-07.

The same conclusion must logically be reached here. Therefore, the district court did not err in dismissing the plaintiffs' [*200] unjust enrichment claim on the basis the plaintiffs' injuries were too remote.

IX.Summary.

HN9[] Iowa's competition law does not provide a remedy to every person who can trace an injury to a defendant's anticompetitive conduct. Injuries that are remote under the analysis used in the Associated General Contractors case may not be recovered under chapter 553.

In the present case, the plaintiff consumers' injuries are remote, and therefore, the plaintiffs lack antitrust standing. Moreover, the plaintiffs are [21] not indirect purchasers of the defendants' services; they are nonpurchasers. Consequently, they cannot benefit from our decision in Comes to allow indirect purchasers to bring suit under Iowa's competition law.

Finally, the plaintiffs cannot recover under a theory of unjust enrichment because their injuries are too remote.

The district court correctly granted the defendants' motion to dismiss the plaintiffs' claims. Accordingly, we affirm.

AFFIRMED.

HN5[] Employment Relationships, At Will Employment

Indiana recognizes a cause of action for tortious interference with a party's employment contract. This cause of action extends to an employee's rights under at-will employment contracts. A plaintiff must establish the following to make out a claim for tortious interference with a contractual relationship: (1) the existence of a valid, enforceable contract; (2) the defendant's knowledge of the contract's existence; (3) the defendant's intent to induce a breach of that contract; (4) the absence of justification; and (5) damages resulting from the defendant's inducement to breach the contract. To establish that a defendant acted without justification, the plaintiff must establish that the resulting breach was malicious and exclusively directed to the injury and damage of another. Additionally, where the contract at issue is an at-will employment contract, the plaintiff also must show that the defendant interferer acted intentionally and without a legitimate business purpose.

HN6[] Regulated Practices, Private Actions

The Indiana Antitrust Act provides for a private right of action by individuals injured as a result of violations of the Act. Ind. Code § 24-1-2-7. The elements of a private action for violation of the Indiana Act are: (1) a violation of the statute, (2) injury to a person's business or property proximately caused by the violation, and 3) actual damages. The second element of a private action also requires a showing of "antitrust injury": the type of injury which the antitrust laws intend to prevent and the type of injury which naturally flows from what makes the defendant's acts unlawful.

Civil Procedure > Preliminary Considerations > Federal & State Interrelationships > General Overview

HN7[] Preliminary Considerations, Federal & State Interrelationships

Where a claim arises under Indiana law, a federal court must decide the issue as it believes the Supreme Court of Indiana would if faced with the same issue. In doing so, the federal court may look to the decisions of the Indiana courts that construe a relevant statute.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > State Regulation

HN8[] Private Actions, State Regulation

An exception for private individuals from the antitrust injury requirement under the Indiana Antitrust Act would be inconsistent with the statute authorizing a private right of action for violations of the Indiana Act. This statute provides a private right of action for any person who shall be injured in his business or property by any person or corporation by reason of the doing by any person or persons of anything forbidden or declared to be unlawful by the Indiana Act. Ind. Code § 24-1-2-7. The text of the statute makes clear that the private action provides recovery for injuries only when the violation of the Act is the reason for the injury. What the Act forbids or declares unlawful are schemes, contracts or combinations that restrain trade, as that concept is understood in federal antitrust law. Ind. Code § 24-1-2-1. The Indiana Act was modeled after 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 of the Sherman Antitrust Act and has been interpreted consistent with the Sherman Act. It follows that anticompetitive conduct must be the reason for plaintiffs' injuries for their claims to fall within Ind. Code § 24-1-2-7.

HN9[] Regulated Practices, Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade

Before enacting its antitrust statutes, Indiana recognized a common law private right of action in those individuals injured by acts in restraint of competition. The Indiana courts have held that the Indiana antitrust statute is intended to be declarative of the common law prohibition against restraint of trade. Indiana has no modern cases involving the common law tort of restraint of trade distinct from the elements of an action under Indiana's antitrust statutes. Because the Indiana antitrust statutes are considered to be declarative of the common law, there is no reason to believe that the elements of a common law action for restraint of trade differ from those of a statutory cause of action.

The burden-shifting analysis of McDonnell-Douglas has been applied to claims under § 510 of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act, 29 U.S.C.S. § 1140. To proceed under this approach, a plaintiff must first establish a prima facie case of discrimination by demonstrating that he (1) belongs to the protected class; (2) was qualified for his job position; and (3) was discharged or denied employment under circumstances that provide some basis for believing that the prohibited intent to retaliate was present. If the plaintiff makes this prima facie showing, the burden shifts to the employer to present a legitimate, nondiscriminatory reason for its action. The burden then shifts back to the plaintiff to demonstrate that the proffered explanation is pretext.

ORDER

[*165] The plaintiffs, Elizabeth Deich-Keibler and Larry Haler, brought this action against the defendants, Bank One and RBC Mortgage Co. ("RBC"), alleging violations of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act ("ERISA") by Bank One and violations of Indiana statutory and common law by both Bank One and RBC in connection with Bank One's sale of its brokered mortgage loan sales division ("Division") to RBC in June 2003. On cross-motions for summary judgment, the district court granted judgment in favor of Bank One and RBC on each of the plaintiffs' claims. The plaintiffs now appeal. For the reasons set forth in this order, we affirm.

I

A.

In June 2003, Bank One and RBC entered [2] into an agreement whereby Bank One would sell the Division to RBC. RBC viewed employing Bank One's employees as advantageous, given the employees' established customer relationships; therefore, RBC planned to offer positions to Bank One's employees in the Division. To facilitate RBC's hiring, the sales agreement prohibited Bank One, for a period of 180 days, from soliciting for employment those Division employees to whom RBC offered jobs ("no-hire provision").

At the time of the sale, the plaintiffs worked in the Division. The plaintiffs were offered jobs by RBC, but rejected the offers. The plaintiffs attempted to find other positions in Bank One, as they had when prior reorganizations by Bank One eliminated the positions they had occupied, but were told that Bank One could [*166] not offer them employment under the sales agreement.

The plaintiffs then sought benefits from Bank One's Pay Continuation Plan ("Plan"). The Plan provided severance pay and other benefits to terminated Bank One employees. Following an amendment in 2002, however, the Plan did not provide benefits to terminated employees when the employee was terminated in connection with the sale of a portion of Bank One's business [3] and the purchasing company offered the employee work pursuant to a requirement of the sales agreement. Because the plaintiffs had been offered employment by RBC under the terms of the sales agreement between RBC and Bank One, the plaintiffs were denied benefits under the Plan.

B.

The plaintiffs then brought this action against RBC and Bank One. They asserted an Indiana common law claim against RBC for tortious interference with their employment contracts with Bank One. The plaintiffs further asserted that the no-hire provision was an unlawful restraint of trade in violation of Indiana statutory and common law. The plaintiffs also contended that Bank One wrongfully had denied them benefits under the Plan and that Bank One had discharged them in retaliation for attempting to exercise their rights under the Plan in violation of ERISA § 510, 29 U.S.C. § 1140.

The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment. The district court concluded that the plaintiffs had failed to come forward with evidence that RBC had acted without justification when it purchased the Division, resulting in the plaintiffs' termination from Bank One. Therefore, the court held, RBC was entitled to summary judgment [4] in its favor on the plaintiffs' tortious interference claims. The court further concluded that, because the plaintiffs had presented no evidence of an antitrust injury as a result of the agreement between RBC and Bank One, RBC and Bank One were entitled to summary judgment on the plaintiffs' Indiana statutory antitrust claims. The court also concluded that the no-hire provision did not constitute an unreasonable restraint of trade, thereby entitling RBC and Bank One to summary judgment on the plaintiffs' Indiana common law restraint of trade claims. Next, the court concluded that Bank One was entitled to summary judgment on the plaintiffs' ERISA denial of benefits claims because Bank One's denial of the plaintiffs' claims for benefits under the Plan was not arbitrary and capricious. Lastly, the court determined that the plaintiffs had failed to rebut Bank One's legitimate, non-discriminatory explanation for terminating the plaintiffs, and, therefore, Bank One was entitled to summary judgment on the plaintiffs' ERISA discriminatory termination claims.

II

DISCUSSION

The plaintiffs now appeal the district court's decision granting summary judgment in favor of RBC and Bank One. The plaintiffs [5] first contend that RBC tortiously interfered with their contract rights with Bank One by inducing Bank One to terminate them in connection with the sale of the Division. The plaintiffs next contend that the no-hire provision of the sales agreement constituted an unreasonable restraint on trade in violation of Indiana's antitrust statutes and common law. The plaintiffs also appeal the district court's conclusion that Bank One had not discriminated against the plaintiffs for attempting to exercise their rights under ERISA. The plaintiffs have abandoned their claim [*167] of wrongful denial of benefits under ERISA on appeal.

A. Plaintiffs' Tortious Interference Claims

The plaintiffs first contend that RBC tortiously interfered with their employment relationship with Bank One. HN5[] Indiana recognizes a cause of action for tortious interference with a party's employment contract. Trail v. Boys & Girls Clubs of N.W. Indiana, 845 N.E.2d 130, 138 (Ind. 2006). This cause of action extends to an employees' rights under at-will employment contracts, such as those between Bank One and the plaintiffs. See id. The plaintiffs must establish the following to make out a claim for tortious interference with a contractual relationship: (1) the existence of a valid, enforceable contract; (2) the defendant's knowledge of the contract's existence; (3) the defendant's intent to induce [7] a breach of that contract; (4) the absence of justification; and (5) damages resulting from the defendant's inducement to breach the contract. Winkler v. V.G. Reed & Sons, Inc., 638 N.E.2d 1228, 1235 (Ind. 1994). To establish that a defendant acted without justification, the plaintiff must establish that the resulting breach was "malicious and exclusively directed to the injury and damage of another." Bilimoria Computer Sys., LLC v. America Online, Inc., 829 N.E.2d 150, 156-57 (Ind. Ct. App. 2005). Additionally, because the contract at issue here is an at-will employment contract, the plaintiffs also must "show that the defendant interferer acted intentionally and without a legitimate business purpose." Trail, 845 N.E.2d at 138 (citing Bochnowski v. Peoples Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n, 571 N.E.2d 282, 285 (Ind. 1991)).

The primary issue here is whether RBC acted without justification when it induced Bank One to terminate the plaintiffs in conjunction with the sale of the Division to RBC. The plaintiffs have come forward with no evidence that RBC was motivated by malice or an intent to injure or damage the plaintiffs. Indeed, RBC offered both plaintiffs positions and it is undisputed that [8] RBC considered employment of Bank One's employees a key part of its business strategy. Furthermore, the plaintiffs recognize that RBC's decision to purchase Bank One's operations was a legitimate business interest: expanding RBC's own business. Because the plaintiffs cannot establish that RBC acted without justification and without a legitimate business purpose, RBC is entitled to summary judgment on the plaintiffs' claim of tortious [*168] interference with their employment contracts with Bank One. [1]

B. Indiana Statutory Antitrust Claims

The plaintiffs next assert that the no-hire provision was an unlawful restraint of trade on the part of RBC and Bank One, in violation of Indiana's antitrust act, I.C. § 24-1-2-1, et seq. HN6[] The act provides for a private right of action by individuals injured as a result of violations of the act. Id. § 24-1-2-7. The elements of a private action for violation [9] of the Indiana act are: "1) a violation of the statute, 2) injury to a person's business or property proximately caused by the violation, and 3) actual damages." City of Auburn v. Mavis, 468 N.E.2d 584, 585 (Ind. Ct. App. 1984). The second element of a private action also requires a showing of "antitrust injury": "the type of injury which the antitrust laws intend to prevent and the type of injury which naturally flows from what makes the defendant's acts unlawful." Id. at 586; see also Berghausen v. Microsoft Corp., 765 N.E.2d 592, 597 (Ind. Ct. App. 2002).

The plaintiffs concede that they cannot demonstrate an antitrust injury, but contend that, because they are private individuals as opposed to corporations, they should be permitted to recover without demonstrating antitrust injury. HN7[] Because this claim arises under Indiana law, we must decide the issue "as we believe the Supreme Court of Indiana would if faced with the same issue." Clark, 473 F.3d at 712. In doing so, we may look to the decisions of the Indiana courts that construe the Indiana antitrust statute. Id. We have found nothing in the decisions of the Indiana courts of appeals to indicate that the Supreme Court of Indiana [10] would create the exception urged by the plaintiffs.

Further, such HN8[] an exception would be inconsistent with the statute authorizing a private right of action for violations of the Indiana act. This statute provides a private right of action for "[a]ny person who shall be injured in his business or property by any person or corporation by reason of the doing by any person or persons of anything forbidden or declared to be unlawful" by the Indiana act. I.C. § 24-1-2-7 (emphasis added). The text of the statute makes clear that the private action provides recovery for injuries only when the violation of the act is the reason for the injury. What the act forbids or declares unlawful are schemes, contracts or combinations that restrain trade, as that concept is understood in federal antitrust law. See I.C. § 24-1-2-1; see also Rumple v. Bloomington Hosp., 422 N.E.2d 1309, 1315 (Ind. Ct. App. 1991) (noting that the Indiana act was modeled after section 1 of the

[1] The plaintiffs also submit that the no-hire provision offends public policy because it violates the Thirteenth Amendment's prohibition on slavery and involuntary servitude by preventing the plaintiffs from seeking employment with Bank One. We deem this contention frivolous and shall not address it further.

Sherman Antitrust Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, and has been interpreted consistent with the Sherman Act). It follows that the anti-competitive conduct must be the reason for the plaintiffs' injuries for their claims to fall within I.C. § 24-1-2-7.

Thus, [11] there is nothing in the statute or the decisions of the courts of Indiana to support the view that the Supreme Court of Indiana would waive the element of proof of an antitrust injury for individuals in the plaintiffs' position. Because the plaintiffs cannot demonstrate antitrust injury, RBC and Bank One are entitled to summary judgment in their favor on the plaintiffs' Indiana statutory antitrust claims.

[*169] C. Indiana Common Law Restraint of Trade Claims

The plaintiffs also assert Indiana common law restraint of trade claims against RBC and Bank One. HN9[] Before enacting its antitrust statutes, Indiana recognized a common law private right of action in those individuals injured by acts in restraint of competition. See Knight & Jillson Co. v. Miller, 172 Ind. 27, 87 N.E. 823, 827-28 (Ind. 1909). The Indiana courts have held that the Indiana antitrust statute was intended to be declarative of the common law prohibition against restraint of trade. See id. at 827. Indiana has no modern cases involving the common law tort of restraint of trade distinct from the elements of an action under Indiana's antitrust statutes. [2] Because the Indiana antitrust statutes are considered to be declarative of the common law, [12] see id., there is no reason to believe that the elements of a common law action for restraint of trade differ from those of a statutory cause of action. Therefore, because the plaintiffs cannot establish a claim under Indiana's antitrust statute, their common law restraint of trade claims also fail.

D. Plaintiffs' ERISA Discriminatory Discharge Claims

Lastly, The plaintiffs allege that Bank One discharged them in order [13] to prevent or otherwise discriminate against them from exercising their rights under the Plan in violation of ERISA § 510. [3] They assert two distinct theories in support of this claim. The plaintiffs first contend that the sale of the Division itself violated ERISA § 510 because the sale was motivated by a desire to prevent all of the Division's employees from exercising their rights under the Plan.

We have not addressed the issue of whether the sale of a division may constitute a violation of § 510. However, the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit has held that HN11[] a party may establish a violation of § 510 under such circumstances, but "only by showing that some ERISA-related characteristic special to the unit . . . was essential to the firm's [14] selecting the unit for closure or sale." Andes v. Ford Motor Co., 315 U.S. App. D.C. 120, 70 F.3d 1332, 1338 (D.C. Cir. 1995). Bank One met its initial burden on summary judgment by pointing to

[2] The plaintiffs cite Fort Wayne Cleaners & Dryers Ass'n v. Price, 127 Ind. App. 13, 137 N.E.2d 738 (Ind. Ct. App. 1956) (en banc), for the proposition that a party may pursue both common law and statutory actions for restraint of trade. Although Fort Wayne Cleaners involved both common law and statutory claims, nothing in the decision suggests that the common law claims were for the tort of restraint of trade. A close reading of the case suggests that the common law claims in that case were for tortious interference with business relations, a separate tort that remains actionable in Indiana. See id. at 741-42 ("There can be no doubt in [Indiana] that it is an actionable wrong to interfere, either directly or indirectly, with the business of another without cause or justification . . . .").

[3] Section 510 provides, in pertinent part:

> HN10[] It shall be unlawful for any person to discharge, fine, suspend, expel, discipline, or discriminate against a participant or beneficiary for exercising any right to which he is entitled under the provisions of an employee benefit plan . . . or for the purpose of interfering with the attainment of any right to which such participant may become entitled under the plan . . . .

29 U.S.C. § 1140.

the absence of evidence that denial of the plaintiffs' benefits under the plan was essential to Bank One's decision to sell the Division. See Celotex, 477 U.S. at 325. In short, to survive summary judgment, the plaintiffs were required to come forward with evidence of specific facts to raise a genuine issue of fact as to whether Bank One intended to discriminate against this particular division [*170] because of some characteristic of the benefit plan. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(e); Anderson, 477 U.S. at 248. The plaintiffs have not provided such evidence. Therefore, Bank One was entitled to summary judgment in its favor on this theory.

The plaintiffs also advance a theory of disparate treatment in support of their claim that Bank One discharged them in violation of ERISA § 510. They contend that Bank One either awarded benefits or allowed other employees of the Division who did not request benefits under the Plan to remain at Bank One.

The plaintiffs attempt to establish their theory of disparate treatment under the indirect method [15] of proof using HN12[] the burden-shifting analysis of McDonnell-Douglas Corp. v. Green, 411 U.S. 792, 93 S. Ct. 1817, 36 L. Ed. 2d 668 (1973), which we have applied to ERISA § 510 claims. See Salus v. GTE Directories Serv. Corp., 104 F.3d 131, 135 (7th Cir. 1997). To proceed under this approach, the plaintiff must first establish a prima facie case of discrimination "by demonstrating that he (1) belongs to the protected class; (2) was qualified for his job position; and (3) was discharged or denied employment under circumstances that provide some basis for believing that the prohibited intent to retaliate was present." Id. If the plaintiff makes this prima facie showing, the burden shifts to the employer to present a legitimate, non-discriminatory reason for its action. Id. The burden then shifts back to the plaintiff to demonstrate that the proffered explanation is pretext.

The plaintiffs have not made a prima facie case of discrimination or retaliation. The record demonstrates that the plaintiffs were notified that they would be terminated before any request for benefits was made. Further, there is no indication in the record that Bank One was aware that the plaintiffs intended to request benefits under the Plan at the time [16] it discharged them. Such circumstances do not provide a "basis for believing that the prohibited intent to retaliate was present." Id.

Assuming that the plaintiffs have met their initial burden of establishing a prima facie case of discrimination, Bank One has come forward with a legitimate, non-pretextual explanation. Bank One explains that its decision to terminate the plaintiffs was the result of selling the Division. HN13[] To meet their burden on summary judgment to demonstrate that Bank One's proffered reason was pretext, the plaintiffs must come forward with "evidence of specific facts that call into question the veracity" of Bank One's proffered reasons. Hague v. Thompson Distribution Co., 436 F.3d 816, 827 (7th Cir. 2006) (applying the McDonnell-Douglas burden-shifting analysis in the context of racial discrimination).

The plaintiffs attempt to meet this burden by pointing to three comparison employees. The first comparison employee, Chris Shrader, also was terminated by Bank One as a result of the sale to RBC, but allegedly received benefits under the Plan. The fact that Shrader also was terminated supports Bank One's proffered reason that the plaintiffs were terminated because of [17] the sale. The plaintiffs submit no evidence regarding second comparison employee, Leo Liberio. Rather, the plaintiffs simply assert their belief that Liberio either still works for Bank One or received benefits under the Plan. Such HN14[] unsupported beliefs do not constitute evidence of specific facts for purposes of summary judgment. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(e). The third comparison employee, Jerry Bevers, formerly worked in the Division but now works for Chase Home Finance, a successor corporation to Bank One. The plaintiffs provide no specific facts with respect to how Bevers came to work there. In short, [*171] these comparisons provide no evidence of specific facts that would call into question the veracity of Bank One's proffered non-discriminatory explanation. Therefore, Bank One is entitled to summary judgment in its favor on the plaintiffs' disparate treatment theory of ERISA discrimination.

Conclusion

The decision of the district court granting summary judgment in favor of Bank One and RBC is affirmed.

HN1[] Private Actions, Sherman Act

A plaintiff's claims under the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. §§ 1 and 2, are fundamentally flawed where the plaintiff fails to allege and prove harm, not just to a single competitor, but to the competitive process, that is, to competition itself. The purpose of the Sherman Act is not to protect businesses from the working of the market; it is to protect the public from the failure of the market. The United States Supreme Court has stated that the antitrust laws were enacted for the protection of competition not competitors.

[776] MEMORANDUM []

Before: THOMPSON, BERZON, and TALLMAN, Circuit Judges.

Paul Lucas, dba Solar Engineering and Contracting, appeals the district court's summary judgment in favor of Citizens Communications Company, dba Kauai Electric ("KE"), and its successor, Kauai Island Utility Cooperative

[*] This disposition is not appropriate for publication and is not precedent except as provided by 9th Cir. R. 36-3.

("KIUC"). Lucas contends that KE violated the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1, 2, [2] and the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 13, by forcing solar water heater installers who were affiliated contractors under its Energy Wise program to sell solar water heaters at fixed low prices. Lucas was a participating Energy Wise solar water heater installer from 1998 until 2000, when he was terminated because, according to KE, he violated the terms of the Participation Agreement by charging customers in excess of the maximum allowable cost for a solar water heater system.

Lucas further contends that he is entitled to punitive damages and that KE defamed him by telling a potential customer that he "overcharged people."

Because Lucas establishes neither antitrust injury nor defamation, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of KE and KIUC on all claims.

Lucas failed to allege facts in his complaint sufficient to establish jurisdiction under the Sherman Act, which requires "the existence of a demonstrable nexus between the defendants' activity and interstate commerce." McLain v. Real Estate Bd. of New Orleans, Inc., 444 U.S. 232, 246, 100 S. Ct. 502, 62 L. Ed. 2d 441 (1980). However, at oral argument, Lucas explained that such a nexus exists, as many of the solar water heaters are manufactured [3] outside of the State of Hawai'i and KE's activities thus would have a substantial effect on interstate commerce. KE did not contest this explanation.

HN1[] Lucas's claims under §§ 1 & 2 of the Sherman Act, however, are fundamentally flawed because he fails to "allege and prove harm, not just to a single competitor, but to the competitive process, i.e., to competition itself." NYNEX Corp. v. Discon, Inc., 525 U.S. 128, 135, 119 S. Ct. 493, 142 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1998). While Lucas has adduced evidence showing damage to his own business, he has failed to demonstrate damage to the solar water heater market as whole. See Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447, 458, 113 S. Ct. 884, 122 L. Ed. 2d 247 (1993) ("The purpose of the Act is not to protect businesses from the working of the market; it is to protect the public from the failure of the market."). As the Supreme Court has often stated, "[t]he antitrust laws . . . were enacted for 'the protection of competition not competitors.'" Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 488, 97 S. Ct. 690, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977) (quoting [*777] Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 320, 82 S. Ct. 1502, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1962)).

Furthermore, Lucas fails to establish HN2[] two elements necessary to make out a claim under § 1 of the Sherman Act: concerted action between two [4] or more entities and an unreasonable restraint of trade injuring competition. Am. Ad Mgmt. v. GTE Corp., 92 F.3d 781, 788 (9th Cir. 1998). Section 1 of the Sherman Act is concerned only with unlawful restraints imposed pursuant to arrangements between two or more actors; KE's unilateral action in fixing maximum price restraints does not fall within the bounds of conduct prohibited under § 1. See Business Electronics Corp. v. Sharp Electronics Corp., 485 U.S. 717, 726-27, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808 (1988); Fisher v. City of Berkeley, 475 U.S. 260, 266-67, 106 S. Ct. 1045, 89 L. Ed. 2d 206 (1986); Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 761, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775 (1984); United States v. Colgate & Co., 250 U.S. 300, 307, 39 S. Ct. 465, 63 L. Ed. 992, 1919 Dec. Comm'r Pat. 460 (1919).

In any event, no per se unlawful horizontal restraint exists. No matter how favorably one construes the facts in favor of Lucas, the Participation Agreement between KE and the installers cannot be interpreted as a horizontal agreement because KE and the installers operate at different levels of the market and are not competitors -- Lucas does not sell electricity and KE does not sell or install solar water heaters. See Bus. Elec. Corp., 485 U.S. at 730 & n.4.

If we were to construe the maximum prices established under the Energy Wise program as a [5] vertical restraint, Lucas fails to establish under the rule-of-reason analysis that the restraint is unlawful. See Cont'l T. V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania Inc., 433 U.S. 36, 57-59, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568 (1977). Lucas has not adduced evidence demonstrating that KE intended to harm or restrain competition, that an actual injury to competition occurred, or that the restraint is unreasonable. See Am. Ad Mgmt., 92 F.3d at 789.

Lucas likewise has failed to adduce evidence to support his § 2 claim that KE monopolizes or attempts to monopolize the solar water heater market on Kauai. Lucas has not established that KE had a dominant market share in the solar water heater market; to the contrary, KE was not a participant in the relevant market because it neither sold nor bought water heaters. See Image Tech. Servs., Inc. v. Eastman Kodak Co., 125 F.3d 1195, 1206 (9th Cir. 1997) (on remand). In addition, Lucas has made no showing that KE has engaged in predatory or anticompetitive conduct with a specific intent to monopolize. See Spectrum Sports, 506 U.S. at 456.

Lucas failed to amend his complaint in the district court to include a claim under the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 13, and raised this issue only in his response [6] to KE's motion for summary judgment. HN3[] Simply alleging violations of the Sherman Act is not sufficient to make out a claim under the Robinson-Patman Act, as the Robinson-Patman Act is separate legislation providing an independent ground for relief. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a). As such, Lucas's § 13 claim is not properly before us. See Smith v. Marsh, 194 F.3d 1045, 1052 (9th Cir. 1999); United States v. Carlson, 900 F.2d 1346, 1349 (9th Cir. 1990).

If we were to exercise our discretion to consider Lucas's Robinson-Patman Act claim, however, we would dismiss it for lack of jurisdiction. In contrast to the Sherman Act, the jurisdictional requirements of the Robinson-Patman Act "cannot be satisfied merely by showing that allegedly anticompetitive acquisitions and activities affect commerce." Gulf Oil Corp. v. Copp Paving Co., Inc., 419 U.S. 186, 195, [*778] 95 S. Ct. 392, 42 L. Ed. 2d 378 (1974). Rather, under the Supreme Court's decision in Gulf Oil, Lucas must demonstrate that (1) KE engaged in interstate commercial activities, (2) KE's alleged unlawful rebate scheme and discriminatory pricing occurred in the course of its interstate activities, and (3) at least one of KE's allegedly discriminatory sales was made in interstate [7] commerce. Id. Because Lucas concedes that the Energy Wise program operates only on the island of Kauai, Lucas cannot satisfy the jurisdictional requirements of § 13.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Scope > General Overview

HN1[] Sherman Act, Scope

Section 1 of the Sherman Act prohibits every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States. 15 U.S.C.S. § 1. While § 1 could be interpreted to proscribe all contracts, the United States Supreme Court has never taken a literal approach to its language. Rather, the Supreme Court has repeated time and again that § 1 outlaws only unreasonable restraints.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Sherman Act

HN2[] Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason, Sherman Act

The rule of reason is the accepted standard for testing whether a practice restrains trade in violation of § 1 (15 U.S.C.S. § 1) of the Sherman Act. Under this rule, the factfinder weighs all of the circumstances of a case in deciding whether a restrictive practice should be prohibited as imposing an unreasonable restraint on competition. Appropriate factors to take into account include specific information about the relevant business and the restraint's history, nature, and effect. Whether the businesses involved have market power is a further, significant consideration. In its design and function the rule distinguishes between restraints with anticompetitive effect that are harmful to the consumer and restraints stimulating competition that are in the consumer's best interest.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN3[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

The rule of reason does not govern all restraints. Some types are deemed unlawful per se. The per se rule, treating categories of restraints as necessarily illegal, eliminates the need to study the reasonableness of an individual restraint in light of the real market forces at work, and, it must be acknowledged, the per se rule can give clear guidance for certain conduct. Restraints that are per se unlawful include horizontal agreements among competitors to fix prices or to divide markets.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN4[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

Resort to per se rules is confined to restraints that would always or almost always tend to restrict competition and decrease output. To justify a per se prohibition a restraint must have "manifestly anticompetitive" effects, and lack any redeeming virtue. As a consequence, the per se rule is appropriate only after courts have had considerable experience with the type of restraint at issue, and only if courts can predict with confidence that it would be invalidated in all or almost all instances under the rule of reason. It should come as no surprise, then, that the United States Supreme Court has expressed reluctance to adopt per se rules with regard to restraints imposed in the context of business relationships where the economic impact of certain practices is not immediately obvious. And a departure from the rule-of-reason standard must be based upon demonstrable economic effect rather than upon formalistic line drawing.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN5[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

The United States Supreme Court should be cautious about putting dispositive weight on doctrines from antiquity but of slight relevance. The state of the common law 400 or even 100 years ago is irrelevant to the issue of the effect of the antitrust laws upon vertical distributional restraints in the American economy today.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN6[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

The United States Supreme Court has rejected the approach of reliance on rules governing horizontal restraints when defining rules applicable to vertical ones. The Supreme Court's recent cases formulate antitrust principles in accordance with the appreciated differences in economic effect between vertical and horizontal agreements.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > Price Fixing

HN7[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

A horizontal cartel among competing manufacturers or competing retailers that decreases output or reduces competition in order to increase price is, and ought to be, per se unlawful. To the extent a vertical agreement setting minimum resale prices is entered upon to facilitate either type of cartel, it, too, would need to be held unlawful under the rule of reason. This type of agreement may also be useful evidence for a plaintiff attempting to prove the existence of a horizontal cartel.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > Resale Price Maintenance

HN8[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

Notwithstanding the risks of unlawful conduct, it cannot be stated with any degree of confidence that resale price maintenance always or almost always tends to restrict competition and decrease output. Vertical agreements establishing minimum resale prices can have either procompetitive or anticompetitive effects, depending upon the circumstances in which they are formed.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN9[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

The United States Supreme Court has explained that administrative advantages are not sufficient in themselves to justify the creation of per se rules, and has relegated their use to restraints that are "manifestly anticompetitive." There are traditional "demanding standards" for adopting per se rules.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN13[] Sherman Act, Scope

The general presumption that legislative changes should be left to Congress has less force with respect to the Sherman Act. From the beginning the United States Supreme Court has treated the Sherman Act as a common-law statute. Just as the common law adapts to modern understanding and greater experience, so too does the Sherman Act's prohibition on "restraints of trade" evolve to meet the dynamics of present economic conditions. The case-by-case adjudication contemplated by the rule of reason has implemented this common-law approach. Likewise, the boundaries of the doctrine of per se illegality should not be immovable.

Decision

[*623] Manufacturer's agreement with distributor on minimum price that distributor could charge for manufacturer's goods held not per se illegal under § 1 of Sherman Act (15 U.S.C.S. § 1); vertical price restraints held required to be judged by rule of reason.

Summary

Procedural posture: Respondent retailer sued petitioner manufacturer, alleging an antitrust violation under § 1 (15 U.S.C.S. § 1) of the Sherman Act. Under the per se rule, the district court excluded the manufacturer's expert testimony regarding the procompetitive effects of its pricing policy. A jury found for the retailer, and the district court trebled the damages. The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirmed. Certiorari was granted.

Overview: The manufacturer instituted a retail pricing and promotion policy, refusing to sell to retailers that discounted its goods below suggested prices. The manufacturer planned to introduce expert testimony describing the procompetitive effects of its pricing policy, but the district court excluded the testimony, relying on the rule that it was per se illegal under the Sherman Act for a manufacturer to agree with its distributor to set the minimum price the distributor could charge for the manufacturer's goods. The United States Supreme Court decided to overrule the per se rule and determined that vertical price restraints were to be judged according to the rule of reason. The rule of reason was the appropriate standard to judge vertical price restraints and vertical minimum resale price maintenance agreements because (1) procompetitive justifications existed for a manufacturer's use of resale price maintenance, (2) the primary purpose of the antitrust laws was to protect interbrand competition, (3) administrative advantages were not sufficient in themselves to justify the creation of per se rules, and (4) stare decisis did not compel the Court's continued adherence to the per se rule.

[*624] Outcome: The Court reversed the appellate court's judgment and remanded the case for further proceedings.

The United States Supreme Court's decision in Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co., 220 U.S. 373, 31 S. Ct. 376, 55 L. Ed. 502 (1911), is now overruled. Vertical price restraints are to be judged according to the rule of reason.

Syllabus

[*628] Given its policy of refusing to sell to retailers that discount its goods below suggested prices, petitioner (Leegin) stopped selling to respondent's (PSKS) store. PSKS filed suit, alleging, inter alia, that Leegin violated the antitrust laws by entering into vertical agreements with its retailers to set minimum resale prices. The District Court excluded expert testimony about Leegin's pricing policy's procompetitive effects on the ground that Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co., 220 U.S. 373, 31 S. Ct. 376, 55 L. Ed. 502, makes it per se illegal under § 1 of the Sherman Act for a manufacturer and [*2] its distributor to agree on the minimum price the distributor can charge for the manufacturer's goods. At trial, PSKS alleged that Leegin and its retailers had agreed to fix prices, but Leegin argued that its pricing policy was lawful under § 1. The jury found for PSKS. On appeal, the Fifth Circuit declined to apply the rule of reason to Leegin's vertical price-fixing agreements and affirmed, finding that Dr. Miles' per se rule rendered irrelevant any procompetitive justifications for Leegin's policy.

Held:

Dr. Miles is overruled, and vertical price restraints are to be judged by the rule of reason. Pp. 5-28.

[*629] (a) The accepted standard for testing whether a practice restrains trade in violation of § 1 is the rule of reason, which requires the factfinder to weigh "all of the circumstances," Continental T. Ed. 2d 199. The rule distinguishes between restraints with anticompetitive effect that are harmful to the consumer and those with procompetitive [*3] effect that are in the consumer's best interest. However, when a restraint is deemed "unlawful per se," ibid., the need to study an individual restraint's reasonableness in light of real market forces is eliminated, Business Electronics Corp. v. Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc., 441 U.S. 1, 9, 99 S. Ct. 1551, 60 L. Ed. 2d 1, and only if they can predict with confidence that the restraint would be invalidated in all or almost all instances under the rule of reason, see Arizona v. Maricopa County Medical Soc., 457 U.S. 332, 344, 102 S. Ct. 2466, 73 L. Ed. 2d 48. Pp. 5-7.

(b) Because the reasons upon which Dr. Miles relied do not justify a per se rule, it is necessary to examine, in the first instance, the economic effects of vertical agreements to fix minimum resale prices and to determine whether the per se rule is [*4] nonetheless appropriate. Were this Court considering the issue as an original matter, the rule of reason, not a per se rule of unlawfulness, would be the appropriate standard to judge vertical price restraints. Pp. 7-19.

(1) Economics literature is replete with procompetitive justifications for a manufacturer's use of resale price maintenance, and the few recent studies on the subject also cast doubt on the conclusion that the practice meets the criteria for a per se rule. The justifications for vertical price restraints are similar to those for other vertical restraints. Minimum resale price maintenance can stimulate interbrand competition among manufacturers selling different brands of the same type of product by reducing intrabrand competition among retailers selling the same brand. This is important because the antitrust laws' "primary purpose . . . is to protect interbrand competition," Khan, supra, at 15, 118 S. Ct. 275, 139 L. Ed. 2d 199. A single manufacturer's use of vertical price restraints tends to eliminate intrabrand price competition; this in turn encourages retailers to invest in services or promotional efforts that aid the manufacturer's position as against rival manufacturers. [*5] Resale price maintenance may also give consumers more options to choose among low-price, low-service brands; high-price, high-service brands; and brands falling in between. Absent vertical price restraints, retail services that enhance interbrand competition might be underprovided because discounting retailers can free ride on retailers who furnish services and then capture some of the demand those services generate. Retail price maintenance can also increase interbrand competition [630] by facilitating market entry for new firms and brands and by encouraging retailer services that would not be provided even absent free riding. Pp. 9-12.

(2) Setting minimum resale prices may also have anticompetitive effects; and unlawful price fixing, designed solely to obtain monopoly profits, is an ever-present temptation. Resale price maintenance may, for example, facilitate a manufacturer cartel or be used to organize retail cartels. It can also be abused by a powerful manufacturer or retailer. Thus, the potential anticompetitive consequences of vertical price restraints must not be ignored or underestimated. Pp. 12-14.

(3) Notwithstanding the risks of unlawful conduct, it cannot be stated [*6] with any degree of confidence that retail price maintenance "always or almost always tend[s] to restrict competition and decrease output," Business Electronics, supra, at 723, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808. Vertical retail price agreements have either procompetitive or anticompetitive effects, depending on the circumstances in which they were formed; and the limited empirical evidence available does not suggest efficient uses of the agreements are infrequent or hypothetical. A per se rule should not be adopted for administrative convenience alone. Such rules can be counterproductive, increasing the antitrust system's total cost by prohibiting procompetitive conduct the antitrust laws should encourage. And a per se rule cannot be justified by the possibility of higher prices absent a further showing of anticompetitive conduct. The antitrust laws primarily are designed to protect interbrand competition from which lower prices can later result. Respondent's argument overlooks that, in general, the interests of manufacturers and consumers are aligned with respect to retailer profit margins. Resale price maintenance has economic dangers. If the rule of reason were to apply, courts would have to [*7] be diligent in eliminating their anticompetitive uses from the market. Factors relevant to the inquiry are the number of manufacturers using the practice, the restraint's source, and a manufacturer's market power. The rule of reason is designed and used to ascertain whether transactions are anticompetitive or procompetitive. This standard principle applies to vertical price restraints. As courts gain experience with these restraints by applying the rule of reason over the course of decisions, they can establish the litigation structure to ensure the rule operates to eliminate anticompetitive restraints from the market and to provide more guidance to businesses. Pp. 14-19.

(c) Stare decisis does not compel continued adherence to the per se rule here. Because the Sherman Act is treated as a common-law statute, its prohibition on "restraint[s] of trade" evolves to meet the dynamics of present economic conditions. The rule of reason's case-by-case adjudication implements this common-law approach. Here, respected economics authorities suggest that the per se rule is inappropriate. And both the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission recommend replacing the [*8] per se rule with the rule of reason. In addition, this Court has "overruled [its] precedents when subsequent cases have undermined their doctrinal underpinnings." Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428, 443, 120 S. Ct. 2326, 147 L. Ed. 2d 405. It is not surprising that the Court has distanced itself from Dr. Miles' rationales, for the case was decided not long [631] after the Sherman Act was enacted, when the Court had little experience with antitrust analysis. Only eight years after Dr. Miles, the Court reined in the decision, holding that a manufacturer can suggest resale prices and refuse to deal with distributors who do not follow them, United States v. Colgate & Co., 250 U.S. 300, 307-308, 39 S. Ct. 465, 63 L. Ed. 992, 1919 Dec. Comm'r Pat. 460; and more recently the Court has tempered, limited, or overruled once strict vertical restraint prohibitions, see, e.g., GTE Sylvania, 433 U.S., at 57-59, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568. The Dr. Miles rule is also inconsistent with a principled framework, for it makes little economic sense when analyzed with the Court's other vertical restraint cases. Deciding that procompetitive effects of resale price maintenance are insufficient to overrule Dr. Miles would call into question cases such [*9] as Colgate and GTE Sylvania. Respondent's arguments for reaffirming Dr. Miles based on stare decisis do not require a different result. Pp. 19-28.

In Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co., 220 U.S. 373, 31 S. Ct. 376, 55 L. Ed. 502 (1911), the Court established the rule that it is per se illegal under § 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, for a manufacturer to agree with its distributor to set the minimum price the distributor can charge for the manufacturer's goods. The question presented by the instant case is [*882] whether the Court should overrule the per se rule and allow resale price maintenance agreements to be judged by the rule of reason, the usual standard applied to determine if there is a violation of § 1. The Court has abandoned the rule of per se illegality for other vertical restraints [*10] a manufacturer imposes on its distributors. Respected economic analysts, furthermore, conclude that vertical price restraints can have procompetitive effects. We now hold that Dr. Miles should be overruled and that vertical price restraints are to be judged by the rule of reason.

I

Petitioner, Leegin Creative Leather Products, Inc. (Leegin), designs, manufactures, and distributes leather goods and accessories. In 1991, Leegin began to sell belts under the brand name "Brighton." The Brighton brand has now expanded into a variety of women's fashion accessories. It is sold across the United States in over 5,000 retail establishments, for the most part independent, small boutiques and specialty stores. Leegin's president, Jerry Kohl, also has an interest in about 70 stores that sell Brighton products. Leegin asserts that, at least for its products, small retailers treat customers better, [2711] provide customers more services, and make their shopping experience more satisfactory than do larger, often impersonal retailers. Kohl explained: "[W]e want the consumers to get a different experience than they get in Sam's Club or in Wal-Mart. And you can't get that kind of experience or support or [*11] customer service from a store like Wal-Mart." 5 Record 127.

[*632] Respondent, PSKS, Inc. (PSKS), operates Kay's Kloset, a women's apparel store in Lewisville, Texas. Kay's Kloset buys from about 75 different manufacturers and at one time sold the Brighton brand. It first started purchasing Brighton goods from Leegin in 1995. Once it began selling the brand, the store promoted Brighton. For example, it ran Brighton advertisements and had Brighton days in the store. [*883] Kay's Kloset became the destination retailer in the area to buy Brighton products. Brighton was the store's most important brand and once accounted for 40 to 50 percent of its profits.

In 1997, Leegin instituted the "Brighton Retail Pricing and Promotion Policy." 4 id., at 939. Following the policy, Leegin refused to sell to retailers that discounted Brighton goods below suggested prices. The policy contained an exception for products not selling well that the retailer did not plan on reordering. In the letter to retailers establishing the policy, Leegin stated:

> "In this age of mega stores like Macy's, Bloomingdales, May Co. and others, consumers are perplexed by promises of product quality and support [*12] of product which we believe is lacking in these large stores. Consumers are further confused by the ever popular sale, sale, sale, etc.
> "We, at Leegin, choose to break away from the pack by selling [at] specialty stores; specialty stores that can offer the customer great quality merchandise, superb service, and support the Brighton product 365 days a year on a consistent basis.
> "We realize that half the equation is Leegin producing great Brighton product and the other half is you, our retailer, creating great looking stores selling our products in a quality manner." Ibid.

Leegin adopted the policy to give its retailers sufficient margins to provide customers the service central to its distribution strategy. It also expressed concern that discounting harmed Brighton's brand image and reputation.

A year after instituting the pricing policy Leegin introduced a marketing strategy known as the "Heart Store Program." See id., at 962-972. It offered retailers incentives to become Heart Stores, and, in exchange, retailers pledged, among other things, to sell at Leegin's suggested prices. Kay's Kloset became a Heart Store soon after Leegin created [*884] the program. After a Leegin [*13] employee visited the store and found it unattractive, the parties appear to have agreed that Kay's Kloset would not be a Heart Store beyond 1998. Despite losing this status, Kay's Kloset continued to increase its Brighton sales.

In December 2002, Leegin discovered Kay's Kloset had been marking down Brighton's entire line by 20 percent. Kay's Kloset contended it placed Brighton products on sale to compete with nearby retailers who also were undercutting Leegin's suggested prices. Leegin, nonetheless, requested that Kay's Kloset cease discounting. Its request refused, Leegin stopped selling to the store. The loss of the Brighton brand had a considerable negative impact on the store's revenue from sales.

[2712] PSKS sued Leegin in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Texas. It alleged, among other claims, that Leegin had violated the antitrust laws by "enter[ing] into [633] agreements with retailers to charge only those prices fixed by Leegin." Id., at 1236. Leegin planned to introduce expert testimony describing the procompetitive effects of its pricing policy. The District Court excluded the testimony, relying on the per se rule established by Dr. Miles. At trial [*14] PSKS argued that the Heart Store program, among other things, demonstrated Leegin and its retailers had agreed to fix prices. Leegin responded that it had established a unilateral pricing policy lawful under § 1, which applies only to concerted action. See United States v. Colgate & Co., 250 U.S. 300, 307, 39 S. Ct. 465, 63 L. Ed. 992, 1919 Dec. Comm'r Pat. 460 (1919). The jury agreed with PSKS and awarded it $1.2 million. Pursuant to 15 U.S.C. § 15(a), the District Court trebled the damages and reimbursed PSKS for its attorney's fees and costs. It entered judgment against Leegin in the amount of $3,975,000.80.

The Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirmed. 171 Fed. Appx. 464 (2006) (per curiam). On appeal Leegin did not dispute that it had entered into vertical price-fixing agreements with its retailers. Rather, it contended that the [*885] rule of reason should have applied to those agreements. The Court of Appeals rejected this argument. Id., at 466-467. It was correct to explain that it remained bound by Dr. Miles "[b]ecause [the Supreme] Court has consistently applied the per se rule to [vertical minimum price-fixing] agreements." 171 Fed. Appx., at 466. [*15]

On this premise the Court of Appeals held that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the testimony of Leegin's economic expert, for the per se rule rendered irrelevant any procompetitive justifications for Leegin's pricing policy. Id., at 467. We granted certiorari to determine whether vertical minimum resale price maintenance agreements should continue to be treated as per se unlawful. 549 U.S. 1092, 127 S. Ct. 763, 166 L. Ed. 2d 590 (2006)

HN1[] LEdHN[] Section 1 of the Sherman Act prohibits "[e]very contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States." Ch. 647, 26 Stat. 209, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 1. While § 1 could be interpreted to proscribe all contracts, see, e.g., Board of Trade of Chicago v. United States, 246 U.S. 231, 238, 38 S. Ct. 242, 62 L. Ed. 683 (1918), the Court has never "taken a literal approach to [its] language," Texaco Inc. v. Dagher, 547 U.S. 1, 5, 126 S. Ct. 1276, 164 L. Ed. 2d 1 (2006). Rather, the Court has repeated time and again that § 1 "outlaw[s] only unreasonable restraints." State Oil Co. v. Khan, 522 U.S. 3, 10, 118 S. Ct. 275, 139 L. Ed. 2d 199 (1997).

HN2[] LEdHN[2][] [2] The rule of reason [*16] is the accepted standard for testing whether a practice restrains trade in violation of § 1. See Texaco, supra, at 5, 126 S. Ct. 1276, 164 L. Ed. 2d 1. "Under this rule, the factfinder weighs all of the circumstances of a case in deciding whether a restrictive practice should be prohibited as imposing an unreasonable restraint on competition." Continental T. V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania Inc., 433 U.S. 36, 49, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568 (1977). Appropriate factors to take into account include "specific information about the relevant business" and "the restraint's history, nature, and effect." Khan, supra, at 10, 118 S. Ct. 275, 139 L. Ed. 2d 199. Whether the businesses [*886] involved have market power is [634] a further, significant consideration. See, e.g., Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 768, 104 S. Ct. 2731, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628 (1984) (equating the rule of [2713] reason with "an inquiry into market power and market structure designed to assess [a restraint's] actual effect"); see also Illinois Tool Works Inc. v. Independent Ink, Inc., 547 U.S. 28, 45-46, 126 S. Ct. 1281, 164 L. Ed. 2d 26 (2006). In its design and function the rule distinguishes between restraints with anticompetitive effect that are harmful to the consumer and restraints stimulating [*17] competition that are in the consumer's best interest.

HN3[] LEdHN[3][] [3] The rule of reason does not govern all restraints. Some types "are deemed unlawful per se." Khan, supra, at 10, 118 S. Ct. 275, 139 L. Ed. 2d 199. The per se rule, treating categories of restraints as necessarily illegal, eliminates the need to study the reasonableness of an individual restraint in light of the real market forces at work, Business Electronics Corp. v. Sharp Electronics Corp., 485 U.S. 717, 723, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808 (1988); and, it must be acknowledged, the per se rule can give clear guidance for certain conduct. Restraints that are per se unlawful include horizontal agreements among competitors to fix prices, see Texaco, supra, at 5, 126 S. Ct. 1276, 164 L. Ed. 2d 1, or to divide markets, see Palmer v. BRG of Ga., Inc., 498 U.S. 46, 49-50, 111 S. Ct. 401, 112 L. Ed. 2d 349 (1990) (per curiam).

HN4[] LEdHN[4][] [4] Resort to per se rules is confined to restraints, like those mentioned, "that would always or almost always tend to restrict competition and decrease output." Business Electronics, supra, at 723, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808 (internal quotation marks omitted). To justify a per se prohibition a restraint must have "manifestly anticompetitive" effects, [*18] GTE Sylvania, supra, at 50, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568, and "lack . . . any redeeming virtue," Northwest Wholesale Stationers, Inc. v. Pacific Stationery & Printing Co., 472 U.S. 284, 289, 105 S. Ct. 2613, 86 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1985) (internal quotation marks omitted).

As a consequence, the per se rule is appropriate only after courts have had considerable experience with the type of restraint at issue, see Broadcast Music, Inc. v. Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc., 441 U.S. 1, 9, 99 S. Ct. 1551, 60 L. Ed. 2d 1 (1979), and only if courts can predict with confidence that it would be invalidated [*887] in all or almost all instances under the rule of reason, see Arizona v. Maricopa County Medical Soc., 457 U.S. 332, 344, 102 S. Ct. 2466, 73 L. Ed. 2d 48 (1982). It should come as no surprise, then, that "we have expressed reluctance to adopt per se rules with regard to restraints imposed in the context of business relationships where the economic impact of certain practices is not immediately obvious." Khan, supra, at 10, 118 S. Ct. 275, 139 L. Ed. 2d 199 (internal quotation marks omitted); see also White Motor Co. v. United States, 372 U.S. 253, 263, 83 S. Ct. 696, 9 L. Ed. 2d 738 (1963) (refusing to adopt a per se rule for a vertical nonprice restraint [*19] because of the uncertainty concerning whether this type of restraint satisfied the demanding standards necessary to apply a per se rule). And, as we have stated, a "departure from the rule-of-reason standard must be based upon demonstrable economic effect rather than . . . upon formalistic line drawing." GTE Sylvania, supra, at 58-59, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568.

The Court has interpreted Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co., 220 U.S. 373, 31 S. Ct. 376, 55 L. Ed. 502, as establishing a per se rule against a vertical agreement between a manufacturer and its distributor to set minimum resale prices. See, e.g., Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Service Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 761, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775 (1984). In Dr. Miles the plaintiff, a manufacturer of medicines, sold its products only to distributors [2714] who agreed to resell them at set prices. The Court found the manufacturer's control of resale prices to be unlawful. It relied on the common-law rule that "a general restraint upon alienation is ordinarily invalid." 220 U.S., at 404-405, 31 S. Ct. 376, 55 L. Ed. 2d 502. The Court then explained that the agreements would advantage the distributors, not the manufacturer, and were analogous to a combination [*20] among competing distributors, which the law treated as void. Id., at 407-408, 31 S. Ct. 376, 55 L. Ed. 2d 502.

The reasoning of the Court's more recent jurisprudence has rejected the rationales on which Dr. Miles was based. By relying on the common-law rule against restraints on alienation, id., at 404-405, 31 S. Ct. 376, 55 L. Ed. 2d 502, the Court justified its decision [*888] based on "formalistic" legal doctrine rather than "demonstrable economic effect," GTE Sylvania, 433 U.S., at 58-59, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568. The Court in Dr. Miles relied on a treatise published in 1628, but failed to discuss in detail the business reasons that would motivate a manufacturer situated in 1911 to make use of vertical price restraints. Yet the Sherman Act's use of "restraint of trade" "invokes the common law itself, . . . not merely the static content that the common law had assigned to the term in 1890." Business Electronics, supra, at 732, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808. The general restraint on alienation, especially in the age when then-Justice Hughes used the term, tended to evoke policy concerns extraneous to the question that controls here. Usually associated with land, not chattels, the rule arose from restrictions removing real property [*21] from the stream of commerce for generations. HN5[] LEdHN[5][] [5] The Court should be cautious about putting dispositive weight on doctrines from antiquity but of slight relevance. We reaffirm that "the state of the common law 400 or even 100 years ago is irrelevant to the issue before us: the effect of the antitrust laws upon vertical distributional restraints in the American economy today." GTE Sylvania, supra, at 53, n. 21, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568 (internal quotation marks omitted).

Dr. Miles, furthermore, treated vertical agreements a manufacturer makes with its distributors as analogous to a horizontal combination among competing distributors. See 220 U.S., at 407-408, 31 S. Ct. 376, 55 L. Ed. 2d 502. In later cases, however, HN6[] LEdHN[6][] [6] the Court rejected the approach of reliance on rules governing horizontal restraints when defining rules applicable to vertical ones. See, e.g., Business Electronics, supra, at 734, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808 (disclaiming the "notion of equivalence between the scope of horizontal per se illegality and that of vertical per se illegality"); Maricopa County, supra, at 348, n 18, 102 S. Ct. 2466, 73 L. Ed. 2d 48 (noting that "horizontal restraints are generally less defensible than vertical restraints"). Our recent [*22] cases formulate antitrust principles in accordance with the appreciated [636] differences in economic effect between vertical and horizontal agreements, differences the Dr. Miles Court failed to consider.

[*889] The reasons upon which Dr. Miles relied do not justify a per se rule. As a consequence, it is necessary to examine, in the first instance, the economic effects of vertical agreements to fix minimum resale prices, and to determine whether the per se rule is nonetheless appropriate. See Business Electronics, 485 U.S., at 726, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808.

Though each side of the debate can find sources to support its position, it suffices to say here that economics literature is replete with procompetitive justifications for a manufacturer's use of resale price maintenance. See, e.g., Brief for Economists as Amici Curiae 16 ("In the theoretical literature, it is essentially undisputed [2715] that minimum [resale price maintenance] can have procompetitive effects and that under a variety of market conditions it is unlikely to have anticompetitive effects"); Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 9 ("[T]here is a widespread consensus that permitting a manufacturer to control [*23] the price at which its goods are sold may promote *inter*brand competition and consumer welfare in a variety of ways"); ABA Section of Antitrust Law, Antitrust Law and Economics of Product Distribution 76 (2006) ("[T]he bulk of the economic literature on [resale price maintenance] suggests that [it] is more likely to be used to enhance efficiency than for anticompetitive purposes"); see also H. Hovenkamp, The Antitrust Enterprise: Principle and Execution 184-191 (2005) (hereinafter Hovenkamp); R. Bork, The Antitrust Paradox 288-291 (1978) (hereinafter Bork). Even those more skeptical of resale price maintenance acknowledge it can have procompetitive effects. See, e.g., Brief for William S. Comanor et al. as Amici Curiae 3 ("[G]iven [the] diversity of effects [of resale price maintenance], one could reasonably take the position that a rule of reason rather than a per se approach is warranted"); F.Scherer & D. Ross, Industrial Market Structure and Economic Performance 558 (3d ed. 1990) (hereinafter Scherer & Ross) ("The overall balance [*890] between benefits and costs [of resale price maintenance] is probably close").

The few recent studies documenting the competitive [*24] effects of resale price maintenance also cast doubt on the conclusion that the practice meets the criteria for a per se rule. See Bureau of Economics Staff Report to the FTC, T. Overstreet, Resale Price Maintenance: Economic Theories and Empirical Evidence 170 (1983) (hereinafter Overstreet) (noting that "[e]fficient uses of [resale price maintenance] are evidently not unusual or rare"); see also Ippolito, Resale Price Maintenance: Empirical Evidence From Litigation, 34 J. Law & Econ. 263, 292-293 (1991) (hereinafter Ippolito).

The justifications for vertical price restraints are similar to those for other vertical restraints. See GTE Sylvania, 433 U.S., at 54-57, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568. Minimum resale price maintenance can stimulate interbrand competition--the competition among manufacturers selling different brands of the same type of product--by reducing intrabrand competition--the competition among retailers selling the same brand. See id., at 51-52, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568. The promotion [637] of interbrand competition is important because "the primary purpose of the antitrust laws is to protect [this type of] competition." Khan, 522 U.S., at 15, 118 S. Ct. 275, 139 L. Ed. 2d 199. A single manufacturer's use of vertical price restraints [*25] tends to eliminate intrabrand price competition; this in turn encourages retailers to invest in tangible or intangible services or promotional efforts that aid the manufacturer's position as against rival manufacturers. Resale price maintenance also has the potential to give consumers more options so that they can choose among low-price, low-service brands; high-price, high-service brands; and brands that fall in between.

Absent vertical price restraints, the retail services that enhance interbrand competition might be underprovided. This is because discounting retailers can free ride on retailers who furnish services and then capture some of the increased demand those services generate. GTE Sylvania, supra, at 55, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568. Consumers might learn, for example, about [*891] the benefits of a manufacturer's product from a retailer that invests in fine showrooms, offers product demonstrations, or hires and trains knowledgeable employees. R. Posner, Antitrust Law 172-173 (2d ed. 2001) (hereinafter Posner). Or consumers might decide to buy the product because [2716] they see it in a retail establishment that has a reputation for selling high-quality merchandise. Marvel & McCafferty, Resale [*26] Price Maintenance and Quality Certification, 15 Rand J. Econ. 346, 347-349 (1984) (hereinafter Marvel & McCafferty). If the consumer can then buy the product from a retailer that discounts because it has not spent capital providing services or developing a quality reputation, the high-service retailer will lose sales to the discounter, forcing it to cut back its services to a level lower than consumers would otherwise prefer. Minimum resale price maintenance alleviates the problem because it prevents the discounter from undercutting the service provider. With price competition decreased, the manufacturer's retailers compete among themselves over services.

Resale price maintenance, in addition, can increase interbrand competition by facilitating market entry for new firms and brands. "[N]ew manufacturers and manufacturers entering new markets can use the restrictions in order to induce competent and aggressive retailers to make the kind of investment of capital and labor that is often required in the distribution of products unknown to the consumer." GTE Sylvania, supra, at 55, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568; see Marvel & McCafferty 349 (noting that reliance on a retailer's reputation "will decline [*27] as the manufacturer's brand becomes better known, so that [resale price maintenance] may be particularly important as a competitive device for new entrants"). New products and new brands are essential to a dynamic economy, and if markets can be penetrated by using resale price maintenance there is a procompetitive effect.

Resale price maintenance can also increase interbrand competition by encouraging retailer services that would not [*892] be provided even absent free riding. It may be difficult and inefficient for a manufacturer to make and enforce a contract with a retailer specifying the different services the retailer must perform. Offering the retailer a guaranteed margin and threatening termination if it does not live up to expectations may be the [638] most efficient way to expand the manufacturer's market share by inducing the retailer's performance and allowing it to use its own initiative and experience in providing valuable services. See Mathewson & Winter, The Law and Economics of Resale Price Maintenance, 13 Rev. Indus. Org. 57, 74-75 (1998) (hereinafter Mathewson & Winter); Klein & Murphy, Vertical Restraints as Contract Enforcement Mechanisms, 31 J. Law & Econ. 265, 295 (1988); [*28] see also Deneckere, Marvel, & Peck, Demand Uncertainty, Inventories, and Resale Price Maintenance, 111 Q. J. Econ. 885, 911 (1996) (noting that resale price maintenance may be beneficial to motivate retailers to stock adequate inventories of a manufacturer's goods in the face of uncertain consumer demand).

While vertical agreements setting minimum resale prices can have procompetitive justifications, they may have anticompetitive effects in other cases; and unlawful price fixing, designed solely to obtain monopoly profits, is an ever-present temptation. Resale price maintenance may, for example, facilitate a manufacturer cartel. See Business Electronics, 485 U.S., at 725, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808. An unlawful cartel will seek to discover if some manufacturers are undercutting the cartel's fixed prices. Resale price maintenance could assist the cartel in identifying price-cutting manufacturers who benefit from the lower prices they offer. Resale price maintenance, furthermore, could discourage a manufacturer from cutting prices to retailers with the concomitant benefit of cheaper prices to [2717] consumers. See ibid.; see also Posner 172; Overstreet 19-23.

[*893] Vertical price restraints also "might [*29] be used to organize cartels at the retailer level." Business Electronics, supra, at 725-726, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808. A group of retailers might collude to fix prices to consumers and then compel a manufacturer to aid the unlawful arrangement with resale price maintenance. In that instance the manufacturer does not establish the practice to stimulate services or to promote its brand but to give inefficient retailers higher profits. Retailers with better distribution systems and lower cost structures would be prevented from charging lower prices by the agreement. See Posner 172; Overstreet 13-19. Historical examples suggest this possibility is a legitimate concern. See, e.g., Marvel & McCafferty, The Welfare Effects of Resale Price Maintenance, 28 J. Law & Econ. 363, 373 (1985) (hereinafter Marvel) (providing an example of the power of the National Association of Retail Druggists to compel manufacturers to use resale price maintenance); Hovenkamp 186 (suggesting that the retail druggists in Dr. Miles formed a cartel and used manufacturers to enforce it).

HN7[] LEdHN[7][] [7] A horizontal cartel among competing manufacturers or competing retailers that decreases output or reduces competition [*30] in order to increase price is, and ought to be, per se unlawful. See Texaco, 547 U.S., at 5, 126 S. Ct. 1276, 164 L. Ed. 2d 1; GTE Sylvania, 433 U.S., at 58, n 28, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568. To the extent a vertical agreement setting minimum resale prices is entered upon to facilitate either type of cartel, it, too, would need to be held unlawful under the rule of reason. This type of agreement may also be useful evidence for a plaintiff attempting to prove the existence of a horizontal cartel.

[*639] Resale price maintenance, furthermore, can be abused by a powerful manufacturer or retailer. A dominant retailer, for example, might request resale price maintenance to forestall innovation in distribution that decreases costs. A manufacturer might consider it has little choice but to accommodate the retailer's demands for vertical price restraints if the manufacturer believes it needs access to the retailer's [*894] distribution network. See Overstreet 31; 8 P. Areeda & H. Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law 47 (2d ed. 2004) (hereinafter Areeda & Hovenkamp); cf. Toys "R" Us, Inc. v. FTC, 221 F.3d 928, 937-938 (CA7 2000). A manufacturer with market power, by comparison, might use resale price maintenance to give [*31] retailers an incentive not to sell the products of smaller rivals or new entrants. See, e.g., Marvel 366-368. As should be evident, the potential anticompetitive consequences of vertical price restraints must not be ignored or underestimated.

HN8[] LEdHN[8][] [8] Notwithstanding the risks of unlawful conduct, it cannot be stated with any degree of confidence that resale price maintenance "always or almost always tend[s] to restrict competition and decrease output." Business Electronics, supra, at 723, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808 (internal quotation marks omitted). Vertical agreements establishing minimum resale prices can have either procompetitive or anticompetitive effects, depending upon the circumstances in which they are formed. And although the empirical evidence on the topic is limited, it does not suggest efficient uses of the agreements are infrequent or hypothetical. See Overstreet 170; see also id., at 80 (noting that for the majority of enforcement actions brought by the Federal Trade Commission between 1965 and 1982, "the use of [resale price maintenance] was not likely motivated by collusive dealers who had successfully coerced their suppliers"); Ippolito 292 (reaching a similar conclusion). [*32] [2718] As the rule would proscribe a significant amount of procompetitive conduct, these agreements appear ill suited for per se condemnation.

Respondent contends, nonetheless, that vertical price restraints should be per se unlawful because of the administrative convenience of per se rules. See, e.g., GTE Sylvania, supra, at 50, n. 16, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568 (noting "per se rules tend to provide guidance to the business community and to minimize the burdens on litigants and the judicial system"). That argument suggests [*895] per se illegality is the rule rather than the exception. This misinterprets our antitrust law. Per se rules may decrease administrative costs, but that is only part of the equation. Those rules can be counterproductive. They can increase the total cost of the antitrust system by prohibiting procompetitive conduct the antitrust laws should encourage. See Easterbrook, Vertical Arrangements and the Rule of Reason, 53 Antitrust L. J. 135, 158 (1984) (hereinafter Easterbrook). They also may increase litigation costs by promoting frivolous suits against legitimate practices. HN9[] LEdHN[9][] [9] The Court has thus explained that administrative "advantages are not sufficient [*33] in themselves to justify the creation of per se rules," GTE Sylvania, 433 U.S., at 50, n. 16, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568, and has relegated their use to restraints that are "manifestly anticompetitive," id., at 49-50, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568. Were the Court now to conclude [640] that vertical price restraints should be per se illegal based on administrative costs, we would undermine, if not overrule, the traditional "demanding standards" for adopting per se rules. Id., at 50, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568. Any possible reduction in administrative costs cannot alone justify the Dr. Miles rule.

Respondent also argues the per se rule is justified because a vertical price restraint can lead to higher prices for the manufacturer's goods. See also Overstreet 160 (noting that "price surveys indicate that [resale price maintenance] in most cases increased the prices of products sold"). Respondent is mistaken in relying on pricing effects absent a further showing of anticompetitive conduct. Cf. id., at 106 (explaining that price surveys "do not necessarily tell us anything conclusive about the welfare effects of [resale price maintenance] because the results are generally consistent with [*34] both procompetitive and anticompetitive theories"). For, as has been indicated already, HN10[] LEdHN[10][] [10] the antitrust laws are designed primarily to protect interbrand competition, from which lower prices can later result. See Khan, 522 U.S., at 15, 118 S. Ct. 275, 139 L. Ed. 2d 199. The Court, moreover, has evaluated other vertical restraints under the rule of reason even though prices can be [*896] increased in the course of promoting procompetitive effects. See, e.g., Business Electronics, 485 U.S., at 728, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808. And resale price maintenance may reduce prices if manufacturers have resorted to costlier alternatives of controlling resale prices that are not per se unlawful. See infra, at 902-904, 168 L. Ed. 2d, at 643-646; see also Marvel 371.

Respondent's argument, furthermore, overlooks that, in general, the interests of manufacturers and consumers are aligned with respect to retailer profit margins. The difference between the price a manufacturer charges retailers and the price retailers charge consumers represents part of the manufacturer's cost of distribution, which, like any other cost, the manufacturer usually desires to minimize. See GTE Sylvania, 433 U.S., at 56, n 24, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568; see also id., at 56, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568 [*35] ("Economists . . . have argued that manufacturers have an economic interest in maintaining as much intrabrand competition as is consistent with the efficient distribution of their products"). A manufacturer [2719] has no incentive to overcompensate retailers with unjustified margins. The retailers, not the manufacturer, gain from higher retail prices. The manufacturer often loses; interbrand competition reduces its competitiveness and market share because consumers will "substitute a different brand of the same product." Id., at 52, n 19, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568; see Business Electronics, supra, at 725, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808. As a general matter, therefore, a single manufacturer will desire to set minimum resale prices only if the "increase in demand resulting from enhanced service . . . will more than offset a negative impact on demand of a higher retail price." Mathewson & Winter 67.

The implications of respondent's position are far reaching. Many decisions a manufacturer makes and carries out through concerted action can lead to higher prices. A manufacturer might, for example, contract with different suppliers to obtain better inputs that improve product quality. Or it might hire an advertising [*36] agency to [641] promote awareness of its goods. Yet no one would think these actions violate the [*897] Sherman Act because they lead to higher prices. The antitrust laws do not require manufacturers to produce generic goods that consumers do not know about or want. The manufacturer strives to improve its product quality or to promote its brand because it believes this conduct will lead to increased demand despite higher prices. The same can hold true for resale price maintenance.

Resale price maintenance, it is true, does have economic dangers. If the rule of reason were to apply to vertical price restraints, courts would have to be diligent in eliminating their anticompetitive uses from the market. This is a realistic objective, and certain factors are relevant to the inquiry. For example, the number of manufacturers that make use of the practice in a given industry can provide important instruction. When only a few manufacturers lacking market power adopt the practice, there is little likelihood it is facilitating a manufacturer cartel, for a cartel then can be undercut by rival manufacturers. See Overstreet 22; Bork 294. Likewise, a retailer cartel is unlikely when only a single manufacturer [*37] in a competitive market uses resale price maintenance. Interbrand competition would divert consumers to lower priced substitutes and eliminate any gains to retailers from their price-fixing agreement over a single brand. See Posner 172; Bork 292. Resale price maintenance should be subject to more careful scrutiny, by contrast, if many competing manufacturers adopt the practice. Cf. Scherer & Ross 558 (noting that "except when [resale price maintenance] spreads to cover the bulk of an industry's output, depriving consumers of a meaningful choice between high-service and low-price outlets, most [resale price maintenance arrangements] are probably innocuous"); Easterbrook 162 (suggesting that "every one of the potentially-anti-competitive outcomes of vertical arrangements depends on the uniformity of the practice").

The source of the restraint may also be an important consideration. If there is evidence retailers were the impetus [*898] for a vertical price restraint, there is a greater likelihood that the restraint facilitates a retailer cartel or supports a dominant, inefficient retailer. See Brief for William S. Comanor et al. as Amici Curiae 7-8. If, by contrast, a manufacturer adopted [*38] the policy independent of retailer pressure, the restraint is less likely to promote anticompetitive conduct. Cf. Posner 177 ("It makes all the difference whether minimum retail prices are imposed by the manufacturer in order to evoke point-of-sale services or by the dealers in order to obtain monopoly profits"). A manufacturer also has an incentive to protest inefficient retailer-induced [2720] price restraints because they can harm its competitive position.

As a final matter, that a dominant manufacturer or retailer can abuse resale price maintenance for anticompetitive purposes may not be a serious concern unless the relevant entity has market power. If a retailer lacks market power, manufacturers likely can sell their goods through rival retailers. See also Business Electronics, supra, at 727, n. 2, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808 (noting "[r]etail market power is rare, because of the usual presence of interbrand competition and other dealers"). And if a manufacturer lacks market power, there is less likelihood it can use the practice [642] to keep competitors away from distribution outlets.

HN11[] LEdHN[11][] [11] The rule of reason is designed and used to eliminate anticompetitive transactions from the market. This standard [*39] principle applies to vertical price restraints. A party alleging injury from a vertical agreement setting minimum resale prices will have, as a general matter, the information and resources available to show the existence of the agreement and its scope of operation. As courts gain experience considering the effects of these restraints by applying the rule of reason over the course of decisions, they can establish the litigation structure to ensure the rule operates to eliminate anticompetitive restraints from the market and to provide more guidance to businesses. Courts can, for example, devise rules over time for offering proof, or even presumptions [*899] where justified, to make the rule of reason a fair and efficient way to prohibit anticompetitive restraints and to promote procompetitive ones.

For all of the foregoing reasons, we think that were the Court considering the issue as an original matter, the rule of reason, not a per se rule of unlawfulness, would be the appropriate standard to judge vertical price restraints.

IV

We do not write on a clean slate, for the decision in Dr. Miles is almost a century old. So there is an argument for its retention on the basis of [*40] stare decisis alone. Even if Dr. Miles established an erroneous rule, HN12[] LEdHN[12][] [12] "[s]tare decisis reflects a policy judgment that in most matters it is more important that the applicable rule of law be settled than that it be settled right." Khan, 522 U.S., at 20, 118 S. Ct. 275, 139 L. Ed. 2d 199 (internal quotation marks omitted). And concerns about maintaining settled law are strong when the question is one of statutory interpretation. See, e.g., Hohn v. United States, 524 U.S. 236, 251, 118 S. Ct. 1969, 141 L. Ed. 2d 242 (1998).

Stare decisis is not as significant in this case, however, because the issue before us is the scope of the Sherman Act. Khan, supra, at 20, 118 S. Ct. 275, 139 L. Ed. 2d 199 (HN13[] LEdHN[13][] [13] "[T]he general presumption that legislative changes should be left to Congress has less force with respect to the Sherman Act"). From the beginning the Court has treated the Sherman Act as a common-law statute. See National Soc. of Professional Engineers v. United States, 435 U.S. 679, 688, 98 S. Ct. 1355, 55 L. Ed. 2d 637 (1978); see also Northwest Airlines, Inc. v. Transport Workers Union, 451 U.S. 77, 98, n 42, 101 S. Ct. 1571, 67 L. Ed. 2d 750 (1981) ("In antitrust, the federal courts . . . act more as common-law courts than in other areas governed by federal [*41] statute"). Just as the common law adapts to modern understanding and greater experience, so too does the Sherman Act's prohibition on "restraint[s] of trade" evolve to meet the dynamics of present economic conditions. The case-by-case adjudication contemplated by the rule of reason has implemented this common-law approach. See National Soc. of Professional [*900] Engineers, supra, at 688, 98 S. Ct. 1355, 55 L. Ed. 2d 637. Likewise, the boundaries of [2721] the doctrine of per se illegality should not be immovable. For "[i]t would make no sense to create out of the single term 'restraint of trade' a chronologically schizoid statute, in which a 'rule of reason' evolves with new circumstances and new wisdom, but a line of per se illegality remains forever fixed where it was." Business Electronics, [643] 485 U.S., at 732, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808.

Stare decisis, we conclude, does not compel our continued adherence to the per se rule against vertical price restraints. As discussed earlier, respected authorities in the economics literature suggest the per se rule is inappropriate, and there is now widespread agreement that resale price maintenance can have procompetitive effects. See, e.g., Brief for Economists [*42] as Amici Curiae 16. It is also significant that both the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission--the antitrust enforcement agencies with the ability to assess the long-term impacts of resale price maintenance--have recommended that this Court replace the per se rule with the traditional rule of reason. See Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 6. HN14[] LEdHN[14][] [14] In the antitrust context the fact that a decision has been "called into serious question" justifies our reevaluation of it. Khan, supra, at 21, 118 S. Ct. 275, 139 L. Ed. 2d 199.

Other considerations reinforce the conclusion that Dr. Miles should be overturned. Of most relevance, HN15[] LEdHN[15][] [15] "we have overruled our precedents when subsequent cases have undermined their doctrinal underpinnings." Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428, 443, 120 S. Ct. 2326, 147 L. Ed. 2d 405 (2000). The Court's treatment of vertical restraints has progressed away from Dr. Miles' strict approach. We have distanced ourselves from the opinion's rationales. See supra, at 887-889, 168 L. Ed. 2d, at 635; see also Khan, supra, at 21, 118 S. Ct. 275, 139 L. Ed. 2d 199 (overruling a case when "the views underlying [it had been] eroded by this Court's precedent"); Rodriguez de Quijas v. Shearson/American Express, Inc., 490 U.S. 477, 480-481, 109 S. Ct. 1917, 104 L. Ed. 2d 526 (1989) [*43] (same). This is unsurprising, for the case was decided not long after enactment of the [*901] Sherman Act when the Court had little experience with antitrust analysis. Only eight years after Dr. Miles, moreover, the Court reined in the decision by holding that HN16[] LEdHN[16][] [16] a manufacturer can announce suggested resale prices and refuse to deal with distributors who do not follow them. Colgate, 250 U.S., at 307-308, 39 S. Ct. 465, 63 L. Ed. 2d 992.

In more recent cases the Court, following a common-law approach, has continued to temper, limit, or overrule once strict prohibitions on vertical restraints. In 1977, HN17[🡅] LEdHN[17][🡅] [17] the Court overturned the per se rule for vertical nonprice restraints, adopting the rule of reason in its stead. GTE Sylvania, 433 U.S., at 57-59, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568 (overruling United States v. Arnold, Schwinn & Co., 388 U.S. 365, 87 S. Ct. 1856, 18 L. Ed. 2d 1249 (1967)); see also 433 U.S., at 58, n 29, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568 (noting "that the advantages of vertical restrictions should not be limited to the categories of new entrants and failing firms"). While the Court in a footnote in GTE Sylvania suggested that differences between vertical price and nonprice restraints could support different legal treatment, see id., at 51, n. 18, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568, [*44] the central part of the opinion relied on authorities and arguments that find unequal treatment "difficult to justify," id., at 69-70, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568 (White, J., concurring in judgment).

Continuing in this direction, in two cases in the 1980's the Court defined legal rules to limit the reach of Dr. [644] Miles and to accommodate the doctrines enunciated in [2722] GTE Sylvania and Colgate. See Business Electronics, supra, at 726-728, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808; Monsanto, 465 U.S., at 763-764, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775. In Monsanto, HN18[🡅] LEdHN[18][🡅] [18] the Court required that antitrust plaintiffs alleging a § 1 price-fixing conspiracy must present evidence tending to exclude the possibility a manufacturer and its distributors acted in an independent manner. Id., at 764, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775. Unlike Justice Brennan's concurrence, which rejected arguments that Dr. Miles should be overruled, see 465 U.S., at 769, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775, the Court "decline[d] to reach the question" whether vertical agreements fixing resale prices always should be unlawful because neither party suggested otherwise, id., at 761-762, n 7, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775. In [*902] Business Electronics the Court further narrowed the scope of Dr. Miles. It held that LEdHN[19][🡅] [19] [*45] HN19[🡅] the per se rule applied only to specific agreements over price levels and not to an agreement between a manufacturer and a distributor to terminate a price-cutting distributor. 485 U.S., at 726-727, 735-736, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808.

Most recently, in 1997, after examining the issue of vertical maximum price-fixing agreements in light of commentary and real experience, the Court overruled a 29-year-old precedent treating those agreements as per se illegal. Khan, 522 U.S., at 22, 118 S. Ct. 275, 139 L. Ed. 2d 199 (overruling Albrecht v. Herald Co., 390 U.S. 145, 88 S. Ct. 869, 19 L. Ed. 2d 998 (1968)). It held instead that HN20[🡅] LEdHN[20][🡅] [20] they should be evaluated under the traditional rule of reason. 522 U.S., at 22, 118 S. Ct. 275, 139 L. Ed. 2d 199. Our continued limiting of the reach of the decision in Dr. Miles and our recent treatment of other vertical restraints justify the conclusion that Dr. Miles should not be retained.

The Dr. Miles rule is also inconsistent with a principled framework, for it makes little economic sense when analyzed with our other cases on vertical restraints. If we were to decide the procompetitive effects of resale price maintenance were insufficient to overrule Dr. Miles, then cases such as Colgate and [*46] GTE Sylvania themselves would be called into question. These later decisions, while they may result in less intrabrand competition, can be justified because they permit manufacturers to secure the procompetitive benefits associated with vertical price restraints through other methods. The other methods, however, could be less efficient for a particular manufacturer to establish and sustain. The end result hinders competition and consumer welfare because manufacturers are forced to engage in second-best alternatives and because consumers are required to shoulder the increased expense of the inferior practices.

The manufacturer has a number of legitimate options to achieve benefits similar to those provided by vertical price restraints. A manufacturer can exercise its Colgate right to refuse to deal with retailers that do not follow its suggested prices. See 250 U.S., at 307, 39 S. Ct. 465, 63 L. Ed. 2d 992. The economic effects of unilateral [*903] and concerted price setting are in general the same. See, e.g., Monsanto, 465 U.S., at 762-764, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775. The problem for the manufacturer is that a jury might conclude its unilateral policy was really a vertical agreement, subjecting it to treble damages [*47] and potential criminal liability. Ibid.; Business Electronics, supra, [645] at 728, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808. Even with the stringent standards in Monsanto and Business Electronics, this danger can lead, and has led, rational manufacturers to take wasteful measures. See, e.g., Brief for PING, Inc., as Amicus Curiae 9-18. A manufacturer might refuse to discuss its pricing policy with its distributors except through counsel knowledgeable of the subtle intricacies of the law. Or it might terminate longstanding distributors for minor violations without seeking an explanation. See ibid. The increased costs these burdensome [2723] measures generate flow to consumers in the form of higher prices.

Furthermore, depending on the type of product it sells, a manufacturer might be able to achieve the procompetitive benefits of resale price maintenance by integrating downstream and selling its products directly to consumers. Dr. Miles tilts the relative costs of vertical integration and vertical agreement by making the former more attractive based on the per se rule, not on real market conditions. See Business Electronics, supra, at 725, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808; see generally Coase, The Nature [*48] of the Firm, 4 Economica, New Series 386 (1937). This distortion might lead to inefficient integration that would not otherwise take place, so that consumers must again suffer the consequences of the suboptimal distribution strategy. And integration, unlike vertical price restraints, eliminates all intrabrand competition. See, e.g., GTE Sylvania, supra, at 57, n 26, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568.

There is yet another consideration. A manufacturer can impose territorial restrictions on distributors and allow only one distributor to sell its goods in a given region. Our cases have recognized, and the economics literature confirms, that these vertical nonprice restraints have impacts similar to [*904] those of vertical price restraints; both reduce intrabrand competition and can stimulate retailer services. See, e.g., Business Electronics, supra, at 728, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808; Monsanto, supra, at 762-763, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775; see also Brief for Economists as Amici Curiae 17-18. Cf. Scherer & Ross 560 (noting that vertical nonprice restraints "can engender inefficiencies at least as serious as those imposed upon the consumer by resale price maintenance"); Steiner, How Manufacturers Deal with the Price-Cutting [*49] Retailer: When Are Vertical Restraints Efficient? 65 Antitrust L. J. 407, 446-447 (1997) (indicating that "antitrust law should recognize that the consumer interest is often better served by [resale price maintenance]--contrary to its per se illegality and the rule-of-reason status of vertical nonprice restraints"). The same legal standard (per se unlawfulness) applies to horizontal market division and horizontal price fixing because both have similar economic effect. There is likewise little economic justification for the current differential treatment of vertical price and nonprice restraints. Furthermore, vertical nonprice restraints may prove less efficient for inducing desired services, and they reduce intrabrand competition more than vertical price restraints by eliminating both price and service competition. See Brief for Economists as Amici Curiae 17-18.

In sum, it is a flawed antitrust doctrine that serves the interests of lawyers--by creating legal distinctions that operate as traps for the [646] unwary--more than the interests of consumers--by requiring manufacturers to choose second-best options to achieve sound business objectives.

Respondent's [*50] arguments for reaffirming Dr. Miles on the basis of stare decisis do not require a different result. Respondent looks to congressional action concerning vertical price restraints. In 1937, Congress passed the Miller-Tydings Fair Trade Act, 50 Stat. 693, which made vertical price restraints legal if authorized by a fair trade law [*905] enacted by a State. Fifteen years later, Congress expanded the exemption to permit vertical price-setting agreements between a manufacturer and a distributor to be enforced against other distributors not involved in the agreement. McGuire Act, 66 Stat. 632 . In 1975, however, Congress repealed both Acts. Consumer Goods Pricing Act, 89 Stat. 801 . That the Dr. Miles rule applied to vertical [2724] price restraints in 1975, according to respondent, shows Congress ratified the rule.

This is not so. HN21[] LEdHN[21][] [21] The text of the Consumer Goods Pricing Act did not codify the rule of per se illegality for vertical price restraints. It rescinded statutory provisions that made them per se legal. Congress once again placed these restraints within the ambit of § 1 of the Sherman Act. And, as has been discussed, Congress intended § 1 to give courts the ability "to develop [*51] governing principles of law" in the common-law tradition. Texas Industries, Inc. v. Radcliff Materials, Inc., 451 U.S. 630, 643, 101 S. Ct. 2061, 68 L. Ed. 2d 500 (1981); see Business Electronics, 485 U.S., at 731, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808 ("The changing content of the term 'restraint of trade' was well recognized at the time the Sherman Act was enacted"). Congress could have set the Dr. Miles rule in stone, but it chose a more flexible option. We respect its decision by analyzing vertical price restraints, like all restraints, in conformance with traditional § 1 principles, including the principle that our HN22[] LEdHN[22][] [22] antitrust doctrines "evolv[e] with new circumstances and new wisdom." Business Electronics, supra, at 732, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808; see also Easterbrook 139.

HN23[] LEdHN[23][] [23] The rule of reason, furthermore, is not inconsistent with the Consumer Goods Pricing Act. Unlike the earlier congressional exemption, it does not treat vertical price restraints as per se legal. In this respect, the justifications for the prior exemption are illuminating. Its goal "was to allow the States to protect small retail establishments that Congress thought might otherwise be driven from the marketplace by large-volume discounters." *California Retail Liquor Dealers Ass'n v. Midcal Aluminum, Inc., 445 U.S. 97, 102, [906] 100 S. Ct. 937, 63 L. Ed. 2d 233 (1980). [*52] The state fair trade laws also appear to have been justified on similar grounds. See Areeda & Hovenkamp 298. The rationales for these provisions are foreign to the Sherman Act. Divorced from competition and consumer welfare, they were designed to save inefficient small retailers from their inability to compete. HN24[] LEdHN[24][] [24] The purpose of the antitrust laws, by contrast, is "the protection of competition, not competitors." Atlantic Richfield Co. v. USA Petroleum Co., 495 U.S. 328, 338, 110 S. Ct. 1884, 109 L. Ed. 2d 333 (1990) (internal quotation marks omitted). To the extent Congress repealed the exemption for some vertical price restraints to end its prior practice of encouraging anti-competitive [647] conduct, the rule of reason promotes the same objective.

Respondent also relies on several congressional appropriations in the mid-1980's in which Congress did not permit the Department of Justice or the Federal Trade Commission to use funds to advocate overturning Dr. Miles. See, e.g., 97 Stat. 1071. We need not pause long in addressing this argument. The conditions on funding are no longer in place, see, e.g., Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 21, and they were ambiguous at best. As [*53] much as they might show congressional approval for Dr. Miles, they might demonstrate a different proposition: that Congress could not pass legislation codifying the rule and reached a short-term compromise instead.

Reliance interests do not require us to reaffirm Dr. Miles. To be sure, HN25[] LEdHN[25][] [25] reliance on a judicial opinion is a significant reason to adhere to it, Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U.S. 808, 828, 111 S. Ct. 2597, 115 L. Ed. 2d 720 (1991), especially "in cases involving property and contract rights," Khan, 522 U.S., at 20, 118 S. Ct. 275, 39 L. Ed. 2d 199. The reliance interests here, however, like the reliance interests in Khan, cannot justify an inefficient rule, especially because the narrowness of the rule has allowed manufacturers [2725] to set minimum resale prices in other ways. And while the Dr. Miles rule is longstanding, resale price maintenance was legal under fair trade laws [*907] in a majority of States for a large part of the past century up until 1975.

It is also of note that during this time "when the legal environment in the [United States] was most favorable for [resale price maintenance], no more than a tiny fraction of manufacturers ever employed [resale price maintenance] contracts." [*54] Overstreet 6; see also id., at 169 (noting that "no more than one percent of manufacturers, accounting for no more than ten percent of consumer goods purchases, ever employed [resale price maintenance] in any single year in the [United States]"); Scherer & Ross 549 (noting that "[t]he fraction of U.S. retail sales covered by [resale price maintenance] in its heyday has been variously estimated at from 4 to 10 percent"). To the extent consumers demand cheap goods, judging vertical price restraints under the rule of reason will not prevent the market from providing them. Cf. Easterbrook 152-153 (noting that "S.S. Kresge (the old K-Mart) flourished during the days of manufacturers' greatest freedom" because "discount stores offer a combination of price and service that many customers value" and that "[n]othing in restricted dealing threatens the ability of consumers to find low prices"); Scherer & Ross 557 (noting that "for the most part, the effects of the [Consumer Goods Pricing Act] were imperceptible because the forces of competition had already repealed the [previous antitrust exemption] in their own quiet way").

For these reasons HN26[] LEdHN[26][] [26] the Court's decision in Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co., 220 U.S. 373, 31 S. Ct. 376, 55 L. Ed. 502 (1911), [*55] is now overruled. Vertical price restraints are to be judged according to the rule of reason.

V

Noting that Leegin's president has an ownership interest in retail stores that sell Brighton, respondent claims Leegin participated in an unlawful horizontal cartel with competing [*908] retailers. Respondent did not make this [648] allegation in the lower courts, and we do not consider it here.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed, and the case is remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

Dissent

Justice Breyer, with whom Justice Stevens, Justice Souter, and Justice Ginsburg join, dissenting.

In Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co., 220 U.S. 373, 394, 408-409, 31 S. Ct. 376, 55 L. Ed. 502 (1911), this Court held that an agreement between a manufacturer of proprietary medicines and its dealers to fix the minimum price at which its medicines could be sold was "invalid . . . under the [Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1]." This Court has consistently read Dr. Miles as establishing a bright-line rule that agreements fixing minimum resale prices are per se illegal. See, e.g., United States v. Trenton Potteries Co., 273 U.S. 392, 399-401, 47 S. Ct. 377, 71 L. Ed. 700 (1927); NYNEX Corp. v. Discon, Inc., 525 U.S. 128, 133, 119 S. Ct. 493, 142 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1998). [*56] That per se rule is one upon which the legal profession, business, and the public have relied for close to a century. Today the Court holds that courts must determine the lawfulness of minimum resale price maintenance by applying, not a bright-line per se rule, but a circumstance-specific "rule of reason." Ante, at 907, 168 L. Ed. 2d, at 647. And in doing so it overturns Dr. Miles.

The Court justifies its departure from ordinary considerations of stare decisis by [2726] pointing to a set of arguments well known in the antitrust literature for close to half a century. See ante, at 889-892, 168 L. Ed. 2d, at 636-638. Congress has repeatedly found in these arguments insufficient grounds for overturning the per se rule. See, e.g., Hearings on H. R. 10527 et al. before the Subcommittee on Commerce and Finance of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, 85th Cong., 2d Sess., 74-76, 89, 99, 101-102, 192-195, 261-262 (1958). And, [*909] in my view, they do not warrant the Court's now overturning so well-established a legal precedent.

The Sherman Act seeks to maintain a marketplace free of anticompetitive practices, in particular [*57] those enforced by agreement among private firms. The law assumes that such a marketplace, free of private restrictions, will tend to bring about the lower prices, better products, and more efficient production processes that consumers typically desire. In determining the lawfulness of particular practices, courts often apply a "rule of reason." They examine both a practice's likely anticompetitive effects and its beneficial business justifications. See, e.g., National Collegiate Athletic Ass'n v. Board of Regents, 468 U.S. 85, 109-110, and n 39, 104 S. Ct. 2948, 82 L. Ed. 2d 70 (1984); National Soc. of Professional Engineers v. United States, 435 U.S. 679, 688-691, 98 S. Ct. 1355, 55 L. Ed. 2d 637 (1978); Board of Trade of Chicago v. United States, 246 U.S. 231, 238, 38 S. Ct. 242, 62 L. Ed. 683 (1918).

Nonetheless, sometimes the likely anticompetitive consequences of a particular practice are so serious and the potential justifications so few (or, [649] e.g., so difficult to prove) that courts have departed from a pure "rule of reason" approach. And sometimes this Court has imposed a rule of per se unlawfulness--a rule that instructs courts to find the practice unlawful all (or nearly all) [*58] the time. See, e.g., NYNEX, supra, at 133, 119 S. Ct. 493, 142 L. Ed. 2d 510; Arizona v. Maricopa County Medical Soc., 457 U.S. 332, 343-344, and n 16, 102 S. Ct. 2466, 73 L. Ed. 2d 48 (1982); Continental T. V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania Inc., 433 U.S. 36, 50, n. 16, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568 (1977); United States v. Topco Associates, Inc., 405 U.S. 596, 609-611, 92 S. Ct. 1126, 31 L. Ed. 2d

515 (1972); United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U.S. 150, 213-214, 60 S. Ct. 811, 84 L. Ed. 1129 (1940) (citing and quoting Trenton Potteries, supra, at 397-398, 47 S. Ct. 377, 71 L. Ed. 700).

The case before us asks which kind of approach the courts should follow where minimum resale price maintenance is at issue. Should they apply a per se rule (or a variation) that [*910] would make minimum resale price maintenance always (or almost always) unlawful? Should they apply a "rule of reason"? Were the Court writing on a blank slate, I would find these questions difficult. But, of course, the Court is not writing on a blank slate, and that fact makes a considerable legal difference.

To best explain why the question would be difficult were we deciding it afresh, I briefly summarize several classical arguments for and against the use of a per se rule. The arguments [*59] focus on three sets of considerations, those involving: (1) potential anticompetitive effects, (2) potential benefits, and (3) administration. The difficulty arises out of the fact that the different sets of considerations point in different directions. See, e.g., 8 P. Areeda, Antitrust Law PP 1628-1633, pp 330-392 (1st ed. 1989) (hereinafter Areeda); 8 P. Areeda & H. Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law PP 1628-1633, pp 288-339 (2d ed. 2004) (hereinafter Areeda & Hovenkamp); Easterbrook, Vertical Arrangements and the Rule of Reason, 53 Antitrust L. J. 135, 146-152 (1984) [2727] (hereinafter Easterbrook); Pitofsky, In Defense of Discounters: The No-Frills Case for a Per Se Rule Against Vertical Price Fixing, 71 Geo. L. J. 1487 (1983) (hereinafter Pitofsky); Scherer, The Economics of Vertical Restraints, 52 Antitrust L. J. 687, 706-707 (1983) (hereinafter Scherer); Posner, The Next Step in the Antitrust Treatment of Restricted Distribution: Per Se Legality, 48 U. Chi. L. Rev. 6, 22-26 (1981); Brief for William S. Comanor et al. as Amici Curiae 7-10.

On the one hand, agreements setting minimum resale prices may have serious [*60] anticompetitive consequences. In respect to dealers: Resale price maintenance agreements, rather like horizontal price agreements, can diminish or eliminate price competition among dealers of a single brand or (if practiced generally by manufacturers) among multibrand dealers. In doing so, they can prevent dealers from offering customers the lower prices that many customers prefer; they can prevent dealers from responding to changes [*911] in demand, say, falling demand, by cutting prices; they can encourage dealers to substitute service, for price, competition, thereby threatening wastefully to attract too many resources into that portion of the industry; they can inhibit expansion by more efficient dealers whose lower prices might otherwise attract more customers, stifling the development of new, more efficient [650] modes of retailing; and so forth. See, e.g., 8 Areeda & Hovenkamp P 1632c, at 319-321; Steiner, The Evolution and Applications of Dual-Stage Thinking, 49 The Antitrust Bulletin 877, 899-900 (2004); Comanor, Vertical Price-Fixing, Vertical Market Restrictions, and the New Antitrust Policy, 98 Harv. L. Rev. 983, 990-1000 (1985).

In respect to producers: Resale [*61] price maintenance agreements can help to reinforce the competition-inhibiting behavior of firms in concentrated industries. In such industries firms may tacitly collude, i.e., observe each other's pricing behavior, each understanding that price cutting by one firm is likely to trigger price competition by all. See 8 Areeda & Hovenkamp P 1632d, at 321-323; P. Areeda & L. Kaplow, Antitrust Analysis PP 231-233, pp 276-283 (4th ed. 1988) (hereinafter Areeda & Kaplow). Cf. United States v. Container Corp. of America, 393 U.S. 333, 89 S. Ct. 510, 21 L. Ed. 2d 526 (1969); Areeda & Kaplow PP 247-253, at 327-348. Where that is so, resale price maintenance can make it easier for each producer to identify (by observing retail markets) when a competitor has begun to cut prices. And a producer who cuts wholesale prices without lowering the minimum resale price will stand to gain little, if anything, in increased profits, because the dealer will be unable to stimulate increased consumer demand by passing along the producer's price cut to consumers. In either case, resale price maintenance agreements will tend to prevent price competition from "breaking out"; and they will thereby tend to stabilize producer [*62] prices. See Pitofsky 1490-1491. Cf., e.g., Container Corp., supra, at 336-337, 89 S. Ct. 510, 21 L. Ed. 2d 526.

[*912] Those who express concern about the potential anticompetitive effects find empirical support in the behavior of prices before, and then after, Congress in 1975 repealed the Miller-Tydings Fair Trade Act, 50 Stat. 693 , and the McGuire Act, 66 Stat. 631 . Those Acts had permitted (but not required) individual States to enact "fair trade" laws authorizing minimum resale price maintenance. At the time of repeal minimum resale price maintenance was lawful in 36 States; it was unlawful in 14 States. See Hearings on S. 408 before the Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 94th Cong., 1st Sess., 173 (1975) [2728] (hereinafter Hearings on S. 408) (statement of Thomas E. Kauper, Assistant Attorney General, Antitrust Division). Comparing prices in the former States with prices in the latter States, the Department of Justice argued that minimum resale price maintenance had raised prices by 19% to 27%. See Hearings on H. R. 2384 before the Subcommittee on Monopolies and Commercial Law of the House Committee on the Judiciary, 94th Cong., 1st Sess., 122 (1975) [*63] (hereinafter Hearings on H. R. 2384) (statement of Keith I. Clearwaters, Deputy Assistant Attorney General, Antitrust Division).

After repeal, minimum resale price maintenance agreements were unlawful per se in every State. The Federal Trade Commission (FTC) staff, after studying numerous price surveys, wrote that collectively the surveys "indicate[d] that [resale price maintenance] in most cases increased the prices of products sold with [resale price maintenance]." Bureau of Economics Staff Report to the FTC, T. Overstreet, Resale Price Maintenance: Economic Theories and Empirical [651] Evidence 160 (1983) (hereinafter Overstreet). Most economists today agree that, in the words of a prominent antitrust treatise, "resale price maintenance tends to produce higher consumer prices than would otherwise be the case." 8 Areeda & Hovenkamp P 1604b, at 40 (finding "[t]he evidence . . . persuasive on this point"). See also Brief for William S. Comanor et al. as Amici Curiae 4 ("It is uniformly [*913] acknowledged that [resale price maintenance] and other vertical restraints lead to higher consumer prices").

On the other hand, those favoring resale price maintenance have long [*64] argued that resale price maintenance agreements can provide important consumer benefits. The majority lists two: First, such agreements can facilitate new entry. Ante, at 891, 168 L. Ed. 2d, at 637-638. For example, a newly entering producer wishing to build a product name might be able to convince dealers to help it do so--if, but only if, the producer can assure those dealers that they will later recoup their investment. Without resale price maintenance, late-entering dealers might take advantage of the earlier investment and, through price competition, drive prices down to the point where the early dealers cannot recover what they spent. By assuring the initial dealers that such later price competition will not occur, resale price maintenance can encourage them to carry the new product, thereby helping the new producer succeed. See 8 Areeda & Hovenkamp PP 1617a, 1631b, at 193-196, 308. The result might be increased competition at the producer level, i.e., greater inter-brand competition, that brings with it net consumer benefits.

Second, without resale price maintenance a producer might find its efforts to sell a product undermined by what resale price maintenance advocates call "free riding. [*65] " Ante, at 890-891, 168 L. Ed. 2d, at 636-637. Suppose a producer concludes that it can succeed only if dealers provide certain services, say, product demonstrations, high quality shops, advertising that creates a certain product image, and so forth. Without resale price maintenance, some dealers might take a "free ride" on the investment that others make in providing those services. Such a dealer would save money by not paying for those services and could consequently cut its own price and increase its own sales. Under these circumstances, dealers might prove unwilling to invest in the provision of necessary services. See, e.g., 8 Areeda & Hovenkamp PP 1611-1613, [*914] 1631c, at 126-165, 309-313; R. Posner, Antitrust Law 172-173 (2d ed. 2001); R. Bork, The Antitrust Paradox 290-291 (1978) (hereinafter Bork); Easterbrook 146-149.

[2729] Moreover, where a producer and not a group of dealers seeks a resale price maintenance agreement, there is a special reason to believe some such benefits exist. That is because, other things being equal, producers should want to encourage price competition among their dealers. By doing so they will often increase profits by selling more of their product. See Sylvania, 433 U.S., at 56, n. 24, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568; [*66] Bork 290. And that is so, even if the producer possesses sufficient market power to earn a supernormal profit. That is to say, other things being equal, the producer will benefit by charging his dealers a competitive (or even a higher-than-competitive) wholesale price while encouraging price competition [652] among them. Hence, if the producer is the moving force, the producer must have some special reason for wanting resale price maintenance; and in the absence of, say, concentrated producer markets (where that special reason might consist of a desire to stabilize wholesale prices), that special reason may well reflect the special circumstances just described: new entry, "free riding," or variations on those themes.

The upshot is, as many economists suggest, sometimes resale price maintenance can prove harmful; sometimes it can bring benefits. See, e.g., Brief for Economists as Amici Curiae 16; 8 Areeda & Hovenkamp PP 1631-1632, at 306-328; Pitofsky 1495; Scherer 706-707. But before concluding that courts should consequently apply a rule of reason, I would ask such questions as, how often are harms or benefits likely to occur? How easy is it to separate the beneficial sheep from [*67] the antitrust goats?

Economic discussion, such as the studies the Court relies upon, can help provide answers to these questions, and in doing so, economics can, and should, inform antitrust law. But antitrust law cannot, and should not, precisely replicate [*915] economists' (sometimes conflicting) views. That is because law, unlike economics, is an administrative system the effects of which depend upon the content of rules and precedents only as they are applied by judges and juries in courts and by lawyers advising their clients. And that fact means that courts will often bring their own administrative judgment to bear, sometimes applying rules of per se unlawfulness to business practices even when those practices sometimes produce benefits. See, e.g., F. Scherer & D. Ross, Industrial Market Structure and Economic Performance 335-339 (3d ed. 1990) (hereinafter Scherer & Ross) (describing some circumstances under which price-fixing agreements could be more beneficial than "unfettered competition," but also noting potential costs of moving from a per se ban to a rule of reasonableness assessment of such agreements).

I have already described studies and analyses that suggest [*68] (though they cannot prove) that resale price maintenance can cause harms with some regularity--and certainly when dealers are the driving force. But what about benefits? How often, for example, will the benefits to which the Court points occur in practice? I can find no economic consensus on this point. There is a consensus in the literature that "free riding" takes place. But "free riding" often takes place in the economy without any legal effort to stop it. Many visitors to California take free rides on the Pacific Coast Highway. We all benefit freely from ideas, such as that of creating the first supermarket. Dealers often take a "free ride" on investments that others have made in building a product's name and reputation. The question is how often the "free riding" problem is serious enough significantly to deter dealer investment.

[2730] To be more specific, one can easily imagine a dealer who refuses to provide important presale services, say, a detailed explanation of how a product works (or who fails to provide a proper atmosphere in which to sell expensive perfume or alligator billfolds), lest customers use that "free" service (or [*916] enjoy the psychological benefit arising when [*69] a high-priced retailer stocks a particular brand of billfold or handbag) and then buy from another dealer at a lower price. Sometimes this must happen in reality. But does [653] it happen often? We do, after all, live in an economy where firms, despite Dr. Miles' per se rule, still sell complex technical equipment (as well as expensive perfume and alligator billfolds) to consumers.

All this is to say that the ultimate question is not whether, but how much, "free riding" of this sort takes place. And, after reading the briefs, I must answer that question with an uncertain "sometimes." See, e.g., Brief for William S. Comanor et al. as Amici Curiae 6-7 (noting "skepticism in the economic literature about how often [free riding] actually occurs"); Scherer & Ross 551-555 (explaining the "severe limitations" of the free-rider justification for resale price maintenance); Pitofsky, Why Dr. Miles Was Right, 8 Regulation, No. 1, pp 27, 29-30 (Jan./Feb. 1984) (similar analysis).

How easily can courts identify instances in which the benefits are likely to outweigh potential harms? My own answer is, not very easily. For one thing, it is often difficult to [*70] identify who--producer or dealer--is the moving force behind any given resale price maintenance agreement. Suppose, for example, several large multibrand retailers all sell resale-price-maintained products. Suppose further that small producers set retail prices because they fear that, otherwise, the large retailers will favor (say, by allocating better shelf space) the goods of other producers who practice resale price maintenance. Who "initiated" this practice, the retailers hoping for considerable insulation from retail competition, or the producers, who simply seek to deal best with the circumstances they find? For another thing, as I just said, it is difficult to determine just when, and where, the "free riding" problem is serious enough to warrant legal protection.

[*917] I recognize that scholars have sought to develop checklists and sets of questions that will help courts separate instances where anticompetitive harms are more likely from instances where only benefits are likely to be found. See, e.g., 8 Areeda & Hovenkamp PP 1633c-1633e, at 330-339. See also Brief for William S. Comanor et al. as Amici Curiae 8-10. But applying these criteria in court [*71] is often easier said than done. The Court's invitation to consider the existence of "market power," for example, ante, at 898, 168 L. Ed. 2d, at 641, invites lengthy time-consuming argument among competing experts, as they seek to apply abstract, highly technical, criteria to often ill-defined markets. And resale price maintenance cases, unlike a major merger or monopoly case, are likely to prove numerous and involve only private parties. One cannot fairly expect judges and juries in such cases to apply complex economic criteria without making a considerable number of mistakes, which themselves may impose serious costs. See, e.g., H. Hovenkamp, The Antitrust Enterprise 105 (2005) (litigating a rule of reason case is "one of the most costly procedures in antitrust practice"). See also Bok, Section 7 of the Clayton Act and the Merging of Law and Economics, 74 Harv. L. Rev. 226, 238-247 (1960) (describing lengthy FTC efforts to apply complex criteria in a merger case).

[2731] Are there special advantages to a bright-line rule? Without such a rule, it is often unfair, and consequently impractical, for enforcement officials to bring criminal proceedings. And since enforcement resources are limited, [*72] that loss may tempt some producers [654] or dealers to enter into agreements that are, on balance, anticompetitive.

Given the uncertainties that surround key items in the overall balance sheet, particularly in respect to the "administrative" questions, I can concede to the majority that the problem is difficult. And, if forced to decide now, at most I might agree that the per se rule should be slightly modified to allow an exception for the more easily identifiable [*918] and temporary condition of "new entry." See Pitofsky 1495. But I am not now forced to decide this question. The question before us is not what should be the rule, starting from scratch. We here must decide whether to change a clear and simple price-related antitrust rule that the courts have applied for nearly a century.

II

We write, not on a blank slate, but on a slate that begins with Dr. Miles and goes on to list a century's worth of similar cases, massive amounts of advice that lawyers have provided their clients, and untold numbers of business decisions those clients have taken in reliance upon that advice. See, e.g., United States v. Bausch & Lomb Optical Co., 321 U.S. 707, 721, 64 S. Ct. 805, 88 L. Ed. 1024 (1944); [*73] Sylvania, 433 U.S., at 51, n. 18, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568 ("The per se illegality of [vertical] price restrictions has been established firmly for many years . . ."). Indeed, a Westlaw search shows that Dr. Miles itself has been cited dozens of times in this Court and hundreds of times in lower courts. Those who wish this Court to change so well-established a legal precedent bear a heavy burden of proof. See Illinois Brick Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 736, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (1977) (noting, in declining to overrule an earlier case interpreting § 4 of the Clayton Act, that "considerations of stare decisis weigh heavily in the area of statutory construction, where Congress is free to change this Court's interpretation of its legislation"). I am not aware of any case in which this Court has overturned so well-established a statutory precedent. Regardless, I do not see how the Court can claim that ordinary criteria for overruling an earlier case have been met. See, e.g., Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pa. v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 854-855, 112 S. Ct. 2791, 120 L. Ed. 2d 674 (1992). See also Federal Election Comm'n v. Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc., ante, at 500-503, 127 S. Ct. 2652, 168 L. Ed. 2d 329, 2007 U.S. LEXIS 8515 (Scalia, J., concurring [*74] in part and concurring in judgment).

I can find no change in circumstances in the past several decades that helps the majority's position. In fact, there has been one important change that argues strongly to the contrary. In 1975, Congress repealed the McGuire and Miller-Tydings Acts. See Consumer Goods Pricing Act of 1975, 89 Stat. 801. And it thereby consciously extended Dr. Miles' per se rule. Indeed, at that time the Department of Justice and the FTC, then urging application of the per se rule, discussed virtually every argument presented now to this Court as well as others not here presented. And they explained to Congress why Congress should reject them. See Hearings on S. 408, at 176-177 (statement of Thomas E. Kauper, Assistant Attorney General, Antitrust Division); id., at 170-172 (testimony of Lewis A. Engman, Chairman of the FTC); Hearings on H. R. 2384, at 113-114 (testimony [655] [2732] of Keith I. Clearwaters, Deputy Assistant Attorney General, Antitrust Division). Congress fully understood, and consequently intended, that the result of its repeal of McGuire and Miller-Tydings would be to make minimum resale price maintenance per se unlawful. See, e.g., S. [*75] Rep. No. 94-466, pp 1-3 (1975) ("Without [the exemptions authorized by the Miller-Tydings and McGuire Acts,] the agreements they authorize would violate the antitrust laws . . . . [R]epeal of the fair trade laws generally will prohibit manufacturers from enforcing resale prices"). See also Sylvania, supra, at 51, n 18, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568 ("Congress recently has expressed its approval of a per se analysis of vertical price restrictions by repealing those provisions of the Miller-Tydings and McGuire Acts allowing fair-trade pricing at the option of the individual States").

Congress did not prohibit this Court from reconsidering the per se rule. But enacting major legislation premised upon the existence of that rule constitutes important public [*920] reliance upon that rule. And doing so aware of the relevant arguments constitutes even stronger reliance upon the Court's keeping the rule, at least in the absence of some significant change in respect to those arguments.

Have there been any such changes? There have been a few economic studies, described in some of the briefs, that argue, contrary to the testimony of the Justice Department and the FTC to Congress in 1975, that resale price [*76] maintenance is not harmful. One study, relying on an analysis of litigated resale price maintenance cases from 1975 to 1982, concludes that resale price maintenance does not ordinarily involve producer or dealer collusion. See Ippolito, Resale Price Maintenance: Empirical Evidence from Litigation, 34 J. Law & Econ. 263, 281-282, 292 (1991). But this study equates the failure of plaintiffs to allege collusion with the absence of collusion--an equation that overlooks the superfluous nature of allegations of horizontal collusion in a resale price maintenance case and the tacit form that such collusion might take. See H. Hovenkamp, Federal Antitrust Policy § 11.3c, p 464, n 19 (3d ed. 2005); supra, at 911, 168 L. Ed. 2d, at 649-650.

The other study provides a theoretical basis for concluding that resale price maintenance "need not lead to higher retail prices." Marvel & McCafferty, The Political Economy of Resale Price Maintenance, 94 J. Pol. Econ. 1074, 1075 (1986). But this study develops a theoretical model "under the assumption that [resale price maintenance] is efficiency-enhancing." Ibid. Its only empirical support is a 1940 study that the authors acknowledge is much criticized. [*77] See id., at 1091. And many other economists take a different view. See Brief for William S. Comanor et al. as Amici Curiae 4.

Regardless, taken together, these studies at most may offer some mild support for the majority's position. But they cannot constitute a major change in circumstances.

Petitioner and some amici have also presented us with newer studies that show that resale price maintenance sometimes [*921] brings consumer benefits. Overstreet 119-129 (describing numerous case studies). But the proponents of a per se rule have always conceded as much. What is remarkable about the majority's arguments is that nothing in this respect [656] is new. See supra, at 910, 919, 168 L. Ed. 2d, at 649, 654 (citing articles and congressional testimony going back several decades). The only new feature of these arguments lies in the fact that the most current advocates of overruling Dr. Miles have abandoned a host of [2733] other not-very-persuasive arguments upon which prior resale price maintenance proponents used to rely. See, e.g., 8 Areeda P 1631a, at 350-352 (listing "'[t]raditional' justifications" for resale price maintenance).

The one arguable exception consists of the majority's [*78] claim that "even absent free riding," resale price maintenance "may be the most efficient way to expand the manufacturer's market share by inducing the retailer's performance and allowing it to use its own initiative and experience in providing valuable services." Ante, at 892, 168 L. Ed. 2d, at 637-638. I cannot count this as an exception, however, because I do not understand how, in the absence of free riding (and assuming competitiveness), an established producer would need resale price maintenance. Why, on these assumptions, would a dealer not "expand" its "market share" as best that dealer sees fit, obtaining appropriate payment from consumers in the process? There may be an answer to this question. But I have not seen it. And I do not think that we should place significant weight upon justifications that the parties do not explain with sufficient clarity for a generalist judge to understand.

No one claims that the American economy has changed in ways that might support the majority. Concentration in retailing has increased. See, e.g., Brief for Respondent 18 (since minimum resale price maintenance was banned nationwide in 1975, the total number of retailers has dropped while the growth in sales [*79] per store has risen); Brief for American Antitrust Institute as Amicus Curiae 17, n 20 (citing private study reporting that the combined sales of the 10 largest [*922] retailers worldwide has grown to nearly 30% of total retail sales of top 250 retailers; also quoting 1999 Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development report stating that the "'last twenty years have seen momentous changes in retail distribution including significant increases in concentration'"); Mamen, Facing Goliath: Challenging the Impacts of Supermarket Consolidation on our Local Economies, Communities, and Food Security, The Oakland Institute, 1 Policy Brief, No. 3, pp 1, 2 (Spring 2007), http://www.oaklandinstitute.org/pdfs/facing_goliath.pdf (as visited June 25, 2007, and available in Clerk of Court's case file) (noting that "[f]or many decades, the top five food retail firms in the U. S. controlled less than 20 percent of the market"; from 1997 to 2000, "the top five firms increased their market share from 24 to 42 percent of all retail sales"; and "[b]y 2003, they controlled over half of all grocery sales"). That change, other things being equal, may enable (and motivate) more retailers, accounting for [*80] a greater percentage of total retail sales volume, to seek resale price maintenance, thereby making it more difficult for price-cutting competitors (perhaps internet retailers) to obtain market share.

Nor has anyone argued that concentration among manufacturers that might use resale price maintenance has diminished significantly. And as far as I can tell, it has not. Consider household electrical appliances, which a study from the late 1950's [657] suggests constituted a significant portion of those products subject to resale price maintenance at that time. See Hollander, United States of America, in Resale Price Maintenance 67, 80-81 (B. Yamey ed. 1966). Although it is somewhat difficult to compare census data from 2002 with that from several decades ago (because of changes in the classification system), it is clear that at least some subsets of the household electrical appliance industry are more concentrated, in terms of manufacturer market power, now than they were then. For instance, the top eight domestic manufacturers of household cooking appliances accounted for 68% [2734] [*923] of the domestic market (measured by value of shipments) in 1963 (the earliest date for which I was able to find [*81] data), compared with 77% in 2002. See Dept. of Commerce, Bureau of Census, 1972 Census of Manufactures, Special Report Series, Concentration Ratios in Manufacturing, No. MC72(SR)-2, p SR2-38 (1975) (hereinafter 1972 Census); Dept. of Commerce, Bureau of Census, 2002 Economic Census, Concentration Ratios: 2002, No. EC02-31SR-1, p 55 (2006) (hereinafter 2002 Census). The top eight domestic manufacturers of household laundry equipment accounted for 95% of the domestic market in 1963 (90% in 1958), compared with 99% in 2002. 1972 Census, at SR2-38; 2002 Census, at 55. And the top eight domestic manufacturers of household refrigerators and freezers accounted for 91% of the domestic market in 1963, compared with 95% in 2002. 1972 Census, at SR2-38; 2002 Census, at 55. Increased concentration among manufacturers increases the likelihood that producer-originated resale price maintenance will prove more prevalent today than in years past, and more harmful. At the very least, the majority has not explained how these, or other changes in the economy, could help support its position.

In sum, there is no relevant change. And without some such change, there is no ground for abandoning a well-established [*82] antitrust rule.

B

With the preceding discussion in mind, I would consult the list of factors that our case law indicates are relevant when we consider overruling an earlier case. Justice Scalia, writing separately in another of our cases this Term, well summarizes that law. See Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc., ante, at 500-503, 127 S. Ct. 2652, 168 L. Ed. 2d 329, 2007 U.S. LEXIS 8515 (opinion concurring in part and concurring in judgment). And every relevant factor he mentions argues against overruling Dr. Miles here.

First, the Court applies stare decisis more "rigidly" in statutory than in constitutional cases. See Glidden Co. v. [*924] Zdanok, 370 U.S. 530, 543, 82 S. Ct. 1459, 8 L. Ed. 2d 671 (1962); Illinois Brick Co., 431 U.S., at 736, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707. This is a statutory case.

Second, the Court does sometimes overrule cases that it decided wrongly only a reasonably short time ago. As Justice Scalia put it, "[o]verruling a constitutional case decided just a few years earlier is far from unprecedented." Wisconsin Right to Life, ante, at 501, 127 S. Ct. 2652, 168 L. Ed. 2d 329, 2007 U.S. LEXIS 8515 (emphasis added). We here overrule one statutory case, Dr. Miles, decided 100 years ago, and we overrule the cases that reaffirmed its per se rule in the intervening years. See, e.g., [*83] Trenton Potteries, 273 U.S., [658] at 399-401, 47 S. Ct. 377, 71 L. Ed. 700; Bausch & Lomb, 321 U.S., at 721, 64 S. Ct. 805, 88 L. Ed. 2d 1024; United States v. Parke, Davis & Co., 362 U.S. 29, 45-47, 80 S. Ct. 503, 4 L. Ed. 2d 505 (1960); Simpson v. Union Oil Co. of Cal., 377 U.S. 13, 16-17, 84 S. Ct. 1051, 12 L. Ed. 2d 98 (1964).

Third, the fact that a decision creates an "unworkable" legal regime argues in favor of overruling. See Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U.S. 808, 827-828, 111 S. Ct. 2597, 115 L. Ed. 2d 720 (1991); Swift & Co. v. Wickham, 382 U.S. 111, 116, 86 S. Ct. 258, 15 L. Ed. 2d 194 (1965). Implementation of the per se rule, even with the complications attendant the exception allowed for in United States v. Colgate & Co., 250 U.S. 300, 39 S. Ct. 465, 63 L. Ed. 992, 1919 Dec. Comm'r Pat. 460 (1919), has proved practical over the course of the last century, particularly when compared with the many complexities of litigating a case under the "rule of reason" regime. No one has shown how moving from the Dr. Miles regime to "rule of reason" analysis [2735] would make the legal regime governing minimum resale price maintenance more "administrable," Wisconsin Right to Life, ante, at 501, 127 S. Ct. 2652, 168 L. Ed. 2d 329, 2007 U.S. LEXIS 8515 (opinion of Scalia, J.), particularly since Colgate would remain good law with respect to unreasonable [*84] price maintenance.

Fourth, the fact that a decision "unsettles" the law may argue in favor of overruling. See Sylvania, 433 U.S., at 47, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 568; Wisconsin Right to Life, ante, at 502, 127 S. Ct. 2652, 168 L. Ed. 2d 3291, 2007 U.S. LEXIS 8515 (opinion of Scalia, J.). The per se rule is well-settled law, as the Court itself has previously recognized. Sylvania, supra, at 51, n. 18, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 568. It is the majority's change here that will unsettle the law.

[*925] Fifth, the fact that a case involves property rights or contract rights, where reliance interests are involved, argues against overruling. Payne, supra, at 828, 111 S. Ct. 2597, 115 L. Ed. 2d 720 . This case involves contract rights and perhaps property rights (consider shopping malls). And there has been considerable reliance upon the per se rule. As I have said, Congress relied upon the continued vitality of Dr. Miles when it repealed Miller-Tydings and McGuire. Supra, at 919-920, 168 L. Ed. 2d, at 654-655. The Executive Branch argued for repeal on the assumption that Dr. Miles stated the law. Supra, at 919-920. Moreover, whole sectors of the economy have come to rely upon the per se rule. A factory outlet store tells us that the rule "form[s] an essential part of the regulatory background against which [*85] [that firm] and many other discount retailers have financed, structured, and operated their businesses." Brief for Burlington Coat Factory Warehouse Corp. as Amicus Curiae 5. The Consumer Federation of America tells us that large low-price retailers would not exist without Dr. Miles; minimum resale price maintenance, "by stabilizing price levels and preventing low-price competition, erects a potentially insurmountable barrier to entry for such low-price innovators." Brief for Consumer Federation of America as Amicus Curiae 5, 7-9 (discussing, inter alia, comments by Wal-Mart's founder 25 years ago that relaxation of the per se ban on minimum resale price maintenance would be a "'great danger'" to Wal-Mart's then-relatively-nascent business). See also Brief for American Antitrust Institute as Amicus Curiae 14-15, and sources [659] cited therein (making the same point). New distributors, including internet distributors, have similarly invested time, money, and labor in an effort to bring yet lower cost goods to Americans.

This Court's overruling of the per se rule jeopardizes this reliance, and more. What about malls built on the assumption that a discount distributor [*86] will remain an anchor tenant? What about home buyers who have taken a home's distance [*926] from such a mall into account? What about Americans, producers, distributors, and consumers, who have understandably assumed, at least for the last 30 years, that price competition is a legally guaranteed way of life? The majority denies none of this. It simply says that these "reliance interests . . ., like the reliance interests in State Oil Co. v. Khan, 522 U.S. 3, 118 S. Ct. 275, 139 L. Ed. 2d 199 (1997), cannot justify an inefficient rule." Ante, at 906, 168 L. Ed. 2d, at 647.

The Court minimizes the importance of this reliance, adding that it "is also of note" that at the time resale price maintenance contracts were lawful "'no more than a tiny fraction of manufacturers ever employed'" the practice. Ante, at 907 (quoting Overstreet 6). By "tiny" the Court means manufacturers that accounted for up to "'ten percent of consumer goods purchases'" annually. Ante, at 907. That figure in today's economy equals just over $300 billion. [2736] See Dept. of Commerce, Bureau of Census, Statistical Abstract of the United States: 2007, p 649 (126th ed.) (over $3 trillion in U. S. retail sales in 2002). Putting the Court's estimate together with the Justice Department's early 1970's study translates a [*87] legal regime that permits all resale price maintenance into retail bills that are higher by an average of roughly $750 to $1,000 annually for an American family of four. Just how much higher retail bills will be after the Court's decision today, of course, depends upon what is now unknown, namely, how courts will decide future cases under a "rule of reason." But these figures indicate that the amounts involved are important to American families and cannot be dismissed as "tiny."

Sixth, the fact that a rule of law has become "embedded" in our "national culture" argues strongly against overruling. Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428, 443-444, 120 S. Ct. 2326, 147 L. Ed. 2d 405 (2000). The per se rule forbidding minimum resale price maintenance agreements has long been "embedded" in the law of antitrust. It involves price, the economy's "'central nervous system.'" National Soc. of Professional Engineers, 435 U.S., at 692, 98 S. Ct. 1355, 55 L. Ed. 2d 637 [*927] (quoting Socony-Vacuum Oil, 310 U.S., at 226, n. 59, 60 S. Ct. 811, 84 L. Ed. 2d 1129). It reflects a basic antitrust assumption (that consumers often prefer lower prices to more service). It embodies a basic antitrust objective (providing consumers with a free choice about [*88] such matters). And it creates an easily administered and enforceable bright line, "Do not agree about price," that businesses as well as lawyers have long understood.

The only contrary stare decisis factor that the majority mentions consists of its claim that this Court has "[f]rom the beginning . . . treated the Sherman Act as a common-law statute," and has previously overruled antitrust precedent. Ante, at 899, 900-902, 168 L. Ed. 2d, at 642, 643-644. It points in support to State Oil Co. v. Khan, 522 U.S. 3, 118 S. Ct. 275, 139 L. Ed. 2d 199 (1997), overruling Albrecht v. Herald Co., 390 U.S. 145, 88 S. Ct. 869, 19 L. [660] Ed. 2d 998 (1968), in which this Court had held that maximum resale price agreements were unlawful per se, and to Sylvania, overruling United States v. Arnold, Schwinn & Co., 388 U.S. 365, 87 S. Ct. 1856, 18 L. Ed. 2d 1249 (1967), in which this Court had held that producer-imposed territorial limits were unlawful per se.

The Court decided Khan, however, 29 years after Albrecht--still a significant period, but nowhere close to the century Dr. Miles has stood. The Court specifically noted the lack of any significant reliance upon Albrecht, 522 U.S., at 18-19, 118 S. Ct. 275, 139 L. Ed. 2d 199 (Albrecht has had "little [*89] or no relevance to ongoing enforcement of the Sherman Act"). Albrecht had far less support in traditional antitrust principles than did Dr. Miles. Compare, e.g., 8 Areeda & Hovenkamp P 1632, at 316-328 (analyzing potential harms of minimum resale price maintenance), with id., P 1637, at 352-361 (analyzing potential harms of maximum resale price maintenance). See also, e.g., Pitofsky 1490, n 17. And Congress had nowhere expressed support for Albrecht's rule. Khan, supra, at 19, 118 S. Ct. 275, 139 L. Ed. 2d 199.

In Sylvania, the Court, in overruling Schwinn, explicitly distinguished Dr. Miles on the ground that while Congress had "recently . . . expressed its approval of a per se analysis of vertical price restrictions" by repealing the Miller-Tydings [*928] and McGuire Acts, "[n]o similar expression of congressional intent exists for nonprice restrictions." 433 U.S., at 51, n. 18, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568. Moreover, the Court decided Sylvania only a decade after Schwinn. And it based its overruling on a generally perceived need to avoid "confusion" in the law, [2737] 433 U.S., at 47-49, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568, a factor totally absent here.

The Court suggests that it is following "the common-law [*90] tradition." Ante, at 905, 168 L. Ed. 2d, at 646. But the common law would not have permitted overruling Dr. Miles in these circumstances. Common-law courts rarely overruled well-established earlier rules outright. Rather, they would over time issue decisions that gradually eroded the scope and effect of the rule in question, which might eventually lead the courts to put the rule to rest. One can argue that modifying the per se rule to make an exception, say, for new entry, see Pitofsky 1495, could prove consistent with this approach. To swallow up a century-old precedent, potentially affecting many billions of dollars of sales, is not. The reader should compare today's "common-law" decision with Justice Cardozo's decision in Allegheny College v. National Chautauqua Cty. Bank of Jamestown, 246 N. Y. 369, 159 N. E. 173 (1927), and note a gradualism that does not characterize today's decision.

Moreover, a Court that rests its decision upon economists' views of the economic merits should also take account of legal scholars' views about common-law overruling. Professors Hart and Sacks list 12 factors (similar to those I have mentioned) that support judicial "adherence to prior [*91] holdings." They all support adherence to Dr. Miles here. See H. Hart & A. Sacks, The Legal Process 568-569 (W. Eskridge & P. Frickey eds. 1994). Karl Llewellyn has written that the common-law judge's "conscious reshaping" of prior law "must so move as to hold the degree of movement down to the degree to which need truly presses." The Bramble Bush 156 (1960). Where here is the pressing [661] need? The Court notes that the FTC argues here in favor of a rule of reason. See ante, at 900, 168 L. Ed. 2d, at 642-643. But both Congress and the FTC, [*929] unlike courts, are well equipped to gather empirical evidence outside the context of a single case. As neither has done so, we cannot conclude with confidence that the gains from eliminating the per se rule will outweigh the costs.

In sum, every stare decisis concern this Court has ever mentioned counsels against overruling here. It is difficult for me to understand how one can believe both that (1) satisfying a set of stare decisis concerns justifies overruling a recent constitutional decision, Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc., ante, at 500-503, 127 S. Ct. 2652, 168 L. Ed. 2d 3291, 2007 U.S. LEXIS 8515 (Scalia, J., joined by Kennedy and Thomas, JJ., concurring in part and concurring in judgment), but (2) failing [*92] to satisfy any of those same concerns nonetheless permits overruling a longstanding statutory decision. Either those concerns are relevant or they are not.

The only safe predictions to make about today's decision are that it will likely raise the price of goods at retail and that it will create considerable legal turbulence as lower courts seek to develop workable principles. I do not believe that the majority has shown new or changed conditions sufficient to warrant overruling a decision of such long standing. All ordinary stare decisis considerations indicate the contrary. For these reasons, with respect, I dissent.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN1[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

In deciding motions to dismiss pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), courts generally consider only the allegations in the complaint, exhibits attached to the complaint, matters of public record, and documents that form the basis of a claim.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN2[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

The applicable inquiry under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) is well-settled. Courts must accept all well-pleaded allegations in the complaint as true and draw all reasonable inferences in favor of the non-moving party. In doing so, a court may look only to the facts alleged in the complaint and any accompanying attachments, and may not look at the record. However, courts are not required to credit bald assertions or legal conclusions improperly alleged in the complaint.

HN3[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

While a complaint attacked by a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss does not need detailed factual allegations, a plaintiff's obligation to provide the grounds of his entitlement to relief requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of a cause of action's elements will not do. Factual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level on the assumption that all of the complaint's allegations are true. Ultimately, however, the question is not whether the plaintiffs will prevail at trial, but whether they should be given an opportunity to offer evidence in support of their claims.

Antitrust complaints, in particular, should be liberally construed. Although there is no heightened pleading standard in antitrust cases, antitrust complaints are not exempt from the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The pleading standard for claims under 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 of the Sherman Act is the short and concise statement standard of Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a). The "short and concise statement" standard of Rule 8(a), generally applicable to antitrust claims, is distinguished from the heightened "particularity" standard of Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b), applicable to antitrust claims sounding in fraud. Regarding the Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a) pleading standard in the context of antitrust cases, while a complaint attacked by a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss does not need detailed factual allegations, it must plead enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

HN10[] Sherman Act, Claims

There are four essential elements of a violation of 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 of the Sherman Act: (1) concerted action by the defendants; (2) that produced anticompetitive effects within the relevant product and geographic markets; (3) that the concerted action was illegal; and (4) that the plaintiff was injured as a proximate result of the concerted action. Moreover, because § 1 of the Sherman Act does not prohibit all unreasonable restraints of trade but only restraints effected by a contract, combination, or conspiracy, the crucial question is whether the challenged anticompetitive conduct stems from independent decision or from an agreement, tacit or express. As a result, stating such a claim requires a complaint with enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest that an agreement was made.

Where the plaintiff fails to define its proposed relevant market with reference to the rule of reasonable interchangeability and cross-elasticity of demand, or alleges a proposed relevant market that clearly does not encompass all interchangeable substitute products even when all factual inferences are granted in the plaintiff's favor, the relevant market is legally insufficient and a motion to dismiss may be granted.

The second Brunswick requirement for an antitrust claim is generally met if a plaintiff is a competitor or a consumer in the relevant market. Opinion

LINARES, District Judge.

This matter comes before the Court on the motion of Defendant, Becton Dickinson & Company, to dismiss Plaintiffs' [1] Consolidated Class Action Complaint, [2] pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6). For the reasons set forth in this Opinion, Defendant's motion is DENIED. [3]

---

[1] For purposes of the instant motion, Plaintiffs include Jabo's Pharmacy, Inc. and Drug Mart Tallman, Inc. (hereinafter collectively "Plaintiffs").

[4]

This matter arises from actions brought by healthcare providers and distributors in the pharmaceutical and medical device industry, against Defendant, a medical device manufacturer, which allegedly controls a dominant share of the relevant market for the hypodermic products at issue in this case. The Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation has transferred several related actions to this Court for consolidated pretrial proceedings, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1407. [5]

I. Historical Facts

Plaintiffs are pharmacies in Tennessee and New York which purchased various disposable hypodermic products manufactured by Becton through a distributor or wholesaler. (Compl., PP 1, 13-14). Becton, a New Jersey corporation founded in 1897, is a large healthcare product manufacturer, which has been the dominant manufacturer of syringes and other disposable hypodermic products in the United States for decades. (Id., PP 3, 15, 46). "By the 1950s, Becton had become the leading U.S. hypodermic syringe manufacturer." (Id., P 46). The disposable hypodermic products at issue include relevant markets for: (1) disposable syringes and associated needles, (2) disposable blood collection tubes, (3) disposable blood collection tube holders, and (4) intravenous [*6] ("IV") catheter devices and their associated needles. (Id., P 2). Said products are referred to collectively in the Complaint as "Disposable Hypodermic Products." (Id.). Disposable Hypodermic Products come in safety and non-safety forms. (Id., P 48). The relevant geographic market for each of the Disposable Hypodermic Products is the entire United States. (Id., PP 27, 34, 39, 44).

By way of background, the Complaint explains that, at all relevant times, Plaintiffs purchased Disposable Hypodermic Products from Becton through authorized distributors who do not set the prices for those products. (Id., P 49). In particular, the Complaint explains that a pharmacy negotiates a price for Disposable Hypodermic Products with Defendant, either directly or through a Group Purchasing Organization (hereinafter "GPO"). (Id., P 50). The authorized dealer then takes possession of Defendant's products and holds them in inventory until the pharmacy becomes in need of said products, at which time the authorized dealer delivers same. (Id.). The pharmacy then pays the authorized dealer the price it had negotiated with Becton, as well as a delivery or administrative fee. (Id.). The authorized dealer then [*7] pays Defendant the amount it collected from the pharmacy, which was "the amount

[2] The operative complaint is the Consolidated Class Action Complaint, filed on May 10, 2006, hereinafter referred to as "Complaint." In the instant Opinion, the Court addresses only Defendant's motion to dismiss the Complaint filed by Jabo's Pharmacy, Inc. and Drug Mart Tallman, Inc. Defendant has filed separate motions to dismiss the complaints of other parties to this multidistrict litigation, which have been decided by the Court by way of separate opinions.

[3] The Court decides this [*4] matter without oral argument. Fed. R. Civ. P. 78. Jurisdiction is premised on 28 U.S.C. §§ 1331, 1337, and 15 U.S.C. § 15(a).

[4] For purposes of the instant motion to dismiss, the Court accepts Plaintiffs' factual allegations as true, and relies only on the Complaint. See, e.g., Lum v. Bank of Am., 361 F.3d 217, 222 n.3 (3d Cir. 2004) (HN1[] "In deciding motions to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6), courts generally consider only the allegations in the complaint, exhibits attached to the complaint, matters of public record, and documents that form the basis of a claim.").

[5] Defendant has also moved to dismiss (1) the Second Consolidated Amended Class Action Complaint filed by Louisiana Wholesale Drug Company, Inc., Rochester [*5] Drug Co-Operative, Inc., JM Smith d/b/a Smith Drug Company, Dik Drug Company, American Sales Company, Inc., Park Surgical Co. Inc. and SAJ Distributors, Inc., and (2) the Class Action Amended Complaint filed by Medstar Health, Inc., Medstar-Georgetown Medical Center, Inc., Washington Hospital Center Corporation and National Rehabilitation Hospital, Inc. As previously indicated, the foregoing motions will not be addressed herein.

already agreed to between Becton and the [pharmacy] under applicable GPO agreements or otherwise directly with Becton." (Id.).

The Complaint goes on to allege that "as a result of this purchasing process, there is effectively only one sale: the [pharmacy] purchases Becton Disposable Hypodermic Products at prices negotiated with Becton and then receives these Products from authorized distributors." (Id.). Because authorized distributors have no control over the pricing of Becton's products, they, therefore, act solely as a distribution agent, "temporarily holding inventory and then delivering the product purchased" by the pharmacy. (Id., P 51). Thus, the only price which the authorized distributors negotiate with Becton and/or the healthcare provider is the amount of the delivery and/or administrative fee associated with same. (Id.). "The fixed percentage the authorized distributor charges for distribution services is the same no matter the price the Class Member negotiates and then pays Becton, and the price a Class Member pays for Becton Disposable Hypodermic Products will be the same from all authorized [*8] distributors." (Id.). The Complaint also explains that upon information and belief, Becton sells a portion of its Disposable Hypodermic Products to wholesalers, who then resell these products to indirect class members. (Id., P 55).

II. Becton's Alleged Anti-Competitive Conduct

Beginning in the early 1980s, rival manufacturers began posing a threat to Becton's dominance in the Disposable Hypodermic Products markets. (Id., P 47). As a result, Becton began engaging in certain anti-competitive and illegal practices, which served to foreclose competition in the relevant markets by suppressing competition from current competitors and/or product innovators, such as Terumo and Retractable (Id., P 6).

The specific anti-competitive practices set forth in the Complaint include: (1) Becton's imposition of market share purchase requirements on persons purchasing Disposable Hypodermic Products, (2) Becton's bundling of its goods for exclusionary and predatory purposes, (3) Becton's exclusionary contracts with certain GPOs, and (4) Becton's bundling of its goods with the goods of other manufacturers for exclusionary purposes. (Id., P 4). Such practices were specifically designed to "eliminate or lessen [*9] competition and unlawfully acquire and maintain monopoly and/or market power" in the four relevant markets mentioned above, namely: (1) disposable syringes and their associated needles, (2) disposable blood collection tubes, (3) disposable blood collection tube holders, and (4) IV catheters and their associated needles. (Id., P 2). Erecting such artificial barriers in the form of anti-competitive conduct has "discouraged potential rivals from even attempting to invest the resources necessary to challenge Becton's dominance in the markets for Disposable Hypodermic Products." (Id., P 47). Moreover, the Complaint alleges that there are no pro-competitive efficiencies created through such predatory and exclusionary conduct. (Id., P 70).

A. Market Share Purchase Requirements and Bundling

The Complaint also alleges that Becton uses exclusionary contracts in order to "bundle together for sale different types of products to protect and exploit its market power." (Id., P 64). For example, Becton responded to bid requests from GPOs, by offering proposals to sell its Disposable Hypodermic Products along with unrelated products, thereby providing substantial financial incentives to customers which [*10] agreed to purchase all of the products included in the bundle. (Id.).

Pursuant to one such purchasing program, in order "to receive the purported benefit" of the bundle, "purchasers had to agree to fill at least 95% of their Disposable Hypodermic Product needs from Becton." (Id., P 65). On the other hand, customers who purchased less than Becton's suggested "compliance" levels of their Disposable Hypodermic Products needs from Becton were penalized by (1) having to pay higher prices for Disposable Hypodermic Products, (2) losing certain post-purchase rebates, and (3) having to re-pay past rebates received by Becton. (Id.).

Becton has also offered certain customers "conversion" bonuses and rebates, which served as an additional incentive to accept the bundle of Becton products. (Id., P 66). One such conversion program offered customers with one month's worth of Disposable Hypodermic Products as an inducement to choose Becton as their "primary"

Disposable Hypodermic Product supplier. (Id.). Under this program, customers became eligible for certain "premium" discounts on Becton products only if they agreed to use a "minimum of three of four Becton Dickinson safety product categories that [*11] include needles and syringes, IV catheters, surgical blades and blood collection." (Id.). Because many of Becton's competitors in the Disposable Hypodermic Product markets are smaller companies which sell much fewer products, "these competitors cannot profitably match Becton's structured offers across product lines (because the combined discounts on all of the products in Becton's bundle is in many cases greater than the entire price of a single product made by another manufacturer)." (Id., P 67). As a result of such "deliberately designed" programs, a substantial portion of the Disposable Hypodermic Product markets has been foreclosed. (Id., P 68).

B. Exclusionary Contracts

Finally, the Complaint alleges that anywhere between 68% to 98% of hospitals in this country currently belong to at least one GPO, which serves as a negotiating agent for healthcare providers. (Id., P 56). GPOs were originally designed as a way for hospitals to save money by pooling their purchasing power in order to negotiate lower prices for medical products and/or goods. (Id., P 57). Prior to 1986, any payments made by manufacturers to a GPO were considered an illegal "kickback," which violated the Social Security [*12] Act's "anti-kickback" provisions. (Id.). However, Congress amended the Social Security Act's "anti-kickback" provisions in 1986 to create certain limited exceptions for amounts paid by vendors to a GPO. (Id.). Thus, according to the Complaint, in order to influence GPOs, such as Premier, Becton has rewarded them not only with substantial cash payments, but also with high administrative fees, and equity positions. (Id., P 58).

Becton also secured "commitment contracts" with certain GPOs -- including Novation and Premier -- which essentially required that they deal exclusively with Becton for all their Hypodermic Product needs. (Id., PP 59-61). For example, in 1998, one such GPO, Premier, awarded Becton with a 7.5 year "sole-source" contract. (Id., P 59). Similarly, in 1999, Becton awarded another GPO, Novation, with a $ 1 million payment -- in addition to certain administrative fees -- for a 4-year "sole-source" contract, whereby "Becton would be the only vendor approved by Novation to sell Disposable Hypodermic Products to Novation members." (Id.). Such commitment or "sole-source" contracts were implemented to prevent healthcare providers from buying Disposable Hypodermic Products made [*13] by other manufacturers. (Id., P 60). In fact, "[i]f a Class member desired to purchase Disposable Hypodermic Products from a manufacturer that was not the chosen sole-source contractor for the GPO, the Class member risked losing numerous financial incentives." (Id.).

Finally, Plaintiffs allege that Becton used exclusionary practices to unfairly and unlawfully limit competition from competing manufacturers of Disposable Hypodermic Products. (Id., P 71). For example, the Complaint alleges that in response to a growing threat to its monopoly power in the Disposable Hypodermic Product markets by a Japanese corporation by the name of Terumo, Becton engaged in a program called "Block Terumo" in the late 1980s, "which entailed the use of an aggressive strategy that included the bundled pricing and contracting strategies described above and other similar exclusionary and predatory tactics." (Id., P 72). Similar strategies were utilized by Becton to limit competition from another competitor -- Retractable Technologies -- in the late 1990s. (Id., PP 73-74).

III. Market Effects of Becton's Alleged Anti-Competitive Conduct

The Complaint alleges that the combined market effect of the foregoing anti-competitive [*14] actions have resulted in foreclosed competition and, thus, higher prices for all purchasers of Becton's Disposable Hypodermic Products. (Id., P 69). Thus, according to the Complaint, Becton's customers have paid more than they would have paid in the absence of such unlawful conduct, "contrary to Becton's representations that hospitals and other customers who purchased Becton's bundle would receive a financial benefit." (Id., PP 69, 77). Thus, not only were healthcare providers deprived of the opportunity to purchase competing Disposable Hypodermic Products, but they were also forced to pay Becton artificially inflated prices for same. (Id., P 77).

IV. The Consolidated Class Action Complaint

In light of the foregoing, Plaintiffs brought this action, pursuant to Sections 4 and 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 15(a) and 26, to recover treble damages, equitable relief, and reasonable attorneys' fees for Defendant's alleged violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1-2, as well as Section 3 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 14. Plaintiffs filed the instant class action complaint on May 10, 2006, pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23(a), (b)(2) and (b)(3), on [*15] their behalf, and as representatives of the following class (hereinafter referred to as the "Class"):

> All persons in the United States who purchased Disposable Hypodermic Products manufactured by Becton through Becton's authorized distributors, at any time during the period 1988 through the present (the "Class Period"). The Class excludes Becton, Becton's parents, subsidiaries and affiliates, as well as Becton's authorized distributors.

(Compl., P 16). In the alternative, or in addition, Plaintiffs seek to bring this action on their own behalf and as representatives of the following class of persons and entities (hereinafter referred to as the "Indirect Class"):

> All persons in Alabama, Arizona, California, District of Columbia, Florida, Hawaii, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, South Dakota, Tennessee, Utah, Vermont, West Virginia, and Wisconsin (the "Class Jurisdictions"), who purchased Disposable Hypodermic Products manufactured by Becton through a distributor or wholesaler at any time during the period 1988 through the present (the "Class Period"). The Class excludes Becton, [*16] Becton's parents, subsidiaries and affiliates, and all distributors or wholesalers.

Count One of the Complaint alleges unreasonable restraint of trade, in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act and Section 3 of the Clayton Act. Count Two of the Complaint alleges monopoly maintenance, in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act, and Count Three alleges attempted monopolization also in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act. Count Four alleges state antitrust law violations, brought only by the Indirect Class. Count Five alleges unjust enrichment, brought by the Indirect Class members in Arizona, District of Columbia, Florida, Hawaii, Iowa, Maine, Massachusetts, Montana, Nebraska, South Dakota, Tennessee, Utah, and Vermont. Count Six alleges also alleges unjust enrichment, brought by the Indirect Class members in Alabama, California, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Nevada, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, West Virginia, and Wisconsin.

Defendant Becton now moves to dismiss the Complaint pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6).

LEGAL STANDARD

HN2[] The applicable inquiry under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) is well-settled. Courts must [*17] accept all well-pleaded allegations in the complaint as true and draw all reasonable inferences in favor of the non-moving party. [6] See Scheuer v. Rhodes, 416 U.S. 232, 236, 94 S. Ct. 1683, 40 L. Ed. 2d 90 (1974), abrogated on other grounds by Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 102 S. Ct. 2727, 73 L. Ed. 2d 396 (1982); Allegheny Gen. Hosp. v. Philip Morris, Inc., 228 F.3d 429, 434-35 (3d Cir. 2000). However, courts are not required to credit bald assertions or legal conclusions improperly alleged in the complaint. See In re Burlington Coat Factory Sec. Litig., 114 F.3d 1410, 1429 (3d Cir.1997). Similarly, legal conclusions draped in the guise of factual allegations may not benefit from the presumption of truthfulness. See In re Nice Sys., Ltd. Secs. Litig., 135 F. Supp.2d 551, 565 (D.N.J. 2001).

[6] In doing so, a court may look only to the facts alleged in the complaint and any accompanying attachments, and may not look at the record. See Jordan v. Fox, Rothschild, O'Brien & Frankel, 20 F.3d 1250, 1261 (3d Cir. 1994).

HN3[] "While a complaint attacked by a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss does not need detailed factual allegations, a plaintiff's obligation to provide the 'grounds' of his 'entitle[ment] to relief' requires more than labels and conclusions, and [*18] a formulaic recitation of a cause of action's elements will not do. Factual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level on the assumption that all of the complaint's allegations are true." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 1959, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). [7] Ultimately, however, the question is not whether plaintiffs will prevail at trial, but whether they should be given an opportunity to offer evidence in support of their claims. Scheuer, 416 U.S. at 236.

Additionally, the Third Circuit has explained that HN4[] antitrust complaints, in particular, should be liberally [*19] construed. Pennsylvania ex rel. Zimmerman v. Pepsico, Inc., 836 F.2d 173, 179 (3d Cir. 1988). Although there is no heightened pleading standard in antitrust cases, [8] antitrust complaints are not exempt from the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. See, e.g., Zimmerman, 836 F.2d at 179-80. In this vein, the Third Circuit has indicated that the pleading standard for "Section 1 claims is the short and concise statement standard of Rule 8(a)." [9] Lum v. Bank of Am., 361 F.3d 217, 228 (3d Cir. 2004) (distinguishing the "short and concise statement" standard of Rule 8(a), generally applicable to antitrust claims, from the heightened "particularity" standard of Rule 9(b), applicable to antitrust claims sounding in fraud). In assessing the Rule 8(a) pleading standard in the context of antitrust cases, the United States Supreme Court has explained that "[w]hile a complaint attacked by a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss does not need detailed factual allegations," it must plead "enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Bell Atl. Corp., 127 S.Ct. at 1964, 1974. [10] With this framework in mind, the Court turns now to the issues raised by Defendant in support of [*20] the instant motion.

DISCUSSION

Becton argues that the Complaint should be dismissed for failure to state claims upon which relief can be granted based on the following: (1) Plaintiffs have not adequately alleged the essential elements or necessary facts of any of its federal antitrust claims, (2) Plaintiffs have not adequately alleged the essential elements of any state-law antitrust claims, (3) Plaintiffs lack standing to assert the Clayton Act claim, (4) Plaintiffs lack standing to assert certain state law claims, and (5) certain state claims fail as a matter [*21] of law.

I. Federal Antitrust Claims

A. Elements of Claims

[7] In so holding, the United States Supreme Court rejected the language previously used by the Court in Conley v. Gibson, providing that "[i]n appraising the sufficiency of the complaint we follow, of course, the accepted rule that a complaint should not be dismissed for failure to state a claim unless it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief." 355 U.S. 41, 45-46, 78 S. Ct. 99, 2 L. Ed. 2d 80 (1957). See Bell Atl. Corp., 127 S.Ct. at 1964, 1974 (holding that the Conley "no set of facts" language "has earned its retirement" and "is best forgotten.").

[9] Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a) provides that HN5[] "[a] pleading which sets forth a claim for relief . . . shall contain . . . a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief."

[10] See also Associated Gen. Contractors of Cal., Inc. v. Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 528 n. 17, 103 S. Ct. 897, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723 (1983) (stating that HN6[] "a district court must retain the power to insist upon some specificity in pleading before allowing a potentially massive factual controversy to proceed.").

Defendant argues that Plaintiffs have failed to allege any of the required elements of an antitrust claim. (Def. Br. at 12). In particular, Defendant claims that the Complaint is deficient in alleging (1) a relevant market, (2) anti-competitive effects, (3) antitrust injury, (4) standing, and (5) unlawful "exclusive dealing" or "exclusionary conduct." Because Defendant has presented the Court with such global pleading arguments, which allegedly relate to Counts One, Two and Three, it is not entirely clear to the Court which arguments relate to which claims, and therefore, the specific basis on which Defendant believes that Plaintiffs have failed to plead particular elements of any claim. As a result, the Court will begin its analysis by assessing, generally, whether the Complaint alleges the requisite elements of the federal antitrust claims, [11] and will then turn to Defendant's broader pleading arguments, keeping in mind that HN7[] antitrust complaints are liberally construed in this Circuit. See PepsiCo, Inc., 836 F.2d at 179.

Count One

> HN9[] Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal. Every person who shall make any contract or engage in any combination or conspiracy hereby declared to be illegal shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $ 100,000,000 if a corporation, or, if any other person, $ 1,000,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding 10 years, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

15 U.S.C. § 1.

The Third Circuit has explained that HN10[] there are four essential elements of a § 1 violation:

> (1) concerted action by the defendants; (2) that produced anti-competitive effects within the relevant product and geographic [*23] markets; (3) that the concerted action was illegal; and (4) that the plaintiff was injured as a proximate result of the concerted action.

Queen City Pizza, Inc. v. Domino's Pizza, Inc., 124 F.3d 430, 442 (3d Cir. 1997). Moreover, "[b]ecause § 1 of the Sherman Act 'does not prohibit [all] unreasonable restraints of trade . . . but only restraints effected by a contract, combination, or conspiracy,' '[t]he crucial question' is whether the challenged anticompetitive conduct 'stem[s] from independent decision or from an agreement, tacit or express.'" Bell Atl. Corp., 127 S.Ct. at 1964. As a result, "stating such a claim requires a complaint with enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest that an agreement was made." Id. at 1965.

Section 3 of the Clayton Act, in turn, provides that:

> HN11[] It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to lease or make a sale or contract for sale of goods . . . or fix a price charged therefor, or discount from, or rebate upon, such price, on the condition, agreement, or understanding that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods . . . of a competitor or competitors of the lessor or seller, [*24] where the effect of such lease, sale, or contract for sale or such condition, agreement, or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

15 U.S.C. § 14. See Town Sound and Custom Tops, Inc. v. Chrysler Motors Corp., 959 F.2d 468, 473 n. 2 (3d Cir. 1992) (explaining that HN12[] Section 3 of the Clayton Act was technically written to "cover exclusive dealing contracts (contracts requiring the purchaser not to deal in the goods of a competitor of the seller) but Congress also intended to cover tying arrangements.").

[11] In doing so, the Court is cognizant of the fact that HN8[] "a [*22] formulaic recitation of a cause of action's elements" alone will not sustain Plaintiffs' obligation to provide the grounds of their entitlement to relief. Bell Atl. Corp., 127 S.Ct. at 1959.

HN13[] Recovery under Section 3 of the Clayton Act generally requires: (1) an "exclusive dealing" arrangement, and (2) "the probable effect of the exclusion must be to substantially lessen competition in the market." *Barr Labs., Inc. v. Abbott Labs., No. 87-4764, 1989 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6051, 1989 WL 60320, 4 (D.N.J. June 1, 1989) (citing Tampa Elec. Co. v. Nashville Coal Co., 365 U.S. 320, 327, 81 S. Ct. 623, 5 L. Ed. 2d 580 (1961)).

Here, the Complaint alleges that Becton entered into anti-competitive arrangements with GPOs, such as Premier, whereby it would pay the GPOs "millions of dollars in cash payments," as well as "equity positions," with the expectation and/or understanding [*25] that said GPOs would then "favor Becton's products, regardless of price, over those of Becton's competitors." (Compl., P 58). The Complaint cites to an article from February 1997, which states that as a result of a recent deal between Becton and Premier, whereby Premier would "receive a portion of administrative fees in the form of warrants to buy Becton stock. If Becton Dickinson's fortunes rise, buoyed in part by Premier purchases, so will the value of the stock held by Premier." (Id.).

The Complaint also alleges that Becton entered into agreements with GPOs, certain hospitals and other customers which included "bundled financial incentives" and "exclusive dealing commitments." (Compl., P 81). For example, during 1999, it is alleged that Becton provided Novation, another GPO, with a $ 1 million payment, on top of the 3% administrative fees, in exchange for a four-year "sole-source contract under which Becton would be the only vendor approved by Novation to sell Disposable Hypodermic Products to Novation members." (Id., P 59). [12] The Complaint further alleges that the object of such an arrangement was to prevent Class members from purchasing Disposable Hypodermic Products made by other [*26] manufacturers, because "[i]f a Class member desired to purchase Disposable Hypodermic Products from a manufacturer that was not the chosen sole-source contractor for the GPO, the Class member risked losing numerous financial incentives." (Id., P 60). Accordingly, such arrangements served to significantly "impede and prevent competing Disposable Hypodermic Product manufacturers from selling significant (if any) Disposable Hypodermic Products to healthcare providers that used those GPOs." (Id., P 61).

Moreover, HN15[] a plaintiff must allege facts establishing an "antitrust [*27] injury." See Schuykill Energy Res., Inc. v. Pa. Power & Light, 113 F.3d 405, 413, 417 (3d Cir. 1997) (recognizing that the existence of antitrust injury is not typically resolved through motions to dismiss). In this regard, the Complaint alleges that Plaintiffs were injured by Becton's exclusionary practices, including its "sole-source" arrangements with certain GPOs, to the extent that they were forced to pay higher prices for Disposable Hypodermic Products than they would have paid in the absence of such practices and/or arrangements. (Compl., PP 62, 84, 92, 98).

Count Two

Count Two of the Complaint alleges monopoly maintenance in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act. Section 2 of the Sherman Act provides that:

> HN16[] Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $ 100,000,000 if a corporation, or, if any other person, $ 1,000,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding 10 years, or by both said punishments, in the discretion [*28] of the court.

---

[12] Given the foregoing allegations, the Court finds "plausible grounds to infer an agreement" between Defendant and certain GPOs and/or manufactures. Bell Atl. Corp., 127 S.Ct. at 1965. See generally Elder--Beerman Stores Corp. v. Federated Dep't Stores, Inc., 459 F.2d 138, 146 (6th Cir. 1972) (HN14[] "The granting of exclusive selling rights or acceptance of such exclusive selling rights, acts which are not prohibited by law unless there is a resulting foreclosure of market alternatives cannot, without proof of such foreclosure, form the basis for a jury verdict that the defendants had entered into a conspiracy to restrain trade.").

15 U.S.C. § 2.

The Third Circuit has indicated that HN17[] a § 2 violation generally consists of two elements: "(1) possession of monopoly power [in the relevant product market] and (2) '. . . maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident.'" United States v. Dentsply Int'l, 399 F.3d 181, 186 (3d Cir. 2005) (citing Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Technical Servs., Inc., 504 U.S. 451, 480, 112 S. Ct. 2072, 119 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1992)). The Complaint alleges that Becton possesses monopoly power in the Disposable Syringe and Blood Collection Tube and Blood Collection Tube Holder markets, in the United States. (Compl., P 86). The Complaint also alleges that in order to maintain such monopoly power, "Becton has willfully and unlawfully used exclusionary and predatory conduct, including but not limited to, bundled pricing with the intent to foreclose competition, and exclusionary agreements." (Id., P 88). The Complaint likewise alleges that Becton's monopoly power in the Disposable Syringe, Blood Collection Tube and Blood Collection Tube Holder markets is not the result of "superior product offerings, good faith business acumen, [*29] or historical accident." (Id., PP 90). Rather, it is the result of certain "deliberately designed" programs and/or arrangements with GPOs and healthcare providers, including but not limited to, commitment contracts, bundling contracts, and conversion bonuses. (Id., PP 58, 59, 65-68). [13]

Count Three

Count Three of the Complaint alleges attempted monopolization, in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act. HN18[] "To state a claim for attempted monopolization, a plaintiff must allege '(1) that the defendant has engaged in predatory or anticompetitive conduct with (2) a specific intent to monopolize [*30] and (3) a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power.'" Schuylkill Energy Res., Inc. v. Pa. Power & Light Co., 113 F.3d 405, 413 (3d Cir. 1997) (citation omitted). The Complaint alleges that, "to the extent that Becton does not possess monopoly power in the Disposable Syringe, Blood Collection Tube and/or Blood Collection Tube Holder markets in the United States, it has unlawfully attempted to monopolize the markets for Disposable Syringes, Blood Collection Tubes and/or Blood Collection Tubes." (Compl., P 94). In particular, the Complaint alleges that Becton engaged in exclusionary and predatory conduct, including bundled pricing and exclusionary agreements, with the "specific intent" of achieving its goal of obtaining a monopoly in the foregoing markets. (Id., PP 95, 96). For example, the Complaint explains that Becton engaged in a program called "Block Terumo," as a result of "the growing threat" posed by the price reductions of a competitor, Terumo. (Id., P 72). The Complaint goes on to allege that, as a result of the implementation of the "exclusionary and predatory sales tactics" (i.e., the "Block Terumo" program) "Terumo's market share in the United States for the Disposable [*31] Hypodermic Products went from approximately 12% to approximately 1%." (Id.). By 1992, "Terumo announced that it would no longer focus on selling hypodermic products to hospitals in the United States," thus illustrating that "there is a dangerous probability that if left unchecked, Becton will achieve its goals of obtaining monopoly power in said markets. (Id., PP 72, 97). [14]

B. Generally

[13] See, e.g., SmithKline Corp. v. Eli Lilly & Co., 575 F.2d 1056, 1065 (3d Cir. 1978) (finding that "the act of willful acquisition and maintenance of monopoly power was brought about by linking products on which Lilly faced no competition Keflin and Keflex with a competitive product, Kefzol. The result was to sell all three products on a non-competitive basis in what would have otherwise been a competitive market for Ancef and Kefzol. The effect of the Revised CSP was to force SmithKline to pay rebates on one product, Ancef, equal to rebates paid by Lilly based on volume sales of three products.").

[14] See generally Schuylkill Energy Res., Inc., 113 F.3d at 415 ("Thus, SER must allege that PP & L unlawfully acquired monopoly power or had a dangerous probability of unlawfully achieving monopoly power in its service area. To do this, SER must allege that PP & L in some way acted to exclude SER as a competitor in the delivery of electricity to customers in PP & L's service area.").

Relevant Market

Turning now to Defendant's arguments, Defendant claims that Plaintiffs have failed to set forth the requisite relevant market. (Def. Br. at 12). In particular, Defendant claims that (1) Plaintiffs improperly combine "safety and conventional products without any allegations of the reasonable interchangeability and cross-elasticity of demand," and (2) Plaintiffs' definition of the "IV" catheter market," which [*32] includes winged IV catheters does not allege whether these products "can be interchanged, used to perform the same clinical functions or substituted for each other in medical practice." (Id. at 13).

The Third Circuit has explained that HN19[] Plaintiffs have the burden of defining the relevant market, and that the "outer boundaries of a product market are determined by the reasonable interchangeability of use or the cross-elasticity of demand between the product itself and substitutes for it." Queen City Pizza, Inc. v. Domino's Pizza, Inc., 124 F.3d 430, 436 (3d Cir. 1997) (internal citations omitted). In Queen City Pizza, the Court went on to explain that:

> Where the plaintiff fails to define its proposed relevant market with reference to the rule of reasonable interchangeability and cross-elasticity of demand, or alleges a proposed relevant market that clearly does not encompass all interchangeable substitute products even when all factual inferences are granted in plaintiff's favor, the relevant market is legally insufficient and a motion to dismiss may be granted.

Id.

The Complaint alleges four relevant product markets: (1) disposable syringes and associated needles, (2) disposable blood collection [*33] tubes, (3) disposable blood collection tube holders, and (4) intravenous catheter devices and their associated needles. (Compl., P 2). The Complaint likewise alleges that there is no product "that can reasonably be substituted for" any of the products comprising the relevant product markets. (Id., PP 28, 33, 38, 43). Defendant is correct in noting that the Complaint alleges that each of the four products at issue come in safety and non-safety forms. (Id., PP 26, 37, 48). To the extent that Defendant urges the Court to conclude, based on the foregoing allegations, (1) that the two versions of each product, therefore, comprise separate product markets, and (2) that "folding these two separate markets into one general market creates an implausible product market," [15] the Court determines that any such determination would be improper at this juncture. [16] See, e.g., Fineman v. Armstrong World Indus., Inc., 980 F.2d 171, 199 (3d Cir. 1992) (HN20[] "the determination of a relevant product market or submarket ("market") is a highly factual one best allocated to the trier of fact."); Weiss v. York Hosp., 745 F.2d 786, 825 (3d Cir. 1984) ("Market definition is a question of fact.").

Defendant also makes the cursory argument that Plaintiffs' definition of the "IV catheter market," which includes winged IV catheters does not allege whether these products "can [*35] be interchanged, used to perform the same clinical functions or substituted for each other in medical practice," without citing to the relevant portion of the Complaint which allegedly defines the "IV catheter market" as such. (Def. Br. at 13). Although the Complaint does allege that Becton manufactures IV Catheters "including Winged IV Catheters," the Complaint does not expressly allege that the "Winged IV Catheters" necessarily fall within the relevant product market of "IV Catheters and their Associated Needles." (Compl., PP 42, 43). Moreover, the Complaint does allege that "[a] relevant product market exists for the sale of IV Catheters and their associated needles and the market segments thereunder," and that "no

[15] In particular, [*34] Defendant argues that "as a matter of federal law, safety and conventional devices are not interchangeable" and thus cannot be part of the same relevant market. (Def. Br. at 8). Even if Defendant is ultimately correct, the Court declines to engage in any such analysis at this time. See, e.g., Ansell, Inc. v. Schmid Labs, Inc., 757 F. Supp. 467 (D.N.J. 1991) (defining relevant product market after multi-day hearing, including expert testimony).

[16] Moreover, Defendant's reliance on E. & G. Gabriel v. Gabriel Bros., Inc., -- a case which is not binding on this Court and distinguishable on a number of levels -- is misplaced. *No. 93-0894, 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9455, 1994 WL 369147, at 3 (S.D.N.Y. July 13, 1994) (finding plaintiff's proposed market, comprised of "products as varied as household hardwares and children's sleepwear," to be implausible, and reasoning that "[h]ammers are obviously not reasonable substitutes for children's pajamas, they are not used for similar purposes, nor will the price of hammers affect the price of pajamas.").

product . . . can be substituted for IV Catheters and their associated needles to fill this medical need." (Id., P 43) (emphasis added).

Anti-Competitive Effects

Defendant claims that the Complaint "contains no particularized allegations about competition in any specific market. Plaintiffs never once identify any specific product as the subject of an exclusive contract or a bundled discount. Nor do they ever allege that any specific contract or agreement impacted any specific [*36] product market or any specific competitor within that market." (Def. Br. at 15). Additionally, Defendant argues that the Complaint "is silent about the competitive dynamics or prices in any specific product market. Nor does the . . . Complaint allege what specific competitors (or would-be competitors) participated in, and were supposedly excluded from, which of the specific product markets." (Id. at 16). However, Defendant cites to no legal authority indicating that such particularized allegations are a pleading requirement. [17] To the contrary, the Supreme Court has reiterated that HN21[] "Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a)(2) requires only 'a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief,' in order to 'give the defendant fair notice of what the . . . claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.'" Bell Atlantic Corp., 127 S.Ct. at 1964 (quoting Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 78 S. Ct. 99, 2 L. Ed. 2d 80 (1957)). [18] The Court recognizes that the Third Circuit has applied a heightened pleading standard in antitrust cases sounding in fraud. See, e.g., Lum, 361 F.3d at 228 (distinguishing the "short and concise statement" standard of Rule 8(a), generally applicable to antitrust claims, [*37] from the heightened "particularity" standard of Rule 9(b), applicable to antitrust claims sounding in fraud). However, Defendant does not suggest that the antitrust claims alleged in the Complaint sound in fraud. [19] Therefore, the Court sees no reason why it should apply the more rigorous pleading standard contemplated by Defendant to the case at hand. [20]

In any event, the Complaint does provide examples of the types of exclusionary practices allegedly utilized by Becton, and the purported effects of same. For example, the Complaint alleges that from 1998 through 1999, Becton engaged in securing commitment or "sole-source" contracts with certain GPOs, including Premier and [17] Throughout its papers, Defendant relies on a number of cases, which are not binding on this Court, for the proposition that Plaintiffs' have failed to plead with the requisite "particularity" or "specificity." The Court has reviewed these decisions and finds that such cases do not warrant dismissal of Plaintiffs' claims on such a basis at this time. *See, e.g., JM Computer Servs. v. Schlumberger Techs., 1996 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21885, 1996 WL 241607, at 4 (N.D. Cal. May 3, 1996) (granting defendant's motion to dismiss a § 2 claim where plaintiff (1) failed to "identify the specific products or services in product markets for which Plaintiff claims there is no price elasticity," (2) failed to "identify an agreement with a specific person or entity," and (3) "does not identify the parts, services, or contracts involved in the alleged exclusive dealing").

Defendant [*38] also relies heavily on the Third Circuit's decision in Garshman v. Universal Res. Holding Inc., 824 F.2d 223, 230-31 (3d Cir. 1987). The Court has reviewed the Garshman decision and finds that the deficiencies alleged by Defendant in this case do not rise to the level of those contemplated by the Third Circuit in Garshman, where the complaint, itself, failed to allege any "adverse effect on competition in any relevant market." Id. at 231 (stating that "[t]he allegation of unspecified contracts with unnamed other entities to achieve unidentified anticompetitive effects does not meet the minimum standards for pleading a conspiracy in violation of the Sherman Act.").

[18] While the Supreme Court indicated that "a plaintiff's obligation to provide the 'grounds' of his 'entitle[ment] to relief' requires more than labels and conclusions," for the reasons stated herein, the Court finds that Plaintiffs have met this burden. Bell Atl. Corp., 127 S.Ct. at 1959.

[19] *See also In re Ins. Brokerage Antitrust Litig., No. 04-5184, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 25632, 2007 WL 1100449, at 8 (D.N.J. April 5, 2007) (utilizing heightened pleading standard of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 9(b) where the plaintiffs' antitrust conspiracy claims [*39] were predicated on fraud).

[20] Defendant reasserts this argument repeatedly throughout its papers. For purposes of efficiency, the Court will not revisit this issue herein.

Novation, which required that they deal exclusively with Becton for any hypodermic product needs, in return for a substantial monetary payment. (Id., P 59). The Complaint also alleges that pursuant to Becton's purchasing programs, unrelated products from different product lines were "bundled" together for sale to hospitals and other healthcare providers whereby in order "to receive the purported benefit offered under the bundle, purchasers had to agree to fill at least 95% of their Disposable Hypodermic Product needs from Becton." (Id., PP 64, 65). As an additional incentive, Plaintiffs also allege that Becton offered "conversion" programs. The Complaint goes on to list two examples of such programs, [*40] one of which provided a particular Class member with the ability to purchase Becton products at a premium discount only if it agreed to utilize a "minimum of three of four Becton Dickinson safety product categories that include needles and syringes, IV catheters, surgical blades and blood collection." (Id., P 66).

In addressing the anti-competitive effects of such programs, the Complaint alleges the following:

> Many of Becton's competitors in the Disposable Hypodermic Product markets are smaller, specialized companies that sell fewer products, and in some instances only a single product. As a result, these competitors cannot profitably match Becton's structured offers across product lines (because the combined discounts on all of the products in Becton's bundle is in many cases greater than the entire price of a single product made by another manufacturer). In certain cases, even if the competitor offered substantial discounts on Disposable Hypodermic Products (or indeed gave them away for free), it could not 'replace' all the discounts and rebates that the buyer would 'lose' as a penalty for rejecting Becton's bundle.

(Id., P 67). For instance, the Complaint alleges that beginning in [*41] the 1970s, one particular competitor, Terumo, "which manufactures certain disposable medical products, including disposable syringes and associated needles" -- one of the relevant product markets at issue -- began gaining approximately 12% of the United States market for various hypodermic products. (Compl., P 71). However, by 1992 -- as a direct result of certain exclusionary initiatives undertaken by Becton -- Terumo's market share dropped to approximately 1%, and it ultimately ceased focusing on selling any hypodermic products to hospitals in the United States. (Id., P 72). This, the Complaint alleges, demonstrates that Becton's actions effectively foreclosed competition in the relevant product markets, forcing Plaintiffs to pay higher prices for Disposable Hypodermic Products than they would have paid in the absence of Becton's exclusionary practices. (Id., PP 67, 68, 69).

The Court finds such allegations of anti-competitive conduct set forth in the Complaint to be in sharp contrast with the allegations found to be insufficient in Bell Atl. Corp., 127 S.Ct. at 1962-63. [21] In particular, the complaint at issue in Bell Atl. Corp. sought to demonstrate anti-competitive agreements based [*42] on parallel conduct through inference. Id. at 1962. To the contrary, the instant Complaint sets forth allegations of specific anti-competitive agreements -- between Becton and certain GPOs, and between Becton and certain manufacturers -- which the Court deems as providing Defendant with adequate notice of the particular grounds upon which Plaintiffs' claims rest, particularly given the fact that Plaintiffs have not yet had the benefit of discovery. [22] See, e.g., Hosp. Bldg. Co. v. Trs. of Rex Hosp., 425 U.S. 738, 746-747, 96 S. Ct. 1848, 48 L. Ed. 2d 338 (1976) (explaining that HN22[] "in antitrust cases, where 'the proof is largely in the hands of the alleged conspirators,' dismissals prior to giving the plaintiff ample opportunity for discovery should be granted very sparingly") (quotation omitted).

Antitrust Injury

[21] In Bell Atl. Corp., the plaintiffs alleged that the Incumbent Local Exchange Carriers "have entered into a contract, combination or conspiracy to prevent competitive entry in their respective local telephone and/or high speed internet services markets and have agreed not to compete with one another and otherwise allocated customers and markets to one another." Id. at 1963.

[22] The Court recognizes that "[t]he allegation of unspecified [*43] contracts with unnamed other entities to achieve unidentified anticompetitive effects does not meet the minimum standards for pleading a conspiracy in violation of the Sherman Act." Garshman v. Universal Res. Holding Inc., 824 F.2d 223, 230-31 (3d Cir. 1987). Nevertheless, the Court does not find that the deficiencies alleged by Defendant in this case rise to the level of those contemplated by the Third Circuit in Garshman, where the complaint, itself, failed to allege any "adverse effect on competition in any relevant market." Id. at 231.

Defendant argues that Plaintiffs cannot state a claim because the "vague" allegations of antitrust injury set forth in the Complaint lack the requisite specificity. (Def. Br. at 25-26). Defendant also argues that "[s]ince a plaintiff ordinarily must be a participant in the relevant market to suffer antitrust injury, MedStar cannot state a claim without alleging the specific market in which it buys or sells products." (Id. at 26).

In support of its argument that the allegations of antitrust injury contained in the Complaint are overly vague, Defendant presents the following hypothetical questions for the Court's consideration -- "Plaintiffs [*44] claim that they 'incurred overcharges' for some unspecified products. What were those products? In what markets are plaintiffs consumers?" (Def. Br. at 16). Even assuming, arguendo, that the Complaint does not specifically answer those questions, once again, Defendant cites to no legal authority indicating that antitrust injury must be plead with such specificity, [23] or that the antitrust injury alleged by Plaintiffs is somehow implausible. The Complaint alleges that "[b]y unlawfully excluding and impairing competition [in the four relevant product markets], Becton's conduct has caused Plaintiffs and the other Class members to pay more for Disposable Hypodermic Products than they otherwise would have paid absent Becton's illegal, exclusionary conduct." (Compl., P 62). Defendant has given the Court no specific basis on which to find such a pleading of antitrust injury to be insufficient. [24]

In the alternative, Defendant cites to Schuykill Energy Res., Inc. v. Pa. Power & Light, 113 F.3d 405, 415 (3d Cir. 1997), for the proposition that "[a] plaintiff who is neither a competitor nor a consumer in the relevant market does not suffer antitrust injury." (Def. Br. at 16). To the extent that Defendant moves to dismiss the Complaint on such a basis, any such request is denied. The United States Supreme Court has recognized that HN25[] an antitrust injury can be suffered by a plaintiff, even if the plaintiff "was not a competitor of the conspirators, [where] the injury she suffered was inextricably intertwined with the injury the conspirators sought to inflict on psychologists and the psychotherapy market." Blue Shield of Va. v. McCready, 457 U.S. 465, 484, 102 S. Ct. 2540, 73 L. Ed. 2d 149 (1982)). There, the [*46] Court went on to explain that "[i]n light of the conspiracy here alleged we think that McCready's injury 'flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful' within the meaning of Brunswick, and falls squarely within the area of congressional concern." Id.

The Third Circuit has likewise found that a terminal operator plaintiff lacked standing to assert antitrust injury in the soda ash market -- in which it was neither a consumer nor a competitor -- because the plaintiff had "made no showing of a connection between the alleged international soda ash conspiracy and the level of competition within the terminalling market." Int'l Raw Materials, Ltd., 978 F.2d at 1327-29. There, the Court explained "[b]ecause IRM is neither a competitor nor a consumer in the relevant market, it must allege a significant causal connection between the alleged soda ash conspiracy and the alleged anticompetitive effects in the terminalling market such that the harm to the terminalling market can be said to be 'inextricably intertwined' with the alleged soda ash cartel." Id. at 1327 (quoting McCready, 457 U.S. at 484). See also Gulfstream III Assocs., Inc. v. Gulfstream Aerospace Corp., 995 F.2d 425, 429 (3d Cir. 1993) [*47] (HN26[] "The second [Brunswick] requirement is generally met if the plaintiff is a 'competitor []or a consumer in the relevant market.' Alternatively, this requirement is fulfilled if there exists a 'significant causal connection' such that the harm to the plaintiff can be said to be 'inextricably intertwined' with the antitrust conspiracy.") (quoting McCready, 457 U.S. at 484). Thus, neither the Supreme Court nor the Third Circuit has foreclosed a finding of antitrust injury simply because the plaintiff was not a participant in the relevant [23] See, e.g., Bell Atl. Corp., 127 S.Ct. at 1960, 1964 (HN23[] "A complaint attacked by a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss does not need detailed factual allegations," only "enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.").

[24] See generally Harrison Aire, Inc. v. Aerostar Intern., Inc., 423 F.3d 374, 385 (3d Cir. 2005) [*45] ("Here, Harrison Aire is a consumer of balloon fabric, and it claims antitrust injury in the form of business losses caused by high fabric prices, which in turn allegedly were caused by Raven/Aerostar's exclusionary conduct in the relevant fabric market. This type of injury-HN24[] prohibitively high consumer prices resulting from allegedly monopolistic behavior-is the type the antitrust laws are designed to redress.").

market. [25] As a result, to the extent that Defendant moves to dismiss the Complaint on the basis that Plaintiffs cannot suffer antitrust injury in a relevant market in which it is not a participant, Defendant's motion is denied. [26]

Standing

Defendant also makes the argument that Plaintiffs lack standing under Section 3 of the Clayton Act because "neither Drug Mart nor Jabo has alleged that they are parties to any contract with Becton, exclusionary or otherwise, prohibiting them from buying products from Becton's competitors." (Def. Br. at 19).

Pursuant to this Court's March 23, 2007 Order, all parties were advised that the issue of Clayton Act standing would by addressed by way of separate motion. See CM/ECF Docket Entry Nos. 144, 146. As a result, the Court will not address the issues raised regarding same herein. [27]

Exclusive Dealing Allegations

Defendant makes the global argument that the "heart of plaintiffs' monopolization, attempted monopolization and restraint of trade claims are the allegations of Becton's alleged 'exclusionary' contracts, 'predatory sales tactics' and 'bundling' practices. There are many paragraphs and pages making vague allegations about how Becton sought to 'unfairly restrain and limit competition' in the non-existent 'Disposable Hypodermic Products' market, but there are no specific allegations about what specific contracts, with what specific parties, affected competition in which specific market." (Def Br. at 14). The crux of Defendant's argument is that, "plaintiffs allege no facts about which contracts are exclusive, [*50] which products they relate to, or who the parties are that are involved in those contracts." (Id. at 15).

The Complaint alleges that "Becton used 'commitment contracts' . . . [which] essentially required GPO members to deal exclusively with Becton for its Hypodermic Product needs." (Compl., P 59). The Complaint goes on to provide two examples of such "commitment contracts," (1) "in or around 1998 Premier awarded Becton a 7.5 year sole-source contract," and (2) "[i]n or around 1999, Becton provided another GPO, Novation, a $ 1 million payment (in addition to the 3% administrative fees that it pays Novation) for a 4-year sole-source contract under which Becton would be the only vendor approved by Novation to sell Disposable Hypodermic Products to Novation members." (Id.). Moreover, the Complaint alleges that "[i]f a Class member desired to purchase Disposable Hypodermic Products from a manufacturer that was not the chosen sole-source contractor for the GPO, the Class member risked losing numerous financial incentives," as a result, a "substantial portion of the markets for Disposable Hypodermic Products have been foreclosed." (Id., PP 60, 68).

[25] Because Defendant does not argue that Plaintiffs' alleged injuries are not "inextricably intertwined" with Defendant's alleged actions in the relevant markets, the Court need not consider same.

[26] Defendant also makes the related argument that Plaintiffs lack antitrust standing generally because they "have not alleged the facts that would give them standing to complain -- e.g., that they actually buy conventional IV catheters, [*48] that the conduct alleged actually affected the price of conventional IV catheters, or that plaintiffs actually were injured by that conduct." (Def. Br. at 17, 20) (emphasis in original). To the extent that the Court should construe such an argument as based on the theory that Plaintiffs cannot suffer antitrust injury in a relevant market in which it is not a participant, such an argument is, therefore, rejected.

[27] To the extent that Defendant argues that Plaintiffs lack antitrust standing generally based on the theory that Plaintiffs have not alleged that they are direct purchasers of the Disposable [*49] Hypodermic Products at issue, the Court will, therefore, defer its consideration of this argument. See Def. Br. at 17, 20 (arguing that Plaintiffs lack standing because they "have not alleged the facts that would them standing to complain -- e.g., that they actually buy conventional IV catheters, that the conduct alleged actually affected the price of conventional IV catheters, or that plaintiffs actually were injured by that conduct.") (emphasis in original).

In light of the foregoing allegations, the [*51] Court finds that Defendant's argument that "there are no specific allegations about what specific contracts, with what specific parties, affected competition in which specific market" to be unpersuasive. [28] See, e.g., Bell Atl. Corp., 127 S.Ct. at 1965 (HN27[] "Asking for plausible grounds to infer an agreement does not impose a probability requirement at the pleading stage; it simply calls for enough fact to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of illegal agreement.").

II. Indirect Purchaser Claims

A. Generally

In the alternative, Plaintiffs assert indirect purchaser claims under the laws of the District of Columbia and twenty-five other jurisdictions. Defendant moves to dismiss such "indirect" purchaser claims on the same basis on which it argues that Plaintiffs' federal antitrust claims are deficient. (Def. Br. at 22). As discussed above, Plaintiffs' claims will not be dismissed on these grounds.

Defendant also claims that "[t]here is an additional, and independent, reason for dismissing plaintiffs' 'indirect' purchaser claims under state law: the Complaint fails to allege what portion, if any, of Becton's alleged 'overcharge' was passed on to them." (Def. Br. at 22). In particular, Defendant argues that, as indirect purchasers, Plaintiffs must prove that Becton charged monopoly prices and that Becton's "overcharge" was passed on to Plaintiffs.

As a preliminary matter, the Court notes that [*53] Defendant cites to no legal authority indicating that Plaintiffs must plead the amount of "overcharge" which was passed on to them. Furthermore, although Defendant claims that "an indirect purchaser must allege and prove: (1) that a 'direct' purchaser (e.g., a wholesaler) was overcharged by Becton, (2) that the direct purchaser then passed on the overcharge, or some portion of it, to the 'indirect' purchaser, and (3) that the indirect purchaser did not turn around and pass on all of the overcharge to its customers," [29] the cases relied upon by Defendant in support of same -- which are not binding on this Court, and none of which were decided at the motion to dismiss stage -- do not dictate that the foregoing factors are a pleading requirement. [30] Therefore, the Court concludes that Defendant has not met its burden in demonstrating that Plaintiffs' indirect purchaser claims should be dismissed on such a basis at this time.

[28] Furthermore, the Court has reviewed the unpublished decisions cited to by Defendant and finds that the types of deficiencies alleged by Defendant in this case do not rise to the level of the deficiencies found by the respective courts in those cases. *See, e.g., McPherson's, Ltd. v. Never Dull, Inc., 1990 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17442, 1990 WL 238812, 4 (D.N.J. 1990) (dismissing antitrust claims where the complaint contained merely a "boilerplate allegation of price discrimination without providing supporting facts."); *JM Computer Servs. v. Schlumberger Techs., 1996 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21885, 1996 WL 241607, at 4 (N.D. Cal. May 3, 1996) (granting defendant's motion to dismiss a § 2 claim where plaintiff (1) failed to "identify the specific products [*52] or services in product markets for which Plaintiff claims there is no price elasticity," (2) failed to "identify an agreement with a specific person or entity," and (3) "does not identify the parts, services, or contracts involved in the alleged exclusive dealing").

[30] See In re Methionine Antitrust Litig., 204 F.R.D. 161, 164 (N.D. Cal. 2001); A&M Supply Co. v. Microsoft Corp., 252 Mich. App. 580, 654 N.W. 2d 572, 575 (Mich. Ct. App. 2002); Melnick v. Microsoft Corp., No. 99-709, 2001 WL 1012261, at *6 (Me. Super. Ct. Aug. 24, 2001).

Moreover, [*54] to the extent that Defendant cites to Illinois Brick Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (1977), for the proposition that "[a]n indirect purchaser plaintiff must prove that Becton charged monopoly prices and that all or some of Becton's 'overcharge' was passed through the distribution chain from the first purchaser to the indirect purchaser plaintiff" (Def. Br. at 23), Defendant fails to indicate how Plaintiffs' ultimate burden of proof is relevant at this stage of the litigation. See, e.g., Scheuer, 416 U.S. at 236 (explaining that, HN28[] in conducting a 12(b)(6) analysis, the question is not whether plaintiffs will ultimately prevail in a trial on the merits, but whether they should be given an opportunity to offer evidence in support of their claims).

B. Standing [31]

Defendant makes the argument that Count IV of the Complaint (asserting various state antitrust law violations) should be dismissed because the named plaintiffs lack standing to bring claims in those states in which the named plaintiffs do not reside or engage in business. (Def. Br. at 24, 27). In particular, Defendant argues that Plaintiffs cannot acquire standing by asserting claims on behalf of "un-named, un-identified absent class members." [32] (Id. at 25). The Court has considered Defendant's argument in this regard, but, for the reasons that follow, declines to rule on the issue prior to addressing the issue of class certification. [33]

The Supreme Court has explained that HN30[] "[w]hile an Article III court ordinarily must be sure of its own jurisdiction before getting to the merits, a Rule 23 [*57] question should be treated first because class certification issues are 'logically antecedent' to Article III concerns . . . ." Ortiz v. Fibreboard Corp., 527 U.S. 815, 816, 119 S. Ct. 2295, 144 L. Ed. 2d 715 (1999). Here, Defendant's argument that Plaintiffs do not enjoy standing to raise state antitrust claims in jurisdictions in which they do not reside or do business is an issue that would not arise unless class certification is granted. To be clear, the state antitrust claims alleged in Count IV of the Complaint are brought "only by the Indirect Class." See Compl. at 24 (emphasis added). It follows that if the Court determines that Plaintiffs' Indirect Class should not be certified, then Defendant's concerns regarding the state antitrust claims -- brought "only by the Indirect Class" -- may prove to be moot. Id. Therefore, in accordance with Ortiz, [34] the Court will defer its consideration of this argument until after class certification issues have been resolved. See, e.g., In re K-Dur Antitrust Litig., 338 F. Supp. 2d at 544 (declining to address defendant's argument that plaintiffs lack Article III standing to assert claims in jurisdictions in which plaintiffs do not allege to have been purchasers prior to determining [*58] class certification); Clark v. McDonald's Corp., 213 F.R.D. 198, 205 (2003) (declining to address defendant's argument that plaintiff has no standing to assert claims on behalf of class members regarding restaurants in states that plaintiff, himself, has not visited, and reasoning that such an issue "would not arise but for Clark's capacity as a putative class representative."); In re Buspirone Patent Litig., 185 F. Supp. 2d 363, 377 (S.D.N.Y. 2002) (deferring on issue of Article III standing on a motion to dismiss, and explaining that "it is appropriate to decide class certification before resolving alleged Article III challenges of the present kind."). As [31] HN29[] L. Civ. R. 7.2(b) imposes a 15 page limit for reply briefs when using a 14-point Times New Roman font, as was done in this case. Moreover, L. Civ. R. 7.2(b) specifically provides that "[b]riefs of greater length will only be accepted if special permission of the Judge or Magistrate Judge is obtained prior to submission of the brief." Defendant's reply brief totals 15 pages. However, Defendant's reply brief also refers the Court [*55] to pages 8-14 of the reply brief it submitted in connection with its motion to dismiss the Second Consolidated Amended Class Action Complaint filed by Louisiana Wholesale Drug Company, Inc., Rochester Drug Co-Operative, Inc., JM Smith d/b/a Smith Drug Company, Dik Drug Company, American Sales Company, Inc., Park Surgical Co. Inc. and SAJ Distributors, Inc. See Def. Reply Br. at 2. Not only does this put Defendant well over the allotted 15 page limit, but such cross-referencing is both confusing and frustrating to the Court, and should therefore be avoided in all future filings. In any event, Defendant does not indicate that it sought, or was given, permission, to file an over-length reply brief in this instance. As a result, to the extent that pages 8-14 of the reply brief submitted in connection with Defendant's motion to dismiss the Second Consolidated Amended Class Action Complaint filed by Louisiana Wholesale Drug Company, Inc., Rochester Drug Co-Operative, Inc., JM Smith d/b/a Smith Drug Company, Dik Drug Company, American Sales Company, Inc., Park Surgical Co. Inc. and SAJ Distributors, Inc. raise arguments not raised herein, the Court will not consider such arguments in connection [*56] with the instant motion to dismiss.

[32] The Court notes that the cases cited to by Defendant in support of this argument are either not binding on this Court, or were decided before Ortiz v. Fibreboard Corp., 527 U.S. 815, 119 S. Ct. 2295, 144 L. Ed. 2d 715 (1999). See Def. Br. at 25.

[33] Magistrate Judge Ronald J. Hedges' March 28, 2007 Order indicates that motions for class certification will be forthcoming. See CM/ECF Docket Entry No. 146.

[34] The Court is unpersuaded by Defendant's contention that the Ortiz "logically antecedent" exception does not apply to the circumstances at hand. 527 U.S. 815, 119 S. Ct. 2295, 144 L. Ed. 2d 715 (1999). (Def. Reply Br. at 3). As previously indicated, the state antitrust claims alleged in Count IV of the Complaint are brought "only by the Indirect Class." See Compl. at 24 (emphasis added). Should the Court decide not [*59] to certify the Indirect Class, then Defendant's concerns regarding claims "brought only by the Indirect Class" may be moot. Id.

such, to the extent that Defendant moves to dismiss Plaintiffs' state antitrust claims on such a basis, Defendant's motion is denied, without prejudice.

C. Unjust Enrichment Claims

Plaintiffs assert claims for unjust enrichment under the laws of the District of Columbia and twenty-five other jurisdictions. (Compl. at 27-28). HN31[] Generally, "in order to state a claim for unjust enrichment, a plaintiff must allege (1) at plaintiff's expense, (2) defendant received benefit, (3) under circumstances that would make it unjust for defendant to retain benefit without paying for it." In re K-Dur Antitrust Litig., 338 F. Supp. 2d at 544 (citing Restatement of Restitution § 1 (1937)). Here, the Complaint alleges that "[a]s a result of Becton's anticompetitive scheme alleged herein, Plaintiffs and the Class members paid too much for Becton Disposable Hypodermic Products. The payment of these 'overcharges' represents an unjust benefit Plaintiffs and Class members conferred upon Becton. Becton was unjustly enriched by these illegal overcharges and equity requires disgorgement to prevent Becton from benefitting from its illegal acts." (Compl., PP 108, 112).

Defendant moves to dismiss Plaintiffs' claims for unjust enrichment on [*60] the basis that such claims are redundant to the extent that they are "based on the same alleged facts and same alleged damages as their antitrust claims: that they 'paid too much' for Becton products and that the 'overcharge' was an 'unjust benefit' plaintiffs conferred on Becton." (Def. Br. at 36). While Defendant may ultimately be correct, HN32[] Plaintiffs are permitted to plead alternative theories of recovery. See, e.g., In re K-Dur Antitrust Litig., 338 F. Supp. 2d at 544 (denying motion to dismiss claims of unjust enrichment on the basis that equitable remedies such as unjust enrichment should not be granted where there exists an adequate remedy at law, and noting that plaintiffs "are clearly permitted to plead alternative theories of recovery."); United States v. Kensington Hosp., 760 F. Supp. 1120, 1135 (E.D. Pa. 1991) (recognizing that under Pennsylvania law an underlying contract precludes a claim of unjust enrichment, but allowing both claims to proceed, and explaining that the "Federal rules allow pleading in the alternative."). Therefore, the Court finds that it would be premature to dismiss Plaintiffs' unjust enrichment claims on such a basis at this stage of the litigation.

To [*61] the extent that Defendant moves to dismiss Plaintiffs' claims of unjust enrichment on the basis that certain individual states impose additional requirements, such as privity and exhaustion of remedies, the Court likewise determines that it is premature to consider these requirements on a state by state basis, at this time. Because neither the "Indirect Class," nor the "D.C. Indirect Class" has yet to be certified, the Court will not predict which state law(s) would be applicable in the event that said Classes are certified, "particularly given the fact that the anticipated complexity of a choice-of-law analysis may itself be a factor in determining the certifiability of the class." In re K-Dur Antitrust Litig., 338 F. Supp. 2d at 541. Therefore, Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' unjust enrichment claims is denied, without prejudice.

D. State Antitrust Claims

Finally, Defendant argues that certain state antitrust claims asserted by Plaintiffs are deficient for various reasons, including, but not limited to (1) Plaintiffs' inability to pursue claims under state antitrust laws which regulate only intrastate commerce, and (2) Plaintiffs' inability to meet particular pleading and/or [*62] procedural requirements set forth by certain states. For the same reasons why the Court deems it inappropriate to determine under which state laws Plaintiffs have viable unjust enrichment claims, the Court likewise determines that it would be inefficient to assess (1) which state antitrust laws would be applicable, and (2) the viability of Plaintiffs' state antitrust claims under such laws, prior to a determination on the issue of class certification. [35] Accordingly, to the extent that [35] See, e.g., In re K-Dur Antitrust Litig., 338 F. Supp. 2d at 542 (declining to address similar arguments regarding the deficiency of plaintiffs' state antitrust claims, and explaining that it would be "inefficient to determine under which state laws the Indirect Purchasers have viable claims before first deciding the class certification and choice of law issues.").

Defendant moves to dismiss Plaintiffs' state antitrust claims on such a basis, Defendant's motion is denied, without prejudice.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated herein, the Court denies Defendant's motion to dismiss the Consolidated Class Action Complaint. An appropriate Order accompanies this Opinion.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN1[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

In deciding motions to dismiss pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), courts generally consider only the allegations in the complaint, exhibits attached to the complaint, matters of public record, and documents that form the basis of a claim.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN2[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

The applicable inquiry under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) is well-settled. Courts must accept all well-pleaded allegations in the complaint as true and draw all reasonable inferences in favor of the non-moving party. In doing so, a court may look only to the facts alleged in the complaint and any accompanying attachments, and may not look at the record. However, courts are not required to credit bald assertions or legal conclusions improperly alleged in the complaint. Similarly, legal conclusions draped in the guise of factual allegations may not benefit from the presumption of truthfulness.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN3[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

While a complaint attacked by a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss does not need detailed factual allegations, a plaintiff's obligation to provide the grounds of his entitlement to relief requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of a cause of action's elements will not do. Factual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level on the assumption that all of the complaint's allegations are true. Ultimately, however, the question is not whether the plaintiffs will prevail at trial, but whether they should be given an opportunity to offer evidence in support of their claims.

HN4[] Regulated Practices, Private Actions

Antitrust complaints, in particular, should be liberally construed. Although there is no heightened pleading standard in antitrust cases, antitrust complaints are not exempt from the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The pleading standard for claims under 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 of the Sherman Act is the short and concise statement standard of Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a). The "short and concise statement" standard of Rule 8(a), generally applicable to antitrust claims, is distinguished from the heightened "particularity" standard of Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b), applicable to antitrust claims sounding in fraud. Regarding the Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a) pleading standard in the context of antitrust cases, while a complaint attacked by a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss does not need detailed factual allegations, it must plead enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.

Antitrust complaints are liberally construed in the Third Circuit.

A formulaic recitation of a cause of action's elements alone will not sustain plaintiffs' obligation to provide the grounds of their entitlement to relief.

See 15 U.S.C.S. § 1.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

HN10[] Sherman Act, Claims

There are four essential elements of a violation of 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 of the Sherman Act: (1) concerted action by the defendants; (2) that produced anti-competitive effects within the relevant product and geographic markets; (3) that the concerted action was illegal; and (4) that the plaintiff was injured as a proximate result of the concerted action. Moreover, because § 1 of the Sherman Act does not prohibit all unreasonable restraints of trade, but only restraints effected by a contract, combination, or conspiracy, the crucial question is whether the challenged anticompetitive conduct stems from independent decision or from an agreement, tacit or express. As a result, stating such a claim requires a complaint with enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest that an agreement was made.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing > Exclusive Dealing

HN12[] Tying Arrangements, Clayton Act

Section 3 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 14, was technically written to cover exclusive dealing contracts (contracts requiring the purchaser not to deal in the goods of a competitor of the seller), but Congress also intended to cover tying arrangements.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing > Exclusive Dealing

HN13[] Clayton Act, Claims

Recovery under § 3 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 14, generally requires: (1) an "exclusive dealing" arrangement, and (2) the probable effect of the exclusion must be to substantially lessen competition in the market.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing > Exclusive Dealing

HN14[] Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing, Exclusive Dealing

The granting of exclusive selling rights or acceptance of such exclusive selling rights, acts which are not prohibited by law unless there is a resulting foreclosure of market alternatives, cannot, without proof of such foreclosure, form the basis for a jury verdict that the defendants had entered into a conspiracy to restrain trade.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Remedies > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN15[] Private Actions, Remedies

An antitrust plaintiff must allege facts establishing an "antitrust injury." The existence of antitrust injury is not typically resolved through motions to dismiss.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

HN17[] Actual Monopolization, Claims

A violation of 15 U.S.C.S. § 2 of the Sherman Act generally consists of two elements: (1) possession of monopoly power in the relevant product market and (2) maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > Elements

HN18[] Attempts to Monopolize, Elements

To state a claim for attempted monopolization, a plaintiff must allege (1) that the defendant has engaged in predatory or anticompetitive conduct with (2) a specific intent to monopolize and (3) a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Market Definition > Relevant Market > Product Market Definition

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN19[] Relevant Market, Product Market Definition

Antitrust plaintiffs have the burden of defining the relevant market, and the outer boundaries of a product market are determined by the reasonable interchangeability of use or the cross-elasticity of demand between the product itself and substitutes for it. Where the plaintiff fails to define its proposed relevant market with reference to the rule of reasonable interchangeability and cross-elasticity of demand, or alleges a proposed relevant market that clearly does not encompass all interchangeable substitute products even when all factual inferences are granted in the plaintiff's favor, the relevant market is legally insufficient and a motion to dismiss may be granted.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Market Definition > Relevant Market > Product Market Definition

HN20[] Relevant Market, Product Market Definition

In an antitrust case, the determination of a relevant product market or submarket is a highly factual one best allocated to the trier of fact.

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Complaints > Requirements for Complaint

HN21[] Complaints, Requirements for Complaint

Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2) requires only a short and plain statement of a claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief, in order to give the defendant fair notice of what the claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN24[] Private Actions, Remedies

An antitrust injury can be suffered by a plaintiff, even if the plaintiff was not a competitor of the conspirators, where the injury the plaintiff suffered was inextricably intertwined with the injury the conspirators sought to inflict.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Remedies > General Overview

HN25[] Private Actions, Remedies

The second Brunswick requirement for showing antitrust injury is generally met if the plaintiff is a competitor or a consumer in the relevant market. Alternatively, this requirement is fulfilled if there exists a significant causal connection such that the harm to the plaintiff can be said to be inextricably intertwined with the antitrust conspiracy. Neither the United States Supreme Court nor the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit has foreclosed a finding of antitrust injury simply because the plaintiff was not a participant in the relevant market.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Complaints > Requirements for Complaint

HN26[] Regulated Practices, Private Actions

In an antitrust case, asking for plausible grounds to infer an agreement does not impose a probability requirement at the pleading stage; it simply calls for enough fact to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of illegal agreement.

HN27[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

In conducting a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) analysis, the question is not whether the plaintiffs will ultimately prevail in a trial on the merits, but whether they should be given an opportunity to offer evidence in support of their claims.

HN28[] Equitable Relief, Quantum Meruit

Generally, in order to state a claim for unjust enrichment, a plaintiff must allege (1) at plaintiff's expense, (2) defendant received benefit, (3) under circumstances that would make it unjust for defendant to retain benefit without paying for it.

LINARES, District Judge.

This matter comes before the Court on the motion of Defendant, Becton Dickinson & Company, to dismiss Plaintiffs' [1] Class Action Amended Complaint, [2] pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6). For the reasons set forth in this Opinion, Defendant's motion is DENIED. [3]

---

[1] For purposes of the instant motion, Plaintiffs include Medstar Health, Inc., Medstar-Georgetown Medical Center, Inc., Washington Hospital Center Corporation and National Rehabilitation Hospital, Inc. (hereinafter collectively "Plaintiffs").

[2] The operative complaint is the Class Action Amended Complaint filed on July 28, 2006, hereinafter referred to as "Complaint." In the instant Opinion, the Court addresses only Defendant's motion to dismiss the Complaint filed by Medstar Health, Inc., Medstar-Georgetown Medical Center, Inc., Washington Hospital Center Corporation and National Rehabilitation Hospital, Inc. Defendant has [*4] filed separate motions to dismiss the complaints of other parties to this multidistrict litigation, which have been decided by the Court by way of separate opinions.

[4]

This matter arises from actions brought by healthcare providers and distributors in the pharmaceutical and medical device industry, against Defendant, a medical device manufacturer, which allegedly controls a dominant share of the relevant market for the hypodermic products at issue in this case. The Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation transferred this case to this Court for consolidated pretrial proceedings, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1407. [5]

I. Historical Facts

Plaintiffs, a Maryland non-profit healthcare corporation, and its Washington, D.C. subsidiaries, operate a community-based network [*6] of hospitals which purchased various disposable hypodermic products manufactured by Becton for use in its hospitals, doctor's offices, surgery centers, nursing homes and other healthcare settings. (Compl., PP 1, 13). Becton, a New Jersey corporation, was founded in 1897, and by the 1950s, had become the leading hypodermic syringe manufacturer in the United States. (Id., P 47). The disposable hypodermic products at issue include relevant markets for: (1) disposable syringes and associated needles, (2) disposable blood collection tubes, (3) disposable blood collection tube holders, and (4) intravenous ("IV") catheter devices and their associated needles. (Id., P 2). Said products are referred to collectively in the Complaint as "Disposable Hypodermic Products." (Id.). Disposable Hypodermic Products are each sold in both a safety and non-safety form to hospitals and/or other healthcare providers. (Id., PP 27, 38, 49). The relevant geographic market for each of the Disposable Hypodermic Products is the entire United States. (Id., PP 30, 35, 40, 45).

By way of background, the Complaint explains that hospitals and other healthcare providers purchased Disposable Hypodermic Products from Defendant [*7] through certain authorized distributors "who do not independently set prices for those products." (Id., P 50). In particular, the Complaint explains that a hospital negotiates a price for Disposable Hypodermic Products with Defendant, either directly or through a Group Purchasing Organization (hereinafter "GPO"). (Id., PP 51, 57). The authorized dealer then takes possession of Defendant's products and holds them in inventory until the hospital needs said products, at which time the authorized dealer delivers same. (Id.). The hospital then pays the authorized dealer the price it had negotiated with Becton, as well as a delivery or administrative fee. (Id.). The authorized dealer then pays Defendant the amount it collected from the hospital, which was "the amount already agreed to between Becton and the [healthcare provider] under applicable GPO agreements or otherwise directly with Becton." (Id.).

[3] The Court decides this matter without oral argument. Fed. R. Civ. P. 78. Jurisdiction is premised on 28 U.S.C. §§ 1331 and 1337.

[4] For purposes of the instant motion to dismiss, the Court accepts Plaintiffs' factual allegations as true, and relies only on the Complaint. See, e.g., Lum v. Bank of Am., 361 F.3d 217, 222 n.3 (3d Cir. 2004) (HN1[] "In deciding motions to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6), courts generally consider only the allegations in the complaint, exhibits attached to the complaint, matters of public record, and documents that form the basis of a claim."). Defendant attaches certain documents to its motion to dismiss, including a copy of the Supplier Agreement between Becton Dickinson & Company and Novation, L.L.C., dated October 12, 1999, and urges the Court to consider same on the basis that said documents are "integral" to the Complaint. (Def. Br. at 9, n. 4; Silodor Decl., Ex. 2). While Plaintiffs do not appear to oppose the Court's consideration of such documents (Pl. Opp'n Br. at 17-18), the [*5] Court determines that it is unnecessary to consider same for purposes of the instant motion to dismiss.

[5] Defendant has also moved to dismiss (1) the Second Consolidated Amended Class Action Complaint filed by Louisiana Wholesale Drug Company, Inc., Rochester Drug Co-Operative, Inc., JM Smith d/b/a Smith Drug Company, Dik Drug Company, American Sales Company, Inc., Park Surgical Co. Inc. and SAJ Distributors, Inc., and (2) the Consolidated Class Action Complaint filed by Jabo's Pharmacy, Inc. and Drug Mart Tallman, Inc. As previously indicated, the foregoing motions will not be addressed herein.

The Complaint goes on to allege that "as a result of this purchasing process, there is effectively only one sale: the [healthcare provider] purchases Becton Disposable Hypodermic Products at prices negotiated with Becton and then receives these Products from authorized distributors." (Id.). [*8] Because authorized distributors have no control over the pricing of Becton's products, they, therefore, act solely as a distribution agent, "temporarily holding inventory and then delivering the product purchased" by the hospital. (Id., P 52). Thus, the only price which the authorized distributors negotiate with Becton and/or the healthcare provider is the amount of the delivery and/or administrative fee associated with same. (Id.). "The fixed percentage the authorized distributor charges for distribution services is the same no matter the price the Class Member negotiates and then pays Becton, and the price a Class Member pays for Becton Disposable Hypodermic Products will be the same from all authorized distributors." (Id.). The Complaint also explains that upon information and belief, Becton sells a portion of its Disposable Hypodermic Products to wholesalers, who then resell these products to indirect class members. (Id., P 56).

II. Becton's Alleged Anti-Competitive Conduct

Beginning in the early 1980s, rival manufacturers began posing a threat to Becton's dominance in the Disposable Hypodermic Products markets. (Id., P 48). As a result, Becton began engaging in certain anti-competitive [*9] and illegal practices, which served to foreclose competition in the relevant markets by suppressing competition from current competitors and/or product innovators, such as Terumo and Retractable (Id., P 6).

The specific anti-competitive practices set forth in the Complaint include: (1) Becton's imposition of market share purchase requirements on healthcare providers, (2) Becton's bundling of its goods for exclusionary and predatory purposes, (3) Becton's exclusionary contracts with certain GPOs, and (4) Becton's bundling of its goods with the goods of other manufacturers for exclusionary purposes. (Id., P 4). Such practices were specifically designed to "eliminate or lessen competition and unlawfully acquire and maintain monopoly and/or market power" in the four relevant markets mentioned above, namely: (1) disposable syringes and their associated needles, (2) blood collection tubes, (3) blood collection tube holders, and (4) IV catheters and their associated needles. (Id., P 25). Erecting such artificial barriers in the form of anti-competitive conduct has "discouraged potential rivals from even attempting to invest the resources necessary to challenge Becton's dominance in the markets [*10] for Disposable Hypodermic Products." (Id., P 48). Moreover, the Complaint alleges that there are no pro-competitive efficiencies created through such predatory and exclusionary conduct. (Id., P 71).

A. Market Share Purchase Requirements and Bundling

The Complaint also alleges that Becton uses exclusionary contracts in order to "bundle together for sale different types of products to protect and exploit its market power." (Id., P 65). For example, Becton responded to bid requests from GPOs, by offering proposals to sell its Disposable Hypodermic Products along with unrelated products, thereby providing substantial financial incentives to hospitals which agreed to purchase all of the products included in the bundle. (Id.).

Becton offered one such purchasing program to MedStar, whereby in order "to receive the purported benefit offered under the bundle, purchasers had to agree to fill at least 95% of their Disposable Hypodermic Product needs from Becton." (Id., P 66). On the other hand, health care providers who purchased less than Becton's suggested "compliance" levels of their Disposable Hypodermic Products needs from Becton were penalized by (1) having to pay higher prices for Disposable [*11] Hypodermic Products, (2) losing certain post-purchase rebates, and (3) having to re-pay past rebates received by Becton. (Id.).

Becton has also offered certain healthcare providers with "conversion" bonuses and rebates, which served as an additional incentive to accept the bundle of Becton products. (Id., P 67). One such conversion program offered healthcare providers with one month's worth of Disposable Hypodermic Products as an inducement to choose Becton as their "primary" Disposable Hypodermic Product supplier. (Id.). Under this program, healthcare providers became eligible for certain "premium" discounts on Becton products only if they agreed to use a "minimum of three of four Becton Dickinson safety product categories that include needles and syringes, IV catheters, surgical blades and blood collection." (Id.). Because many of Becton's competitors in the Disposable Hypodermic Product markets are smaller companies which sell much fewer products, "these competitors cannot profitably match Becton's structured offers across product lines (because the combined discounts on all of the products in Becton's bundle is in many cases greater than the entire price of a single product made [*12] by another manufacturer)." (Id., P 68). As a result of such "deliberately designed" programs, a substantial portion of the Disposable Hypodermic Product markets has been foreclosed. (Id.).

B. Exclusionary Contracts

The Complaint explains that anywhere between 68% to 98% of hospitals in this country currently belong to at least one GPO, which serves as a negotiating agent for healthcare providers. (Id., P 57). GPOs were originally designed as a way for hospitals to save money by pooling their purchasing power in order to negotiate lower prices for medical products and/or goods. (Id., P 58). Prior to 1986, any payments made by manufacturers to a GPO were considered an illegal "kickback," which violated the Social Security Act's "anti-kickback" provisions. (Id.). However, Congress amended the Social Security Act's "anti-kickback" provisions in 1986 to create certain limited exceptions for amounts paid by vendors to a GPO. (Id.). Thus, according to the Complaint, in order to influence GPOs, such as Premier, Becton has rewarded them not only with substantial cash payments, but also with high administrative fees, and equity positions. (Id., P 59).

Becton also secured "commitment contracts" [*13] with certain GPOs -- including Novation and Premier -- which essentially required that they deal exclusively with Becton for all their Hypodermic Product needs. (Id., PP 60, 62). For example, in 1998, one such GPO, Premier, awarded Becton with a 7.5 year "sole-source" contract. (Id., P 60). Similarly, in 1999, Becton awarded another GPO, Novation, with a $ 1 million payment -- in addition to certain administrative fees -- for a 4-year "sole-source" contract, whereby "Becton would be the only vendor approved by Novation to sell Disposable Hypodermic Products to Novation members." (Id.). Such commitment or "sole-source" contracts were implemented to prevent healthcare providers from buying Disposable Hypodermic Products made by other manufacturers. (Id., P 61). In fact, "[i]f a Class member desired to purchase Disposable Hypodermic Products from a manufacturer that was not the chosen sole-source contractor for the GPO, the Class member risked losing numerous financial incentives." (Id.).

Finally, Plaintiffs allege that Becton used exclusionary practices to unfairly and unlawfully limit competition from competing manufacturers of Disposable Hypodermic Products. (Id., P 72). For example, [*14] the Complaint alleges that in response to a growing threat to its monopoly power in the Disposable Hypodermic Product markets by a Japanese corporation by the name of Terumo, Becton engaged in a program called "Block Terumo" in the late 1980s, "which entailed the use of an aggressive strategy that included the bundled pricing and contracting strategies described above and other similar exclusionary and predatory tactics." (Id., P 73). Similar strategies were utilized by Becton to limit competition from another competitor -- Retractable Technologies -- in the late 1990s. (Id., P 75).

III. Market Effects of Becton's Alleged Anti-Competitive Conduct

The Complaint alleges that the combined market effect of the foregoing anti-competitive actions have resulted in foreclosed competition and, thus, higher prices for all purchasers of Becton's Disposable Hypodermic Products. (Id., P 70). Thus, according to the Complaint, Becton's customers have paid more than they would have paid in the absence of such unlawful conduct, "contrary to Becton's representations that hospitals and other customers who purchased Becton's bundle would receive a financial benefit." (Id., PP 70, 78). Thus, not only were [*15] healthcare providers deprived of the opportunity to purchase competing Disposable Hypodermic Products, but they were also forced to pay Becton artificially inflated prices for same. (Id., P 78).

IV. The Class Action Amended Complaint

In light of the foregoing, Plaintiffs brought this action, pursuant to Sections 4 and 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 15(a) and 26, to recover treble damages, equitable relief, and reasonable attorneys' fees for Defendant's alleged violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1-2, as well as Section 3 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 14. Plaintiffs filed the instant class action complaint on July 28, 2006, pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23(a), (b)(2) and (b)(3), on their behalf, and as representatives of the following class (hereinafter referred to as the "Class"):

> All hospitals and healthcare providers in the United States who purchased Disposable Hypodermic Products manufactured by Becton through Becton's authorized distributors, at any time during the period 1988 through the present (the "Class Period"). The Class excludes Becton, Becton's parents, subsidiaries and affiliates, as well as all Becton's authorized distributors [*16] [sic].

(Compl., P 16). In the alternative, or in addition, Plaintiffs seek to bring this action on their own behalf and as representatives of the following class of persons and entities (hereinafter referred to as the "Indirect Class"):

> All hospitals and healthcare providers in Alabama, Arizona, California, District of Columbia, Florida, Hawaii, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, South Dakota, Tennessee, Utah, Vermont, West Virginia, and Wisconsin (the "Class Jurisdictions"), who purchased Disposable Hypodermic Products manufactured by Becton through a distributor or wholesaler at any time during the period 1988 through the present (the "Class Period"). The Class excludes Becton, Becton's parents, subsidiaries and affiliates, and all distributors or wholesalers.

(Id., P 17). Plaintiffs present a third alternative class (hereinafter referred to as the "D.C. Indirect Class"):

> All hospitals and healthcare providers in the District of Columbia who purchased Disposable Hypodermic Products manufactured by Becton through a distributor or wholesaler at any time during the period 1988 [*17] through the present (the "Class Period"). The Class excludes Becton, Becton's parents, subsidiaries and affiliates, and all distributors or wholesalers.

Count One of the Complaint alleges unreasonable restraint of trade, in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act and Section 3 of the Clayton Act. Count Two of the Complaint alleges monopoly maintenance, in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act, and Count Three alleges attempted monopolization also in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act. Count Four alleges state antitrust law violations, brought only by the Indirect Class. Count Five alleges violation of the District of Columbia's Antitrust Law, brought only by the D.C. Indirect Class, and Count Six of the Complaint alleges unjust enrichment.

Defendant Becton now moves to dismiss the Complaint pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6).

LEGAL STANDARD

HN2[] The applicable inquiry under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) is well-settled. Courts must accept all well-pleaded allegations in the complaint as true and draw all reasonable inferences in favor of the non-moving party. [6] See Scheuer v. Rhodes, 416 U.S. 232, 236, 94 S. Ct. 1683, 40 L. Ed. 2d 90 (1974), abrogated on other grounds by [*18] Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 102 S. Ct. 2727, 73 L. Ed. 2d 396 (1982); Allegheny Gen. Hosp. v. Philip Morris, Inc., 228 F.3d 429, 434-35 (3d Cir. 2000). However, courts are not required to credit bald assertions or legal conclusions improperly alleged in the complaint. See In re Burlington Coat Factory Sec. Litig., 114 F.3d 1410, 1429 (3d Cir. 1997). Similarly, legal conclusions draped in the guise of factual allegations may not benefit from the presumption of truthfulness. See In re Nice Sys., Ltd. Secs. Litig., 135 F. Supp.2d 551, 565 (D.N.J. 2001).

HN3[] "While a complaint attacked by a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss does not need detailed factual allegations, a plaintiff's obligation to provide the 'grounds' of his 'entitle[ment] to relief' requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of a cause of action's elements will not do. Factual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level on the assumption that all of the complaint's allegations [*19] are true." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 1959, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). [7] Ultimately, however, the question is not whether plaintiffs will prevail at trial, but whether they should be given an opportunity to offer evidence in support of their claims. Scheuer, 416 U.S. at 236.

Additionally, the Third Circuit has explained that HN4[] antitrust complaints, in particular, should be liberally construed. Pennsylvania ex rel. Zimmerman v. Pepsico, Inc., 836 F.2d 173, 179 (3d Cir. 1988). Although there is no heightened pleading standard in antitrust cases, [8] antitrust complaints are not exempt from [*20] the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. See, e.g., Zimmerman, 836 F.2d at 179-80. In this vein, the Third Circuit has indicated that the pleading standard for "Section 1 claims is the short and concise statement standard of Rule 8(a)." [9] Lum v. Bank of Am., 361 F.3d 217, 228 (3d Cir. 2004) (distinguishing the "short and concise statement" standard of Rule 8(a), generally applicable to antitrust claims, from the heightened "particularity" standard of Rule 9(b), applicable to antitrust claims sounding in fraud). In assessing the Rule 8(a) pleading standard in the context of antitrust cases, the United States Supreme Court has explained that "[w]hile a complaint attacked by a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss does not need detailed factual allegations," it must plead "enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Bell Atl. Corp., 127 S.Ct. at 1964, 1974. [10] With this framework in mind, the Court turns now to the issues raised by Defendant in support of the instant motion.

DISCUSSION

Becton argues that the Complaint should be dismissed for failure to state claims upon which relief can be granted based on the following: (1) Plaintiffs have not adequately alleged the essential elements or necessary facts of any of its antitrust claims, (2) Plaintiffs have not adequately alleged the essential elements of any state-law antitrust claims, (3) Plaintiffs lack standing to assert certain claims, and (4) certain state claims fail as a matter of law.

A. Elements of Claims

[7] In so holding, the United States Supreme Court rejected the language previously used by the Court in Conley v. Gibson, providing that "[i]n appraising the sufficiency of the complaint we follow, of course, the accepted rule that a complaint should not be dismissed for failure to state a claim unless it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief." 355 U.S. 41, 45-46, 78 S. Ct. 99, 2 L. Ed. 2d 80 (1957). See Bell Atl. Corp., 127 S.Ct. at 1964, 1974 (holding that the Conley "no set of facts" language "has earned its retirement" and "is best forgotten.").

[9] Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a) provides [*21] that HN5[] "[a] pleading which sets forth a claim for relief . . . shall contain . . . a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief."

[10] See also Associated Gen. Contractors of Cal., Inc. v. Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 528 n. 17, 103 S. Ct. 897, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723 (1983) (stating that HN6[] "a district court must retain the power to insist upon some specificity in pleading before allowing a potentially massive factual controversy to proceed.").

Defendant argues that Plaintiffs (1) have failed to allege any of the required elements of an antitrust claim -- such as relevant market, anti-competitive effects, antitrust injury, and standing -- and (2) have failed to specify any unlawful [*22] "exclusive dealing" or "exclusionary conduct." Because Defendant has presented the Court with such global pleading arguments, which allegedly relate to Counts One, Two and Three, it is not entirely clear to the Court which arguments relate to which claims, and therefore, the specific basis on which Defendant believes that Plaintiffs have failed to plead particular elements of any claim. As a result, the Court will begin its analysis by assessing, generally, whether the Complaint alleges the requisite elements of the federal antitrust claims, [11] and will then turn to Defendant's broader pleading arguments, keeping in mind that HN7[] antitrust complaints are liberally construed in this Circuit. See PepsiCo, Inc., 836 F.2d at 179.

Count One

> HN9[] Every contract, combination [*23] in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal. Every person who shall make any contract or engage in any combination or conspiracy hereby declared to be illegal shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $ 100,000,000 if a corporation, or, if any other person, $ 1,000,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding 10 years, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

15 U.S.C. § 1.

The Third Circuit has explained that HN10[] there are four essential elements of a § 1 violation:

> (1) concerted action by the defendants; (2) that produced anti-competitive effects within the relevant product and geographic markets; (3) that the concerted action was illegal; and (4) that the plaintiff was injured as a proximate result of the concerted action.

Queen City Pizza, Inc. v. Domino's Pizza, Inc., 124 F.3d 430, 442 (3d Cir. 1997). Moreover, "[b]ecause § 1 of the Sherman Act 'does not prohibit [all] unreasonable restraints of trade . . . but only restraints effected by a contract, combination, or conspiracy,' '[t]he crucial question' [*24] is whether the challenged anticompetitive conduct 'stem[s] from independent decision or from an agreement, tacit or express.'" Bell Atl. Corp., 127 S.Ct. at 1964. As a result, "stating such a claim requires a complaint with enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest that an agreement was made." Id. at 1965.

Section 3 of the Clayton Act, in turn, provides that:

> HN11[] It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to lease or make a sale or contract for sale of goods . . . or fix a price charged therefor, or discount from, or rebate upon, such price, on the condition, agreement, or understanding that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods . . . of a competitor or competitors of the lessor or seller, where the effect of such lease, sale, or contract for sale or such condition, agreement, or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

15 U.S.C. § 14. See Town Sound and Custom Tops, Inc. v. Chrysler Motors Corp., 959 F.2d 468, 473 n. 2 (3d Cir. 1992) (explaining that HN12[] Section 3 of the Clayton Act was technically written to "cover exclusive dealing contracts [*25] (contracts requiring the purchaser not to deal in the goods of a competitor of the seller) but Congress also intended to cover tying arrangements.").

HN13[] Recovery under Section 3 of the Clayton Act generally requires: (1) an "exclusive dealing" arrangement, and (2) "the probable effect of the exclusion must be to substantially lessen competition in the market." *Barr Laboratories, Inc. v. Abbott Laboratories, No. 87-4764, 1989 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6051, 1989 WL 60320, 4 (D.N.J. June 1, 1989) (citing Tampa Elec. Co. v. Nashville Coal Co., 365 U.S. 320, 327, 81 S. Ct. 623, 5 L. Ed. 2d 580 (1961)).

Here, the Complaint alleges that Becton entered into arrangements with GPOs, such as Premier, whereby it would pay the GPOs "millions of dollars in cash payments," as well as "equity positions," with the expectation said GPOs would "favor Becton's products, regardless of price, over those of Becton's competitors." (Compl., P 59). The Complaint cites to an article from February 1997, which states that as a result of a recent deal between Becton and Premier, whereby Premier would "receive a portion of administrative fees in the form of warrants to buy Becton stock. If Becton Dickinson's fortunes rise, buoyed in part by Premier purchases, so will the value of the stock held by [*26] Premier." (Id.).

The Complaint also alleges that Becton entered into agreements with GPOs, certain hospitals and other customers which included "bundled financial incentives" and "exclusive dealing commitments." (Compl., P 82). For example, during 1999, it is alleged that Becton provided Novation, another GPO, with a $ 1 million payment, on top of the 3% administrative fees, in exchange for a four-year "sole-source contract under which Becton would be the only vendor approved by Novation to sell Disposable Hypodermic Products to Novation members." (Id., P 60). [12] The Complaint further alleges that the object of such an arrangement was to prevent Class members from purchasing Disposable Hypodermic Products made by other manufacturers, because "[i]f a Class member desired to purchase Disposable Hypodermic Products from a manufacturer that was not the chosen sole-source contractor for the GPO, the Class member risked losing numerous financial incentives." (Id., P 61). Accordingly, such arrangements served to significantly "impede and prevent competing Disposable Hypodermic Product manufacturers from selling significant (if any) Disposable Hypodermic Products to healthcare providers that [*27] used those GPOs." (Id., P 62).

Moreover, HN15[] a plaintiff must allege facts establishing an "antitrust injury." See Schuykill Energy Res., Inc. v. Pa. Power & Light, 113 F.3d 405, 413, 417 (3d Cir. 1997) (recognizing that the existence of antitrust injury is not typically resolved through motions to dismiss). In this regard, the Complaint alleges that Plaintiffs were injured by Becton's exclusionary practices, including its "sole-source" arrangements with certain GPOs, to the extent that they were forced to pay higher prices for Disposable Hypodermic Products than they [*28] would have paid in the absence of such practices and/or arrangements. (Compl., PP 63, 85, 93, 99).

Count Two

Count Two of the Complaint alleges monopoly maintenance in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act. Section 2 of the Sherman Act provides that:

> HN16[] Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding

[12] Given the foregoing allegations, the Court finds "plausible grounds to infer an agreement" between Defendant and certain GPOs and/or manufactures. Bell Atl. Corp., 127 S.Ct. at 1965. See generally Elder--Beerman Stores Corp. v. Federated Dep't Stores, Inc., 459 F.2d 138, 146 (6th Cir. 1972) (HN14[] "The granting of exclusive selling rights or acceptance of such exclusive selling rights, acts which are not prohibited by law unless there is a resulting foreclosure of market alternatives cannot, without proof of such foreclosure, form the basis for a jury verdict that the defendants had entered into a conspiracy to restrain trade.").

$ 100,000,000 if a corporation, or, if any other person, $ 1,000,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding 10 years, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

15 U.S.C. § 2.

The Third Circuit has indicated that HN17[] a § 2 violation generally consists of two elements: "(1) possession of monopoly power [in the relevant product market] and (2) '. . . maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident.'" United States v. Dentsply Int'l, 399 F.3d 181, 186 (3d Cir. 2005) (citing Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Technical Servs., Inc., 504 U.S. 451, 480, 112 S. Ct. 2072, 119 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1992)). [*29] The Complaint alleges that Becton possesses monopoly power in the Disposable Syringe and Blood Collection Tube and Blood Collection Tube Holder markets, in the United States. (Compl., P 87). The Complaint also alleges that in order to maintain such monopoly power, "Becton has willfully and unlawfully used exclusionary and predatory conduct, including but not limited to, bundled pricing with the intent to foreclose competition, and exclusionary agreements." (Id., P 89). The Complaint likewise alleges that Becton's monopoly power in the Disposable Syringe, Blood Collection Tube and Blood Collection Tube Holder markets is not the result of "superior product offerings, good faith business acumen, or historical accident." (Id., PP 91, 92). Rather, it is the result of certain "deliberately designed" programs and/or arrangements with GPOs and healthcare providers, including but not limited to, commitment contracts, bundling contracts, and conversion bonuses. (Id., PP 59, 60, 66-69). [13]

Count Three

Count Three of the Complaint alleges attempted monopolization, in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act. HN18[] "To state a claim for attempted monopolization, a plaintiff must allege '(1) that the defendant has engaged in predatory or anticompetitive conduct with (2) a specific intent to monopolize and (3) a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power.'" Schuylkill Energy Res., Inc. v. Pa. Power & Light Co., 113 F.3d 405, 413 (3d Cir. 1997) (citation omitted). The Complaint alleges that, "to the extent that Becton does not possess monopoly power in the Disposable Syringe, Blood Collection Tube and/or Blood Collection Tube Holder markets in the United States, it has unlawfully attempted to monopolize the markets for Disposable Syringes, Blood Collection Tubes and/or Blood Collection [*31] Tubes." (Compl., P 95). In particular, the Complaint alleges that Becton engaged in exclusionary and predatory conduct, including bundled pricing and exclusionary agreements, with the "specific intent" of achieving its goal of obtaining a monopoly in the foregoing markets. (Id., PP 96, 97). For example, the Complaint explains that Becton engaged in a program called "Block Terumo," as a result of "the growing threat" posed by the price reductions of a competitor, Terumo. (Id., P 73). The Complaint goes on to allege that, as a result of the implementation of the "exclusionary and predatory sales tactics" (i.e., the "Block Terumo" program) "Terumo's market share in the United States for the Disposable Hypodermic Products went from approximately 12% to approximately 1%." (Id.). By 1992, "Terumo announced that it would no longer focus on selling hypodermic products to hospitals in the United States," thus indicating that "there is a dangerous probability that if left unchecked, Becton will achieve its goals of obtaining monopoly power in said markets. (Id., PP 73, 98). [14]

---

[13] See, e.g., SmithKline Corp. v. Eli Lilly & Co., 575 F.2d 1056, 1065 (3d Cir. 1978) (finding that "the act of willful acquisition and maintenance of monopoly power was brought about by linking products on which [*30] Lilly faced no competition Keflin and Keflex with a competitive product, Kefzol. The result was to sell all three products on a non-competitive basis in what would have otherwise been a competitive market for Ancef and Kefzol. The effect of the Revised CSP was to force SmithKline to pay rebates on one product, Ancef, equal to rebates paid by Lilly based on volume sales of three products.").

[14] See generally Schuylkill Energy Res., Inc., 113 F.3d at 415 ("Thus, SER must allege that PP & L unlawfully acquired [*32] monopoly power or had a dangerous probability of unlawfully achieving monopoly power in its service area. To do this, SER must allege that PP & L in some way acted to exclude SER as a competitor in the delivery of electricity to customers in PP & L's service area.").

B. Generally

Relevant Market

Turning now to Defendant's arguments, Defendant claims that Plaintiffs have failed to set forth the requisite relevant market. In particular, Defendant claims that (1) Plaintiffs improperly combine "safety and conventional products without any allegations of the reasonable interchangeability and cross-elasticity of demand," and (2) Plaintiffs' definition of the "IV" catheter market," which includes winged IV catheters does not allege whether these products "can be interchanged, used to perform the same clinical functions or substituted for each other in medical practice." (Def. Br. at 24).

The Third Circuit has explained that HN19[] Plaintiffs have the burden of defining the relevant market, and that the "outer boundaries of a product market are determined by the reasonable interchangeability of use or the cross-elasticity of demand between the product itself and substitutes for it." Queen City Pizza, Inc. v. Domino's Pizza, Inc., 124 F.3d 430, 436 (3d Cir. 1997) [*33] (internal citations omitted). In Queen City Pizza, the Court went on to explain that:

> Where the plaintiff fails to define its proposed relevant market with reference to the rule of reasonable interchangeability and cross-elasticity of demand, or alleges a proposed relevant market that clearly does not encompass all interchangeable substitute products even when all factual inferences are granted in plaintiff's favor, the relevant market is legally insufficient and a motion to dismiss may be granted.

Id.

The Complaint alleges four relevant product markets: (1) disposable syringes and associated needles, (2) disposable blood collection tubes, (3) disposable blood collection tube holders, and (4) intravenous catheter devices and their associated needles. (Compl., P 2). The Complaint likewise alleges that there is no product "that can reasonably be substituted for" any of the products comprising the relevant product markets. (Id., PP 29, 34, 39, 44). Defendant is correct in noting that the Complaint alleges that each of the four products at issue come in safety and non-safety forms. (Id., PP 27, 38, 49). To the extent that Defendant urges the Court to conclude, based on the foregoing allegations, [*34] (1) that the two versions of each product, therefore, comprise separate product markets, and (2) that "folding these two separate markets into one general market creates an implausible product market," [15] the Court determines that any such determination would be improper at this juncture. [16] See, e.g., Fineman v. Armstrong World Indus., Inc., 980 F.2d 171, 199 (3d Cir. 1992) (HN20[] "the determination of a relevant product market or submarket ("market") is a highly factual one best allocated to the trier of fact."); Weiss v. York Hosp., 745 F.2d 786, 825 (3d Cir. 1984) ("Market definition is a question of fact.").

Defendant also makes the cursory argument that Plaintiffs' definition of the "IV catheter market," which includes winged IV catheters does not allege whether these products "can be interchanged, used to perform the same clinical functions or substituted for each other in medical practice," without citing to the relevant portion of the Complaint which allegedly defines the "IV catheter market" as such. (Def. Br. at 24). Although the Complaint does

[15] In particular, Defendant argues that "as a matter of law, safety and conventional devices are not interchangeable and cannot be part of the same relevant market." Even if Defendant is ultimately correct, the Court declines to engage in any such analysis at this time. See, e.g., Ansell, Inc. v. Schmid Labs, Inc., 757 F. Supp. 467 (D.N.J. 1991) (defining relevant product market after multi-day hearing, including expert testimony).

[16] Moreover, Defendant's reliance on E. & G. Gabriel v. Gabriel Bros., Inc., -- a case which is not binding on this Court and distinguishable on a number [*35] of levels -- is misplaced. *No. 93-0894, 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9455, 1994 WL 369147, at 3 (S.D.N.Y. July 13, 1994) (finding plaintiff's proposed market, comprised of "products as varied as household hardwares and children's sleepwear," to be implausible, and reasoning that "[h]ammers are obviously not reasonable substitutes for children's pajamas, they are not used for similar purposes, nor will the price of hammers affect the price of pajamas.").

allege that Becton manufactures IV Catheters "including Winged IV Catheters," the Complaint does not expressly allege that the "Winged IV Catheters" necessarily fall within the relevant product market of "IV Catheters and their Associated Needles." (Compl., PP 43, 44). Moreover, the Complaint does allege that "[a] relevant product [*36] market exists for the sale of IV Catheters and their associated needles and the market segments thereunder," and that "no product . . . can be substituted for IV Catheters and their associated needles to fill this medical need." (Id., P 44) (emphasis added).

Anti-Competitive Effects

Defendant also argues that the Complaint "contains no particularized allegations about competition in any specific market. . . Medstar never specifies what specific products were supposedly bundled and to whom the proposals were made." (Def. Br. at 25). Additionally, Defendant argues that the Complaint "is silent about the competitive dynamics or prices in any specific product market. Nor does the . . . Complaint allege what specific competitors (or would-be competitors) participated in, and were supposedly excluded from, which of the specific product markets." However, Defendant cites to no legal authority indicating that such particularized allegations are a pleading requirement. [17] To the contrary, the Supreme Court has reiterated that HN21[] "Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a)(2) requires only 'a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief,' in order to 'give the defendant [*37] fair notice of what the . . . claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.'" Bell Atl. Corp., 127 S.Ct. at 1964 (quoting Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 47, 78 S. Ct. 99, 2 L. Ed. 2d 80 (1957)). [18] The Court recognizes that the Third Circuit has applied a heightened pleading standard in antitrust cases sounding in fraud. See, e.g., Lum, 361 F.3d at 228 (distinguishing the "short and concise statement" standard of Rule 8(a), generally applicable to antitrust claims, from the heightened "particularity" standard of Rule 9(b), applicable to antitrust claims sounding in fraud). However, Defendant does not suggest that the antitrust claims alleged in the Complaint sound in [17] Throughout its papers, Defendant relies on a number of cases, which are not binding on this Court, for the proposition that Plaintiffs' have failed to plead with the requisite "particularity" or "specificity." The Court has reviewed these decisions and finds that such cases do not warrant dismissal of Plaintiffs' claims on such a basis at this time. *See, e.g., Broadcom Corp. v. Qualcomm Inc., No. 05-3350, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 62090, 2006 WL 2528545, at 7-9 (D.N.J. Aug. 31, 2006) [*38] (dismissing antitrust claims where defendant had a "legal monopoly over the technology claimed in its patents," and expressing concern "that reviewing and supervising the terms upon which Qualcomm licenses its patents, and offers to sell its UMTS chipsets may be beyond the effective control of the Court under the antitrust laws."); *Glaberson v. Comcast Corp., No. 03-6604, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 62672, 2006 WL 2559479, at 15 (D.N.J. Aug. 31, 2006) (denying motion to dismiss and finding that "Comcast has not demonstrated that Plaintiffs cannot prove any set of facts, consistent with the Third Amended Complaint, which would entitle them to relief."); *JM Computer Servs. v. Schlumberger Techs., 1996 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21885, 1996 WL 241607, at 4 (N.D. Cal. May 3, 1996) (granting defendant's motion to dismiss a § 2 claim where plaintiff (1) failed to "identify the specific products or services in product markets for which Plaintiff claims there is no price elasticity," (2) failed to "identify an agreement with a specific person or entity," and (3) "does not identify the parts, services, or contracts involved in the alleged exclusive dealing").

Defendant also relies heavily on the Third Circuit's decision in Garshman v. Universal Res. Holding Inc., 824 F.2d 223, 230-31 (3d Cir. 1987). [*39] The Court has reviewed the Garshman decision and finds that the deficiencies alleged by Defendant in this case do not rise to the level of those contemplated by the Third Circuit in Garshman, where the complaint, itself, failed to allege any "adverse effect on competition in any relevant market." Id. at 230-31 (stating that "[t]he allegation of unspecified contracts with unnamed other entities to achieve unidentified anticompetitive effects does not meet the minimum standards for pleading a conspiracy in violation of the Sherman Act.").

[18] While the Supreme Court indicated that "a plaintiff's obligation to provide the 'grounds' of his 'entitle[ment] to relief' requires more than labels and conclusions," for the reasons stated herein, the Court finds that Plaintiffs have met this burden. Bell Atl. Corp., 127 S.Ct. at 1959.

fraud. [19] Therefore, the Court sees no reason why it should apply the more rigorous pleading standard contemplated by Defendant to the case at hand. [20]

In any event, the Complaint does provide certain examples of the types of exclusionary practices utilized by Becton, and the purported effects of same. For example, the Complaint alleges that from 1998 through 1999, Becton engaged in securing commitment or "sole-source" contracts with certain GPOs, including Premier and Novation, which required that they deal exclusively with Becton for any hypodermic product needs, in return for a substantial monetary payment. (Id., P 60). The Complaint also alleges that pursuant to Becton's purchasing programs, unrelated products from different product lines were "bundled" together for sale to hospitals and other healthcare providers -- including Medstar -- whereby in order "to receive the purported benefit offered under the bundle, purchasers had to agree to fill at least 95% of their Disposable Hypodermic Product needs from Becton." (Id., PP 66, 68). As an additional incentive, Plaintiffs also allege that Becton offered "conversion" programs. The Complaint goes on to list two examples of such programs, one of which provided a particular Class member with the ability to purchase Becton products at a premium discount [*41] only if it agreed to utilize a "minimum of three of four Becton Dickinson safety product categories that include needles and syringes, IV catheters, surgical blades and blood collection." (Id., P 67).

In addressing the anti-competitive effects of such programs, the Complaint explains the following:

> Many of Becton's competitors in the Disposable Hypodermic Product markets are smaller, specialized companies that sell fewer products, and in some instances only a single product. As a result, these competitors cannot profitably match Becton's structured offers across product lines (because the combined discounts on all of the products in Becton's bundle is in many cases greater than the entire price of a single product made by another manufacturer). In certain cases, even if the competitor offered substantial discounts on Disposable Hypodermic Products (or indeed gave them away for free), it could not 'replace' all the discounts and rebates that the buyer would 'lose' as a penalty for rejecting Becton's bundle.

(Id., P 68). For instance, the Complaint alleges that beginning in the 1970s, one particular competitor, Terumo, "which manufactures certain disposable medical products, including disposable [*42] syringes and associated needles" -- one of the relevant product markets at issue -- began gaining approximately 12% of the United States market for various hypodermic products. (Compl., P 72). However, by 1992 -- as a direct result of certain exclusionary initiatives undertaken by Becton -- Terumo's market share dropped to approximately 1%, and it ultimately ceased focusing on selling any hypodermic products to hospitals in the United States. (Id., P 73). This, the Complaint alleges, demonstrates that Becton's actions effectively foreclosed competition in the relevant product markets, forcing Plaintiffs to pay higher prices for Disposable Hypodermic Products than they would have paid in the absence of Becton's exclusionary practices. (Id., PP 68, 69, 70).

The Court finds such allegations of anti-competitive conduct set forth in the Complaint to be in sharp contrast with the allegations found to be insufficient in Bell Atl. Corp., 127 S.Ct. at 1962-63. [21] In particular, the complaint at issue in Bell Atl. Corp. sought to demonstrate anti-competitive agreements based on parallel conduct through inference. Id. at 1962. To the contrary, the instant Complaint sets forth allegations of specific [43] anti-competitive agreements -- between Becton and certain GPOs, and between Becton and certain manufacturers -- which the Court deems as providing Defendant with adequate notice of the particular grounds upon which Plaintiffs' claims April 5, 2007) (utilizing heightened pleading standard of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 9(b) where the plaintiffs' antitrust conspiracy claims were predicated on fraud).

[20] Defendant reasserts this argument repeatedly throughout its papers. For purposes of efficiency, the Court [*40] will not revisit this issue herein.

[21] In Bell Atl. Corp., the plaintiffs alleged that the Incumbent Local Exchange Carriers "have entered into a contract, combination or conspiracy to prevent competitive entry in their respective local telephone and/or high speed internet services markets and have agreed not to compete with one another and otherwise allocated customers and markets to one another." Id. at 1963.

rest, particularly given the fact that Plaintiffs have not yet had the benefit of discovery. [22] See, e.g., Hosp. Bldg. Co. v. Trs. of Rex Hosp., 425 U.S. 738, 746-747, 96 S. Ct. 1848, 48 L. Ed. 2d 338 (1976) (explaining that HN22[] "in antitrust cases, where 'the proof is largely in the hands of the alleged conspirators,' dismissals prior to giving the plaintiff ample opportunity for discovery should be granted very sparingly") (quotation omitted).

Antitrust Injury

Defendant argues that Plaintiffs cannot state a claim because the "vague" allegations of antitrust injury set forth in the Complaint lack the requisite specificity. (Def. Br. at 25-26). Defendant also argues that "[s]ince a plaintiff ordinarily must be a participant in the relevant market to suffer antitrust injury, MedStar cannot state a claim without alleging the specific market in which it buys or sells products." (Id. at 26).

In support of its argument that the allegations of antitrust injury contained in the Complaint are overly "vague," Defendant presents the following hypothetical questions for the Court's consideration -- "did MedStar pay overcharges for Becton's products? If so, what were those products?" (Def. Br. at 26). Even assuming, arguendo, [*45] that the Complaint does not specifically answer those questions, once again, Defendant cites to no legal authority indicating that antitrust injury must be plead with such specificity, or that the antitrust injury alleged by Plaintiffs is somehow implausible. (Def. Br. at 25-26). The Complaint alleges that "[b]y unlawfully excluding and impairing competition [in the four relevant product markets], Becton's conduct has caused Plaintiffs and the other Class members to pay more for Disposable Hypodermic Products than they otherwise would have paid absent Becton's illegal, exclusionary conduct." (Compl., P 63). Defendant has given the Court no specific basis on which to find such a pleading of antitrust injury to be insufficient. [23]

In the alternative, Defendant cites to Schuylkill Energy Res., Inc. v. Pa. Power & Light, 113 F.3d 405, 415 (3d Cir. 1997), for the proposition that "[a] plaintiff who is neither a competitor nor a consumer in the relevant market does not suffer antitrust injury." (Def. Br. at 26). To the extent that Defendant moves to dismiss the Complaint on such a basis, any such request is denied. The United States Supreme Court has recognized that HN24[] an antitrust injury can be suffered by a plaintiff, even if the plaintiff "was not a competitor of the conspirators, [where] the injury she suffered was inextricably intertwined with the injury the conspirators sought to inflict on psychologists and the psychotherapy market." Blue Shield of Va. v. McCready, 457 U.S. 465, 484, 102 S. Ct. 2540, 73 L. Ed. 2d 149 (1982). There, the Court went on to explain that "[i]n light of the conspiracy here alleged we think that McCready's injury 'flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful' within the meaning of Brunswick, and falls squarely within the area of congressional concern." Id.

The Third Circuit has likewise found that a terminal operator plaintiff lacked standing to assert antitrust injury [*47] in the soda ash market -- in which it was neither a consumer nor a competitor -- because the plaintiff had "made no showing of a connection between the alleged international soda ash conspiracy and the level of competition within the terminalling market." Int'l Raw Materials, Ltd., 978 F.2d at 1327-29. There, the Court explained "[b]ecause IRM is neither a competitor nor a consumer in the relevant market, it must allege a significant causal connection between the alleged soda ash conspiracy and the alleged anticompetitive effects in the

[22] The Court recognizes that "[t]he allegation of unspecified contracts with unnamed other entities to achieve unidentified anticompetitive effects does not meet the minimum standards [*44] for pleading a conspiracy in violation of the Sherman Act." Garshman v. Universal Res. Holding Inc., 824 F.2d 223, 230-31 (3d Cir. 1987). Nevertheless, the Court does not find that the deficiencies alleged by Defendant in this case rise to the level of those contemplated by the Third Circuit in Garshman, where the complaint, itself, failed to allege any "adverse effect on competition in any relevant market." Id. at 231.

[23] See generally Harrison Aire, Inc. v. Aerostar Intern., Inc., 423 F.3d 374, 385 (3d Cir. 2005) ("Here, Harrison Aire is a consumer of balloon fabric, and it claims antitrust injury in the form of business losses caused by high fabric prices, which in turn allegedly were caused by Raven/Aerostar's exclusionary conduct in the relevant fabric market. This type of injury-HN23[] prohibitively high consumer prices resulting from allegedly monopolistic behavior-is the type [*46] the antitrust laws are designed to redress.").

terminalling market such that the harm to the terminalling market can be said to be 'inextricably intertwined' with the alleged soda ash cartel." Id. at 1327 (quoting McCready, 457 U.S. at 484). See also Gulfstream III Assocs., Inc. v. Gulfstream Aerospace Corp., 995 F.2d 425, 429 (3d Cir. 1993) (HN25[] "The second [Brunswick] requirement is generally met if the plaintiff is a 'competitor []or a consumer in the relevant market.' Alternatively, this requirement is fulfilled if there exists a 'significant causal connection' such that the harm to the plaintiff can be said to be 'inextricably intertwined' with the antitrust conspiracy.") (quoting McCready, 457 U.S. at 484). [*48] Thus, neither the Supreme Court nor the Third Circuit has foreclosed a finding of antitrust injury simply because the plaintiff was not a participant in the relevant market. [24] As a result, to the extent that Defendant moves to dismiss the Complaint on the basis that Plaintiffs cannot suffer antitrust injury in a relevant market in which it is not a participant, Defendant's motion is denied. [25]

Standing

Defendant makes the argument that Plaintiffs lack standing under Section 3 of the Clayton Act because "MedStar has not alleged specific facts showing any contracts that it is a party to that are exclusive. That pleading defect is particularly fatal to MedStar's exclusive dealing claim under Section 3 of the Clayton Act. Only competitors and 'restricted purchasers' -- purchasers who are parties to the allegedly restrictive contract -- can sue for damages under Section 3 of Clayton Act." (Def. Br. at 28).

Pursuant to this Court's March 23, 2007 Order, all parties were advised that the issue of Clayton Act standing would by addressed by way of a separate motion. See CM/ECF Docket Entry Nos. 144, 146. As a result, the Court will not address the issues raised regarding same herein. [26]

Exclusive Dealing Allegations

Defendant makes the global argument that "[w]hether fashioned as unlawful 'exclusive dealing' under Section 1 of the Sherman Act and Section 3 of the Clayton Act (Count I), or as a form of monopolization under Section 2 of the Sherman Act (Counts II and III), MedStar has failed to plead the facts necessary to state any viable claim: that there are exclusive agreements and that those agreements resulted in the foreclosure of competition in a substantial portion of the market." (Def Br. at 14). The crux of Defendant's argument is that, despite the fact that the Complaint contains the jargon of exclusive dealing, it contains "no specific facts to support MedStar's conclusion that some unidentified and unexplained contracts 'were designed to [*51] prevent' hospitals from buying from other manufacturers." (Id. at 16).

[24] Because Defendant does not argue that Plaintiffs' alleged injuries are not "inextricably intertwined" with Defendant's alleged actions in the relevant markets, the Court need not consider same.

[25] Defendant also makes the related argument that Plaintiffs lack antitrust standing generally because they have "not alleged the facts that would give it standing to complain -- e.g., that it actually buys those products from Becton, that it did so pursuant to an 'exclusive' contract, that the contract prevented MedStar from buying such products from Becton's rivals, and that such conduct actually affected the price of such products." (Def. Br. at 27) (emphasis in original). To the extent that the Court should construe such an argument as based on the theory that Plaintiffs cannot suffer antitrust injury [*49] in a relevant market in which it is not a participant, such an argument is, therefore, rejected.

[26] To the extent that Defendant argues that Plaintiffs lack antitrust standing generally based on the theory that Plaintiffs have not alleged that they are direct purchasers of the Disposable Hypodermic Products at issue, the Court will, therefore, defer its consideration of this argument. See Def. Br. at 27 [*50] (arguing that Plaintiffs lack antitrust standing because Plaintiffs have "not alleged the facts that would give it standing to complain -- e.g., that it actually buys those products from Becton, that it did so pursuant to an 'exclusive' contract, that the contract prevented MedStar from buying such products from Becton's rivals, and that such conduct actually affected the price of such products.") (emphasis in original).

The Complaint alleges that "Becton used 'commitment contracts' . . . [which] essentially required GPO members to deal exclusively with Becton for its Hypodermic Product needs." (Compl., P 60). The Complaint goes on to provide two examples of such "commitment contracts," (1) "in or around 1998 Premier awarded Becton a 7.5 year sole-source contract," and (2) "[i]n or around 1999, Becton provided another GPO, Novation, a $ 1 million payment (in addition to the 3% administrative fees that it pays Novation) for a 4-year sole-source contract under which Becton would be the only vendor approved by Novation to sell Disposable Hypodermic Products to Novation members." (Id.). Moreover, the Complaint alleges that "[i]f a Class member desired to purchase Disposable Hypodermic Products from a manufacturer that was not the chosen sole-source contractor for the GPO, the Class member risked losing numerous financial incentives," as a result, a "substantial portion of the markets for Disposable Hypodermic Products have been foreclosed." (Id., PP 61, 69).

In light of the foregoing allegations, the Court finds that Defendant's argument [*52] that "MedStar has not pled any particular facts to establish either the existence of exclusive dealing arrangements or the substantial foreclosure of competition by those contracts" to be unpersuasive. [27] See, e.g., Bell Atl. Corp., 127 S.Ct. at 1965 (HN26[]] "Asking for plausible grounds to infer an agreement does not impose a probability requirement at the pleading stage; it simply calls for enough fact to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of illegal agreement.").

II. Indirect Purchaser Claims

A. Generally

In the alternative, Plaintiffs assert indirect purchaser [*53] claims under the laws of the District of Columbia and twenty-five other jurisdictions. Defendant moves to dismiss such "indirect" purchaser claims on the same basis on which it argues that Plaintiffs' federal antitrust claims are deficient. As discussed above, Plaintiffs' claims will not be dismissed on these grounds.

Defendant also claims that "[t]here is an additional, and independent, reason for dismissing plaintiffs' 'indirect' purchaser claims under state law: the Complaint fails to allege what portion, if any, of Becton's alleged 'overcharge' was passed on to them." (Def. Br. at 30). [28] In particular, Defendant argues that, as indirect purchasers, Plaintiffs must prove that Becton charged monopoly prices and that Becton's "overcharge" was passed on to Plaintiffs.

As a preliminary matter, the Court notes that Defendant cites to no legal authority indicating that Plaintiffs must plead the amount of "overcharge" [*54] which was passed on to them. Furthermore, although Defendant claims that "an indirect purchaser must allege and prove: (1) that a 'direct' purchaser (e.g., a wholesaler) was overcharged by Becton, (2) that the direct purchaser then passed on the overcharge, or some portion of it, to the 'indirect' purchaser, and (3) that the indirect purchaser did not turn around and pass on all of the overcharge to its customers," [29] the cases relied upon by Defendant in support of same -- which are not binding on this Court, and none of which were decided at the motion to dismiss stage -- do not dictate that the foregoing factors are a pleading

[27] Furthermore, Defendant cites to no legal authority indicating that such allegations have been insufficiently plead. In fact, the majority of the cases relied upon by Defendant in this regard are either not binding on this Court, or were not decided at the motion to dismiss level, therefore providing little or no guidance to the Court as to whether Plaintiffs' exclusive dealing allegations were properly or improperly pled. See, e.g., Atl. Richfield Co. v. USA Petroleum Co., 495 U.S. 328, 110 S. Ct. 1884, 109 L. Ed. 2d 333 (1990); Tampa Elec. Co. v. Nashville Coal Co., 365 U.S. 320, 81 S. Ct. 623, 5 L. Ed. 2d 580 (1961); LePage's Inc. v. 3M, 324 F.3d 141 (3d Cir. 2003).

[28] Defendant incorporates by reference its arguments at pages 22-23 and 36-38 of its Memorandum in Support of its Motion to Dismiss the Consolidated Complaint of Jabo's Pharmacy and Drug Mart Tallman, attached as Exhibit 4 to the Silodor Declaration. See Silodor Decl., Ex. 4 at 22-23.

requirement. [30] Therefore, the Court concludes that Defendant has not met its burden in demonstrating that Plaintiffs' indirect purchaser claims should be dismissed on such a basis at this time.

B. Unjust Enrichment Claims

Plaintiffs assert claims for unjust enrichment under the laws of the District of Columbia and twenty-five other jurisdictions. (Compl. at 28). HN28[] Generally, "in order to state a claim for unjust enrichment, a plaintiff must allege (1) at plaintiff's expense, (2) defendant received benefit, (3) under circumstances that would make it unjust for defendant to retain benefit without paying for it." In re K-Dur Antitrust Litig., 338 F. Supp. 2d at 544 (citing Restatement of Restitution § 1 (1937)). Here, [*56] the Complaint alleges that "[a]s a result of Becton's anticompetitive scheme alleged herein, Plaintiffs and the Class members paid too much for Becton Disposable Hypodermic Products. The payment of these 'overcharges' represents an unjust benefit Plaintiffs and Class members conferred upon Becton. Becton was unjustly enriched by these illegal overcharges and equity requires disgorgement to prevent Becton from benefitting from its illegal acts." (Compl., P 116).

Defendant moves to dismiss Plaintiffs' claims for unjust enrichment on the basis that such claims are redundant to the extent that they are "based on the same alleged facts and same alleged damages as their antitrust claims: that they 'paid too much' for Becton products and that the 'overcharge' was an 'unjust benefit' plaintiffs conferred on Becton." (Def. Br. at 30). [31] While Defendant may ultimately be correct, HN29[] Plaintiffs are permitted to plead alternative theories of recovery. See, e.g., In re K-Dur Antitrust Litig., 338 F. Supp. 2d at 544 (denying motion to dismiss claims of unjust enrichment on the basis that equitable remedies such as unjust enrichment should not be granted where there exists an adequate remedy at law, [*57] and noting that plaintiffs "are clearly permitted to plead alternative theories of recovery."); United States v. Kensington Hosp., 760 F. Supp. 1120, 1135 (E.D. Pa. 1991) (recognizing that under Pennsylvania law an underlying contract precludes a claim of unjust enrichment, but allowing both claims to proceed, and explaining that the "Federal rules allow pleading in the alternative."). Therefore, the Court finds that it would be premature to dismiss Plaintiffs' unjust enrichment claims on such a basis at this stage of the litigation.

To the extent that Defendant moves to dismiss Plaintiffs' claims of unjust enrichment on the basis that certain individual states impose additional requirements, such as privity and exhaustion of remedies, the Court likewise determines that it is premature to consider these requirements on a state by state basis, at this time. [32] Because

Moreover, to the extent that Defendant cites to Illinois Brick Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (1977), [*55] for the proposition that "[a]n indirect purchaser plaintiff must prove that Becton charged monopoly prices and that all or some of Becton's 'overcharge' was passed through the distribution chain from the first purchaser to the indirect purchaser plaintiff," (Silidor Decl., Ex. 4 at 23) Defendant fails to indicate how Plaintiffs' ultimate burden of proof is relevant at this stage of the litigation. See, e.g., Scheuer, 416 U.S. at 236 (explaining that, HN27[] in conducting a 12(b)(6) analysis, the question is not whether plaintiffs will ultimately prevail in a trial on the merits, but whether they should be given an opportunity to offer evidence in support of their claims).

[31] Defendant's brief incorporates by reference pages 36-38 of its motion to dismiss the Consolidated Complaint of Jabo's Pharmacy, Inc. and Drug Mart Tallman, Inc. attached as Exhibit 4 to the Silodor Declaration. See Silodor Decl., Ex. 4 at 36-38.

[32] In Section V of its motion to dismiss the Consolidated Complaint of Jabo's Pharmacy, Inc. and Drug Mart Tallman, Inc., Defendant makes the argument that certain state law claims should be dismissed because the named plaintiffs lack standing to bring claims in those states in which the named plaintiffs do not engage in business. See Silodor Decl., Ex. 4 at 24. The Court notes that this argument is not raised in connection with the instant motion to dismiss, nor is it expressly incorporated by reference. See Def. Br. at 30. However, page 38 of the motion to dismiss the Consolidated Complaint of Jabo's Pharmacy, Inc. and Drug Mart Tallman, Inc. -- which Defendant does incorporate by reference -- then refers the Court to Section V of same. See neither the "Indirect Class," nor the "D.C. Indirect Class" has yet to be [*58] certified, the Court will not predict which state law(s) would be applicable in the event that said Classes are certified, "particularly given the fact that the anticipated complexity of a choice-of-law analysis may itself be a factor in determining the certifiability of the class." In re K-Dur Antitrust Litig., 338 F. Supp. 2d at 541. Therefore, Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' unjust enrichment claims is denied, without prejudice.

C. State Antitrust Claims

Finally, Defendant argues that certain state antitrust claims asserted by Plaintiffs are deficient for various reasons, including, but not limited to (1) Plaintiffs' inability to pursue claims under state antitrust laws which regulate only intrastate commerce, and (2) Plaintiffs' inability to meet particular pleading and/or procedural requirements set forth by certain states. (Def. Br. at 30). [33] For the same reasons why the Court deems it inappropriate [*62] to determine under which state laws Plaintiffs have viable unjust enrichment claims, the Court likewise determines that it would be inefficient to assess (1) which state antitrust laws would be applicable, and (2) the viability of Plaintiffs' state antitrust claims under such laws, prior to a determination on the issue of class certification. [34] Accordingly, to the extent that Defendant moves to dismiss Plaintiffs' state antitrust claims on such a basis, Defendant's motion is denied, without prejudice.

Silodor [*59] Decl., Ex. 4 at 38, 24. Defendant's maneuvering in this regard is both confusing and frustrating to the Court, and should be avoided in all future filings. Moreover, as a result of such maneuvering, it is unclear to the Court whether Defendant intends to incorporate this argument into its motion to dismiss the instant Complaint.

HN30[] L. Civ. R. 7.2(b) imposes a 40 page limit when using a 14-point Times New Roman font, as was done in this case. Moreover, L. Civ. R. 7.2(b) specifically provides that "[b]riefs of greater length will only be accepted if special permission of the Judge or Magistrate Judge is obtained prior to submission of the brief." Defendant's brief totals 30 pages. Defendant also incorporates by reference pages 22-23, 36-38, and 27-36 of its motion to dismiss the Consolidated Complaint of Jabo's Pharmacy, Inc. and Drug Mart Tallman, Inc. See Def. Br. at 30. This puts Defendant's brief at 5 pages over the 40 page limit. While the Court has considered the arguments contained therein, as a courtesy to Defendant, to the extent that Defendant also seeks to indirectly incorporate by reference the arguments raised in Section V of its motion to dismiss the Consolidated Complaint [*60] of Jabo's Pharmacy, Inc. and Drug Mart Tallman, Inc., the arguments contained therein will not be considered by the Court. Defendant does not indicate that it sought, or was given, permission, to file an over-length brief in this instance.

Even if the Court were to consider same, the Court would decline to entertain such an argument prior to addressing the issue of class certification. See Ortiz v. Fibreboard Corp., 527 U.S. 815, 816, 119 S. Ct. 2295, 144 L. Ed. 2d 715 (1999) (HN31[] "[w]hile an Article III court ordinarily must be sure of its own jurisdiction before getting to the merits, a Rule 23 question should be treated first because class certification issues are 'logically antecedent' to Article III concerns . . . .") (citation omitted). The state antitrust claims alleged in Count IV of the Complaint are brought "only by the Indirect Class." See Compl. at 25. (emphasis added). Should the Court decide not to certify the Indirect Class, then Defendant's concerns regarding claims "brought only by the Indirect Class" may be moot. See, e.g., In re K-Dur Antitrust Litig., 338 F. Supp. 2d at 544 (declining to address defendant's argument that plaintiffs lack Article III standing to assert claims in jurisdictions in which plaintiffs [*61] do not allege to have been purchasers prior to determining class certification); Clark v. McDonald's Corp., 213 F.R.D. 198, 205 (2003) (declining to address defendant's argument that plaintiff has no standing to assert claims on behalf of class members regarding restaurants in states that plaintiff, himself, has not visited, and reasoning that such an issue "would not arise but for Clark's capacity as a putative class representative."); In re Buspirone Patent Litig., 185 F. Supp. 2d 363, 377 (S.D.N.Y. 2002) (deferring on issue of Article III standing on a motion to dismiss, and explaining that "it is appropriate to decide class certification before resolving alleged Article III challenges of the present kind.").

[33] Defendant's brief incorporates by reference pages 27-36 of its motion to dismiss the Consolidated Complaint of Jabo's Pharmacy, Inc. and Drug Mart Tallman, Inc. attached as Exhibit 4 to the Silodor Declaration. See Silodor Decl., Ex. 4 at 27-36.

[34] See, e.g., In re K-Dur Antitrust Litig., 338 F. Supp. 2d at 542 (declining to address similar arguments regarding the deficiency of plaintiffs' state antitrust claims, and explaining that it would be "inefficient to determine under which state laws the Indirect Purchasers have viable claims before first deciding the class certification and choice of law issues.").

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated herein, the Court denies Defendant's motion to [*63] dismiss the Class Action Amended Complaint. An appropriate Order accompanies this Opinion.

MEMORANDUM & ORDER

GORTON, J.

This civil case involves allegations by the plaintiff, National [*2] Recycling, Inc. ("National Recycling") that the defendants, SEMass Partnership L.P. ("SEMass"), Browning-Ferris Industries, Inc. ("BFI") and Waste Management of Massachusetts, Inc. ("WMMA") have suppressed competition in the commercial waste industry in southeastern Massachusetts through the control and manipulation of prices at solid waste disposal sites in violation of 1) the Consumer Protection Act, Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 93A, §§ 2 and 11, 2) the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1 and 3) the Massachusetts Antitrust Act, Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 93, § 4. Currently pending before the Court is a joint motion of the defendants for summary judgment on all counts.

I. Background

The commercial waste industry consists of two segments: hauling and disposing. Hauling is, as it sounds, the pickup and removal of municipal solid waste from commercial customers. The waste is then delivered to various local disposal sites (landfill or incinerator) or to a transfer station. Transfer stations are used primarily by high volume haulers to collect several loads of waste before they are ultimately taken by transfer trailer to either a landfill or an incinerator for final disposal.

The economics of the industry are driven by two factors: 1) transportation costs and 2) "tipping fees" charged [*3] by the ultimate disposal site. In order to minimize costs, waste haulers seek to dispose of waste at the disposal site closest to the collection point. The tipping fees, the disposal price charged by the incinerator or landfill, are more variable and make up a significant percentage of the hauler's costs and, therefore, the price charged to the customer. At issue in this case are the tipping fees charged by the disposal sites.

In the southeastern Massachusetts waste disposal market, there are four sizable disposal sites which account for nearly all of the commercial municipal solid waste in the area, three of which are owned or operated by the defendants: 1) SEMass's incinerator plant, 2) BFI's Fall River Landfill, 3) WMMA's Taunton Landfill and 4) Crapo Hill Landfill. Defendant SEMass receives the greatest share of the market, disposing nearly 70% of the southeastern Massachusetts commercial municipal solid waste. Crapo Hill is owned by the City of New Bedford and takes only municipal solid waste collected in New Bedford and Dartmouth. The limited number of disposal sites is the result, at least in part, of requirements adopted by the Massachusetts Department of Environmental Protection [*4] in the 1990s to close all unlined landfills and to declare a moratorium on all new incinerator plants.

The plaintiff, National Recycling, is an independent waste hauler which operated in the southeastern Massachusetts area until February, 2005. Until that time, National Recycling hauled municipal solid waste for commercial customers and delivered it to waste disposal sites, mainly to the SEMass incinerator plant. As an independent hauler, National Recycling hauled all of its municipal waste to the disposal site using direct haul trucks; it neither owned a transfer station nor had access to delivery by transfer trailer. National Recycling remained profitable until 2002 at which point it began to lose customers rapidly, allegedly as the result of the high disposal prices charged by SEMass for direct haul disposal. In February, 2005, National Recycling stopped operating hauling trucks in the southeastern Massachusetts market and sold off its last truck in June, 2005.

Defendants BFI and WMMA are national waste disposal and hauling companies. Prior to 1999, BFI owned a 50% interest in the SEMass incinerator plant and was the country's third largest hauling and disposal company. In addition [*5] to the SEMass disposal site, BFI also owned other disposal locations in southeastern Massachusetts, including the Fall River Landfill. In 1999, BFI merged with Allied Waste Service, the country's second largest hauling and disposal company.[1] As a pre-condition for merger approval, BFI sold its interest in SEMass to the American Ref-Fuel Company in August, 1999. Defendant WMMA, owned by Waste Management, Inc., the country's largest waste disposal and hauling company, also operates as a hauler in the southeastern Massachusetts area and owns the Taunton landfill, which opened for municipal waste disposal in 2001.

In November 5, 2003, National Recycling filed an initial complaint in this Court alleging that the defendants had engaged in anticompetitive behavior by controlling the prices at solid waste disposal sites. On December 18, 2003, the plaintiff filed an amended complaint dismissing Waste Management, Inc. as a defendant and adding Waste Management of Massachusetts, Inc. The case was transferred to this Session on July 8, 2004. On December 29, 2006, the Court denied the plaintiff's motion for leave to file a second amended complaint to add a claim for exclusionary dealing but allowed [*6] its motion for leave to file a third amended complaint for lost profits. On January 17, 2007, the plaintiff filed an amended complaint in accordance with that order.

In the complaint, National Recycling alleges that the defendants entered into various agreements which resulted in anticompetitive restraints on the market. Generally, the complaint alleges that: 1) SEMass agreed to provide defendants WMMA and BFI with the lowest direct haul disposal prices, 2) SEMass made other side agreements with WMMA and BFI for rebates and discounts for trailer transfers which disproportionately benefited them and 3) the defendants agreed to raise and fix direct haul disposal prices at their facilities which would drive up the costs for their competitors while maximizing their own profit margins.

II. Joint Motion for Summary Judgment

The defendants contend that National Recycling cannot prove that 1) the defendants engaged in any agreements that unreasonably restrained trade and 2) even if such agreements existed, they did not adversely affect competition or cause injury to the plaintiff.

A. Legal Standard

Summary judgment is appropriate where the moving party has shown, based upon the pleadings, discovery [*7] and affidavits, "that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the moving party is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law". Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c).

A fact is material if it "might affect the outcome of the suit under the governing law". Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 248, 106 S. Ct. 2505, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1986). "Factual disputes that are irrelevant or unnecessary will not be counted." Id. A genuine issue of material fact exists where the evidence with respect to the material fact in dispute "is such that a reasonable jury could return a verdict for the nonmoving party". Id.

Once the moving party has satisfied its burden, the burden shifts to the non-moving party to set forth specific facts showing that there is a genuine, triable issue. Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 324, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986). The Court must view the entire record in the light most hospitable to the non-moving party and indulge all reasonable inferences in that party's favor. O'Connor v. Steeves, 994 F.2d 905, 907 (1st Cir. 1993). If, after viewing the record in the non-movant's favor, the Court determines that no genuine issue of material fact exists and the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law, summary judgment is appropriate.

B. Federal Antitrust Claim

The federal claim is the linchpin of this case. The Court begins, therefore, with the operative language in § 1 of the Sherman Act [*8] which states:

> [e]very contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States . . . is hereby declared to be illegal.

15 U.S.C. § 1. Despite the statute's broad language with respect to "restraint of trade", Congress intended to outlaw only unreasonable restraints. Those restraints are broken down generally into two categories: 1) per se unreasonable restraints in which a "practice facially appears to be one that would always or almost always tend to restrict competition and decrease output" and 2) those which are "designed to increase economic efficiency and render markets more, rather than less, competitive". Broadcast Music, Inc. v. Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc., 441 U.S. 1, 19-20, 99 S. Ct. 1551, 60 L. Ed. 2d 1 (1979)(citation omitted). The first category, which includes such restraints as horizontal price-fixing, are illegal without regard to a defendant's market power, illicit purpose or an agreement's anticompetitive effects. U.S. Healthcare, Inc. v. Healthsource, Inc., 986 F.2d 589, 593 (1st Cir. 1993). The second requires a "rule of reason analysis" in which a plaintiff has the burden of demonstrating, inter alia, "that the anticompetitive effects of the agreements outweigh their legitimate business justifications." Monahan's Marine, Inc. v. Boston Whaler, Inc., 866 F.2d 525, 526-27 (1st Cir. 1989).

1. Most Favored Nation Agreements

In both SEMass's service agreements with WMMA and BFI, [*9] there are "Most Favored Nation" ("MFN") clauses which state that, except in cases of spot waste deliveries or waste collected under municipal or other government contracts, SEMass will provide the defendants with the lowest per ton rate paid by any company for the disposal of municipal solid waste. National Recycling contends that the MFN agreements exerted anticompetitive effects on the industry. The defendants disagree and respond that the agreements are: 1) pro-competitive as a matter of law, 2) without adverse effect on competition and 3) based on legitimate business justifications which outweigh any alleged anticompetitive claims. National Recycling rejects each of those arguments and contends that the MFN agreements in this case exerted an unreasonable restraint of trade by unfairly raising disposal prices and imposing a price floor for the defendants' competitors.

a. Pro-Competitive as a Matter of Law

First, the defendants cite two First Circuit cases, Kartell v. Blue Shield of Massachusetts, Inc., 749 F.2d 922 (1st Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 471 U.S. 1029, 105 S. Ct. 2040, 105 S. Ct. 2049, 85 L. Ed. 2d 322 (1985) and Ocean State Physicians Health Plan, Inc. v. Blue Cross & Blue Shield of Rhode Island, 883 F.2d 1101 (1st Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1027, 110 S. Ct. 1473, 108 L. Ed. 2d 610 (1990), in support of their argument that MFN clauses, in the absence of evidence that pricing was predatory or below incremental cost, are pro-competitive as a matter of law. The first, Kartell, did [*10] not involve a MFN clause but rather allegations that the price bargaining scheme violated § 1 of the Sherman Act. Ocean State involved a challenge to a MFN agreement but was brought pursuant to § 2 of the Sherman Act, rather than § 1. The defendants contend that the two cases when read together support the claim that MFN clauses are pro-competitive.

Plaintiff National Recycling vigorously disagrees and criticizes the defendants' interpretation of the caselaw as overly broad. It directs the Court's attention to a 1996 decision from the District Court of Rhode Island, United States v. Delta Dental of Rhode Island, 943 F. Supp. 172 (D. R.I. 1996), which considered Kartell and Ocean State extensively and concluded that they did not establish a rule that MFN clauses are competitive as a matter of law:

> Despite Kartell and Ocean State's broad language, these decisions, properly construed, fail to establish a per se validation of the MFN clauses in all cases where pricing is not predatory or below incremental costs. Such a blanket condonation of MFN clauses would ignore the context Kartell and Ocean State were decided in, run counter to the Sherman Act's preference for fact-specific inquires, implausibly reject the premise that MFN clauses produce substantial anticompetitive effects [*11] in particular circumstances and contradict the Sherman Act's animating concern for low consumer prices.

Id. at 176. This Court agrees. Neither Ocean State nor Kartell stand for the proposition that the effect of a MFN clause on a market is always de minimus in the absence of predatory or below costs pricing.

b. Rule of Reason

Second, the defendants contend that even if the MFN agreements are subject to judicial scrutiny, National Recycling cannot demonstrate that they unreasonably restrained trade. In this case, the defendants assert that the MFN agreements are "vertical agreements" because they are between buyers of waste disposal services (WMMA and BFI) and the seller of those services (SEMass) and, therefore, are subject to the rule of reason analysis. See State Oil Co. v. Khan, 522 U.S. 3, 10-19, 118 S. Ct. 275, 139 L. Ed. 2d 199 (1997). Under that analysis, a plaintiff bears the burden of showing that the arrangement had an anticompetitive effect which outweighed the legitimate economic advantages which it might provide. U.S. Healthcare, Inc., 986 F.2d at 595. Anticompetitive effect can be demonstrated either directly with evidence of an actual adverse effect or indirectly by establishing that the arrangement created or enhanced market power which resulted in the ability either to control prices or to exclude [*12] competition. See Eastern Food Servs., Inc. v. Pontifical Catholic Univ. Servs. Ass'n Inc., 357 F.3d 1, 5 (1st Cir. 2004).

The existence of market power can be proven through direct evidence of such efforts to control or indirect evidence based on market share in a relevant market combined with other factors such as evidence of high entry barriers. Top Markets, Inc. v. Quality Markets, Inc., 142 F.3d 90, 99 (2d Cir. 1998). Proof of market share is fundamental to a showing of anticompetitive effects; "absent market power there is ordinarily no detriment". Eastern Food Servs., 357 F.3d at 5. The defendants contend that National Recycling has failed to produce any evidence demonstrating that either WMMA or BFI had sufficient market power to control disposal pricing at SEMass.

As an initial matter, the parties dispute the appropriate methodology for calculating market share. The defendants contend that, even using the plaintiff's market share numbers, neither BFI nor WMMA has a sufficiently high percentage of the commercial hauling market to establish control over disposal site tipping fees.[2] In response, National Recycling contends that in this case, market share should be based on the collective shares of the two defendants: a share of over 80% of the hauling market.

The question of whether it is appropriate to aggregate the market shares of defendants BFI and WMMA is significant. When added together, [*13] whether it is 75% or 80%, the market share percentage is sufficient evidence of market power, especially when considered in conjunction with the nature of the waste disposal industry. Although the defendants vigorously challenge the validity of the aggregated calculus, the plaintiff defends it on the basis that: 1) the rate-differential agreements indicate that SEMass considered the economic impact of BFI and WMMA as a unit, 2) BFI and WMMA were aware of each other's MFN agreements and 3) the original MFN agreement between WMMA and SEMass was negotiated and agreed when SEMass was still owned by BFI in 1998. The Court finds none of those arguments persuasive.

As discussed in the next section, there is no credible evidence to support the existence of the rate-differential agreements. With respect to the MFN agreements, the Court finds that the contracts between WMMA and SEMass and between BFI and SEMass are vertical agreements, which the parties entered into separately. While the ability to obtain a contract with a MFN provision is evidence of some degree of market strength, the existence of the agreement itself is not conclusive evidence of market power. Furthermore, while the plaintiff [*14] urges that there is a triable issue with respect to the pre-merger relationship between BFI and SEMass, the record clearly indicates that by 1999, the two were independent entities. Although WMMA entered into its first MFN agreement with SEMass in 1998, the evidence clearly demonstrates that WMMA engaged in separate negotiations and contracts with SEMass subsequent to BFI's divestment.[3] There is no reason to infer that WMMA's MFN agreement with SEMass was actually an agreement with BFI.

Considering only the defendant's individual market shares, there is no evidence on the record that WMMA has a waste haul market share greater than 25%. In fact, in the plaintiff's statement of facts, WMMA's market share is alleged to be no higher than 20.5%. As a matter of law, that percentage is insufficient evidence of market power because "firms with market shares of less than 30% are presumptively incapable of exercising market power." See Union Carbide Corp. v. Montell N.V., 27 F. Supp. 2d 414, 417 (S.D.N.Y. 1998)(collecting cases). National Recycling provides no evidence to overcome that presumption. The Court concludes, therefore, that as a matter of law, National Recycling's claim that WMMA's MFN agreement unreasonably restrained the waste hauling market fails.

[2] According to the plaintiff's expert, some sources estimate the market shares of WMMA and BFI in the waste hauling market as 20-25% and 45-50%, respectively.

[3] Plaintiff's argument that BFI and SEMass should be treated as a single entity prior to the 1999 divestiture, citing Nobody in Particular Presents, Inc. v. Clear Channel Commc'n, 311 F. Supp. 2d 1048 (D. Colo. 2004), is unavailing.

BFI, on [*15] the other hand, has a much higher percentage of market power in the waste hauling market although the exact percentage is in dispute. National Recycling contends that it is as high as 61%, while the defendants argue that it is much lower. National Recycling asserts that BFI's market power is also underscored by the high barriers to entry in the hauling and disposal market.

Market power, while critical to a showing of indirect adverse effect, is, alone, insufficient. Top Markets, Inc., 142 F.3d at 97. The defendants contend that, even if they had market power, National Recycling cannot show harm to competition. The defendants correctly assert that it is harm to competition, not to competitors, that is the hallmark of an antitrust claim. See Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 97 S. Ct. 690, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977). National Recycling responds that the agreements between the defendants resulted in sustained price increases in the industry and a reasonable jury could find that the defendants' actions exerted an adverse effect on competition as a whole. The Court agrees.

Specifically, the plaintiff contends that prior to the MFN agreements in 1998, the tipping fees for commercial haulers were between $35 and $40 per ton. In 1999 and 2000, the tipping fees increased to about $80 per ton and by [*16] 2001, SEMass was charging a tipping fee of $85-86 per ton for independent haulers delivering municipal waste by direct haul vehicles. Two of the three largest landfill disposal sites, owned by defendants BFI and WMMA, had equivalent tipping fees. National Recycling maintains that those increased tipping fees resulted in increased prices to commercial waste customers in the southeastern Massachusetts markets and forced independent waste haulers out of business. Moreover, the record includes evidence of purported communications between SEMass and BFI regarding price increases and profitability calculations. Such evidence is not only indicative of BFI's market power in southeastern Massachusetts but also that they acted in a concerted manner to increase prices and harm competition. The Court concludes, therefore, that there are genuine issues of material fact with respect to BFI's market power and the adverse effect resulting from the defendants' behavior.

With respect to the defendants' argument that there are legitimate business reasons for those increased prices which outweigh the alleged anticompetitive effects, the Court concludes that there are genuine issues of material fact. Sufficient [*17] for the purpose of surviving a motion for summary judgment, the plaintiff's complaint, combined with the various documents and deposition transcripts submitted by the parties, support an inference that the defendants embarked upon a course of conduct that was intended to control the direct haul disposal market in such a manner as to have a negative impact on competition.

2. Rate-Differential Agreements

The defendants also contend that National Recycling has failed to produce any credible evidence of a "Rate Differential Agreement" between the parties. According to the plaintiff, both BFI and WMMA had an oral understanding with SEMass that if SEMass lowered the price for any independent hauler (even if it was higher than the MFN price), it would lower the price charged to BFI and WMMA, dollar for dollar. As a result, SEMass had a strong incentive to resist granting discounts to other commercial haulers because that would force corresponding discounts for BFI and WMMA.

The defendants assert that the only evidence provided by National Recycling is the inconsistent testimony of its President, Michael O'Keefe ("O'Keefe") about conversations he allegedly had with SEMass employees. Defendants [*18] contend that in the absence of any corroborating evidence, the self-serving statements, alone, are insufficient proof of Rate Differential Agreements. In their depositions, the SEMass personnel who allegedly discussed those agreements with O'Keefe deny that the agreements exist. Furthermore, the defendants offer evidence that, contrary to the plaintiff's claim that it was impossible, SEMass did provide discounts to other independent haulers who were able to deliver an increased volume of municipal waste.

In response, the plaintiff relies primarily on the argument that credibility cannot be contested on summary judgment. The Court is not persuaded. While the credibility of a witness is the province of the trier of fact, the defendants are correct that in cases such as this where the claim at issue "makes no economic sense", the plaintiff has the burden of providing some evidence to support that claim. Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 587, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986). Based on evidence on the record, the rate differential agreement alleged by the plaintiff would be contrary to SEMass's economic self-interest and plaintiff has failed to satisfy its burden to come forward with the required additional evidence. O'Keefe's testimony alone is insufficient [*19] to prove the existence of the alleged rate-differential agreements. See Perez v. Volvo Car Corp., 247 F.3d 303, 318 (1st Cir. 2001)("Where, as here, the nonmovant has the burden of proof on a critical issue, and the evidence that she proffers in opposition to summary judgment is so vague that she could not prevail at trial, the motion must be granted."). The Court concludes that National Recycling has failed to present a triable issue regarding the rate differential agreements.

C. State Law Claims

The defendants also seek summary judgment on plaintiff's state law claims on the same basis as the federal claims. Given the Court's denial of summary judgment on the federal antitrust claims with respect to defendants SEMass and BFI, summary judgment on the state law claims is inappropriate.

Defendant WMMA (in the joint motion) contends that the state law claims, pursuant to the Massachusetts Antitrust Act and the Consumer Protection Act, also fail because National Recycling cannot demonstrate an antitrust violation. National Recycling does not challenge dismissal of the state antitrust law but contends that the Chapter 93A claim is not co-extensive with the antitrust violation. The Court disagrees and will, therefore, dismiss the 93A claim.

ORDER

For [*20] the foregoing reasons, the defendants' joint motion for summary judgment on all claims (Docket No. 83) is, with respect to defendant Waste Management of Massachusetts, Inc., ALLOWED; but is, with respect to defendants Browning-Ferris Industries, Inc. and SEMass Partnership L.P., DENIED.

So ordered.

In Copperweld, the United States Supreme Court has rejected the concept of intra-enterprise conspiracy and has ruled that a corporation and its wholly-owned subsidiary are incapable of conspiring with each other for purposes of the Sherman Act. In doing so, it has emphasized that function, not form, controls and that concerted behavior deprives the marketplace of the independent centers of decisionmaking that competition assumes and denies. The Supreme Court has concluded that coordination between a corporation and its division does not represent a sudden joining of two independent sources of economic power previously pursuing separate interests. Copperweld casts considerable doubt upon prior lower court decisions broadly rejecting the single entity concept, and the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, believes it is imprudent to rely upon those cases.

Perhaps a proper reading of Copperweld leads to the conclusion that in most national sports league contexts for league-wide policy, other than labor disputes, the leagues are single entities. While such a position has considerable appeal, the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit has not gone that far. It has recognized that, antitrust issues aside, how much a professional sports league charges for national telecasts is for the league to resolve under its internal governance procedures. It is no different in principle from the question how the clubs divide revenue from merchandise bearing their logos and trademarks.

In answering Copperweld's functional question, the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, believes that cooperative marketing by national professional football teams serves to promote professional football and falls on the "unilateral" action side of the line. The court reaches this conclusion while recognizing that others might well disagree.

Ownership (and, thus, ultimate control) of intellectual property rights does not necessarily defeat the single entity concept for antitrust purposes. Indeed, that common ownership and the absence of conflicts are not determinative standards adds to the conceptual difficulties in where to draw the line between what should be deemed a single entity and what should not. The United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, recognizes, as well, that supposed efficiencies in economic arrangements are more the stuff of the rule of reason than of distinguishing between single entities and joint ventures.

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

Since 1963 the merchandising of the NFL and constituent team paraphernalia has been through a jointly-owned affiliate, NFL Properties. The 32 teams may own the intellectual property involved, but the exploitation of that property has been delegated to NFL Properties. Over the years, the details of the arrangement have changed, e.g., a trust now acts as a conduit for the transfer of rights from teams to NFL Properties, but the substance of the arrangement is essentially unchanged. The 32 teams each has an equal interest in the enterprise. Thus, although much (perhaps all) of the profits may go to charity, any distribution that may be made after payment of expenses and distribution to charity is equally shared. [1]

It is the responsibility of NFL Properties to assist in the [3] development and protection of the various marks and to implement marketing strategies. Therefore, it coordinates the development of intellectual property rights, promotes consistent branding and quality, and engages in nationwide promotion. That means, for example, that the Green Bay Packers need not find and monitor suppliers for apparel bearing its logos, need not locate outlets in Chicago, Tampa or Seattle, need not unilaterally pursue infringers, and need not coordinate marketing strategies with 31 other teams and the NFL. Further, a supplier need not negotiate separate licenses with 32 different teams and the NFL.

For over twenty years NFL Properties granted licenses to plaintiff American Needle, Inc., to use trademarks of the NFL and the (now) 32 teams on headware it manufactured. In 2000, NFL Properties was authorized to enter into an exclusive license with Reebok International Ltd. (Reebok), and it did so. That prompted plaintiff, which lost its license rights, to sue. It does not claim that the NFL and its 32 teams previously acted improperly by delegating to NFL Properties the authority to grant licenses. That was permissible, it contends, so long as the licenses were spread [4] around a number of competitors. It only became an antitrust violation, an illegal conspiracy in restraint of trade violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act, when NFL Properties granted an exclusive license to Reebok.

We reject the distinction plaintiff urges us to make. HN1[] The owner or licensor of intellectual property can grant a license to one or to many. See Cook, Inc. v. Boston Scientific Corp., 333 F.3d 737, 740-41 (7th Cir. 2003). Even were plaintiff right in its claim that there is a Section 1 antitrust violation (which we reject), and each team had to do its own licensing, each could choose to license many, or just one. The issue, rather, is whether or not the 32 teams can agree on designating a common actor to exploit their various intellectual [*943] property rights, and on being bound by the decisions of that common actor. And the answer to that depends upon whether, with regard to the facet of their operations respecting exploitation of intellectual property rights, the NFL and its 32 teams are, in the jargon of antitrust law, acting as a single entity. We conclude that they clearly are, and, accordingly, enter summary judgment for defendants on Counts II and V. HN2[] That determination [5] is essentially a conclusion that in that facet of their operations they have so integrated their operations that they should be deemed to be a single entity rather than joint venturers cooperating for a common purpose. See Texaco, Inc. v. Dagher, 547 U.S. 1, 6, 126 S. Ct. 1276, 164 L. Ed. 2d 1 (2006). [2]

The two cases most relevant to the decision are Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 104 S. Ct. 2731, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628 (1984), and Chicago Professional Sports Limited Partnership v. National Basketball Association, 95 F.3d 593 (7th Cir. 1996) ("Bulls II"). HN4[] In Copperweld, the Supreme Court rejected the concept of intra-enterprise conspiracy and ruled that a corporation and its wholly-owned subsidiary are incapable of conspiring with each other for purposes of the Sherman Act. In doing so, it emphasized that function, not form, controlled. It noted that concerted behavior "deprives the marketplace of the independent centers of decision-making [6] that competition assumes and denies" 467 U.S. at 769. It also concluded that "[C]oordination between [1] Some minor revenue from sales from local team pro shops may adhere to the benefit of the local team.

[2] Plaintiff also contends that Reebok, also a defendant and supposedly an ardent suitor, itself creates the plurality necessary for Section 1 claims. But if NFL Properties HN3[] can issue an exclusive license, then whether or not the licensee urged, solicited or vigorously argued for the change is irrelevant.

a corporation and its division does not represent a sudden joining of two independent sources of economic power previously pursuing separate interests" (id. at 770). Copperweld casts considerable doubt upon prior lower court decisions broadly rejecting the single entity concept and, we believe, made it imprudent to rely upon those cases. HN5[] Perhaps a proper reading of Copperweld leads to the conclusion that in the NFL and most other sports league contexts for league-wide policy other than labor disputes, the leagues are single entities. That is the position taken in Grow, Note: "There is No 'I' in 'League': Professional Sports League and the Single Entity Defense," 105 Mich.L.Rev. 183 (2006). That Note provides a helpful discussion of the status of the defense over time. While Grow's position has considerable appeal, the Seventh Circuit did not go that far in Bulls II, and we therefore turn to Bulls II.

Bulls II recognizes that, antitrust issues aside, how much the NBA charges for national telecasts is for the league to resolve under its internal governance procedures. It is no different [7] in principle from the question how the clubs divide revenue from merchandise bearing their logos and trademarks. Id., at 597.

HN6[] Delegated decision-making does not deprive the marketplace of independent centers of decision-making. There is no sudden joining of independent sources of economic power previously pursuing separate interests. NFL Properties has been making the decisions unilaterally or jointly since 1963. Why the NFL should opt for that structure is obvious. To require that 32 teams each take total responsibility for the protection and marketing of its own logos and trademarks in a nationwide market would cause each to be at a competitive disadvantage with other leagues with integrated marketing. Sharing the revenues (or tax deductions), despite some teams being in much larger [*944] markets, serves the interest in having the teams relatively competitive. For this facet, HN7[] in answering Copperweld's functional question, we believe cooperative marketing does serve to promote NFL football and falls on the "unilateral" action side of the line. Dagher, 547 U.S. 1, 126 S. Ct. 1276, 164 L. Ed. 2d 1 (2006).

We reach that conclusion while recognizing that others might well disagree, see, e.g., Sullivan v. National Football League, 34 F.3d 1091, 1099 (1st Cir. 1994), [8] that it "is a tough question …," and that the "cases do not yield a clear principle about the proper characterization of sports leagues …," Bulls II at 599-600. Plaintiff here emphasizes that the teams, not NFL Properties, own the respective property rights. HN8[] Ownership (and, thus, ultimate control) does not necessarily defeat the single entity concept. Sunkist Growers, Inc. v. Winckler & Smith Citrus Products, 370 U.S. 19, 29, 82 S. Ct. 1130, 8 L. Ed. 2d 305 (1962); City of Mt. Pleasant, Iowa v. Associated Electric Cooperative, Inc., 838 F.2d 268, 275 (8th Cir. 1988). Indeed, that common ownership and the absence of conflicts are not determinative standards adds to the conceptual difficulties in where to draw the line between what should be deemed a single entity and what should not. See Fraser v. Major League Soccer, L.L.C., 284 F.3d 47, 58 (1st Cir. 2002). We recognize, as well, that supposed efficiencies in economic arrangements are more the stuff of the rule of reason than of distinguishing between single entities and joint ventures.

The obvious advantages of one-stop exploitation of the intellectual properties of the 32 teams and of those common to the league in a national market do, however, explain in part why [9] the National Football League teams proceeded as they did. The need for competitive balance is obvious as well. The teams agreed to share equally in that market, and they have done so since 1963. They have, through the various forms of NFL Properties, acted as an economic unit. Freeman v. San Diego Association of Realtors, 322 F.3d 1133, 1147-48 (9th Cir 2003). The economic reality is that the separate ownerships had no economic significance in and of itself, and American Needle, Inc. does not suggest that it ever dealt with any of the teams as independent organizations. See City of Mt. Pleasant, Iowa v. Associated Electric Cooperative, Inc., 838 F.2d at 275.

Plaintiff has urged that it needs a great amount of discovery and that any consideration of the single entity concept is premature. We disagree. We believe that the facts that materially bear upon the decisions are undisputed and that they lead undeniedly to the conclusion that the NFL and the teams act as a single entity in licensing their intellectual property. Accordingly, we grant defendants' motion for summary judgment on Counts II and V.

Pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), a court may dismiss a complaint for failure to state a claim upon which relief may be granted. Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6). Rule 12(b)(6) is also invoked for questions of antitrust standing.

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Complaints > Requirements for Complaint

HN2[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

The purpose of a motion to dismiss is to test the sufficiency of a complaint, not to resolve disputed facts or decide the merits of the case. While the court must accept as true all allegations in the complaint and must draw all reasonable factual inferences in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, the factual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level. Heightened fact pleading is not required, but enough facts must be alleged to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face. The court is not required to accept legal conclusions alleged or inferred from the pleaded facts. Once a claim has been stated adequately, it may be supported by showing any set of facts consistent with the allegations in the complaint. The burden of demonstrating that dismissal is appropriate rests on the movant.

Constitutional Law > ... > Case or Controversy > Standing > Elements

HN3[] Standing, Requirements

To demonstrate standing for the purposes of pursuing an antitrust claim, plaintiffs must demonstrate the Constitutional standing requirements of U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, namely a "case" or "controversy." However, the Constitutional standing requirements are augmented by consideration of prudential limitations. Specifically, plaintiffs must demonstrate that they have antitrust standing and are the proper parties to bring a private antitrust action. The United States Supreme Court outlined five factors that courts should consider when determining whether a party has standing to bring a private action under the antitrust laws. These factors include: (1) whether plaintiff's alleged injury is the type of injury that the antitrust laws were intended to redress (i.e., the antitrust injury requirement); (2) the causal connection between the antitrust violation and the harm to the plaintiff, including the defendant's intent to cause that harm; (3) whether the injury is a direct injury or a speculative injury; (4) whether there are more direct victims of the alleged antitrust violations; and (5) the potential for duplicative recovery or complex apportionment of damages.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Sherman Act

HN4[] Standing, Sherman Act

Plaintiffs bringing claims under §16 of the Sherman Act need only demonstrate a threat of loss for injunctive relief; however, § 16 plaintiffs are still required to demonstrate that the threatened injury is the type of injury the antitrust laws were designed to prevent.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Requirements

HN5[] Standing, Requirements

To establish an antitrust injury, a plaintiff must allege a type of injury that the antitrust laws were designed to prevent and which flows from the conduct that makes the defendant's actions unlawful.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > General Overview

In the context of antitrust standing, injury in the form of higher prices to consumers is within the type of injury that the antitrust laws are designed to prevent.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > General Overview

HN7[] Private Actions, Standing

In the context of antitrust standing, the concept of antitrust injury overlaps with the causation factor in the balancing test because the injury must be causally related to the defendant's allegedly anticompetitive activity.

HN18[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

A majority of courts have concluded that N.Y. C.P.L.R. § 901 is a substantive rule and not a procedural rule. Therefore, under Erie principles, § 901 applies in federal court diversity actions.

State statutes prohibiting class certification do not directly conflict with Fed. R. Civ. P. 23, which governs the manner in which a court should determine if class certification is appropriate.

Civil Procedure > Preliminary Considerations > Federal & State Interrelationships > Erie Doctrine

HN21[] Federal & State Interrelationships, Erie Doctrine

Under Erie, a federal court with diversity jurisdiction must apply state substantive law and federal procedural law. The application of the substantive/procedural dichotomy is applied with an outcome determinative goal so that in all cases where a federal court is exercising jurisdiction solely because of the diversity of citizenship of the parties, the outcome of the litigation in the federal court will be substantially the same, so far as legal rules determine the outcome of a litigation, as it would be if tried in a State court. The outcome determinative focus serves the "twin aims" of discouraging forum shopping and avoiding inequitable administration of the laws. Thus, application of the outcome determinative test should not favor the use of state law unless one of these aims is furthered.

Civil Procedure > Preliminary Considerations > Federal & State Interrelationships > Erie Doctrine

HN22[] Federal & State Interrelationships, Erie Doctrine

Erie and its progeny make clear that when a federal court sitting in a diversity case is faced with a question of whether or not to apply state law, the importance of a state rule is indeed relevant, but only in the context of asking whether application of the rule would make so important a difference to the character or result of the litigation that failure to enforce it would unfairly discriminate against citizens of the forum State, or whether application of the rule would have so important an effect upon the fortunes of one or both of the litigants that failure to enforce it would be likely to cause a plaintiff to choose the federal court.

Civil Procedure > Preliminary Considerations > Federal & State Interrelationships > Erie Doctrine

HN23[] Federal & State Interrelationships, Erie Doctrine

Even if state law affects the outcome of the litigation, however, it will not be applied if a strong countervailing federal interest dictates recourse to the federal rules, or if the Erie rule is used to void a Federal Rule of Civil Procedure.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

Civil Procedure > Preliminary Considerations > Federal & State Interrelationships > Erie Doctrine

HN24[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

A specific state policy denying class action enforcement of a particular state-created right should be honored by a federal court.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Monopolies & Monopolization > General Overview

HN25[] Regulated Practices, Monopolies & Monopolization

A civil claim for damages for monopolization was not recognized under the common law.

Contracts Law > Remedies > Equitable Relief > Quantum Meruit

HN26[] Equitable Relief, Quantum Meruit

Generally, a claim for unjust enrichment requires a plaintiff to demonstrate that (1) the plaintiff conferred a benefit on the defendant; (2) the defendant knew of the benefit; and (3) the defendant accepted or retained the benefit under such circumstances as to make non-payment inequitable. Unjust enrichment only applies in circumstances in which the parties have not entered into an express contract. A person of full capacity who, pursuant to a contract with another, has performed services or transferred property to the other or otherwise conferred a benefit upon him, is not entitled to compensation therefor other than in accordance with the terms of such bargain, unless the transaction is rescinded for fraud, mistake, duress, undue influence or illegality, or unless the other has failed to perform his part of the bargain.

Contracts Law > Remedies > Equitable Relief > Quantum Meruit

HN27[] Equitable Relief, Quantum Meruit

Unjust enrichment ordinarily does not furnish a basis for liability where parties voluntarily have negotiated, entered into and fully performed their bargain, as consumers do in buying vehicles.

[*406] CONSOLIDATED ACTION

MEMORANDUM OPINION

July 12, 2007

Wilmington, Delaware

Farnan, District Judge.

Pending before the Court is Defendant Intel Corporation's Motion To Dismiss The First Amended Consolidated Complaint (D.I. 217 in Civil [2] Action No. 05-485 and D.I. 307 in MDL Docket No. 05-1717). [1] For the reasons discussed the Court will grant-in-part and deny-in-part Defendant's Motion.

BACKGROUND

The background related to this action has been set forth by the Court in its previous decision (D.I. 299) addressing the Motion To Dismiss Class Plaintiffs Foreign Conduct Claims filed by Defendant Intel Corporation ("Intel"). *Paul v. Intel Corp. (In re Intel Corp. Microprocessor Antitrust Litig.), 476 F. Supp. 2d 452, 2007 WL 685564, 1-2 (D. Del. 2007). By [*407] way of brief summary, Class Plaintiffs filed multiple class action lawsuits against Intel after it was sued by Advanced Micro Devices, Inc. and AMD International Sales & Service, Ltd. (collectively, "AMD"). Those lawsuits have been consolidated here.

Class Plaintiffs represent United States consumers who purchased computers containing Intel x86 microprocessors. The allegations of Class Plaintiffs' First Amended Consolidated Complaint (the "Complaint") are similar to, and at times, identical to the allegations of AMD's Complaint. Class Plaintiffs allege seven causes [3] of action, including: (1) Section 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2 (Count I); (2) Section 16720 of the California Business and Professional Code for unlawful trust in restraint of trade and commerce (Count II); (3) the prohibition against monopolies under California state tort law (Count III); (4) Section 17000 et seq. of the California Business and Professional Code for unfair competition (Count IV); (5) antitrust and restraint of trade violations under the laws of nineteen states and the District of Columbia (Count V); (6) consumer protection and/or unfair competition violations under the laws of twenty-two states and the District of Columbia (Count VI); and (7) unjust enrichment and disgorgement of profits under the common law of California, or alternatively the common law of the other States at issue and the District of Columbia (Count VII). Class Plaintiffs seek a variety of relief, including punitive damages, treble damages, disgorgement of profits, the establishment of a constructive trust from which the Class Plaintiffs can seek restitution based on the disgorgement of profits, the costs of bringing this lawsuit, and reasonable attorneys' fees.

[1] In citing to additional documents throughout this Memorandum Opinion, the Court will refer to the docket item numbers used in Civil Action No. 05-485-JJF.

By the instant Motion, Intel [4] requests the Court to dismiss the Complaint pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) for failure to state a claim and lack of standing. The parties have fully briefed Intel's Motion, and therefore, this matter is ready for the Court's review.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

HN1[] Pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6), the Court may dismiss a complaint for failure to state a claim upon which relief may be granted. Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6). Rule 12(b)(6) is also invoked for questions of antitrust standing. Maio v. Aetna, Inc., 221 F.3d 472, 481 n. 7 (3d Cir. 2000).

HN2[] The purpose of a motion to dismiss is to test the sufficiency of a complaint, not to resolve disputed facts or decide the merits of the case. Kost v. Kozakiewicz, 1 F.3d 176, 183 (3d Cir. 1993). While the Court must accept as true all allegations in the complaint and must draw all reasonable factual inferences in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, the "[f]actual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level . . ." Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 1965, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). [2] Heightened fact pleading is not [*408] required, but enough facts must be alleged to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its [5] face. Id. at 1974. The Court is not required to accept legal conclusions alleged or inferred from the pleaded facts. "[O]nce a claim has been stated adequately, it may be supported by showing any set of facts consistent with the allegations in the complaint." Twombly, 127 S. Ct. at 1969. The burden of demonstrating that dismissal is appropriate rests on the movant.

DISCUSSION

I. Whether Class Plaintiffs Have Stated A Claim Under Federal Or State Antitrust Laws

A. Antitrust Standing

HN3[] To demonstrate standing for the purposes of pursuing an antitrust claim, Class Plaintiffs must demonstrate the Constitutional standing requirements of Article III, § 2, namely a "case" or "controversy." However, the Constitutional standing requirements are "augmented by consideration of prudential limitations." City of Pittsburgh v. West Penn Power Co., 147 F.3d 256, 264 (3d Cir. 1998). Specifically, Class Plaintiffs must demonstrate that they have antitrust standing and are the proper parties to bring a private antitrust action. Id. In Associated General Contractors of California v. California State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 537-545, 103 S. Ct. 897, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723 (1983), [7] the Supreme Court outlined five factors that courts should consider when determining whether a party has standing to bring a private action under the antitrust laws. These factors include: (1) whether plaintiff's alleged injury is the type of injury that the antitrust laws were intended to redress (i.e., the antitrust injury

---

[2] Intel filed a Supplemental Brief addressing the Twombly decision. Class Plaintiffs have also filed a response. The Second Circuit recently identified and discussed the "conflicting signals" from Twombly in determining how that decision impacts the standard for reviewing a motion to dismiss. *Iqbal v. Hasty, 490 F.3d 143, 2007 U.S. App. LEXIS 13911, 2007 WL 1717803, *8-11 (2d Cir. June 14, 2007). While the Second Circuit acknowledged that Twombly dealt with antitrust claims under Section 1 of the Sherman Act, the Second Circuit also acknowledged that the Supreme Court likely intended some change in the dismissal standard extending beyond antitrust conspiracy cases.

The Court understands Twombly to primarily be a decision aimed at bringing the standard of dismissal back to its "roots" by undoing the literal reading of Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 78 S. Ct. 99, 2 L. Ed. 2d 80 (1957), engaged in [6] by some courts and emphasizing that Conley "described the breadth of opportunity to prove what an adequate complaint claims, not the minimum standard of adequate pleading to govern a complaint's survival." 127 S. Ct. at 1969. For purposes of Intel's motion here, the Court will apply, where applicable, what the Second Circuit has coined the "flexible plausibility standard" of Twombly to Class Plaintiffs' claims as outlined by the Court in its recitation of the standard of review governing Intel's Motion.

requirement); (2) the causal connection between the antitrust violation and the harm to the plaintiff, including the defendant's intent to cause that harm; (3) whether the injury is a direct injury or a speculative injury; (4) whether there are more direct victims of the alleged antitrust violations; and (5) the potential for duplicative recovery or complex apportionment of damages. West Penn, 147 F.3d at 264 (restating the Associated General Contractors ("AGC") factors).

Intel contends that Class Plaintiffs cannot demonstrate antitrust injury because they received the benefit of Intel's alleged price cuts and rebates. According to Intel, Class Plaintiffs cannot allege antitrust injury, because low prices benefit consumers, regardless of how those prices are set. Intel further contends that Class Plaintiffs cannot demonstrate that the remaining AGC factors support [8] their assertion that they have antitrust standing.

In response, Class Plaintiffs contend that the heightened prudential standing requirements represented by the AGC five-factor test are not relevant to Class Plaintiffs' antitrust claims. Class Plaintiffs point out that their only federal claim is a claim for injunctive relief under Section 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 26, and Class Plaintiffs contend that Section 16 is not as demanding as Section 4. Under Section 16, Class Plaintiffs contend that they need only establish a threat of antitrust injury.

Although Class Plaintiffs seek damages under state antitrust laws, Class Plaintiffs contend that the AGC factors do not apply to those claims. Rather, Class Plaintiffs [*409] contend that the appropriate standing analysis for these claims must look to state law, not federal law, because state law permits indirect purchasers to bring antitrust claims. In the alternative, Class Plaintiffs contend that the AGC factors weigh in favor of Class Plaintiffs' standing, and in any event, standing is a fact-intensive inquiry best left to later stages of the proceedings when the parties have the benefit of a more fully developed factual record.

The Court [9] begins its analysis by determining whether it is appropriate to apply the AGC five-factor test to all of Class Plaintiffs' claims. The Court has reviewed the parties' arguments concerning this issue and concludes that it is appropriate to apply the AGC factors if not directly, at least as a guide, in evaluating Class Plaintiffs' state law antitrust claims. Relying on D.R. Ward Construction Co. v. Rohm & Haas Co., 470 F. Supp. 2d 485, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 61828 (E.D. Pa. May 31, 2006), Class Plaintiffs contend that the AGC factors are inapplicable to state law claims, even where the applicable state law has a "permissive" harmonization statute that allows federal courts to use federal law as a guide in interpreting them. However, the Court finds D.R. Ward to be inconsistent with the prevailing approach to this question by courts applying the laws of states that have rejected the Illinois Brick prohibition on indirect purchaser suits. Lorix v. Crompton Corp., 720 N.W.2d 15, 18-19 (Minn. 2006); Kanne v. Visa U.S.A., Inc., 272 Neb. 489, 723 N.W.2d 293, 301 (Neb. 2006); Strang v. Visa U.S.A., Inc., 2005 WL 1403769, *3-5 (Wis. Cir. Ct. Feb. 8, 2005); Peterson v. Visa U.S.A., Inc., 2005 WL 1403761, *3-6 (D.C. Super Ct. Apr. 22, 2005); [10] Southard v. Visa U.S.A., Inc., 2004 WL 3030028, *3-4 (Iowa Dist. Ct. Nov. 17, 2004).

The Court further agrees with Intel, that Class Plaintiffs' argument against the use of federal law as a guideline blurs the distinction between the question of standing and the question of whether indirect purchasers may sue for antitrust injury. That numerous state courts have declined to apply the indirect purchaser bar announced by the Supreme Court in Illinois Brick does not equate with the question of whether standing under those states' laws should be informed by federal law.

As for Class Plaintiffs' federal law claim, the Court notes that Class Plaintiffs are correct that HN4[] plaintiffs bringing claims under Section 16 of the Sherman Act need only demonstrate a threat of loss for injunctive relief; however, Section 16 plaintiffs are still required to demonstrate that the threatened injury is the type of injury the antitrust laws were designed to prevent. Accordingly, in light of the foregoing, the Court will loosely apply the AGC factors as a guide in analyzing the standing issues relevant to Class Plaintiffs' federal and state law claims.

HN5[] To establish an antitrust injury, a plaintiff must allege [11] a type of injury that the antitrust laws were designed to prevent and which flows from the conduct that makes the defendant's actions unlawful. [3] Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 489, 97 S. Ct. 690, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977). Reviewing the Complaint in the light most favorable to Class Plaintiffs as the Court must on a motion to dismiss, the Court concludes that Class Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged antitrust injury at this juncture. Class Plaintiffs have alleged that Intel engaged in a variety of anticompetitive actions > with the goal of keeping competitors small and keeping Intel's customers dependent [*410] on Intel for very substantial amounts of product. In this way, OEMs remain vulnerable to continual threats of Intel retaliation, Intel's competitors remain capacity-constrained, the OEMs remain Intel-dependent, and Intel thereby perpetuates its economic hold over them, allowing it to continue to demand that customers curtail their dealings with Intel's competitors.

Complaint at P 141. According to Class Plaintiffs this anticompetitive conduct allowed Intel to garner a higher market share, which allowed Intel to charge higher prices to consumers. Id. at 1, 2, 5. By keeping their rivals small, [12] Class Plaintiffs contend that Intel prevents them from offering lower-priced or higher quality products. If its rivals were able to offer such products, Intel would then be forced in turn to lower its own prices. Stated another way, Class Plaintiffs have alleged that "but for" Intel's anticompetitive conduct, Intel's prices would have been lower. HN6[] Injury in the form of higher prices to consumers is within the type of injury that the antitrust laws are designed to prevent. See e.g., Allegheny Gen. Hosp. v. Philip Morris, Inc., 228 F.3d 429, 439 (3d Cir. 2000).

Intel contends that Class Plaintiffs cannot state an antitrust injury because their arguments are based on Intel's average prices overall, and Plaintiffs have not alleged (and cannot allege) how industry-wide average prices of Intel chips affect the transaction prices of the products they actually purchased. (D.I. 293 at 10.) However, the cases Intel cites to support its argument [13] are in the context of class certification disputes.

Intel also contends that Class Plaintiffs' argument involves too speculative a chain of events, and therefore, any alleged injury is too remote and speculative to establish that the alleged injury flowed from Intel's alleged anticompetitive conduct. HN7[] "The concept of antitrust injury overlaps with the [causation] factor in the balancing test because the injury must be causally related to the defendant's allegedly anticompetitive activity." West Penn, 147 F.3d at 265. At this early stage of the proceedings, the Court concludes that Class Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged "but for" causation. However, the Court acknowledges that the parties' arguments are complex and intensely factual, and therefore, the Court concludes that a more fully developed factual record is necessary to address them.

As for the remaining three AGC factors, the Court concludes that they carry less weight in the standing analysis in jurisdictions rejecting Illinois Brick. For example, in applying the fourth AGC factor, the Court must determine whether there are more direct victims of the alleged antitrust violations. However, under the state statutes asserted by [14] Class Plaintiffs, indirect purchasers are permitted to bring claims, and therefore, the existence of more direct victims would not necessarily undercut Class Plaintiffs' standing. Accordingly, the Court concludes that the allegation of the Complaint are sufficient to withstand dismissal, and therefore, the Court will deny Intel's Motion To Dismiss based on the failure to allege antitrust standing.

B. Choice Of Law

Intel next requests the Court to dismiss Class Plaintiffs' claims for violation of California law as alleged in Count II (violation of the Cartwright Act); Count III (California tort law against monopolization) and Count IV (violation of the California Unfair Competition Law), as those Counts pertain to non-California Plaintiffs. Intel's request for dismissal implicates a choice of law analysis. Specifically, Intel contends that it is inappropriate to apply California law on a nation-wide basis, because such [*411] application would frustrate the laws of other states who also have an interest in this litigation. In conducting this choice of law analysis, Intel contends that the Court must apply the choice of law rules of the transferor forum states, namely Delaware, California, Florida [15] and Tennessee.

[3] Class Plaintiffs agree with Intel that this element of AGC applies to both their federal and state claims; however, Class Plaintiffs contend that the antitrust injury under Section 16 is less demanding than Section 4 and broader for their state law claims.

Class Plaintiffs agree that a choice of law analysis is necessary in this case; however, they believe it should be reserved until class certification proceedings. In any event, Class Plaintiffs contend that the appropriate choice of law analysis is for this Court to apply California choice of law principles because the majority of the transferred cases came from California, with only two cases coming from Tennessee and only one case from Florida.

The Court agrees with Class Plaintiffs that analysis of the choice of law questions presented in this litigation should be deferred. This litigation is still in its infancy, and the Court concludes that these complex and sometimes dispositive choice of law questions should be made with the benefit of a more complete context for this litigation. Accordingly, the Court declines to engage in a choice of law analysis at this time, and therefore, the Court will deny Intel's Motion to the extent that it seeks dismissal of claims under California law asserted by Class Plaintiffs who do not live in California.

C. Antitrust Claims Asserted Under The Laws Of The States Of Mississippi, Nevada, South Dakota, West Virginia And The District [16] Of Columbia

Intel next contends that Class Plaintiffs have failed to state claims under the antitrust laws of Mississippi, Nevada, South Dakota, West Virginia and the District of Columbia. [4] Intel contends that these jurisdictions limit the reach of their antitrust laws to intrastate conduct. According to Intel, Class Plaintiffs' Complaint alleges the monopolization of a world-wide market. Thus, Intel contends that Class Plaintiffs have failed to allege that Intel engaged in any state-specific conduct or that Intel directed its alleged anticompetitive conduct toward any particular state.

Directing the Court to case law applying the laws of the four states at issue and the District of Columbia, Class Plaintiffs respond that Intel's alleged conduct has both an intrastate and interstate component. Class Plaintiffs contend that the sales of computers [17] containing Intel x86 microprocessors occurred wholly within the four states and the District of Columbia, and therefore, any intrastate component required by these laws is satisfied. Class Plaintiffs also point out that they have alleged injury throughout the United States and the District of Columbia. Specifically, Class Plaintiffs direct the Court to the following allegations contained in the Complaint:

> 248. Intel's contracts, trusts or conspiracies were entered into, carried out, effectuated and perfected mainly within the State of California, and Intel's conduct within California injured all Class members throughout the United States. Therefore, this claim for relief under California law is brought on behalf of all Class members, whether or not they are California residents.
> 251. The contracts, trusts or conspiracies alleged herein have had, inter alia, the following effects:
>> a. price competition in the sale of microprocessors has been restrained, [*412] suppressed and/or eliminated in the State of California and throughout the United States;
>> b. prices for microprocessors sold by Intel and its co-conspirators have been fixed, raised, maintained and stabilized at artificially high, non-competitive [18] levels in the State of California and throughout the United States; and
>> c. those who purchased microprocessors from Intel have been deprived of the benefit of free and open competition.
> 252. Plaintiffs and the Class members paid and continue to pay supra-competitive, artificially inflated prices for microprocessors.
> 253. As a direct and proximate result of Intel's unlawful conduct, Plaintiffs and the Class members have been injured in their business and property in that they paid more for Intel's x86 microprocessors (or for products containing such microprocessors) than they would have paid absent Intel's unlawful conduct. As a result of [4] Defendants have included the State of New York in their argument as the fifth state at issue. However, Plaintiffs' claims under New York law fail for reasons apart from the intrastate pleading requirement, and therefore, the Court will not discuss New York law here. See infra Section I.D. of the Discussion portion of this Memorandum Opinion.

> Intel's violation of Section 16720, Plaintiffs and the Class members seek treble damages and the costs of suit, including reasonable attorneys' fees, pursuant to Section 16750(a) of the California Business and Professions Code.

The Court will address the parties' arguments in the context of the law of each of the challenged jurisdictions.

1. District of Columbia

In full, the District of Columbia's antitrust legislation provides:

> HN8[] It shall be unlawful for any person to monopolize, attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons [19] to monopolize any part of trade or commerce, all or any part of which is within the District of Columbia.

D.C. Code § 28-4503 (emphasis added). In GTE New Media Servs, Inc. v. Ameritech Corp., 21 F. Supp. 2d 27, 45 (D.D.C. 1998), the United States District Court for the District of Columbia applied this statute in the context of addressing the defendants' motion to dismiss the plaintiff's antitrust claims. Specifically, the plaintiff alleged that the defendants illegally combined to restrain trade and monopolize the Internet Yellow pages market by controlling Internet access points through which competing Internet Yellow Pages providers offered their services. In this way, users who sought Yellow Pages information were directed by web browsers exclusively to the defendants' companies. Recognizing that D.C. Code § 28-4503 requires the plaintiff to allege a "connection with this jurisdiction," the court found that "the plaintiff ha[d] satisfied this separate requirement by alleging the defendants' anti-competitive activity impacts upon Internet users and businesses purchasing Internet Yellow Pages advertisements in the District of Columbia." Id. at 45.

Construing the allegations of the [20] Complaint in the light most favorable to Class Plaintiffs and drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of Class Plaintiffs as the Court must on a Motion To Dismiss, the Court concludes that Class Plaintiffs have alleged an impact upon consumers in the District of Columbia through their allegations that the putative class members were injured by Intel's alleged conduct throughout the United States and in the District of Columbia. Accordingly, at this juncture, the Court will deny Intel's Motion To Dismiss Class Plaintiffs' claims under the antitrust laws of the District of Columbia.

2. Mississippi

HN9[] Mississippi's antitrust laws prohibit agreements to "restrain trade," "increase [*413] . . . the price of a commodity," or "hinder competition in the production, importation, . . . sale or purchase of a commodity." Miss. Code Ann. § 75-21-1. In In re New Motor Vehicles Canadian Export Antitrust Litig. ("NMV"), 350 F. Supp. 2d 160, 171 (D. Me. 2004), the defendants raised the same argument that Intel raises here, that Mississippi's antitrust laws are limited to intrastate conduct and the plaintiffs' failure to allege state specific activity required dismissal of their complaint. However, the NMV court [21] recognized that HN10[] the Mississippi Supreme Court has characterized sales and distribution within Mississippi as intrastate in character when made "'after the . . . products [have] been received . . . in this state and . . . incorporated into the general mass of property therein.'" Id. (quoting Standard Oil Co. of Kentucky v. State, 107 Miss. 377, 65 So. 468, 471 (1914)). In Standard Oil, the Mississippi Supreme Court went on to conclude that HN11[] "to be punishable under state laws, [a conspiracy to monopolize trade] must have as one of its objects a monopoly in the intrastate trade . . . to be accomplished in part at least by transactions which are also wholly intrastate." 65 So. at 471. Extrapolating from this line of reasoning, the NMV court found it reasonable to infer from the complaint that the defendants wanted Mississippi car dealerships, like the dealerships in all states, to charge Mississippi consumers higher prices as a result of the lack of competition from Canadian imports. The court concluded that some of these sales "would occur wholly within the State of Mississippi, after the vehicle had been 'incorporated into the general mass of property' in the state, thereby falling within the compass [22] of the Mississippi antitrust statute." NMV, 350 F. Supp. 2d at 171. In the Court's view, Class Plaintiffs' Complaint satisfies this requirement. [5] Accordingly, the Court will deny Intel's Motion To Dismiss Class Plaintiffs' claims under Mississippi's antitrust laws.

3. Nevada

HN12[] Nevada's antitrust statute, the Nevada Unfair Trade Practices Act ("NUTPA"), delineates certain anticompetitive conduct and states that it is "unlawful to conduct any part of such activity in this state." Nev. Rev. Stat. § 598A.060. In NMV, the court also examined this statute and concluded that it was reasonable to construe the plaintiffs' complaint as alleging a conspiracy among car manufacturers and [23] Nevada dealers which "contemplated vehicle sales in Nevada at higher prices because of the exclusion of Canadian vehicles." 350 F. Supp. 2d at 171-172. This approach is also consistent with the approach taken by the United States District Court for the District of Nevada in Pooler v. R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., 2001 WL 403167, *2 (Nev. Dist. Ct. Apr. 4, 2001) (concluding that allegations of anticompetitive conduct in domestic and foreign markets included the marketing and sale of tobacco products in Nevada and denying motion to dismiss complaint for failure to allege acts committed in the state which were part of the alleged illegal activity).

In this case, the sale of computers containing the x86 microprocessor is at least part of the anticompetitive conduct alleged by Class Plaintiffs, and the Court concludes that it is reasonable to infer [*414] from Class Plaintiffs' allegations of indirect purchaser injury throughout the United States that Class Plaintiffs' allegations of anticompetitive conduct by Intel include the sale of the x86 microprocessor in Nevada markets. Accordingly, the Court will deny Defendants' Motion To Dismiss Class Plaintiffs' claims under the NUTPA.

4. South Dakota

HN13[] South [24] Dakota's antitrust law provides that "[a] contract, combination or conspiracy between two or more persons in restraint of trade or commerce any part of which is within this state is unlawful." S.D. Rev. Code § 37-1-3.1 (emphasis added). As the court in NMV recognized, this statute is ambiguous regarding whether part of the conspiracy or part of the trade or commerce must be within the state. The NMV court went on to assume thatHN14[] the State of South Dakota intended its antitrust coverage to be as broad as possible, and therefore, allegations that part of the trade or commerce occurred within South Dakota were sufficient to bring the related conspiracy into the reach of South Dakota law. Intel has not persuaded the Court that this construction of South Dakota law is erroneous, and Class Plaintiffs have, at least by reasonable inference, alleged the sale of computers containing Intel x86 microprocessors in South Dakota. Accordingly, the Court will deny Intel's Motion To Dismiss Class Plaintiffs' claims under South Dakota's antitrust laws.

5. West Virginia

HN15[] West Virginia's antitrust statute provides that "[e]very contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint [25] of trade or commerce in this State shall be unlawful." W. Va. Code § 47-18-3 (emphasis added). Further, the portion of the West Virginia Code dealing with monopoly provides that "[t]he establishment, maintenance or use of a monopoly or an attempt to establish a monopoly of trade or commerce, any part of which is within this State, by any persons for the purpose of excluding competition or controlling, fixing or maintaining prices is unlawful." W. Va. Code § 47-18-4 (emphasis added). Because Class Plaintiffs have, at least by reasonable inference, alleged the sale of computers containing Intel x86 microprocessors in West Virginia, the Court concludes at this juncture, that Class Plaintiffs' claims under West Virginia law withstand dismissal. Accordingly, the Court will deny Intel's Motion To Dismiss Class Plaintiffs' West Virginia antitrust claims.

D. Class Plaintiff's Class Action Claim For Violation Of New York's Antitrust Law

[5] Intel argues that no part of Intel's conduct can be considered "wholly intrastate" in character, because Intel is a component maker and Class Plaintiffs are indirect purchasers of downstream products who are several links down the manufacturing and distribution chain from Intel's alleged conduct. However, the component part argument does not appear to be relevant to the Mississippi Supreme Court's approach to when sales and distributions within the state assume an intrastate character. Standard Oil, 65 So. at 471.

In their Complaint, Class Plaintiffs allege a claim under New York Gen. Bus. Law § 30 et seq. (the "Donnelly Act") for antitrust violations. By its Motion, Intel contends that Class Plaintiffs cannot maintain this claim, because New York's class action statute, [26] CPLR § 901(b) [6], prohibits class actions under statutes like the Donnelly Act that provide for a treble damages remedy, but do not specifically authorize class action recovery.

In response, Class Plaintiffs contend that this Court need not apply CPLR § 901(b), because it is a procedural rule whose application is usurped by Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23. Because Rule 23 does not prohibit class recovery on treble damages claims, Class Plaintiffs [*415] maintain that class certification is not precluded, and therefore, dismissal of their Donnelly Act claim is not warranted.

This Court has previously concluded that HN17[] Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23 does not conflict with § 901(b), and that under the principles set forth in Erie R.R. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64, 78, 58 S. Ct. 817, 82 L. Ed. 1188 (1938), application of CPLR § 901(b) is appropriate. United States v. Dentsply Int'l, Inc., 2001 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9057, 2001 WL 624807, 15-16 (D. Del. Mar. 30, 2001) [27] (Robinson, C.J.). The Court finds no reason to depart from the rationale in Dentsply. [7]

As Class Plaintiffs recognize, if Section 901(b) applies, this Court is bound by the interpretation of New York law provided by the Court of Appeals of New York. See Gruber v. Owens-Illinois, Inc., 899 F.2d 1366, 1369 (3d Cir. 1990) (HN19[] "In interpreting state statutes, decisions of the state's highest court are binding upon us.") In Sperry v. Crompton Corp., 8 N.Y.3d 204, 863 N.E.2d 1012, 831 N.Y.S.2d 760, 2007 WL 527726 (N.Y. 2007), the Court of Appeals of New York concluded that a class action for treble damages cannot be maintained under the Donnelly Act. Accordingly, the Court will grant Intel's Motion To Dismiss Class Plaintiffs' antitrust claim for treble damages under the Donnelly Act.

II. [28] Whether Class Plaintiffs Have Stated A Claim Under State Consumer Protection Statutes

In arguing that Class Plaintiffs' claims under state consumer protection statutes should be dismissed, Intel first reiterates its argument that Class Plaintiffs have not suffered any injury, and therefore, they lack standing to pursue claims under state consumer protection laws. For the reasons discussed in the context of Plaintiffs' antitrust claims, the Court concludes that Intel is not entitled to dismissal on this ground.

Intel's remaining arguments raise two points. First, Intel contends that the consumer protection statues of Alaska, Georgia, Louisiana and Montana prohibit class actions, and therefore, Class Plaintiffs' claims under these statutes should be dismissed. Intel's second argument is directed to the consumer protection laws of Arkansas, Idaho, Kansas, Maine, New Mexico, New York and Utah. Intel contends that the consumer protection laws of these states prohibit only fraudulent, deceptive or unconscionable conduct, and Class Plaintiffs' allegations are insufficient to meet these pleading requirements. The Court will address each of Intel's arguments in turn.

A. Class Plaintiffs' Class [29] Action Claims For Violation Of The Consumer Protection Laws of Alaska, Georgia, Louisiana And Montana

[6] CPLR § 901(b) provides:

> HN16[] Unless a statute creating or imposing a penalty, or a minimum measure of recovery specifically authorizes the recovery thereof in a class action, an action to recover a penalty, or minimum measure of recovery created or imposed by statute may not be maintained as a class action.

[7] Further, HN18[] a majority of courts have concluded that § 901 is a substantive rule and not a procedural rule. Therefore, under Erie principles, § 901 applies in federal court diversity actions. See *Holster v. Gatco, Inc., 485 F. Supp. 2d 179, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20953, 2007 WL 923086, 4-6 (E.D.N.Y. 2007). For additional discussion of Erie principles in the context of Class Plaintiffs' class action consumer protection claims see infra Section II of the Discussion portion of this Memorandum Opinion.

Intel contends that Class Plaintiffs' claims under the laws of Alaska, Georgia, Louisiana and Montana for consumer protection violations should be dismissed because each state expressly prohibits class actions. In response, Class Plaintiffs contend that the limits on class actions imposed by these states' laws are procedural rules which directly conflict with Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23, and therefore, Rule 23 should prevail over the conflicting states' procedural laws.

[*416] As this Court explained in addressing New York's Donnelly Act, HN20[] state statutes prohibiting class certification do not directly conflict with Rule 23, which governs the manner in which a court should determine if class certification is appropriate. Because no direct conflict exists, the Court must apply Erie principles to determine if state law should apply.

HN21[] Under Erie, a federal court with diversity jurisdiction must apply state substantive law and federal procedural law. The application of the substantive/procedural dichotomy is applied with an outcome determinative goal so that "'in all cases where a federal court [30] is exercising jurisdiction solely because of the diversity of citizenship of the parties, the outcome of the litigation in the federal court [will] be substantially the same, so far as legal rules determine the outcome of a litigation, as it would be if tried in a State court.'" Chamberlain v. Giampapa, 210 F.3d 154, 158-159 (3d Cir. 2000) (quoting Guaranty Trust Co. v. York, 326 U.S. 99, 109, 65 S. Ct. 1464, 89 L. Ed. 2079 (1945)). The outcome determinative focus serves the "twin aims" of discouraging forum shopping and avoiding inequitable administration of the laws. Id. (citing Hanna v. Plumer, 380 U.S. 460, 468, 85 S. Ct. 1136, 14 L. Ed. 2d 8 (1965)). Thus, application of the outcome determinative test should not favor the use of state law unless one of these aims is furthered. Id. As the Supreme Court explained in Hanna:

> HN22[] Erie and its progeny make clear that when a federal court sitting in a diversity case is faced with a question of whether or not to apply state law, the importance of a state rule is indeed relevant, but only in the context of asking whether application of the rule would make so important a difference to the character or result of the litigation that failure to enforce it would unfairly discriminate against citizens of the [31] forum State, or whether application of the rule would have so important an effect upon the fortunes of one or both of the litigants that failure to enforce it would be likely to cause a plaintiff to choose the federal court.

380 U.S. at 468. HN23[] Even if state law affects the outcome of the litigation, however, it will not be applied if a strong countervailing federal interest dictates recourse to the federal rules, or if the Erie rule is used to void a Federal Rule of Civil Procedure. Giampapa, 210 F.3d at 159 (citations omitted).

In this case, the Court concludes that application of the Erie principles favors application of the state laws prohibiting class actions. 19 Charles Alan Wright, et al., Federal Practice & Procedure: Jurisdiction 2d § 4513 at 442 n. 63 (2d ed. 1996) ("[HN24[] A] specific state policy denying class action enforcement of a particular state-created right should be honored by a federal court."). In the Court's view, a contrary result would alter the character of this litigation and provide a result that is at odds with the result that would be reached by the respective state courts had this action been brought in those jurisdictions. Further, the Court is persuaded that application [32] of the respective state bans on class actions will discourage forum shopping.

Class Plaintiffs direct the Court to three cases taking a contrary approach, O'Keefe v. Mercedes Benz USA, LLC, 214 F.R.D. 266, 285-286 (E.D. Pa. 2003); In re Bridgestone/Firestone Inc., 205 F.R.D. 503 (S.D. Ind. 2001), rev'd in part on other grounds, 288 F.3d 1012 (7th Cir. 2002); and Kristiansen v. John Mullins & Sons, Inc., 59 F.R.D. 99, 109-110 n.13 (E.D.N.Y. 1973). In these cases, the respective courts found that limitations [*417] on class actions were procedural rules which directly conflicted with Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23, and therefore, Rule 23 should apply to allow class certification. However, the Court finds these decisions to be distinguishable from the circumstances here. Notably, none of the cases identified by Class Plaintiffs address the laws of the particular states at issue here. In O'Keefe, the court determined that an Alabama ban on class actions was a procedural rule; however, it did so in the face of an Alabama Supreme Court case expressly referring to the rule as a procedural rule. By way of further example, Bridgestone/Firestone addressed Tennessee [33] law and Michigan law; however, neither of these states banned class actions outright. In fact, the Tennessee law was silent on the questions of class actions and the Michigan law under consideration allowed class actions, but with certain requirements that were additional to those set forth in Rule 23.

In contrast, federal courts considering the laws of the states at issue here have concluded that class actions were precluded in federal courts based on the respective state law bans. See e.g., In re Pharm. Indus. Average Wholesale Price Litig., 230 F.R.D. 61, 84 (D. Mass. 2005) (excluding consumers from Alaska, Georgia and Montana from class because consumer protection statutes in those state prohibit class actions); O'Quin v. Verizon Wireless, 256 F. Supp. 2d 512, 519 (M.D. La. 2003) (recognizing Louisiana's ban on class actions and expressing view that plaintiffs "could not get a class certified under that particular law in either state or federal court"). Accordingly, the Court will grant Defendants' Motion To Dismiss Class Plaintiffs' consumer protection claims based on the laws of the States of Alaska, Georgia, Louisiana and Montana.

B. Whether Class Plaintiffs Have Sufficiently [34] Alleged Deceptive Or Unconscionable Conduct To State Claims Under The Consumer Protection Laws Of Arkansas, Idaho, Kansas, Maine, New Mexico, New York and Utah

Intel contends that Class Plaintiffs' claims under the consumer protection laws of Arkansas, Idaho, Kansas, Maine, New Mexico, New York and Utah should be dismissed, because these laws require fraudulent or deceptive conduct and/or unconscionable trade practices, and Plaintiffs' allegations do not rise to that level. Specifically, Intel contends that Class Plaintiffs' allegations of "fraudulent practices" are conclusory and insufficient to satisfy the fraudulent or deceptive component of these state laws. Intel also contends that, to the extent Class Plaintiffs are alleging unconscionable trade practices, as opposed to and separate from fraudulent practices, Class Plaintiffs fail to state a cause of action. Because Class Plaintiffs are indirect purchasers who had no direct contact with Intel, Intel contends that they cannot allege that Intel took grossly unfair advantage of them. Intel also contends that Class Plaintiffs stood to benefit from the discounts on Intel's microprocessors and that the reduction in the prices of microprocessors [35] cannot be said to be conduct which is an "affront to justice," "conscience-shocking" or "grossly disparate."

In response, Class Plaintiffs contend that the allegations concerning Intel's discriminatory rebates and discounts, its below-cost pricing, its threats toward customers who were considering making deals with AMD, and its retaliation against customers who did make such deals are inherently deceptive and self-concealing actions, of which Class Plaintiffs could not have been aware. Class Plaintiffs also contend that Intel acted fraudulently when it used [*418] compiler programs to secretly degrade computer performance when a program is run on an AMD platform.

The Court concludes that Class Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged deceptive or unconscionable trade practices so as to withstand dismissal for purposes of Rule 12(b)(6) under the laws of the States of Arkansas, Idaho, Kansas, Maine, New Mexico, New York and Utah. Intel contends that Class Plaintiffs have failed to allege that any of Intel's alleged conduct was directed towards Class Plaintiffs personally. Instead, Intel contends that all of Class Plaintiffs' allegations are directed toward its actions vis-a-vis AMD and others. In [36] the Court's view, Intel's arguments are in the nature of the causation arguments that it raised in the context of antitrust injury. As the Court noted there, these arguments are fact-driven and better left to a later stage of the proceedings.

At this juncture, the Court concludes that Class Plaintiffs have alleged a scheme involving discriminatory rebates and discounts, threats and intimidation of direct purchasers and retaliation against direct purchasers, all of which ultimately impacted consumers like Class Plaintiffs. Intel contends that Class Plaintiffs acknowledge that some of their alleged conduct resulted in below-cost pricing, and therefore, their conduct cannot be unconscionable. While Class Plaintiffs acknowledge that Intel's conduct may "in some cases" have resulted in below-cost pricing on incremental sales, Class Plaintiffs have also alleged that the suppression of competition that has resulted from Intel's conduct has ultimately led to higher prices for consumers. Specifically, Class Plaintiffs allege:

> 234. Intel's exclusionary and restrictive practices described herein have suppressed competition in the x86 Microprocessor Market, resulting in higher prices for Intel x86 [37] microprocessors, even after discounts or rebates attributable to microprocessor purchases. The overcharges imposed by Intel have been passed on to Plaintiffs and the Class members in the form of higher prices for personal computers, workstations, and servers containing Intel x86 microprocessors.

Further, the Court concludes that Class Plaintiffs' allegations concerning Intel's use of compiler programs to degrade computer performances of programs run on an AMD platform are in the nature of deceptive trade practices for purposes of the various state statutes. Accordingly, on the face of the Class Complaint at this early stage of the proceedings, the Court cannot conclude that Class Plaintiffs allegations fail, as a matter of law, to state a claim for fraudulent, deceptive or unconscionable trade practices under the various state consumer protection laws. Therefore, the Court will deny Intel's Motion To Dismiss these claims.

C. Whether Class Plaintiffs Have Sufficiently Pled A Claim Under California's Unfair Competition Law

Intel separately challenges Class Plaintiffs' ability to state a claim under California's Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"). Intel's argument is based upon its argument [38] that Class Plaintiffs lack standing to assert violations of either the Sherman Act or the Cartwright Act. Because the Court has concluded that a determination of whether Class Plaintiffs have alleged antitrust injury is best left to a later stage of the proceedings, the Court will deny Intel's Motion To Dismiss Class Plaintiffs' claim under the California UCL.

[*419] V. Whether Class Plaintiffs Have Stated Common Law Claims For Monopolization And Unjust Enrichment

A. Monopolization

Intel contends that Class Plaintiffs cannot state a claim for the tort of monopolization under California's common law. In support of its argument, Intel points out that there are no definitive California Appellate Court or Supreme Court cases recognizing a damages claim based upon the common law tort of actual or attempted monopolization, and therefore, Intel contends that this Court should not "create" such a tort here. In response, Class Plaintiffs direct the Court to several California Superior Court cases and one California Court of Appeals case which Class Plaintiffs contend demonstrate that California recognizes a common law tort of monopolization.

The Court has reviewed the cases cited by the parties and finds [39] that there is no direct precedent from the California Supreme Court or the California Courts of Appeals on the question of whether California recognizes a common law claim for damages based upon monopolization. Class Plaintiffs direct the Court to In re Cipro Cases I & II, 121 Cal. App. 4th 402, 17 Cal. Rptr. 3d 1 (Cal. Ct. App. 2004) for the proposition that California courts recognize the common law tort of monopolization. However, in Cipro, the Court did not analyze this question specifically and only addressed whether a class alleging a claim for common law monopolization was properly certified. Class Plaintiffs also direct the Court to Natural Gas Anti-Trust Cases I, II, III and IV, 2002 WL 31570296 (Cal. Super. Ct. Oct. 16, 2002). In Natural Gas, the California Superior Court of San Diego County refused to strike a claim alleging the common law tort of monopolization stating:

> Additionally, the monopolization cause of action is not stricken because California courts have recognized that monopolization and attempted monopolization are against public policy and prohibited at common law. Burdell v. Grandi, 152 Cal. 376, 92 P. 1022 (1907). California also recognizes the existence of the common law "business tort" [40] of monopolization, separate and apart from statutory claims arising under the Cartright Act. Exxon Corp. v. Superior Court, . . . 51 Cal. App. 4th 1672, 60 Cal. Rptr. 2d 195 (1997).

*2002 WL 31570296 at * 3*. As Intel points out, however, neither case cited by the Natural Gas court actually analyzes whether a monopolization claim is available under California law in the first instance. In Burdell, the California Supreme Court found that a restrictive covenant in a lease that was intended to create a monopoly was void, but it did not address the availability of damages for a monopoly claim. Similarly in Exxon, the court concluded that the plaintiffs' monopoly claim could not survive summary judgment, but did not actually address whether such a claim was cognizable under California law because no such challenge was made to the claim.

More recently, another California Superior Court, the Superior Court of Santa Clara County, has taken the opposite view of the Natural Gas court. In Branning v. Apple Computer, Inc, the court concluded that "there is no cause of action for common law monopoly under California law." No. 1-05-CV-045719 at 3 (Cal. Super. Ct. May 9, 2006). In support of its conclusion, the Branning court [41] pointed to legislative history concerning the 2002 attempt to amend the Cartwright Act. In arguing that California should adopt a clause similar to Section 2 of the Sherman Act, the Attorney General of the State of California reported to the Senate that "[a]ccording to Attorney General's Office, the remedies for [*420] illegal monopolization are limited under current law to relief in a federal court." Assembly Comm. On Bus. & Profs., 2001-2002 Reg. Session, analysis of Senate Bill 1814, at 3 (June 25, 2002). The Branning court went on to cite to State of California ex rel. Van de Kamp v. Texaco, Inc., 46 Cal. 3d 1147, 1167, 252 Cal. Rptr. 221, 762 P.2d 385 (1988) and Phillip E. Areeda, Antitrust Law*: An Analysis of Antitrust Principles and their Application,* for the proposition thatHN25[] a civil claim for damages for monopolization was not recognized under the common law. As these sources point out, under the common law, the remedy for illegal agreements resulting in monopolies was the voiding of the offending agreements and not the awarding of civil damages as provided for under statutory law. See also Joseph D. Zamore, Business Torts Vol. 2, ch. 20 § 20.01 ("The primary difference between common law trade regulation and the Sherman [42] Act is that the Sherman Act penalizes anticompetitive conduct whereas the common law merely held that contracts that unreasonably restrained trade were unenforceable.")

This rationale is in accord with the approach taken by the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in Dimidowich v. Bell & Howell, 803 F.2d 1473, 1478 (9th Cir. 1986). Construing California law, the Ninth Circuit recognized that California's Cartwright Act does not contain a provision addressing unilateral conduct that results in a monopoly, but only combinations or conspiracies. As a result, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the district court's dismissal of the plaintiff's monopolization and attempted monopolization claims concluding that the plaintiff's monopoly claims challenging only the unilateral conduct of the defendant "fail[ed] to state a cognizable claim under California law . . ." Id.

In the absence of California Supreme Court law to the contrary, the Court is persuaded by the rationale of the Branning court and finds it to be consistent with the state of the common law as described by leading commentators. Accordingly, the Court concludes that Class Plaintiffs' claim for damages based upon the common law tort of [43] monopolization is not cognizable under California law, and therefore, the Court will dismiss Class Plaintiffs' common law monopolization claim.

B. Unjust Enrichment

In the Complaint, Class Plaintiffs allege that Intel has been unjustly enriched through the overpayments of Class Plaintiffs and the resulting profits such overpayments yielded to Intel. Class Plaintiffs raise this claim under California law on behalf of all Class Members, but alternatively allege that if California law is not applied on a nation-wide basis that this claim is brought under the laws of the individual States and the District of Columbia.

By its Motion, Intel contends that Class Plaintiffs' unjust enrichment claim should be dismissed, because California does not recognize a cause of action for unjust enrichment. Intel also contends that Class Plaintiffs cannot maintain a claim for unjust enrichment under the laws of the individual States because (1) Class Plaintiffs have no antitrust standing and therefore cannot maintain an unjust enrichment claim on the same facts; (2) a successful unjust enrichment claim would expose Intel to the risk of multiple liability, an outcome prohibited by states following the Supreme [44] Court's decision in Illinois Brick; and (3) Class Plaintiffs cannot establish a claim for unjust enrichment on the merits.

HN26[] Generally, a claim for unjust enrichment requires a plaintiff to demonstrate that (1) the plaintiff conferred a benefit on the defendant; (2) the defendant knew of the benefit; and (3) the [*421] defendant accepted or retained the benefit under such circumstances as to make non-payment inequitable. Unjust enrichment only applies in circumstances in which the parties have not entered into an express contract. As Section 107(1) of the Restatement (First) of Restitution provides:

> A person of full capacity who, pursuant to a contract with another, has performed services or transferred property to the other or otherwise conferred a benefit upon him, is not entitled to compensation therefor other than in accordance with the terms of such bargain, unless the transaction is rescinded for fraud, mistake, duress, undue influence or illegality, or unless the other has failed to perform his part of the bargain.

In NMV, the court recognized this principle and dismissed the unjust enrichment claims of the plaintiffs who claimed that automobile manufacturers and dealers conspired to keep [45] Canadian built cars out of the United States thereby causing overcharges for cars built in the United States that the plaintiffs purchased. 350 F. Supp. 2d at 210. The NMV court stated that HN27[] "unjust enrichment ordinarily does not furnish a basis for liability where parties voluntarily have negotiated, entered into and fully performed their bargain, as consumers do in buying vehicles." According to the NMV court:

> The automobile purchasers here paid their purchase prices and obtained their vehicles. The Second Amended Complaint does not seek to rescind these sales, and it does not assert that purchasers failed to receive the benefit for which they bargained in buying the vehicles.

Id. at 120. The Court concludes that the circumstances in NMV are analogous to the circumstances here. The Class Plaintiffs paid the purchase price for their computers and received their computers. Class Plaintiffs have not sought to rescind their purchases, none of which involved Intel as a direct manufacturer or seller, and Class Plaintiffs have not alleged that they did not receive the benefit of their bargain.

Class Plaintiffs direct the Court to a contrary holding in In re K-Dur Antitrust Litig., 338 F. Supp. 2d 517 (D.N.J. 2004). [46] In K-Dur, the court rejected the defendants' argument that "'any consideration' given for a benefit conferred necessarily defeats unjust enrichment claims." Id. at 545-546 (emphasis added). The court went on to conclude that the determination of the value of the benefit received compared with the amount paid were fact sensitive questions not suitable for adjudication in the context of a motion to dismiss. In this case, Class Plaintiffs do not allege that they failed to receive the benefit of their bargain, and therefore, the Court is not persuaded that K-Dur is applicable here. Further, to the extent that K-Dur can be read to adopt a general rule contrary to the rule discussed in NMV, the Court declines to adopt K-Dur and instead concludes that NMV and its adherence to the principles outlined in the Restatement (First) of Restitution is the better reasoned approach. Accordingly, the Court will grant Defendants' Motion to the extent it seeks dismissal of Class Plaintiffs' common law unjust enrichment claims.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons discussed, the Court will grant Intel's Motion To Dismiss the following claims asserted by Class Plaintiffs: (1) claims for antitrust violations under New [47] York law; (2) class action consumer protection claims under the laws of the States of Alaska, Georgia, Louisiana and Montana; (3) claims under the common law for monopoly; and (4) claims under the common law for unjust enrichment. [*422] Intel's Motion To Dismiss will be denied in all other respects.

An appropriate Order will be entered.

HN4[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

A motion to dismiss a complaint for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted tests the legal sufficiency of the complaint. For the limited purposes of assessing a complaint's legal sufficiency, a court accepts as true all facts as set forth in the complaint, and reasonable inferences that may be drawn from such facts. A complaint in a civil action should not be dismissed as legally insufficient unless it is clear that there are no circumstances under which the plaintiff can recover.

HN5[] Standards of Review, De Novo Review

Interpretation and application of statutes and case law to a set of facts are matters of law that an appellate court decides de novo.

Governments > Legislation > Interpretation

HN6[] Legislation, Interpretation

Statutory interpretation begins with the language of the statute. A court applies the language of a statute as written, giving the words their commonly accepted meanings. Statutory context is relevant to the plain meaning of a statute. Previous cases construing a statute also become a part of the understanding of a statute's plain meaning.

The Wisconsin Antitrust Act, Wis. Stat. § 133.03 (2005-06), may reach interstate commerce if (1) actionable conduct, such as the formation of a combination or conspiracy, occurred within the State of Wisconsin, even if its effects are felt primarily outside Wisconsin; or (2) the conduct complained of "substantially affects" the people of Wisconsin and has impacts in the State, even if the illegal activity resulting in those impacts occurred predominantly or exclusively outside the State.

A civil plaintiff filing an action under the Wisconsin Antitrust Act must allege either that actionable conduct occurred within the State of Wisconsin, or that the conduct complained of "substantially affects" the people of Wisconsin and has impacts in the State.

Under Olstad, an antitrust complaint must simply allege that the challenged conduct "substantially affects" the people of Wisconsin and has impacts in the State of Wisconsin, not that the impacts be disproportionately felt in Wisconsin.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Purchasers > Indirect Purchasers

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > State Regulation

HN18[] Purchasers, Indirect Purchasers

The Wisconsin Antitrust Act specifically provides a remedy for indirect purchasers who suffer harm as a result of conduct that violates Wis. Stat. ch. 133 (2005-006). Wis. Stat. § 133.18 provides that a person injured, directly or indirectly, by reason of anything prohibited by this chapter may sue and shall recover damages.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

Price-fixing is a monopolistic practice that, by its very nature, substantially affects the public. Opinion

[*P1] [299] [450] LOUIS B. BUTLER, JR., J. The defendants, Bayer AG, et al. (collectively "Bayer"), seek review of a published court of appeals' decision [1] reversing a circuit court order that [*3] dismissed all claims brought under Wisconsin's Antitrust Act, Chapter 133 of the Wisconsin Statutes, by Barbara Meyers, Lynn Stucker, Loyal Berg, and Eugene Browning (collectively "Meyers"), representing a putative class of Wisconsin residents who purchased the antibiotic ciprofloxacin hydrochloride from Bayer under the brand name Cipro. Meyers' complaint [2] alleges that Wisconsin consumers paid inflated prices for Cipro as a result of an unlawful agreement between Bayer and three manufacturers of generic drugs, Barr Laboratories, Inc. ("Barr"), Hoechst Marion Roussel, Inc. ("HMR") and The Rugby Group ("Rugby"), which precluded Barr, HMR and Rugby from selling or marketing generic ciprofloxacin hydrochloride to compete with Cipro.

[*P2] The circuit court, Honorable Michael D. Guolee, dismissed Meyers' claims [451] against Bayer, concluding that Wisconsin's Antitrust Act, Wis. Stat. § 133.03 (2005-06), [3] applied only to intrastate commerce. Meyers appealed, and the court of [*4] appeals held the case in abeyance pending our decision in Olstad v. Microsoft Corp., 2005 WI 121, 284 Wis. 2d 224, 700 N.W.2d 139. Subsequently, we concluded in Olstad that Wisconsin's Antitrust Act applies to cases involving interstate conduct if > [300] (1) the actionable conduct, such as the formation of a combination or conspiracy, occurred within this state, even if its effects are felt primarily outside of Wisconsin; or (2) the conduct complained of "substantially affects" the people of Wisconsin and has impacts in this state, even if the illegal activity resulting in those impacts occurred predominantly or exclusively outside this state.

Olstad, 2005 WI 121, P1, 284 Wis. 2d 224, 700 N.W.2d 139. Applying Olstad, the court of appeals reversed the circuit court on grounds that the Wisconsin Antitrust Act reaches interstate commerce, and Meyers' complaint alleged facts of illegal conduct that, if true, "substantially affected" the people of Wisconsin and had impacts in this state. Meyers v. Bayer AG, 2006 WI App 102, PP1, 10-11, 293 Wis. 2d 770, 718 N.W.2d 251.

[*P3] We follow our precedent set forth in Olstad for determining [*5] when Chapter 133 reaches interstate commerce: HN1[] A plaintiff filing an action under Wisconsin's Antitrust Act must allege price fixing as a result of the formation of a combination or conspiracy that "'substantially affects' the people of Wisconsin and has impacts in this state" when the challenged conduct occurs predominately or exclusively outside this state. Olstad, 2005 WI 121, P85, 284 Wis. 2d 224, 700 N.W.2d 139. We conclude that additional limitations Bayer and amici Milwaukee

[2] Except where otherwise noted, the complaint we refer to throughout this opinion is the second amended complaint filed by the plaintiffs in this action.

Metropolitan Chamber of Commerce and Wisconsin Manufacturers and Commerce seek to read into the "substantially affects" standard are unsupported by our precedents and are contrary to the policy choices of the legislature.

[*P4] Meyers' 35-page, 106-paragraph complaint alleges a broad price-fixing scheme affecting "at a minimum, thousands . . . in Wisconsin" who purchased the best-selling antibiotic Cipro "at any time since [301] January 6, 1995." We conclude Meyers' complaint alleges illegal conduct that, if true, substantially affected the people of Wisconsin and had impacts in this state. [4] We therefore affirm the court of appeals' decision reversing the circuit court's order dismissing Meyers' claims, and remand for further proceedings consistent [*6] with this opinion.

I

[*P5] This review of a decision of the court of appeals arises on a motion to dismiss for [452] failure to state a claim. HN2[] For purposes of this review, we accept as [*7] true the facts alleged in Meyers' complaint. Tietsworth v. Harley-Davidson, Inc., 2004 WI 32, P5, 270 Wis. 2d 146, 677 N.W.2d 233. The facts as set forth below are taken from Meyers' complaint except where otherwise noted.

[*P6] Bayer filed U.S. Patent No. 4,670,444 ("'444 patent") on May 29, 1984, a compound patent for the [302] drug ciprofloxacin hydrochloride. In October 1987, a subsidiary of Bayer obtained approval from the Food and Drug Administration ("FDA") to market ciprofloxacin hydrochloride. The drug was marketed under the name Cipro, a broad spectrum antibiotic approved to treat sinusitis, lower respiratory infections, and fifteen other ailments. Cipro quickly became one of the most prescribed drugs of its kind. [5] Meyers' complaint states that within one year of its introduction, Cipro was adopted in the formulary of every hospital in the United States.

[*P7] In October 1991 Barr filed an Abbreviated [*8] New Drug Application ("application") with the FDA, pursuant to certain provisions of 21 U.S.C. § 355, a/k/a the Hatch-Waxman Act, requesting approval to market and sell generic ciprofloxacin hydrochloride ("generic Cipro"). Pursuant to the Hatch-Waxman Act, Barr notified Bayer of its application, and asserted that Bayer's '444 patent was invalid and unenforceable. In response, Bayer filed a patent infringement lawsuit against Barr on January 16, 1992, challenging Barr's application to market and sell generic Cipro. As a result of the infringement lawsuit, FDA approval of Barr's application was automatically postponed by operation of statute, 21 U.S.C. § 355(j)(5)(B)(iii) (1991), pending resolution of the patent infringement lawsuit.

[*P8] On January 6, 1995, with the patent case as yet unresolved, the FDA gave tentative approval to Barr's application for generic Cipro. Meyers' complaint states that, following the FDA's action, a Barr official [303] reportedly stated that Barr would bring to market its generic Cipro "immediately" if Barr prevailed in the patent infringement suit.

[4] At oral argument, the issue arose of whether the agreement between Bayer and the generic manufacturers constituted actionable conduct under Chapter 133. We note that a federal district court dismissed an action under the Sherman Antitrust Act against Bayer on grounds that the Agreement between Bayer and the generic manufacturers did not violate federal antitrust law. See In re Ciproflaxacin Hydrochloride Antitrust Litigation, 363 F. Supp. 2d 514 (E.D.N.Y. 2005). In a complex opinion discussing a number of different issues, the federal district court addressed whether the consumer plaintiffs could attack the validity of the Cipro patent post hoc, and the effect of the possible invalidity of the patent on the legality of the Agreements, among other questions. Because these issues have not been briefed by the parties, have not been developed in the record in this motion to dismiss, and are not properly before this court, we do not address them further. These matters may be addressed by the circuit court on remand.

[5] Meyers' complaint indicates that, as of January 2002, Cipro was the best-selling antibiotic in the world, a position it had maintained for eight consecutive years. Meyers cites a March 2000 Bayer press release indicating that in 1999 Cipro posted $ 1 billion in sales in the United States.

[*P9] On March 29, 1996, Barr entered into an agreement with Rugby, a rival generic drug manufacturer, in which Barr agreed [*9] to share equally with Rugby any rights and profits from the eventual marketing and distribution of generic Cipro in exchange for Rugby's assistance in funding the patent litigation with Bayer.

[*P10] Bayer moved for summary judgment in the patent suit with Barr and Rugby in January 1996. On June 5, 1996, the court presiding over the patent litigation denied Bayer's motion for summary judgment, and denied a motion for reconsideration on September 5, 1996.

[*P11] On January 8, 1997, Bayer, Barr, HMR, and Rugby entered into four agreements (collectively, the "Agreement") which allocated the entire United States market for Cipro for at least six years, and required Bayer to make large monetary payments to Barr and HMR. [6] According to the complaint, Bayer made an initial payment to Barr and HMR of $ 49.1 million. [453] The complaint asserts that the Agreement granted Bayer an unlawful monopoly in the market for Cipro and generic Cipro. As a part of the Agreement, Bayer and Barr agreed to resolve the patent litigation by entering into a consent judgment that acknowledged the validity and enforceability of the '444 patent. Bayer states it is undisputed that the discussions relating to the Agreement occurred [*10] in New York and Germany.

[*P12] [304] The Agreement further provided that Bayer could either (a) license and supply Bayer-manufactured Cipro to Barr and HMR for resale under a generic label; or (b) pay quarterly amounts to Barr from 1998 through at least 2003. [7] The former of these options established the price Barr and HMR would pay to Bayer for Cipro, and required Barr and HMR to share its profits with Bayer. The Agreement also required Barr to amend its application to the FDA, ending its challenge to the validity of the '444 patent. The Agreement required that the parties not disclose the terms of the Agreement. The consent judgment ending the patent litigation in federal court contained no information about the terms of the Agreement and made no mention of any payments from Bayer to Barr.

[*P13] Meyers' complaint asserts that, as a result of the Agreement, Bayer maintained its monopoly of the United States market for Cipro and generic equivalents of Cipro. Published reports cited in the complaint show that from January 1997 to December 1998, Bayer increased the price of Cipro by 16.7%, one of the largest increases for any prescription drug in the United States. Bayer's internal sales documents show that its revenues and profits increased substantially after the execution of the Agreement, according to the complaint. From 1998 to 1999, Bayer's United States revenues from Cipro went up from $ 834,620,400 to $ 1,042,473,100, an increase of 25%, while its net profits jumped from $ 756,265,800 to $ 921,631,900, an increase of 22%.

[*P14] [305] The complaint asserts that were it not for the conduct of the defendants, generic manufacturers, including Barr, would have begun marketing and selling generic Cipro in the United States no later than January 1995. The complaint asserts that, "[a]s [*12] a result of the illegal conduct of Defendants, Plaintiffs and members of the Class were compelled to pay, and did pay, supracompetitive prices for Cipro which were substantially higher than the prices that Plaintiffs and members of the Class would have paid absent the unlawful agreements and conspiracy alleged herein."

[*P15] In November 2000, Meyers, [8] both individually and on behalf of all others similarly situated, filed suit against Bayer, Barr, Rugby, Watson and HMR in Milwaukee County Circuit Court. The complaint states that the named plaintiffs and members of the putative class are Wisconsin residents who purchased Cipro indirectly from

[6] The complaint states that Rugby was a subsidiary of HMR until February 1998, at which time Rugby was acquired by Watson. The complaint states that Rugby retained the exclusive right to distribute generic Cipro following the sale of Rugby to Watson Pharmaceuticals, Inc. ("Watson").

[7] Meyers' brief states that Bayer has chosen to make quarterly payments to Barr and HMR. It states that, including the $ 49.1 [*11] million initial payment, Bayer agreed to pay Barr and HMR through December 2003 a total of $ 398 million not to compete in the United States with Bayer in the market for Cipro and generic equivalents to Cipro.

Bayer at any time since January 6, 1995. The complaint alleges violations of the Wisconsin Unfair Competition statute, Wis. Stat. § 100.20(1), and the Wisconsin Antitrust Act, Wis. Stat. § 133.03(1).

[*P16] The case was removed to the United States District Court for the Eastern [454] District of Wisconsin and subsequently transferred to a New York federal district court. On October 1, 2001, the case was remanded back to the state court where it was originally filed. See In re Ciproflaxacin Hydrochloride Antitrust Litig., 166 F. Supp. 2d 740, 742-43 (E.D.N.Y. 2001).

[*P17] [*13] On remand of the matter back to the Milwaukee Circuit Court, Bayer moved to dismiss Meyers' complaint. In an order dated September 19, 2003, the Milwaukee County Circuit Court, Honorable Michael D. [306] Guolee, granted Bayer's motion, concluding that the complaint failed to state a claim on which relief could be granted. The circuit court's decision relied on Conley Publishing Group, Ltd. v. Journal Communications, Inc., 2003 WI 119, P16, 265 Wis. 2d 128, 665 N.W.2d 879, which stated that "the scope of Chapter 133 is limited to intrastate transactions."

[*P18] Meyers appealed from the order of dismissal. The court of appeals stayed the appeal pending the outcome of the Olstad case, which was on certification to this court to resolve an apparent conflict between a line of cases including Conley Publishing, which held that Chapter 133 did not reach interstate commerce, and a divergent line of cases, including State v. Allied Chemical and Dye Corp., 9 Wis. 2d 290, 295, 101 N.W.2d 133 (1960), which suggested that Chapter 133 provided a remedy in at least some cases involving interstate conduct. In a 5-0 decision, with Chief Justice Abrahamson and Justice Bradley not participating, we wrote that Chapter [*14] 133 "applies to interstate commerce, at least in some circumstances." Olstad, 2005 WI 121, P74, 284 Wis. 2d 224, 700 N.W.2d 139. We explained that Wisconsin's Antitrust Act provides a remedy whenever: (1) the actionable conduct occurs within the state; or (2) the actionable conduct "substantially affects" the people of Wisconsin and has impacts in the state, even if the conduct resulting in these impacts occurred outside of Wisconsin. Id., P85.

[*P19] In view of Olstad, the court of appeals reversed the circuit court, concluding that the circuit court's interpretation of the scope of the Wisconsin Antitrust Act was erroneous. Meyers, 2006 WI App 102, P9, 293 Wis. 2d 770, 718 N.W.2d 251. The court of appeals noted that while Olstad did not define "substantially affects," this court stated in Allied Chemical, 9 Wis. 2d at 295, that " [t]he public interest [307] and welfare of the people of Wisconsin are substantially affected if prices of a product are fixed or supplies thereof are restricted as the result of an illegal combination or conspiracy." The court of appeals examined Meyers' complaint and concluded that it set forth the necessary facts and allegations to withstand a motion to dismiss. Meyers, 2006 WI App 102, 293 Wis. 2d 770, P13, 718 N.W.2d 251.

[*P20] Bayer filed a petition seeking review [*15] of the court of appeals' decision, stating that the issue presented for review was whether the allegations of the complaint satisfied the "substantially affects" test articulated in Olstad. We granted Bayer's petition to address this particular issue, and we affirm.

[*P21] HN3[] The matter of whether a complaint states a claim upon which relief can be granted is a question of law subject to our independent review. Beloit Liquidating Trust v. Grade, 2004 WI 39, P17, 270 Wis. 2d 356, 677 N.W.2d 298 (citation omitted). HN4[] "A motion to dismiss a complaint for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted tests the legal sufficiency of the complaint." For the limited purposes of assessing the complaint's legal sufficiency, we accept as true all facts as set forth in the complaint, and reasonable inferences that may be drawn [455] from such facts. Id. "[A] complaint in a civil action should not be dismissed as legally insufficient unless it is clear that there are no circumstances under which the plaintiff can recover." Lewis v. Sullivan, 188 Wis. 2d 157, 164, 524 N.W.2d 630 (1994).

[*P22] Whether the complaint is legally sufficient in this case depends upon application of the Wisconsin Antitrust Act, [*16] Chapter 133, and the cases construing it, [308] to the facts as pled. HN5[] Interpretation and application of statutes and case law to a set of facts are matters of law that we decide de novo. Welin v. American Family Mut. Ins. Co., 2006 WI 81, P16, 292 Wis.2d 73, 717 N.W.2d 690 .

[*P23] HN6[] Statutory interpretation begins with the language of the statute. We apply the language of the statute as written, giving the words their commonly accepted meanings. Statutory context is relevant to the plain meaning of a statute. Previous cases construing a statute also become a part of our understanding of a statute's plain meaning. See Olstad, 2005 WI 121, P21, 284 Wis. 2d 224, 700 N.W.2d 139 (quoting Zimmerman v. Wisconsin Elec. Power Co., 38 Wis. 2d 626, 633-34, 157 N.W.2d 648 (1968) ("'It has often been said that once a construction has been given to a statute, the construction becomes a part of the statute.'")).

[*P24] Two years ago, we concluded in Olstad, 2005 WI 121, P1, 284 Wis. 2d 224, 700 N.W.2d 139, that HN7[] the Wisconsin Antitrust Act, Wis. Stat. § 133.03, > may reach interstate commerce if (1) actionable conduct, such as the formation of a combination or conspiracy, occurred within this state, even if its effects are felt primarily outside Wisconsin; or (2) the conduct [*17] complained of "substantially affects" the people of Wisconsin and has impacts in this state, even if the illegal activity resulting in those impacts occurred predominantly or exclusively outside this state.

HN8[] A civil plaintiff filing an action under the act must allege either that actionable conduct occurred within the state, or that the conduct complained of "substantially [309] affects" the people of Wisconsin and has impacts in this state. Id., P85. Because the issue in Olstad arose on a certified question, we did not apply the "substantially affects" test to the facts of the case, a class action against the software manufacturer Microsoft alleging monopolistic practices. See id. We explicitly declined to elaborate on the meaning of "substantially affects," except to state the following: "Operating with lesser standards would jeopardize the action, undermine the validity of our antitrust statute, and create the spectacle of Lilliputian harassment in Wisconsin courts." Id.

[*P25] Bayer contends that the cases upon which Olstad relied establish that the "substantially affects" test requires that plaintiffs allege specific and particularized effects on Wisconsin consumers, not merely generalized [*18] allegations of nationwide effects. It further asserts that plaintiffs must allege that the impacts on this state are more than that indirect purchasers in Wisconsin may have paid higher prices because of the challenged conduct. Meyers contends that requiring allegations of specific and particularized effects would amount to a heightened pleading standard for claims brought under the Wisconsin Antitrust Act, and be contrary to the purposes of the statute. To consider these arguments, we examine the language of the Wisconsin Antitrust Act and those cases interpreting it.

[*P26] Wisconsin Stat. § 133.03 provides as follows, in relevant part:

> (1) HN9[] Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce is illegal. Every person who makes any contract [310] or engages in any combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce is guilty of a Class H felony, except that, notwithstanding the maximum fine specified in s. 939.50(3)(h), the person may be fined not more than $ 100,000 if a corporation, or, if any other person, may be fined not more than $ 50,000.
> (2) Every person who monopolizes, or attempts to monopolize, or combines or conspires [*19] with any other person or persons to monopolize any part of trade or commerce is guilty of a Class H felony, except that, notwithstanding the maximum fine specified in s. 939.50(3)(h), the person may be fined not more than $ 100,000 if a corporation, or, if any other person, may be fined not more than $ 50,000.

Chapter 133 contains a statement of legislative intent, which provides as follows:

> The intent of this chapter is to safeguard the public against the creation or perpetuation of monopolies and to foster and encourage competition by prohibiting unfair and discriminatory business practices which destroy or > hamper competition. It is the intent of the legislature that this chapter be interpreted in a manner which gives the most liberal construction to achieve the aim of competition. It is the intent of the legislature to make competition the fundamental economic policy of this state and, to that end, state regulatory agencies shall regard the public interest as requiring the preservation and promotion of the maximum level of competition in any regulated industry consistent with the other public interest goals established by the legislature.

Wis. Stat. § 133.01. HN10[] Wisconsin Stat. § 133.18 [*20] provides treble damages to "any person injured, directly or indirectly." As we noted in Olstad, 2005 WI 121, P61, 284 Wis. 2d 224, 700 N.W.2d 139, language providing recovery to those harmed indirectly was adopted in response to the United States [311] Supreme Court's decision in Illinois Brick Co. v. State of Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (1977), which limited recovery under the federal antitrust statute to direct purchasers.

[*P27] We thoroughly examined the language of the Wisconsin Antitrust Act, its legislative history and historical context in Olstad to determine whether the Wisconsin Antitrust Act applies to conduct that reaches interstate commerce. There, we noted that the Wisconsin Antitrust Act was adopted in 1893, three years after passage of the Sherman Antitrust Act. Olstad, 2005 WI 121, P41, 284 Wis. 2d 224, 700 N.W.2d 139. At that time, there was little doubt that state antitrust law was limited in scope to conduct impacting intrastate commerce; the Supreme Court saw only a narrow role for state government in commercial regulation. Id., P30. Courts then treated state and federal governments as "'separate and distinct sovereignties, acting separately and independently of each other, within their respective spheres.'" Id., P33 (quoting The Collector v. Day, 78 U.S. 113, 124, 20 L. Ed. 122 (1870)).

[*P28] [*21] Our early cases interpreting the reach of the Wisconsin Antitrust Act were consistent with this narrow view of state regulatory authority, holding that the statute applied only to intrastate commerce. See, e.g., State v. Lewis & Leidersdorf Co., 201 Wis. 543, 549, 230 N.W. 692 (1930); Pulp Wood v. Green Bay Paper & Fiber Co., 157 Wis. 604, 625, 147 N.W. 1058 [457] (1914). While the Supreme Court later adopted a much less rigid view of the role of state government in regulation, some of this court's decisions continued to adhere to the view that the Wisconsin Antitrust Act was limited in scope to intrastate commerce. See, e.g., Conley Publishing, 265 Wis. 2d 128, 2003 WI 119, 665 N.W.2d 879; Grams v. Boss, 97 Wis. 2d 332, 346, 294 N.W.2d 473 (1980). However, as we discussed in Olstad, 2005 WI 121, PP24-27, 284 Wis. 2d 224, 700 N.W.2d 139, other cases held that the Wisconsin Antitrust Act reached interstate commerce [312] in some circumstances. See State v. Milwaukee Braves, 31 Wis. 2d 699, 144 N.W.2d 1 (1966); Allied Chemical, 9 Wis. 2d 290, 101 N.W.2d 133. Based on the apparent conflict between these lines of cases, we concluded in Olstad, 2005 WI 121, P28, 284 Wis. 2d 224, 700 N.W.2d 139, that Chapter 133 had been interpreted inconsistently, and, as a result, the statute was ambiguous. [9] We therefore [*22] examined the legislative history of the Wisconsin Antitrust Act, and in particular a 1980 overhaul of the statute. See id., PP55-73.

[*P29] The 1980 revision, Olstad explained, included language that permitted indirect purchasers harmed by antitrust violations to recover under the Wisconsin Antitrust Act. Id., P61-63 (discussing language now contained in Wis. Stat. § 133.18 providing that "any person injured, directly or indirectly, by reason of anything prohibited by this chapter may sue"). A letter from Attorney General Bronson La Follette to the bill's Assembly author, Representative [*23] Marjorie Miller, indicated that this change > would reverse the effect of the U.S. Supreme Court's ruling in the Illinois Brick case on Wisconsin law. The Court, in that case, ruled that only direct purchasers may recover damages for illegally-priced goods. Thus, indirect purchasers--such as state and local governments which purchase most of their supplies through wholesalers, retailers or other middlemen--are left out [313] in the cold when it comes to recovering for the illegally inflated prices they and their constituents must pay.

[9] The conclusion in Olstad v. Microsoft Corp., 2005 WI 121, P28, 284 Wis. 2d 224, 700 N.W.2d 139, that the statute was ambiguous was not based on a reading of the text of the statute itself, but on the inconsistency in prior case law construing the statute. In determining the statute to be ambiguous, Olstad observed that while "[t]he language [of Wis. Stat. § 133.03] itself provides no express limit to the statute's scope," this court had ascribed such a limit to the statute only two years earlier in Conley Publishing Group, Ltd. v. Journal Communications, Inc., 2003 WI 119, P16, 265 Wis. 2d 128, 665 N.W.2d 879.

Id., P62 (quoting Letter to Representative Marjorie Miller from Attorney General Bronson La Follette dated October 3, 1979, located in Legislative Council files, Madison, Wisconsin). We note that Meyers and the putative class were indirect purchasers of Cipro, and that without this change they would not have had a cause of action under the Wisconsin Antitrust Act.

[*P30] Moreover, we noted in Olstad that the 1980 revision created a new section, Wis. Stat. § 133.01, that included a broad statement of legislative intent. Id., P68. This section provided, in part: "It is the intent of the legislature that this chapter be interpreted in a manner which gives the most liberal [*24] construction to achieve the aim of competition." Id.

[*P31] We concluded in Olstad that these changes (along with other legislative history material) "le[ft] little doubt of the legislature's intent to apply the Wisconsin antitrust statute to interstate commerce." Id., P55. We then held that HN11[] when the challenged conduct does not occur within the state of Wisconsin and impacts interstate commerce, the Wisconsin Antitrust Act applies if the conduct "substantially affects" [458] the people of Wisconsin and has "impacts" [10] in this state. Id., P85. The "substantially affects" standard [314] comes from the following language in the Allied Chemical decision: "The public interest and welfare of the people of Wisconsin are substantially affected if prices of a product are fixed or supplies thereof are restricted as the result of an illegal combination or conspiracy." Allied Chemical, 9 Wis. 2d at 295.

[*P32] Bayer contends that the cases upon which Olstad relied establish two limiting principles that should govern the application of the "substantially affects" test. First, Bayer argues plaintiffs must allege specific and particularized effects on Wisconsin consumers, not merely generalized allegations of nationwide effects, citing Emergency One, Inc. v. Waterous Co., 23 F. Supp. 2d 959 (E.D. Wis. 1998), and State v. Milwaukee Braves, Inc., 31 Wis. 2d 699, 144 N.W.2d 1 (1966). Second, Bayer argues plaintiffs must put forth allegations more specific than merely that some Wisconsin downstream consumers may have generally paid higher prices because of the challenged conduct, citing Emergency One. We examine the cases on which we relied in Olstad -- Allied [*26] Chemical, Milwaukee Braves and Emergency One -- to determine whether they support Bayer's argument.

[*P33] The Allied Chemical case arose out of an action alleging monopolistic practices in violation of the Wisconsin Antitrust Act brought by the attorney general against manufacturers and sellers of the chemical calcium chloride. At the time of the state suit, the [315] Federal Trade Commission (FTC) was already investigating allegations of price-fixing against the calcium chloride companies, and the trial court dismissed the complaint on grounds that the federal regulatory agency had taken exclusive jurisdiction over the matter. Allied Chemical, 9 Wis. 2d at 293.

[*P34] This court reversed the trial court's dismissal, concluding that federal antitrust law did not preempt state efforts to enact and enforce effective legislation against monopolistic practices. Id. at 295. The court further concluded that there was no conflict between the federal and state statutes, that the Wisconsin statutes made no attempt to regulate or burden interstate commerce, and that the FTC was not established to enforce the federal antimonopoly statutes but to regulate certain trade practices instead. Moreover, the court cited [*27] letters in the record from FTC officials and the Department of Justice that indicated that the attitude of the federal government was to cooperate with the state in its efforts to enforce state statutes dealing with conspiracies and monopolies. Id. at 295-96. Importantly, the Allied Chemical court held that the Wisconsin antitrust statute was enacted to protect state consumers from the effects of monopolistic practices. Id.

[*P35] In Milwaukee Braves, the State brought an action under the Wisconsin Antitrust Act in response to the departure [459] from Wisconsin of the Milwaukee Braves professional baseball club. Although the Milwaukee Braves court declined to enforce Chapter 133, in part because of major league baseball's well-settled exemption from antitrust regulation, all seven members of the court asserted that the Wisconsin Antitrust Act could be applied to interstate commerce. Olstad, 2005 WI 121, P27, 284 Wis. 2d 224, 700 N.W.2d 139 (discussing Milwaukee Braves, 31 Wis. 2d at 725). [316] The Milwaukee Braves court noted that the exercise of the defendants' monopoly power caused "substantial injury to business activity within Wisconsin" such that the court would "assume, at this point, that a violation of Wisconsin law has [*28] occurred if our law can be applied." Milwaukee Braves, 31 Wis. 2d at 719. Nevertheless, the court recognized that while "[t]he state may, ordinarily, protect the interests of its people by enforcing its antitrust act against persons doing business in interstate commerce," the state policy must yield when a conflict exists between state and federal policy. Id. at 721.

[*P36] In Emergency One, a Wisconsin federal district court considered the issue of whether the Wisconsin Antitrust Act reaches interstate commerce several years before our decision in Olstad. Emergency One, a Florida-based manufacturer of fire trucks, sued a Wisconsin truck manufacturer and two manufacturers of fire pump hoses, alleging the three companies conspired to choke competition in the United States market for fire pumps, in violation of Wisconsin's Antitrust Act. The Emergency One court carefully examined our precedents and the legislative history of Wis. Stat. § 133.03 and concluded that the Wisconsin Antitrust Act reaches interstate commerce to some degree. Emergency One, 23 F. Supp. 2d at 966.

[*P37] To determine when the statute would apply in cases involving interstate commerce, the Emergency One court relied on an "adverse [*29] effects" standard that is, in essence, the test we adopted in Olstad. Emergency One, 23 F. Supp. 2d at 969-970. The Emergency One court explained that the "adverse effects" test "extend[s] the jurisdictional scope of Wisconsin antitrust law to unlawful activity which has significantly and adversely affected trade and economic competition within this [317] state." Id. at 969. In examining and ultimately rejecting other approaches to determine when the antitrust act applies in cases involving interstate commerce, [11] the Emergency One court concluded that "an [460] adverse effects standard is the only standard that remains faithful to the purpose of Chapter 133--to protect and encourage competition in this state, by penalizing interstate activities that adversely affect it." Id. at 970.

[*P38] Applying this effects-based standard, the Emergency One court concluded that the complaint "d[id] not [*31] allege significant and adverse effects on economic competition in Wisconsin." Id. at 971.

> Based on the amended complaint . . . the connection between plaintiff's injury and Wisconsin commerce is [318] tenuous at best. E-One identifies three Wisconsin dealerships of a number allegedly maintained by plaintiff over the years. The specific dates of operation suggest that only one dealership in Wisconsin was [11] The Emergency One court considered two alternate tests for determining whether state antitrust law applies in cases involving interstate commerce: (1) A "contacts-based" standard that emphasizes "the nature and degree of defendant's contacts with Wisconsin" bearing similarities to the International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310, 66 S. Ct. 154, 90 L. Ed. 95 (1945), test in the law of personal jurisdiction, and the "aggregation of contacts" [*30] standard set forth in Allstate Ins. Co. v. Hague, 449 U.S. 302, 308, 101 S. Ct. 633, 66 L. Ed. 2d 521 (1981), to resolve "choice of law" disputes; and (2) A "predominance" standard, which would apply state antitrust law only to transactions and commerce that is predominantly intrastate in nature. Emergency One v. Waterous Co., Inc., 23 F. Supp. 2d 959, 967-969 (E.D. Wis. 1998). The federal district court rejected the "contacts-based" standard because, in cases involving nationwide sales, application of a "contacts-based" standard might result in application of state antitrust law when no significant injury to trade and economic competition occurred in the state. The court rejected the "predominance" standard on grounds that it would essentially reintroduce federal preemption of state anti-trust law (commerce cannot be both predominantly interstate and predominantly intrastate in nature) "a result consistently rejected by the Supreme Court." See Emergency One, 23 F. Supp. 2d at 967 (citing California v. ARC America Corp., 490 U.S. 93, 102, 109 S. Ct. 1661, 104 L. Ed. 2d 86 (1989)).

> maintained by E-One at any given time, however. Plaintiff does not estimate the amount of sales at such dealerships in a certain time frame or suggest what proportion of those sales were affected by defendants' conduct. Plaintiff does not indicate how many fire trucks are sold in Wisconsin per year, how many by plaintiff, or how many by plaintiff's competitors. Indeed, plaintiff does not identify a single fire truck contract in Wisconsin from which E-One was precluded from bidding based on the unavailability of Waterous pumps. Without this type of information, the amended complaint does not suggest that injury to E-One also constituted significant injury to trade and commerce related to fire truck sales in Wisconsin.

Id. The court concluded: "[T]he only significant and adverse effect alleged [*32] by plaintiff is to plaintiff itself." Id.

[*P39] Relying on the above cases, Bayer makes essentially three arguments. First, Bayer asserts that all of these cases stand for the proposition that plaintiffs bringing suit under the Wisconsin Antitrust Act must specifically allege the challenged conduct had Wisconsin impacts. Second, citing language from Milwaukee Braves noting that the departure of the Braves from the state "terminated very substantial business activity in Wisconsin," Bayer suggests that the plaintiffs must also allege that these Wisconsin impacts were disproportionate to nationwide impacts. Third, Bayer asserts that the analysis of the Emergency One court demonstrates that "bare allegations" that indirect purchasers in Wisconsin paid higher prices as a result of [319] the challenged conduct is not sufficient to meet the "substantially affects" standard. We consider each of these arguments in turn.

[*P41] "For well over 100 years, this court has consistently held that HN14[] pleadings shall be liberally construed with a view to substantial justice between the parties." J.L. Phillips & Assoc. v. E&H Plastic Corp., 217 Wis. 2d 348, 365, 577 N.W.2d 13 (1998) (citation omitted). HN15[] "[A] complaint in a civil action should not be dismissed as legally insufficient unless it is clear that there are no circumstances under which the plaintiff [461] can recover." Lewis, 188 Wis. 2d at 164.

[*P42] There is no exception to this rule for actions under the Wisconsin Antitrust Act. In Grams, 97 Wis. 2d 332, 294 N.W.2d 473, an insurance agency brought suit against another insurance company and a hospital service corporation, alleging antitrust violations. Writing for the majority, Justice Abrahamson concluded that while [*34] the plaintiffs' complaint was "barebone . . . conclusory in part, and may have failed to state sufficient facts" under [320] prior pleading rules, it was sufficient to state a claim under the notice pleading statute. Id. at 352.

[*P43] In light of our liberal pleadings standard, HN16[] a complaint under the Wisconsin Antitrust Act, where the circumstances involve interstate commerce and the challenged conduct occurred outside of Wisconsin, is sufficient if it alleges price fixing as a result of the formation of a combination or conspiracy that substantially affected the people of Wisconsin and had impacts in this state. As Meyers asserts, requiring greater specificity than the notice pleading statute demands would create a heightened pleading standard for Chapter 133 actions that would bar otherwise legitimate suits, thus undermining the Act's purposes of fostering competition and prohibiting unfair and discriminatory business practices. See Wis. Stat. § 133.01.

[*P44] We decline to follow Bayer's suggestion that the impacts of the challenged conduct on Wisconsin must be distinguishable from or disproportionate to its impacts on other states. HN17[] Under Olstad, the complaint must simply allege that the challenged [*35] conduct "'substantially affects' the people of Wisconsin and has impacts in this state," not that these impacts be disproportionately felt in Wisconsin. Olstad, 2005 WI 121, P85, 284 Wis. 2d 224, 700 N.W.2d 139.

[*P45] Bayer apparently takes the fact that the Emergency One and Milwaukee Braves courts focused (properly) on the impacts felt in Wisconsin to mean that plaintiffs filing an action under Chapter 133 must assert allegations of disproportionate impacts on Wisconsin. As the Department of Justice asserts in its amicus brief, this approach would subject a defendant that targets the effects of its illegal conduct on Wisconsin to treble damages under Chapter 133, while another [321] defendant that causes equal or greater harm in Wisconsin would be immune from suit simply because the latter defendant's harms were evenly spread across the country. Neither the statute nor our case law requires that plaintiffs allege that the challenged conduct caused disproportionate injury to Wisconsin consumers. Plaintiffs need only allege that the conduct substantially affected the people of Wisconsin and had impacts in this state. Olstad, 2005 WI 121, P85, 284 Wis. 2d 224, 700 N.W.2d 139.

[*P46] Turning to Bayer's contention that the "substantially affects" standard requires [*36] more than "bare allegations" that indirect purchasers in Wisconsin paid higher prices as a result of the challenged conduct, we disagree. This argument is based on a misreading of Emergency One and, moreover, is plainly contrary to Wis. Stat. §§ 133.03 and 133.18.

[*P47] Bayer contends that the Emergency One court held that the plaintiff's allegations of supracompetitive prices were not sufficient to state a claim under the Wisconsin Antitrust Act. This misstates the holding of Emergency One. The Emergency One court dismissed the plaintiff's claim because it concluded that the plaintiff's complaint "made no . . . allegations" of "any significant adverse effects on trade and economic competition within Wisconsin." Emergency One, 23 F. Supp. 2d at [462] 970. The Emergency One court carefully examined the complaint to ascertain whether it alleged "significant adverse effects" to support a claim under state antitrust law. Id. at 970-71. Based on this examination, the court concluded that the plaintiff failed to state a claim under the Wisconsin Antitrust Act. Id. It did not dismiss the complaint based on a per se rule that "bare allegations" that indirect purchasers in Wisconsin paid higher prices [*37] is insufficient to state a claim under the act.

[*P48] [322] HN18[] The Wisconsin Antitrust Act specifically provides a remedy for indirect purchasers who suffer harm as a result of conduct that violates Chapter 133. See Wis. Stat. § 133.18 ("[A] person injured, directly or indirectly, by reason of anything prohibited by this chapter may sue . . . and shall recover . . . damages.") (emphasis added). In Olstad, we noted that the 1980 revision of Chapter 133 provided a remedy under the statute to indirect purchasers in response to Illinois Brick, 431 U.S. 720, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707, which foreclosed recovery to indirect purchasers under the federal statute. An allegation that thousands of Wisconsin consumers paid supracompetitive prices as a result of monopolistic conduct by an interstate seller therefore states a basis for recovery under the statute.

[*P49] The test we crafted in Olstad for determining when, in circumstances involving interstate commerce where the challenged conduct occurred outside of Wisconsin, a complaint states a claim under the Wisconsin Antitrust Act was derived in part from this court's decision in Allied Chemical, 9 Wis. 2d 290, 101 N.W.2d 133. Like the present case, Allied Chemical involved allegations of a conspiracy to [*38] fix prices to the detriment of Wisconsin consumers. This court held in Allied Chemical that HN19[] price-fixing is a monopolistic practice that, by its very nature, substantially affects the public.

> The public interest and welfare of the people of Wisconsin are substantially affected if prices of a product are fixed or supplies thereof are restricted as the result of an illegal combination or conspiracy. The people of Wisconsin are entitled to the advantages that flow from free competition in the purchase of calcium chloride and other products, and if the state is able to prove the allegations made in its complaint it is apparent that the acts of the defendants deny to them those advantages.

Id. at 295.

[*P50] [323] Amici Wisconsin Manufacturers and Commerce (WMC) and Milwaukee Metropolitan Area Chamber of Commerce (MMAC) point us to Szukalski v. Crompton Corp., 2006 WI App 195, 296 Wis. 2d 728, 726 N.W.2d 304. There, the court of appeals affirmed a circuit court dismissal of an antitrust lawsuit brought by a group of tire buyers alleging several companies engaged in the manufacture and sale of chemicals used to process rubber conspired to fix prices. In determining the scope of the "substantially affects" [*39] test, the Szukalski court held that plaintiffs must allege "(1) specific effects on Wisconsin commerce, not merely effects that are nationwide, and (2) that these effects on Wisconsin are more than a general nationwide effect on the price," citing Emergency One, 23 F. Supp. 2d at 971, and a recent decision of the Tennessee Supreme Court, Freeman Industries, LLC v. Eastman Chemical Co., 172 S.W.3d 512 (Tenn. 2005). Szukalski, 2006 WI App 195, 296 Wis. 2d 728, 726 N.W.2d 304, P20. While noting that Szukalski is not before us, we address it to resolve any inconsistencies between it and our decision today.

[*P51] Szukalski correctly states that a complaint must allege effects on [463] Wisconsin, and not merely nationwide effects. [12] However, its conclusion that the "substantially affects" standard requires allegations "that these effects on Wisconsin are more than a general nationwide effect on the price" misstates the Olstad [324] standard, and is inconsistent with our opinion today. See supra, PP45-46. As noted, plaintiffs need not allege that the challenged conduct disproportionately affected Wisconsin, only that the challenged conduct substantially affected the people of Wisconsin and had impacts in this state. Olstad, 2005 WI 121, P85, 284 Wis. 2d 224, 700 N.W.2d 139. [*40]

[*P52] Finally, Bayer and amici WMC and MMAC contend that certain limitations on actions under the Wisconsin Antitrust Act are necessary for judicial economy and preserving a favorable business climate in Wisconsin. They assert that if the court does not adopt their proposed limitations to the "substantially affects" test, Wisconsin courts will be flooded with complex antitrust litigation. They maintain that without these limitations the specter of antitrust litigation would create a hostile atmosphere for businesses in Wisconsin.

[*P53] To adopt on policy grounds the limitations Bayer and amici propose would be to substitute our own judgment for that of the legislature. By establishing a broad antitrust act that provides remedies to consumers not available under federal antitrust law, the legislature has made clear policy choices in [*41] the area of antitrust regulation. The "substantially affects" test adopted in Olstad is consistent with the legislature's policy choices; requiring more of plaintiffs would close off consumer suits, particularly those by indirect purchasers, contrary to the 1980 revision of the statute. Moreover, it would bar otherwise legitimate actions, thereby undermining the statute's purpose "to foster and encourage competition by prohibiting unfair and discriminatory practices which destroy or hamper competition." See Wis. Stat. § 133.01. We decline to substitute our judgment for that of the legislature. See Flynn v. Dep't of Admin., 216 Wis. 2d 521, 539, 576 N.W.2d 245 (1998) [325] ("This court has long held that it is the province of the legislature, not the courts, to determine public policy."). [13]

[*P54] We turn now to Meyers' complaint to determine if it alleges that the conduct of Bayer and the generic manufacturers substantially affected the people of Wisconsin [*42] and had impacts in this state.

[*P55] Meyers' complaint alleges, in the course of 35 pages and 106 paragraphs, a broad price-fixing scheme affecting "at a minimum, thousands . . . in Wisconsin." The complaint states that the named plaintiffs and the putative class are Wisconsin residents who purchased the antibiotic Cipro "at any time since January 6, 1995," the date that Meyers alleges the market for Cipro and generic equivalents would have opened to competition. The complaint states that Cipro was the best-selling antibiotic in the world throughout most of the 1990s. It avers that Bayer posted [464] $ 1 billion in sales of Cipro in the United States in 1999 alone. It states that as a result of the Agreement among Bayer and the generic manufacturers, Bayer maintained its monopoly in the United States market for Cipro; that from January 1997 to December 1998, Bayer increased its price for Cipro by 16.7%; and that from 1998 to 1999, Bayer's United States revenues for Cipro increased 25%, while its net profits increased 22%.

[12] Because Szukalski v. Crompton Corp., 2006 WI App 195, 296 Wis. 2d 728, 726 N.W.2d 304, no petition for review filed, is not before us, and we have not had an opportunity to review the plaintiff's complaint in Szukalski to determine its sufficiency, we do not address the Szukalski court's conclusion that the plaintiff failed to allege substantial Wisconsin effects.

[13] As to the merits of these policy arguments, we note that Bayer and amici fail to provide empirical support for the proposition that failure to limit the applicability of the Wisconsin Antitrust Act would harm Wisconsin's business climate.

[*P56] While Meyers' complaint alleges harm to "thousands of Wisconsin residents," the Emergency One complaint, by contrast, alleged a conspiracy adversely [326] affecting "only . . . plaintiff [*43] itself." Emergency One, 23 F. Supp. 2d at 971. The plaintiff in Emergency One was a fire truck manufacturer that apparently maintained only one dealership in Wisconsin. Id. at 960-61. The plaintiff's complaint did not state the number of sales it made in Wisconsin per year, although it certainly would have had this information. [14] Id. at 971. The plaintiff did not indicate a time frame in which the people of Wisconsin suffered injury as a result of alleged monopolistic practices. Id. And the company itself was a Delaware corporation, with a principal place of business in Florida, and thus, any injury suffered by the company resulting in lay-offs or lost profits would have likely had a negligible effect on Wisconsin workers and investors. Id. at 970-71.

[*P57] Here, Meyers alleges "thousands of Wisconsin residents" suffered economic harm as a result of Bayer's alleged monopolistic practices, starting January 6, 1995. An allegation that a group of pharmaceutical companies conspired to maintain monopoly prices on a best-selling prescription [*44] drug purchased by thousands of Wisconsin residents over several years meets the "substantially affects" test set forth in Olstad, 2005 WI 121, P85, 284 Wis. 2d 224, 700 N.W.2d 139. We conclude that Meyers has sufficiently alleged that the challenged conduct of Bayer and the generic manufacturers substantially affected the people of Wisconsin and had impacts in this state. We therefore affirm the court of appeals' reversal of the circuit court's order dismissing the complaint.

[327] IV

[*P58] In summary, we reaffirm HN20[] the following standard set forth in Olstad for determining when Chapter 133 reaches interstate commerce: A plaintiff filing an action under Wisconsin's Antitrust Act must allege price fixing as a result of the formation of a combination or conspiracy that "substantially affects the people of Wisconsin and has impacts in this state" when the challenged conduct occurs predominately or exclusively outside this state. Olstad, 2005 WI 121, P85, 284 Wis. 2d 224, 700 N.W.2d 139. We conclude that additional limitations Bayer and amici MMAC and WMC seek to read into the "substantially affects" standard are unsupported by our precedents and are contrary to the policy choices of the legislature.

[*P59] Meyers' 35-page, 106-paragraph complaint alleges a broad [*45] price-fixing scheme affecting "at a minimum, thousands . . . in Wisconsin" who purchased the best-selling antibiotic Cipro "at any time since January 6, 1995." We conclude Meyers' complaint alleges illegal conduct that, if true, substantially affected the people of Wisconsin and had impacts in this state. [15] We therefore affirm the court of [465] appeals' decision reversing the circuit court's order dismissing Meyers' claims, and remand the matter to the circuit court for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

[328] By the Court.--The decision of the court of appeals is affirmed, and the cause is remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Dissent by: DAVID T. PROSSER

Dissent

[14] The complaint in Emergency One, 23 F. Supp. 2d 959, alleged only that 3500 to 4000 fire trucks are purchased by fire departments in the United States annually.

[15] As we previously indicated, supra, P4 n.4, issues regarding the validity or invalidity of the Cipro patent, and the effect of the possible invalidity of the patent on the legality of the Agreements have not been briefed by the parties, have not been developed in the record in this motion to dismiss, and are not properly before this court. These matters may be addressed by the circuit court on remand.

[*P60] DAVID T. PROSSER, J. (dissenting). Four years ago in Conley Publishing Group Ltd. v. Journal Communications, Inc., 2003 WI 119, 265 Wis. 2d 128, 665 N.W.2d 879, [*46] this court was confronted with the question whether we should adopt Brooke Group Ltd. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., 509 U.S. 209, 113 S. Ct. 2578, 125 L. Ed. 2d 168 (1993), as the law of Wisconsin governing predatory pricing under Wis. Stat. § 133.03. As we answered this question, we noted that "Wisconsin courts have [long] followed federal court interpretations of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act and have construed Wisconsin antitrust statutes in conformity with these federal court interpretations." Conley, 2003 WI 119, P17, 265 Wis. 2d 128, 665 N.W.2d 879.

[*P62] Two years later, the same writer was forced to withdraw the phrase "the scope of Chapter 133 is limited to intrastate transactions" because the court unanimously upheld the application of Wisconsin's Little Sherman Act to interstate commerce in some circumstances. [*47] Olstad v. Microsoft Corp., 2005 WI 121, PP13, 74, 284 Wis. 2d 224, 700 N.W.2d 139.

[*P63] Having opened the door to interstate antitrust enforcement in some circumstances, the court [329] thought it ought to comment briefly on what those "circumstances" were, even though that question had not been briefed.

[*P64] Early in the opinion, the court quoted Professor Herbert Hovenkamp to the effect that "a state antitrust law of general application can virtually always be applied to a practice having sufficient effects within the state." Id., P14 (emphasis added) (citation omitted). Then we added, "State law is precluded from regulating interstate commerce only if it 'unduly burden[s]' interstate commerce." Id. (citing Von Kalinowski, Antitrust Laws & Trade Regulation § 100.03 (2d. ed. 2004)).

[*P65] At the end of the opinion, the court said:

> A civil plaintiff filing an action under Wisconsin's antitrust act must allege that (1) actionable conduct, such as the formation of a combination or conspiracy, occurred within this state, even if its effects are felt primarily outside Wisconsin; or (2) the conduct complained of "substantially affects" the people of Wisconsin and has impacts in this state, even if the illegal [*48] activity resulting in those impacts occurred predominantly or exclusively outside this state. [State v.] Allied Chemical [& Dye Corp.], 9 Wis. 2d [290,] 295[, 101 N.W.2d 133 (1960)]. Operating with lesser standards [466] would jeopardize the action, undermine the validity of our antitrust statute, and create the spectacle of Lilliputian harassment in Wisconsin courts. Questions of provincialism, favoritism, and undue burden on interstate commerce should be determined by resort to contemporary federal commerce clause jurisprudence. To say more is beyond the scope of this opinion.

Id., P85.

[*P66] Four things should be noted about this paragraph. First, the words "substantially affects" were borrowed from Allied Chemical. Second, the words [330] "substantially affects" imply a higher standard than "sufficient effects," quoted earlier in the opinion. Third, the second point is underscored by the following sentence: "Operating with lesser standards would jeopardize the action, undermine the validity of our antitrust statute, and create the spectacle of Lilliputian harassment in Wisconsin courts." Fourth, the paragraph requires "impacts in this state."

[*P67] In interpreting the phrase "jeopardize the action," [*49] it should be remembered that the court had recently considered two cases exploring the reach of Wisconsin jurisdiction. See State v. Derek Anderson, 2005 WI 54, 280 Wis. 2d 104, 695 N.W.2d 731; and Tammie J.C. v. Robert T.R., 2003 WI 61, 262 Wis. 2d 217, 663 N.W.2d 734. The court did not want to encourage litigation that exceeded the jurisdiction of the state. As for the phrase "undermine the validity of our antitrust statute," Olstad discussed such issues as federal preemption and burden on interstate commerce in the opinion, and that context gives the phrase meaning. "Lilliputian harassment" conveys the image of a commercial Gulliver tied down by a multitude of antitrust litigants across the country.

[*P69] Because I am unable to discern from the discussion in the majority opinion any meaningful limitation on antitrust suits against illegal activities outside this state, I respectfully dissent.

[*P70] PATIENCE DRAKE ROGGENSACK, J. (dissenting). The majority opinion concludes that the second amended complaint (the complaint) of the plaintiffs sufficiently alleges a violation of Wisconsin's antitrust law, Wis. Stat. § 133.03 (2005-06), [16] to withstand a motion to dismiss. Majority op., P4. It does so based on the complaint's allegations that an agreement concerning ciprofloxacin hydrochloride between Bayer AG and Barr Laboratories, Inc. (the Bayer-Barr agreement) [17] is a "price-fixing scheme" for ciprofloxacin hydrochloride that controlled the price for the drug "at any time since January 6, 1995." Id. The majority opinion [467] concludes that, if proved, the price-fixing alleged is "illegal conduct" that "substantially affected the people of Wisconsin and had impacts in this state" thereby violating Wisconsin antitrust [*51] law. Id. However, it also recognizes that there are significant questions about the effect that Bayer's patent may have on the plaintiffs' claims. Id., P4 n.4. It suggests that those questions be addressed in the circuit court on remand. Id.

[*P71] I dissent because I would resolve the effect of Bayer's patent on the plaintiffs' claims at this time. I would do so because Bayer was granted a federal patent [332] for ciprofloxacin hydrochloride (the Cipro patent) that, in order to have subject matter jurisdiction for this antitrust action, Wisconsin courts must presume is valid. 28 U.S.C. § 1338(a). Presuming that Bayer's patent is valid, I conclude that the complaint does not allege facts that, if true, are sufficient to show illegal conduct or conduct that has an illegal effect. E. Bement & Sons v. Nat'l Harrow Co., 186 U.S. 70, 91, 22 S. Ct. 747, 46 L. Ed. 1058 (1902). Only illegal conduct or conduct that has an illegal effect violates Wisconsin's antitrust law. Prentice v. Title Ins. Co. of Minn., 176 Wis. 2d 714, 725, 500 N.W.2d 658 (1993); [*52] State v. Allied Chem. & Dye Corp., 9 Wis. 2d 290, 296, 101 N.W.2d 133 (1960). Furthermore, because the conduct alleged in the complaint is not illegal or alleged to have had an illegal effect, it cannot "substantially affect" the people in Wisconsin and have "impacts" in Wisconsin contrary to Wis. Stat. § 133.03. Olstad v. Microsoft Corp., 2005 WI 121, P85, 284 Wis. 2d 224, 700 N.W.2d 139. Accordingly, I would affirm the circuit court's dismissal of the complaint for failure to state a claim pursuant to Wis. Stat. § 802.06(2)(a)6, albeit on different grounds. Therefore, I respectfully dissent.

I. BACKGROUND [18]

[*P72] The gravamen of the complaint is that the agreement between Bayer, who owns the patent for ciprofloxacin hydrochloride that it markets under the trade name, "Cipro," and Barr, who applied to the United States Food and Drug Administration [*53] (FDA) for [333] permission to manufacture and market a generic form of Cipro, is a price-fixing agreement that effected a monopoly for Cipro in Wisconsin. The complaint alleges Bayer's monopoly is illegal and violates Wis. Stat. § 133.03(2).

---

[16] All further references to the Wisconsin Statutes are to the 2005-06 version, unless otherwise noted.

[18] The facts used in the background narration have been taken from the complaint and from the public records of the United States Food and Drug Administration (FDA) and the United States Patent and Trademark Office (PTO). We may take judicial notice of public records of governmental agencies. Perkins v. State, 61 Wis. 2d 341, 346, 212 N.W.2d 141 (1973).

[*P73] As background for this theory, the plaintiffs allege that Bayer held the patent for the active ingredient of Cipro, ciprofloxacin hydrochloride, and that the Cipro patent was granted to Bayer on May 29, 1984, as Patent No. 4,670,444. Bayer also received FDA approval to market Cipro in October of 1987. Bayer's initial patent for Cipro expired in December of 2003. [19]

[*P74] On October 27, 1991, Barr applied to the FDA to manufacture and market a generic form of Cipro. Barr used a shortened form of application for FDA approval that is known as an Abbreviated New Drug Application, or ANDA. As part of the ANDA process, Barr asserted that its generic drug was the bioequivalent of Cipro. This assertion permitted FDA consideration of Barr's generic Cipro without the years of testing that Bayer had to [468] undergo in order to obtain FDA approval for Cipro. Therefore, [*54] by piggybacking on Bayer's lengthy FDA new drug testing requirements, Barr's ANDA applied for FDA approval for the same drug to which the FDA had given Bayer approval. In its ANDA, Barr also alleged that Bayer's patent was invalid, which is one of the allegations required in order for the FDA to give preliminary approval to a generic equivalent of a patented drug. See 21 U.S.C. § 355(j)(2)(A)(vii)(IV).

[*P75] As is required by federal statute, Barr gave notice of its ANDA to Bayer. See 21 U.S.C. § 355(j)(2)(B)(iii). Within the statutory timeline of receiving [334] Barr's notice (45 days), Bayer filed a patent infringement suit against Barr. A patent infringement suit is required by federal statutes as a precursor to maintaining patent priority over a pending ANDA for the generic equivalent of a patented drug. See 21 U.S.C. § 355(j)(5)(B)(iii).

[*P76] The filing of Bayer's patent infringement suit stayed Barr's ANDA before the FDA for 30 months or until the conclusion of the patent infringement suit, whichever occurred first. See id. That 30-month stay would have ended on July 16, 1994. However, prior to settling Bayer's suit against Barr for patent infringement, Bayer and Barr executed a stipulation to [*55] extend the 30-month stay until a final judgment on the pending patent litigation was entered. The district court approved the stipulation and ordered that final consideration of Barr's ANDA before the FDA was stayed until the patent litigation concluded. Bayer AG v. Barr Labs., No. 92CV391 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 9, 1992); see also 21 U.S.C. § 355(j)(5)(B)(iii).

[*P77] On January 6, 1995, the FDA gave "tentative approval" to Barr to market its drug, which approval was subject to Bayer's patent being held invalid or expiring. FDA's public records show that FDA final approval to manufacture and market a generic form of Cipro was not given to Barr until June 9, 2004. [20]

[*P78] The complaint does not allege that the conduct set out in the Bayer-Barr agreement falls outside of Bayer's rights under the Cipro patent. It also does not allege that Barr, or anyone else, has ever contended that Bayer obtained its Cipro patent through fraud on the United States Patent & Trademark Office (PTO). [335] Rather, the complaint asserts that the Bayer-Barr agreement was entered into on January 8, 1997, and that it allocates "the [*56] entire United States market for Cipro to Bayer for at least six years" (January 2003) and that at Bayer's option Bayer could either: (1) supply Cipro for sale as a generic to Barr, who would operate as Bayer's licensee, or (2) supply all of the Cipro to purchasers itself and make specified payments to Barr. [21]

[*P79] The Bayer-Barr agreement, together with a consent judgment, concluded Bayer's federal patent infringement suit. The consent judgment affirmed that Bayer owns the patent for Cipro; that it is valid and enforceable; and that Barr's generic form of Cipro infringed Bayer's patent. Bayer AG v. Barr Labs., No. 92CV391 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 16, 1997). There has been no appeal or collateral attack on that judgment.

[19] The public records of the PTO show that the PTO extended Bayer's patent for Cipro through June 8, 2004.

[20] We may take judicial notice of public records of governmental agencies. Perkins, 61 Wis. 2d at 346.

[21] Payments such as these are commonly referred to as "reverse" or "exit" payments. Anne-Marie C. Yvon, Settlements Between Brand and Generic Pharmaceutical Companies: A Reasonable Antitrust Analysis of Reverse Payments, 75 Fordham L. Rev. 1883, 1884 n.9 (2006).

[*P80] Subsequent to the conclusion of the patent infringement action, Bayer re-submitted [469] its patent to the PTO for review. Bayer's patent for Cipro was upheld in that proceeding as well.

II. DISCUSSION

A. Standard of Review

[*P81] A motion [*57] to dismiss challenges the legal sufficiency of the complaint to state a claim on which relief may be granted. Kaloti Enters., Inc. v. Kellogg Sales Co., 2005 WI 111, P11, 283 Wis. 2d 555, 699 N.W.2d 205. For purposes of the motion, we generally [336] accept as true all factual allegations made in the complaint. Watts v. Watts, 137 Wis. 2d 506, 512, 405 N.W.2d 303 (1987). Judicial notice may also be taken of facts from the public records of government agencies, here the PTO and the FDA. See Perkins v. State, 61 Wis. 2d 341, 346, 212 N.W.2d 141 (1973) (concluding that a court may take judicial notice of facts easily accessible and capable of immediate and accurate determination); Wis. Power & Light Co. v. City of Beloit, 215 Wis. 439, 444, 254 N.W. 119 (1934) (taking judicial notice of the files of the public service commission); Hillier v. Lake View Mem'l Park, Inc., 208 Wis. 614, 622, 243 N.W. 406 (1932) (taking judicial notice of incorporation records in the office of secretary of state). [22] However, on a motion to dismiss, courts do not accept "facts which the court will take judicial notice are not true, nor does the rule [of accepting facts pled in the complaint] apply to legally impossible [*58] facts." Cohen v. United States, 129 F.2d 733, 736 (8th Cir. 1942). We also are not required to accept factual statements that are not credible. See Ferraro v. Koelsch, 119 Wis. 2d 407, 410-11, 350 N.W.2d 735 (Ct. App. 1984). Furthermore, we are not required to accept legal conclusions pled in the complaint. John BBB Doe v. Archdiocese of Milwaukee, 211 Wis. 2d 312, 331, 565 N.W.2d 94 (1997).

[*P82] We interpret the application of statutes independently of the court of appeals and the circuit court, but benefiting from the analyses of both prior decisions. Spiegelberg v. State, 2006 WI 75, P8, 291 Wis. 2d 601, 717 N.W.2d 641. And finally, whether a legal doctrine can shield defendants from liability under [337] Wisconsin's antitrust law that would otherwise be accorded to the complained of conduct is a question of law. Prentice, 176 Wis. 2d at 721.

B. Wisconsin Antitrust Claim

[*P83] There have been approximately 30 cases filed throughout the United States, in state and [*59] federal courts, that make antitrust claims against Bayer and Barr based on the same Bayer-Barr agreement that is at issue here. Meyers v. Bayer AG, 143 F. Supp. 2d 1044, 1046 (E.D. Wis. 2001). Many of those cases have been consolidated in the Eastern District of New York under the scholarly attention of District Court Judge David Trager. See In re Ciprofloxacin Hydrochloride Antitrust Litig., 363 F. Supp. 2d 514 (E.D.N.Y. 2005).

[*P84] The case now before us was filed in state court, removed to federal court and remanded to state court because the federal district court determined that mounting a patent defense to a state antitrust claim did not cause the matter "to arise under" federal law. Meyers, 143 F. Supp. 2d at 1051. The federal district court did not analyze whether a state claim had been stated without plaintiffs alleging that Bayer's Cipro patent was invalid. In addition, the district court did not address whether the conduct alleged in the complaint exceeded [470] Bayer's rights under its Cipro patent.

1. General patent law principles

[*P85] In order to adequately address the defendants' motion to dismiss the complaint, there are certain general principles of federal patent law that must be [*60] recognized. That recognition is necessary before a court can evaluate a complaint wherein a patent owner is sued, in order to sort out which allegations are factual [338] allegations of a type that must be accepted for purposes of a motion to dismiss, which allegations contain facts not accepted as true, and which allegations are actually legal conclusions.

[22] For a detailed exposition of judicial notice of facts by appellate courts see George R. Currie, Appellate Courts Use of Facts Outside of the Record by Resort to Judicial Notice and Independent Investigation, 1960 Wis. L. Rev. 39 (1960).

[*P86] A civil state court claim against a patent owner, such as Bayer, that alleges conduct relating to the patented invention and requests damages, must assume that the patent is valid and it must allege conduct that falls outside of the rights accorded under the patent. This is so because if the complaint were to allege that the patent is invalid, there would be no subject matter jurisdiction in Wisconsin state courts to hear the claim. 28 U.S.C. § 1338(a); [23] Schecher v. Purdue Pharma L.P., 317 F. Supp. 2d 1253, 1257 (D. Kan. 2004); [24] see also Vill. of Trempealeau v. Mikrut, 2004 WI 79, P8 n.2, 273 Wis. 2d 76, 681 N.W.2d 190. [25] And, if all the conduct that is alleged falls within the rights granted by the federal government to the patentee, the conduct is not illegal nor is its effect illegal. United States v. General Elec. Co., 272 U.S. 476, 489-90, 47 S. Ct. 192, 71 L. Ed. 362 (1926). [*61] [339] It is important to continue to note that only illegal conduct or conduct that has an illegal effect violates Wis. Stat. § 133.03. Olstad, 2005 WI 121, P85, 284 Wis. 2d 224, 700 N.W.2d 139; Prentice, 176 Wis. 2d at 721.

[*P87] Antitrust law generally forbids agreements that restrict output and raise prices above that which would be achieved in normal [*62] market competition. See Phillip Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp, Vol. X Antitrust Law: An Analysis of Antitrust Principles and Their Application, P1780a (2d ed. 2004). However, if a patent owner acts solely within the rights granted under the patent, the patent owner has a lawful monopoly and is "freed from competition of price, service, quality or otherwise." United States v. Line Material Co., 333 U.S. 287, 300, 68 S. Ct. 550, 92 L. Ed. 701 (1948).

[*P88] As the United States Supreme Court has explained:

> "A patent by its very nature is affected with a public interest . . . [It] is an exception to the general rule against monopolies and to the right to access to a free and open market."

Walker Process Equip., Inc. v. Food Mach. & Chem. Corp., 382 U.S. 172, 177, 86 S. Ct. 347, 15 L. Ed. 2d 247 (1965) (quoting Precision Instrument Mfg. Co. v. Auto. Maint. Mach. Co., 324 U.S. 806, 816, 65 S. Ct. 993, [471] 89 L. Ed. 1381, 1945 Dec. Comm'r Pat. 582 (1945)). It is black letter law that a patent "is an exception to the general rule against monopolies." Ciprofloxacin, 363 F. Supp. 2d at 523 (quoting Precision, 324 U.S. at 816).

[*P89] Therefore, agreeing to operate as a monopoly that fixes price for a patented invention is not illegal because monopoly rights exercised within the confines of the patent are granted by the federal government [*63] with the patent. As the United States Supreme Court has explained:

> [340] [T]he general rule is absolute freedom in the use or sale of rights under the patent laws of the United States. The very object of these laws is monopoly, and the rule is, with few exceptions, that any conditions which are not in their very nature illegal with regard to this kind of property, imposed by the patentee and agreed to by the licensee for the right to manufacture or use or sell the article, will be upheld by the courts. The fact that the conditions in the contracts keep up the monopoly or fix prices does not render them illegal.

Bement, 186 U.S. at 91 (emphasis added). In support of this monopoly, the federal law grants to a patent owner "the right to exclude others from making, using, offering for sale, or selling the invention throughout the United States or importing the invention into the United States." 35 U.S.C. § 154(a)(1). The "essence of a patent grant is the right to exclude others from profiting by the patented invention." Dawson Chem. Co. v. Rohm & Haas Co., 448 U.S. 176, 215, 100 S. Ct. 2601, 65 L. Ed. 2d 696 (1980). The rationale for granting such monopolies to patent

[23] 28 U.S.C. § 1338(a) provides, "The districts courts shall have original jurisdiction of any civil action arising under any Act of Congress relating to patents . . . . Such jurisdiction shall be exclusive of the courts of the states."

[24] [D]istrict courts have exclusive original jurisdiction over actions "arising under" federal patent laws, i.e., in an action challenging the validity or enforceability of the patent. Schecher v. Purdue Pharma L.P., 317 F. Supp. 2d 1253, 1257 (D. Kan. 2004).

[25] Village of Trempealeau v. Mikrut, 2004 WI 79, 273 Wis. 2d 76, 681 N.W.2d 190, explains that as a general proposition, circuit courts have broad subject matter jurisdiction; however, "[f]ederal law may confer exclusive jurisdiction over certain subject matters to the federal courts, precluding state court jurisdiction in those areas by operation of the Supremacy Clause." Id., P8 n.2.

owners is to encourage inventions. Brenner v. Manson, 383 U.S. 519, 534, 86 S. Ct. 1033, 16 L. Ed. 2d 69, 1966 Dec. Comm'r Pat. 74 (1966). [*64] [26]

[*P90] The monopoly rights accorded to a patent owner also include the right to control the price charged for the patented invention by a licensee of the patent owner. General Elec., 272 U.S. at 489-90. In General [341] Electric, the government alleged that General Electric was engaged in illegal price-fixing of lamps through an agreement with Westinghouse. Id. at 478. General Electric owned the patents necessary for the construction of certain tungsten filament lamps. Id. at 480-81. Westinghouse was one of General Electric's licensees to sell the lamps as part of a nationwide sales and distribution plan. Id. at 481-82. [*65] In considering the government's allegation that General Electric imposed a price-fixing condition on Westinghouse's sales, the Court concluded price-fixing on sales by a licensee was permissible so long as the price-fixing stopped with the licensee and did not continue to fix the prices charged by those who purchased from the licensee for subsequent sale. Id. at 485. The court explained:

> [U]nder the patent law the patentee is given by statute a monopoly of making, using and selling the patented article. The extent of his monopoly in the articles sold and in the territory of the United States where sold is not limited in the grant of his patent, and the comprehensiveness of his control of the business [472] in the sale of the patented article is not necessarily an indication of illegality of his method. As long as he makes no effort to fasten upon ownership of the articles he sells control of the prices at which his purchaser shall sell, it makes no difference how widespread his monopoly. It is only when he adopts a combination with others, by which he steps out of the scope of his patent rights and seeks to control and restrain those to whom he has sold his patented articles in their subsequent [*66] disposition of what is theirs, that he comes within the operation of the Anti-Trust Act.

Id.

[*P91] Therefore, as we examine the complaint, we must: (1) presume Bayer's Cipro patent is valid because the plaintiffs claims are before a Wisconsin state [342] court; and (2) assess whether any factual allegation relating to the Bayer-Barr agreement falls outside Bayer's right to maintain a monopoly on the price Bayer or its licensee charges for Cipro. With these general principles of patent law in mind, I turn to Wisconsin antitrust law.

2. State antitrust principles

[*P92] Wisconsin's antitrust law is set out in ch. 133 of the Wisconsin Statutes. The operative provision at issue in the case before us is Wis. Stat. § 133.03. It provides in relevant part:

> Unlawful contracts; conspiracies. (1) Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce is illegal. . . .
> (2) Every person who monopolizes, or attempts to monopolize, or combines or conspires with any other person or persons to monopolize any part of trade or commerce is guilty.

[*P93] Wisconsin antitrust law follows federal antitrust law in most respects. State v. Waste Mgmt. of Wis., Inc., 81 Wis. 2d 555, 568-69, 261 N.W.2d 147 (1978). [*67] For example, both federal and state laws prohibit conspiracies to restrain trade and monopolies of the market. 15 U.S.C. §§ 1, 4, 15; Wis. Stat. § 133.03. However, Wisconsin antitrust law differs from federal antitrust law in that Wisconsin law may permit the recovery of damages by "indirect purchasers" [27] alleging [343] unlawful anticompetitive conduct, Olstad, 2005 WI 121, P63,

[26] The freedom to take actions within the rights granted to a patent owner that would otherwise be unlawful has a limitation. If the patent was obtained "by knowing and willful fraud practiced by the defendant on the Patent Office or, if the defendant was not the original patent applicant, [but] he had been enforcing the patent with knowledge of the fraudulent manner in which it was obtained," the patent will provide no shield to claims of unlawful anticompetitive conduct. Walker Process Equip., Inc. v. Food Mach. & Chem. Corp., 382 U.S. 172, 179, 86 S. Ct. 347, 15 L. Ed. 2d 247 (1965) (Harlan, J., concurring).

284 Wis. 2d 224, 700 N.W.2d 139, but federal law does not. Ill. Brick Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 730-31, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (Ill. 1977).

[*P94] The most recent Wisconsin Supreme Court decision interpreting Wis. Stat. § 133.03 is Olstad. There we addressed the certified question: "Does Wisconsin's antitrust act, Wis. Stat. § 133.03, apply to interstate commerce affecting Wisconsin commerce?" Olstad, 2005 WI 121, P10, 284 Wis. 2d 224, 700 N.W.2d 139. Olstad claimed that Microsoft's share of the market for personal computer operating systems was so large that it prevented others from entering the market. Id., PP2-3. Olstad alleged that Microsoft's anticompetitive conduct caused Wisconsin consumers [*68] to pay higher prices. Id., P7. The circuit court dismissed the action after concluding that § 133.03 did not apply to interstate conduct. Id., P9.

[*P95] We concluded that "at least in some circumstances" Wis. Stat. § 133.03 does apply to interstate conduct. Id., P74. Our limited conclusion was based in large part on our prior holding in Allied Chemical & Dye, where we addressed whether [473] Wisconsin could apply its antitrust law to the sales of calcium chloride made in Wisconsin through interstate commerce when those sales were subject to the federal antitrust law. Allied Chem. & Dye, 9 Wis. 2d at 292. We concluded that Wisconsin law could be applied in some circumstances, in part because there was no conflict between federal and state antitrust laws. Id. at 295.

[*P96] In Olstad, we also set out a test to assist courts and the public ascertain when Wis. Stat. § 133.03 may reach interstate actions. As a very general framework, we explained that either: (1) "actionable conduct, such as the formation of a combination or conspiracy," must have occurred within Wisconsin, or (2) if the actionable conduct occurred predominantly or exclusively [344] outside of Wisconsin, the "illegal activity" must "substantially [*69] affect" the people of Wisconsin and have "impacts" in Wisconsin. Olstad, 2005 WI 121, P85, 284 Wis. 2d 224, 700 N.W.2d 139. We advised that the test was to be interpreted in a restrictive fashion so that Wisconsin's antitrust law would be available on only a limited basis with regard to interstate conduct:

> Operating with lesser standards would jeopardize the action, undermine the validity of our antitrust statute, and create the spectacle of Lilliputian harassment in Wisconsin courts. Questions of provincialism, favoritism, and undue burden on interstate commerce should be determined by resort to contemporary federal commerce clause jurisprudence.

Id.

[*P97] It is important to note that Olstad does not address any issue that may arise in the application of state antitrust law in the context of a federal patentee's actions, where federal law may effect whether state law will be applied. Furthermore, in Olstad, we also did not address whether an indirect purchaser's claim based on conduct that occurred solely outside of Wisconsin should be subject to Wisconsin's antitrust law because that question was not brought to us for decision.

[*P98] However, we have in past decisions shown that Wisconsin antitrust law will not be applied [*70] to each and every occasion where the claim of a state law violation is made. In State v. Milwaukee Braves, Inc., 31 Wis. 2d 699, 144 N.W.2d 1 (1966), we carefully considered the lack of federal prosecution of interstate conduct and what impact that should have on our decision about the prosecution of an antitrust claim under Wisconsin law.

[*P99] Milwaukee Braves involved a state antitrust action brought against the Braves and others by the [345] State, due to major league baseball's decision to move the club to Atlanta, while refusing to permit another major league baseball team to locate in Milwaukee. Id. at 703-04. We acknowledged that a "substantial injury to business activity within Wisconsin" was caused by the exercise of major league baseball's monopoly power. Id. at 719. We explained that "organized baseball is interstate commerce and Congress may therefore regulate it." Id. at 720.

[27] The plaintiffs in the case before us are all "indirect purchasers" of Cipro because they did not purchase Cipro directly from Bayer or Barr. Ill. Brick Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 726, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (Ill. 1977).

However, we noted that major league baseball had not been subjected to prosecution under federal antitrust law. Id. at 721.

[*P100] When considering how to determine whether that de facto exemption from federal antitrust law could cause a conflict with the application of state antitrust law in regard to the decision [*71] to move the Braves, we framed the question as: "whether there is a conflict between state and federal policy, so that the state policy must yield." Id. We concluded that federal choice must control and Wisconsin could not enforce its antitrust law based on the [474] "concerted action" of moving the Braves from Milwaukee and refusing Milwaukee another major league baseball franchise. Id. at 732.

[*P101] In Prentice, we once again addressed whether prosecution of alleged conduct, which if proved true, appeared to violate Wisconsin antitrust law, should proceed. Prentice was brought as a class action against "twelve title insurance companies and several of their employees." Prentice, 176 Wis. 2d at 720. It was claimed that the defendants engaged in a conspiracy to restrain trade, causing the consumer "plaintiffs to pay substantially higher prices for title insurance and related services than they would have had to pay in the absence of the alleged conspiracy." Id. At issue was [346] "whether the filed rate doctrine shield[ed] the defendants from liability" under Wisconsin's antitrust law. Id. at 721.

[*P102] In Prentice, we explained how a regulatory agency's approval of a rate "established the lawfulness" of a [*72] rate; and therefore, the "legal rights of the parties were measured solely by the filed rate." Id. at 722. We concluded that because the insurance companies filed the rates they would charge pursuant to the provisions of Wis. Stat. § 625.15(2) (1977-78) and the agency had approved those rates under the filed rate doctrine, the rates charged were lawful rates. Id. at 725. Therefore, the title insurance companies and their employees were not subject to prosecution under Wisconsin antitrust law. Id. This discussion demonstrates that while Wisconsin's antitrust law may initially appear to be applicable, there are occasions when it will not be applied because to do so would interfere with other federal or state laws or doctrines.

3. Plaintiffs' claims

[*P103] I now turn to the plaintiffs' claims in the suit before us. The complaint acknowledges that Bayer is the holder of the patent for Cipro. It alleges that Barr's generic drug is the "bioequivalence" of Cipro.

[*P104] Plaintiffs' allegation of the existence of Bayer's Cipro patent is significant because all patents are presumed to be valid. 35 U.S.C. § 282. Furthermore, Bayer's patent for Cipro has been adjudged valid and enforceable. Bayer AG v. Barr Labs., No. 92CV391 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 16, 1997). [*73] And finally, if the plaintiffs were attacking the validity or enforceability of the patent through the allegations that are made in the complaint, there would be no subject matter jurisdiction [347] in Wisconsin courts to hear their claims. Schecher, 317 F. Supp. 2d at 1257.

[*P105] Plaintiffs nonetheless allege that in the absence of the Bayer-Barr agreement, Barr would have begun marketing generic Cipro January 6, 1995. [28] This can be true under only one condition for a claim made in state court--the monopoly set out in the Bayer-Barr agreement must fall outside of Bayer's right to maintain a monopoly for Cipro throughout the term of the patent. Ciprofloxacin, 363 F. Supp. 2d at 524. Stated otherwise, "the conduct at issue is illegal if it threatens competition in areas other than those protected by the patent and [if not, it] is otherwise legal." Id. (quoting United States v. Studiengesellschaft Kohle, m.b.H., 670 F.2d 1122, 1127, 216 U.S. App. D.C. 303 (D.C. Cir. 1981)). Therefore, while not every monopoly that an owner of a patent [475] maintains is lawful, in order to withstand a motion to dismiss, a complaint against a patent owner must allege some conduct, which if proved [*74] true, falls outside of the conduct protected under the patent during the entire term of the patent. [29]

[28] This date predates FDA final approval to Barr, which according to the FDA's public records occurred on June 9, 2004.

[29] For example, while one who owns a patent can price-fix for the patented invention to those to whom it or its licensees sell, it cannot lawfully fix the price for the patented invention that will be charged by those to whom the patent owner or its licensees

[*P106] [348] I accept the following allegations of plaintiffs as true for purposes of this motion: (1) The Bayer-Barr agreement consented to "fix, raise, maintain, and stabilize the price of Cipro." (2) The Bayer-Barr agreement "provides that Bayer has the option to either: [*75] (a) license and supply Bayer-manufactured Cipro to Barr [] for resale under a generic label; or (b) pay quarterly amounts to Barr from 1998 through at least 2003." (3) The Bayer-Barr agreement "set forth the prices that Bayer may charge to Barr [], if Bayer chooses to supply its Cipro to Barr [] for resale [and] requires Barr [] to share with Bayer in profits from the resale of generically labeled Cipro manufactured by Bayer [and] [] limits the ability of Barr [] to price Cipro licensed from Bayer independently."

[*P107] None of these allegations is sufficient to state a claim under Wis. Stat. § 133.03 because none of the alleged conduct is illegal and the monopolistic effect of the conduct is not illegal. The price-fixing conduct and the monopoly that is alleged to have resulted come within the rights granted to Bayer by the federal government when it issued the Cipro patent. General Elec., 272 U.S. at 485; Bement, 186 U.S. at 91.

[*P108] There are other allegations in the complaint that appear factual, but are either legal conclusions that I do not accept for purposes of a motion to dismiss, John BBB Doe, 211 Wis. 2d at 331, or they are facts for which I take judicial notice that they are not true [*76] or are not legally possible. Cohen, 129 F.2d at 736. For example, we need not accept the allegation, repeated in many forms in the complaint, that were it not for the Bayer-Barr agreement, Barr would have begun to manufacture and market generic Cipro in January of 1995.

[*P109] [349] According to the public records of the PTO, Bayer's original patent for Cipro did not expire until December 2003 and was extended through June 8, 2004. Furthermore, Barr had received only "tentative" FDA approval in January of 1995. The public records of the FDA show Barr did not have FDA approval to market generic Cipro until June 9, 2004. Therefore, unless Bayer's Cipro patent is invalid--a position that the plaintiffs cannot maintain in this lawsuit in state court--it would have been a violation of federal law for Barr to market generic Cipro before June 9, 2004. Therefore, in the context of a motion to dismiss, plaintiffs' repeated allegation in this regard does not cause their complaint to state a claim.

[*P110] The majority permits plaintiffs' claims to proceed because plaintiffs allege:

> a broad price-fixing scheme affecting "at minimum, thousands . . . in Wisconsin" who purchased the best-selling antibiotic [476] Cipro "at [*77] any time since January 6, 1995." We conclude Meyers' complaint alleges illegal conduct that, if true, substantially affected the people of Wisconsin and had impacts in this state.

Majority op., P4. The quote above shows that the majority opinion errs because it does not consider the context in which the complaint is made, i.e., it is made against the lawful owner of the federal patent for Cipro. Bayer AG v. Barr Labs., No. 92CV391 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 16, 1997) (concluding that Bayer owns the Cipro patent, which is valid and enforceable). [30]

[*P111] [350] The majority opinion gives credence to the complaint's assertion that "as a result of the Agreement, Bayer maintained its monopoly of the United States market for Cipro and generic equivalents of Cipro." Majority op., [*78] P13. The quoted phrase, "as a result of the Agreement" from the majority opinion incorporates a conclusion of law. It does not recite a fact because the Bayer-Barr agreement could have caused Bayer to have a monopoly for Cipro only if Bayer's Cipro patent were invalid. General Elec., 272 U.S. at 485; Bement, 186 U.S. at 91. Otherwise, the monopoly is a result of the patent. Throughout the majority opinion it assumes the alleged conduct is illegal. This is a conclusion of law inappropriate for a motion to dismiss, unless there are facts alleged, have sold. General Elec., 272 U.S. at 485. In addition, a licensee who has rights under a former provision in the Hatch-Waxman Act to act as the first generic producer for 180 days on the expiration of the patent (21 U.S.C. § 355(j)(5)(B)(iv)) cannot lawfully agree to delay the commencement of the 180-day period and in so doing, extend the patent beyond the term granted by the PTO. In re Cardizem CK Antitrust Litig., 332 F.3d 896, 907-08 (6th Cir. 2003).

[30] That the plaintiffs' claim is made against the patent owner for Cipro was argued to the circuit court. It was not briefed for us because the circuit court dismissed the complaint on other grounds and the court of appeals reviewed only the grounds employed by the circuit court. However, many questions about the effect of Bayer's Cipro patent on the plaintiffs' claims were asked of counsel for all parties at the oral argument before us.

which if true, were sufficient to support that conclusion. No such facts have been alleged in the complaint. And, as I explained above, price-fixing and monopolies within the rights granted with the Cipro patent are legal. Bement, 186 U.S. at 91 (explaining that "[t]he fact that the conditions in the contracts keep up the monopoly or fix prices does not render them illegal").

[*P112] Only illegal conduct or conduct that has an illegal effect violates Wisconsin's antitrust law. Prentice, 176 Wis. 2d at 721; Allied Chem., 9 Wis. 2d at 296. Therefore, it is not just that price-fixing occurred and that it had a monopolistic effect, the price-fixing to attain [*79] a monopoly for Cipro must be illegal or the effect of the conduct must be illegal. The allegations of both the conduct and its effect set out in the complaint are not illegal under controlling federal law. General Elec., 272 U.S. at 485.

[*P113] [351] Furthermore, under Wis. Stat. § 133.03, only illegal conduct or conduct that has an illegal effect can "substantially affect" the people of Wisconsin and have "impacts" that violate Wisconsin antitrust law. Olstad, 2005 WI 121, P85, 284 Wis. 2d 224, 700 N.W.2d 139; Allied Chem., 9 Wis. 2d at 295. It is beyond question that not all price-fixing or monopolies are illegal. In the case before us, given the presumption that Bayer's Cipro patent is valid and enforceable, none of the conduct alleged is illegal, nor is the monopolistic effect of the conduct illegal. General Elec., 272 U.S. at 485; Bement, 186 U.S. at 91. Therefore, because of the nature of a patent, any adverse effects on the market that were caused by actions that fall within the scope of a patent owner's rights under the patent cannot be addressed by antitrust law. Ciprofloxacin, 363 F. Supp. 2d at 524; see also Prentice, 176 Wis. 2d at 721. Only conduct that threatens competition in areas other than those that are [*80] [477] protected by the rights under a patent can be illegal under federal antitrust law. Ciprofloxacin, 363 F. Supp. 2d at 524. No such conduct has been alleged in the complaint before us. Therefore, defendant's motion to dismiss should be granted.

III. CONCLUSION

[*P114] Because the conduct alleged in the complaint is not illegal or alleged to have had an illegal effect, it cannot "substantially affect" the people in Wisconsin and have "impacts" in Wisconsin contrary to Wis. Stat. § 133.03. Olstad, 2005 WI 121, P85, 284 Wis. 2d 224, 700 N.W.2d 139. Therefore, I would affirm the circuit court's dismissal of the complaint for failure to state a claim pursuant to Wis. Stat. § 802.06(2)(a)6, albeit on different grounds. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent.

[*P115] [352] I am authorized to state that Justices JON P. WILCOX and DAVID T. PROSSER join this dissent.

HN2[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

A motion to strike tests the legal sufficiency of a pleading. Conn. Gen. Prac. Book § 10-39. The purpose of a motion to strike is to contest the legal sufficiency of the allegations of any complaint to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. In ruling on a motion to strike, the court is limited to the facts alleged in the complaint. The court must construe the facts in the complaint most favorably to the plaintiff. The trial court deciding a motion to strike must consider as true the well-pleaded facts, but not the legal conclusions, set forth in the complaint. The court should view the facts in a broad fashion, on one hand, to include facts that are necessarily implied by and fairly provable by the allegations, but on the other hand, to avoid enlarging the allegations of the complaint by assuming facts that are clearly not alleged.

HN3[] Alter Ego, Corporate Formalities

A corporate veil may be pierced when facts show that the corporation is a mere shell and operates without corporate formalities for the benefit of the controlling shareholder.

Business & Corporate Law > ... > Piercing the Corporate Veil > Alter Ego > Corporate Formalities

Business & Corporate Law > ... > Corporate Existence, Powers & Purpose > Existence > Distinct & Separate Legal Entity

HN4[] Alter Ego, Corporate Formalities

A fundamental principle of corporate law is that the parent corporation and its subsidiary are treated as separate and distinct legal persons even though the parent owns all the shares of the subsidiary and the two enterprises have identical directors and officers. Such control, is no more than a normal consequence of controlling share ownership. Absent direct participation by the parent corporation, or facts that would meet common law standards for piercing the corporate veil, the parent is not liable for the alleged deeds if it has not actually operated or participated in the operation of its subsidiary's facility.

It is the intent of the Connecticut General Assembly that in construing the Connecticut Antitrust Act, Conn. Gen. Stat. §§ 35-24 to 35-46, inclusive, the courts of the State of Connecticut shall be guided by interpretations given by the federal courts to federal antitrust statutes.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Sherman Act

HN6[] Practices Governed by Per Se Rule, Boycotts

The anti-boycott provision of Conn. Gen. Stat. § 35-28(d) is essentially a codification of what has been labeled a per se violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act. Section 1 of the Sherman Act reaches unreasonable restraints of trade effected by a contract, combination, or conspiracy between separate entities. It does not reach conduct that is wholly unilateral. A plaintiff claiming a § 1 violation must first establish a combination or some form of concerted action between at least two legally distinct economic entities. Unilateral conduct on the part of a single person or enterprise falls outside the purview of that provision in the antitrust law.

Business & Corporate Law > ... > Corporate Existence, Powers & Purpose > Existence > Distinct & Separate Legal Entity

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Sherman Act Violations

HN7[] Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason, Sherman Act

Whether affiliated companies owned or controlled by another should be viewed as a single economic entity for antitrust purposes turns less on the particular nature of the corporate structure, and more on whether the parent company's control over the subsidiaries or affiliates is such that the conglomerate must be viewed as an enterprise operating with singular, business interests or goals.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Sherman Act

Business & Corporate Law > ... > Corporate Existence, Powers & Purpose > Existence > Distinct & Separate Legal Entity

HN8[] Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason, Sherman Act

Antitrust liability should not depend on whether a corporate subunit is organized as an unincorporated division or a wholly owned subsidiary. A corporation has complete power to maintain a wholly owned subsidiary in either form. The economic, legal, or other considerations that lead corporate management to choose one structure over the other are not relevant to whether the enterprise's conduct seriously threatens competition. A corporation may adopt the subsidiary form of organization for valid management and related purposes. Separate incorporation may improve management, avoid special tax problems arising from multi-state operations, or serve other legitimate interests. Especially in view of the increasing complexity of corporate operations, a business enterprise should be free to structure itself in ways that serve efficiency of control, economy of operations, and other factors dictated by business judgment without increasing its exposure to antitrust liability. Conduct that deprives the marketplace of the independent centers of decision making that competition assumes, without the efficiencies that come with integration inside a firm, go on the concerted side of the line.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Sherman Act

Business & Corporate Law > ... > Corporate Existence, Powers & Purpose > Existence > Distinct & Separate Legal Entity

HN9[] Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason, Sherman Act

Two subsidiaries of the same parent corporation are legally incapable of conspiring with one another for purposes of § 1 of the Sherman Act. Because unilateral action is not prohibited by § 1 of the Sherman Act, the actions of a parent corporation, its subsidiaries or sister corporations, and its employees cannot be considered concerted action. Interpreting Conn. Gen. Stat. § 35-28 in a manner consistent with the weight of federal authority, a Connecticut trial court holds that the concerted action of legally distinct entities operating without unified business interests is insufficient for the application of the anti-boycott provision of § 35-28(d).

HN10[] Sherman Act, Claims

Any anti-competitive activities of corporations and their wholly owned subsidiaries meriting antitrust remedies may be policed adequately without resort to an intra-enterprise conspiracy doctrine. A corporation's initial acquisition of control will always be subject to scrutiny under § 1 of the Sherman Act and § 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 18. The enterprise is fully subject to § 2 of the Sherman Act and § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 45.

HN11[] Per Se Rule Tests, Manifestly Anticompetitive Effects

Conn. Gen. Stat. § 35-27 is patterned after § 2 of the Sherman Act. The conduct of a single firm is governed by § 2 of the Sherman Act alone and is unlawful only when it threatens actual monopolization.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Clayton Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Sherman Act Violations

HN12[] Tying Arrangements, Clayton Act

A tying arrangement is an agreement by a party to sell one product but only on the condition that the buyer also purchases a different, or tied, product, or at least agrees that he will not purchase that product from any other supplier. The practice is made illegal by § 3 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 14 and Conn. Gen. Stat. § 35-29, if the product is a commodity, otherwise, it is a violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 and Conn. Gen. Stat. § 35-26. There is nothing inherently anticompetitive about packaged sales. Only when consumers are forced to purchase a tied product with a tying product, due to a defendant's substantial market power in the tying product market, are the protections of the antitrust laws triggered.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Clayton Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Per Se Rule

HN13[] Tying Arrangements, Clayton Act

Conn. Gen. Stat. § 35-26 provides that every contract, combination, or conspiracy in restraint of any part of trade or commerce is unlawful. Conn. Gen. Stat. § 35-29 is patterned after § 3 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 14.

HN14[] Tying Arrangements, Per Se Rule

Similar to Conn. Gen. Stat. § 35-28(d), Conn. Gen. Stat. § 35-26 is patterned after and is to be construed consistent with § 1 of the Sherman Act, and therefore, § 35-26 requires the concerted action of two or more persons.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Clayton Act

Evidence > Burdens of Proof > Allocation

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Sherman Act Violations

HN15[] Tying Arrangements, Clayton Act

The elements of a tying violation are described as follows: First, there must be in fact a tying arrangement. Second, the seller must possess sufficient economic power with respect to the tying product to restrain free competition appreciably for the tied product. Third, a substantial amount of commerce in the tied product must be restrained. In less demanding Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 14, cases, a plaintiff must only demonstrate the existence of a tying arrangement and either of the second or third elements to make out a violation. To establish a violation under the more stringent non-commodity Sherman Act, all three elements must be present.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Per Se Rule

Evidence > Burdens of Proof > Allocation

HN16[] Tying Arrangements, Per Se Rule

The common core of the adjudicated unlawful tying arrangements is the forced purchase of a second distinct commodity with the desired purchase of a dominant tying product, resulting in economic harm to competition in the tied market. Consequently, no cognizable cause of action under the antitrust laws for tying can be established in the absence of allegations demonstrating that the defendants have foreclosed competition on the merits in a product market distinct from the market for the tying item. A tying arrangement cannot exist unless two separate product markets have been linked.

In describing the business relationship necessary for a plaintiff to have standing to assert a CUTPA claim, the cases indicate that a business person must have a direct commercial relationship with the defendant, or some other relationship with the defendant in a commercial marketplace, so that a nexus exists between this relationship and an ascertainable loss caused by the defendant's unfair or deceptive practices. At the very least, other business people, who are not direct competitors, must have some type of commercial relationship with the alleged wrongdoer, commercial relationship not being so much a business-to-business relationship but some kind of relationship in the marketplace, so that the particular acts of wrongdoing alleged will interfere with fair and open competition in that particular marketplace.

Contracts Law > Contract Interpretation > Good Faith & Fair Dealing

HN27[] Breach of Contract Actions, Elements of Contract Claims

The duty of good faith and fair dealing is a covenant implied into a contract or a contractual relationship. Every contract carries an implied duty requiring that neither party do anything that will injure the right of the other to receive the benefits of the agreement. The covenant of good faith and fair dealing presupposes that the terms and purpose of the contract are agreed upon by the parties and that what is in dispute is a party's discretionary application or interpretation of a contract term. To constitute a breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, the acts by which a defendant allegedly impedes the plaintiff's right to receive benefits that he or she reasonably expected to receive under the contract must have been taken in bad faith. Bad faith has been defined in our jurisprudence in various ways. Bad faith in general implies both actual or constructive fraud, or a design to mislead or deceive another, or a neglect or refusal to fulfill some duty or some contractual obligation, not prompted by an honest mistake as to one's rights or duties, but by some interested or sinister motive. Bad faith means more than mere negligence; it involves a dishonest purpose. Bad faith may be overt or may consist of inaction, and it may include evasion of the spirit of the bargain.

Contracts Law > Contract Interpretation > Good Faith & Fair Dealing

Evidence > Burdens of Proof > Allocation

HN28[] Breach of Contract Actions, Elements of Contract Claims

An action for breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing requires proof of three essential elements, which the plaintiff must duly plead: first, that the plaintiff and the defendant were parties to a contract under which the plaintiff reasonably expected to receive certain benefits; second, that the defendant engaged in conduct that injured the plaintiff's right to receive some or all of those benefits; and third, that when committing the acts by which it injured the plaintiff's right to receive benefits it reasonably expected to receive under the contract, the defendant was acting in bad faith.

MEMORANDUM OF DECISION ON DEFENDANTS' MOTION TO STRIKE THE REVISED FIRST AMENDED CLASS ACTION COMPLAINT (# 121)

SUMMARY OF DECISION

This is an action instituted by four doctors, Dr. Donald Austrian, Dr. Francis Garofalo, Dr. Kenneth Miller and Dr. Evangelos Xistris. The four defendants are: United HealthCare Insurance Company, UnitedHealth Group, Inc., Oxford Health Plans (CT), Inc., and Oxford Health Insurance, Inc. The plaintiffs assert claims against all the defendants under the Connecticut Unfair Trade Practices Act, General Statutes § 42-110a et seq., ("CUTPA"); the Connecticut Unfair Insurance Practices Act, § 38a-815 and § 38a-816(4); tying in violation of Connecticut Antitrust Act, General Statutes § 36-26; and boycott in violation of the Connecticut Antitrust Act, General Statutes § 35-28(d). Against the defendant United HealthCare Insurance Company, the plaintiffs also claim breach of contract and violation of the implied duty of good faith and fair dealing. The plaintiffs also seek a declaratory judgment that United HealthCare Insurance Company, Oxford Health Plans (CT), Inc., and Oxford Health Insurance, Inc. are required to keep their [*2] approval offices open 24 hours a day, seven days a week, and that these defendants must endeavor to reduce hold times on their approval lines to a maximum of ten minutes.

On the defendants' motion to strike all the counts of the complaint, the court rules as follows:

The motion to strike is denied as to plaintiffs' claims against the defendants United HealthCare Insurance Company, Oxford Health Plans (CT), Inc., and Oxford Health Insurance, Inc., for violation of CUTPA (Second Count and Third Count).

The motion to strike is denied as to plaintiffs' claims against the defendant United HealthCare Insurance Company for breach of the implied duty of good faith and fair dealing (Fifteenth Count).

The motion to strike is granted as to counts one and counts four though fourteen.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The named plaintiffs in this proposed class action are four doctors [1] who are licensed to practice medicine in Connecticut and who contract as participating providers with the defendant United HealthCare Insurance Company (UHC), a Connecticut corporation with its principal place of business in Hartford, Connecticut. Under the contract, UHC reimburses the plaintiffs for services rendered in accordance [*3] with a contracted fee schedule. The other defendants are as follows: UnitedHealth Group, Inc. ("UHG"), a corporation established under the laws of Minnesota, with its principal place of business in Minnetonka, Minnesota; Oxford Health Plans (CT), Inc., a Connecticut corporation with its principal place of business in Trumbull, Connecticut; and Oxford Health Insurance, Inc., a New York corporation also with its principal place of business in Trumbull, Connecticut. (In this opinion, as in the complaint, Oxford Health Plans (CT), Inc. and Oxford Health Insurance, Inc. will be referred to jointly as "Oxford"). The gravamen of the plaintiffs' fifteen-count complaint is that in order to continue their participation in UHC's provider network, UHC also is requiring the plaintiffs to participate in Oxford's health plans.

According to the complaint and its attachments, [2] UHG is the ultimate parent corporation of UHC. In July 2004, UHG acquired control of Oxford through "merger, acquisition and/or affiliation," and thereafter, UHC and Oxford existed as subsidiaries of the same parent company. Complaint P16. [3] Generally, UHC and Oxford have continued to operate as separate insurance companies, maintaining their own branded health plans, claims processing procedures and fee schedules. In 2005, providers for UHC and Oxford were informed by either UHC or Oxford that despite the fact UHC and Oxford would continue to operate as separate companies, their provider contracts would be amended so that physicians would now have to become an Oxford provider if they were solely a UHC provider and vice versa. Complaint P24. According to the amendment, its purpose was that "United and Oxford now wish to integrate their physician networks."

According to the complaint, this requirement being imposed on the plaintiffs is known in the health care industry as an "all products" clause, whereby an insurer requires that a physician accept all of its offered coverage plans, not just the preferred plan. This clause was imposed upon the providers in a nonnegotiable, "take-it or leave-it" fashion, and evidences the "uneven playing field in bargaining power between individual physicians and the large insurance companies, which every day deteriorates more of the doctor-patient [*6] relationship." Complaint P25. [4]

The complaint describes the named plaintiffs' history with Oxford. Plaintiff Austrian was an Oxford provider for approximately four years before he terminated his contract with Oxford due to the related high administrative costs

[1] Dr. Donald Austrian specializes in internal medicine and is affiliated with Bridgeport Hospital; Dr. Francis Garofalo is a urologist who, at the time the complaint was initiated in 2005, was affiliated with Norwalk Hospital, but has since moved out-of-state; Dr. Kenneth Miller is a rheumatologist affiliated with Danbury, New Milford and Putnam Hospitals; and Dr. Evangelos Xistris [*4] is a neurologist affiliated with Stamford Hospital.

[2] Practice Book § 10-29(a) HN1[] permits the plaintiff to make any document a part of the complaint as fully as if it had been set out at length, and the court can consider such document(s) as part of the complaint on a motion to strike. Tracy v. New Milford Public Schools, 101 Conn.App. 560, 566, 922 A.2d 280 (2007).

[3] The [*5] exact corporate relationships of the defendants are actually more involved. According to the complaint, the defendant UHC is a subsidiary of UHIC Holdings, Inc. UHIC Holdings, Inc. is a subsidiary of United HealthCare Services, Inc., which in turn is a subsidiary of the defendant UHG.

The defendant Oxford Health Plans (CT), Inc., is a subsidiary of Oxford Health Plans, LLC, which in turn is a subsidiary of the defendant UHG. The defendant Oxford Health Insurance, Inc., is a subsidiary of Oxford Health Plans (NY), Inc., which in turn is a subsidiary of Oxford Health Plans, LLC. As previously stated, Oxford Health Plans, LLC is a subsidiary of the defendant UHG.

[4] The complaint alleges the following about the "all products" clause: "Requiring physicians to accept inferior plans imposing inadequate reimbursement rates, unreasonable risk, limited coverage, burdensome administrative requirements, limited drug formularies and other inappropriate incentives forces those physicians into a situation where they cannot opt-out of the plans for financial reasons, and places them in a position where they cannot provide a reasonable level of care due to the restrictions of the inferior plan. Moreover, when the physician's agreement with one plan is cancelled solely due to his or her refusal to participate in other plans, that physician incurs a great financial burden and is prevented from continuing to furnish medical care to his or her current patients, who are thus deprived of access to and continuity of medical care." Complaint P26.

and low fee schedule. He has been a UHC participating provider [*7] for more than five years, and approximately 26% of his practice is composed of UHC insureds. He informed UHC in June 2005 that he would not agree to become a provider for both Oxford and UHC. According to the complaint, UHC responded that it would terminate his participating provider agreement effective July 6, 2005. [5] The complaint further alleges that UHC sent notice of his termination to plaintiff Austrian's patients, "giving them less than one month to find a new participating provider and failing to inform them that they could continue to receive treatment from Dr. Austrian on an out-of-network basis." [6] Complaint, P31. The plaintiff Austrian claims that due to the all products clause, he "stands to lose more than one quarter of his patient base." Complaint, P32.

Plaintiff Garofalo also participated in the Oxford plan until 2003, when he terminated his contract with Oxford due to the related high administrative costs and low fee schedule. Prior to his moving to Utah, 12% of [*8] his practice involved treating UHC insureds. The complaint alleges that when plaintiff Garofalo received Oxford's letter informing him of the all products clause, and he learned that the acceptance of the all products clause was not negotiable, and considering his expectation that "as a direct result of being coerced to rejoin Oxford, he would devote less time to individual patients, making less money and working harder … he decided to stop practicing medicine in … Connecticut and to relocate to Utah …" Complaint, P36.

The complaint states that approximately 11% of plaintiff Miller's practice is comprised of UHC insureds; that he was an Oxford participating provider until "in or around" 2002, when he terminated his contract with Oxford as a result of the high administrative costs and low fee schedule; and upon receiving notification of the all products clause at issue, he attempted to negotiate with UHC, and was informed that he would have to agree to accept a decrease in his reimbursements from UHC if he expected Oxford to increase its fee schedule. Plaintiff Miller claims that he could not agree to such a condition and consequently rejoined Oxford "at the lower fee schedule." The [*9] complaint alleges that plaintiff Miller will be directly affected by his coerced acceptance of the all products clause by the threat of losing 11% of his patient base comprising UHC insureds, increased patient load and administrative burdens, less time with individual patients, working harder for less money, and not being able to afford additional staff as a result of Oxford's lower fee schedule.

Plaintiff Xistris is both a UHC participating provider (33% of his practice) and a participating provider with Oxford (10% of his practice). Prior to receiving notification of the provider agreement amendment at issue, plaintiff Xistris intended to terminate his contract with Oxford because of the related high administrative costs and low fee schedule. Plaintiff Xistris alleges that Oxford's fee schedule reimburses him in amounts lower than Medicare, "to the point where it often costs [him] more to bill Oxford than the payments he ultimately receives." Complaint, P42. He further alleges that Oxford's approvals office is closed on weekends, and so weekend emergency procedures are performed without approval, and this plaintiff often is denied reimbursement by Oxford for emergency procedures performed [*10] on weekends. As a result of his coerced acceptance of the all products clause, plaintiff Xistris claims that he will have to work harder for less money, and his patients will be deprived of continuity of care.

The plaintiffs assert the following claims against UHG: violation of the Connecticut Unfair Trade Practices Act, General Statutes § 42-110a et seq. (CUTPA) (first count); violation of the Connecticut Unfair Insurance Practices Act (CUIPA), General Statutes § 38a-815 and § 38a-816(4) (fourth count); and violation of the Connecticut Antitrust Act based on tying, General Statutes § 35-26 (seventh count) and on boycott, General Statutes § 35-28(d) (tenth count). The plaintiffs assert claims against UHC for violation of CUTPA (second count) and CUIPA (fifth count), tying (eighth count) and boycott (eleventh count), breach of contract (fourteenth count) and breach of implied contract of good faith and fair dealing (fifteenth count). They assert claims against Oxford for violation of CUTPA (third count) and CUIPA (sixth count), tying (ninth count) and boycott (twelfth count). The plaintiffs also seek a declaratory judgment ordering that UHC and Oxford be required to keep their approvals [*11] offices open 24 hours a day, seven days a week, and that UHC and Oxford endeavor to reduce hold times on their approval lines to a maximum of ten minutes (thirteenth count).

The defendants move to strike the complaint in its entirety. The plaintiffs oppose the motion to strike.

II

Motion to Strike All Counts Against UHG

As previously stated, four statutory claims are asserted against UHG based on CUTPA, CUIPA, and antitrust tying and boycott. UHG has moved to strike all of these claims on the ground that the claims are unsupported by any facts. UHG contends that the plaintiffs have alleged a corporate relationship between it and the other corporate defendants, UHC and Oxford, but the plaintiffs have failed to allege any relationship between themselves and UHG that would support holding UHG independently liable for any of the statutory actions asserted against it. UHG insists that linking it to its subsidiaries' alleged activities on the basis of nothing more than general assertions arising from its parental status is insufficient as a matter [*13] of law. In response, the plaintiffs contend that they have sufficiently alleged that UHG is a participant in the challenged scheme, together with UHC and Oxford, and is accountable as an actor. The court agrees with UHG.

The law is established that HN3[] the corporate veil may be pierced when facts show that the corporation is a mere shell and operates without corporate formalities for the benefit of the controlling shareholder. See, e.g., Toshiba America Med. Sys. v. Mobile Med. Sys., 53 Conn.App. 484, 730 A.2d 1219 (1999). However, the plaintiffs admit that they are not seeking to impose liability on UHG by piercing the corporate veil or through any form of "vicarious liability." Plaintiffs' Memorandum of Law in Opposition to Defendants' Motion to Strike, 6 and 10. Additionally, the plaintiffs have not sued UHG for breach of any express or implied contract. The plaintiffs admitted during oral argument that they have no breach of contract claim against UHG. Furthermore, the plaintiffs deny that they are alleging any "intracorporate" conspiracy. Plaintiffs' Memorandum of Law in Opposition to Defendants' Motion to Strike, 11; cf. Harp v. King, 266 Conn. 747, 835 A.2d 953 (2003) (under the [*14] intra-corporate conspiracy doctrine, employees of a corporation cannot conspire with the corporation itself).

The complaint alleges that UHG is the ultimate parent company of UHC and Oxford, acquiring control of Oxford in a corporate acquisition/merger. UHG has an economic interest in the products that UHC and Oxford sell; and UHG is the corporate link between UHC and Oxford, providing the business relationship between UHC and Oxford. Complaint, PP19-20. On the basis of these allegations, the plaintiffs generally aver that UHG "materially aids and assists in the scheme, combination, conspiracy and agreement" that the plaintiffs are challenging. Complaint, P20. However, this statement that UHG "materially" assists the alleged wrongful conduct is nothing more than an unspecific, conclusory assertion. The complaint fails to describe any facts indicating how UHG is materially assisting any scheme and how such acts provide the elements to support any cause of action against UHG. Reading these allegations broadly in favor of the plaintiffs, it appears that this "material" aid that UHG is providing simply emanates from its status as being the parent or "corporate link" between UHC and Oxford. [*15] This "link" gives UHG an "economic interest" in the products of its subsidiaries and generates "revenue" flowing to UHG. Complaint, PP18-21. These allegations, in effect, merely describe the nature of the parent-subsidiary relationship that UHG has with its subsidiaries, UHC and Oxford.

As a matter of established corporate law, such allegations alone are insufficient to assert a cause of action against a parent corporation for the acts of its subsidiaries. The Connecticut Supreme Court recognizes HN4[] the "fundamental principle of corporate law that the parent corporation and its subsidiary are treated as separate and distinct legal persons even though the parent owns all the shares of the subsidiary and the two enterprises have identical directors and officers. Such control, after all, is no more than a normal consequence of controlling share ownership." (Citations omitted; internal quotation marks omitted.) SFA Folio Collections, Inc. v. Bannon, 217 Conn. 220, 232, 585 A.2d 666, cert. denied, 501 U.S. 1223, 111 S. Ct. 2839, 115 L. Ed. 2d 1008 (1991). Similarly, the United States Supreme Court expressed this principle in United States v. Bestfoods, 524 U.S. 51, 61, 118 S.Ct. 1876, 141 L.Ed.2d 43 (1998). [*16] In Bestfoods, the plaintiff sought to impose liability on the parent company for pollution by the subsidiary. The court ruled that absent direct participation by the parent corporation in the pollution, or facts that would meet common law standards for piercing the corporate veil, the parent is not liable for the alleged deeds if it has not actually operated or participated in the operation of its subsidiary's facility.

In short, the plaintiffs have neither articulated any specific acts committed against them by UHG itself nor described in any particularized way how UHG participated in the contested conduct. The plaintiffs have alleged the interests that UHG, as a parent corporation, may have in the business activities of its subsidiaries or the control that this parent corporation may legitimately exercise over its subsidiaries. However, such allegations alone are insufficient to state a legally cognizable claim against UHG. As a matter of law, the existence of the control that a parent corporation may exercise over a subsidiary is insufficient to impose liability upon the parent for the acts of the subsidiary absent any other evidence to support the piercing of the corporate veil.

Therefore, [*17] for these reasons, the motion to strike counts one, four, seven and ten against UHG is granted. Alternatively, UHG also argues that these counts should be stricken because on their substantive merits they fail to state claims upon which relief may be granted. As discussed below, the court agrees with UHG's alternative arguments, except as to the CUTPA claim asserted in Count One.

Motion to Strike Antitrust Counts

Antitrust Boycott Claims

In counts seven through twelve, the plaintiffs claim damages for violation of the Connecticut Antitrust Act, General Statutes §§ 35-26, 35-28. The legislative history of the Connecticut Antitrust Act establishes that it was intentionally patterned after the antitrust law of the federal government. Vacco v. Microsoft Corp., 260 Conn. 59, 72, 793 A.2d 1048 (2002). In fact, the General Assembly amended the Connecticut Antitrust Act in 1992 to express its intent that the judiciary shall interpret the Connecticut Antitrust Act in accordance with the federal courts' interpretation of federal antitrust law. General Statutes § 35-44b ("[I]t HN5[] is the intent of the General Assembly that in construing sections 35-24 to 35-46, inclusive, the courts of this state [*18] shall be guided by interpretations given by the federal courts to federal antitrust statutes.").

The tenth through twelfth counts of the complaint claim that UHG, UHC, and Oxford respectively engaged in a boycott in violation of the Connecticut Antitrust Act, General Statutes § 35-28. HN6[] The anti-boycott provision of Section 35-28(d) is essentially a codification of what has been labeled a per se violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act. See Klor's, Inc. v. Broadway-Hale Stores, Inc., 359 U.S. 207, 79 S.Ct. 705, 3 L.Ed.2d 741 (1959). "Section 1 of the Sherman Act … reaches unreasonable restraints of trade effected by a 'contract, combination … or conspiracy' between separate entities. It does not reach conduct that is 'wholly unilateral.'" Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 768, 104 S.Ct. 2731, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628 (1984). "[A] plaintiff claiming a § 1 violation must first establish a combination or some form of concerted action between at least two legally distinct economic entities. Unilateral conduct on the part of a single person or enterprise falls outside the purview of this provision in the antitrust law." (Citation omitted.) Capital Imaging Assocs., P.C. v. Mohawk Valley Medical Assocs., 996 F.2d 537, 542 (2nd Cir. 1993), [*19] cert denied, 510 U.S. 947, 114 S. Ct. 388, 126 L. Ed. 2d 337 (1993).

The complaint alleges in pertinent part that the all products clause has exerted pressure on the plaintiffs and other physicians to accept Oxford through the threat of losing UHC patients, causing an unreasonable restraint of the freedom of physicians to choose which insurance plans they will participate in on the open market; and UHC and Oxford as affiliates and United as their parent have entered into a contract, combination, conspiracy or agreement to refuse to deal with UHC participating providers who do not agree to also become Oxford participating providers. The defendants move to strike the boycott claims on the grounds that a boycott violation requires that at least two, separate, unaffiliated corporations conspire and agree not to deal with a third, and the defendants, as affiliated companies, are legally incapable of conspiring with one another because under the antitrust laws they must be viewed as sharing unified business interests.

The plaintiffs, on the other hand, argue that UHC and Oxford attempted to merge their networks of participating provider physicians, not merge their businesses. Although the plaintiffs [*20] concede that UHG is the ultimate parent corporation of the defendants UHC and Oxford, this relationship is not accomplished directly, but is accomplished through UHG's control over intervening subsidiaries. See n.3. As a result of this corporate structure, the plaintiffs contend that the affiliations of UHG, UHC, and Oxford are so distant and distinct that these companies must be viewed as being separate business entities, without having the unity of interest necessary to be treated as a single economic unit under antitrust law. The court is unpersuaded.

As previously indicated, in order to assert a boycott in violation of General Statutes § 35-28(d), the plaintiffs must allege concerted action between at least two legally distinct entities; a single entity is incapable of conspiring with itself. In Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., supra, 467 U.S. 752, the Supreme Court rejected the intra-enterprise conspiracy doctrine and held that a corporation and its wholly owned subsidiary are legally incapable of conspiring with each other under § 1 of the Sherman Act.

The plaintiffs argue that Copperweld is distinguishable from the present case because of the corporate remoteness between [*21] UHG and its subsidiaries, UHC and Oxford, and because UHC and Oxford are sister corporations. The plaintiffs emphasize that the Supreme Court's decision in Copperweld was limited to conduct between a parent corporation and its wholly owned subsidiaries. Id., 767-68. The court rejects the plaintiffs' argument and finds that the factual distinction between this case and Copperweld relied on by the plaintiffs is without legal significance.

HN7[] Whether affiliated companies owned or controlled by another should be viewed as a single economic entity for antitrust purposes turns less on the particular nature of the corporate structure, and more on whether the parent company's control over the subsidiaries or affiliates is such that the conglomerate must be viewed as an enterprise operating with singular, business interests or goals. [7] Such a relationship is exactly what is alleged in the complaint.

[7] See generally, Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., supra, 467 U.S. 772-73: "HN8[] Antitrust liability should not depend on whether a corporate subunit is organized as an unincorporated division or a wholly owned subsidiary. A corporation has complete power to maintain a wholly owned subsidiary in either form. The economic, legal, or other considerations that lead corporate management to choose one structure over the other are not relevant to whether the enterprise's conduct seriously threatens competition. Rather, a corporation may adopt the subsidiary form of organization for valid management and related purposes. Separate incorporation may improve management, avoid special tax problems arising from multi-state operations, or

The complaint describes how UHG has structured its business operations so as to conduct "its business as a diversified health and well-being company through several operating divisions, including its Health Care Services business segment, of which UHC and Oxford are part." Complaint P18. As previously [*22] discussed, the complaint fails to describe any specific, independent acts committed by UHG individually against the plaintiffs, but complains about how UHG's control of UHC and Oxford has resulted in them committing the acts contested by the plaintiffs. [8]

The plaintiffs are correct that Copperweld involved actions between a parent and a wholly owned subsidiary, whereas this case involves, in part, the actions of two subsidiaries. Although this precise issue is one of first impression in Connecticut, the federal circuit courts addressing this or analogous issues indicate [*24] that Copperweld precludes a finding that two subsidiaries, wholly owned or ultimately controlled by a parent corporation, can conspire under § 1 of the Sherman Act. Advanced Health-Care Servs. v. Radford Community Hosp., 910 F.2d 139, 146 (4th Cir. 1990) ("we conclude that HN9[] two subsidiaries of the same parent corporation are legally incapable of conspiring with one another for purposes of § 1 of the Sherman Act"); Odishelidze v. Aetna Life & Casualty Co., 853 F.2d 21, 23 (1st Cir. 1988) ("[b]ecause unilateral action is not prohibited by § 1 of the Sherman Act … the actions of a parent corporation, its subsidiaries or sister corporations, and its employees cannot be considered concerted action."); Directory Sales Management Corp. v. Ohio Bell Tel. Co., 833 F.2d 606, 611, (6th Cir. 1987) ("Copperweld precludes a finding that two wholly owned sibling corporations can combine" in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act); Hood v. Tenneco Texas Life Ins. Co., 739 F.2d 1012, 1015 (5th Cir. 1984) (if two siblings cannot conspire with their parent in violation of § 1, they cannot conspire with each other); Century Oil Tool v. Production Specialties, 737 F.2d 1316, 1317 (5th Cir. 1984) (finding [*25] no relevant difference between a corporation wholly owned by another corporation and two corporations wholly owned by a third corporation); but see Tunis Bros. Co. v. Ford Motor Co., 763 F.2d 1482, 1495, n.20 (3rd Cir. 1985), remanded on other grounds, 475 U.S. 1105, 106 S. Ct. 1509, 89 L. Ed. 2d 909 (1986) (parent corporation could conspire with 79% owned subsidiary.) Interpreting General Statutes § 35-28 in a manner consistent with the weight of this federal authority, the activities of UHG, UHC, and Oxford as specifically alleged here do not provide the concerted action of legally distinct entities operating without unified business interests sufficient for the application of the anti-boycott provision of § 35-28(d).

The court appreciates that in today's modern climate of ever expanding corporate conglomerates, any broad unity of interest analysis may create a "gap" in state antitrust protection for anti-competitive, conspiratorial conduct. Two responses address this concern. First, any rigid or formalistic approach to this issue should be eschewed because antitrust liability is not invariably or stringently controlled by the corporate garb or structure of the defendants" realities must [*26] dominate the judgment." Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., supra, 467 U.S. 774. Moreover, this court, as the Supreme Court did in Copperweld, [9] questions the true significance of any enforcement serve other legitimate interests. Especially in view of the increasing complexity of corporate operations, a business enterprise should be free to structure itself in ways that serve efficiency of control, [*23] economy of operations, and other factors dictated by business judgment without increasing its exposure to antitrust liability."

[8] See also, Chicago Prof. Sports v. Natl. Basketball Asso., 95 F.3d 593, 598 (7th Cir. 1996): "Copperweld does not hold that only conflict-free enterprises may be treated as single entities. Instead it asks why the antitrust laws distinguish between unilateral and concerted action, and then assigns a parent-subsidiary group to the 'unilateral' side in light of those functions. Like a single firm, the parent-subsidiary combination cooperates internally to increase efficiency. Conduct that 'deprives the marketplace of the independent centers of decision making that competition assumes' … without the efficiencies that come with integration inside a firm, go on the 'concerted' side of the line." (Citations omitted; internal quotation marks omitted.)

[9] In regard to § 1 of the Sherman Act, the Supreme Court in Copperweld expressed the following on this issue: "Although we recognize that any "gap" the Sherman Act leaves [in the antitrust regulation of concerted activity] is the sensible result of a purposeful policy decision by Congress, we also note that the size of any such gap is open to serious question. HN10[] Any anti-competitive activities of corporations and their wholly owned subsidiaries meriting antitrust remedies may be policed adequately without resort to an intra-enterprise conspiracy doctrine. A corporation's initial acquisition of control will always be subject to scrutiny under § 1 of the Sherman Act and § 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18. Thereafter, the enterprise is fully

"gap" in light of other remedies under the state's antitrust and tort laws governing the anti-competitive conduct of individual actors. See, e.g., General Statutes § 35-27. [10]

Thus, the motion to strike the tenth through twelfth counts is granted.

Antitrust Tying Claims

The seventh, eighth and ninth counts of the complaint are asserted against UHG, UHC, and Oxford, respectively. These counts allege that the defendants are jointly and severally liable for engaging in anti-competitive tying [11] in violation of the Connecticut Antitrust Act, General Statutes § 35-26. [12] "[A] HN12[] tying arrangement [is] an agreement by a party to sell one product but only on the condition that the buyer also purchases a different (or tied) product, or at least agrees that he will not purchase that product from any other supplier." Northern Pacific Railway Co. v. United States, 356 U.S. 1, 5-6, 78 S.Ct. 514, 518, 2 L.Ed.2d 545 (1958). [*28] The practice is made illegal by Section 3 of the Clayton Act [15 U.S.C. § 14; Connecticut General Statutes § 35-29] [13] if the product is a commodity, Tire Sales Corp. v. Cities Service Oil Corp., 410 F.Sup. 1222 (N.D.Ill. 1976); otherwise, it is a violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act [15 U.S.C. § 1; Connecticut General Statutes § 35-26]. Fortner Enterprises, Inc. v. United States Steel Corp., 394 U.S. 495, 89 S.Ct. 1252, 22 L.Ed.2d 495 (1969)." Bobbins Flooring, Inc. v. Federal Floors, Inc., 445 F. Supp. 4, 10 (E.D.Penn.).

HN14[] Similar to General Statutes § 35-28(d), § 35-26 is patterned after and is to be construed consistent with § 1 of the Sherman Act, and therefore, § 35-26 requires the concerted action of two or more persons. Shea v. First Federal Savings & Loan of New Haven, 184 Conn. 285, 305, 439 A.2d 997 (1981). Consequently, the plaintiffs' claims under § 35-26 fail because as previously discussed, the plaintiffs cannot establish concerted action between two legally distinct, economic entities. See generally, Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., supra, 467 U.S. 767; Shea v. First Federal Savings & Loan of New Haven, supra, 184 Conn. 305-6. In addition, the court agrees with the defendants that the plaintiffs [*30] have failed to allege facts sufficient to satisfy the basic elements of an illegal tying arrangement.

HN15[] The elements of a tying violation are described as follows: "First, there must be in fact a tying arrangement. Second, the seller must possess sufficient economic power with respect to the tying product to subject to § 2 of the Sherman Act and § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission [*27] act, 15 U.S.C. § 45." Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., supra, 467 U.S. 776-77.

[10] General Statutes § 35-27 HN11[] is patterned after § 2 of the Sherman Act. Shea v. First Fed. Savings & Loan of New Haven, 184 Conn. 285, 304, 439 A.2d 997 (1981). The settled law is that "[t]he conduct of a single firm is governed by § 2 [of the Sherman Act] alone and is unlawful only when it threatens actual monopolization." Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., supra, 467 U.S. 767. The plaintiffs have not made any claims under General Statutes § 35-27.

[11] "Tying is a form of marketing in which a seller insists on selling two distinct products or services as a package. A supermarket that will sell flour to consumers only if they will also buy sugar is engaged in tying. Flour is referred to as the tying product, sugar as the tied product." Jefferson Parish Hospital Dist. No. 2 v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 33, 104 S. Ct. 1551, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2 (1984). As the Supreme Court has explained, however, "there is nothing inherently anticompetitive about packaged sales." Id. at 25. "Only when consumers are forced to purchase a tied product with a tying product, due to a defendant's substantial market power in the tying product market, are [*29] the protections of the antitrust laws triggered." Michigan Monument Builders of North America v. Michigan Cemetery Assoc., 458 F. Supp. 2d 474 (E.D. Mich. Southern Div. 2006).

[12] Section 35-26 HN13[] provides that "Every contract, combination, or conspiracy in restraint of any part of trade or commerce is unlawful.

[13] Section § 35-29 is patterned after section 3 of the Clayton Act. State v. Hossan-Maxwell, Inc., 181 Conn. 655, 661, 436 A.2d 284 (1980).

restrain free competition appreciably for the tied product. Third, a substantial amount of commerce in the tied product must be restrained. In less demanding Clayton Act cases, plaintiff must only demonstrate the existence of a tying arrangement and either of the second or third elements to make out a violation. To establish a violation under the more stringent non-commodity Sherman Act, all three elements must be present." Times-Picayune Publishing Co. v. United States, 345 U.S. 594, 609-10, 73 S. Ct. 872, 881, 97 L. Ed. 1277 (1953).

Although the defendants argue that the plaintiffs fail to meet any of the elements necessary for a tying claim, the court limits its consideration to the plaintiffs' failure to assert facts sufficient to satisfy the first element--the existence of an unlawful tying arrangement.

The tying arrangement alleged in this case is "the unlawful effect of conditioning [*31] the physicians' purchase of or participation in the 'tying product' (a UHC participating provider agreement) upon their purchase of or participation in the 'tied product' (an Oxford participating provider agreement)." Complaint, P49, p. 29. Although the plaintiffs have alleged a "tying" arrangement in the very general sense that participation in the UHC network is being conditioned on participation in the Oxford network, the type of tying addressed by the antitrust statutes has a more narrow, long established meaning because "[i]t is clear … that not every refusal to sell two products separately can be said to restrain competition." Jefferson Parish Hosp. Dist. No. 2 v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 11, 104 S.Ct. 1551, 80 L.Ed.2d 2 (1984).

"HN16[] The common core of the adjudicated unlawful tying arrangements is the forced purchase of a second distinct commodity with the desired purchase of a dominant 'tying' product, resulting in economic harm to competition in the 'tied' market." Times-Picayune Publishing Co. v. United States, supra, 345 U.S. 614. Consequently, no cognizable cause of action under the antitrust laws for tying can be established in the absence of allegations demonstrating that the defendants [*32] "have foreclosed competition on the merits in a product market distinct from the market for the tying item." Jefferson Parish Hosp. Dist No. 2 v. Hyde, supra, 466 U.S. 22. "[A] tying arrangement cannot exist unless two separate product markets have been linked." Id., 20-21.

Therefore, the first question which must be addressed in determining whether an unlawful tying claim has been asserted under § 35-26 is whether two separate product or service markets are involved in the alleged tying arrangement. The allegations of the complaint clearly indicate that only one market is involved here. UHC and Oxford are both managed care organizations operating in the state of Connecticut market. Complaint P50 (because of the all products clause, the defendants "now maintain a significant portion of the applicable market for managed care organizations in the State of Connecticut); Complaint P51, pp. 30-31 ("[t]here are approximately five (5) other commercial managed care organizations in the State of Connecticut, the small number of which contributes to the appreciable market power that [the defendants] now maintain."). Despite other conclusory, generalized statements in the complaint to the contrary, [*33] UHC and Oxford offer contracts in this managed health care market that have different terms, but in this context, the "services" provided by these defendants in this market are legally indistinguishable.

Thus, the motion to strike the seventh through ninth counts is granted.

IV

Motion To Strike CUTPA Counts

The first through third counts of the complaint seek damages under CUTPA against UHG, UHC and Oxford, respectively, alleging that the amendment to the physician provider contracts constitutes an unfair trade practice. The defendants move to strike the CUTPA claims on the grounds that the plaintiffs lack standing to assert them, and even if they do have standing, the plaintiffs have failed to allege any unfair trade practice prohibited by CUTPA.

"HN17[] Standing is the legal right to set judicial machinery in motion. One cannot rightfully invoke the jurisdiction of the court unless he has, in an individual or representative capacity, some real interest in the cause of action …"

(Internal quotation marks omitted.) Ardmare Construction Co. v. Freedman, 191 Conn. 497, 501, 467 A.2d 674 (1983). HN18[] A person may file suit under CUTPA upon suffering "any ascertainable loss of money or property, real or [*34] personal, as a result of the use or employment of a method, act or practice prohibited by [General Statutes § 42-110b.]" Section 42-110b, in turn, states that "[n]o person shall engage in unfair methods of competition and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in the conduct of any trade or commerce." Finally, General Statutes § 42-110a provides the following definitions of essential terms used in the foregoing statutes.

> HN19[] As used in this chapter: (3) "Person" means a natural person, corporation, limited liability company, trust, partnership, incorporated or unincorporated association, and any other legal entity; (4) "Trade" and "commerce" means the advertising, the sale or rent or lease, the offering for sale or rent or lease, or the distribution of any services and any property, tangible or intangible, real, personal or mixed, and any other article, commodity, or thing of value in this state.

There is no dispute that the plaintiffs have neither a consumer nor competitor relationship with the defendants. Consequently, the defendants argue that the plaintiffs lack standing to assert a CUTPA claim because the plaintiffs do not "operate in the market for defendants' goods and services (i.e., [*35] the market for the sale of health insurance and/or health benefit plans) such that defendants' alleged conduct could fairly be alleged to affect competition [in] that marketplace." Memorandum of Law In Support of Defendants' Motion to Strike dated February 16, 2007, p. 18. The court rejects the defendants' argument as too narrowly defining the scope of CUTPA's remedial design.

HN20[] A plaintiff asserting a cause of action under CUTPA must have some consumer or business relationship with the defendant, as "it strains credulity to conclude that CUTPA is so formless as to provide redress to any person, for any ascertainable harm, cause by any person in the conduct of any "trade" or "commerce." Jackson v. R.G. Whipple, Inc., 225 Conn. 705, 725-26, 627 A.2d 374 (1993). In describing the business relationship necessary for a plaintiff to have standing to assert a CUTPA claim, the cases indicate that a business person must have a direct commercial relationship with the defendant, or some other relationship with the defendant in a commercial marketplace, so that a nexus exists between this relationship and an ascertainable loss caused by the defendant's unfair or deceptive practices. [*36] See, e.g., Connecticut Water Co. v. Town of Thomaston, Superior Court, judicial district of Hartford, Docket No. CV 94 0535590, (Nov. 25, 1996; Corradino, J.); "[A]t the very least, other business people, who are not direct competitors, must have some type of commercial relationship with the alleged wrongdoer--commercial relationship not being so much a business-to-business relationship but some kind of relationship in the marketplace so that the particular acts of wrongdoing alleged will interfere with fair and open competition in that particular marketplace." Accord, Mar v. WMX Technologies, Inc. et al., Superior Court, judicial district of Litchfield, Docket No. CV 96 0071542 (Nov. 6, 1998; Sheldon, J.); Nolfi v. Melson, Superior Court, judicial district of Fairfield at Bridgeport, Docket No. CV 00 0360876 (June 12, 2000; Moran, J.).

In this case, the plaintiffs have alleged a direct business relationship or involvement with UHC and Oxford and they have alleged injury emanating from this relationship sufficient to assert a claim under CUTPA. All the named plaintiffs explain that they had business contracts with UHC or both UHC and Oxford, and that the gravamen of their CUTPA complaint is that they all [*37] were "informed by letter from either UCH or Oxford that despite the fact that UHC and Oxford would continue to operate as separate companies, physicians would now have to become an Oxford provider if they were solely a UHC provider and vice versa. Any physician who did not agree to become a provider for both UHC and Oxford would have their provider agreement terminated." Complaint, P24. According to the complaint, the "all products clause" violates CUTPA because, inter alia, it is being imposed upon the plaintiffs in an "uneven playing field [of] bargaining power" and it operates to "deteriorate" the doctor-patient relationship. Complaint, P25. If accepted, the requirement operates to impose unreasonably high administrative fees and unreasonable low fee schedules, and if not accepted, a termination of both UHC and Oxford contracts occurs. On the basis of these claims, the argument by UHC and Oxford that the plaintiffs have not alleged a direct business relationship with them sufficient to establish standing under CUTPA is meritless.

The defendants next argue that the plaintiffs have failed to allege an unfair trade practice cognizable under CUTPA. Because the complaint alleges that [*38] the defendants are engaged in the business of insurance and are subject to CUIPA, the cases indicate that the plaintiffs must allege facts sufficient to state a claim under CUIPA in order to maintain a CUTPA claim. The Supreme Court expressed this point in both Lees v. Middlesex Ins. Co., 229 Conn. 842, 643 A.2d 1282 (1994) and Mead v. Burns, 199 Conn. 651, 509 A.2d 11 (1986), where the court held that HN21[] conduct which does not violate CUIPA does not constitute an unfair act or practice under CUTPA. Specifically in Lees, the supreme court held that "[b]ecause the plaintiffs evidence was insufficient to satisfy the requirement under CUIPA that the defendant's alleged unfair claim settlement practices constituted a 'general business practice,' the plaintiff's CUTPA claim could not survive the failure of her CUIPA claim." Id., 851. Accord, Nazami v. Patrons Mutual Insurance Co., 280 Conn. 619, 625, 910 A.2d 209 (2006) ("[i]n order to sustain a CUIPA cause of action under CUTPA, a plaintiff must allege conduct that is proscribed by CUIPA."); Anley v. Allstate Ins. Co., Superior Court, judicial district of Stamford-Norwalk at Stamford, Docket No. CV 98 0166413 (Jan. 9, 2002; D'Andrea, J.) [*39] ("one cannot maintain a CUTPA claim against an insurer absent an underlying CUIPA claim."); Delpier v. Connecticut Interlocal Risk Management Agency, Superior Court, judicial district of Waterbury, Docket No. CV 01 0164366 (Nov. 28, 2001; Pittman, J.) ("defendant correctly asserts that the plaintiff can only maintain a CUTPA count against an insurer if she alleges a violation of the standards of CUIPA"). To support their CUTPA claims, the plaintiffs allege violation of § 38a-816(4) of CUIPA. This provision states that an unfair method of competition and an unfair and deceptive action or practice in the business of insurance include: "[e]ntering into any agreement to commit, or by any concerted action committing, any act of boycott, coercion or intimidation resulting in or tending to result in unreasonable restraint of, or monopoly in, the business of insurance." General Statutes § 38a-816(4).

This provision HN22[] prohibits any agreement or concerted action monopolizing or unreasonably restraining the insurance business through boycott, coercion or intimidation. The defendants contend that because the plaintiffs' antitrust claims fail, this CUIPA claim must fail as well. The defendants, however, [*40] have not cited any authority to support this position. Indeed, neither the defendants nor the plaintiffs have cited any case law or even addressed in any specific way how this CUIPA provision should be interpreted or applied viz-a-viz the Connecticut antitrust statutes generally or more particularly viz-a-viz the two antitrust provisions asserted in this case--General Statutes § 35-26 and § 35-28(d). The court has not located any cases on these questions, which appear to raise issues of first impression.

The defendants surmise that because the language of the two statutes is identical, the CUIPA and antitrust provisions should be treated alike. However, a close examination reveals that the language of these provisions is similar, but not identical. A reasonable interpretation might be that the legislature intended to provide more expansive rather then mere co-extensive, anti-monopoly protection through this CUIPA provision than that provided by § 35-26 and § 35-28(d), but on this record, and with the parties not fully addressing the matter, the court declines to reach this issue.

Consequently, on the present record, the court cannot conclude that as a matter of law, the plaintiffs have [*41] failed to state a CUIPA claim cognizable under CUTPA, and the motion to strike counts two and three against UHC and Oxford is denied.

V

Motion To Strike CUIPA Counts

The fourth, fifth and sixth counts of the complaint are asserted against UHG, UHC, and Oxford, respectively. In each of these counts, the complaint alleges that these defendants individually and jointly committed "acts of boycott, coercion, and intimidation to force physicians to accept the inferior Oxford plan as a condition of continuing as a UHC provider" in violation of CUIPA, General Statutes § 38a-816(4). The defendants move to strike the CUIPA claims on the grounds that the allegations do not state a claim and that CUTPA does not provide for a private right of action. The court agrees with the defendants that CUIPA does not provide for a private right of action.

HN23[] Under CUIPA, the insurance commissioner is authorized to investigate CUIPA violations and institute administrative enforcement proceedings "[w]henever the commissioner has reason to believe that any such person has been engaged in or is engaging in … any unfair method of competition or any unfair or deceptive act or practice

…" General Statutes § 38a-817(a). [*42] No private right of action is provided under the statute. Therefore, the precise question at issue is whether such a private right of action should be implied. This question is somewhat academic because as just discussed, an action under CUTPA may be asserted for a CUIPA violation, and CUTPA allows recovery of actual damages, as well as attorney fees and punitive damages. Any relief provided by an implied cause of action under CUIPA would therefore be redundant, and most likely, less extensive.

Our appellate courts have not had the opportunity to squarely address whether a private cause of action exists under CUIPA. In Carford v. Empire Fire and Marine Insurance Co., 94 Conn.App. 41, 53, 891 A.2d 55 (2006), the appellate court decided that with certain exceptions, a right to assert a private cause of action for CUIPA violations through CUTPA does not extend to third parties, but the question whether CUIPA alone allows a private cause of action was not squarely presented, and therefore, was not reached. The court, however, did provide some guidance on this issue by noting that "it is the province of the legislature to create new rights and remedies contained within the highly regulated [*43] industry of insurance." The court also explained the following about the legislative history of CUIPA, suggesting that no private right of action should be implied:

> CUIPA is based on a legislative proposal in 1944 by the National Association of Insurance Commissioners (association), which Connecticut enacted in 1955. The model act was amended in 1971 to include a section regulating unfair claim settlement practices, and this state enacted these new provisions in 1973. The specific language of § 38a-816(6) is not enlightening, and the legislative history of the statute is silent as to a third party's right to bring a claim against an insurance company …
> In 1990, the association expressly considered for the first time whether the model act should allow a private cause of action and rejected the idea. The unequivocal rejection was accompanied by a drafting note, stating that a jurisdiction choosing to provide for a private cause of action should consider a different statutory scheme. This [claims settlement practices act] is inherently inconsistent with a private cause of action. This is merely a clarification of original intent and not indicative of any change in position.

(Citations omitted; [*44] internal quotation marks omitted.) Carford v. Empire Fire and Marine Insurance Co., supra, 94 Conn.App. 49-53.

The superior court decisions considering this question are split, with a majority of these decisions concluding that CUIPA alone does not provide for a private right of action. Compare Bragg v. New London County Mutual, Superior Court, judicial district of New London, Docket No. CV 05-4102853 (Oct. 31, 2006; Jones, J.) ; Starview Ventures, LLC v. Acadia Insurance, Superior Court, judicial district of New Haven, Docket No. CV 06 5003463 (Oct. 17, 2006; Skolnick, J.); Carter v. Cambridge Mutual Fire Ins. Co., Superior Court, judicial district of Hartford, Docket No. CV 03 0824460 (September 9, 2004; Shapiro, J.); Lee v. Scottsdale Ins. Co., Superior Court, judicial district of Fairfield at Bridgeport, Docket No. CV 98 350438 (February 8, 1999; Nadeau, J.) (not recognizing a private right of action); with Agency Rent A Car v. ITT Hartford, Superior Court, judicial district of Hartford New Britain at Hartford, Docket No. 93 053053 (Sept. 26, 1994; Corradino, J.); Polchlopek v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., judicial district of Hartford--New Britain at Hartford, Docket No. 93 0530360, 1994 Conn. Super. LEXIS 1448 (June 3, 1994; Hennessey, J.) [*45] ; Covino v. Jacovino, Superior Court, judicial district of Waterbury, Docket No. 107889, 1993 Conn. Super. LEXIS 1848 (July 20, 1993; Sullivan, J.) [9 Conn. L. Rptr. 377]; Sansone v. Esis, Inc., Superior Court, judicial district of New Haven, Docket No. 92 0327409, 1993 Conn. Super. LEXIS 111 (Jan. 4, 1993; Maiocco, J.) [8 Conn. L. Rptr. 171]; Sygiel v. Clifford, Ban & Loos, Insurance Agency, Superior Court, judicial district of New Haven, Docket No. 360149, 1995 Conn. Super. LEXIS 2193 (July 27, 1995; Licari, J.) [14 Conn. L. Rptr. 561] (recognizing a private right of action.).

The court concludes that on the basis of the specific statutory language and the overall statutory scheme, the cases holding that CUIPA alone does not authorize a private right of action present the more persuasive evaluation of this issue. Therefore, the defendants' motion to strike the fourth, fifth and sixth counts is granted.

VI

Motion To Strike Contract Counts

Breach of Express Contract Provisions

In the fourteenth count, the plaintiffs allege that UHC breached its obligations under the participating provider contract which requires, among other things, that UHC "respect and support the physician /patient relationship [while] adhering fairly to the contract for benefits [*46] it provides its customers; and to allow the physicians to make independent treatment decisions." Complaint, Fourteenth Count, P50. According to the complaint, the alleged breach of contract has had the effect of curtailing the time that these physicians can spend with their patients; Complaint, Fourteenth Count, P51; and has forced them to deal with Oxford when they otherwise would avoid that insurer because of associated administrative burdens. Complaint, Fourteenth Count, P52.

As noted by UHC, its contracts with the plaintiffs, as evidenced by the agreement attached as Exhibit A to the complaint, provide that UHC has the unilateral right to amend the contract, and if any such amendment creates a "material adverse change" in the agreement that is deemed unacceptable to the plaintiff providers, the plaintiffs have the right to terminate the contracts. [14] This fact is not addressed in the substance of the complaint. In response to the motion to strike, the plaintiffs fail to explain convincingly how UHC's exercise of its unrestricted right to amend the contract to impose the so-called all products clause violates any express provision of the contract. For example, the plaintiffs insist [*47] that the proposed amendment involving the all products clause conflicts with other provisions of the contract, by violating UHC's obligation "to respect and support the physician/patient relationship … and to allow the physicians to make independent treatment decisions." Complaint P50, p. 40. Nevertheless, to the extent that the proposed amendment imposing the all products clause constitutes a material change to the agreement, or even conflicts with other provisions of the agreement, no express violation of the contract has occurred because under the contract, UHC has the unilateral right to amend the agreement. This authority includes the right to make an amendment representing "a material adverse change to [the] agreement." Complaint, Exhibit A, p. 4; see n.14. In short, as to any express breach of contract claim, the plaintiffs have failed to explain how they can complain about an adverse, material amendment to the agreement when UHC is expressly authorized under the agreement to make such an amendment.

In their objection to the motion to strike, the plaintiffs also make the following argument. The right to terminate the agreements because of an unacceptable amendment belonged to the plaintiffs, not UHC. Consequently, according to the plaintiffs, the breach of contract count states a bona fide claim because UHC wrongly terminated the agreements itself in response to the plaintiffs' unwillingness to accept Oxford. [15] Such a claim must be supported by

[14] Exhibit A to the complaint under the heading "How long our agreement lasts; how it gets amended; and how it can end," states the following in pertinent part:

> Upon our execution of [*48] this agreement, you will receive a copy from us with the effective date noted on the signature page. It continues until one of us terminates it.
> We can amend this agreement or any of the appendices on 90 days' written or electronic notice by sending you a copy of the amendment. Your signature is not required to make the amendment effective. However, if you do not wish to continue your participation with our network as changed by an amendment that is not required by law or regulation but that includes a material adverse change to this agreement, then you may terminate this agreement on 60 days' written or electronic notice to us so long as you send this termination notice within 30 days of your receipt of the amendment.

[15] The court also notes the inaccuracy of the plaintiffs' unqualified statement that only the physicians had the right to terminate the contracts. The terms of the contracts indicate that either party has the right to terminate the agreements upon ninety days prior written notice to the other. See Complaint, Ex. A, p. 4 ("[u]pon our execution of this agreement … [i]t continues until one of us terminates it … In addition, either you or we can terminate this agreement, effective on an anniversary of the date this agreement begins, by providing 90 days written or electronic notice.").

allegations in the [*49] complaint before it can be considered on a motion to strike. Faulkner v. United Technologies Corp., supra, 240 Conn. 580; accord, Cayer v. Western Connecticut State University, Superior Court, judicial district of Hartford, Docket No. CV 04 4001958 (Feb. 16, 2005; Shapiro, J.) (on a motion to strike, trial court may not consider additional allegations by the plaintiff in his response to the motion).

None of the named plaintiffs specifically claim that UHC actually terminated their contracts, except possibly Dr. Austrian (if the complaint is read broadly). See Complaint, P31, p. 10. However, even as to Dr. Austrian, [*50] the express terms of the contract require him to accept the amendment regarding Oxford unless he terminates the agreement. Consequently, as a matter of law, the alleged termination by UHC would have no legal significance (i.e., would not be a proximate cause to any harm to Dr. Austrian) unless he also claims that he would not have terminated the contract himself and would have accepted Oxford. The complaint makes no such claim. HN24[] A complaint must allege facts sufficient to satisfy all the elements of the purported cause of action, and HN25[] a breach of contract for which no injury is alleged fails to state a legally compensable claim. See generally, Rosato v. Mascardo, 82 Conn.App. 396, 410-11, 844 A.2d 893 (2004) ("[t]he elements of a breach of contract action are the formation of an agreement, performance by one party, breach of the agreement by the other party and damages."). For similar reasons, the case relied on by the plaintiffs, Martin v. Kavanewsky, 157 Conn. 514, 255 A.2d 619 (1969), involving a quantum meruit claim based on a defendant's anticipatory breach of a contract, is distinguishable and inapposite. The plaintiffs' complaint makes an express breach of contract claim and does [*51] not assert a claim based on quantum meruit, an equitable claim applied to avoid unjust enrichment. [16]

Breach of Implied Covenant of Good Faith and Fair Dealing

The fifteenth count of the complaint alleges a breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing against UHC. The doctrine of implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing has been frequently described.

> [I]t is axiomatic that HN27[] the duty of good faith and fair dealing is a covenant implied into a contract or a contractual relationship. In other words, every contract carries an implied duty requiring that neither party do anything that will injure the right of the other to receive the benefits of the agreement. [*52] The covenant of good faith and fair dealing presupposes that the terms and purpose of the contract are agreed upon by the parties and that what is in dispute is a party's discretionary application or interpretation of a contract term. To constitute a breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, the acts by which a defendant allegedly impedes the plaintiff's right to receive benefits that he or she reasonably expected to receive under the contract must have been taken in bad faith. Bad faith has been defined in our jurisprudence in various ways. Bad faith in general implies both actual or constructive fraud, or a design to mislead or deceive another, or a neglect or refusal to fulfill some duty or some contractual obligation, not prompted by an honest mistake as to one's rights or duties, but by some interested or sinister motive. Bad faith means more than mere negligence; it involves a dishonest purpose. Bad faith may be overt or may consist of inaction, and it may include evasion of the spirit of the bargain.

(Citations omitted; internal quotation marks omitted.) Landry v. Spitz, 102 Conn.App. 34, 42-3, 925 A.2d 334 (2007).

"[A]n HN28[] action for breach of the covenant of good faith and [*53] fair dealing requires proof of three essential elements, which the plaintiff must duly plead: first, that the plaintiff and the defendant were parties to a contract under which the plaintiff reasonably expected to receive certain benefits; second, that the defendant

[16] To further support their claim that UHC breached an express provision of the provider agreements, the plaintiffs also emphasize that the agreements are adhesion contracts. However, HN26[] there is no per se prohibition against adhesion contracts; see generally, Aetna Casualty & Surety Co. v. Murphy, 206 Conn. 409, 416-18, 538 A.2d 219 (1988) (observing that insurance policies, generally, are contracts of adhesion); and the "adhesive" nature of a contract, without more, does not render a contract invalid or unenforceable.

engaged in conduct that injured the plaintiff's right to receive some or all of those benefits; and third, that when committing the acts by which it injured the plaintiff's right to receive benefits it reasonably expected to receive under the contract, the defendant was acting in bad faith." Ruiz v. Dunbar Armored, Inc., Superior Court, judicial district of Fairfield, Docket No. CV 03 0404213 (July 19, 2005; Hiller, J.).

UHC moves to strike the fifteenth count alleging breach of the implied covenant of good faith on two grounds. The defendant first argues that the plaintiffs' claim that the all products clause breaches the covenant of good faith is inconsistent with the express provision of the contracts that give UHC the unrestricted, unilateral right to make material amendments to the agreements. See generally, Southbridge Assocs., L.L.C. v. Garofalo, 53 Conn. App. 11, 17, 728 A.2d 1114 (1999) (as a general rule, HN29[] the breach of the [*54] implied covenant of good faith is a principle that "cannot be applied to achieve a result contrary to the clearly expressed terms of a contract.") UHC's second argument is that the plaintiffs have not sufficiently pleaded that UHC acted in bad faith. Although UHC's motion presents a close question, the court concludes that at this stage of the proceedings and on these pleadings, UHC's motion to strike the fifteenth count must be denied.

Although the court has concluded that the plaintiffs have not stated a cause of action based on an express breach of the agreements, no such finding is necessary to support a claim for breach of the implied covenant of good faith. Landry v. Spitz, supra, 102 Conn.App. 46-7. Similarly, contrary to UHC's position, the plaintiffs' implied covenant claim does not find its primary premise on UHC's contractual right to amend the agreements. The focus of the issue concerns the manner in which this right has been exercised. As previously stated, "[t]he covenant of good faith and fair dealing presupposes that the terms and purpose of the contract are agreed upon by the parties and that what is in dispute is a party's discretionary application … of a contract [*55] term." Landry v. Spitz, supra, 102 Conn.App. 42. As applied here, there is no question that under the terms of the agreement, UHC has the right to amend the contracts, but the dispositive issue is whether this right was exercised in such an unreasonable, oppressive, or onerous way that it represents a bad faith deprivation of the physicians' reasonable expectations under the agreements.

The plaintiffs allege that they expected to receive timely and efficient services, reasonable and prompt reimbursement for medical services provided to patients, respect for the physician/patient relationship, and the right to make independent health decisions; Complaint, Fifteenth Count, P49; and those expectations have been defeated by the coerced acceptance of Oxford insureds by way of the all products clause. They allege that forcing them to accept Oxford and consequently treat patients whom they otherwise would not choose to treat curtails the time they can spend with their other patients, which is contrary to UHC's obligation to respect the physician/patient relationship. Complaint, Fifteenth Count, P51. They further assert that UHC has acted in bad faith by the "take it or leave it" nature of [*56] the proposed contract amendment.

Additionally, the reasonableness of UHC's conduct must be considered in the specific context of the alleged circumstances. The plaintiffs were not presented with contracts containing the all products clause in the first instance and faced with a decision whether to accept or reject affiliation with UHC. The plaintiffs were presented with this clause after they had agreed to become UHC providers and after UHC patients comprised a significant percentage of their medical practices. According to the complaint, the plaintiffs' ability to continue to practice medicine effectively and to earn a living was put at stake by the defendant's actions.

Furthermore, as previously stated, the complaint expressly alleges the unilateral, unnegotiable "take it or leave it" nature of UHC's conduct, made under circumstances in which the physicians were without equal bargaining power. Complaint, P25. Thus, in evaluating the reasonableness of UHC's actions, the "adhesive" nature of these contracts is indeed a relevant consideration. An essential feature of an adhesion contract is that it is not subject to negotiation and is imposed on a "take it or leave it" basis upon a party [*57] having little or no bargaining power. See Brown v. Soh, 280 Conn. 494, 504-5, 909 A.2d 43 (2006).

Lastly, contrary to the UHC's position, and on this record, the plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged bad faith because "bad faith may include one party's performance or interpretation of the contract in a manner that evades its spirit and is unfaithful to its purpose, resulting in a denial of the justified expectations of the other party." Landry v. Spitz, supra, 102 Conn.App. 48.

Therefore, UHC's motion to strike the fifteenth count of the complaint is denied.

VII

Motion To Strike Declaratory Judgment Count

The plaintiffs in the thirteenth count of their complaint seek a judgment against UHC and Oxford pursuant to Practice Book § 17-55, declaring that UHC and Oxford be required to keep their approvals offices open for 24 hours a day, seven days a week, and that UHC and Oxford endeavor to reduce hold times on their approval lines to a maximum of ten minutes.

HN30[] The conditions for a declaratory judgment under Practice Book § 17-55 are that the plaintiffs: (1) have an interest by reason of danger of loss or of uncertainty as to their rights; (2) there is an actual bona fide and substantial issue [*58] in dispute and substantial uncertainty of legal relations requiring settlement between the parties; and (3) there is not another proceeding that provides them with immediate redress. UHC and Oxford move to strike the thirteenth count arguing that the subject matter of the plaintiffs' concerns is expressly addressed by statute, and therefore, no judicial "declaration" is required. The court agrees.

General Statutes § 38a-226c(a)(8) addresses the requirement that pre-certification review staff must be available forty hours per week during normal business hours. General Statutes § 38a-226c(e) provides the statutory procedure for an attending physician to transmit an expedited review request upon a covered patient's admission to an acute care hospital. There is no need for the court to "declare" rights that are expressed by statute. In short, the plaintiffs fail to allege facts demonstrating the existence of a substantial controversy or uncertainty of legal relations requiring settlement between the parties.

Moreover, any ruling by the court that the defendants should "endeavor" to limit to ten minutes the amount of time that they place the plaintiffs on hold would be too ephemeral, commenting [*59] more on the defendants' telephone etiquette than providing substantive relief, and as such it would be an advisory opinion, adjudicating nothing and binding on no one.

For these reasons, the motion to strike the thirteenth count is granted.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the defendants' motion to strike the plaintiffs' revised first amended class action complaint is denied as to the Second Count and the Third Count against the defendants United HealthCare Insurance Company, Oxford Health Plans (CT), Inc., and Oxford Health Insurance, Inc., alleging violation of the Connecticut Unfair Trade Practices Act.

The motion to strike is further denied as to the Fifteenth Count against the defendant United HealthCare Insurance Company, alleging breach of the implied duty of good faith and fair dealing.

The motion to strike is granted as to counts one and counts four through fourteen.

Within twenty (20) days, the plaintiffs may file a new pleading, and in the absence of such a filing, the defendants shall move, within twenty (20) days thereafter, for judgment in accordance with this decision. See Practice Book § 10-44.

A status conference is hereby scheduled in this case for Monday, September [*60] 10, 2007, at 10:00 a.m.

So ordered this 16th day of July 2007.

ORDER

On October 23, 2006, the court granted partial summary judgment in favor of Defendant Respironics, Inc. ("Defendant" or "Respironics"). [1] (Order, ECF No. 80.) Now pending before the court are Plaintiff Invacare Corporation's ("Plaintiff" or "Invacare") Motion for Reconsideration (ECF No. 82) and the parties' Joint Motion for Scheduling a Status Conference (ECF No. 103). Specifically, Plaintiff seeks reconsideration of the court's grant of summary judgment for Defendant on Plaintiff's monopolization, attempted monopolization, and price [*2] discrimination claims. For the reasons stated below, Plaintiff's Motion for Reconsideration (ECF No. 82) is denied and the parties' request for a status conference (ECF No. 103) is denied as moot.

[1] The pertinent facts are fully detailed in the court's Order dated October 23, 2006. (Order, ECF No. 80.)

I. RECONSIDERATION STANDARD

The court notes that it has the authority to reconsider its Order. Motions to reconsider may be treated as motions to alter/amend judgment under 59(e) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Huff v. Metro. Life Ins. Co., 675 F.2d 119, 122 (6th Cir. 1982). Rule 59(e) motions may be granted if there is: (1) a clear error of law; (2) newly discovered evidence; (3) an intervening change in controlling law; or (4) to prevent manifest injustice. E.g., Gencorp, Inc. v. American Int'l Underwriters, 178 F.3d 804, 834 (6th Cir. 1999).

Although it has authority to do so, a court will only reconsider its prior ruling in rare and unusual circumstances:

> Although 'motions to reconsider are not ill-founded step-children of the federal court's procedural arsenal,' they are 'extraordinary in nature and, because they run contrary to notions of finality and repose, should be discouraged.' [*3] In re August, 1993 Regular Grand Jury, 854 F. Supp. 1403, 1406 (S.D. Ind. 1994). To be sure, 'a court can always take a second look at a prior decision; but 'it need not and should not do so in the vast majority of instances,' especially where such motions 'merely restyle or re-hash the initial issues.' Id. at 1407. It is not the function of a motion to reconsider either to renew arguments already considered and rejected by a court or 'to proffer a new legal theory or new evidence to support a prior argument when the legal theory or argument could, with due diligence, have been discovered and offered during the initial consideration of the issue.' Id. at 1408. Where, as is the case with much of the instant motion, 'defendant views the law in a light contrary to that of this Court,' its 'proper recourse' is not by way of a motion for reconsideration 'but appeal to the Sixth Circuit.' Dana Corp. v. United States, 764 F. Supp. 482, 489 (N.D. Ohio 1991).

McConocha v. Blue Cross and Blue Shield Mut. of Ohio, 930 F. Supp. 1182, 1184 (N.D. Ohio 1996). Motions to reconsider are "not designed to give an unhappy litigant an opportunity to relitigate matters already decided, nor is it a substitute [*4] for an appeal." Sherwood v. Royal Ins. Co. of Am., 290 F. Supp. 2d 856, 858 (N.D. Ohio 2003).

III. LAW AND ANALYSIS

In its Motion for Reconsideration, Plaintiff argues only that the court has made a clear error in its current holding -- not that any controlling law has changed, or that any new evidence has been discovered, or that the holding creates a manifest injustice.

As stated in the court's previous Order, claims of monopolization, attempted monopolization, and price discrimination "each require some proof of anticompetitive conduct within a relevant market." (Order, ECF No. 80, at 7.) In the instant case, the court defined the relevant product market as all masks sold to both sleep labs and DMEs in the United States, despite Plaintiff's attempt to narrow the relevant mask market to masks sold to sleep labs. (Id. at 8-13.) Next, the court analyzed the two types of anticompetitive conduct that Plaintiff alleged in its Complaint: predatory pricing and product bundling. In its Motion, Plaintiff seeks reconsideration in regard to predatory pricing only. (Pl.'s Mot. for Recons. at 1, n.1.)

There are two requirements for a predatory pricing claim: (1) "that the prices complained of are [*5] below an appropriate measure of its rival's costs;" and (2) "a demonstration that the competitor has a reasonable prospect, or . . . a dangerous probability, of recouping its investment in below-cost prices." Brooke Group Ltd. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., 509 U.S. 209, 222, 224, 113 S. Ct. 2578, 125 L. Ed. 2d 168 (1993). In its previous Order, the court found that Plaintiff's claims failed to satisfy the first element, so the court did not reach the second element. (Order, ECF No. 80, at 18); see United States v. AMR Corp., 335 F.3d 1109, 1121 (10th Cir. 2003).

It is undisputed that Plaintiff's monopolization, attempted monopolization, and price discrimination claims are based on Defendant's "below-cost sales to sleep labs." (Pl.'s Mot. for Recons. at 8; Pl.'s Opp'n to Def.'s Mot. for Summ. J. 21, ECF No. 63.) Plaintiff argued at the summary judgment stage, and continues to argue on reconsideration, that it need only prove that certain isolated prices ("the prices complained of"), rather than Defendant's overall costs in the relevant market, are below cost. The court disagrees, finding that Plaintiff has submitted no authority that has employed this interpretation and, further, that Plaintiff's reading would abrogate [*6] the well-settled importance of defining a relevant market.

The court finds that Plaintiff's position ignores the well-settled principle that defining a relevant market is a prerequisite to succeeding on a monopolization, attempted monopolization, or price discrimination claim. E.g., Spectrum Sports v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447, 455, 113 S. Ct. 884, 122 L. Ed. 2d 247 (1993) ("[T]he plaintiff charging attempted monopolization must prove a dangerous probability of actual monopolization, which has generally required a definition of the relevant market and examination of market power."); Walker Process Equipment, Inc. v. Food Machinery & Chemical Corp., 382 U.S. 172, 177, 86 S. Ct. 347, 15 L. Ed. 2d 247 (1965) ("Without a definition of [the] market there is no way to measure [the defendant's] ability to lessen or destroy competition."); Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 324, 82 S. Ct. 1502, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510 & n.41 (1962) (citing United States v. E.I. Du Pont de Nemours & Co., 353 U.S. 586, 593, 77 S. Ct. 872, 1 L. Ed. 2d 1057 (1957)). If the anticompetitive conduct need not relate to the relevant market, then there would arguably be no need to determine a relevant market. Thus, Plaintiff's position flies in the face of settled antitrust law principles.

Plaintiff relies on the precise phrasing "prices complained [*7] of" in Brooke Group and "different purchasers" in the Robinson-Patman Act, as well as similar language in other case and statutory law, to support its argument that a predatory pricing claim can be based on an injury that occurred in an area less than the relevant market. However, none of the authority that Plaintiff cites employs an analysis favorable to Plaintiff. First, although Brooke Group used the "prices complained of" phrase, it also characterized the "essence" of a predatory price claim or price discrimination claim [2] as where "[a] business rival has priced its products in an unfair manner with an object to eliminate or retard competition and thereby gain and exercise control over prices in the relevant market." Brooke Group, 509 U.S. at 222 (emphasis added). The Sixth Circuit has stated, in a case admittedly prior to Brooke Group, that "to demonstrate predatory pricing [plaintiff] would have to show that the Defendants' overall charges . . . are priced below cost." Directory Sales Mgmt. Corp. v. Ohio Bell Tel. Co., 833 F.2d 606, 614 (6th Cir. 1987) (emphasis added). The Sixth Circuit recently affirmed this position by stating:

> We adopt the principle of Brooke Group that where [*8] reasonable economic proof justifies a relevant market, the appropriate measure of costs for a predatory pricing claim is for the particular good or service in that market . . . .
> Other Circuits have determined the appropriate measure of cost for predatory pricing claims to be the average variable cost of the product or service in the relevant market.

Spirit Airlines, Inc. v. Northwest Airlines, Inc., 431 F.3d 917, 946 (6th Cir. 2005) (emphasis added) (rejecting idea of including all products or services that the defendant provides). As such, the principle that a predatory pricing claim requires analysis of the pricing in the entire relevant market appears quite clear.

Furthermore, the cases cited by Plaintiff for the contrary position are distinguishable. Some were decided on other grounds, without analyzing the price discrimination test, thereby rendering the quoted language dicta. E.g., Mathias v. Daily News, L.P., 152 F. Supp. 2d 465 (S.D.N.Y. 2001) [*9] (dismissing primary-line price discrimination claim because plaintiff failed to plead the required elements); Bailey v. Allgas, Inc., 148 F. Supp. 2d 1222 (D. Ala. 2000) (granting summary judgment for defendants because plaintiffs failed to establish the relevant geographic market). In fact, even Brooke Group was decided on the second element of the predatory price test, recoupment, and did not discuss the first element at issue here. Other cases involved secondary-line price discrimination claims, in which a seller's customer alleges that the seller is discriminating among purchasers, unlike the instant case, in which the seller's competitor alleges discrimination. E.g., Hoover Color Corp. v. Bayer Corp., 199 F.3d 160 (4th Cir. 1999); Lewis v. Philip Morris, Inc., 355 F.3d 515, 520 (6th Cir. 2004).

[2] As the court noted in its Order dated October 23, 2006, the Supreme Court has held that a price discrimination claim under the Clayton Act should be treated the same as a predatory pricing claim under the Sherman Act. Brooke Group, 509 U.S. at 221-22; (Order, ECF No. 80, at 14 n.3.)

The court also notes that, as support for its opposition to the reconsideration motion, Defendant submitted supplemental authority in the form of a recent Supreme Court case, Weyerhaeuser Co. v. Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co., 127 S. Ct. 1069, 166 L. Ed. 2d 911 (2007). (See Def.'s Mot. for Leave to File Not. of Supplemental Authority, ECF No. 92.) However, as the issue before the Weyerhaeuser Court was "whether [*10] the standard governing predatory pricing claims also governs predatory bidding claims," and as the Court's discussion centered on "relevant input markets" and "relevant output markets," which are not present here, the court finds that Weyerhaeuser does not clearly and unequivocally address the issue before the court in the instant case.

Therefore, the court finds that Plaintiff has failed to show clear error on the part of the court with regard to its prior decision granting summary judgment for Defendant on Plaintiff's monopolization, attempted monopolization, and price discrimination claims. As such, the court hereby denies Plaintiff's Motion for Reconsideration (ECF No. 82).

IV. REQUEST FOR STATUS CONFERENCE

On June 14, 2007, the parties jointly requested a status conference to receive guidance on whether to stay discovery on any remaining issues and to schedule pre-trial dates. (ECF No. 103.) As the court has now denied Plaintiff's Motion for Reconsideration, only Plaintiff's claims under Section 1 of the Sherman Act and Ohio's Valentine Act remain. (See Order, ECF No. 80, at 29; Order, ECF No. 90.) As indicated in their request for a status conference, the parties have completed [*11] discovery on these issues. (ECF No. 103, P 1.) Consequently, no more discovery shall be conducted.

In light of the within ruling regarding reconsideration, the parties' request for a status conference is denied as moot.

V. CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated above, Plaintiff's Motion for Reconsideration (ECF No. 82) is hereby denied and the parties' Joint Motion for Scheduling a Status Conference (ECF No. 103) is denied as moot. The court further notes that Defendant's Motion for Summary Judgment (ECF No. 94) remains under consideration.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

Order Granting Class Plaintiffs' Motion For Class Certification Pursuant To FED. R. CIV. P. 23

THIS MATTER comes before the Court on: 1) Class Plaintiffs' Motion To Certify Class pursuant to Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and all related memoranda and exhibits submitted in support and in opposition thereto. (Documents ## 219, 264-75, 281, 314, 325, 369-371, 383, 395, 415, 422, 428, 434-36, 492, 494-95)

I. Background & Procedural History

This action arises out of allegations by Plaintiffs [1] that between April 1999, and continuing through July 31, 2001, Defendants and their co-conspirators agreed, combined and conspired with each other to fix, raise, [*6] maintain and / or stabilize the price of polyester staple and to allocate markets and / or customers for the sale of polyester staple in the United States. (Consol. Am. Cl. Action Compl. at 2.) [2] Plaintiffs collectively allege that as a result of Defendants' unlawful conduct and conspiracy, Plaintiffs paid artificially inflated prices for polyester staple. Plaintiffs assert that Defendants violated Sections 4 and 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 15 and 26, and Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §1. Plaintiffs seek injunctive relief and recovery of treble damages and the costs of this suit, including reasonable attorneys' fees.

Plaintiffs seek to proceed as a class pursuant to Rule 23(a) and (b)(3) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. [*7] The plaintiff class proposed for certification is:

> "All individuals or entities (excluding governmental entities, Defendants, and their parents, predecessors, subsidiaries, affiliates, and their co-conspirators) who purchased Polyester Staple in the United States directly from any of the Defendants or their co-conspirators or any predecessor, subsidiary or affiliate of each, at any time during the period from April 1, 1999 to July 31, 2001."

(Class Compl., P37)

With the exception of Arteva Specialties, S.a r.l, d/b/a KoSa, now named INVISTA S.a.r.l. and Arteva Services, S.a r.l, (hereinafter "Arteva" or "Arteva / KoSa"), all of the Defendants originally named within the Consolidated Amended Class Action Complaint entered into settlement agreements with the Plaintiffs and obtained court approval of the agreements pursuant to Rule 23(e). [3] During 2005 Arteva settled with the various entities (approximately 37) that either prosecuted individual actions against Arteva or hired independent counsel to represent their interests related to this litigation. (Egge Decl., PP5-7) Most of these Non-Class Plaintiffs were relatively large textile (also called fine denier) customers who purchased polyester [*8] staple fiber for use in woven textile products, although there were also some carpet manufacturers and nonwoven purchasers within this group.

[1] For purposes of this Memorandum and Order, "Plaintiffs" refers to the named class representatives and the putative members of the proposed class as opposed to any individual or non-class plaintiff that elected to pursue its own lawsuit within these consolidated proceedings.

[2] Plaintiffs' complaint is entitled, "Consolidated Amended Class Action Complaint." For convenience, the Court will refer to the pleading as "Class Compl." within the instant Memorandum and Order.

[3] The original Defendants included: the Nan Ya Defendants -- Nan Ya Plastics Corporation ("Nan Ya Taiwan"), Nan Ya Plastics Corporation, America a/k/a Nan Ya Plastics Corporation USA ("Nan Ya America"), and Robert Bradley Dutton; Wellman, Inc. ("Wellman"); the Arteva or Arteva / Kosa Defendants -- Arteva Specialties, S.a.r.l. d/b/a KoSa ("KoSa"), Arteva Specialties LLC ("Arteva"), Arteva Services S.a.r.l. ("Arteva Services"), Arteva Services LLC, Koch Industries, Inc. ("Koch"), IMASAB S.A. de C.V. ("IMSAB"), and Troy F. Stanley; and the DAK Defendants -- E.I. DuPont de Nemours and Co., ("DuPont"), DAK Americas LLC ("DAK"), DAK Fibers LLC, f/k/a DuPont-Akra Polyester ("DuPont-Akra"), and Alpek S.A. de C.V. ("Alpek").

(Beyer Dep. at 77; Egge Decl., Exh. A) According to Plaintiffs, there are hundreds of customers that have not been compensated and remain a part of the putative class. (2-15-06 Hr'g Tr. at 192-93.) [4]

The Court heard oral argument from [*9] counsel for the parties on February 15, 2006. Since the 2006 hearing, the parties have submitted voluminous supplemental filings related to certification (as recently as December 2006), including expert reports, rebuttal, and trial reports. The parties have also submitted cross-motions for partial summary judgment. [5] This matter is now ripe for disposition by the Court.

II. Factual Findings

A. The Polyester Staple Fiber ("PSF") Industry

Polyester Fiber is defined as a "man-made, synthetic polymer fiber derived from polyethylene terephthalate and composed of linear macromolecules having [*10] in the chain at least 85% by mass of an ester of diol and terephthalic acid." (Class Compl., P43) For purposes of these consolidated actions, polyester staple is defined as "[A]ny Polyester Fiber cut to specific and relatively limited but spinnable lengths (generally 0.5 to 4-6 inches)." (Class Compl., P44)

Within the polyester staple fiber ("PSF") industry, there are different types of polyester staple fiber customers and an even greater number of products manufactured using PSF. (Class Compl., P48) PSF is used 1) as fiberfill in pillows, mattresses, furniture cushions, comforters, jackets, and sleeping bags; 2) as spinnable fiber for use in both woven and nonwoven applications; [7] and 3) in the manufacture of carpets. [8] Between 1998 and 2001, 53.6% of polyester staple fiber was used in the manufacture of textiles, 21.7% was used in the manufacture of fiberfill, 13.2% in the manufacture of nonwovens, and 11.5% in the manufacture of carpets. (Beyer's Trial Rpt., P10) (explaining that these figures are based upon the average annual U.S. consumption of domestic-made polyester staple fiber).

The characteristics of PSF determine the end use to which it is put. Some of the characteristics of PSF include denier (thickness and weight of the fiber), cut length, cross-sectional shape, tenacity (strength), dyeability, pilling performance (the tendency of fibers to accumulate on a fabric's surface), elongation, shrinkage, and spinning compatibility. (Latten Decl., P5 n. 1, [*12] Rust Trial Rpt., P32) Arteva suggests the following general categories: "fine denier staple, nonwoven / industrial staple (including fiberfill), and floor coverings." [9] (Latten Decl., P6) It is

[4] All other references to the February 15, 2006 hearing transcript will be cited as "Hr'g Tr. at **.")

[5] Arteva moves for summary judgment against all of the class representatives except Thomaston Mills. Both sides move for summary judgment based upon their theories regarding the scope of the conspiracy. Except for the issues addressed herein, the Court's decision on summary judgment will be issued in a separate Order following notice to the putative class and expiration of the "opt-out" period.

[6] The Court begins with a description of the product and industry at the heart of the litigation. See DeLoach, 206 F.R.D. at 553 ("The debate over class certification centers on the nature of the tobacco industry.")

[7] A woven fiber is used in textile applications to manufacture sheets, apparel, home furnishings, [*11] towels, industrial fabric. A nonwoven fiber is a "fabric-like" fiber that does not have interlocking continuous fiber strands. A nonwoven may be used to manufacture home furnishings, fabrics used in medical and personal care applications, and automotive and industrial fabrics. Knits also fall into the category of spinnable fiber. Knits are used to manufacture apparel used in sweats, tees, turtlenecks, jerseys and golf shirts.

[8] PSF of 3 denier and above (primarily in the 6 to 8 and 14 to 16 denier ranges) and measuring 1 to 5 inches in length are used as fiber-fill and insulating material. Fiber that is less than 3 denier is spun into yarns and then knit or woven into manufactured textile and apparel products. Fiber of 10 to 18 denier and 6 to 8 inches in length is generally used in the manufacture of carpets.

undisputed that "PSF products designed for end use in one of these customer categories generally are not suitable for use in other categories." (Latten Decl., P6; Rust Trial Rpt., P54) For example, a highloft product (e.g., fiberfill) would not be interchangeable with a fine denier staple product. (White Dep., at 64-65, 358-361.)

Polyester staple fiber is discussed in terms of being "commodity" or "specialty." Most PSF is considered commodity-like, which means [*13] that the price is one of the most important criteria for a purchaser in choosing between producers of PSF. [10] (Beyer Aff., PP31, 34; Hollander Dep. at 53; Habasit Dep. at 68-69; Thomaston Dep. at 124-125; Tex Tech. Dep. at 101; Fiber Dynamics Dep. at 62-63, 65.) That is not to say that price is the only criteria considered by purchasers. In some instances, the performance of the product for its intended use, or the specific characteristics of the fiber, may be more important than the price. (Habasit Dep. at 103; Hollander Dep. at 145-49, 161-162; Fiber Dynamics Dep. at 22-23; HDK Industries Dep. at 31-32; Carpenter Dep. at 131-132, 143-144; Quality Felt Dep. at 69-70.) Occasionally, a brand name PSF is selected even though the brand carries a higher price. (Carpenter Dep. at 74-76 ("[p]robably close to 100 percent" of its PSF purchases from DuPont were dictated by customer requests that DuPont-branded PSF be used even though the same product type was available at a less expensive price from KoSa); Quality Felt Dep. at 74-75.) [11]

"Specialty" fibers are those which are "not so easily duplicated" and not typically produced on a large scale by commodity PSF manufacturers. (Rust Trial Rpt., P43; Beyer Aff, P37) According to Dr. Rust, true specialty PSF products are rare because many alleged specialty products eventually become commodity products. (Rust Trial Rpt, PP43, 45) (citing Arteva and Wellman internal documents commenting on the fact that "specialties" have or will become "commodities"). During the class period, there was a movement on the part of alleged co-conspirators to "redefine" [*15] their respective commodity PSF products as "specialty" PSF products so that a premium price could be charged. (Beyer Aff., PP36, 37)

Regardless of the end use, both commodity and specialty PSF begin with the same raw materials, namely, at least 85% polyethyleneterephthalate. [12] (Rust Trial Rpt., PP12a-c, 17) Similarly, most categories of polyester staple fiber are produced on the same basic type of production line. [13] (Rust Trial Rpt., P19) For example, Arteva manufactured

9 Referring to PSF categories in this manner can be misleading. According to Jeffrey Hollander, who purchases 100% of the polyester staple for fill, fiberfill is made by "taking polyester staple fiber, processing it so that way it's opened up, carded out, combed out, to become as fluffy as possible . . . ." (Hollander Dep. at 67.) Thus, a nonwoven PSF such as a PSF purchased for fill is processed or prepared for that purpose by the direct purchaser - not the PSF manufacturer. The same is true with respect to the other end use PSF categories.

10 Arteva concedes, "There are particular kinds of textile fibers, carpet fibers, and nonwovens[sic] fibers than[sic] can fairly be considered commodities." [*14] (Def.'s Mem. In Opp'n at 48.) Counsel for Arteva describes the "Individually Represented Putative Class Members" as "purchasers of commodity textile PSF products." (Egge Decl., PP5, 6) The characterization of PSF as a commodity is also utilized by other polyester staple manufacturers, Defendants' customers, and trade publications. (Class Pl.s' Exhs. 49, 52)

11 The Carpenter representative testified later that other branded programs were generally unsuccessful. (Carpenter Dep. at 87.) This testimony is consistent with Dr. Beyer's opinion that brand names in the PSF industry generally did not affect purchasing. (Beyer Aff., P32)

12 In 2000, Richard Osman, Director of Arteva's New Business Development for Fibers, testified under oath that "Polyester fiber can be made from a variety of inputs with one very important qualification. These inputs are all ultimately derived from the same raw materials, teraphalic acid and ethylene glycol, no matter what their life history might have been . . . The end use product is not distinguished by the end user based on the inputs used in its production." (See ITC March 28, 2000 Hr'g / Decision, at 18-20.)

13 Within the nonwoven category, Fiber Dynamics uses the same raw materials and same production line to manufacture different nonwoven PSF products such as drylaid chemically bonded and drylaid point (or thermally) bonded PSF products. (Fiber Dynamics Dep. at 55-56.) One exception to the use of the same production line within the nonwoven category is fiber designed for an airlaid manufacturing process versus fiber designed for a wetlaid manufacturing process. (Latten Decl., PP28-34)

its range of fine denier products during most of the relevant period only at its Spartanburg plant on a modern production line called "CPS3," and made other polyester staple products such as fiberfill on an older line at the same plant. [14] (Def.'s Mem. In Opp'n at 45; Latten Decl., P50) In some cases, it is necessary to use (or add via modification of the line) specific hardware depending on the desired characteristics and properties of the PSF. (Rust Trial Rpt., PP29, 31, 36, 40) Finishes or additives may be applied later in the production process. (Rust Trial Rpt., PP24, 34, 35) Regardless, all PSF products go through a similar manufacturing process: polymerization, extrusion, application of finish, drawing, imparting [*16] crimp and heat setting, and cutting. (Rust Trial Rpt., PP19-30)

Within the different categories of PSF described herein, PSF produced by the defendant manufacturers with the same characteristics and physical properties may be used interchangeably. (Rust Trial Rpt., PP33, 54; Beyer Aff., PP14 - 20; Beyer Trial Rpt. Reply, P10; Hr'g Tr. at 172-173; Carpenter Dep. at 126-127; Kidd Decl., PP6, 7; Hollander Dep. at 53; Habasit Dep. at 74; Hough Dep. at 180-181.) [15] Arteva contends the "market reality" demonstrates otherwise - i.e., that within the various categories, substitution did not occur as a general rule given compatibility and performance concerns of the direct purchaser, as well as customer-specific requirements of the indirect purchaser. (Carpenter Dep. at 74-76; Fiber Dynamics Dep. at 67.) Indeed, before switching PSF suppliers, purchasers typically perform trials to optimize performance of a new PSF product. (Rust Trial Rpt., P54) There is also evidence that certain direct purchasers were contractually limited in their ability to substitute raw materials without notice to and approval of the indirect purchaser. (HDK Industries Dep. at 20-21.) Similarly, when a particular manufacturer [*18] is the only producer of a specialty type PSF (e.g., bicomponent fibers [16] produced in the U.S. only by Arteva), or when a manufacturer has a proprietary interest in a unique finish or other differentiating application, the PSF is not immediately interchangeable. (Rust Trial Rpt., PP43, 44) Even in those instances, if the market supports the action, theoretically, other manufacturers could follow suit and begin to produce a comparable PSF product. (Rust Trial Rpt., PP44-45, 48) Shifting production from one PSF category or type to another, particularly between heavy and fine denier products, is rarely done given the costs of reconfiguration. (Latten Decl., PP51, 52)

Generally speaking, PSF does not have any close substitutes. (Rust Trial Rpt., P58) Cotton is probably the closest natural fiber that is a substitute. [17] (Beyer Trial Rpt., P14) In the manufacture of textiles, cotton is used along with PSF in the manufacture of blended fabrics. (Rust Trial Rpt., PP50-51; Beyer Trial Rpt., P14) Within the nonwoven category, other polymer products such as polypropylene compete with PSF but are not considered true substitutes. (Latten Decl., P34; Rust Trial Rpt., P52) Within the fiberfill market, goose and duck down substitutes are more expensive, and polyurethane foam is of lower quality. (U.S. ITC's April 13, 2000, "Certain Polyester Staple Fiber from Korea and Taiwan," Pre-hearing Report to the Commission on Investigation Nos. 731-TA-825-826 (Final) [18], page 23; Hollander Dep. at 33, 37.) Within the carpeting or floor coverings category, nylon is actually preferred over PSF for many products. (Rust Trial Rpt., [*20] P53) In each, PSF is usually the most important input in the application for which it is used. (Beyer Trial Rpt, PP17, 21) In 1994, four producers (Arteva, Wellman, DuPont, Nan Ya America) accounted for 87% of the North American market. In 2000, the same four producers accounted for [14] It is not clear whether both production lines had the capability to manufacture PSF across these categories or whether production was [*17] structured this way deliberately for efficiency purposes.

[15] Frank Hurst, Carpenter's corporate representative, explained with reference to fiberfill: "I would look at 6 and 15 denier from all of these suppliers as being an almost generic product. We can bring product from any one of those suppliers, run it in our plants, and our customers will never tell the difference." (Carpenter Dep. at 126-127.) (emphasis added).

[16] A bicomponent staple or "low-melt" product is made with two different components and combines a polyester (or polypropylene) core (to provide strength and resilience) [*19] surrounded by a lower melting temperature polymer (or polyethylene or modified co-polyester) sheath. (Rapp Decl., at 12 n. 22, 23; Kimberly Clark Dep. at 63.) When exposed to heat, the fiber forms a strong, cohesive bond with other fibers. Id.

[17] Dr. Rust disagrees with Dr. Beyer regarding cotton being a direct substitute for PSF. (Rust Trial Rpt., PP50, 58)

[18] For convenience, remaining cites to ITC proceedings will be abbreviated as: "U.S. ITC Determination, month / year, at page #."

81% of the North American market. Arteva is the largest producer of polyester staple fiber in the United States. Wellman is the second largest PSF producer, followed by the DAK entities, and then Nan Ya.

PSF manufacturers do not generally publish price lists. (Stanley Decl., P26) However, at least one of the PSF manufacturers, alleged co-conspirator DuPont-Akra, had a list price for each market segment. (Walker Dep. at 32.) Sonny Walker, Dupont-Akra Vice President, testified that "barring some competitive issue, a customer would pay that price." (Id.) The pricing methods for PSF sales vary from customer-to-customer (and sometimes product-by-product) depending upon a [*21] number of factors, including the volume being purchased and the prior dealings / nature of business relationship between the manufacturer and purchaser. (Stanley Dep. at 258-260; Walker Dep. at 21-22, 32, 256.) Notwithstanding Dupont-Akra's list prices, different customers paid different prices for the same product. (Id. at 32-33.) PSF manufacturers utilized short and long-term contracts to govern the terms of sale, some of which were broken in order to effect a price increase. [19] (Lambert Dep. Tr. at 213-214.) Some manufacturers offered rebates. (Quality Felt Dep. at 76-77.) Individual price negotiations were common practice between PSF manufacturers and PSF purchasers, particularly the larger customers. (Stanley Decl., PP21, 26-27; Carpenter Dep. at 98 National Textiles Dep. at 78-79; Tex. Tech. Dep. at 106; Habasit Dep. at 115.)

The price of PSF began to fall in 1996, and continued to decline into 1999. (Beyer Aff., P19) Beginning in 1999, and persisting during the class period, the PSF industry experienced "substantial excess capacity." [*22] (Beyer Trial Rpt., P18; Trial Reply Rpt., P13; Stanley Dep. at 40.) The industry was described as "sick" due to the "textile industry as a whole [] being bombarded by goods from China." (Dutton Tr. at 290; Stanley Dep. Tr. at 40.) According to Arteva / KoSa Executive, Troy Stanley, customers were routinely filing for bankruptcy and customer plants were shutting down, lessening the demand for PSF. (Id.) Despite an oversupply of PSF during this time period, PSF prices started to rise in mid-1999 and continued to rise through mid-2001. [20] (Beyer Aff., P19)

B. Class Representatives & Composition Of Putative Class

All of the original ten class representatives are (or were during the class period) direct purchasers of PSF. [21] The representatives collectively purchased PSF from each of the Defendants during the class period and used PSF in a variety of products [*23] including furniture, pillows, mattress pads, comforters, sheets, pillowcases and industrial products. [22] The class representatives vary in size and are geographically dispersed throughout the United States. (Class Compl., PP7-16) Eight of the nine remaining class representative entities use PSF for the production of nonwoven goods (including fiberfill). (Carpenter Dep. at 22-23; Habasit Dep. at 49; J.H.N.Y. Dep. at 28; Tex Tech Dep. at 34, 180; Southern Fiber Dep. at 24; Quality Felt Dep. At 137-138; Fiber Dynamics Dep. at 48; Hollander

---

[19] Arteva's contracts included the ability to increase prices or increase transportation terms as long as the customer had 30 days notice. (Exh. 19, P6)

[20] Plaintiff's expert, Dr. Beyer, explains that, "[i]n the absence of coordinated actions, economists would expect prices to remain unchanged or decline, and with an undifferentiated product and supply substitution in the PSF industry, all purchasers would have benefitted from unchanged or lower PSF prices." (Beyer Trial Reply Rpt., P13)

[21] There are only nine class representatives now because Doran Mills and Arteva settled Doran Mills' claim against it on February 9, 2007. (Document # 521)

[22] Class representatives who were nonwoven fiberfill customers include: Quality Felt (manufactures mattress and furniture stuffing); Carpenter (mattress and furniture stuffing); Southern Fiber (mattress and furniture stuffing); and Hollander Home Fashions (home furnishings such as pillows, comforters). [*24] Class representatives who were industrial nonwoven customers include: Habasit Belting (manufactures lightweight conveyor belts); Tex Tech, Inc. (filtration products, mattress products, fire-blocking material); JHNY, Inc. (automotive applications such as gaskets); and Fiber Dynamics, Inc. (filtration and insulation).

Dep. at 22.) One of the class representatives, Thomaston Mills, uses PSF to produce textiles. (Thomaston Dep. at 38.) There is no class representative that purchased carpet fiber. [23] (Hr'g Tr. at 174.)

Counsel for Arteva represents [*25] that based on its textile fiber sales, "only 13 percent of its sales of [sic] or customers accounting for 13 percent of its sales are even potentially within the class." (Hr'g Tr. at 102.) Plaintiffs take issue with the 13 percent figure but agree that the known "opt-outs" (37 out of 1115 putative class members noticed) thus far comprise approximately 70 to 75% of the putative class in terms of its sales volume. (Hr'g Tr. at 189, 192; See also Egge Decl., P2) Plaintiffs also contend that during the class period, class representatives' sales represent as much as 69.4% of Arteva's PSF sales, and more than $ 730 million worth (1.293 billion pounds) of first quality polyester staple fiber from all Defendants. Plaintiffs claim to have purchased $ 280 million worth (462 million pounds) from Arteva alone. (Hr'g Tr. at 189; Pl.s' 3-3-06 Letter at 5.) Arteva is also subject to joint and several liability based upon the sales of its alleged co-conspirators, minus settlement figures. (Id.)

C. Arteva's Polyester Staple Fiber Business

In December 1998, Arteva purchased all of Hoechst Celanese' s PSF manufacturing assets. [25] (Stanley Decl., P12) During the class period, Arteva had two plants in the United States that produced PSF (Salisbury, NC and Spartanburg, SC), two in Mexico, and one plant in Canada. During the relevant time period, Arteva produced as many as 196 PSF products for use in apparel and home fashions, insulation, personal hygiene, filtration, automotive, and other specialized customer needs. [26] (Latten Decl., P5) Arteva was the sole supplier of certain types of PSF. [27] (Rapp Decl. P24; Latten Decl. PP9, 16; Tex Tech. Dep. at 33, 58, 72-73 (flame retardant PSF for use in bus seat and mattress fire blocking); Kimberly Clark Dep. at 28-29 (diapers)). Sales to fiberfill customers accounted for approximately 20% of Arteva's sales of PSF during the class period. (Latten, [*27] P30)

In1999, Arteva's website characterized its PSF division as a "mostly commodity-oriented" business. (Class Pls.' Exh. 1 to 3-3-06 Letter) In one of its internal documents from the Fall of 2000 regarding pricing, Arteva noted its two [23] Based upon the descriptions of carpet fiber (10 to 18 denier and 6-8 inches in length) adopted by Plaintiffs' expert, Dr .Beyer, PSF for the manufacturing of carpets is not necessarily included within Plaintiffs' definition of polyester staple. (Compare Class Compl., P44 - "generally 0.5 to 4-6 inches" in length) with Beyer's Trial Rpt, P12). Later within Dr. Beyer's report he states that "[t]he class products include all the products covered by the U.S. ITC proceedings plus products both below and above the U.S. ITC denier range." (Beyer's Trial Rpt, n. 18) The length of the PSF is not mentioned.

According to counsel for Arteva, Arteva settled with all but about 3 percent of its carpet fiber purchasers through direct or individual action. (Hr'g Tr. at 103.) Neither side paid much attention to this PSF category in its filings or in oral arguments.

[24] The Court provides a brief description of the relevant facts that pertain to Arteva / KoSa since it is the only remaining Defendant. If Plaintiffs are successful [*26] in proving the conspiracy as alleged in the Amended Consolidated Class Action Complaint, Arteva, as an alleged co-conspirator, will be jointly and severally liable for the damages sustained by all class members' PSF purchases that are encompassed within the conspiracy. See In re Vitamins Antitrust Litig., 209 F.R.D. 251, 262 (D.D.C.2002).

[25] In 2003, a related civil action was commenced in the Southern District of New York by Arteva entities including its parent, Koch Industries, Inc., against the Hoechst Celanese entities. See SDNY Civil Docket No.: 1:03CV8679. Koch Industries seeks to recover from Hoechst based upon the alleged fraudulent sale of Hoechst's PSF business. Essentially, Koch Industries alleges that it purchased a price-fixing conspiracy from Hoechst. The SDNY case is still pending but a review of the docket shows little activity since the filing of initial disclosures in August 2004.

[26] Arteva does not produce PSF for floor coverings at present. (Latten, P6 n.2)

[27] The fact that Arteva was the sole supplier of certain types of PSF is one of Arteva's defenses to the action. Arteva's argument is that the alleged conspiracy could not have affected the PSF purchasing decisions of these entities and, therefore, the fact of injury cannot be shown.

different types of polyester staple [*28] fiber business - commodity and specialty. (Class Pl.s' Exh. 22) The document belies Arteva's present claim in that according to the document, Arteva's commodity polyester staple business was comprised of fine denier woven and knits as well as heavy denier (needle punch, nonwovens, and carpet backing). (Id.) Commodity PSF was at a lower price point than specialty PSF. (Id.) Arteva's commodity business covered 30 to 40 markets. (Id.) Arteva had approximately 50 fine denier woven and knit customers and approximately 400 heavy denier customers. (Id.)

Paul Latten, Vice President of Nonwoven and Textile Fibers for Arteva, has worked with Arteva for over twenty years and currently oversees Arteva's PSF business. (Latten Decl., PP2, 4) Latten previously managed Arteva's nonwoven (including fiberfill) business. (Id., P3) Latten asserts that Arteva had separate business divisions and pricing mechanisms based upon end use. (Id., PP14, 53, 54) In fact, in one of its documents (contemporaneous to the conspiracy) Arteva speaks of the "well established markets and sub-markets" within the PSF industry. (Beyer Aff., P27 (citing KOSA049642))

Troy F. Stanley, Sr. ("Stanley") was employed by Hoechst Celanese [*29] Corporation prior to Hoechst's sale to Arteva - from 1989 through 1998. (Stanley Decl., P6) In April 1999, Stanley was named by Arteva as Business Director for Textile Staples for United States and Canada. (Stanley Decl., P12) Stanley has not been actively employed by Arteva since 2001. (Stanley Decl., P12) Stanley is assisting Arteva in its defense of the lawsuit and remains on the payroll. (Stanley Decl., P3; Hr'g Tr. at 184.)

D. Price Increase Announcements Issued By Defendant Manufacturers Of Polyester Staple Fiber

Between June 28, 1999 and June 30, 1999, all four major manufacturers of polyester staple in the United States announced price increases ranging from 10 to 15% effective by early August. (Class Pl.s' Exh. B) Each of the manufacturers recognized in their respective announcements that increases in raw materials were driving the price increase announcements. Many of the price increase announcements also expressly referred to the depressed prices in the recent past as well as the effect of Asian imports.

On June 29, 1999, Arteva / KoSa made the following announcement:

> "KoSa, one of the world's largest polyester producers, is increasing the prices of its polyester staple products [*30] by 10 to 15 percent, effective with August orders. . .
> * * *
> KoSa produces commodity and specialty polyester products . . ."

(Pl.s' Exh. B) Wellman's price increase announcement, issued the next day on June 30, 1999, specified that it intended to "raise the price of Fortrel(R) brand polyester staple by 10 - 12 %." (Id.) Later in its announcement, Wellman described its Fortrel(R) brand polyester as a "textile fiber." (Id.) DAK issued a similar announcement. (Id.) Nan Ya expressly stated in its June 28, 1999 price increase announcement it would be "increasing the selling price of all Polyester Staple Fiber 10 -12%, effective August 1, 1999."

A few months later, between October 1, 1999, and October 5, 1999, Arteva, Dupont and Nan Ya announced price increases ranging from 10 to 15 % effective November 1, 1999. In its October 1, 1999, announcement, Arteva stated its intention to raise the prices of its polyester staple products by 10 to 15 percent, effective with November 1, 1999 orders. (Pl.s' Exh. C) DuPont-Akra followed KoSa and on October 5, 1999, announced its increase of 10-12% of "global polyester staple prices," effective October 30, 1999. (Id.) Nan Ya issued a similar price increase [*31] announcement on the same day, stating that it would be increasing the selling price of all Polyester Staple Fiber 13 - 15%, effective November 1, 1999. (Id.)

Between January 10, 2000, and January 14, 2000, DuPont, Arteva, Nan Ya and Wellman announced price increases ranging from 10 to 15%, effective in mid-February. (Pl.s' Exh. D) Arteva's press release advised that KoSa would be "increasing the prices of its polyester staple products by 10 to 15 percent, effective with February 15, 2000 orders." (Id.) Like its June 1999 announcement, KoSa mentioned its production of both "commodity and special polyester products" but did not limit the price increase announcement in any way. (Id.) Wellman's January 13, 2000 price increase announcement expressly expanded its price increase to cover "all polyester staple" and stated that its price increase would "affect the apparel, home furnishings, industrial, non-wovens, fiberfill and carpet markets." (Id.) DuPont's January 10, 2000 announcement refers to increased imports of Asian fabrics and garments but repeats that "global polyester staple prices are being increased . . ." (Id.)

E. Related Criminal Proceedings Against Arteva & Troy Stanley

The sole [*32] remaining Defendant named by the putative class is the single corporate entity that was prosecuted criminally. [28] Defendant Arteva / KoSa pled guilty to conspiring to violate the Sherman Antitrust Act, 15 U.S.C. §1. (See WDNC Criminal Docket No.: 3:02CR229-V) Arteva was required to pay a monetary fine in the amount of $ 28,500,000.00. On December 18, 2002, Troy Stanley also pled guilty to conspiring, in restraint of trade, to fix certain polyester staple fiber prices and allocate certain polyester staple customers for the time period September 1999 through January 2001, in violation of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §1. (See WDNC Criminal Docket No.: 3:02CR230-V) Stanley was sentenced to one year probation and a $ 5,000 fine. [29]

For purposes of the criminal prosecution, the charging instruments and plea agreements included identical descriptions of polyester staple as well as the following language explaining the types of products that are made with polyester staple:

> "Polyester staple is a man-made, petroleum-based fiber that is manufactured in varying thicknesses and cut into short lengths. It is sold to textile manufacturers who incorporate it into fabrics for sheets, shirts, and other wearing apparel. Other forms of polyester staple have applications in items such as sleeping bags, pillows, and comforters." [30]

(Indictment, P5; Plea Agreement, P4(a))

Arteva's Plea Agreement included a proffer [*34] of the facts that the Government's evidence tended to establish. The factual basis agreed to by Arteva and the United States follows:

> During the relevant period, the defendant, through its officers, directors, managers, or employees, participated in a conspiracy with other persons and entities engaged in the manufacture and sale of polyester staple, the primary purpose of which was to fix, increase and maintain prices, coordinate price increases, and allocate customers for first-quality polyester staple sold in North America. In furtherance of the conspiracy, the defendant, through its officers, directors, managers, or employees, engaged in bilateral discussions and attended bilateral meetings with representatives of other polyester staple producing firms. During these discussions and meetings, agreements were reached as to the first-quality polyester staple customers to which the conspirators would sell and the prices at which they would sell first-quality polyester staple in North America.

(Arteva Plea Agreement, P4(b)) Stanley's Plea Agreement contained an almost identical statement of the factual basis. (Stanley Plea Agreement, P4(b))

[28] In 2001, DuPont admitted participation in a conspiracy to fix prices and allocate customers in the PSF industry. DuPont and the other DAK Defendants participated in the U.S. Department of Justice's Corporate Leniency Program in order to avoid criminal prosecution. (Class Compl., P64) After months of ongoing grand jury investigation that delayed the progress of the instant civil action, the DOJ ultimately elected not to pursue criminal charges against Wellman or [*33] any of the other alleged co-conspirators.

[29] Stanley's Plea Agreement was modified on November 10, 2004, several days prior to the actual sentencing hearing, in view of an agreement between the United States and the Defendant that an active term of imprisonment was unnecessary in this case. (3:02CR230-V, Document # 9)

[30] In support of its motion for partial summary judgment, Arteva contends that this provision reflects a "basic industry distinction between woven and nonwoven fibers." (Arteva's Mem. In Supp. Summ. J. at 19.)

At sentencing, federal prosecutor Mitch Chitwood [*35] ("Chitwood"), U.S. Department of Justice, Antitrust Division, described the conspiracy in similar terms. Chitwood stated that "bilateral" discussions and meetings were employed and that the conspiracy targeted "primarily" textile customers. (Sentencing Hr'g Tr. at 6.) When asked about victim notification, Chitwood stated that "given the number of potential victims in this case, which are extraordinary, essentially any company or any individual who bought polyester staple throughout the United States, I think such notice would be impractical." (Sentencing Hr'g Tr. at 24-25.)

F. Canadian Criminal Proceedings

The Canadian Attorney General also initiated criminal proceedings against the alleged co-conspirators. (Canadian Case No.: T-1527-03) On August 6, 2003, Arteva was formally charged by the Canadian Government with unlawfully conspiring "to prevent or lessen, unduly, competition in the production, manufacture, purchase, sale, storage, transportation or supply of a product, namely, polyester staple fibre, in Canada, contrary to paragraph 45(1)(c) of the Competition Act." (Pl.s' Exh. A) (italics in original) Arteva admitted much of what was alleged in the Canadian proceedings, including [*36] "announc[ing] price increases for the product at agreed ranges that differed for each competitor but, through individual negotiations with individual customers, aimed to achieve increased price levels." (Pl.s' Exh. A / Statement of Admissions, P17(c))

G. Related March 2006 U.S. International Trade Commission ("ITC") Rulings

On April 2, 1999, DuPont, Nan Ya America, Arteva and Wellman ("ITC Petitioners") jointly filed an "Antidumping Duty Petition on Certain Polyester Staple Fiber from South Korea and Taiwan" in the United States International Trade Commission ("ITC"). (U.S. ITC Determination, April 2000) The initial proceedings consisted of an investigation of fiberfill being imported from Korea and Taiwan. [32] Spinnable PSF and PSF for carpeting were excluded from the investigation. (Class Compl., P52; Beyer Aff., P16 n. 10) The anti-dumping proceedings were initiated due to ITC Petitioners' allegation that low cost fiberfill from Taiwanese, Chinese and other Asian importers was being "dumped" in the United States at very low prices and having a negative impact on the United States fiber fill industry and other PSF markets. (Beyer Trial Reply Rpt., P12) In May 2000, the original ITC proceeding resulted in imposition of various restrictions and duties up to fourteen percent on Korean and Taiwanese imports. [33] (Beyer Aff., P18)

---

[31] The findings of the U.S. International Trade Commission are of limited value, but probative of the certification issue nonetheless. Arteva implies that the ITC rulings provide conclusive evidence in support of Arteva's theory of the case, i.e., the conspiracy was much narrower than alleged by Plaintiffs. At the same time, Arteva criticizes Dr. Beyer for relying extensively on the proceedings. Dr. Beyer, like the undersigned, considers the ITC proceedings, along with other sources of information, in his study of the PSF industry. (Beyer Trial Reply Rpt., P12) That said, inclusion of the ITC proceedings and determinations in the context of evaluating whether certification of a class is appropriate does not mean the Court would necessarily deem this evidence admissible at trial. In addition to addressing any other evidentiary objections the parties may raise, the [*37] Court would carefully evaluate this evidence under Rule 403 of the Federal Rules of Evidence.

[32] Defendant ITC Petitioners defined the market for purposes of the anti-dumping investigation [*38] as: "synthetic staple fibers, not carded, combed or otherwise processed for spinning, of polyesters measuring 3.3 decitex (3 denier inclusive) or more in diameter. This merchandise is cut to lengths varying from one inch (25 mm) to five inches (127 mm). Merchandise subject to the investigation may be coated, usually with silicon or other finish or not coated. This Polyester Staple is referred to in the Petition as "certain polyester staple fiber."" (Compl., P51)

[33] Plaintiffs' expert contends that the anti-dumping duties constitute a barrier to entry of the PSF market that aided the implementation of the price-fixing conspiracy.

In 2006 the ITC commenced proceedings for the purpose of reconsidering its earlier ruling. (See U.S. ITC's March 2006, "Certain Polyester Staple Fiber from Korea and Taiwan," Investigation Nos. 731-TA-825-826 (Review)). In March 2006, the ITC found that "the record does not substantiate the theory that the conspiracy in question covered products other than fine denier PSF for textile applications, a product not subject to these reviews, and that the antitrust conspiracy did not impact the record of these reviews such that the pricing data or other information [*39] on the record [related to fiber fill] should be discounted." (U.S. ITC Determination, March 2006, page 18.) The ITC expressly acknowledged its limitations by observing that "ascertaining antitrust violations based upon conflicting or ambiguous evidence submitted in civil antitrust proceedings is outside the Commission's expertise." (Id., page 21 n. 146, pages 22-23, n. 158) (emphasis added). The ITC did not revoke the anti-dumping duty orders previously imposed for fear that revocation might lead to a continuance or recurrence of material injury to domestic producers.

The ITC also noted the industry practice: "domestic producers of PSF generally followed pricing announcements covering all PSF products with negotiations with specific customers over the price of specific types of PSF." (U.S. ITC Determination, March 2006, page 23.) The ITC stated that the price increase announcements were "typically spurred by increased costs for inputs common to all PSF products. . . ." (Id., page 21.)

III. Rule 23(a) Considerations / Amenability To Class Treatment

"The class action device, which allows a representative party to prosecute his own claims and the claims of those who present similar issues, [*40] is an exception to the general rule that a party in federal court may vindicate only his own interests." Thorn v. Jefferson-Pilot Life Ins., 445 F.3d 311, 318 (4th Cir. 2006) (citing Gen. Tel. Co. of Southwest v. Falcon, 457 U.S. 147, 156, 102 S. Ct. 2364, 72 L. Ed. 2d 740 (1982)). "Chief among the justifications for this device is its efficiency: adjudication of a properly-constituted class action generally has res judicata effect and "saves the resources of both the courts and the parties by permitting an issue potentially affecting every [class member] to be litigated in an economical fashion."" Thorn, 445 F.3d at 318 (quoting Califano v. Yamasaki, 442 U.S. 682, 701, 99 S. Ct. 2545, 61 L. Ed. 2d 176 (1979)). Another benefit of the class action device is to "afford aggrieved persons a remedy if it is not economically feasible to obtain relief through the traditional framework of multiple individual damage actions." Gunnells v. Healthplan Servs., Inc., 348 F.3d 417, 424 (4th Cir.2003)) (citing 5 James Wm. Moore, et al., Moore's Federal Practice, §23.02 (3d ed. 1999)).

A court may certify a class only "after a rigorous analysis that the prerequisites of Rule 23(a) have been satisfied." Falcon, 457 U.S. at 161. A "rigorous analysis" ensures that both the [*41] rights of the absent plaintiffs to present claims that are different from those common to the class, and the right of the defendant to present facts or raise defenses that are particular to individual class members, are protected. Thorn, 445 F.3d at 318 (citing Falcon, 457 U.S. at 161.)

In order for a class to be certified, "a proposed class must satisfy Rule 23(a) and one of the three sub-parts of Rule 23(b)." Thorn, 445 F.3d at 318 (citing Gunnells, 348 F.3d at 423.) Rule 23(a) requires that 1) the class be so numerous that joinder of all members is impracticable; 2) there are questions of law or fact common to the class; 3) the claims or defenses of the representative parties are typical of the claims or defenses of the class; and 4) the representative parties will fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class. FED. R. CIV. P. 23(a); Amchem Prods., Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 613, 117 S. Ct. 2231, 138 L. Ed. 2d 689 (1997). It is Plaintiffs' burden to demonstrate satisfaction of the Rule 23 requirements. Thorn, 445 F.3d at 321 (citing Windham v. Am. Brands, Inc., 565 F.2d 59, 65 n. 6 (4th Cir.1977) (en banc)). The Rule 23(a) criteria are discussed first.

Here, the numerosity requirement is not at issue given [*42] Plaintiffs' unchallenged representation that hundreds of putative class members remain. In addition, members of the putative class are geographically dispersed which presents a potential obstacle to joinder. See In re Vitamins Antitrust Litig., 209 F.R.D. 251, 259 (D.D.C. 2002) ("[C]ourts often take the geographical location of the proposed class members into consideration when deciding whether or not certification is appropriate.")

Before discovery was complete, the Court found in the context of Rule 23(e) that the commonality requirement of Rule 23(a) [34] was easily met. [35] See generally, Ballard v. Blue Shield, 543 F.2d 1075, 1080 (4th Cir. 1976); Brown v. Cameron Brown Co., 92 F.R.D. 32, 38 (E.D.Va. 1981) (allegation of conspiracy to violate the antitrust laws involves questions common to the class). While the Court might frame the common issues slightly differently now, the result is the same. Commonality of both factual and legal issues exists.

The typicality of claims requirement is also satisfied. To be given the trust responsibility imposed by Rule 23, "a class representative must be part of the class and possess the same interest and suffer the same injury as the class members." Deiter v. Microsoft Corp., 436 F.3d 461, 466 (4th Cir.2006). In determining whether the claims of the class representatives are typical of the class, the Court looks to the nature of the claims asserted (i.e., the legal theory) rather than any specific factual differences amongst class members. See Brown, 92 F.R.D. at 38; Woodard v. Online Info. Servs., 191 F.R.D. 502, 505 (E.D.N.C. 2000) (citing Holsey v. Armour & Co., 743 F.2d 199, 216-217 (4th Cir.1984)). While Plaintiffs' claims should be "squarely aligned," Plaintiffs' claims and the claims of class members need not "be perfectly identical or perfectly aligned." Deiter, 436 F.3d at 467. Here, Plaintiffs' [*44] claims are typical of each other because each alleges injury via an illegal overcharge as a result of an industry-wide price-fixing and customer allocation conspiracy in violation of the Clayton Act.

Adequacy of representation is also met. The fourth criteria under Rule 23(a) requires the representative parties to "fairly and adequately protect the interest of the class." FED. R. CIV. P. 23(a). Fair and adequate representation depends upon the qualifications and experience of Plaintiffs' counsel as well as whether the class representatives have any interests antagonistic to the class. In re Vitamins, 209 F.R.D. at 261. Stated differently, the adequacy of representation inquiry "serves to uncover conflicts of interest between named parties and the class they seek to represent." [36] Amchem, 521 U.S. at 625 (citing Falcon, 457 U.S. at 157-158.) Determining whether any conflict exists is critical because the absent class members who do not elect to "opt-out" are ultimately bound by the class action. Gunnells, 348 F.3d at 427.

As an initial matter, the competency of Plaintiffs' [*45] counsel, as well as counsel's ability to handle a complex class action is evident. Class Counsel, who have appeared before the Court on numerous occasions during the course of the litigation, have been exceptionally well-prepared on each occasion and demonstrated a mastery of both antitrust and class action jurisprudence. Plaintiffs' counsel have vigorously prosecuted this action and will undoubtedly continue to do so upon certification.

Regarding the alignment of interests, Arteva contends that the legal strategies of PSF textile customers like Thomaston and Spartan Mills (putative class member) and that of nonwoven purchasers differ and create intra-class conflict. Arteva further contends that its respective defenses to each individual class representative, create intra-class conflicts. [37] Under Arteva's theory, a lawyer representing Thomaston or Spartan Mills would embrace Troy Stanley's testimony whereas a lawyer representing a nonwoven purchaser like Quality Felt would seek to discredit Stanley. (Mem. In Opp. at 25; Hr'g Tr. at 146-147.) However, one class member's emphasis on particular evidence does not defeat certification. Plaintiffs also correctly point out that Thomaston [*46] and other putative [34] FRCP 23(a)(2) does not require that the common factual and legal issues predominate whereas (b)(3) does.

[35] At that time, the common questions were identified as:

> 1) Whether the prices of Polyester Staple were raised, fixed, maintained or [*43] stabilized at artificial and non-competitive levels;
> 2) Whether the conspiracy had the effect of fixing, maintaining and stabilizing prices of Polyester Staple in the US; and
> 3) Whether prices paid by plaintiffs and putative class members were higher than they would have been absent the conspiracy.

[36] The adequacy of representation inquiry tends to merge with the question of typicality. Falcon, 457 U.S. at 158 n.13.

[37] The effect of Arteva's defenses is analyzed in greater detail in conjunction with the Rule 23(b)(3) discussion.

class members who purchased fine denier PSF will recover the same monetary award under either theory, regardless of the ultimate finding regarding the scope of the conspiracy. (Pl.s' 3-3-06 Letter at 14.)

In Gunnells, the Fourth Circuit stated that in order for a conflict to defeat class certification, the conflict must be "fundamental" and "go to the heart of the litigation." [38] Gunnells, 348 F.3d at 430-431; Brown, 92 F.R.D. at 41 n.9 (internal citations omitted). The plaintiff class in Gunnells was comprised of both purchasers (employers) and beneficiaries (employees) of a multi-employer health care plan. Plaintiffs' lawsuit sought class-wide recovery for both employers' and employees' claims precipitated by the plan's collapse. The defendant claimed that class conflicts existed based upon the potential for the employee members to seek additional redress from the employer members for unpaid medical bills resulting from the collapse of the plan. The Fourth Circuit panel discounted the purported conflict as not bearing on "the heart of the litigation." Gunnells, 348 F.3d at 431. [*47] The appellate court reasoned that both the employers and employees "share common objectives and the same factual and legal positions," and thus "have the same interest in establishing the liability of [the defendant]." (Id.) Such is the case here.

Arteva also makes much of the fact that the Rule 23(e) settlement between Plaintiffs and the DAK Defendants excluded fiberfill from the definition of polyester staple. (See Class Plaintiffs' & DAK Defendants' Settlement Agreement, P8) (defining Polyester Staple as: "[A]ny Polyester Fiber, other than Fiberfill, cut to specific and relatively limited lengths (generally 0.5 to 4-6 inches).") Arteva implies that the DAK Defendants, like Arteva, successfully challenged the Plaintiffs on their inclusion of fiberfill customers within the putative class. Arteva suggests that the parties both recognized that fiberfill was not affected due to substantial competition from foreign producers. In support, Arteva alleges that DuPont manufactured fiberfill during the class period. (Penrice Aff., P5, P20-21) According to Jon Penrice, former Global Business Manager for DuPont's PSF specialty branded division, DuPont sold approx 190 million pounds of branded and unbranded fiberfill between April 1999 and [*49] July 2001. (Penrice Aff., PP4, 5) However, Sonny Walker testified that during the fall of 1999, Dupont-Akra, also a DAK entity later known as DAK Fibers, LLC, did not sell fiberfill in the United States. (Walker Dep. at 59.) Co-Lead Class Counsel, Paul Bennett, represented to the Court that "DAK itself did not sell fiber fill and therefore it would not have been proper to either include fiber fill purchasers or to give a release to the DAK defendants for fiber fill purchases." [39] (1-8-04 Hr'g Tr. at 55.) Based upon these facts, the Court dismisses Arteva's suspect view of the Plaintiffs' agreement with the DAK Defendants.

In sum, the Court finds that no fundamental conflict exists between the class representatives and members of the putative class. Despite the differences between the various types of PSF purchasers, and the possibility that Plaintiffs may have sustained different degrees of injury, the Court finds Plaintiffs' litigation [*50] interests are sufficiently aligned to proceed as a class.

IV. Rule 23(b)(3) Predominance Of Common Issues

[38] There are few examples of "fundamental" conflicts identified by the Fourth Circuit. In Broussard v. Meineke, the Fourth Circuit held that conflicts of interest existed between different groups of franchisees that precluded certification. Broussard v. Meineke Discount Muffler Shops, Inc., 155 F.3d 331, 338-339 (4th Cir.1998) (securities case). The plaintiff class of franchisees was subject to the following categorization: 1) former franchisees with an interest in maximizing damages; 2) current franchisees not entitled to any monetary damages given contractual limitations; and 3) current franchisees entitled to monetary damages. Broussard, 155 F.3d at 338. Of the current franchisees, several sought only restitution and expressed concern about the long-term financial health of Meineke in the event defendant was subject to a large damages award. Within the current franchisee group, the putative class members were unable to resolve their differences. [*48] Based on plaintiffs' adverse ultimate objectives, the Fourth Circuit determined that "the remedial interests of those within the single class [were] not aligned." Id. (citing Amchem, 521 U.S. at 627.)

[39] The Court's February 5, 2004 Order was amended in order to clarify precisely what Class Counsel said in relation to certain entities' failure to produce fiberfill, namely, that DuPont - as opposed to the other DAK Defendants - did not manufacture fiberfill.

The Court now turns to the question of predominance. Under Rule 23(b)(3), the Court contemplates whether a class action trial will present common proof that predominates over any individualized proof such that certification of the proposed class serves the objectives of Rule 23.

Although the analyses under Rule 23(a) and (b)(3) are similar, satisfaction of the predominance requirement articulated within Rule 23(b)(3) is "more stringent" than satisfaction of Rule 23(a). Thorn, 445 F.3d at 319 (quoting Lienhart v. Dryvit Sys., Inc., 255 F.3d 138, 146 n. 4 (4th Cir. 2001)). "The Rule 23(b)(3) predominance inquiry tests whether proposed classes are sufficiently cohesive to warrant adjudication by representation." Amchem, 521 U.S. at 623. Rule 23(b)(3) requires that:

> 1) the questions of law and fact common to the members of the class predominate over any questions affecting only individual members; and
> 2) a class action is superior to the other available methods for the fair and efficient administration of the controversy.

FED. R. CIV. P. 23(b)(3). The predominance of common issues and superiority [*51] of the class action proceeding are to be considered in tandem. Windham, 565 F.2d at 65 n.7 (internal citations omitted). Rule 23(b)(3) identifies a non-exhaustive list of factors to consider when evaluating the predominance and superiority criteria:

> 1) the interest of members in the class in individually controlling the prosecution or defense of separate actions;
> 2) the extent and nature of any litigation concerning the controversy already commenced by or against members of the class;
> 3) the desirability or undesirability of concentrating the litigation of the claims in the particular forum; and > 4) the difficulties likely to be encountered in the management of a class action.

FED. R. CIV. P. 23(b)(3); Amchem, 521 U.S. at 615-616.

The purpose of Rule 23(b)(3) is to address cases "in which a class action would achieve economies of time, effort, and expense, and promote . . . uniformity of decision as to persons similarly situated, without sacrificing procedural fairness or bringing about other undesirable results." Amchem, 521 U.S. at 615 (citing Adv. Comm. Notes, 28 U.S.C.App., p. 697.) Because Rule 23(b)(3)'s focus is on the practical question of manageability, the trial court must "be granted [*52] a wide range of discretion." Windham, 565 F.2d at 65. [40]

The Rule 23(b)(3) analysis is fact-intensive. Windham, 565 F.2d at 65. "The district court must take a 'close look' at the facts relevant to class certification and, if necessary, make specific findings on the propriety of certification." Thorn, 445 F.3d at 319 (citing Gariety v. Grant Thornton, LLP, 368 F.3d 356, 365 (4th Cir.2004)). Findings may be necessary even if the issues related to certification overlap with the merits of the underlying case. Id. (citing Falcon, 457 U.S. at 160; Gariety, 368 F.3d at 366.) "Nonetheless, such disputes may be resolved only insofar as resolution is necessary to determine the nature of the evidence that would be sufficient, if the plaintiff's general allegations were true, to make out a prima facie case for the class." Blades v. Monsanto Co., 400 F.3d 562, 567 (8th Cir.2005) ("The closer any dispute at [*53] the class certification stage comes to the heart of the claim, the more cautious the court should be in ensuring that [factual disputes] . . . [are] resolved in order to determine the nature of the evidence the plaintiff would require.") (citing Eisen v. Carlisle & Jacquelin, 417 U.S. 156, 177-178, 94 S. Ct. 2140, 40 L. Ed. 2d 732 (1974)). "The likelihood of the plaintiffs' success on the merits, however, is not relevant to the issue of whether certification is proper." Thorn, 445 F.3d at 319 (citing Eisen, 417 U.S. at 177-78; Gariety, 368 F.3d at 366.)

To successfully prosecute a private antitrust action, Plaintiffs must prove: 1) a violation of the antitrust law; 2) direct injury to the Plaintiffs from such violations; and 3) damages sustained by the Plaintiffs. Windham, 565 F.2d at 65 (district court must have in mind the essential elements of the private antitrust action and the proof that may be required to establish these elements). Together, proof of a violation and the fact of antitrust injury establish liability. Windham, 565 F.2d at 65-66 (right of action extends only to one injured in his business or property by reason of a violation of the antitrust laws.); In re S. Cent. States Bakery Prod. Antitrust Litig., 86 F.R.D. 407, 419 (M.D.La 1980) [*54] (citing Terrell v. Household Goods Carriers' Bureau, 494 F.2d 16, 20 (5th Cir.1974)).

[40] The Windham opinion is instructive but is distinguishable on its facts. The proposed class action in Windham was deemed unmanageable due to the number and variety of claims brought by the plaintiffs as well as plaintiffs' different impact and damages theories. Windham, 565 F.2d at 66-67, 70.

"Damages always require individual proofs and the crucial element in a court's analysis will be whether the "liability" issues are so closely linked to the "damage" issue that severability is not practicable." Brown, 92 F.R.D. at 42 (citing 3B Moore's Federal Practice, P 23.45(2) at 23-336 n. 33.) Accordingly, the parties' liability evidence - evidence probative of the conspiracy's scope and the fact of injury - is the focus of the Court's Rule 23(b)(3) analysis. Windham, 565 F.2d at 66; Brown, 92 F.R.D. at 42; Blades, 400 F.3d at 566 (citing In re Visa Check / Master Money Antitrust Litig., 280 F.3d 124, 135-140 (2nd Cir.2001)).

Plaintiffs contend the majority of the evidence they intend to present at trial is common to each member of the putative class. Arteva claims that even if there is common proof presented by Plaintiffs regarding the alleged conspiracy, its members, and its scope, its defenses to liability require highly individualized proof. With Rule 23(b)(3) and the record evidence in mind, the Court evaluates the nature of the evidence likely to be presented by both sides. [41]

1. Liability

A. Violation Of The Antitrust Laws

In the Court's view, the exact nature of the antitrust violation, particularly the scope of the alleged conspiracy, is the predominant common issue for trial. See 7AA Wright, Miller & Kane, Federal Practice & Procedure §1781 at 228 (3d ed.2005); 6 Newberg on Class Actions, §18.28 at 102 (4 ed. 2002) ("As a rule, the allegation of a price-fixing conspiracy is sufficient to establish predominance of common questions.") Plaintiffs contend they will offer common proof establishing a nationwide, industry-wide conspiracy by focusing on the conduct of the alleged co-conspirators. (Pl.s' Mem. In Supp. at 15-22.) Plaintiffs intend to offer testimony of Defendants' corporate representatives as well as documentary evidence implicating all of the PSF producers originally [*56] named as Defendants in the Consolidated Amended Class Action Complaint. Plaintiffs predict the evidence at trial will show that the Defendants' sales forces used the price increase announcements to negotiate price increases for all PSF products. Arteva asserts its proof will demonstrate that the conspiracy targeted only about twelve customers and four SKU line products, all fine denier textile staple.

As discussed below, there is conflicting evidence on this issue which creates a question of fact common to all members of the putative class.

i. Common Proof - General Price Increase Announcements

Plaintiffs' presentation of evidence on liability may begin with common evidence of the general price increase announcements issued by all of the four PSF manufacturers (alleged co-conspirators). (See Section "II, D") Like the parties, different PSF purchasers hold different views regarding the effect of the price increase announcements. The customers' views are captured in the testimony of their respective corporate representatives. The larger PSF customers tended to have more bargaining power whereas the smaller PSF purchasers had little ability to negotiate a more favorable price. (Compare Carpenter [*57] Dep. at 105-106 (price increase announcements were "meaningless"); and Fiber Dynamics Dep. at 126-127 ("The supplier pretty much names their price to us. We're a [41] The Court has [*55] thoroughly evaluated the evidence presented by both sides regarding the motion for class certification. In addition, the Court has evaluated enough of the evidence presented in support and in opposition to the cross-motions for summary judgment to rule on certain summary judgment issues. The Court's analysis, however, does not include a complete recitation of all the record evidence.

small company. We don't - we're not able to make those demands.")) In fact, some purchasers simply refused to accept a price increase notwithstanding the price increase announcements. (Walker Dep. at 64; Stanley Decl., PP27-28) Further, the amount of the price increase announced within the press release did not always correspond with the actual price increase for those businesses whose prices were affected. (Fiber Dynamics Dep. at 183 ("What happens with Fiber Dynamics could be different.")) For example, following a price increase announcement alerting customers to the possibility of a ten to twelve percent price increase, DuPont-Akra began its price increase negotiations with customers for all "core products" at five cents per pound, expecting that the final agreed upon price would be somewhere in between a five cent per pound increase and the current price. (Walker Dep. at 59-60.) The timing of implementation of price increases also varied. (Id.)

The general price increase announcements did not, standing alone, automatically [*58] result in increased prices or alter existing PSF prices. (See DAK Dep. at 158; Hollander Dep. at 213-215; Habasit Belting Dep. at 133-34.) According to the evidence, the work of the conspiracy took place after the price increase announcements when the manufacturers negotiated their contracts with purchasers and "policed" said negotiations. [42] Nonetheless, the price increase announcements themselves, as well as the timing and surrounding circumstances, provide common evidence of the coordination amongst the Defendant manufacturers, as well as the intended scope of the conspiracy.

ii. Common Proof- Related Criminal Proceedings

Plaintiffs' direct case may continue with common evidence related to the guilty pleas of Arteva / KoSa and Troy Stanley. Relying on the language within the Plea Agreements, Arteva [*59] contends that its liability extends only to the large textile manufacturers that purchased "first-quality polyester staple." The parties vigorously debate the meaning and significance of this phrase, as well as the overall effect of Arteva's guilty plea in the instant civil action. Because this question bears upon the nature of the evidence to be presented at trial (i.e., whether any evidence on this issue will be necessary at all), the Court considers application of collateral estoppel principles, an issue raised by the parties in their summary judgment motions. [43]

"Collateral estoppel or issue preclusion is premised on the notion that a judgment in a prior suit 'precludes relitigation of issues actually litigated and necessary to the outcome of the first action.'" United States v. Wight, 839 F.2d 193, 196 (4th Cir. 1987) [*60] (quoting Parklane Hosiery Co. v. Shore, 439 U.S. 322, 326 n. 5, 99 S. Ct. 645, 58 L. Ed. 2d 552 (1979); and 1B J. Moore, Moore's Federal Practice, P0.405(1), at 622-24 (2d ed. 1974)). "When determination of an issue in a prior action [is] necessary and essential to the judgment, the parties to a second action are precluded from later raising that issue." Wight, 839 F.2d at 196 (internal citations omitted). "The doctrine of collateral estoppel may apply to issues litigated in a criminal case which a party seeks to relitigate in a subsequent civil proceeding." (Id.) (citing Emich Motors Corp. v. Gen. Motors Corp., 340 U.S. 558, 568, 71 S. Ct. 408, 95 L. Ed. 534 (1951)) (question raised after jury trial in criminal case - "estoppel extends only to questions 'distinctly put in issue and directly determined' in the criminal prosecution.")) Where the criminal conviction stems from a plea agreement, the "defendant is precluded from retrying issues necessary to his plea agreement in a later civil suit." (Id.)

A determination as to the breadth of the price-fixing conspiracy was not necessary to Arteva's plea agreement. In other words, the Court finds the phrase "first-quality polyester staple" reasonably susceptible to more than one interpretation. Paul [*61] Latten, Arteva Vice President, testified that "first-quality polyester staple" "means that the product met specification as manufactured the first time through the process." (Latten Dep. Tr. at 45-46.) Latten also testified that first-quality polyester staple could include a whole range of fibers. (Latten Dep. at 47-48.) Similarly, Grover Smith ("Smith"), former Hoechst executive and Latten predecessor, testified that first quality polyester staple means that "the polyester you produce meets the standard set by your specifications." (Smith Dep. Tr. at 293-94; Trial Tr. at 205-206.) Smith and Latten agree that nonwoven polyester staple (including fiberfill) could be included within the first-quality polyester staple category. (Id.; See also, Rust Trial Rpt., P18) Therefore, based in part on the testimony of Arteva's own witness, the Court finds that reference to "first-quality polyester staple" is not necessarily limited to fine denier or polyester staple purchased for textile applications as Arteva suggests in its cross motion. [44] However, the converse is also true. Reference to "first-quality polyester staple" within Arteva's Plea Agreement does not necessarily and conclusively establish [*62] that Arteva's antitrust violation encompassed all types of PSF meeting specifications as suggested by Plaintiffs in their summary judgment motion. Therefore, Arteva is not estopped from litigating in this civil action the significance of its guilty plea in the criminal case, and the weight to attribute it, as this specific issue was neither adjudicated nor necessary in the criminal proceedings. See Emich Motors Corp., 340 U.S. at 568-569 (explaining difficulties associated with discerning issues actually adjudicated in antecedent criminal trial).

[42] Stanley testified during the Dutton trial that he and Dutton discussed and agreed about the amount of the second price increase, the timing of said increase, as well as the "need to be religious in [their] approach to policing of the agreement." (9/24/03 Dutton Trial Tr. at 285.) Stanley further admitted to having similar conversations with other alleged co-conspirators. (Id. at 286-287.)

[43] The parties' summary judgment motions are fully briefed and ripe for disposition. (See Documents 503, 509) Plaintiffs urged the Court to not consider the summary judgment motions until resolving the motion for class certification. Given the posture of the case, it makes sense to proceed with the summary judgment issues that bear upon the presentation of Plaintiffs' direct case.

Arteva contends that it only intended to tender a guilty plea with respect to commodity textile polyester staple. George Gregory, Arteva's CEO at the time the guilty plea was tendered, testified that "KoSa pled guilty to price-fixing in the commodity textile polyester staple business based on the actions of Troy Stanley." (Gregory Dep. Tr. at 93.) [*63] (emphasis added) However, the full extent of Stanley's actions are yet to be determined. [45] Further, as discussed, supra, some commodity textile PSF products fall within the nonwoven category (e.g., knit apparel, home furnishings). The question of the parties' intent with respect to Arteva's Plea Agreement cannot be determined as a matter of law.

iii. Common Proof- Troy Stanley's Admissions & Evidence Of Collusion

As of May 10, 1999, Stanley's official title was "Director of Sales and Marketing for U.S. / Canada Commodity Polyester Staple." [46] (Class Pl.s' 3-6-06 Letter Exh. 6) In that position, Stanley's responsibilities were identified as follows: "Develop and implement plan to sell out the production of the commodity machine groups in N.A. serving the Apparel, Home Fashions, Floor Coverings, and Highloft markets." [47] (Id.)

Plaintiffs contend [*64] that every class member would seek to introduce the trial testimony of Troy Stanley from the criminal prosecution of Nan Ya's former sales manager, Robert Bradley Dutton ("Dutton"), which was heard before the undersigned. Portions of Stanley's testimony relate to various price-fixing conversations with his competitors at Wellman, DuPont, and Nan Ya. (Dutton Trial Tr. at 285-287, 293-295.) [48] In addition, Stanley explains the efforts that were made by these entities and their respective representatives to stabilize and maintain the price increases. (Id. at 246, 263, 275-287.)

[44] Compare the language of the price increase announcements during the class period with Arteva's later price increase announcement issued after the class period, which expressly states that the increase in price applies only to its "commodity fine denier polyester staple products." (Hr'g Tr. at 35.)

[45] The Department of Justice did not identify specific victims or any group of victims for purposes of requiring Arteva / KoSa to make restitution.

[46] In Stanley's own words, his title was "Business Director for Textile Staples for United States and Canada." (Stanley Decl., P12)

[47] The word "highloft" is another term for nonwovens. (Stanley Dep. at 88.)

[48] Within the instant order, all references to the trial transcript of related criminal proceedings against Robert Bradley Dutton will be cited as "Dutton Trial Tr. at **."

In addition to Stanley's trial testimony, Arteva relies heavily on the deposition testimony and declaration of Troy Stanley. [49] (Hr'g Tr. at 187.) According to Stanley, the object of the conspiracy was to make profitable the commodity textile PSF industry. (Stanley Decl., PP17-20) Stanley explains that his coordination with competitors corresponded and "focused on certain specific large commodity textile customers." (Stanley Decl., PP3, 21) Stanley [*65] avers that he "communicated with employees of certain other polyester staple manufacturers regarding efforts to coordinate pricing to certain specific polyester staple customers, primarily [not exclusively] in the commodity textile business." (Stanley Decl., P2) (emphasis added)

With respect to nonwovens and floor coverings, Stanley states:

> "[D]uring the period for which I entered my guilty plea, I was just getting up to speed on Arteva's non-wovens and floor coverings business. I was fairly unfamiliar with the customers in these product lines, their pricing, and the products that they purchased from Arteva. Unlike Arteva's large textile mill customers with whom I was either directly involved or for which I personally approved pricing negotiations, others at Arteva were largely responsible for the customer relationships and pricing negotiations at non-wovens and floor [*66] covering accounts, with little to no input from me. My unfamiliarity with and nonparticipation in these businesses was one of the reasons that the non-wovens and floor coverings product lines were generally not the focus of my conversations with my competitors. Those few exceptional discussions we had regarding the floor coverings and non-wovens business lines involved pieces of business particularly important to Arteva. . ."

(Stanley Decl., P39) (emphasis added) Although Stanley claims he was not as intimately involved in these areas of the business, Stanley admits that certain nonwoven and carpet PSF purchasers were discussed with competitors and thereby targeted. For example, Stanley admits he let Brad Dutton of Nan Ya know that Arteva would no longer be pursuing the Shaw Industries account (carpets) because the account was no longer profitable for Arteva. (Id.) Stanley concedes he made an effort to coordinate this account with Brad Dutton of Nan Ya but states that this was the only attempt he made to coordinate any floor covering account with a competitor. [50] (Id.) Stanley's declaration that he focused on the floor covering and non-woven business lines deemed most important to Arteva [*67] is consistent with what is already known about the co-conspirators' strategy regarding allocating fine denier PSF customers.

Stanley's deposition testimony regarding customers purchasing PSF for nonwovens (beyond what is admitted within his declaration) is best described as sketchy. There are numerous occasions where Stanley testified either that he did not know the answer or simply couldn't recall. (Stanley Dep. at 34-35, 42-46, 55-57, 102-104, 113-114, 116.)

Plaintiffs present evidence of a broader, industry-wide conspiracy. In addition to the admissions of Troy Stanley, the testimony of other Arteva employees tends to show not only that the price increase announcements were utilized as a tool to raise prices beyond the fine denier PSF segment, but that PSF prices rose within the nonwoven category as well. Brenda Hough testified that KoSa provided a copy of the price increase announcements [*68] to its employees who were "to go and notify all of [their] existing customers." (Hough Dep. at 39.) Achim Heyer, Business Director for Nonwovens, testified that as the prices of fine denier PSF rose, the price for nonwovens also rose. (Heyer Dep. Tr. at 237-238; 284.) Alice White, then a PSF sales person in the nonwoven division, testified that the prices for her customers increased in conjunction with all three price increases. (White Dep. at 155, 316, 189, 195, 204.)

[49] Plaintiffs argue that Stanley's declaration was "bought and paid for" by Arteva. Without weighing the credibility of the witness, the Court notes that a jury would not have to discredit Stanley's testimony in order to find that the actual impact (of what has already been admitted) exceeded what was originally intended.

[50] According to Stanley, he did not discuss the following floor covering and nonwoven customers (all class representatives except Gulistan) with his competitors: Gulistan, Tex Tech, Carpenter, Fiber Dynamics, Habasit Belting, J.H.N.Y., Inc., Quality Felt, Co., and Southern Fiber, Inc. (Stanley Decl., P40)

In addition to the deposition testimony of Arteva's own sales force, Jim Netzel of DAK testified that DuPont Akra "used price increase announcements to raise all products to all customers." (Netzel Dep. at 128-129.) Sonny Walker, DAK's Vice President, testified that industry-wide prices at DAK rose approximately 22% during the class period. (Walker Dep. at 211-214.) Likewise, David Lambert of Wellman testified that all three price increase announcements applied to all PSF products and were implemented "as broadly as possible." (Lambert Dep. at 212-214; 216-217.)

Documentary evidence also exists to support Plaintiffs' theory that a broader conspiracy existed. Stanley's 2000 corporate performance review, which is written [*69] in the first person, boasts that Stanley "orchestrated price increase[sic] in all market segments." [51] (Pl.s' 3-6-06 Letter; Stanley Dep. Exh. 12) Arteva also proposed at least one meeting with DAK for the purpose of initiating "across the board" discussions on polyester. (Class Pl.s' Exh. H / 2-2-99 Letter) Email correspondence between Sonny Walker and other DAK employees referring to the second price increase directs the recipients to "contact all of your customers." (Pl.s' 3-6-06 Letter, Exh. 16) DAK email correspondence dated June 29, 1999, also indicates that DAK is "leading the price increase in nonwovens." (Pl.s' 3-6-06 Letter, Exh. 15) In October 1999, Walker prepared a "talking points" memo for DAK's sales staff to better prepare them for discussions with customers following the announcements. (Walker Dep. at 55.) The memo responds directly to a hypothetical question about the application of the price increase to all end-users -- "Yes, most staple products are included. A very few exceptions are being made for higher priced specialty products." (Id.)

Plaintiffs [*70] also intend to offer common evidence probative of the alleged collusion amongst the PSF manufacturers. According to Plaintiffs, Defendants met face-to-face as well as communicated via telephone. Stanley testified that the purpose of these communications were to coordinate the price increase announcements, to verify customers' positions during negotiations, and to enforce the agreement. (Dutton Trial Tr. at 293-295.) As detailed in Plaintiffs' memoranda in support, there are phone records documenting hundreds of calls between alleged co-conspirators (e.g., between Stanley and Dutton, between Sonny Walker of DuPont and Dutton, and between Dutton and John Hobson of Wellman, etc.) (Id. at 285-287; Stanley Dep. Tr. at 80-83.) Plaintiffs identify and describe a "whirlwind" of calls amongst the alleged co-conspirators before and after price increase announcements. (Dutton Trial Exh. 3) Defendants' own internal documents also tend to show that the PSF manufacturers were participating in ongoing price discussions with each other. (Pl.s' Exhs. H - L)

iv. Common Proof -- Customer Allocation

Plaintiffs intend to offer evidence establishing that Defendants allocated customers in an effort to guarantee [*71] that each PSF manufacturer maintained a certain market share during the relevant time period. (Dutton Trial Tr. at 246, 263-264, 275, 279, 294.) According to Stanley, the Defendants worked together in order to "co-exist" in the market. (Id. at 263, 275.)

v. Conspiracy's Scope -- Common Question Of Fact

In sum, because there is conflicting evidence upon which a reasonable fact finder could rely, the breadth of the conspiracy, a common question of fact, cannot be decided as a matter of law - no matter how zealously counsel present their respective arguments. [52] FED. R. CIV. P. 56; See Rossignol v. Voorhaar, 316 F.3d 516 (4th Cir. 2003) (When considering each individual motion, the court must take care to "resolve all factual disputes and any competing, rational inferences in the light most favorable" to the party opposing the motion.) (internal citations omitted)

[51] Orchestration of price increases is included within a list of ten (10) purported "Value Added Contributions" by Stanley.

[52] This case may be unique in that the Court did not reach the certification question before discovery was complete. Because the Court is essentially reviewing the same record in evaluating both motions, the Court, applying the appropriate standard of review for resolving cross-motions, finds that Plaintiffs present sufficient evidence [*72] of an industry-wide conspiracy to overcome Arteva's motion for summary judgment on this particular issue, i.e., scope of the alleged conspiracy. As mentioned, supra, the remaining summary judgment rulings will be addressed in a separate Memorandum and Order.

B. Injury In Fact / Impact

In order for a direct purchaser to establish injury in an antitrust conspiracy case alleging price fixing and customer allocation, Plaintiffs need only demonstrate they paid a higher price for polyester staple purchased from Defendants than they would have absent the existence of a conspiracy. Hanover Shoe v. United Shoe Machinery Corp., 392 U.S. 481, 489, 88 S. Ct. 2224, 20 L. Ed. 2d 1231 (1968). The burden of proving antitrust injury (fact of damage or "impact") under the Clayton Act requires "proof of some damage flowing from the unlawful conspiracy; inquiry beyond this minimum point goes only to the amount and not the fact of damage. It is enough that the illegality is shown to be a material cause of the injury; a plaintiff need not exhaust all possible alternative sources of injury in fulfilling its burden of proving compensable injury. . ." Zenith Radio Corp. v. Hazeltine Research, Inc., 395 U.S. 100, 114 n. 9, 89 S. Ct. 1562, 23 L. Ed. 2d 129 (1969); In re S. Cent. States Bakery Prod. Antitrust Litig., 86 F.R.D. 407, 419 (M.D.La 1980) [*73] (plaintiffs must establish a causal link between the conspiracy and the alleged injury). In this circuit, courts are to construe the gravamen of an antitrust action to be "the injury to the plaintiff as an individual, rather than issues relating to an overall conspiracy." See Windham, 565 F.2d at 59. The fact of injury must also be subject to a formulaic proof rather than individualized proof. (Id., 565 F.2d at 68-69.)

"The operative question here is not whether Plaintiffs can establish class-wide impact, but whether class-wide impact may be proven by evidence common to all class members." *In re Bulk [Extruded] Graphite Prods. Antitrust Litig., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16619, 2006 WL 891362, * 10 (D.N.J. April 4, 2006)* (citing In re Mercedes-Benz Antitrust Litig., 213 F.R.D. 180, 190 (D.N.J.2003)).

i. The "Bogosian Short-Cut" & The "Paradigm" Horizontal Price-Fixing Case

The Court's analysis with respect to injury or impact begins with determining whether impact may be presumed or inferred under these facts and what effect, if any, a presumption has on the presentation of evidence. There is persuasive authority holding that "an illegal price fixing scheme presumptively impacts upon all purchasers of a price fixed product [*74] in a conspiratorially affected market." [53] See, e.g., In re Folding Carton Antitrust Litig., 75 F.R.D. 727, 734 (N.D. Ill. 1977); In re Catfish Antitrust Litig., 826 F.Supp. 1019 (N.D.Miss.1993); Tech. Learning Collective, Inc. and Lad Mills, Inc. v. Daimler-Benz Aktiengesellschaft and Mercedez-Benz of North Am., Inc., 1979 WL 1718 (D.Md. August 8, 1979); In re Plywood Antitrust Litig., 76 F.R.D. 570, 584 (E.D.La. 1976) (proof of purchase during relevant period plus proof that defendants conspiratorially increased or stabilized prices allows trier of fact to conclude that the requisite fact of injury occurred.) This presumption is sometimes referred to as the "Bogosian short-cut." See In re Linerboard Antitrust Litig., 305 F.3d 145, 151 (3rd Cir.2002) (citing Bogosian v. Gulf Oil Corp., 561 F.2d 434, 448 (3d Cir.1977)).

In Bogosian v. Gulf Oil Corp., the Third Circuit Court of Appeals explained:

> [W]hen an antitrust violation impacts upon a class of persons who do have standing, there is no reason in doctrine why proof of the impact cannot be made on a common basis so long as the common proof adequately demonstrates some damage to each individual. Whether or not fact of damage can be proven on a common basis therefore depends upon the circumstances of each case . . . If, in this case, a nationwide conspiracy is proven, the result of which was to increase prices to a class of plaintiffs beyond which would obtain in a competitive regime, an individual plaintiff could prove fact of damage simply by proving that the free market prices would be lower than the prices paid and that he made some purchases at the higher price. If the price structure in the industry is such that nationwide the conspiratorially affected prices at the wholesale level fluctuated within a range which, though different in regions, was higher in

[53] In an earlier ruling denying Defendants' motion to compel "downstream discovery," the Court cited Hanover Shoe in support of the rule of law that impact may be presumed in price-fixing or customer allocation conspiracy cases. At that time, the production of "downstream data" by direct and indirect purchasers of PSF was at issue and the burden associated with Defendants' [*75] request was compared to the probative value of evidence not directly related to the transaction between the PSF manufacturer (alleged co-conspirator) and the direct purchaser.

> all regions than [*76] the range which would have existed in all regions under competitive conditions, it would be clear that all members of the class suffered some damage, notwithstanding that there would be variations among all dealers as to the extent of their damage.

Bogosian, 561 F.2d at 454-455 (emphasis added); accord In re Fine Paper Antitrust Litig., 82 F.R.D. 143, 153-154 (E.D.Pa. 1979). The effect of the inference is explained nicely within Technical Learning:

> "[T]he inference of impact does not establish an irrebutable presumption of injury to individual class members. Rather, . . . it merely allows the class member entrance into the damages phase, as a purchaser during the period of the conspiracy. At the damages stage, then, the individual member must show that it paid a price for [the product] that actually was higher than the "competitive, non-conspiratorial price line established by the finder of fact."

Tech. Learning Collective, Inc., 1979 WL 1718, *11. Thus, the inference merely provides those purchasers an opportunity to prove their damages as a result of the alleged injury. [54] Tech. Learning, 1979 WL 1718, *11-12 (citing In re E. Sugar Indus. Antitrust Litig., 73 F.R.D. 322, 347 (N.D.Cal. 1976)); [*77] In re Folding Carton, 75 F.R.D. at 734 (liability determination not contingent upon a carton-by-carton analysis of every sale made under the alleged conspiracy to fix prices - for damages determination). In this line of cases, "the inference of impact raised by proof of the conspiracy is deemed a question common to the class and a permissible form of common proof which satisfies the antitrust class action analysis." [55] (Id.)

Arteva argues that the Fourth Circuit's opinion in Windham prohibits Plaintiffs' reliance on any such presumption. [56] Presumably, Arteva contends that the circuit court's emphasis on the individual nature of antitrust injury within Windham is inconsistent with application of the Bogosian principle and reliance on an inference of general class-wide injury. Although Windham discussed the individual nature of the injury and damages inquiries, Windham did not expressly hold impact can never be presumed or inferred in a horizontal price-fixing case. Tech. Learning Collective, 1979 WL 1718, *10 (Windham court implicitly accepted the proposition that proof of an illegal price-fixing conspiracy raises an inference of general injury to the class); Brown, 92 F.R.D. at 46 ("Windham only proscribes the use of generalized or common class [*79] proofs as to the issue of damages, . . . [but] did not deny that the fact of injury or impact might be the same for each individual plaintiff.")

As the parties suggest, courts applying the Bogosian short-cut rely upon the economics of the industry to justify application (e.g., a limited number of manufacturers control the market, price structure is conducive to demonstration of overall impact, etc.) (Beyer Trial Rpt. P8; Rapp Decl., P2) See also In re Linerboard., 305 F.3d at 152 (Bogosian concept of presumed impact properly applied where defendants' deliberate cut in supply gave rise to price increases); Windham, 565 F.2d at 68 n. 22 (citing with approval cases applying Bogosian principle where process of computing individual damages is "virtually a mechanical task.") A discussion of the requisite market conditions and underlying economic principles leads to Arteva's argument that this case does not "fit the mold."

[54] The undersigned questions whether, as a practical matter, the proof as to these two issues can be severed without reliance on the Bogosian principle. It seems that the inference recognizes that the antitrust injury and damages inquiries overlap (if not embody each other). As a result, the Bogosian shortcut establishes a more manageable framework for analysis. See, In re Bulk [Extruded] Graphite Prods. Antitrust Litig., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16619, 2006 WL 891362, *11 ("[T]he Third Circuit created the "Bogosian short-cut" to deal with the question of impact when there are multiple variables affecting the price paid by the plaintiffs.")

[55] Critics refer to this approach - finding that the fact of conspiracy predominates and relying on the Bogosian shortcut to demonstrate common impact - as "drive-by [*78] certification." See Morrison, Todd A., Economic Issues in Class Certification, Economics and Private Antitrust Litigation Committees ABA Section of Antitrust Law Spring 2004 Meeting. At the time of the 2004 ABA Spring Meeting, Morrison was Vice President of Dr. Rapp's economic consulting firm, National Economic Research Associates Inc. ("NERA"). (Rapp Decl. at 2.)

[56] Plaintiffs do not rely solely on a presumption of injury or impact. Instead, Plaintiff's contend that Arteva's and Troy Stanley's guilty pleas give rise to an inference of injury.

Within the parties' filings, there is much debate about whether the facts here bear comparison [*80] to the "paradigm" horizontal price-fixing case. Plaintiffs contend there is no such thing. [57] According to Arteva, a "paradigm" case is one "where there exists a market-wide conspiracy to raise all prices in a single market for an undifferentiated commodity product." (Def.'s Mem. In Opp'n at 42.) Secondly, Arteva argues that in a "paradigm" case, the illegal agreement effects "some general determinant of everyone's price," (e.g., a specific market price, a floor price, a list price, or some kind of benchmark from which negotiations might start). (Def.'s Mem. In Opp'n at 54.)

Although the undersigned is not persuaded by Arteva's contention [58], the criteria allegedly characteristic of the elusive "paradigm" case are discussed below.

a. Market-Wide Conspiracy

Without delving too deeply into the merits of the action, the Court presumes, for purposes of this Rule 23 motion only, that Plaintiffs will be able to demonstrate the broader, market-wide conspiracy they allege. In re Vitamins, 209 F.R.D. at 267-268 ("The Court must accept the substantive allegations contained in the plaintiffs' complaints as true, but will consider matters beyond the pleadings to ascertain whether the asserted claims or defenses are susceptible of resolution on a class-wide basis."); Bogosian, 561 F.2d at 455 (explaining economic principles that apply if plaintiffs prove that a nationwide conspiracy existed); Monsanto, 400 F.3d at 567 (relevant inquiry is nature of evidence if plaintiffs prove what they allege). If the jury later finds facts consistent with Plaintiffs' allegations, reliance on the Bogosian principle or inference will be sufficient to establish common impact.

b. Undifferentiated Commodity

According to Dr. Beyer, the term [*82] "undifferentiated" is an economic term which "means purchasers do not choose a source of supply based on the identity of the supplier. Price, therefore, is the principal determinant for a purchaser (some economists refer to this as being commodity-like)." (Beyer Trial Reply Rpt., P9) The rationale, as explained by the parties' experts, is that with undifferentiated commodities, a rise in prices to one set of customers necessarily implies a price increase to all customers generally. (Beyer Aff., P12; Rapp Decl., PP8-9 ("if products are undifferentiated commodities, they are perfect substitutes - identical in the eyes of the consumers."))

Here, the majority of PSF can fairly be described as an undifferentiated commodity for purposes of the instant economic analysis. While there is evidence indicating that, on occasion, price is not the primary consideration in PSF purchasing decisions, there is a significant amount of evidence tending to show that price was, in fact, one of the most important factors in purchasing decisions. In addition, the PSF market as a whole is relatively homogeneous in that any given PSF product (a product with certain characteristics and physical properties) produced [*83] by one manufacturer is identical to the same PSF product produced by a different manufacturer. [59] The fact that PSF (once manufactured for the direct purchaser) is not interchangeable across all product types does not warrant a different finding. See In re Flat Glass Antitrust Litig., 191 F.R.D. 472, 485 (W.D.Pa. 1999) (where a Section 1 conspiracy is alleged, "it is appropriate to look beyond surface distinctions between the products because [57] Plaintiffs argue that few of the antitrust cases where plaintiff classes are eventually certified evolved out of non-diverse industries or met all of the criteria Arteva contends are necessary for class action treatment. After reading its fair share of Rule 23(b)(3) "impact" cases, the Court might reasonably conclude that the typical approach is anything but typical. See "Antitrust Class Actions: Chaos In The Courts," 11 Stan. J.L. Bus. & Fin. 1 (2005).

[58] As [*81] Plaintiffs aptly point out, Arteva fails to cite a single price-fixing or customer allocation case that satisfies all of the criteria discussed herein with reference to a "paradigm" horizontal price-fixing case.

[59] A homogeneous product is "one identical to the product sold by others in the industry." (Beyer Trial Reply Rpt., 9 n. 10) (citing Samuelson, Paul A. And Nordhaus, Williams D. Economics (Eighteenth Edition), p. 148 (2005)).

identical products, uniform prices and unitary distribution patterns are not indispensable for class certification in this context.") (internal citations omitted). Thus, PSF may be described as an undifferentiated commodity. [60]

c. Single PSF Product Market

According to Dr. Rapp, there is no single product market for all PSF. (Rapp Decl. at 3, 9) The Court disagrees. The Court is persuaded by the opinion of Dr. Rust that regardless of the different physical properties and characteristics that distinguish the PSF products, there is a single market for PSF products - diverse as they are. Arteva's argument on this question is undermined by the price increase announcements that speak in terms of "polyester staple fiber" as [*85] opposed to specific, differentiated PSF products or categories of products. The record evidence cited herein tends to show that the actual participants in the PSF industry, including the alleged co-conspirator manufacturers, perceive the PSF market as a single market (possibly encompassing smaller sub-markets) notwithstanding the different PSF categories.

d. General Determinant Of Price

The Court next considers whether there exists some general determinant of price within the PSF industry notwithstanding the co-conspirators' practice of conducting individual price negotiations with their customers. In evaluating price, the Court first looks to a case described by Plaintiffs as at least as complicated factually as the instant case. In South Central States Bakery, the court evaluated the propriety of certification in an industry where there were varied pricing arrangements and different types of customers with different purchasing methods. In South Central States Bakery, hundreds of different private and secondary label bakery products ranging from cakes to whole breads to individual pastries sold at both the retail and wholesale level were involved. The proposed plaintiff class consisted [*86] of multiple and diverse categories of customers (e.g., retailers, restaurants, institutional purchasers) with different pricing and purchasing arrangements including discounts, etc. There was no market-wide wholesale price list. Instead, the bakeries maintained separate price lists for each market area. In certifying the class pursuant to Rule 23(b)(3), the district court followed the rationale of the Fifth Circuit - that if there is "some uniformity in the quality and price" of the product, demonstration of impact through common proof is more likely. S. Cent. Bakery, 86 F.R.D. at 421 (quoting Alabama v. Blue Bird Body Co., Inc., 573 F.2d 309, 312 (5th Cir. 1978)); See also Tech. Learning, 1979 WL 1718, *12 (product at issue found to be " uniform in quality and price" because parts were standardized and dealer's pricing policy was influenced by recommended wholesale price). The district court determined that the bakery products were fungible, substitutable, and homogeneous, thereby providing uniformity of quality. (Id. at 421.) The court noted the complex and varied pricing but stated that "non-uniformity of price . . . does not by itself defeat class certification." (Id.) The court [*87] relied in part on the Bogosian principle to simplify the impact analysis. (Id.) In addition to putative class members' proof of purchase during the class period, Plaintiffs also represented they would rely on the following to establish impact: 1) testimony of present and former officers and employees of the bakery companies; 2) the bakery companies' pricing records; and 3) economic testimony from plaintiffs' expert that the conspiracy "would have the effect of fixing, raising, or stabilizing the prices of bakery products at artificially high levels where two or more of the defendants sold bakery products." (Id., at 422.) The class was certified despite the many purported obstacles to certification.

The Court likewise considers whether individual price negotiations preclude Plaintiffs from ably demonstrating common impact. Plaintiffs refer the Court to a district court opinion that certified a class despite the potential for individual proofs as a result of individual negotiations between plaintiffs and defendants. See In re Flat Glass, 191 F.R.D. 472 (W.D.Pa. 1999). Not unlike PSF, the product at the heart of the Flat Glass litigation was sometimes sold as a component for use in other [*88] products. [61] In re Flat Glass, 191 F.R.D. at 475-476 n.6. Thus, different types of flat glass purchasers had different relationships with the manufacturers and pricing arrangements varied for the different purchaser groups. Defendants, whose legal argument mirrors the position advanced by Arteva, opposed certification in part based upon the individually negotiated prices for products within the proposed subclasses and the fact that actual prices paid by putative class members varied. In Flat Glass, the court explained:

> "[E]ven though some plaintiffs negotiated prices, if plaintiffs can establish that the base price from which these negotiations occurred was inflated, this would establish at least the fact of damage, even if the extent of the damage by each plaintiff varied."

In re Flat Glass, 191 F.R.D. at 486 (emphasis added). The district court certified the class and rejected the defense argument that individual price negotiations and actual differences in prices charged precluded class treatment.

In this case, while there is no published price list, the market price for the raw materials used as the primary ingredient for PSF provides some uniformity of price. As mentioned, supra, PSF is defined as being comprised of at least 85% polyethyleneterephthalate (otherwise referred to as "EG" and "PTA"). Dr. Beyer explains in his discussion of supply factors that "[t]he main driver of prices of polyester staple fiber is the cost of the primary inputs, EG and PTA." (Beyer Trial Rpt., P46 n. 70) (citing EDUP008630 - "The cost of PTA and EG is a primary determinant of polyester prices.") Dr. Rapp similarly notes that the cost of raw materials should contribute to the similar movement of PSF prices, at least to a degree. (Rapp Decl. at 21-22.) In other words, the cost of raw materials influenced Defendants' PSF pricing for all PSF products in the same manner a suggested wholesale price would. [62] See Tech. Learning, 1979 WL 1718, *12 (uniformity of price found where dealer's pricing policy was influenced by recommended wholesale price).

The price increase announcements that identified the manufacturers' intended increase in percentages likewise support Plaintiffs' position regarding the market-wide uniformity of price. It is true that following the price increase announcements, Arteva and at least one other manufacturer began customer negotiations with "the last agreed prices for the products that were the subject of the negotiation." (Stanley Decl., P26;Walker Dep. at 31-32.) Nevertheless, to the extent Defendants' new "asking price" was artificially inflated, all PSF customers entering renegotiations were at a disadvantage. See also In re Commercial Tissue Prods., 183 F.R.D. 589, 595 (N.D.Fla. 1998) ("even [*91] if there is considerable individual variety in pricing because of individual price negotiations, class plaintiffs may succeed in proving classwide impact by showing that the minimum baseline for beginning negotiations, or the range of prices which resulted from negotiation, was artificially raised (or slowed in its descent) by the collusive actions of the defendants.")

Arteva contrasts the facts here with those in DeLoach. See DeLoach v. Philip Morris, 206 F.R.D. 551 (M.D.N.C. 2002). In DeLoach, Judge Osteen certified the proposed class where the prices of the products at issue (tobacco) were all determined at auction, without reference to any individual customer relationship or specification. DeLoach, 206 F.R.D. at 563. Arteva contends that the absence of individual negotiations enabled the court to find that proof of the alleged antitrust conspiracy would have resulted in some damage to each individual plaintiff. (Id. at 561.) Plaintiffs argue that certification of a class in DeLoach was entirely consistent with Fourth Circuit law - that certification is proper despite complexity within the industry (e.g., hundreds of grades of tobacco) or some individual issues. (Pl.s' Mem. In Supp. at 3-4.) [*92] While there may be uniformity of quality, [63] price is not entirely uniform as was the case in DeLoach. Arteva suggests that the lack of uniformity in price is troublesome from a proof

[61] The fabricated flat glass products were primarily used for architectural (glass windows and doors for both residential and commercial structures) and automotive (windshields, side and rear [*89] windows) purposes but were also used as a component in the manufacturing of mirrors, doors, appliances and furniture. (Id. at 476.)

[62] With the exception [*90] of Dupont-Akra's "list" prices based upon market segment, there is no evidence that the different PSF market categories had wholly separate price lists.

[63] Customers' preferences with respect to a particular PSF supplier or product do not compel a finding that uniformity in quality is lacking. (Carpenter Dep. at 126-127.) In many cases, customers' preferences had to do more with equipment compatibility and overall performance for the intended use than with quality.

standpoint because even within the PSF categories, prices varied per customer and per product depending on the customer's purchasing volume (bargaining power), the relationship between the manufacturer and the purchaser, and occasionally, the end user's preferences. Many courts find, however, that demonstrating antitrust injury or impact does not require a purchase-by-purchase analysis. [64] See, e.g., In re Folding Carton, 75 F.R.D. at 734 ("liability determination is not contingent upon a carton-by-carton analysis of every sale made under the alleged conspiracy to fix prices . . ."); In re Sugar Industry, 73 F.R.D. at 346 (distinguishing general impact on purchasers from each class member's specific dollar damages); In re Plywood, 76 F.R.D. at 583-584 (same). Rather, Plaintiffs need only establish "some damage" to each individual class member in order to satisfy its burden of proving impact. Zenith Radio Corp., 395 U.S. at 114 n. 9 ("inquiry beyond this minimum point goes only to the amount and not the [*93] fact of damage.")

For all of these reasons, the Court finds that an inference of antitrust injury is permissible at least to the extent Arteva expressly admits it violated the federal antitrust laws. Liability is conceded with respect to putative class members who purchased fine denier PSF for textile applications. Within the category of fine denier PSF, there is uniformity of both quality and price. [65] (Beyer Trial Rpt., P32) Subject to Plaintiffs' proof regarding the conspiracy's scope, an inference of antitrust injury may, in fact, benefit the entire putative class and eliminate the need for any individual inquiry regarding injury or impact. [66]

It is in this context that the Court turns to the parties' expert evidence regarding the efficacy of demonstrating class-wide impact via common proof without the benefit of the Bogosian shortcut. [67]

ii. Common [*95] Impact - Plaintiffs' Expert Testimony

Plaintiffs may also present expert testimony from Dr. John C. Beyer [68] as a means of establishing impact. As a preliminary matter, the Court notes the split of authority with respect to the level of scrutiny a Court should apply to the parties' proffered expert economic testimony. See generally, Klonoff, Antitrust Class Actions: Chaos In The Courts,11 Stan. J.L. Bus. & Fin. 1, at 14-21. Numerous courts find that at the certification stage, the court need only determine whether plaintiffs advance a "plausible" or "valid" methodology for demonstrating that antitrust injury can be proven on a class-wide basis. See, e.g., In re Vitamins, 209 F.R.D. at 267; *In re Bulk [Extruded] Graphite, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16619, 2006 WL 891362, 14; In re Currency Conversion Fee Antitrust Litig., 224 F.R.D. 555, 565 (S.D.N.Y.2004) (citing In re Visa Check, 280 F.3d at 135.) Other courts scrutinize the expert evidence more thoroughly. See, e.g., In re Polypropylene Carpet Antitrust Litig., 996 F.Supp. 18, 25 (N.D.Ga.1997) (predominance requirement only met as to products on price lists); In re Indus. Diamonds Antitrust Litig., 167 F.R.D. 374, 383 (S.D.N.Y. 1996) (same). As noted previously, [*96] the instant case is distinguishable from most because discovery is complete and dispositive motions are ripe. Therefore, the merits of Plaintiffs' legal arguments are properly before the Court in addition to the question of class certification. Further, because Plaintiffs' expert testimony must ultimately be deemed reliable and helpful to the jury before it can be admitted, the Court carefully considers both [64] To the extent individual proof is necessary to demonstrate impact, this element of proof could be litigated in conjunction with an individualized damages inquiry.

[65] In his trial report, Dr. Beyer attempts to reflect the differences [*94] in price, if any, for PSF purchases depending on the size of the customer. If this could be accomplished, there would be an even stronger argument for uniformity of price.

[66] Like Plaintiffs, the Court does not consider the presumption or inference determinative of any issue given that the undersigned now has a complete factual record to rely upon in reaching its decision.

[67] Despite Defendants' argument to the contrary, accepting Plaintiffs' allegations as true for this limited purpose is entirely consistent with the rigorous analysis requirement. In Gariety, the district court erred in accepting at face value Plaintiff's characterization of the efficiency of the industry for purposes of a presumption of reliance under a "fraud-on-the-market theory" (i.e., plaintiffs' assertion that the market is efficient "is enough at the certification stage to find the market is efficient") - not Plaintiffs' conspiracy theory or allegations as a whole. See Gariety, 368 F.3d at 364 (securities case).

[68] Dr. Beyer also provided the expert economic / econometric evidence relied upon in the Vitamins, Flat Glass, Linerboard, Corrugated Container, Carbon Dioxide, Domestic Air, and Mercedes-Benz cases. (Beyer Aff., P3)

the factual bases and the analyses underlying Dr. Beyer's opinions. FED. R. EVID. 702. The Court will not, however, weigh Plaintiffs' expert evidence against the expert evidence submitted by the defense as the weighing of evidence, like evaluating credibility, is a function for the jury. [69] In re Vitamins, 209 F.R.D. at 267-268.

Dr. Beyer explains in his Trial Report that "common impact" implies:

> "the effect of the collusion would [*97] have been widespread and pervasive so as to adversely affect all or nearly all members of the class. This does not, however, imply that every transaction between the defendants and every class member would have been affected by the collusion, but rather all or nearly all of the class members would have been affected by the collusion to fix prices at some point during the class period and they would have paid a price above the competitive price for polyester staple fiber."

(Beyer Trial Rpt., P26)

According to Dr. Beyer, the "[s]alient economic characteristics of the polyester staple fiber market make it likely that collusive anti-competitive behavior such as price-fixing would be successful and have a generalized widespread impact." (Beyer Trial Rpt., P8) In a series of affidavits and reports, Dr. Beyer consistently opines that if Plaintiffs are successful in proving the conspiracy as alleged, the conspiracy "would have impacted all [or nearly all] purchasers of polyester staple fiber, and that all of these purchasers paid higher prices than they would have absent the conspiracy." (Beyer Aff., P12; Beyer Trial Rpt., P8) According to Dr. Beyer, the prices charged by Defendants for their [*98] PSF products "move similarly over time, across products, customers and end use." (Beyer Aff., PP38, 42; Charts 8, 8a / Beyer Trial Rpt., P30; Charts 4a-4d, 5a, 5b)

In considering impact, Dr. Beyer also addressed customer size based on economic theory and experience suggesting that "prices charged by suppliers vary according to the size of the purchaser, i.e., volume purchased by the purchaser." (Beyer Trial Rpt., P32) Dr. Beyer explained that "[s]uppliers give discounts to larger purchasers and charge higher prices for the same product to purchasers who buy small quantities and who buy infrequently." (Id.) Dr. Beyer found that prices for PSF products move similarly over time notwithstanding customer size. (Id.; Charts 6a-6d)

a. Price Structure Analysis

Dr. Beyer's opinion regarding Plaintiffs' ability to demonstrate class-wide impact through common proof is based primarily upon the PSF industry's price structure. (Beyer Aff., PP42-46; Beyer Trial Rpt., P30) If an industry's price structure is such that prices respond similarly to basic market supply and demand forces, then prices would also respond similarly to coordinated pricing activity. (Beyer Aff., P42)

A price structure analysis [*99] considers a number of market conditions that bear on price. Examples of relevant market conditions include: the number of manufacturers and the degree to which the manufacturers control the relevant market; barriers to entry of the market such as the high cost of set up and operations as well as duties levied on imports; overlap in the geographic markets, channels of distribution, and products supplied; the commodity-like nature of the product at issue; and actual transaction data. There is no disagreement with respect to certain of these market conditions. Arteva takes issue with Dr. Beyer's model on common impact (and class-wide damages) being premised in large part on the following conclusions regarding the PSF industry: 1) PSF is an undifferentiated commodity product; and 2) supply substitution occurs among defendant suppliers. [70] (Beyer's Trial Reply Rpt., PP7-13, 37)

Dr. Beyer explains the concept of supply side substitution: "suppliers can choose which type of fibers to manufacture and change their mix of PSF fibers as profit opportunities improve and diminish." (Beyer Trial Reply [*100] Rpt., P11) Supply side substitution is premised upon similarities in price. (Id.) According to Dr. Beyer, all

---

[69] Many courts recite familiar language to the effect that class certification does not require the court to resolve a "battle of the experts."

[70] The undersigned has already addressed the characterization of PSF as an undifferentiated commodity.

producers of PSF have the ability to produce and sell a broad range of PSF [71] but concedes that to do so may not always be profitable. (Beyer Aff., P24; Beyer Dep. at 107.) Dr. Beyer reasons that: 1) the production technology used to produce different polyester staple fiber products is the same; and 2) the cost and effort required to switch from the production of one fiber to another is minimal. (Beyer Aff., P24)

For purposes of the instant motion, the Court credits Dr. Beyer's price structure analysis.

b. Benchmark & Regression Analyses

Dr. Beyer also discusses common impact in conjunction with his proposed methodologies for proving damages on a class-wide basis. [72] (See Section "IV, B, 2") According to Dr. Beyer's forecast model for calculating damages, by October 1999, after the second price increase announcement, impact of the conspiracy is evident. (Beyer Dep.at 229-31; Beyer Trial Rpt., P41; Beyer Trial Reply Rpt., P22) [*101] Pursuant to the same model, the impact period continued through December 2001. (Beyer Trial Rpt., P46) Arteva, in its summary judgment motion, misinterprets Dr. Beyer's statement by attempting to construe the comment as a concession that the only purchasers impacted by the alleged conspiracy are those who experienced actual price increases. (Def.'s Mem. In Supp. at 24-26.) Dr. Beyer's affidavits and reports make clear, however, that the price increase trend begins in or around October 1999. (Beyer Trial Rpt., P41) (prices show "upward trend" starting October 1999). Instead of opining that PSF purchasers who experienced price increases during the class period are the only plaintiffs impacted, Dr. Beyer finds that "the price of polyester staple fiber was greater than it would have been, but for the behavior of the co-defendants" and "Class members would have paid higher prices than they would have absent the alleged collusion." (Beyer Trial Reply Rpt., P57-58) In other words, in some instances, impact might be shown by demonstrating that the "but for" price absent a conspiracy would have been lower than the price actually paid. Hanover Shoe, 392 U.S. at 489; In re Commercial Tissue, 183 F.R.D. at 595 [*102] (recognizing that price may be artificially inflated due to price-fixing even though the actual price did not increase during conspiracy period). Under this rationale, the fact that certain class representatives' prices may have decreased or stayed the same during the class period is irrelevant. [73]

iii. Defense Evidence Regarding Liability

Because the Court must consider the case as a whole, the Court next considers the nature of Arteva's evidence with respect to [*103] liability. Windham, 565 F.2d at 66; Thorn, 445 F.3d at 318; In re Visa Check, 280 F.3d at 138 (court must consider both the claims and defenses in determining whether a putative class meets the requirements of Rule 23(b)(3)). Arteva plans to challenge liability with respect to the direct purchasers of PSF for use in nonwoven products. [74] In response to Plaintiffs' theory of overall or class-wide impact, Arteva contends there is no evidence that any entities other than the fine denier (textile) PSF purchasers were impacted by the alleged conspiracy. Arteva's conclusory statement does not square with the evidence. (See Section "IV, 1A") The Court has already determined that the nature of the evidence regarding impact is dependent upon the jury's findings of violation. Moreover, Plaintiffs do not have to rule out all possible alternative causes to demonstrate compensable injury. Zenith Radio Corp., 395 U.S. at 114 n. 9.

[71] According to Plaintiffs, "supply substitutability doesn't mean that every product must be able to be produced on every production line." (Hr'g Tr. at 87.)

[72] Plaintiffs contend that any one of Dr. Beyer's three independent analyses is sufficient and may be relied on by the Court as an available method for demonstrating common impact.

[73] Arteva posits that 191 of 395 total PSF customers, equal to 48.4%, did not experience any price increase on any polyester staple fiber product during the Class Period. (Warren Decl., PP1, 2) According to Arteva, putative class representatives Hollander Home Fashions, J.H.N.Y., and Habasit Belting fall within this category. Arteva also represents that for customers that purchased PSF both before and after the June 1999 price increase announcement, 84 of the 288 customers (equal to 29.2%) did not experience any price increase. (Warren Decl., PP1, 3)

[74] Arteva advances the same argument with respect to damages. However, many class actions still require individual damages determinations. Thus, courts consider the presentation of individual proof as to damages less troublesome (from a trial management standpoint) than [*104] individual proof of injury or impact.

Other defenses Arteva claims it will assert at trial are: 1) a mitigation defense with respect to fiberfill purchasers; 2) an indirect purchaser / improper party to assert damages defense depending upon the agreement between the purchaser and end use customer; and 3) lack of injury / impact where the putative class member purchased only from a single PSF manufacturer. (Def.'s Mem. In Opp'n, at 32-35.) To the extent Arteva's defenses are consistent with the applicable law, [75] the defenses will apply differently to various class representatives. However, the fact that a defense "may arise and may affect different class members differently does not compel a finding that individual issues predominate over common ones." In re Visa Check, 280 F.3d at 138 (affirming certification of class despite potential for individual issues regarding mitigation of damages) (quoting Waste Mgmt. Holdings, Inc. v. Mowbray, 208 F.3d 288, 296 (1st Cir.2000)).

It bears repeating that predominance under Rule 23(b)(3) requires that [*105] common issues predominate, but does not require all issues to be common. See In re Se. Hotel Properties Ltd. P'ship Inv. Litig., 151 F.R.D. 597, 603 (W.D.N.C. 1993) (Rule 23(b)(3) "does not require that each issue in the case be common to all members, but only that there are substantial common issues which predominate over the individual ones.") (citing S. Carolina Nat'l Bank v. Stone, 139 F.R.D. 325 (D.S.C.1991)); In re Visa Check, 280 F.3d at 140. As explained herein, the Court finds that questions regarding the scope of the conspiracy present the predominant common factual issue for trial. Although the potential for individual liability issues exists (depending on the jury's findings), Plaintiffs may also be entitled to rely upon the Bogosian principle and Dr. Beyer's current analyses for proof of common impact. In any event, any individual issues regarding the existence of antitrust injury could be decided in conjunction with the damages phase of the trial and eliminate the greatest obstacle to class certification.

2. Damages

Class representatives must establish that each individual putative class member has sustained actual antitrust injury as a result of the alleged conspiracy. [*106] Zenith Radio, 395 U.S. at 114 n. 9; Windham, 565 F.2d at 59. The inquiry as to damages necessarily requires individual proof.

In Windham, the Fourth Circuit cited Professor Handler's antitrust publication with approval in speaking about the treble damage remedy provided by the Clayton Act:

> "The treble-damage remedy is . . . limited by its (own) terms . . . The language that Congress used . . . leaves no room for awarding damages to some amorphous "fluid class" rather than, or in addition, to one or more actually injured persons. It likewise does not permit any person to recover damages sustained not by him, but by someone else who happens to be a member of such class."

Windham, 565 F.2d at 66 (quoting Handler, Twenty-fourth Annual Antitrust Review, 72 Col. L. Rev. 1, 37 (1972)).

The necessity of individualized proof as to damages does not defeat the instant motion. "Rule 23 contains no suggestion that the necessity for individual damage determinations destroys commonality, typicality, or predominance, or otherwise forecloses certification." See Gunnells, 348 F.3d at 428-29 (rejecting defense argument that individual proof of damages for class members precludes certification). "In fact, Rule 23 [*107] explicitly envisions class actions with such individualized damage determinations." (Id.) (noting that Rule 23(c)(4) permits courts to certify a class with respect to particular issues and contemplates possible class adjudication of liability issues with class members individually proving the amounts of their respective claims). The Gunnells panel stated that when money damages are being sought, courts "usually" require individual proof of the amount of damages. (Id.,) (citing 5 Moore's Federal Practice § 23.46[2][a] (1997)). Other Fourth Circuit cases have likewise consistently rejected this argument. See Cent. Wesleyan, 6 F.3d at 189; Hill v. W. Elec. Co., Inc., 672 F.2d 381, 387 (4th Cir.1982) ("Bifurcation of . . . class actions proceedings for hearings on . . . damages is now commonplace.")

[75] The Court questions whether Arteva can pursue an "indirect purchaser / improper party" defense against a direct purchaser putative class member.

According to Dr. Beyer, there are two steps to determining the amount of Plaintiffs' damages: 1) to determine the percentage of the illegal overcharge (i.e., elevation in price attributable to the alleged collusion); and 2) to apply the percentage overcharge to the dollar value of purchases by class members (from the defendants) to calculate the actual dollar amount of damages. (Beyer Trial Rpt., [*108] P33)

Dr. Beyer presents two options for determining class-wide damages: 1) benchmark analysis; and 2) regression analysis. Both methods have been successfully utilized in numerous class proceedings and are generally accepted methodologies for determining class-wide impact and damages in the antitrust context. In re Vitamins, 209 F.R.D. at 267-268; In re Flat Glass, 191 F.R.D. at 486 ("There is no dispute that when used properly multiple regression analysis is one of the mainstream tools in economic study and it is an accepted method of determining damages in antitrust litigation.");In re Linerboard, 305 F.3d at 153-154 (multiple regression analysis approved as a potential method of demonstrating common impact); Rubinfield, Daniel L. "Reference Guide on Multiple Regression," REFERENCE MANUAL ON SCIENTIFIC EVIDENCE, 2<nd> ed., Federal Judicial Center, 2000 pp. 179-227.

The benchmark approach to assessing damages on a class-wide basis involves two steps. (Beyer Aff., P48) The first step is to determine the extent to which prices during the conspiracy period were higher than they would have been absent the conspiracy. (Id.) This disparity is generally referred to as the percentage overcharge. [*109] (Id.) The second step is to apply the percentage overcharge to the unit or dollar volume of each class member's purchases from the Defendants during the class period. (Id.) Dr. Beyer proposes two different benchmarks for purposes of arriving at the percentage overcharge. (Id., PP50, 51) The "before and after" benchmark compares the Defendants' actual prices for PSF during the class period with competitive prices before the class period. (Id., P50) The second benchmark identified by Dr. Beyer compares the prices during the conspiracy with prices after the conspiracy. (Id., P51)

Regression analysis is also used to estimate the percentage of overcharge resulting from the alleged collusion. (Beyer Trial Rpt., P34) Regression analysis may be used in conjunction with, or as an alternative to, a benchmark methodology. (Beyer Aff., P53) Regression analysis is a statistical technique that quantifies the relationship between a variable and one or more other variables. "[T]he purpose of the regression analysis is to estimate what the price would be during a period that the alleged conspiracy would not take place . . . ." (Beyer Dep. at 58.) In estimating the "but for" price, the regression analysis [*110] attempts to control for ordinary market factors so that the effect of a conspiracy, if any, on price can be isolated. . . ." (Id. at 58-59; Beyer Aff., P53) Dr. Beyer uses two different regression analyses in trying to estimate the overcharge - the forecast model and the binary variable model. (Id., P43) According to Dr. Beyer, each of these individual analyses supports his findings regarding overcharge in the other model. (Id.) Dr. Beyer uses the same techniques to arrive at his estimate regarding the actual amount of monetary damages. (Id., P51)

For purposes of calculating damages, Dr. Beyer considers the relevant period to begin December 1999 and continue through July 2001. [76] (Beyer Trial Rpt., P41 n. 63, 64) In his calculations, Dr. Beyer attempts to account for various demand and supply factors as well as the passage of time. Arteva's experts, Drs. Johnson and Rapp, criticize Dr. Beyer's "single-equation" damages analyses based on the failure to account for different supply and demand conditions for the different types of PSF. (Def.'s Exh. 6 / Johnson & Rapp Decl., P18) Johnson and Rapp contend that the PSF customers are "diverse in their buying power and in the nature of their [*111] demands for different types of staple products." (Id., P30) As a result, Defendants' experts propose to utilize both product and customer "fixed effects."

Although the Court rejects many of the criticisms launched by Arteva, the Court has some concern that Dr. Beyer's economic damages analyses do not adequately address the differences between the various PSF market segments upon which his analyses are based - fiberfill, knits, wovens, nonwovens, carpets. Of these, the nonwoven category

[76] The relevant time period for calculation of damages does not correspond with the alleged period of impact described by Dr. Beyer (December 1999 through September 2001) because the class period, as alleged by Plaintiffs' Class Complaint, ends in July 2001. (Beyer Trial Rpt., PP41, 46)

(or PSF purchased for manufacturing nonwovens) is the most diverse. (Walker Dep. at 191, 131 (nonwovens are "pretty specialized")).

Within the nonwoven category, the fiberfill market seems to be the most readily distinguishable from the other PSF markets. Arteva's Paul Latten describes the fiberfill market as a more competitive PSF market category as a result of imports from South Korea and Taiwan. (Latten, P31) Achim Heyer, [*112] who oversaw Arteva's nonwovens, also testified about the competitive market conditions for fiberfill PSF due to Asian imports. (Heyer Dep. Tr. at 238.) Class representatives, Carpenter, Tex Tech and Fiber Dynamics each purchased fiberfill from foreign PSF producers during the relevant time period. (Carpenter Dep. at 50-58; Tex Tech Dep. at 61-62, 123-124, 126; Fiber Dynamics Dep. at 99-100.) The ability to purchase PSF from foreign suppliers, presumably at a lower price, was not an option in the other PSF markets. (Beyer Aff., P23) (defendants' control of domestic PSF market leaves purchasers no practical alternative to purchasing PSF at an artificially inflated price). Non-Class Plaintiff Carolina Mills' corporate representative explains that fiberfill is "used in an entirely different market than we participate in." (Groce Dep. at 50-51.) Moreover, the differentiations that exist within the other PSF categories do not exist with respect to the PSF fiberfill category. The parties agree that PSF purchased for use as fiberfill is a "pure commodity." (Hollander Dep. at 53; Carpenter Dep. at 126-127; Hr'g Tr. at 165.)

In Linerboard, one of the more recent cases applying the Bogosian principle [*113] cited by Plaintiffs, the Third Circuit explained:

> "if variation in price dynamics among . . . marketing areas were such that in certain areas the free market price would be no lower than the conspiratorially affected price, it might be possible to designate subclasses to conform with these variations."

Linerboard, 305 F.3d at 151 (citing Bogosian, 561 F.2d at 455.) Because the fiberfill sub-market is arguably subject to different economic conditions than the other sub-markets within the PSF industry, it may be proper to create a subclass solely for fiberfill purchasers during the damages phase of the trial.

Both sides proffer their respective experts' proposed modifications to the opposing party's damages calculations. (See Johnson & Rapp Decl., PP47-54; Beyer's Trial Reply Rpt., PP52-57) To the extent Dr. Beyer erred in failing to exclude the sales of the "opt-outs" or Non-Class Plaintiffs, in his damages models, Dr. Beyer concedes the mistake and represents that his models can be revised. (Beyer Dep. at 76, 80, 83-84.) Regardless of the exact approach, the parties' submissions demonstrate that calculation of damages for each individual class member is susceptible to one or more formulaic [*114] applications that can be presented along with individual evidence as is necessary.

3. Superiority

In deciding whether certification of a class is superior to other trial methods, the Court considers "whether the resolution of common issues advances the litigation as a whole, as opposed to leaving a large number of issues for case-by-case adjudication." Barbara J. Rothstein & Thomas E. Willging, Managing Class Action Litigation: A Pocket Guide for Judges, Federal Judicial Center, §2C (2005). Based upon the number of common issues of fact identified herein, and the effect each of these common issues has upon the remaining aspects of the litigation, the Court finds that certification is superior to any other trial method.

i. Rule 23 Factors

The Court begins its superiority analysis with a discussion of the factors identified within Rule 23. As for the first criterion, the interest of members in the class in individually controlling the prosecution or defense of separate actions, a number of class members (approximately 37 large textile / fine denier PSF customers) have already effectively "opted out" via prosecution of their own individual actions. Arteva contends that the number of opt-outs [*115] is indicative of the market forces. On the other hand, the class representatives appear to be content to proceed as a class and rely upon appointed co-lead counsel. The fact that a substantial putative class remains weighs in favor of certification. Although Plaintiffs' "death knell" argument [77] is not particularly persuasive, the fact that many of the smaller PSF purchasers remain in the putative class favors certification. [78] Similarly, the fact that many of the class members facing potentially the most difficult obstacles to establishing liability (PSF customers in the nonwoven category), remain in the putative class likewise favors certification.

The second factor, the extent and nature of any litigation concerning the controversy already commenced by or against members of the class, overlaps with the first factor [*116] and allows the Court to consider the "opt-outs'" choices to pursue their own individual actions. Rather than read any purported conflict into the decision of the large textile mills to "opt-out," common sense teaches that the fine denier PSF customers didn't need to rely on Rule 23 and engage in protracted class litigation because, relative to some other putative class members, they already had "slam dunk" cases.

Next, it is desirable to concentrate litigation of the claims in this particular forum given that the locus of the action lies within North and South Carolina, and particularly within the Western District of North Carolina. Desirability of the forum is likewise demonstrated by the consolidation of these pretrial proceedings and subsequent assignment to this Court pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1407 by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation.

In light of the posture of this case, the final consideration - the difficulties in the management of a class action - only applies now to resolution of the remaining issues raised within the parties' cross-motions for summary judgment, final pretrial preparation, trial, and post-trial motions practice - the logistics of a class action trial [*117] being the most complicated of these final phases. Given the demonstrated assistance of able counsel on both sides, any management issues that may arise can be overcome.

ii. Alternatives To Certification Of Proposed Class

The Court has also considered several alternatives to certification of the class as proposed by Class Plaintiffs. [79] The most appealing of the alternatives to wholesale certification lies within Rule 23 itself. Rule 23(c)(4)(A) permits a class to be certified for specific issues or elements of claims. In Gunnells, the Fourth Circuit panel mentioned the admonition in A.H. Robbins, 880 F.2d at 740, to take full advantage of this provision. Gunnells, 348 F.3d at 426. The Court would utilize Rule 23(c)(4)(A) and limit certification to the issue of liability if it were clear that the Bogosian principle applied to the entire putative class, eliminating the need for any significant evidence on the question of antitrust injury. However, without the benefit of the inference, the questions of impact and damages are too closely intertwined to sever or bifurcate. Brown, 92 F.R.D. at 42.

Another alternative to certification as suggested is the creation of subclasses. The creation of subclasses is required where the differences amongst putative class members warrant separate class representatives and separate counsel. Because the Court does not find any fundamental conflicts amongst the putative class members, the creation of subclasses is not required. [80]

[77] A death-knell argument is one that failure to certify the class would be a death knell to (or put an end to) most remaining plaintiffs' ability to prosecute their cases individually.

[78] In fact, Dr. Beyer's charts indicate that the smaller PSF purchasers are also the putative class members subject to the greatest percentage price increases. (Beyer Trial Rpt., Charts 6a-6d)

[79] Arteva does not address any of these possibilities, nor did Arteva suggest an alternative to certification [*118] of the proposed class.

[80] Subclasses may also be created to accommodate individual proof or address factual differences amongst class members. In re Gen. Motors Corp. Engine Interchange Litig., 594 F.2d 1106 (7th Cir.1979); Campus Cleaners, Inc. v. Dallas Tailor & Laundry Supply, 1977 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14186, 1977WL1490 (S.D.Tex. 1977); Brown, 92 F.R.D. at 41 (if factual differences between plaintiffs are uncovered, division of the class into subclasses might be an option). Arguably, division of the putative class into one or more smaller, separate subclasses (in a manner consistent with one of the several categorizations of PSF products proposed by the litigants or to distinguish the PSF fiberfill purchasers) might render any given phase of the trial more manageable. In certifying the class, the Court does not rule out the possibility of creating [*119] subclasses to aid in the proper allocation of Another creative mechanism would be to employ a test case approach (i.e., a "bellwether" trial). Since there is no question regarding liability as to Thomaston Mills and the other fine denier PSF purchasers, the Court could suggest the parties agree to proceed to trial with one of its other class representatives that purchase PSF for use in nonwoven goods. In light of Arteva's arguments opposing certification, it is doubtful Arteva would agree to this trial method.

Other management tools available to the court not already discussed are: appointing a magistrate judge or special master to preside over individual damages proceedings; decertifying the class after the liability trial and providing notice to class members concerning how they may proceed to prove damages; and altering or amending the class. To date, the undersigned has not referred any of the motions in this case to a magistrate judge or special master. [*120] For efficiency's sake, it makes more sense for this district judge to preside over any remaining aspects of the litigation. Decertification after a trial resolving liability does not appear to be necessary or efficient. The undersigned is uncomfortable with altering or amending the class beyond what has already been suggested regarding the possible use of subclasses.

For all of these reasons, certification of a direct purchaser class as proposed by Plaintiffs provides an efficient and superior mechanism for the hundreds of putative class members to prosecute their claims against Arteva. Certification will also promote consistency and protect the Defendant from inconsistent adjudications. Gunnells, 348 F.3d at 426; FED. R. CIV. P. 23(c)(2)(B).

Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(1) provides for the dismissal of a claim when the federal court lacks jurisdiction over the subject matter.

Civil Procedure > ... > Responses > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss

HN3[] Jurisdiction, Subject Matter Jurisdiction

In considering a motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, the court must assume the truth of the material factual allegations contained in a complaint. However, jurisdiction must be shown affirmatively, and that showing is not made by drawing from the pleadings inferences favorable to the party asserting it. In fact, where jurisdictional facts are placed in dispute, the court has the power and obligation to decide issues of fact by reference to evidence outside the pleadings, such as affidavits.

Civil Procedure > Pleading & Practice > Pleadings > Rule Application & Interpretation

HN4[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2) requires a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief. When a complaint is attacked by a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, the plaintiff need not provide detailed factual allegations. When deciding a defendant's motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6), a judge must accept as true all of the factual allegations contained in the complaint and draw all reasonable inferences in plaintiff's favor.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN5[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

To survive a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, the allegations in the complaint must meet the standard of "plausibility." A complaint must amplify a claim with some factual allegations to render the claim plausible. In other words, it must provide the grounds upon which the plaintiff's claim rests through factual allegations sufficient to raise a right to relief above the speculative level. Moreover, although the court must take the plaintiff's allegations as true, the claim may still fail as a matter of law if the claim is not legally feasible.

Contracts Law > Remedies > Reformation

HN6[] Remedies, Reformation

Reformation of a contract should be allowed only where mutual mistake or fraud is clearly established, particularly when the negotiations were conducted by sophisticated, counseled business people.

Contracts Law > Remedies > Reformation

HN7[] Remedies, Reformation

The complaint in a suit for the reformation of a written instrument must set forth (1) an agreement other than that expressed in the instrument; (2) the written instrument sought to be reformed; and (3) mutual mistake of the parties, or the mistake of one party and the fraud of the other.

Contracts Law > Remedies > Reformation

HN8[] Remedies, Reformation

To prevail on a claim for reformation, a petitioning party has to show in no uncertain terms, not only that mistake or fraud exists, but exactly what was really agreed upon between the parties.

Contracts Law > Remedies > Reformation

HN9[] Remedies, Reformation

A bare claim of unilateral mistake by the plaintiff, unsupported by legally sufficient allegations of fraud on the part of defendants, does not state a cause of action for reformation.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Intellectual Property > Misuse of Rights > Patent Misuse Defense

HN10[] Misuse of Rights, Patent Misuse Defense

Patent misuse is an equitable defense to patent infringement. It arose to restrain practices that did not in themselves violate any law, but that drew anticompetitive strength from the patent right, and thus were deemed to be contrary to public policy. The purpose of the patent misuse defense was to prevent a patentee from using the patent to obtain market benefit beyond that which inheres in the statutory patent right. As the U.S. Supreme Court has explained, the doctrine of patent misuse bars a patentee from using the "patent's leverage" to extend the monopoly of his patent to derive a benefit not attributable to the use of the patent's teachings, such as requiring a licensee to pay a royalty on products that do not use the teaching of the patent. The key inquiry is whether, by imposing conditions that derive their force from the patent, the patentee has impermissibly broadened the scope of the patent grant with anticompetitive effect.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Intellectual Property > Misuse of Rights > Patent Misuse Defense

HN11[] Misuse of Rights, Patent Misuse Defense

Patent misuse, which developed long before the advent of antitrust law, has largely merged with antitrust law. Misuse is closely intertwined with antitrust law, and most findings of misuse are conditioned on conduct that would also violate the antitrust laws.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Intellectual Property > Misuse of Rights > Patent Misuse Defense

HN12[] Misuse of Rights, Patent Misuse Defense

Since the enactment of the Patent Misuse Reform Act of 1988, imposing conditions on a patent license is not patent misuse unless the patentee has power in the relevant market. No patent owner otherwise entitled to relief for infringement of a patent shall be denied relief or deemed guilty of misuse or illegal extension of the patent right by reason of his having sought to enforce his patent rights against infringement, or refused to license or use any rights to the patent; or conditioned the license of any rights to the patent or the sale of the patented product on the acquisition of a license to rights in another patent or purchase of a separate product, unless, in view of the circumstances, the patent owner has market power in the relevant market for the patent or patented product on which the license or sale is conditioned.

HN13[] Misuse of Rights, Patent Misuse Defense

A patentee's market power is necessary, but not sufficient, for a finding of patent misuse based on conditional licensing. Historically, courts have acknowledged a presumption of monopoly power from the mere possession of a patent, but more recently, courts have expressly rejected such a presumption, holding that in both patent misuse and antitrust cases involving a tying arrangement, the plaintiff must prove that the defendant has market power in the tying product.

HN14[] Misuse of Rights, Patent Misuse Defense

Because the statute, 35 U.S.C.S. § 271(d), is phrased in the negative, it does not require that patent misuse be found in the case of all such conditional licenses in which the patent owner has market power; instead, the statute simply excludes such conditional licenses in which the patent owner lacks market power from the category of arrangements that may be found to constitute patent misuse.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Intellectual Property > Misuse of Rights > Patent Misuse Defense

HN15[] Misuse of Rights, Patent Misuse Defense

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit held in B. Braun that while patent misuse may satisfy an element of a plaintiff's antitrust claim, a plaintiff may not recover damages when seeking a declaratory judgment of patent misuse. B. Braun did not proscribe claims seeking a declaratory judgment of patent misuse. Indeed, the Federal Circuit has allowed such claims.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN16[] Sherman Act, Claims

In order to survive a motion to dismiss, a claim under § 1 and § 2 of the Sherman Act must allege a relevant geographic and product market in which trade was unreasonably restrained or monopolized. A relevant product market consists of products that have reasonable interchangeability for the purposes for which they are produced--price, use and qualities considered. Products will be considered to be reasonably interchangeable if consumers treat them as acceptable substitutes.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN17[] Sherman Act, Claims

Where the plaintiff fails to define its proposed relevant market with reference to the rule of reasonable interchangeability and cross-elasticity of demand, or alleges a proposed relevant market that clearly does not encompass all interchangeable substitute products even when all factual inferences are granted in plaintiff's favor, the relevant market is legally insufficient and a motion to dismiss may be granted.

To state an attempted monopolization claim, a plaintiff must establish (1) that the defendant has engaged in predatory or anticompetitive conduct with (2) a specific intent to monopolize and (3) a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power.

[*542] OPINION AND ORDER

SHIRA A. SCHEINDLIN, U.S.D.J.:

I. INTRODUCTION

Chandra Sekar ("Sekar") invented an inexpensive industrial process for manufacturing plastic paint rollers. In 1996, Sekar was awarded a patent (the "'790 Patent") for this invention, giving him the right to exclude others from using his process (the "'790 process") to manufacture paint rollers. [1] In 1998, Sekar entered into a license agreement (the "Agreement" or "1998 Agreement") with Linzer Products Corporation ("Linzer"), a manufacturer of paint rollers, permitting Linzer to use his '790 process in exchange for royalties. [2] Shortly thereafter, Linzer began using the '790 process to manufacture one-ply paint rollers, paying royalties to Sekar for each roller.

In 2000, Sekar was awarded a second patent (the "'134 Patent") for another invention, a process for manufacturing plastic paint rollers having two or more layers (the "'134 process"). [3] With Sekar's knowledge and assistance, Linzer began manufacturing two-ply paint rollers (in addition to its one-ply roller production). Accordingly, Linzer also began paying royalties for its two-ply roller production at the same rate it had paid for its one-ply rollers.

The parties operated amicably on these terms until 2006, when they began to disagree about the amount of royalties owed. Linzer clamed that it had no obligation to pay any royalties for its use of the two-ply process because this process was not covered by the '790 Patent. As explained below, the relationship deteriorated, and Sekar eventually threatened to sue Linzer if Linzer refused to negotiate new royalty terms for its use of the two-ply process.

Instead [3] of waiting for Sekar to sue, Linzer filed this lawsuit, bringing a number of state and federal claims against Sekar, [*543] including: (1) breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing; (2) breach of warranty; (3) breach of contract; (4) unjust enrichment; and (5) various antitrust violations under both federal and state law. Linzer also asks the Court for several declaratory judgments relating to (1) the parties' rights with respect to the Agreement; (2) the alleged unenforceability of certain provisions of the Agreement in light of principles of patent law and federal and state antitrust law; and (3) the alleged invalidity of the patents-in-suit.

Pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(1) and 12(b)(6), Sekar moves to dismiss most, but not all, of these claims. [4] For the following reasons, Sekar's motion to dismiss is granted in part and denied in part.

II. BACKGROUND

A. Sekar Invents the '790 Process

Linzer is a New York corporation in the business of manufacturing paint application products, including paint rollers. Sekar is an individual residing in New York. Sekar invented a process for manufacturing paint rollers from a thermoplastic called polypropylene and received the '790 Patent for that process in 1996. Sekar is a joint owner of the '790 Patent with Newell Operating Company ("Newell"). [5] Newell manufactures plastic products and competes with Linzer in the paint-roller market. [6]

Nor does he move to dismiss Linzer's requests (1) for a declaratory judgment that Sekar is estopped from terminating the Agreement [4] or (2) for a declaratory judgment that part of the Agreement is an unenforceable unlawful restrictive covenant under New York law.

B. Linzer and Sekar Execute the 1998 Licensing Agreement

In April 1998, Linzer and Sekar executed the Agreement, [5] granting Linzer a royalty-bearing license to use the '790 Patent to manufacture "Licensed Products." [7] It also grants Linzer royalty-free licenses to use Sekar's related knowledge and trade secrets, [8] and any of Sekar's future inventions relating to polypropylene paint roller [*544] manufacturing. [9] The Agreement also included a sale of two machines for manufacturing paint rollers to be delivered and installed by Sekar at Linzer's facilities. [10] In addition, each party made express warranties to the other. Sekar warranted that "[a]s of the Agreement Date . . . he [was] not aware of anything that would effect [sic] the validity of the Patent Rights . . . ." [11] Linzer warranted "that during the Term of this Agreement it shall not manufacture or sell any Polypropylene Paint Roller unless it is a Licensed Product." [12] Finally, the Agreement provides that certain rights and obligations will survive termination of the Agreement, including Linzer's royalty-free licenses to Sekar's knowledge, trade secrets, and future inventions. [13]

Pursuant to the Agreement, Sekar delivered and installed two machines at Linzer facilities, which Linzer used to manufacture one-ply rollers. The process that these machines employed (the "Linzer one-ply process") was similar, though not identical, to Sekar's '790 process.

C. Sekar Invents the Multi-Ply '134 Process

Chandra Sekar's Motion to Dismiss ("Def. Rep.") at 12; 5/2/07 Letter from Keith A. Walter, counsel for Linzer, to the Court ("5/2/07 Walter Letter"), at 1.

[6] See Def. Rep. at 12.

[7] See Agreement § 2.1 ("During the Term of this Agreement . . . Sekar hereby grants to Linzer, under the Patent Rights, a royalty-bearing, non-exclusive right and license [6] to make, use, and/or sell Licensed Products in the Territory."). For purposes of this dispute, the Agreement defines "Licensed Products" as "length[s] of Polypropylene Paint Roller . . . manufactured using a process or apparatus claimed in" "a claim of the Patent Rights which has not been withdrawn, canceled, disclaimed, abandoned, or held invalid, unpatentable, or unenforceable by a tribunal of competent jurisdiction . . . ." Id. §§ 1.4-1.7. "Patent Rights means Sekar's joint interest in and to United States Letters Patent No. 5,572,790 . . . ." Id. § 1.2. The Agreement also sets out a quarterly schedule by which Linzer must pay royalties to Sekar based on the number of Licensed Products manufactured by Linzer. See id. §§ 3.2-3.3.

[8] See id. § 6.2 ("Sekar grants and agrees to grant to Linzer a royalty free, fully paid up, perpetual right and license to use the Sekar Know-how in connection with the manufacture of Polypropylene Paint Rollers.").

[9] See id. § 8.1 ("In the event that Sekar invents an invention related to the Technology . . . Sekar hereby grants and agrees to grant to Linzer during the Term of this Agreement a fully paid-up, royalty-free right and license to practice the invention [7] throughout the world.").

[10] See id. § 11.1 (Sekar to deliver and install two machines at Linzer's facilities; Linzer to pay $ 75,000 for each machine upon delivery and before installation).

[13] "Upon the expiration of the Term of this Agreement, or earlier termination as permitted herein, all rights and obligations hereunder shall terminate, except for such rights and/or obligations in Sections 6.2, 6.4, 7.3, 8.1, 8.2, 9.2, 9.3, 9.4, 9.5, 10.5 and this Section 16, which rights and/or obligations shall survive termination of this Agreement." Id. § 16.2 (underline in original).

Sekar later invented another process for manufacturing paint rollers, for which he received the '134 Patent in December 2000. [14] This process is used to produce multi-layer or multi-ply paint rollers. In 2002, with Sekar's assistance, Linzer implemented a two-ply roller production [8] process (covered by the '134 Patent) and began producing two-ply rollers. [15] Linzer paid royalties for its two-ply roller production at the same royalty rate that the Agreement set for Linzer's use of the one-ply process. [16]

D. Linzer and Sekar Dispute Their Obligations Under the Agreement

Linzer and Sekar performed the Agreement to the satisfaction of both parties until February 2006, when Sekar began an audit of Linzer's royalty payments. [17] Responding to the audit, Linzer instituted its own review of the terms of the Agreement to verify which of Linzer's processes were covered by the '790 and '134 Patents. After this review, Linzer took the position that its royalty payments for its two-ply process had been paid mistakenly. Linzer's position was -- and is -- that its two-ply process was within the scope of the '134 Patent (which it had a royalty-free license to use), and not within the scope of the '790 Patent (which it had a royalty-bearing [*545] license to use). Sekar disagreed, responding that Linzer's two-ply [9] process was covered by both the '134 and '790 Patents, and therefore royalties were owed. [18] The parties began a series of discussions to resolve their differences. At the same time, Linzer obtained an opinion of counsel that the '790 Patent was invalid and another opinion that Linzer's two-ply process did not infringe the '790 Patent. Linzer provided these opinions of counsel to Sekar in August and September 2006 under a written agreement pursuant to Rule 408 of the Federal Rules of Evidence regarding inadmissibility of communications made in settlement negotiations. [19]

Sekar responded to these opinions in a letter to Linzer's general counsel. As to the invalidity opinion, Sekar responded that he "is not persuaded that there is any serious likelihood that the '790 Patent would be held to be invalidated in the event of a challenge." [20] Regarding non-infringement, [10] Sekar noted that if Linzer's opinion was correct (i.e., Linzer's two-ply process was outside the scope of the '790 Patent) then Linzer was in breach of its warranty that it would not manufacture paint rollers other than Licensed Products (i.e., rollers made by the process of the '790 Patent). [21] Sekar also cautioned that while Linzer's prior breach of its warranty may have been inadvertent, Linzer was now on notice, therefore any continued use of its two-ply process would be willful. [22] Sekar also gave a 40-day notice of termination pursuant to the termination provisions of the Agreement, stating that the notice was "a mere formality since Linzer's breach of warranty is non-curable[,]" implying that such notice was unnecessary, and adding that "[n]evertheless, at present, Mr. Sekar does no[t] intend to terminate the agreement before expiration of the 40-day notice period." [23] Sekar suggested terms under which Linzer would pay breach damages and proposed that the parties renegotiate the Agreement to include explicit terms licensing Linzer's two-ply roller production under the '134 Patent (at a much higher royalty rate than Linzer had been paying). In a November 2006 letter, Sekar also [11] stated that he would be "happy to meet with Linzer to discuss renegotiation of the License Agreement[,]" but that Sekar "want[s] it to be clear that if we [Linzer and Sekar] cannot reach agreement, Mr. Sekar intends to let a Court decide the legal issues." [24]

E. Linzer's Lawsuit

Linzer chose not to wait for Sekar to sue for breach and/or patent infringement. Linzer sued in November 2006, and filed its Amended Complaint in December. The Amended Complaint contains eighteen claims, fourteen of which Sekar now moves to dismiss. Many of the claims in Linzer's Amended Complaint seek a declaratory judgment of the parties' rights under their [*546] License Agreement, a common feature of suits brought against patent holders and their licensees. [25]

The claims in the Amended Complaint are arranged, with no apparent organizing principle, into Counts numbered I through XIII (including Counts VII(A)-(F)). Each of the parties' briefs adds to this confusion by addressing the claims in a seemingly random order that corresponds neither to the Amended Complaint nor to the preceding briefs. To make sense of the issues raised by the briefs, this Opinion will group the claims as follows: (1) claims that arise under contract law, (2) claims [13] that seek a declaratory judgment of the parties' rights under the 1998 Agreement (including some such claims that are based on antitrust law), and (3) claims that arise under patent law.

III. LEGAL STANDARDS

A. Rule 12(b)(1) Motion to Dismiss

HN1[] Rule 12(b)(1) provides for the dismissal of a claim when the federal court "lack[s] . . . jurisdiction over the subject matter." Plaintiff bears the burden of establishing subject matter jurisdiction by a preponderance of the evidence. [26]

HN3[] In considering a motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, the court must assume the truth of the material factual allegations contained in a complaint. [27] However, "jurisdiction must be shown affirmatively, and [25] See MedImmune, Inc. v. Genentech, Inc., 127 S. Ct. 764, 166 L. Ed. 2d 604 (Jan. 9, 2007). In the context [12] of a patent license dispute, declaratory judgment claims serve to relieve a licensee from the threat of an infringement suit and the injunction or damages that might result. In such suits, the declaratory judgment plaintiff often takes legal positions similar to those adopted by patent infringement defendants. For example, a licensee who is sued as a patent infringement defendant might raise the defense that the patent is invalid. If that same licensee had sufficient reason to believe such a suit would be filed, the licensee might file a declaratory judgment suit as a plaintiff, raising the same substantive argument - the patent's invalidity - in the form of a declaratory judgment that the patent is invalid.

that showing is not made by drawing from the pleadings inferences favorable to the party asserting it." [28] In fact, "where jurisdictional facts are [14] placed in dispute, the court has the power and obligation to decide issues of fact by reference to evidence outside the pleadings, such as affidavits." [29]

B. Rule 12(b)(6) Motion to Dismiss

HN4[] "Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a)(2) requires . . . 'a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief.'" [30] When a complaint is attacked by a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, the plaintiff need not provide "detailed factual allegations." [31] When deciding [*547] a defendant's motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6), a judge must "accept as true all of the factual allegations contained in the complaint" [32] and "draw all reasonable inferences in plaintiff's favor." [33]

Nevertheless, HN5[] to survive a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, the allegations in the complaint must meet the standard of "plausibility." [34] A complaint must "amplify a claim with some factual allegations . . . to render the claim plausible [italics in original]." [35] In other words, it must provide "the grounds upon which [the plaintiff's] claim rests through factual allegations sufficient 'to raise a right to relief above the speculative level.'" [36] Moreover, although the court must take the plaintiff's allegations as true, "the claim may still fail as a matter of law . . . if the claim is not legally feasible." [37]

In Count I, Linzer alleges a breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing and seeks an injunction prohibiting Sekar from, inter alia, terminating the 1998 Agreement. [38] Sekar argues that Count I should be dismissed because Linzer failed to allege that Sekar has threatened termination, and should also be dismissed because Linzer has failed to allege that Sekar acted in bad faith.

Linzer has sufficiently alleged that Sekar threatened to terminate the Agreement. Sekar issued a notice to Linzer under section 10.2.2, a termination provision of the Agreement, noting that Sekar "does no[t] intend to terminate the agreement before expiration of the 40-day notice period [of section 10.2.2]." [39] Also, in response to legal actions taken by Linzer, Sekar has agreed to forbear from exercising "any right he may have" to terminate the Agreement. [40] Under Sekar's interpretation of the Agreement, he does have a termination right, triggered by Linzer's [17] failure to pay royalties owed and/or its material breach of section 14.4. And Sekar's words suggest he would exercise this right -- in accordance with the termination provisions of the Agreement -- if he found Linzer's conduct to be deficient. Moreover, in his Memorandum of Law in Opposition, Sekar argues that he has not threatened to terminate the Agreement, but he does not promise to abstain from terminating [*548] the Agreement nor does he state that he is unable to terminate.

Linzer also sufficiently alleges that Sekar's threats of termination were made in bad faith. Taking Linzer's allegations as true, Sekar used Linzer's opinions of counsel to threaten termination of the Agreement, though the opinions were tendered pursuant to an agreement that they would be used only for settlement purposes. [41] Sekar allegedly threatened termination in the absence of a material breach, and did so with the intent to force Linzer to agree to higher royalty rates on its [18] two-ply process. [42]

In further support of its claims [19] of bad faith, Linzer notes that Sekar assisted Linzer in implementing the two-ply process that Sekar now identifies as his grounds for termination. Linzer employees visited Sekar's facility to learn how to implement the two-ply process. Linzer alleges that without Sekar's help, Linzer would have been unable to implement that process. Linzer also alleges that Sekar has known the details of Linzer's manufacturing processes at all relevant times, and has personally observed them in action at Linzer's New York facility. [43] If, as Linzer alleges (and Sekar denies), Sekar accepted royalties for Linzer's two-ply production, knowing that such royalties were not owed, such conduct would support a claim of bad faith.

Count I adequately pleads both threats of termination and bad faith on Sekar's part. Accordingly, Sekar's motion to dismiss Count I is denied.

In response, Linzer provided Sekar with two opinions of Linzer's counsel, subject to an agreement between the parties that the opinions would be used for settlement purposes only. See id. at PP 66-68. 2. Linzer's Allegations State a Claim for Breach of Warranty (Count II)

In Count II, Linzer alleges that Sekar breached his warranty to Linzer that he was "not aware of anything that would [affect] the validity of the Patent Rights" because Sekar knew his invention to be inoperable as described in the application that [20] eventually became the '790 Patent. [44] Sekar argues that Count II should be dismissed because "the only way [Linzer] can succeed on Count II is to succeed on Count XI (which [Linzer] cannot)." [45] Count XI alleges that the '790 Patent is invalid. In order to prevail on its breach of warranty claim, Linzer must show that Sekar withheld information that affected the validity of the '790 Patent. Sekar argues that because Linzer lacks standing to challenge the validity of the '790 Patent, it cannot make the necessary showing to [*549] succeed on its breach of warranty claim, i.e., that the information Sekar allegedly withheld indeed affected the '790 Patent's validity. Sekar's argument fails because Linzer has standing to challenge the validity of the patents-in-suit, [46] and will thus have the opportunity to prove up its breach of warranty claim. Sekar's motion to dismiss Count II is denied.

3. Linzer's Allegations Do Not State a Claim for Reformation (Count VIII)

Sekar argues that Count VIII, in which Linzer [21] seeks reformation of the 1998 Agreement, fails to state a claim because Linzer fails to allege a mistake, fraud, and that the Agreement does not reflect the parties' intent. HN6[] "[R]eformation of a contract should be allowed only where mutual mistake or fraud is clearly established, particularly when the negotiations were conducted by sophisticated, counseled business people." [47]

> [T]he complaint HN7[] in a suit for the reformation of a written instrument must set forth (1) an agreement other than that expressed in the instrument; (2) the written instrument sought to be reformed; and (3) mutual mistake of the parties, or the mistake of one party and the fraud of the other. [48]

HN8[] To prevail on a claim for reformation, "a petitioning party has to show in no uncertain terms, not only that mistake or fraud exists, but exactly what was really agreed upon between the parties." [49]

Linzer [22] alleges that "Sekar lead [sic] Linzer to believe that (i) it had the right to practice the two-ply process under the agreement, and (ii) Linzer was required to pay Mr. Sekar royalties for the two-ply process," when Sekar knew "that Linzer was not required to pay royalties for the two-ply process and Linzer is purportedly not permitted to practice the two-ply process under Mr. Sekar's construction of § 8.1 of the 1998 Agreement." [50] Sekar's allegedly fraudulent conduct might suffice to establish bad faith in the performance of the Agreement, but it cannot support a reformation claim because the conduct happened well after the Agreement was executed. The alleged conduct regarding the two-ply process occurred after 2000, and could not have affected Linzer's understanding of the terms of the Agreement at the time of execution in 1998. Thus, Linzer fails to sufficiently allege unilateral mistake and fraud. HN9[] "A bare claim of unilateral mistake by the plaintiff, unsupported by legally sufficient allegations of fraud on the part of defendants, does not state a cause of action for reformation." [51]

Moreover, even assuming that Linzer had sufficiently alleged unilateral mistake and fraud, its reformation claim would still fail because Linzer does not allege what the parties' true agreement was. Accordingly, Linzer fails to state a claim for [*550] reformation and Sekar's motion to dismiss Count VIII is granted.

B. Claims Seeking a Declaratory Judgment of the Parties' Rights Under the 1998 Agreement (Counts IV, V, VII(A)-(E), X, XIII)

1. The Parties' Dispute Over the License of the '134 Patent Is Ripe for Adjudication (Count IV)

In Count IV, Linzer seeks a declaratory judgment that the 1998 Agreement grants Linzer a royalty-free license to practice the methods of the '134 Patent and that this license survives the termination of the 1998 Agreement. [52] Sekar argues that Count IV should be dismissed as unripe because Sekar has neither threatened to terminate the Agreement nor to bring an infringement suit. [53] Absent such a threat, Sekar reasons, Count IV requests an impermissible advisory opinion. [54]

Sekar's argument is without merit. Count IV seeks a remedy for an actual conflict which poses a threat of imminent harm [24] to Linzer. As discussed above, the Amended Complaint does allege that Sekar has threatened to terminate the Agreement. [55] Moreover, the parties have been involved in this contract dispute for more than a year. The judgment sought in Count IV would relieve Linzer of its ongoing royalty payments to Sekar for its two-ply process, royalties Linzer asserts were never owed and have been mistakenly paid for years. The judgment sought in Count IV would also determine whether, under the terms of the 1998 Agreement, Linzer's license to the '134 Patent survives termination of that Agreement. If it does not, Linzer will have to develop an alternate method for producing two-ply rollers, negotiate a new license with Sekar, or abandon the market for two-ply rollers. Despite Sekar's arguments to the contrary, these are not theoretical harms, but rather the realities of a business in which Linzer has a great deal at stake. Thus, Sekar's motion to dismiss Count IV is denied.

2. Linzer's Request for a Declaratory Judgment that Its Two-Ply Process Is Not Covered by the '790 Patent Is Not Futile (Count V)

In Count V, Linzer seeks a declaratory judgment that its two-ply process is [25] not covered by the '790 Patent. [56] If this is so, then two-ply rollers manufactured by that process are not Licensed Products under the 1998 Agreement [57] and Linzer does not owe Sekar royalties for the manufacture of these rollers. [58]

[56] Compl. at P 149 (seeking "a declaratory judgment . . . that [Linzer] owes no royalties to Mr. Sekar under the 1998 Agreement based on roller covers made in accordance with [Linzer's] two-ply process . . . and that [Linzer's] two-ply process does not fall within the claims of the '790 Patent.").

[57] See Agreement §§ 1.2, 1.3, 1.5, 1.6, 1.7 (defining Licensed Products as polypropylene paint rollers that are covered by a valid claim of the '790 Patent).

Sekar argues, however, that if it is determined that Linzer's two-ply process is not covered by the '790 Patent, then it necessarily follows that Linzer is in breach of section 14.4 of the Agreement. [59] Thus, [*551] according to Sekar, a declaratory judgment that Linzer's two-ply process is not covered by the '790 Patent would not end the dispute between the parties.

Nonetheless, Count V cannot be dismissed as futile. Resolution of this claim would determine whether Linzer's two-ply rollers are Licensed Products. Although this determination would not resolve every issue raised in this dispute, it does address a major question: the scope of the '790 Patent. As a result, the claim is not futile and Sekar's motion to dismiss Count V is denied.

3. Claims Seeking a Declaratory Judgment that Section 14.4 of the 1998 Agreement Is Unenforceable (Counts VII(A)-(E))

In Count VII, Linzer seeks a declaratory judgment that section 14.4 of the Agreement is unenforceable because it conflicts with various federal and state laws prohibiting anticompetitive conduct. Count VII is divided into six sub-counts, VII(A)-(F), [60] each of which (1) seeks a declaratory judgment that section 14.4 of the 1998 Agreement is unenforceable and (2) names a federal or state law or doctrine that, according to Linzer, would be violated if section 14.4 was enforced, including the doctrine of patent misuse and federal and state antitrust laws. In addition, some of the sub-counts also seek damages and injunctive relief. In light [27] of this complexity each sub-count will be addressed as a separate Count.

a. Linzer's Allegations Do Not State a Claim for Declaratory Judgment of Patent Misuse (Count VII(A))

In Count VII(A), Linzer seeks a declaratory judgment that section 14.4 of the Agreement is unenforceable because in imposing that condition, Sekar committed patent misuse, which is the unlawful extension of a patent monopoly.

> HN10[] Patent misuse is an equitable defense to patent infringement. It "arose to restrain practices that did not in themselves violate any law, but that drew anticompetitive strength from the patent right, and thus were deemed to be contrary to public policy." The purpose of the patent misuse defense "was to prevent a patentee from using the patent to obtain market benefit beyond that which inheres in the statutory patent right." As the Supreme Court has explained, the doctrine of patent misuse bars a patentee from using the "patent's leverage" to "extend the monopoly of his patent to derive a benefit not attributable to the use of the patent's teachings," such as requiring a licensee to pay a royalty on products that do not use the teaching [28] of the patent. The "key inquiry is whether, by imposing conditions that derive their force from the patent, the patentee has impermissibly broadened the scope of the patent grant with anticompetitive effect." [61]

Linzer alleges that Sekar "has monopolized, attempted to monopolize and restrain trade unreasonably in the relevant market through the exclusionary acts set forth below" [62] and that Sekar "has developed [*552] and enforced throughout the United States a policy, pattern, practice, of exclusionary dealing, pursuant to which Mr. Sekar will license only to manufacture[r]s and distributors that agree not to manufacture polypropylene paint rollers using any other technologies." [63] Not surprisingly, these allegations and others in Count VII(A) sound like antitrust claims. HN11[] Patent misuse, which developed long before the advent of antitrust law, has largely merged with [29] antitrust law. "Misuse is closely intertwined with antitrust law, and most findings of misuse are conditioned on conduct that would also violate the antitrust laws." [64] The particular form of misuse alleged in Count VII(A) is Sekar's refusal to license the '790 Patent unless Linzer agreed to an exclusive dealing arrangement. HN12[] Since the enactment of the Patent Misuse Reform Act of 1988, imposing conditions on a patent license is not patent misuse unless the patentee has power in the relevant market.

> (d) No patent owner otherwise entitled to relief for infringement . . . of a patent shall be denied relief or deemed guilty of misuse or illegal extension of the patent right by reason of his having . . . (3) sought to enforce his patent rights against infringement . . . (4) refused to license or use any rights to the patent; or (5) conditioned the license of any rights to the patent or the sale of the patented product on the acquisition of a license to rights in another patent or purchase of a separate product, unless, in view of the circumstances, the patent owner has market power in the relevant market for the patent or patented product on which the license or sale is conditioned. [65]

HN13[] A patentee's [30] market power is necessary, but not sufficient, for a finding of patent misuse based on conditional licensing. [66] Historically, courts have acknowledged a presumption of monopoly power from the mere possession of a patent, but more recently, courts have expressly rejected such a presumption, holding that "in [both patent misuse and antitrust] cases involving a tying arrangement, the plaintiff must prove that the defendant has market power in the tying product." [67]

Sekar [31] argues that Count VII(A) should be dismissed because Linzer improperly invokes the doctrine of patent misuse as an independent cause of action. [68] This argument is without merit. In B. Braun Medical, Inc. v. Abbott Labs., the HN15[] Federal Circuit held that while patent misuse may satisfy an element of a plaintiff's antitrust claim, a plaintiff may not recover damages when seeking a declaratory judgment of patent misuse. [69] B. Braun did not proscribe [*553] claims seeking a declaratory judgment of patent misuse. Indeed, in later actions, the Federal Circuit has allowed such claims without comment. [70] Linzer's patent misuse claims -- in Counts VII(A) and XII -- seek a declaratory judgment, not damages.

However, Sekar also argues -- correctly -- that Linzer fails to allege a relevant market in which Sekar has monopoly power. As explained below with respect to Linzer's antitrust claims, Linzer's allegations do not allow even an inference of a relevant market in which Sekar has monopoly power. [71] This failure is fatal to Linzer's patent misuse claim in Count VII(A). Sekar's motion to dismiss Count VII(A) is granted.

b. Linzer's Allegations Do Not State a Claim Under Section 1 of the Sherman Act (Count VII(B))

In Count VII(B), Linzer seeks a declaratory judgment that section 14.4 of the Agreement is unenforceable on the grounds that this section, as interpreted by Sekar, is an unreasonable restraint on competition in violation of section 1 of the Sherman Act. [72] Linzer alleges that enforcement of section 14.4 of [33] the Agreement would result in an injury to competition. "Sekar has admitted that the tie-out covenant imposed on Linzer which compels Linzer to manufacture only polypropylene paint rollers made allegedly under [Sekar's] '790 Patent process is a restriction on competition by Linzer." [73] According to Linzer, section 14.4 chills innovation by preventing Linzer from using competing manufacturing technologies, thus reducing the demand for superior one-ply manufacturing processes, which processes could reduce prices for consumers. [74] That is, without section 14.4, Linzer (and others who could sell Linzer such a process) would have greater incentive to compete by creating improved manufacturing processes. Sekar argues that Count VII(B) should be dismissed because Linzer fails to properly define a relevant market and fails to allege harm to competition within that (allegedly improperly-defined) market.

HN16[] "In order to survive a motion to dismiss, a claim under Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act must allege a relevant geographic and product market in which trade was unreasonably restrained or monopolized." [75] "A relevant product market consists of 'products that have reasonable interchangeability for the purposes for which they are produced - price, use and qualities considered.' Products will be considered to be reasonably interchangeable [*554] if consumers treat them as 'acceptable substitutes.'" [76]

> HN17[] Where the plaintiff fails to define its proposed relevant market with reference to the rule of reasonable interchangeability and cross-elasticity of demand, or alleges a proposed relevant market that clearly does not encompass all interchangeable substitute products even when all factual inferences are granted in plaintiff's favor, the relevant market is legally insufficient and a motion to dismiss may be granted. [77]

Linzer's definition of its relevant market is unclear - the Amended Complaint states that the relevant market is "the market for one-ply rollers made pursuant to the one-ply process[.]" [78] In the context of Linzer's other allegations, this phrase could be read to mean the market for one-ply rollers manufactured according to (a) Linzer's one-ply process, (b) the '790 process, or (c) any one-ply process (i.e., all one-ply rollers). Under any of these three definitions, Linzer's Sherman Act claims fail.

First, it would strain credulity to narrow the relevant product market to rollers produced by Linzer's one-ply process. Linzer offers no support for the proposition that there are no substitutes for its one-ply rollers. Indeed, [36] for a product as uncomplicated as a paint roller, Linzer's allegation that its competitors are also using the '790 process implies that Linzer's one-ply rollers would be interchangeable with those of the competitors in the consumer's eyes. Such a market definition would be inadequate because it fails to distinguish the included products from the excluded products. [79] Without a properly-defined market, Linzer cannot state a claim for a violation of the Sherman Act.

Second, if the relevant product market is the market for '790-process rollers, and assuming that Sekar has power in that market, Linzer's claim fails because the exclusive dealing arrangement of section 14.4 cannot be an unreasonable restraint. It gives Sekar nothing more than his due as an owner of the '790 Patent. Vertical exclusive dealing arrangements such as section 14.4 of the Agreement are presumptively lawful, [80] and HN18[] a patentee is entitled to impose conditions on licenses or refuse to grant licenses entirely. [81] Linzer [*555] argues that the only effect of section 14.4 is anticompetitive, allowing Sekar to achieve or maintain a monopoly. But this view overlooks the pro-competitive effects of [37] the patent right, to wit, the incentive for Sekar and others like him to innovate. During the term of the '790 Patent, any power Sekar might have in the '790-process roller market is a legitimate result of Sekar's monopoly right as owner of that patent. Thus, Linzer's Sherman Act claims fail for lack of an unreasonable restraint on competition.

Third, if the relevant product market is the market for one-ply rollers in general, then Linzer fails to allege facts that allow an inference of the required anticompetitive effect. At most, two of the four major competitors in the one-ply roller market are licensed by Sekar. [82] Thus, efforts by Sekar to exert monopoly power -- assuming, again, that he had such power [83] -- by raising license fees might raise costs of production for Sekar's licensees, but would not raise costs for the other two competitors, who would simply undercut Sekar's licensees on price. The licensees would doubtless be injured -- and could perhaps seek redress through other means -- but there would be no harm to competition in the one-ply roller market or to the consumers of that product. HN20[] "The antitrust laws were enacted for 'the protection of competition, not competitors.'" [84] "Other allegations in the amended complaint, as well as common knowledge, make it clear that other large competitors . . . compete [39] in the [one-ply paint-roller]

[81] See, e.g., 35 U.S.C. § 271(d)(4)-(5); Applera Corp. v. MJ Research, Inc., 349 F. Supp. 2d 321, 328 (D. Conn. 2004) (HN19[] "A patent holder . . . has a legal monopoly and significant freedom to license or refuse to license the use of the patented invention, including 'to exact royalties as high as he can negotiate with the leverage of that monopoly.'" (quoting Brulotte v. Thys Co., 379 U.S. 29, 33, 85 S. Ct. 176, 13 L. Ed. 2d 99 (1964))). [38] A patentee's right to refuse or impose conditions on a license may be diminished where the patentee refuses to license a horizontal competitor. Here, however, the relationship between the parties is vertical.

[82] Compl. at P 169 ("three of the four major manufacture[r]s and distributors of polypropylene paint rollers in the United States make one-ply rollers pursuant to the [one]-ply process, which Mr. Sekar alleges falls within his '790 Patent"). One of the three manufacturers that use the '790 process is Newell, Sekar's co-owner of the '790 Patent. Thus, Sekar licenses only two of the four major competitors in the one-ply roller market.

[83] Sekar has limited control of the competitors in this market. Only two of the four competitors are licensees of the '790 Patent and there is no allegation that Sekar has an exclusive dealing arrangement with any manufacturer other than Linzer.

market. Without any allegation as to how market-wide competition will be affected, the complaint fails to allege a claim on which relief may be granted." [85]

Further, Sekar's exclusive dealing arrangement with Linzer does not alone establish -- nor do Linzer's allegations support [40] the inference of -- a "pattern and practice" of monopolistic conduct, as Linzer alleges. Sekar is entitled to his patent right. Linzer's allegation -- that Sekar's imposition of an exclusive dealing arrangement on Linzer tends to inhibit innovation of new manufacturing techniques -- is negated by Sekar's patent right to impose such conditions. After all, Sekar's innovation of the '790 process was motivated by the incentive of the patent right. Linzer cannot argue that the legitimate rewards of past innovation inhibit future innovation. Accordingly, Linzer fails to state a claim under the Sherman Act, and Sekar's motion to dismiss Count VII(B) is granted.

c. Linzer's Allegations Do Not State a Claim for a Violation of Section 3 of the Clayton Act (Count VII(C))

In Count VII(C), Linzer seeks a declaratory judgment that section 14.4 of the [*556] Agreement is unenforceable because enforcement would violate section 3 of the Clayton Act, and also seeks treble damages, injunctive relief, and fees and costs under the Act. [86] Sekar moves to dismiss Count VII(C) for failure to state a claim because HN21[] section 3 of the Clayton Act, which is limited to leases or sales of commodities, is inapplicable to the [41] parties' 1998 Agreement, which is principally a patent licensing agreement (rather than a sale or lease of tangible goods). [87] Linzer does not dispute that section 3 of the Clayton Act governs sales of tangible goods, but rather argues that section 3 governs the 1998 Agreement because the Agreement includes a sale of goods. Indeed, Sekar promised to -- and actually did -- deliver and install two roller-manufacturing machines at Linzer's facilities. [88] However, HN22[] it is not dispositive that a contract merely includes a sale of goods.

> HN23[] When the subject of a contract is a combination of both tangible goods and intangible rights or services, the contract is covered by the [Clayton Act, as modified by the Robinson-Patman Act] if its "dominant nature" or purpose is the sale of tangible products rather than the transfer of intangible rights or services. [89]

It is beyond cavil that the dominant purpose of the 1998 Agreement was to license Sekar's intellectual property rights to Linzer to allow it to manufacture paint rollers pursuant to these rights. The bulk of the Agreement (entitled "License Agreement") is concerned with specifying and licensing Sekar's patent rights, trade secrets, and know-how in exchange for cash and royalties to be paid. Linzer has paid Sekar "nearly $ 11 million in royalty payments" pursuant to the licensing provisions of the Agreement, while the purchase-and-sale provisions set a price of $ 150,000 for the two machines Sekar delivered. [90] Moreover, HN25[] "contracts that explicitly grant a license to exploit the intellectual property contained in a commodity have been viewed as primarily concerned with intangible rights, and are therefore not covered by the Act." [91] Accordingly, Sekar's motion to dismiss Count VII(C) is granted.

d. Linzer's Allegations Do Not State a [43] Claim for Violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act (Count VII(D))

In Count VII(D), Linzer alleges that Sekar's actions constitute a monopolization and attempted monopolization in violation of section 2 of the Sherman Act, and accordingly seeks treble damages, injunctive relief, and a declaratory judgment that section 14.4 of the Agreement is unenforceable. [92]

> [I]n order HN26[] to state a claim for monopolization under Section 2 of the Sherman Act, a plaintiff must establish "(1) the possession of monopoly power in the relevant market and (2) the willful acquisition [*557] or maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident." To state an attempted monopolization claim, a plaintiff must establish "(1) that the defendant has engaged in predatory or anticompetitive conduct with (2) a specific intent to monopolize and (3) a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power." [93]

As discussed [44] earlier with respect to Linzer's claims under section 1 of the Sherman Act, Linzer fails to allege a relevant market in which Sekar possesses or could possess monopoly power for purposes of its Sherman Act claims. Accordingly, Sekar's motion to dismiss Count VII(D) is granted.

e. Linzer's Allegations Do Not State a Claim for Violation of the Donnelly Act (Count VII(E))

In Count VII(E), Linzer seeks a declaratory judgment that section 14.4 of the Agreement is unenforceable because it violates New York's Donnelly Act, an analog of the Sherman Act intended for cases in which the interstate commerce requirement is not met. HN27[] "The Donnelly Act was modeled after the Sherman Act, and the courts generally apply federal antitrust precedent in construing it." [94] Neither party argues that the Donnelly Act should be applied differently in this case. Sekar correctly notes that "the Donnelly Act requires all of the elements of a Sherman Act claim." [95] Thus, Sekar argues, because these two Acts have the same elements and are applied similarly, and because Linzer's Sherman Act claims must be dismissed, the Donnelly Act claims must be dismissed as well. Indeed, Linzer's Donnelly Act claims succeed or fail [45] with its Sherman Act claims, and as discussed above, Linzer failed to adequately plead its Sherman Act claims. Thus, Linzer's Donnelly Act claims are also insufficiently pled, and Sekar's motion to dismiss Count VII(E) is granted.

4. Linzer's Allegations State a Claim for a Declaratory Judgment that Sekar May Not Terminate the Agreement (Count X)

In Count X, Linzer seeks a declaratory judgment, on the grounds of unclean hands, that Sekar may not terminate or act contrary to the Agreement. [96] Sekar argues that Count X, like Count I, should be dismissed because Linzer fails to allege that Sekar has threatened termination. As discussed above with respect to Count I, [97] Linzer does sufficiently allege that Sekar threatened termination. Therefore, Sekar's motion to dismiss Count X is denied.

[96] See id. at P 255. Ordinarily, such a claim would be brought as a defense [46] to an infringement suit, but, as discussed above, Linzer need not wait until Sekar terminates the Agreement. Termination of the license agreement would leave Linzer with the rock-and-a-hard-place choice to cease manufacturing operations or facing an infringement suit. The Declaratory Judgment Act was designed to prevent such situations.

[*558] 5. Linzer's Allegations State a Claim for a Declaratory Judgment that a Breach of Section 14.4 Is Not Material (Count XIII)

Sekar argues that Linzer has not alleged facts sufficient to sustain its claim for a declaratory judgment that Linzer's breaches of section 14.4 of the Agreement, if any, were not material. If Linzer's two-ply process is found to fall within the claims of the '790 Patent, Linzer would not be in breach of section 14.4. However, if Linzer's allegation that its two-ply process falls outside the '790 Patent is correct, then Linzer would be in breach of section 14.4, raising the question of whether such breach is material.

> HN28[] In determining whether a failure to render or to offer performance is material, the following circumstances are significant:
> (a) the extent to which the injured party will be deprived of the benefit [47] which he reasonably expected;
> (b) the extent to which the injured party can be adequately compensated for the part of that benefit of which he will be deprived;
> * * *
> (d) the likelihood that the party failing to perform or to offer to perform will cure his failure, taking account of all the circumstances including any reasonable assurances;
> (e) the extent to which the behavior of the party failing to perform or to offer to perform comports with standards of good faith and fair dealing. [98]

Sekar's acceptance of royalties for Linzer's use of its two-ply process suggests that even if such use was a breach of section 14.4, Sekar was not deprived of the benefit he expected under the Agreement. Further, Sekar's acceptance of royalties and his offer to "revise" the Agreement to explicitly permit Linzer to use its two-ply process (at a higher royalty rate) demonstrate that Sekar can be compensated for such a breach. [99] Linzer's payment of two-ply royalties with reservations, along with its investment in Sekar's processes, indicate that if Linzer is found in breach of section 14.4, such breach is likely to be cured by Linzer's payment of royalties. [48] [100] Finally, Linzer's payment of the disputed royalties with reservation and explanations of its reasons for reservation (rather than a total refusal to pay disputed royalties) evince good faith and fair dealing on its part. Accordingly, Linzer alleges facts sufficient to state a claim for a declaratory judgment that its breaches, if any, of section 14.4 of the Agreement were not material breaches of the Agreement as a whole.

C. Patent Claims (Counts XI, XII)

In Counts XI and XII, Linzer seeks declaratory judgments that both patents-in-suit are invalid (Count XI) and unenforceable (Count XII). [101] Sekar argues that both counts must be dismissed because Linzer, "a licensee without a reasonable apprehension of suit, cannot challenge the validity of" the patents-in-suit for want of a case or controversy, as is required to invoke the Declaratory Judgment Act. [102] [*559] According to Sekar, Linzer cannot have a reasonable apprehension of an infringement suit because Sekar is incapable of bringing such a suit without Newell, the co-owner of the '790 Patent. [103]

Sekar's argument relies on the Federal Circuit's "reasonable apprehension of suit" test for evaluating the existence of a case or controversy in a suit for declaratory judgment of invalidity of a patent -- a test which the Supreme Court rejected in MedImmune v. Genentech. [104] The MedImmune Court wrote:

> Aetna and the cases following it do not draw the brightest of lines between those declaratory-judgment actions that satisfy the case-or-controversy requirement and those that do not. Our decisions have required that the dispute be "definite and concrete, touching the legal relations of parties having adverse legal interests"; and that it be "real and substantial" and "admi[t] of specific relief through a decree of a conclusive character, as distinguished from an opinion advising what the law would be upon a hypothetical state of facts." In Maryland Casualty Co. v. Pacific Coal & Oil Co., we summarized as follows: HN32[] "Basically, the question in each case is whether the facts alleged, under all the circumstances, show that there is a substantial controversy, [51] between parties having adverse legal interests, of sufficient immediacy and reality to warrant the issuance of a declaratory judgment." [105]

The Federal Circuit has acknowledged the rejection of its standard and has decided subsequent cases in accordance with MedImmune. [106]

[*560] The instant dispute satisfies the case or controversy standard as explained in MedImmune for several reasons. First, Linzer and Sekar are undoubtedly parties with adverse interests in their legal relations with respect to the Agreement and the patents-in-suit. The interpretation of the Agreement and the validity and possible infringement of the patents-in-suit will determine whether Linzer must pay royalties or breach damages to Sekar, or may be enjoined from manufacturing infringing rollers.

Ed. 2d 1 (1993))*. Though the "reasonable apprehension of suit" standard is no longer the law, Sekar's argument would fail even under that test. As discussed below, Linzer's apprehension of suit is not extinguished simply because the potential exists for Newell to exercise its "right to impede the other co-owner's [Sekar's] ability to sue infringers by refusing to voluntarily join in such a suit." Ethicon, 135 F.3d at 1468. Newell, Linzer's direct competitor, has sued Linzer in the past for infringement of another patent in this field. See [52] Pl. Opp. at 15. Moreover, Sekar is the sole owner of the '134 Patent, and is thus immediately capable of suing for infringement of that patent.

[105] MedImmune, 127 S. Ct. at 771 (citations omitted; alteration in original) (quoting Aetna, 300 U.S. at 240-41).

[106] See, e.g., Sandisk Corp. v. STMicroelectronics, Inc., 480 F.3d 1372, 1380-81 (Fed. Cir. 2007) ("In finding declaratory judgment jurisdiction in MedImmune, the Court specifically addressed and rejected our reasonable apprehension test[.]").

Second, the controversy between Linzer and Sekar is "real and substantial." Their dispute -- over royalties, breach, and patent validity and infringement -- has been festering for over a year now. The parties [53] remain at an impasse after substantial negotiation and renegotiation.

Third, this case does not require suppositions about "a hypothetical state of facts" because the facts are amply developed. The 1998 Agreement is a signed, operative document, under which the parties have been performing for eight years. Linzer's potentially-infringing activities are real and known: during the performance of the Agreement, Linzer has been manufacturing rollers using its one- and two-ply processes -- processes which Sekar claims infringe the patents-in-suit. Sekar filed several patent applications, including those applications which matured into the patents-in-suit. The prosecution histories of those applications contain evidence that bears on the alleged invalidity of those patents and of Sekar's knowledge of such invalidity (and thus his alleged breach of warranty).

Finally, the controversy would be resolved by the declaratory judgments Linzer seeks. Such judgments would provide Linzer with relief by clarifying whether royalties are owed, whether its processes infringe either or both of the patents-in-suit, whether those patents are valid, and what rights the parties have under the Agreement. Indeed, [54] Sekar invited such a judgment by stating that he would be "happy to meet with Linzer to discuss renegotiation of the License Agreement[,]" but that he "want[ed] it to be clear that if we [Linzer and Sekar] cannot reach agreement, Mr. Sekar intends to let a Court decide the legal issues." [107] "The Declaratory Judgment Act was designed to relieve potential defendants from the Damoclean threat of impending litigation which a harassing adversary might brandish, while initiating suit at his leisure or never." [108] In sum, this case presents a case or controversy sufficient for plaintiff to invoke the Declaratory Judgment Act, and this Court has jurisdiction to issue the declaratory judgments sought in the Complaint. Accordingly, Sekar's motion to dismiss is denied as to Count XI.

Sekar further argues with respect to Count XII that patent misuse is not a cause of action. This argument fails for the same reasons discussed above regarding Count II. [109] However, Count XII must be dismissed for a different reason: it is superfluous. Count XII seeks a declaratory [55] judgment that the patents-in-suit are unenforceable on the grounds of patent misuse. The patent misuse alleged in Count XII is that Sekar attempted to enforce invalid patents (the patents-in-suit). [110] [*561] For Linzer to prevail on this claim, then, the patents-in-suit must be shown to be invalid. Thus, Count XII is duplicative of Count XI. Count XI seeks a declaratory judgment that the patents-in-suit are invalid, and if it succeeds -- i.e., if the patents-in-suit are invalidated -- then the patents will be unenforceable, which is the very relief sought by Count XII. Therefore, Sekar's motion to dismiss is granted as to Count XII.

V. CONCLUSION

For the reasons discussed above, defendant's motion to dismiss is granted with respect to Counts VIII, VII(A)-(E), and XII; it is denied with respect to Counts I-II, IV-V, X-XI, and XIII. The Clerk of the Court is directed to close this motion (document # 24). A conference is scheduled for August 9, 2007, at 4:30 p.m. in Courtroom 15C.

HN4[] Claims, Fraud

Congress passed the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) in an effort to combat organized, long-term criminal activity. Although 18 U.S.C.S. § 1964(c) provides a private civil action to recover treble damages for violations of RICO's substantive provisions, the statute was never intended to allow plaintiffs to turn garden-variety state law fraud claims into federal RICO actions. In order to establish a violation of § 1962(c), a plaintiff must show the following four elements by a preponderance of the evidence: (1) conduct (2) of an enterprise (3) through a pattern (4) of racketeering activity. A pattern of racketeering activity consists, at the very least, of two predicate acts of racketeering committed within a ten-year period. 18 U.S.C.S. § 1961(5). In order to curb widespread attempts to turn routine commercial disputes into civil RICO actions, courts carefully scrutinize the pattern requirement to forestall RICO's use against isolated or sporadic criminal activity, and to prevent RICO from becoming a surrogate for garden-variety fraud actions properly brought under state law. To fulfill the pattern requirement, plaintiffs must satisfy the so-called "continuity plus relationship" test: the predicate acts must be related to one another (the relationship prong) and pose a threat of continued criminal activity (the continuity prong).

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Racketeer Influenced & Corrupt Organizations > Claims > Fraud

HN5[] Claims, Fraud

In the context of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO), the continuity requirement exists to give effect to Congress's clear intention that RICO target long-term criminal behavior, as opposed to more discrete acts of fraud. Continuity can be both a closed-and open-ended concept. Closed-ended continuity, which is all that is even arguably present in this case, refers to criminal behavior that has come to a close but endured for such a substantial period of time that the duration and repetition of the criminal activity carries with it an implicit threat of continued criminal activity in the future. A RICO plaintiff may satisfy the open-ended continuity requirement by showing past conduct which by its nature projects into the future with a threat of repetition.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Racketeer Influenced & Corrupt Organizations > Claims > Fraud

HN6[] Claims, Fraud

In the context of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, in determining whether there is continuity, relevant factors include the number and variety of predicate acts and the length of time over which they were committed, the number of victims, the presence of separate schemes and the occurrence of distinct injuries. The mere fact that the predicate acts relate to the same overall scheme or involve the same victim does not mean that the acts automatically fail to satisfy the pattern requirement. The requirement of a pattern of racketeering activity is a standard, not a rule, and thus its determination depends on the facts and circumstances of the particular case, with no one factor being necessarily determinative. Courts evaluate the allegations with the goal of achieving a natural and commonsense result, consistent with Congress's concern with long-term criminal conduct.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Racketeer Influenced & Corrupt Organizations > Claims > Fraud

HN7[] Claims, Fraud

The duration of the alleged racketeering activity is perhaps the most important element of Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act continuity.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Racketeer Influenced & Corrupt Organizations > Claims > Fraud

HN8[] Claims, Fraud

In the context of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, actions, even if themselves illegal, taken in an effort to cover up a criminal scheme do nothing to extend the duration of the underlying scheme.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Racketeer Influenced & Corrupt Organizations > Claims > Fraud

HN9[] Claims, Fraud

In the context of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, mail and wire fraud allegations are unique among predicate acts because the multiplicity of such acts may be no indication of the requisite continuity of the underlying fraudulent activity. Consequently, courts do not look favorably on many instances of mail and wire fraud to form a pattern.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Racketeer Influenced & Corrupt Organizations > Claims > Fraud

HN10[] Claims, Fraud

The Indiana Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) statute is modeled after federal RICO, and also requires proof of conduct of an enterprise through a pattern of racketeering activity. As with federal RICO, a plaintiff must satisfy the continuity plus relationship requirement with respect to the predicate acts alleged.

An appellate court reviews the district court's decision to dismiss a complaint on ripeness grounds de novo.

Civil Procedure > ... > Justiciability > Ripeness > Rationale for Ripeness

HN12[] Ripeness, Rationale for Ripeness

The ripeness doctrine exists to prevent the courts, through avoidance of premature adjudication, from entangling themselves in abstract disagreements over administrative policies, and also to protect the agencies from judicial interference until an administrative decision has been formalized and its effects felt in a concrete way by the challenging parties.

[*1578] WOOD, Circuit Judge. Plaintiff Douglas M. Jennings designed an aftermarket dashboard bezel--that is, a molded shape that fits over an automobile's instrument panel. Hoping to make money from his design through manufacturing and selling his bezels in the auto parts aftermarket and to forestall copycats, Jennings applied to the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office ("PTO") for a patent. As part of her review of Jennings's application, the patent Examiner contacted defendants Auto Meter Products, Inc. [2] ("Auto Meter"), Gauge Works, LLC ("Gauge Works"), and Gregory Day to inquire whether the bezel they were selling was on sale or publicly available before Jennings applied for his patent. Jennings believes that the defendants, in response to the Examiner's inquiries, fraudulently misled her into believing that Jennings was not in fact the inventor of the bezel.

In addition to continuing to pursue his patent application, Jennings filed this action against the defendants under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act ("RICO"), 18 U.S.C. §§ 1962(a)-(d), as well as its Indiana counterpart, Ind. Code §§ 35-45-6-2. RICO fit the bill, in Jennings's opinion, because the defendants were engaged in "the type of unfair competition that one would expect from a Mafia family or narcotics cartel." His complaint alleged that the defendants had commandeered the PTO through a pattern of racketeering activity by flooding it (via mail and wire transmissions) with false information in order to deny Jennings a patent and thereby "exploit the market for the bezel without compensating Jennings for use of his invention." In addition to his federal and state RICO theories, Jennings asserted various [3] grounds for recovery under Indiana state law, such as unauthorized control of his property, conversion, and fraud.

The defendants moved to dismiss on various grounds. They argued that the RICO counts failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted, see FED. R. CIV. P. 12(b)(6), because Jennings had not adequately alleged a pattern of racketeering activity. They also maintained that the state-law claims were unripe, because Jennings's patent application was still pending before the Board of Patent Appeals and Interferences ("BPAI") at the time. Defendants also moved to disqualify Jennings's attorney, claiming that he was a necessary fact witness under Indiana Rule of Professional Conduct 3.7. A magistrate judge granted the defendants' Rule 12(b)(6) motion, stayed the state-law claims, and granted the motion to disqualify Jennings's attorney. After a joint motion by the parties, the court issued a final judgment dismissing all claims. For the following reasons, we affirm the dismissal of all claims. Because we have resolved Jennings's appeal this way, we have no need to reach the attorney-disqualification issue.

I

Briefly, a dashboard bezel is the structure that surrounds the [4] instrument gauges [*470] on a car's dashboard and holds the gauges in place. Jennings's bezel replaces a car's original dashboard bezel. More than that, it improves the bezel, because it has room for more automotive gauges than were included in the original design of the car and it still allows the driver to see the entire panel of instruments. [1579] In early 2000, Jennings advertised and sold his product on the Internet at www.clubsi.com. He alleges that sometime in January 2000--about nine months before he applied for his patent--Day, the president and sole owner of Gauge Works, noticed the bezel for the first time on www.clubsi.com and decided to manufacture and sell a nearly identical one of his own. Day and his company partnered with Auto Meter, a wholesaler of aftermarket auto parts, to distribute an aftermarket dashboard bezel that Jennings claims was simply a replica of his bezel. Auto Meter, Day and Gauge Works first displayed their bezel at a trade show known as the SEMA International Auto Salon, which was held at the end of March 2000 in Pomona, California. Seven months later, on October 25, 2000, Jennings filed an application for a utility patent on his bezel.

According to Jennings, [5] the defendants then began engaging in a series of fraudulent acts aimed at "corrupting" his patent application and sabotaging his ability to establish himself as the inventor of his aftermarket dashboard bezel. In the course of reviewing Jennings's patent application, the patent Examiner contacted Auto Meter requesting evidence that the aftermarket dashboard bezel was on sale or publicly available before October 25, 2000. Auto Meter referred the Examiner to Day, who told the Examiner on October 21, 2002, that he, not Jennings, was the inventor of the bezel that was the subject of Jennings's patent application. Because Jennings believes that Day was lying, and the conversation occurred on the telephone, Jennings asserts that the communication was an act of wire fraud. Jennings also claims that Day subsequently contacted Auto Meter, and the two parties conspired to fabricate a product flyer purportedly for the 2000 SEMA show, to demonstrate that the bezel was indeed publicly available before the date on which Jennings filed his application. (HN1[] The date of first public use matters, as inventors have only one year after that date in which to file a patent application. See 35 U.S.C. § 102(b).) [6] The allegedly fraudulent flyer identified Auto Meter's bezel and displayed a date of October 24, 2000. On October 31, 2002, Auto Meter faxed the contested document to the Examiner. Jennings asserts that this too was an act of wire fraud. The Examiner relied on the product flyer in concluding that the aftermarket dashboard bezel was "prior art" under 35 U.S.C. § 102(a), and on that ground she rejected Jennings's patent claims in an Office Action issued on November 13, 2002.

In response to the Office Action, Jennings furnished the Patent Office with evidence that he had invented his bezel before January 2000. Following up on this information, the Examiner again contacted Auto Meter seeking additional evidence that its bezel was publicly available before June 1999. Auto Meter in turn contacted Day and Gauge Works and relayed to them its recent conversation with the Examiner. Jennings claims that the group of defendants then agreed to fabricate a second false product flyer, which showed that Day's bezel was in fact available to the public prior to June 1999, even though they knew that it was not until at least early 2000 that they first began manufacturing the bezel. The second flyer was [7] mailed to the PTO sometime between April 15, 2003, and August 13, 2003, another purported act of mail fraud. The Examiner [*471] issued a second non-final Office Action, mailed on August 13, 2003, once again rejecting Jennings's patent claims, this time relying on the later-filed flyer, which established (fraudulently according to Jennings) that Day's bezel was available in June 1999.

On September 11, 2003, Jennings's attorney, Paul Maginot, attempted to convince the examiner in an interview that she had relied on false information in rejecting Jennings's claims. The Examiner was not persuaded; she issued a final Office Action on February 9, 2004, rejecting Jennings's application and again referring to Auto Meter's second product flyer as her basis for concluding that the product was previously available to the public. Jennings appealed the ruling to the BPAI. Since this case was argued, the court has been informed that the BPAI has reversed the Examiner's decision, finding both substantive and procedural problems with the flyer submitted by Auto Meter. We are not aware, however, of any further developments in the PTO, and in particular, the record does not reflect that Jennings's application [8] has either been granted or denied. (Nor has Jennings withdrawn his appeal, even though it appears that the procedures that the PTO furnishes for contesting adverse decisions may be working perfectly well for him.) Nothing that has happened renders the present case moot, however, and so we proceed with our decision.

In an effort, Jennings says, "to address the delay in the examination and issuance of his patent," he filed a request for voluntary publication of his patent application in order to obtain provisional rights in his application under [1580] 35 U.S.C. § 154(d). While the request was ultimately accepted by the PTO, the wheels did not turn quickly enough to satisfy Jennings. He claims that a number of companies nonetheless "declined the invitation to consider a reasonable royalty for Jennings's intellectual property because the claims of the Bezel Patent Application currently stand rejected in the PTO."

After filing his request for voluntary publication, Jennings, through his lawyer, sent a letter to Gauge Works expressing his doubts about the product flyer that Gauge Works had submitted to the Examiner showing that the bezel was available before June 1999. Gauge Works responded on September [9] 23, 2004, with its own letter stating that it believed that the flyer, which stated that the bezel would be "Available in June" without specifying the year, was intended to indicate that the bezel would be available to the public in June 2000, contrary to the Examiner's interpretation that the flyer showed the bezel would become available in June 1999. Additionally, to bolster its contention that Jennings did not himself invent the bezel, Gauge Works included with its letter a discussion about and photographs of a bezel manufactured by Mitsubishi and made available in the spring of 1999, which Gauge Works claimed constituted prior art to Jennings's bezel. Jennings counters that Mitsubishi's bezel is substantially different from his bezel, that it therefore does not constitute prior art, and that by knowingly misrepresenting it as such in its mailing, Gauge Works was perpetuating its mail-fraud schemes. Indeed, Jennings characterizes Auto Meter's letter of October 20, 2004, to him stating that Auto Meter agreed with Gauge Works's position as yet another fraudulent mailing.

While the parties quarreled over the validity of Jennings's application, Day filed his own design patent application [10] regarding the same bezel in the PTO on November 1, 2002, 11 days after he had spoken with the Examiner regarding Jennings's utility patent application. Jennings alleges [*472] that Day and Gauge Works fraudulently conspired to name Day as the inventor in an effort to "cover up the misrepresentations made to the Examiner during the telephone conversation of October 21, 2002." According to Jennings, the fraud continued throughout the PTO's evaluation of Day's design patent. The Examiner was never given evidence that Day had seen Jennings's bezel on the Internet in January 2000 or that the bezel was displayed at the 2000 SEMA trade show. Allegedly, the Examiner knew nothing about the product flyer that Auto Meter submitted during Jennings's patent application process. Jennings asserts that filing the design patent application without disclosing all of this relevant evidence constituted another act of mail fraud. On October 7, 2003, Day was issued a design patent on the bezel; Day's patent remains in effect.

II

As we noted at the outset, Jennings decided to bring this suit under RICO and related theories, believing that he was one of many victims of a conspiracy by the defendants to defraud the [11] public by manipulating PTO proceedings. The district court, however, found that Jennings had "failed to plead the requisite acts and continued criminal activity as required by RICO," and it therefore dismissed the federal and state RICO claims under FED. R.

CIV. P. 12(b)(6). In the closely-related area of antitrust law, the Supreme Court recently summarized a plaintiff's pleading obligations as follows:

HN4[] Congress passed RICO in an effort to combat organized, long-term criminal activity. Midwest Grinding Co., Inc. v. Spitz, 976 F.2d 1016, 1019 (7th Cir. 1992). Although § 1964(c) provides a private civil action to recover treble damages for violations of RICO's substantive provisions, *Sedima, S.P.R.L. v. Imrex Co., Inc., 473 U.S. 479, 481, 105 S. In order to establish a violation of § 1962(c), on which Jennings relies in part, a plaintiff must show the following [1581] four elements by a preponderance of the evidence: "(1) conduct (2) of an enterprise (3) through a pattern (4) of racketeering activity." Sedima, 473 U.S. at 496. A pattern of racketeering activity consists, at the very least, of two predicate acts of racketeering committed within a ten-year period. 18 U.S.C. § 1961(5); Midwest Grinding, 976 F.2d at 1019. In order to curb "widespread attempts to turn routine commercial disputes into civil RICO actions," id. at 1022, courts carefully scrutinize the pattern requirement to "forestall RICO's use against isolated [13] or sporadic criminal activity, and to prevent RICO from becoming a surrogate for garden-variety [*473] fraud actions properly brought under state law." Id. To fulfill the pattern requirement, plaintiffs must satisfy "the so-called 'continuity plus relationship' test: the predicate acts must be related to one another (the relationship prong) and pose a threat of continued criminal activity (the continuity prong)." Id. (citing *H.J., Inc. v. We can assume that the acts here are related; the question is whether Jennings can show continuity. As the Supreme Court explained in H.J. Inc., HN5[] the continuity requirement exists to give effect to Congress's clear intention that RICO target long-term criminal behavior, 492 U.S. at 242, as opposed to more discrete acts of fraud. Continuity can be "both a closed-and open-ended concept." Midwest Grinding, 976 F.2d at 1022 (quoting H.J., Inc., 492 U.S. at 241). Closed-ended continuity, which is all that is even arguably present in this case, refers to criminal behavior that has come to a close but endured for such a substantial period of time "that the duration and repetition of the criminal activity [14] carries with it an implicit threat of continued criminal activity in the future." Midwest Grinding, 976 F.2d at 1022-23. (An open-ended period, in contrast, is "a course of criminal activity which lacks the duration and repetition to establish continuity." Midwest Grinding, 976 F.2d at 1023. A RICO plaintiff may satisfy the open-ended continuity requirement by showing past conduct which "by its nature projects into the future with a threat of repetition." Id. (quoting H.J. Inc., 492 U.S. at 242).)

In Morgan v. Bank of Waukegan, 804 F.2d 970, 976 (7th Cir. 1986), this court held thatHN6[] in determining whether there is continuity, "[r]elevant factors include the number and variety of predicate acts and the length of time over which they were committed, the number of victims, the presence of separate schemes and the occurrence of distinct injuries." Id. at 975. The court cautioned that "the mere fact that the predicate acts relate to the same overall scheme or involve the same victim does not mean that the acts automatically fail to satisfy the pattern requirement." Id. at 976. The requirement of a pattern of racketeering activity is "a standard, not a rule, and thus its determination depends [15] on the facts and circumstances of the particular case, with no one factor being necessarily determinative." Id. We evaluate the allegations with the goal of "achieving a natural and commonsense result, consistent with Congress's concern with long-term criminal conduct." Roger Whitmore's Auto. Servs., Inc. v. Lake County, Illinois, 424 F.3d 659, 673 (7th Cir. 2005).

Evaluating this complaint as Twombly instructs and paying attention to the way in which the factual allegations correspond to the legal requirements we have outlined, we have no trouble concluding that Jennings has not presented a RICO case. Although Jennings alleges a slew of predicate racketeering acts that he claims were aimed at corrupting PTO proceedings (in his words, "an assault on the Patent Office"), at root this is a dispute over who invented an aftermarket dashboard bezel. Even if the defendants may have used misleading tactics in their various efforts to obtain the rights to the product (a point on which we take no position), the case lacks any of the hallmarks of a RICO violation. There is no pattern of fraudulent or racketeering behavior. The state courts and the PTO itself have ample tools to correct any individual [16] instances of fraud or other misconduct.

Consideration of the Morgan factors shows why this is so. HN7[] The duration of the [*474] alleged racketeering activity is "perhaps the most important element of RICO continuity." Roger Whitmore's, 424 F.3d at 673. Here, the defendants' conduct spanned an insubstantial amount of time. Their alleged fraudulent behavior began on October 21, 2002, when Day first accepted the telephone call from the Examiner. According to the complaint, the last communication with the PTO occurred as late as August 13, 2003, fewer than ten months after the alleged racketeering activity began.

Implicitly conceding that ten months is potentially too short, Jennings urges us to take a broader look at the defendants' conduct. He argues that the appropriate time span is two years, and that we must consider two particular sets of allegations that he thinks the district court improperly ignored. First, Jennings argues that we must account for the allegations [1582] associated with Day's design patent application, which the district court held were irrelevant to the analysis. Even if we were inclined to do so, however, we do not see how it makes a difference. Day's design patent application, [17] which Jennings argues was an act of mail fraud, was filed on November 1, 2002, 11 days after the alleged criminal activity began. While Jennings strenuously urges that Day should never have received the patent eleven months later, and he implies that the fraud was an ongoing act that continued until the application was granted, there was nothing ongoing about any fraudulent act. The alleged misrepresentation was a singular predicate act that occurred right at the beginning of the ten-month window. Second, Jennings argues that the district court should have considered the September and October 2004 letters from the defendants to Jennings as further acts of mail fraud that extended the duration of the scheme. We disagree. These were letters sent to Jennings, not the PTO, essentially explaining to him why the defendants believed that his utility patent application in the PTO should be rejected. If fraudulent at all, the letters were, in Jennings's own words, "intended to cover up the fraudulent scheme being perpetrated at the [PTO]." But HN8[] actions, even if themselves illegal, taken in an effort to cover up a criminal scheme "do [18] nothing to extend the duration of the underlying . . . scheme." Midwest Grinding, 976 F.2d at 1024; see also Pyramid Sec. Ltd. v. IB Resolution Inc., 288 U.S. App. D.C. 157, 924 F.2d 1114, 1117 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (holding scheme to conceal underlying criminal activity by giving false deposition testimony does not extend the length of a closed-ended RICO scheme); Aldridge v. Lily-Tulip, Inc., 953 F.2d 587, 593-94 (11th Cir. 1992) (noting that acts to conceal underlying wrongdoing in a RICO suit do not carry with them the threat of future harm).

In short, Jennings's allegations, even construed generously in his favor, cannot support a time period longer than ten months. That time period, during which only a few allegedly fraudulent acts took place, is too short to show the necessary continuity for a "pattern" of racketeering. See Midwest Grinding, 976 F.2d at 1024 (finding a nine-month scheme insubstantial); Olive Can Co. v. Martin, 906 F.2d 1147, 1151 (finding six months to be a "short period of time"); *Uni*Uni*Quality, Inc. v. Infotronx, Inc., 974 F.2d 918, 922 (7th Cir. 1992)* (holding that a scheme that lasted at most seven to eight months was "precisely the type of short-term, closed-ended fraud that, subsequent [19] to H.J., Inc., this circuit consistently has held does not constitute a pattern."); see also Hughes v. Consol-Pennsylvania Coal Co., 945 F.2d 594, 611 (3d Cir. 1991) ("We hold that twelve months is not a substantial period of time."); Primary Care Inv. v. PHP Healthcare Corp., 986 F.2d 1208, 1215 (8th [*475] Cir. 1993) (stating that "the activity lasted between ten and eleven months and . . . we deem this period insubstantial").

The short duration alone might be enough to dispose of this case. See Vicom, Inc. v. Harbridge Merchant Servs., Inc., 20 F.3d 771, 782 (7th Cir. 1994). The other factors identified in Morgan also favor dismissal, however, and so we address them briefly. Jennings has not alleged a sufficient number and variety of predicate acts to show a RICO violation. While the complaint actually alleges very few criminal acts, Jennings attempts to demonstrate a wide variety of predicate acts by alleging that individual acts violate multiple statutes. The act of mailing the purportedly false product flyer to the PTO, for example, metamorphoses in his hands into both tampering with evidence and mail fraud. What emerges from a careful reading of his complaint is something akin to what [20] the court found in Vicom, where we said, "Although Vicom's prolixity makes it seem as though Vicom alleges innumerable predicate acts to support its causes of action . . . [w]hen all the verbiage is weeded out, Vicom manages to allege a very few acts of mail or wire fraud in each count." 20 F.3d at 781. Jennings's complaint also lacks the requisite variety. Other than the evidence-tampering allegations, which, as we noted above, generally stem from acts that are also alleged to be mail or wire fraud, all we have here is a few instances of mail and wire fraud. We have repeatedly rejected RICO claims that rely so heavily on mail and wire fraud allegations to establish a pattern. See Midwest Grinding, 976 F.2d at 1024-25 ("HN9[] [M]ail and wire fraud allegations are unique among predicate acts because the multiplicity of such acts may be no indication of the requisite continuity of the underlying fraudulent activity. Consequently, we do not look favorably on many instances of mail and wire fraud to form a pattern." (internal quotations omitted)); Vicom, 20 F.3d at 781 (same).

Additionally, notwithstanding Jennings's efforts to allege a vast array of victims and injuries, he is the only identifiable [21] victim. He alleges that "the [PTO], the payers of users fees, taxpayers, and participants in the relevant automotive accessory market" are also [1583] victims of the defendants' alleged crimes, but such unspecific assertions are inadequate. In SK Hand Tool Corp. v. Dresser Indus. Inc., 852 F.2d 936, 942 (7th Cir. 1988), for example, the court considered a RICO claim that the defendant "defrauded investors generally." The court rejected this claim of "fraud on the public" because the complaint "contains no well-pleaded facts permitting us to conclude that some [other] investors may have been hurt by the alleged fraud." See also Cross v. Simons, 729 F. Supp. 588, 595 (N.D.Ill. 1989) (Williams, J.) (holding that an allegation that victims were "U.S. Citizens" was insufficient). Jennings is the only identifiable individual who has suffered any potential injury. For similar reasons, we reject Jennings's characterization of the number of injuries suffered. He claims to have "allege[d] a myriad of distinct injuries. Among the injuries alleged are the loss of honest governmental services from officials of the [PTO], . . . the slander of Mr. Jennings's provisional patent rights and the hampering of [22] his licensing program, . . . the loss of patent term and the corresponding loss of license fees arising from the denial of a patent to Mr. Jennings, . . . and the loss of the honest services of the defendants to perform their duty of truthfully responding to quasi-judicial officers on [sic] the U.S. Government." Each one of these so-called injuries, however, even if cognizable (which many are [*476] not), is simply a different way to characterize the damage Jennings has suffered from his inability (thus far) to get his utility patent.

Finally, Day's filing of the design patent application does not create a separate "scheme" sufficient to save Jennings's RICO claims. It is not even clear that Jennings is entitled to assert any injury from the Day design patent application, since it is unclear whether, without the utility patent Jennings is seeking, he has any legal right in any property in the first place. Regardless, the existence of a design patent application for the same product does not change what this case is really about: a dispute over various patent rights to an aftermarket dashboard bezel. As we discussed at oral argument, Jennings has a number of remedies he might pursue in order [23] to rectify the injustice he perceives regarding these patents. But those remedies do not include a private right of action under RICO, which was never intended to apply to such brief, closed-ended, instances of fraud, where there is only one identifiable victim, and that victim suffered one articulable injury. The district court was correct to dismiss these claims.

For the same reasons, the district court properly dismissed Jennings's state RICO claim. HN10[] "The Indiana RICO statute is modeled after federal RICO, and also requires proof of conduct of an enterprise through a pattern of racketeering activity. As with federal RICO, a Plaintiff must satisfy the continuity plus relationship requirement with respect to the predicate acts alleged." Directv v. Edwards, 293 F. Supp. 2d 873, 879 (N.D. Ind. 2003) (citing Yoder Grain, Inc. v. Antalis, 722 N.E.2d 840 (Ind. Ct. App. 2000)). Thus, Jennings's state RICO claims fail as well.

III

We turn now to the remaining state law claims. At the time this case was argued, the Examiner's decision to reject Jennings's patent application was on appeal in the BPAI. The district court, after dismissing the RICO claims, dismissed the remaining state law claims [24] pending the BPAI's decision, finding that the case was not ripe for judicial review. Jennings contends he has suffered various harms under Indiana law whether or not he ever receives his patent, which makes it unnecessary to wait for the result of his patent application. HN11[] We review the district court's decision to dismiss the complaint on ripeness grounds de novo, see Metropolitan Milwaukee Ass'n of Commerce v. Milwaukee County, 325 F.3d 879, 881 (7th Cir. 2003), and we affirm that conclusion as well.

Since oral argument, the BPAI has reversed the Examiner's decision. That does not mean, however, that the issue of Jennings's patent application has finally been resolved. As far as we are aware, the PTO has not yet conclusively determined whether Jennings will receive a utility patent on the dashboard bezel. Unless and until that happens, any damages he has are entirely speculative. Should Jennings ultimately receive his patent, any potential damages he claims to have suffered from the inability to get a patent disappear. Moreover, it remains a possibility that his application might be denied on grounds other than the existence of prior art, such as obviousness. See KSR Internat'l Co. v. Teleflex, 550 U.S. 398, 127 S. Ct. 1727, 1741-42, 167 L. Ed. 2d 705 (2007) [25] (invalidating a patent as obvious and rejecting, as too lenient, the approach that the Federal Circuit has been taking to that issue). We recognize that Jennings believes that he has been damaged in ways that Indiana law recognizes, whether or not he ultimately receives [1584] his patent. Nonetheless, even those [*477] claims will be affected by the outcome of the patent proceeding. HN12[] The ripeness doctrine exists "to prevent the courts, through avoidance of premature adjudication, from entangling themselves in abstract disagreements over administrative policies, and also to protect the agencies from judicial interference until an administrative decision has been formalized and its effects felt in a concrete way by the challenging parties." Sprint Spectrum L.P. v. City of Carmel, 361 F.3d 998, 1002 (7th Cir. 2004) (quoting Abbott Labs. v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 136, 148-49, 87 S. Ct. 1507, 18 L. Ed. 2d 681 (1967)) (internal quotation marks omitted). Although Jennings is not asking this court to review the PTO's actions (undoubtedly because he knows that we have no jurisdiction to do so), the ultimate outcome of the agency proceedings will shed meaningful light on the nature and degree of harm Jennings may have suffered. The district court [26] did not err by concluding it was premature to consider the state law claims.

IV

Finally, Jennings argues that the district court erred by disqualifying his attorney from this litigation. Jennings does not claim that he has been prejudiced thus far in any way by his attorney's disqualification, and we do not see how he could have been. His only remedy at this point would be for us to reinstate his attorney for future litigation in this matter. Since, in the exercise of de novo review, we have affirmed the dismissal of all claims in this case, we need not consider whether the attorney disqualification was appropriate.

The district court's decision is AFFIRMED.

Opinion

ORDER

Plaintiff Champagne Metals ("Champagne"), an aluminum distributor or "service [*3] center" sued seven other service centers -- Ken-Mac Metals, Inc. ("Ken-Mac"), Samuel, Son & Co., Ltd., Samuel Specialty Metals, Inc. (collectively "Samuel"), Metalwest, LLC, Integris Metals, Inc. ("Integris"), Earle M. Jorgensen Co. ("EMG"), and Ryerson Tull, Inc. ("Ryerson") [1] (collectively the "Established Distributors"). The plaintiff claims the defendants violated Section 1 of the Sherman Antitrust Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, by engaging in a horizontal group boycott, violated the Oklahoma Antitrust Reform Act, 79 Okla. Stat. § 203, by unreasonably restraining trade, and tortiously interfered with its business and contractual relationships. Summary judgment was previously entered in the defendants' favor on all claims, but that decision was reversed in part on appeal. [2] Renewed motions for summary judgment have been filed by the defendants, which must be considered, together with the parties' evidence, under the guidelines set forth by the Tenth Circuit in Champagne Metals v. Ken-Mac Metals, Inc., 458 F.3d 1073 (10th Cir. 2006). [3] As the facts have been stated in detail in the Tenth Circuit's opinion, the court will not repeat them, except as necessary to explain its conclusions. [4]

1. The Sherman Act Claim [5]

Agreement

The defendants contend the [*5] plaintiff's Sherman Act claim fails because the plaintiff cannot demonstrate the existence of an agreement among the defendants that unreasonably restrained trade. As "[t]he essence of a claim of violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act is the agreement itself," Champagne Metals, 458 F.3d at 1082, the court initially must decide "whether the circumstantial evidence, viewed through the lens of a highly plausible economic theory, and combined with Champagne's direct evidence, creates a genuine issue of material fact as to [1] *Ryerson [4] Tull and Integris, which has been acquired by Ryerson, are now known as Ryerson Inc.

[2] The decision was affirmed with respect to the plaintiff's claim that the defendants had unilaterally violated the Oklahoma Antitrust Act, its state law claim of tortious interference with its relationship with Ormet Corporation, one of the mills, and its tortious interference claim against EMJ. The appellate court also affirmed the exclusion of the report and testimony of one of Champagne's expert witnesses.

[3] The court allowed the parties to file their briefs and the record under seal. To the extent this opinion cites to sealed portions of the briefs and record, those portions are unsealed.

[4] Briefly summarized, the plaintiff claims the Established Distributors conspired "to attempt to keep a new, aggressive entrant out of the market," Champagne Metals, 458 F.3d at 1086, by threatening to move their business from the mills that sold them aluminum, if those mills dealt with Champagne.

the existence of a conspiracy." Id. at 1087. The crux of the issue is whether the plaintiff has presented evidence "that tends to exclude the possibility that the alleged conspirators acted independently." Id. at 1085. The defendants claim Champagne has only cited instances of purely unilateral, parallel conduct on their part, in addition to what the Tenth Circuit termed as "weak direct evidence" of a conspiracy. Id. at 1084. This, they argue, is insufficient to show they entered into an illegal agreement. [6] The court concludes otherwise.

"[U]nilateral conduct, regardless of its anti-competitive effects, is not prohibited by § 1 of the Sherman Act." Abraham v. Intermountain Health Care Inc., 461 F.3d 1249, 1256 (10th Cir. 2006) (internal quotation marks omitted). Concerted action also cannot "be inferred merely from the existence of complaints." Id. at 1259. However, because the alleged conspiracy is economically rational, "restrictions on the inferences drawn from Champagne's circumstantial evidence are not warranted." Champagne Metals, 458 F.3d at 1085. See Abraham, 461 F.3d at 1257 ("'[I]f the claim is one that simply makes no economic sense --[a plaintiff] must come forward with more persuasive evidence to support [its] claim than would otherwise be necessary.'") (quoting Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 587, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986)). [7] The evidence of an agreement is not overwhelming, [8] but, "constru[ing] all facts and reasonable inferences in a light most favorable to the nonmoving party," Champagne Metals, 458 F.3d at 1078 [*7] (internal quotation marks omitted), and considering the testimony and exhibits before it cumulatively, [9] the court finds sufficient evidence from which a reasonable jury might infer the defendants acted in concert to pressure the mills not to supply aluminum to Champagne or designate it a "recognized distributor."

This evidence includes the quick succession of events that occurred after Champagne Metals was formed -- EMJ's refusal to sell the plaintiff its cut-to-length line, after its initial agreement to do so; [10] Commonwealth's refusal to fill the plaintiff's orders, despite its initial agreement to do so; [11] the pressure Commonwealth's major service center

[6] The defendants also claim there is no evidence of any communication among defendants, yet discuss Bill Thomas' alleged statement [*6] that Debbie Veale had told him that she "had been in contact with her counterparts, who were part of the National Association of Aluminum Distributors group." Defendants' renewed motion, p. 17.

[7] Here, unlike the situation in Abraham, the plaintiff is not relying "solely on circumstantial evidence to prove concerted action." Abraham, 461 F.3d at 1257.

[8] There is considerable evidence that controverts the plaintiff's conspiracy claim, e.g. plaintiff's Exhibit 68 demonstrating that "Commonwealth's increased sales to Champagne were accompanied by increased purchases from Commonwealth by Integris, VMG and Rasco." Integris' reply brief, p. 2.

[9] In reaching its decision, the court has heeded the Tenth Circuit's statement:

> [W]e emphasize the Supreme Court's admonition in Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171, 107 S.Ct. 2775, 97 L.Ed.2d 144 (1987), that individual pieces of evidence, insufficient in themselves to prove a point, may in cumulation prove it. The sum of an evidentiary presentation may well be greater than its constituent parts.... [A] piece of evidence, unreliable [*8] in isolation, may become quite probative when corroborated by other evidence.

Champagne Metals, 458 F.3d at 1081 at n.6 (quoting Bourjaily, 483 U.S. at 179-80).

[10] In its reply brief, EMJ denies an agreement to sell existed, citing deposition testimony of Mike Champagne, which is included in an appendix submitted with its reply. It is improper for a party to submit new evidence in a reply brief. (Apparently the evidence was included with EMJ's original summary judgment motion, but not its renewed motion. See reply, p. 4). Nonetheless, the court has considered the [*10] testimony and finds the evidence does not negate the existence of an agreement to sell Champagne the line.

[11] Bill Thomas, a former Commonwealth employee who now works for Champagne, testified that he "assumed that Jorgensen would not object to Commonwealth Aluminum or other mills selling to Champagne, and that other established distributors would have little or no objection because of their previous lack of interest in serving the horse trailer industry. I talked to my manager at Commonwealth, Terry Wirta, and we agreed that selling mill finish and painted aluminum coil to Champagne should workout for customers put on the mill to refuse to recognize or sell to Champagne; [12] Ravensworth Aluminum and Kaiser Aluminum's refusal to sell aluminum to Champagne, and Samuel's offer to buy the company. Additional evidence consists of the circumstances surrounding the plaintiff's attempt to gain recognition by Ormet Corporation in late 2001; the evidence of contact among defendants (Phil Wiley and Debbie Veale's statements), the repeated anti-competitive statements/actions taken by the defendants; a strong motive for the defendants to conspire; [13] and the testimony from the defendants' industry expert, John Campbell, that he could not point to a new service center other than Champagne that [*9] had achieved mill recognition within the last ten years. [14] See Rossi v. Standard Roofing, Inc., 156 F.3d 452, 456 (3rd Cir. 1998). See generally Mitchael v. Intracorp, Inc., 179 F.3d 847, 859 (10th Cir. 1999) ("While consciously parallel behavior may contribute to a finding of antitrust conspiracy, it is insufficient, standing alone, to prove conspiracy. Such parallel behavior may, however, support the existence of an illegal agreement when augmented by additional evidence from which an understanding among the parties may be inferred. Such evidence may include a showing that the parties are acting against their own individual business interests, [15] or that there is motivation to enter into an agreement requiring parallel behavior.") (citation and internal quotation marks omitted). [16]

Viewing all the evidence cumulatively and in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, the court finds Champagne has shown the existence of a genuine issue of fact as to whether the Established Distributors entered into a conspiracy.

Unreasonable restraint of trade

As the plaintiff has established, for summary judgment purposes, the existence of an agreement, the court must now determine whether the alleged restraint of trade is unreasonable. Diaz v. Farley, 215 F.3d 1175, 1182 (10th Cir. 2000) [*12] (The Sherman Act "generally precludes only restraints [of trade] that are unreasonable."). Two main analytical approaches are used to determine whether a defendant's conduct unreasonably restrains trade -- the per se rule and the rule of reason. [17] FTC v. Indiana Fed'n of Dentists, 476 U.S. 447, 457-58, 106 S. Ct. 2009, 90 L. Ed. 2d 445 (1986)("a restraint may be adjudged unreasonable either because it fits within a class of restraints that has been held to be 'per se' unreasonable, or because it violates what has come to be known as the 'Rule of Reason'"); Rossi v. Standard Roofing, Inc., 156 F.3d 452, 461 (3rd Cir. 1998). While the per se rule treats certain categories of restraints as necessarily illegal, under the rule of reason "'the factfinder weighs all of the circumstances of a case in deciding whether a restrictive practice should be prohibited as imposing an

Not all group boycotts or horizontal restraints of trade are judged, however, under a per se standard. Diaz, 215 F.3d at 1182. "The decision to apply the per se rule turns on whether the practice facially appears to be one that would always or almost always tend to restrict competition and decrease output or instead one designed to increase economic efficiency and render markets more, rather than less, competitive." Northwest Wholesale, 472 U.S. at 289-90 (internal quotation marks omitted).

The defendants contend that the per se rule does not apply as the plaintiff cannot show either that they possess dominant [18] market power or cut off access to a supply necessary to enable the plaintiff to compete. The defendants argue that dominant position in the relevant market and exclusive control are essential elements of a per se violation. The plaintiff responds that what the defendants refer to as requirements for per se consideration are merely [*15] traits often possessed by typical per se cases. These traits become relevant, the plaintiff contends, when the challenged conduct involves legitimate cooperative activity. The plaintiff asserts that cases requiring a showing of market power, like Northwest Wholesale, all involve organizations with "obvious pro-competitive aspects," such as professional associations, industry self-regulating entities, trade associations, sports leagues, health care facilities and joint ventures.

There is authority to support the plaintiff's position, see Rossi, 156 F.3d at 463-64, and in Klor's, Inc. v. Broadway-Hale Stores, Inc., 359 U.S. 207, 79 S. Ct. 705, 3 L. Ed. 2d 741 (1959) the Supreme Court applied the per se standard to a group boycott despite the absence of any claim of market power. [19] However, "[i]n Northwest Wholesale, the Supreme Court clarified its earlier language from Klor's." Diaz, 215 F.3d at 1182. "There, the court stated that unless the defendants in a group boycott situation 'possess[ ] market [*16] power or exclusive access to an element essential to effective competition, the conclusion that expulsion [of the plaintiff] is virtually always likely to have an anticompetitive effect [thereby invoking a per se analysis] is not warranted.'" Id. at 1182-83 (quoting Northwest Wholesale, 472 U.S. at 296.

Northwest Wholesale did involve a wholesale purchasing cooperative which was "not a form of concerted activity characteristically likely to result in predominantly anticompetitive effects." Northwest Wholesale, 472 U.S. at 295. Similarly, Diaz, a Tenth Circuit decision in which the three factors discussed in Northwest Wholesale were applied to determine whether the challenged agreements "merited per se condemnation under the antitrust laws," involved a health care [*17] facility. Diaz, 215 F.3d at 1180. However, the Tenth Circuit did not apply the factors in Diaz

[18] Although the plaintiff challenges the defendants reference to "dominant" market power, the Tenth Circuit has required a showing that a defendant "hold a dominant position in a relevant market." Diaz, 215 F.3d at 1183.

[19] The court accords less significance to Full Draw, 182 F. 3d at 745, a case relied on by the plaintiff, as the Tenth Circuit was considering the sufficiency of the complaint, not the evidence required to permit the case to proceed to trial. The same distinction applies to the recent decision of the Supreme Court in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007), referenced in the supplemental submissions of the parties.

because of the type of organization being sued, but rather found that to be an additional consideration -- "the fact that the conduct at issue in this case concerns decisions relating to health care presents a further reason why we should be caution in applying a per se test." Id. at 1184. [20] The court will, therefore, proceed to consider the Northwest Wholesale factors in determining the applicable analysis. See Indiana Fed'n of Dentists, 476 U.S. at 458 ("As we observed last Term … the category of restraints classed as group boycotts is not to be expanded indiscriminately, and the per se approach has generally been limited to cases in which firms with market power boycott suppliers or customers in order to discourage them from doing business with a competitor ….").

The defendants claim they lack market power because they compete with "a wide variety of sources," including both service centers and mills, which make 60% of sales to end-users. They also point to Judge Cauthron's finding that the barriers to entry in their industry are low, as additional support for their claimed lack of substantial market power. [21] Their lack of control over an element essential to the plaintiff's ability to compete is evidenced, they assert, by Champagne's success -- a doubling of revenues from 1997-2002. [22]

Again, the court is confronted with a difficult issue. [23] Nonetheless, it concludes the record includes sufficient evidence to create a justiciable question as to whether the defendants collectively possess market power or a "dominant position in the relevant market." Northwest Wholesale, 472 U.S. at 294. E.g., Plaintiff's Exhibit 30, pp. 32-33; Exhibit 35, p. 13-14; Exhibit 61; Exhibit 71. See Toys "R" Us v. FTC, 221 F.3d 928, 936 (7th Cir. 2000) (term "dominant," as used in phrase "dominant position in the market" is "an undefined term, but plainly chosen to stand for something different from antitrust's term of art "monopoly"). [24] See generally Indiana Fed'n of Dentists, 476 U.S. at 460-61 ("Since the purpose of the inquiries into market definition and market power is to determine whether an arrangement has the potential for genuine adverse [*20] effects on competition, proof of actual detrimental effects, such as a reduction of output, can obviate the need for an inquiry into market power, which is but a surrogate for detrimental effects.) (internal quotation marks omitted). That market power, [25] when combined with the lack of a plausible argument justifying the alleged boycott, merits per se review of the plaintiff Section 1 claim. [26] See id. at

However, that case was evaluating the evidence necessary to show the market power required to establish a Section 2 violation of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2, not a per se violation of Section 1, as was Bacchus Indus., Inc. v. Antitrust injury and Damages

Even if the plaintiff can establish an illegal agreement, its antitrust claim nonetheless fails, the defendants assert, because Champagne cannot prove an antitrust injury -- a necessary component of a Sherman Act claim. See Medical Supply Chain, Inc. v. General Elec. Co., 144 F.App'x 708, 714 (10th Cir. 2005) [30] ("[E]ven where a per se violation of 15 U.S.C. § 1 is involved, a plaintiff must still show that it suffered an antitrust injury."). The defendants argue that the plaintiff has not suffered an antitrust injury because the Tenth Circuit "has already ruled that Champagne failed to demonstrate an adverse effect on overall competition." Defendants' renewed motion, p. 42.

In the context of discussing whether the plaintiff had shown the unilateral harm to competition required to establish its state unilateral antitrust claim, the Tenth Circuit stated that the plaintiff had not pointed to "evidence of an actual barrier to entry created by the Established Distributors' unilateral conduct." Id. at 1093. [31] However, the court proceeded [*24] to state: "We do not mean to imply that there might not be other evidence of injury to competition to be found in this case's voluminous record; we note only that Champagne fails to point to any such evidence on appeal." Id. at 1093 n.21. [32]

[26] The defendants offer no justification for their alleged conduct -- no "'plausible arguments that they were intended to enhance overall efficiency and make markets more competitive.'" Diaz, 215 F.3d at 1183 (quoting Northwest Wholesale, 472 U.S. at 294*). Instead, they attempt to discount the significance of this factor.*

[27] The plaintiff also has submitted evidence showing that the defendants deprived the plaintiff of access to multiple mills, which it needed to compete successfully. See Klor's, 359 U.S. at 209-10; Rossi, 156 F. 3d at 464 ("Rossi has adduced evidence that GAF product was, if not unique, then at least necessary for him to compete in the marketplace. ").

[29] Ken-Mac argues that it could not have been part of any per se conspiracy because it does not compete in the same market with Champagne Metals. However, the court finds the plaintiff has proffered sufficient evidence that the two were competitors to preclude entry of summary judgment in Ken-Mac's favor. E.g., plaintiff's [*23] Exhibit 23, p.29.

[30] Medical Supply Chain, Inc. is an unpublished decision cited for persuasive value only under 10th Cir. R. 36.3(B).

[31] While the plaintiff's expert had testified that the defendants' threats deterred other investors from entering the service center business in the relevant market, his testimony was not a part of the record, the appellate court having upheld its exclusion by the trial court.

[32] The defendants also argue that, even if the plaintiff was able to demonstrate a barrier to entry, that would negate its antitrust injury, as it would benefit from decreased competition. The flaw in that argument is the plaintiff claims that because of the alleged barrier, it is, and has been since it started, at a competitive disadvantage and is not an "existing competitor[] in the market." Defendants' renewed motion, p. 43 n.10.

Because "the antitrust laws were enacted for the protection of competition not competitors," Full Draw, 182 F.3d at 754 (internal quotation marks omitted), the question is whether "the instant case is … one in which it is alleged that competition fell [*25] prey to a competitor," rather than "one in which it is alleged that a competitor fell prey to competition." Id. The court finds the plaintiff has met its burden of producing evidence, including the deposition testimony of Krausse and his affidavit, [33] demonstrating that, as a result of the defendants' anticompetitive acts, there were significant barriers to entry in the aluminum service center industry, which caused the plaintiff damage. [34]

The defendants also contend that the plaintiff lacks admissible evidence showing that it sustained damages resulting from the defendants' conduct. They challenge the plaintiff's proof of loss, [*26] asserting that critical defects in its damages model requires its exclusion, along with the testimony of the plaintiff's expert, Mr. Wilsey, who prepared it. The defendants assert that the model includes damages that allegedly were incurred outside the four year limitations period and that the estimated loss is speculative and unreliable. The plaintiff responds that it advised the court at the status conference that its damages report would have to be revised and the court indicated that it would determine whether the damages calculations could be changed after the summary judgment motions were decided.

The plaintiff has accurately reported part of the court's statements at the status conference. However, the court also advised the defendants that they could submit a summary judgment motion on damages if it was dispositive. As the court has not determined if the plaintiff will be allowed to revise the expert report on which the defendants' motion is based, it is premature to consider the defendants' contention that the plaintiff's antitrust claim fails for lack of admissible evidence of loss. The defendants may reurge that aspect of their motion once the court decides if the plaintiff [*27] is bound by its expert's initial submissions.

As the court has concluded the plaintiff has demonstrated that material questions of fact exist as to whether the defendants conspired to engage in an unreasonable restraint of trade, the defendants are not entitled at this time to summary judgment on the plaintiff's state or federal antitrust claims. [35]

2. The Tortious Interference Claim

The defendants also seek summary judgment on the plaintiff's tortious interference with contract claim, which is asserted against all defendants but EMJ. In their joint brief they allot little space to address this claim, simply stating that it fails because Champagne lacks sufficient evidence of anticompetitive conduct. Integris argues in its individual motion that the plaintiff has no evidence that it or its predecessors unlawfully interfered with the plaintiff's relationship with third persons and that the claim is deficient because "throughout the limitations period Commonwealth sold 'as much [*28] as it could' to Champagne," Integris' reply, p. 8. Ken-Mac asserts that the plaintiff has failed to identify a single incident of its alleged interference with the plaintiff's relationship with Commonwealth and does not mention it in the section of its response brief discussing that claim. Finally, Metalwest argues that there is no evidence that it engaged in any "independently wrongful means to interfere with Champagne's relationships with Commonwealth." Metalwest's motion, p. 23.

The Tenth Circuit stated in Champagne Metals that if the plaintiff "can show evidence of anticompetitive conduct, it can, by definition, show wrongful conduct in support of its interference with business relations claim." Champagne

[33] As is discussed subsequently, the court did not consider what the defendants identify in their motion to strike as new information contained in the Krausse affidavit.

[34] See Champagne Metals, 458 F. 3d at 1088 n.15 ("These injuries stemmed from the denial of recognition of Champagne by the mills-denials that Champagne alleges were prompted by the pressure put on the mills by the Established Distributors …. Thus, the Established Distributors are incorrect to say that Champagne's evidence shows it suffered no injury from acts within the limitations period. ").

[35] As mentioned, the defendants are not precluded from reurging their motion insofar as it pertains to the proof of loss issue, if appropriate, after the court decides if the plaintiff may revise its expert's report.

Metals, 458 F.3d at 1095. The plaintiff's evidence of a conspiracy and anticompetitive conduct suffices to demonstrate all elements of the plaintiff's tortious interference claim against all the defendants except for the element of damages. Because of uncertainty regarding the plaintiff's expert's report - Champagne's proof of loss - the court has yet to decide if the plaintiff has demonstrated that its profitability and growth were affected by the defendants' alleged anticompetitive [*29] conduct. As that aspect of the plaintiff's case will be addressed subsequently, the defendants' motions, insofar as they pertain to the plaintiff's tortious interference claim, will be denied at this time.

Motion to Strike

The defendants also filed a motion to strike the affidavits attached to the plaintiff's response brief. The court completely disregarded the affidavit of Alvin Wyatt and disregarded the portions of the remaining affidavits that contained new information that was not part of the original summary judgment record. Therefore, the motion to strike is moot.

Accordingly, having found the plaintiff's evidence suffices to create material questions of fact as to Champagne's federal and state antitrust claims and its tortious interference with contract claim, the defendants' renewed motions for summary judgment [Doc. Nos. 420, 425, 427, 428, 430, 431, 432] are DENIED. Their motion to strike [Doc. # 458] is DENIED as being MOOT.

Faced with a proffer of expert scientific testimony the trial judge must determine whether the expert is proposing to testify to (1) scientific knowledge that (2) will assist the trier of fact to understand or determine a fact in issue. This gatekeeping function extends beyond scientific testimony to testimony based on "technical" and "other specialized" knowledge.

Evidence > Admissibility > Expert Witnesses

Evidence > ... > Testimony > Expert Witnesses > Qualifications

HN3[] Admissibility, Expert Witnesses

Fed. R. Evid. 702 embodies three distinct substantive restrictions on the admission of expert testimony: qualifications, reliability, and fit. The party offering the expert must prove each of these requirements by a preponderance of the evidence.

Evidence > Admissibility > Expert Witnesses > Daubert Standard

Evidence > Admissibility > Expert Witnesses

HN4[] Expert Witnesses, Daubert Standard

For expert testimony to meet the "fit" requirement, it must assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue. Fed. R. Evid. 702. This condition goes primarily to relevance. Expert testimony which does not relate to any issue in the case is not relevant and, ergo, non-helpful. "Fit" is not always obvious, and scientific validity for one purpose is not necessarily scientific validity for other, unrelated purposes.

Evidence > Relevance > Exclusion of Relevant Evidence > Confusion, Prejudice & Waste of Time

Evidence > Relevance > Relevant Evidence

Evidence > Admissibility > Expert Witnesses

Evidence > Admissibility > Expert Witnesses > Daubert Standard

HN5[] Exclusion of Relevant Evidence, Confusion, Prejudice & Waste of Time

The United States Supreme Court recognized that the "fit" requirement goes primarily to relevance, but it obviously did not intend the second prong of Fed. R. Evid. 702 to be merely a reiteration of the general relevancy requirement of Fed. R. Evid. 402. In elucidating the "fit" requirement, the Supreme Court noted that scientific expert testimony carries special dangers to the fact-finding process because it can be both powerful and quite misleading because of the difficulty in evaluating it. Federal judges must therefore exclude proffered scientific evidence under Fed. R. Evid. 702 and 403 unless they are convinced that it speaks clearly and directly to an issue in dispute in the case, and that it will not mislead the jury.

Evidence > Admissibility > Expert Witnesses > Daubert Standard

HN6[] Expert Witnesses, Daubert Standard

District courts should tread carefully when evaluating proffered expert testimony, paying special attention to the relevance prong of Daubert.

Evidence > Admissibility > Expert Witnesses > Daubert Standard

Evidence > Admissibility > Expert Witnesses

HN7[] Expert Witnesses, Daubert Standard

The standard for analyzing the fit of an expert's analysis to the case at hand is "not that high," but is "higher than bare relevance." That statement remains sound law inasmuch as it requires that experts who purport to apply their principles and methods to the facts of the case do so in a reliable manner.

Evidence > Admissibility > Expert Witnesses > Daubert Standard

Evidence > Admissibility > Expert Witnesses

HN8[] Expert Witnesses, Daubert Standard

Under the liberal Daubert standard, the plaintiffs do not have to prove to the judge by a preponderance of the evidence that their expert's testimony is correct, they must only show that it is reliable. The requirement of reliability is lower than the standard of correctness. The judge does not have to determine that these methods are necessarily the best grounds to ascertain certain facts, but only that the evidence presented will help the trier of fact.

Evidence > Admissibility > Expert Witnesses > Daubert Standard

Evidence > Admissibility > Expert Witnesses

HN9[] Expert Witnesses, Daubert Standard

Once the foundation for admissibility required by Daubert has been established, concerns about the validity of an expert's conclusions should not result in the exclusion of the expert's testimony. Rather, such concerns should be presented to the jury through cross examination, presentation of contrary evidence and careful instruction on the burden of proof.

A consumer alleging antitrust violations cannot obtain damages without showing that he actually paid more than he would have paid in the absence of the violation. Thus, one pursuing antitrust recovery must establish that the damages suffered were caused by the defendant's participation in a scheme repugnant to the antitrust laws.

HN11[] Regulated Practices, Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade

In price-fixing cases, causation of injury may be found as a matter of just and reasonable inference from proof of defendants' wrongful acts and their tendency to injure plaintiffs, and from evidence of change in prices not shown to be attributable to other causes.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Remedies > General Overview

HN12[] Private Actions, Remedies

In an action alleging antitrust violations, once causation is determined, the actual amount of damages may result from a reasonable estimate, as long as the jury verdict is not the product of speculation or guess work. The relaxed measure of proof is afforded to the amount, not the causation of loss--the nexus between the defendant's illegal activity and the injuries suffered must be reasonably proven. However, a plaintiff's burden of proving the fact of damage is satisfied by its proof of some damage flowing from the unlawful conspiracy; inquiry beyond this minimum point goes only to the amount and not the fact of damage. It is enough that the illegality is shown to be a material cause of the injury; a plaintiff need not exhaust all possible alternative sources of injury .

HN13[] Private Actions, Remedies

Daubert does not require a plaintiff to prove causation of damages twice-they do not have to demonstrate to the judge by a preponderance of the evidence that the assessments of their experts are correct, they only have to demonstrate by a preponderance of evidence that their opinions are reliable and fit the facts of the case. Plaintiffs must be free to select their own antitrust damages theories as long as they are supported by a reasonable foundation.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Remedies > General Overview

The United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit has made clear that the standard for admitting expert testimony on antitrust damages is lower than a plaintiff's burden of proof in establishing antitrust damages.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Remedies > General Overview

HN15[] Private Actions, Remedies

With respect to accounting for exogenous factors, the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit has specifically addressed the potential problems of "but for" econometric models in proving causation of antitrust damages, albeit not in the context of price-fixing conspiracies. As explained, "but for" models do not attempt to measure the particularized effects of any specific alleged illegal practices, but rather rely on an aggregation of injury from all factors. Second, their hypothetical "but for" calculations usually rely upon unrealistic ex ante assumptions about the business environment, such as assumptions of perfect knowledge of future demand, future prices, and future costs that tend to overstate the plaintiff's damage claim. Thus, using a "but for" damage model arguably makes it impossible for the trier of fact to determine what, if any, injury derived from the defendant's antitrust violations as opposed to other factors, and courts sometimes reject such models as the basis of either causation or amount of injury.

In this multidistrict litigation brought under Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, plaintiffs allege that several U.S. linerboard manufacturers conspired to restrict linerboard output in order to increase the price of corrugated sheets and corrugated boxes. [1] Currently before the Court is Defendants' Motion to Exclude the Testimony of Prof. Halbert L. White, Jr. ("Motion to Exclude"), the direct-action plaintiffs' damages expert.

Defendants [2] contend that Professor White's predictive econometric damages model does not address the issue of causation - whether defendants' alleged unlawful conduct caused the alleged overcharge [*668] for corrugated sheets and corrugated boxes. Although defendants affirmatively challenge only the "fit" of Professor White's testimony, defendants' arguments also implicate the reliability of Professor White's methodology in the context of establishing antitrust damages. In contrast, defendants do not challenge Professors White's qualifications as an economist or the reliability of predictive modeling in other contexts. [2]

After conducting oral argument and a Daubert hearing [3] on June 14, 2007 and July 2, 2007, the Court concludes that Professor White's damages model fits the facts of this case and is a reliable method of establishing causation of damages in price-fixing cases. [4] Accordingly, his testimony is admissible and defendants' Motion to Exclude is denied. The Court need not and does not address whether Professor White's testimony, standing alone, would be sufficient to support a finding of causation of damages so as to survive a motion for summary judgment. [5]

> Linerboard includes any grade of paperboard suitable for use in the production of corrugated sheets, which are in turn used in the manufacture of corrugated boxes and for a variety of industrial and commercial applications. Corrugated sheets are made by gluing a fluted sheet which is not made of linerboard, known as the corrugating medium, between facing sheets of linerboard; corrugated sheets are also referred to as containerboard. The defendants named in the instant lawsuits are major integrated manufacturers and sellers of linerboard, corrugated sheets, and corrugated boxes.

In re Linerboard Antitrust Litig., 203 F.R.D. 197, 202 (E.D. Pa. 2001).

2 Although the Court does not address in detail Professor White's qualifications or the general reliability of predictive modeling, the Court concludes as follows:

First, Professor White is well qualified to testify on damages in antitrust cases. He holds a Ph.D. in economics from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, is a Professor of Economics at the University of California, San Diego, and is a Founder of Bates White, LLC, a consulting firm. He has published in peer-reviewed academic journals on topics in econometrics and statistics. His book, Asymptotic Theory for Econometricians, [3] is a standard graduate level text in econometrics. Finally, he has testified as an expert and directed economic and statistical analysis of damages in several other multidistrict antitrust cases. White Rpt. at 17.

Second, predictive modeling is a reliable methodology in other contexts. "Articles published in respected peer-reviewed scientific journals report [the use of predictive econometric models] to predict real estate prices, financial earnings, credit risk, marketing and advertising outcomes, payroll expenses, . . . and crop yields." Opp. at 30.

3 Under Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharms., 509 U.S. 579, 113 S. Ct. 2786, 125 L. Ed. 2d 469 (1993), this Court must act as a gatekeeper [4] to ensure that Professor White is qualified, that his testimony is reliable, and that his testimony fits the facts of the case.

4 In ruling upon the Motion to Exclude, the Court did not consider any issues presented by Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment With Respect to Statutes of Limitations, which asks the Court to dismiss plaintiffs' claims as to a portion of the damages period.

I. BACKGROUND

The factual background of this case is described in detail in this Court's previous opinions. See, e.g., *In re Linerboard Antitrust Litig., 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14433, 2000 WL 1475559, 1 (E.D. Pa. Pa. 2006) (granting motion for summary judgment against one direct action plaintiff). Accordingly, the Court sets forth only those facts necessary to resolve defendants' Motion to Exclude.

A. Overview

Plaintiffs in this case purchased corrugated products from defendants. [6] According to plaintiffs, defendants "conspired to raise the price of corrugated containers and corrugated sheets throughout the United States by restricting production and/or curtailing inventories in violation of federal antitrust laws." In re Linerboard Antitrust Litig., 223 F.R.D. 357, 359 (E.D. Pa. 2004). [6] Specifically, plaintiffs allege that defendant Stone Container Corporation ("Stone") > devised a strategy to invite its competitors to increase the price of linerboard. As part of this strategy, Stone planned to take downtime at its plants to reduce its production and inventory of linerboard substantially, and contemporaneously to purchase substantial amounts of linerboard from competitors--actions which, plaintiffs allege, were extraordinary, and not in the regular course of business.

> The concerted actions of the defendants in taking downtime at the mills producing linerboard, and then increasing the price of linerboard, resulting in price increases for corrugated sheets and corrugated boxes, forms the basis of the conspiracy at issue in this case.

In re Linerboard Antitrust Litig., 203 F.R.D. 197, 204 (E.D. Pa. 2001).

In its Memorandum addressing class certification, the Court explained that the conspiracy alleged in this case is tantamount to a price-fixing agreement. "An agreement on output also equates to a price-fixing agreement. If firms raise prices, the market's demand for their product will fall, so the amount supplied will fall too--in other words, output will be restricted. If instead firms restrict output directly, price will as mentioned rise in order to limit demand to the reduced supply." Id. at 216 (citing 216 Westinghouse Elec. Corp. v. Gulf Oil Corp., 588 F.2d 221, 226 (7th Cir. 1978)).

B. Discussion of Impact at the Class Certification Stage

[6] The class action components of MDL 1261 have been settled. In re Linerboard Antitrust Litig., 292 F. Supp. 2d 631 (E.D. Pa. 2003). One-hundred and forty entities opted out of the classes. Thirteen groups of opt-outs subsequently filed direct actions against defendants. In re Linerboard Antitrust Litigation, 443 F. Supp. 2d 703, 707 (E.D. Pa. 2006). The claims against [7] all defendants other than defendants Temple-Inland, Inc. ("Temple-Inland") and Gaylord Container Corp. ("Gaylord") have either been settled or withdrawn. Id. This Memorandum pertains to the remaining direct action plaintiffs and defendants Temple-Inland and Gaylord.

To demonstrate that the questions of law and fact common to the members of the class predominated over any questions affecting only individual members, the Court applied a presumption of impact known as the "Bogosian short-cut":

> If, in this case, a nationwide conspiracy is proven, the [8] result of which was to increase prices . . . beyond the prices which would obtain in a competitive regime, an individual plaintiff could prove fact of damage [7] simply by proving that [*670] the free market prices would be lower than the prices paid and that he made some purchases at the higher price."

Id. (citing Bogosian v. Gulf Oil Corp., 561 F.2d 434, 454 (3d Cir. 1977)).

The Court also briefly addressed plaintiffs' "econometric models to be used to establish impact." Id. at 218. Specifically, the Court examined the affidavit of Dr. John C. Beyer, plaintiffs' economic expert. As the Third Circuit explained in affirming the Court's class certification,

> In discussing . . . feasible approaches[] which could be used to provide quantitative methods for corroborating his opinion on impact and for estimating damages, [Dr. Beyer] suggested as a potential benchmark[] the potential prices charged for linerboard during a competitive period when there would be no effects of the conspiracy. [9] He explained that the necessary data was available to do the analysis and described the types of data he would use. He discussed also a multiple regression model [8] to isolate the effects of various influences on corrugated container prices, thereby allowing a determination of the impact of any one of the variables, including, in this case, the impact of the conspiracy.

In re Linerboard Antitrust Litig., 305 F.3d 145, 154 (3d Cir. 2002).

II. PROFESSOR WHITE'S ECONOMETRIC MODEL

Direct-action plaintiffs retained Professor White to opine on the extent to which the alleged conspiracy [10] caused them to pay higher prices for corrugated containers. [9] White Rpt. P 1. The objective of Professor White's analysis was "to estimate 'but-for' prices of corrugated containers and sheets, that is, the prices that would have prevailed but for the existence of the alleged conduct, covering every affected purchase for each plaintiff in this matter." Id. P 120. In other words, Professor White estimated "but-for prices consistent with the level of competition and interaction of market forces that prevailed when the alleged conduct was not in effect." Id. To accomplish this, Professor White developed an "econometric model that relates product prices to the underlying costs and demand shifters in the industry using data that exclude the period of the alleged conduct. [He] then appl[ied] this relationship to estimate what prices would have been during the period of the alleged conduct, had they followed the relationship estimated outside the alleged conduct period." Id.

---

[8]

> Multiple regression analysis is a statistical tool for understanding the relationship between two or more variables . . . . [It] is sometimes well suited to the analysis of data about competing theories in which there are several possible explanations for the relationship among a number of explanatory variables . . . . [It] may also be useful (1) in determining whether a particular effect is present; (2) in measuring the magnitude of a particular effect; and (3) in forecasting what a particular effect would be, but for an intervening event.

In re Linerboard Antitrust Litig., 203 F.R.D. 197, 219 (E.D. Pa. 2001).

[9] Specifically, Professor White's "charge [was] to determine the extent to which direct action plaintiffs were overcharged . . . as a result of an alleged price fixing conspiracy to restrict the supply of linerboard and [11] corrugated medium and to elevate the prices of linerboard, corrugating medium, and corrugated product in the United States." White Rpt. P 1 (emphasis added).

The econometric model that Professor White developed and applied was a "prediction model." "A prediction model captures the statistical relationship between [*671] prices and cost, demand, and other potentially predictive factors." Id. P 126.

> Prediction models . . . . are fundamentally different than causal models (also known as "structural" models). Whereas causal models are intended to measure the ceteris paribus effects of specific economic factors, the purpose of a prediction models is to accurately predict outcomes that would be observed during a period of interest. Prediction models account for unobservable causal factors by the use of suitable proxies.

Id. P 130. "By constructing the prediction model using data that exclude the alleged conduct period, [Professor White] obtain[ed] a model that reflects the predictive relationship between prices and predictive factors in the absence of the alleged conduct." Id. P 126.

To select the relevant predictive factors for his regression equation, [10] Professor White first "identified a set of [12] candidate predictor variables using economic theory and an understanding of the relevant market." Id. P 127. He then "used a statistical criterion, cross-validation, to select from these candidate variables a subset of predictors that delivers superior accuracy. This method involves repeatedly holding out part of the data to measure the predictive ability of a given set of predictors." Id.

"Among the predictive factors [Professor White] did not include are economic variables subject to the control of the defendants such as inventory levels or downtime that was taken for market purposes. Nor did [Professor White] include other variables whose values would be affected by the alleged coordinated action of the defendants, such as the price of recycled corrugated containers." Id. P 129. Specifically, Professor White excluded inventories, capacity, capacity utilization, [13] non-incident downtime, [11] number of suppliers, and the cost of recycled corrugated containers ("OCC"). July 2, 2007 Tr. at 27-28. According to Professor White, "use of actual values of such variables [could] have [had] the effect of absorbing part or all of the effect of the alleged conduct and is therefore clearly inappropriate." White Rpt. P 129. Instead, Professor White utilized "predictors that drive the values of the potentially affected variable but that are not themselves affected by the alleged coordinated action of the defendants." Id.

After Professor White estimated but-for prices, he calculated overcharges by subtracting the but-for price from the allegedly elevated prices paid by plaintiffs for corrugated products during "the damages period, i.e. from December 1993 through May 1997." Id. P 182. Professor White concluded that the "overcharges from Temple-Inland and Gaylord for all purchases for the plaintiffs were $ 109.4 million during the damage period." Id. P 183. Applying the U.S. bank prime loan rate [*672] (averaging seven percent from 1993 to August 2006), Professor White further calculated that "the present value of plaintiffs' damages . . . . associated with purchases from Temple-Inland and Gaylord total $ 228.1 million during the damage period." Id. P 185. According to Professor White, this figure "represents the total payments required to restore the plaintiffs to the same financial position that they would have enjoyed but for the defendants' alleged illegal cartel." Id.

[10] Professor White "estimated the prediction model using standard ridge regression methods," which "has a long history of use in statistics and econometrics." Id. P 134. A regression equation consists of "a set of coefficients that are associated with each of the variables" selected for the equation. July 2, 2007 Tr. at 50.

[11] Incident downtime is involuntary downtime taken by the defendants that is caused, for example, by mill accidents or regulatory shutdowns. See July 2, 2007 Tr. at 28-28, 91-92. Professor White "was careful to distinguish between incident downtime . . . and non-incident downtime." Id. at 98.

> By including the incident downtime in [his] model, [he] was able to build a prediction that took into account, using the underlying drivers of cost and demand, what the presumably lawful and more competitive behavior with regard to other types of downtime, market downtime, maintenance downtime, would be during the benchmark period, and that's what's relevant [14] for the purpose of constructing the but-for line.

III. STANDARD OF REVIEW

Federal Rule of Evidence 702 governs the admissibility of expert testimony. The rule provides as follows:

> HN1[] If scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge will [15] assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue, a witness qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education, may testify thereto in the form of an opinion or otherwise, if (1) the testimony is based upon sufficient facts or data, (2) the testimony is the product of reliable principles and methods, and (3) the witness has applied the principles and methods reliably to the facts of the case.

HN2[] "Faced with a proffer of expert scientific testimony . . . the trial judge must determine . . . whether the expert is proposing to testify to (1) scientific knowledge that (2) will assist the trier of fact to understand or determine a fact in issue." Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharms., 509 U.S. 579, 592, 113 S. Ct. 2786, 125 L. Ed. 2d 469 (1993). This gatekeeping function extends beyond scientific testimony to testimony based on "technical" and "other specialized" knowledge. Kumho Tire Co., Ltd. v. Carmichael, 526 U.S. 137, 141, 119 S. Ct. 1167, 143 L. Ed. 2d 238 (1999).

HN3[] "Rule 702 embodies three distinct substantive restrictions on the admission of expert testimony: qualifications, reliability, and fit." Elcock v. Kmart Corp., 233 F. 3d 734, 741 (3d Cir. 2000) (citing In re Paoli R.R. Yard PCB Litig., 35 F.3d 717 (3d Cir. 1994)). [16] The party offering the expert must prove each of these requirements by a preponderance of the evidence. In re TMI Litig., 193 F.3d 613, 663 (3d Cir. 1999).

Defendants affirmatively challenge only the "fit" of Professor White's testimony. [12] HN4[] For expert testimony to meet the "fit" requirement, it must "assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue." Fed. R. Evid. 702. "This condition goes primarily to relevance. Expert testimony which does not relate to any issue in the case is not relevant and, ergo, non-helpful." Daubert, 509 U.S. at 591 (citing United States v. Downing, 753 F.2d 1224, 1242 (3d Cir. 1985) (quotations omitted). "'Fit' is not always obvious, and scientific validity for one purpose is not necessarily scientific validity for other, unrelated purposes." Daubert, 509 U.S. at 591.

In its reconsideration of Daubert on remand from the Supreme Court, the Ninth Circuit explained as follows:

> HN5[] The Supreme Court recognized that the "fit" requirement "goes primarily to relevance," but it obviously did not intend the second prong of Rule 702 to be merely a reiteration of the general relevancy requirement of Rule 402. In elucidating [*673] the "fit" requirement, the Supreme Court noted that scientific expert testimony carries special dangers to the fact-finding process because it "can be both powerful and quite misleading because of the difficulty in evaluating it." Federal judges must therefore exclude proffered scientific evidence under Rules 702 and 403 unless they are convinced that it speaks clearly and directly to an issue in dispute in the case, and that it will not mislead the jury.

Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 43 F. 3d 1311, 1321 (9th Cir. 1995).

As the Third Circuit recently stated, "[a]lthough we do not adopt the apparent presumption of exclusion enunciated by the Ninth Circuit, we agree with the spirit of our sister court's exhortation. In particular, HN6[] district courts [18] should tread carefully when evaluating proffered expert testimony, paying special attention to the relevance prong of Daubert." United States v. Ford, 481 F.3d 215, 220 n.6 (3d Cir. 2007). The Third Circuit further explained that [12] Defendants state as follows in their motion: "Defendants do not question Prof. White's qualifications as an economist or the application of his methodology in other contexts. Rather Defendants question whether the methodology Professor White chose 'fits' the facts in this case and Plaintiffs' theory of this case." Def.'s Mot. at 11. Defense counsel repeatedly [17] stressed during the Daubert hearing that defendants were only making a "fit" challenge.

---

> The discussion of "fit" in Paoli indicated that HN7[] the standard for analyzing the fit of an expert's analysis to the case at hand is "not that high," but is "higher than bare relevance."
> That statement remains sound law inasmuch as it requires that experts who purport to apply their principles and methods to the facts of the case do so in a reliable manner. The Paoli Court's discussion of fit requires that expert opinions that apply principles or methods to the facts of the case and produce conclusions that have a debatable connection to the question in issue be predicated on a reliable methodology. This is the critical import of Paoli's discussion of fit within the context of reliability. Outside of this relatively narrow setting, "fit" is a relevance concern.

Id. (citing Paoli, 35 F.3d at 745).

As in Paoli, defendants' fit arguments in fact implicate the reliability of Professor White's methodology in certain respects. For example, defendants argue that it was [19] inappropriate for Professor White to apply a cross-validated root mean squared error method [13] in selecting variables for his regression equation, and that Professor White incorrectly assumed that his benchmark period was free of collusion. July 2, 2007 Tr. at 115.

HN8[] "Under the liberal Daubert standard, the plaintiffs do not have to prove to the judge by a preponderance of the evidence that their expert's testimony is correct, they must only show that it is reliable. The requirement of reliability is lower than the standard of correctness." *United States v. Williams, 235 Fed. Appx. 925, 2007 U.S. App. LEXIS 13429, 2007 WL 1643197, 3 (3d Cir. Jun. 7, 2007) (citing Daubert, 509 U.S. at 590). "The judge does not have to determine that these methods are necessarily the best grounds to ascertain [20] certain facts, but only that the evidence presented will help the trier of fact." Id.

HN9[] "Once the foundation for admissibility required by Daubert has been established, concerns about the validity of an expert's conclusions should not result in the exclusion of the expert's testimony. Rather, such concerns should be presented to the jury through cross examination, presentation [*674] of contrary evidence and careful instruction on the burden of proof." Id.

V. DISCUSSION

A. Overview

According to defendants, Professor White's model "is simply not helpful, because he has not done the analysis and rendered an opinion as to how that difference in price is connected to the specific conspiracy in this case." Reply at 7. Defendants' Motion to Exclude focuses on the following three arguments:

> (1) Professor White fails "to link the alleged price increase . . . to the allegedly wrongful conduct . . . and to exclude the possibility that legitimate factors, such as costs, capacity constraints, or increase in demand caused that increase in price." Mot. at 1.
> (2) Professor White "removed all variables that could be affected by Defendants' conduct - lawful or unlawful" such that there is "no way to isolate the pricing [21] effect of lawful conduct from that of unlawful conduct." Reply at 11-12.

---

[13] Professor White explained that the cross-validated root mean squared error is > a measure of the squared error which is a measure of how well or poorly you're doing. The bigger the squared error, the worse you're doing, the smaller the better, on average the word "mean" conveys that. So it's the average squared error that is achieved when you apply the prediction equation to data that haven't been seen for purposes of estimation.

July 2, 2007 Tr. at 45.

(3) Professor White "fails to quantify the degree to which any economic factor-downtime, restricted production, or other-affected prices during the relevant period" and "ignores the timing and quantity of downtime taken . . . ." Mot. at 3.

These arguments are distinct but present interrelated issues. The first argument pertains to controlling for exogenous economic factors (factors outside of defendants' control, such as demand), while the second argument pertains to disaggregation of defendants' lawful and allegedly unlawful conduct (factors within defendants' control). [14] The third argument pertains to disaggregation of specific acts alleged to be unlawful, and relating damages to those specific unlawful acts. [15]

Based on these arguments, defendants contend that Professor "White is unable to opine as to how (or even whether) the alleged unlawful conduct affected prices . . . ." Mot. at 3. The Court disagrees. First, Professor White's econometric damages model properly controls for exogenous factors by incorporating all relevant [23] "aspects of the economic reality of the [linerboard] market . . . ." Concord Boat Corp. v. Brunswick Corp., 207 F.3d 1039, 1057 (8th Cir. 2000). Second, Professor White's econometric damages model "separate[s] lawful from unlawful conduct." Id. Third, it was unnecessary for Professor White to particularize the effect that any one variable, such as downtime or inventories, had upon prices. *LePage's Inc. v. [675] 3M, 324 F.3d 141 (3d Cir. 2003). The Court need not and does not address whether Professor White's testimony, standing alone, would be sufficient to support a finding of causation of damages so as to survive a motion for summary judgment.

During the Daubert Hearing, defense counsel also argued that Professor White incorrectly assumed that his benchmark period was free of collusion. July 2, 2007 Tr. at 87. This argument is unavailing because, assuming that the benchmark period was not perfectly competitive, Professor White's damages calculation actually becomes a more conservative estimate. That is, if there was in fact collusion during the benchmark period, Professor White's but-for price estimate would be too high, causing his estimate of the overcharge (the difference between actual [24] prices and but-for prices) to be too low.

B. Legal Standard: Causation of Damages in Antitrust Cases

HN10[] "A consumer alleging antitrust violations cannot obtain damages without showing that he actually paid more than he would have paid in the absence of the violation.'" City of Pittsburgh v. West Penn Power Co., 147 F.3d 256, 265 (3d Cir. 1998) (citing Phillip E. Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law, at 200 (1995)* (noting that "determining whether antitrust injury is present necessarily involves examining whether there is a causal connection between the violation alleged and the injury")). Thus, "one pursuing antitrust recovery must establish that the damages suffered were caused by the defendant's participation in a scheme repugnant to the antitrust

> Suppose that an antitrust defendant has engaged in multiple activities that have imposed some injury on the plaintiff. If some of the defendant's conduct is lawful and some is lawful, the damage claim will have to be disaggregated. The reason for this is clear: . . . a plaintiff may recover a damage award that will return him to the financial position that he would have enjoyed but for the unlawful conduct. [22] . . . The disaggregation requirement is distinct from the requirement that the plaintiff's damage calculations must control for exogenous factors that also have an adverse impact on the plaintiff's economic condition.

Phillip E. Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law: An Anaylsis of Antitrust Principles and Their Application* P 391g (2d ed. 2000) (emphasis added).

15 Defendants distinguish between their arguments in a manner different from the approach taken by the Court. They state that Professor White's method: "(1) ignores the timing and quantity of downtime taken; (2) ignores other lawful factors that affected prices during the relevant period; and (3) fails to quantify the degree to which any economic factor - downtime, restricted production, or other - affected prices during the relevant period." Mot. at 3. The Court addresses each of these arguments in its analysis.

HN11[] In price-fixing cases, "causation of injury may be found as a matter of just and reasonable inference from proof of defendants' wrongful acts and their tendency to injure plaintiffs, and from evidence of change in prices not shown to be attributable to other causes." *In re Industrial Silicon Antitrust Litig., 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20459, 1998 WL 1031507, 4 (W.D. Pa. Oct. 13, 1998) [25] (citing In re Aluminum Phosphide Antitrust Litig., 893 F. Supp. 1497, 1499 (D. Kan. 1995) (citing Bigelow v. RKO Radio Pictures, Inc., 327 U.S. 251, 262-64, 66 S. Ct. 574, 90 L. Ed. 652 (1946))) (emphasis added).

HN12[] "Once causation is determined, . . . the actual amount of damages may result from a 'reasonable estimate, as long as the jury verdict is not the product of speculation or guess work.'" Lower Lake Erie, 998 F.2d at 1176 (citing MCI Communications Corp. v. Am. Tel. & Tel. Co., 708 F.2d 1081, 1161 (7th Cir. 1983)). "The relaxed measure of proof is afforded to the amount, not the causation of loss--the nexus between the defendant's illegal activity and the injuries suffered must be reasonably proven." Id. However, a plaintiff's "burden of proving the fact of damage . . . is satisfied by its proof of some damage flowing from the unlawful conspiracy; inquiry beyond this minimum point goes only to the amount and not the fact of damage. It is enough that the illegality is shown to be a material cause of the injury; a plaintiff need not exhaust all possible alternative sources of injury . . . ." Danny Kresky Enter. Corp. v. Magid, 716 F.2d 206, 209-10 (3d Cir. 1983).

Importantly, HN13[] Daubert does not require a plaintiff [26] to prove causation of damages "twice-they do not have to demonstrate to the judge by a preponderance of the evidence that the assessments of their experts are correct, they only have to demonstrate by a preponderance of evidence that their opinions are reliable" and fit the facts of the case. Paoli, 35 F.3d at 744. [*676] "[P]laintiffs must be free to select their own [antitrust] damages theories as long as they are supported by a reasonable foundation." Danny Kresky, 716 F.2d at 213.

Indeed, HN14[] the Third Circuit has made clear that the standard for admitting expert testimony on antitrust damages is lower than a plaintiff's burden of proof in establishing antitrust damages. That dichotomy presents the same issues as are argued by the defendants in this case. They were explained by the Third Circuit in Stelwagon Mfg. Co. v. Tarmac Roofing Systems, Inc., 63 F.3d 1267 (3d Cir. 1995), which criticized the damages expert in much the same way that defendants criticize Professor White:

> Significantly, Dr. Perry's analysis failed to sufficiently link any decline in Stelwagon's MAPs sales to price discrimination. The sales may have been lost for reasons apart from the price discrimination-reasons that Dr. [27] Perry's analysis apparently did not take into account. For example, the evidence showed that Stelwagon had higher overhead costs than its competitors. In addition, there was undisputed evidence that Stelwagon experienced other business complications during the relevant time period. In 1988, for example, Stelwagon terminated a vice-president, two territorial managers and three key employees for their part in an embezzlement scheme.

Id. at 1275. Nevertheless, the Third Circuit clearly stated that the expert's damages testimony was admissible:

> Although we do not agree with [defendant's] contention that the district court erred in admitting [the expert] testimony, or in failing to strike the testimony in response to a motion by [defendant] at the conclusion of the direct examination, we do agree that, standing alone, the expert's opinions, as reflected in his testimony and report, are insufficient to support the finding of actual damage.

Id.; see also Callahan v. A.E.V., Inc., 182 F.3d 237, 256 (3d Cir. 1999) (Becker, J.) (summarizing Stelwagon, 63 F.3d at 1275) (The "expert's testimony, although admissible evidence, was insufficient by itself to prove that the antitrust violations had in [28] fact caused [the] losses.")

C. Analysis of Defendants' Arguments

1. Incorporation of Exogenous Factors (Factors Beyond Defendants' Control)

Defendants argue that Professor White fails "to link the alleged price increase . . . to the allegedly wrongful conduct . . . and to exclude the possibility that legitimate factors, such as costs, capacity constraints, or increase in demand caused that increase in price." Mot. at 1. In other words, defendants argue that Professor White's "damage calculations [do not] control for exogenous factors that [could] have an adverse impact on the plaintiff's economic condition[,]" a question related to but distinct from the question whether Professor White's model disaggregates the effects of defendants' lawful conduct from defendants' unlawful conduct. Areeda & Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law P 391g. The Court rejects this argument because Professor White's model properly accounted for exogenous factors such as cost, capacity constraints, and demand. In short, Professor White explained that it did not matter what specific demand, cost, or capacity variables were included or excluded from his regression equation, as long as tainted variables were excluded and the [29] regression equation closely predicted actual prices during the benchmark period.

a. Problems With "But-For" Models

HN15[] With respect to accounting for exogenous factors, the Third Circuit has specifically addressed the potential problems of "but for" econometric models in proving [*677] causation of antitrust damages, albeit not in the context of price-fixing conspiracies. As explained in Rossi v. Standard Roofing, Inc., 156 F.3d 452 (3d Cir. 1998) (Becker, J.), "but for" models > do not attempt to measure the particularized effects of any specific alleged illegal practices, but rather rely on an aggregation of injury from all factors. Second, their hypothetical "but for" calculations usually rely upon unrealistic ex ante assumptions about the business environment, such as assumptions of perfect knowledge of future demand, future prices, and future costs that tend to overstate the plaintiff's damage claim. Thus, using a "but for" damage model arguably makes it impossible for the trier of fact to determine what, if any, injury derived from the defendant's antitrust violations as opposed to other factors, and courts sometimes reject such models as the basis of either causation or amount of injury.

Id. at 485 [30] (citations omitted). In that case, noting that the expert's damages model was "much less speculative" than other "but for" damages models, the Third Circuit found it inappropriate to exclude the model even though it did "not deal with the particularized effects of specific injuries, but rather aggregate[d] all . . . damages into one figure." Id. at 485-86. The Court further found that various extrinsic factors, not incorporated into plaintiff's model, were insufficient to warrant exclusion of plaintiff's model. [16] See id.

The Third Circuit again "considered [31] the sufficiency of expert evidence offered as proof of causation in antitrust cases" in Callahan, 182 F.3d at 256. In that case, "defendants criticize[d] [plaintiffs' expert] report for failing to take into account potential alternative causes for the plaintiffs' losses not attributable to the defendants' actions." Id. at 258 (emphasis added). Specifically, "defendants contend[ed] that . . . the expert's report was inadequate because it failed to consider alternative causes, so we must find [the] report inadequate because he failed to consider certain specific factors that might have affected the plaintiffs' business success, such as general economic conditions, changes in their operations during the relevant time period, or changes in costs." Id. The Third Circuit rejected this argument, noting that plaintiffs did "discuss some of these factors the defendants suggest he should have--including general economic conditions--albeit not to the degree the defendants might prefer." Id. The Court "found the export's [sic] report acceptable in spite of certain gaps," and stated that the factors "involve factual disputes that need to be resolved by the trier of fact, not by this court . . . [32] ." Id. (quoting Rossi, 156 F.3d at 487). [17]

[16] Although the Rossi court did not explicitly state that the expert report was admissible, it considered the expert report and stated as follows:

> We do not agree with the defendants' reading of these cases (and, at all events, are not bound by them), which we conclude only stand for the proposition that some, not all, "but for" models are too speculative and must be precluded as a matter of law. The Rockhill Report, as we shall see, is much less speculative and does not suffer from many of the flaws in the damage models discussed in Van Dyk Research and Southern Pacific, and thus it is not comparable with them.

Rossi, 156 F.3d at 485-86.

[*678] HN16[] In the context of price-fixing cases, several other courts have recognized that "[m]erely pointing to economic conditions that may affect the dependant variable is not enough to call into [33] question the reliability of an econometric model." In re Polypropylene Carpet Antitrust Litig., 93 F. Supp. 2d 1348 (N.D. Ga. 2000) (citing *In re Indus. Silicon Antitrust Litig., 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20459 , [WL] at 3 (W.D. Pa. Oct. 13, 1998)). In that case, the court explained that > Unless the party challenging a regression model proffers evidence that an omitted variable "is correlated with the dependant variable and is likely to affect the result of the regression analysis," the Court will not find that omission of the variable implicates the reliability of the model.

Id. at 1365 (citation omitted). "It is only the rare case where the 'regressions are so incomplete as to be irrelevant' and the expert's decisions regarding control variables are the basis to exclude the analysis." *Gutierrez v. Johnson & Johnson, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 80834, 2006 WL 3246605, 5 (D.N.J. Nov. 6, 2006) ("The Court is unpersuaded that [the expert's] choice of variables renders her analysis so fatally flawed that it should be stricken as a matter of law.").

These decisions are based on Bazemore v. Friday, 478 U.S. 385, 106 S. Ct. 3000, 92 L. Ed. 2d 315 (1986), in which the Supreme Court addressed omission of variables from regression analyses proffered to establish discrimination. The [34] Fourth Circuit concluded that a regression analysis was "unacceptable as evidence of discrimination, because they did not include "'all measurable variables thought to have an effect on salary level." Id. (quotations omitted). Finding this "view of the evidentiary value of the regression analyses . . . plainly incorrect[,]" the Supreme Court explained, > HN17[] While the omission of variables from a regression analysis may render the analysis less probative . . ., it can hardly be said, absent some other infirmity, that an analysis which accounts for the major factors must be considered unacceptable . . . . Normally, failure to include variables will affect the analysis' probativeness, not its admissibility.

Id. at 400 (quotation omitted). "There may, of course, be some regressions so incomplete as to be inadmissible as irrelevant . . . ." [18] Id. at 400 n.10.

[17] Also instructive on this point is J.F. Feeser, Inc. v. Serv-A-Portion, Inc., 909 F.2d 1524, 1540 (3d Cir. 1990), a Third Circuit case that discusses the Supreme Court's decision in Texaco Inc. v. Hasbrouck, 496 U.S. 543, 572, 110 S. Ct. 2535, 110 L. Ed. 2d 492 (1990):

> To estimate its lost sales at trial, Hasbrouck's expert presented a market analysis comparing Hasbrouck's actual prices, volumes and profits to its estimated amount absent the discrimination. The expert utilized economic projections based upon various assumptions such as assuming Texaco did not offer a favored price to its competitors and assuming that Texaco lowered its price to Hasbrouck.

On appeal, the Supreme Court decided that:

> [e]ven if some portion of some of the respondent's injuries may be attributable to the conduct of independent retailers, the expert testimony nevertheless provided a sufficient basis for an acceptable estimate of the amount of damages.

J.F. Feeser, 909 F.2d at 1540 n. 16 (citing Texaco, 496 U.S. at 572).

[18] Other circuits interpret Bazemore to require a defendant to introduce "evidence to support the contention that the missing factor would explain the existing disparities" revealed by the regression analysis. Palmer v. Shultz, 259 U.S. App. D.C. 246, 815 F.2d 84, 101 (D.C. Cir. 1987); Sobel v. Yeshiva Univ., 839 F.2d 18, 33-34 (2d. Cir. 1988). Several courts in [35] the Third Circuit have taken this approach. Churchill v. Int'l Bus. Machines, Inc., Nat'l Serv. Div. U, 759 F. Supp. 1089, 1099 (D.N.J. 1991);

Defendants apparently concede that "conflicts between parties or experts over which variables are the proper variables to include in a model or which variables should be given more weight are simply issues of fact to be considered by juries." Reply at 16. According to defendants, they are "not quibbling with the variables, [*679] . . . that wouldn't be an appropriate Daubert challenge and we've never done that." July 2, 2007 Tr. at 178. This is directly at odds with defendants' argument that Professor White's model did not account for legitimate factors affecting price such as costs, capacity constraints, or increase in demand.

b. Incorporation of Exogenous Factors into Professor White's Model

In this case, Professor White testified that he did incorporate all appropriate cost and demand factors. On the cost side, Professor White's regression equation included the following variables: woodchips, labor, coal, electric [36] power, natural gas, oil railroad transportation, diesel fuel, caustic soda, sulfuric acid, sodium carbonate/sulfate, 3-month treasury bill, 10-year treasury note, and incident downtime. On the demand side, Professor White's regression equation included the following variables: U.S. durable and non-durable industrial production indices, foreign industrial production indices and exchange rates, and the price index for plastic packaging products (a substitute for packaging products made from corrugated cardboard).

In contrast, Professor White excluded from his equation inventories, capacity, capacity utilization, non-incident downtime, number of suppliers, cost of recycled corrugated containers ("OCC"), and the paper component of the U.S. nondurable industrial production index. July 2, 2007 Tr. at 27-28. As evinced by Professor White's testimony during the Daubert hearing, it was appropriate for him to exclude these variables, because they were either tainted or duplicative. See *Gutierrez, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 80834, [WL] at 6 (holding that an expert "exercised professional judgment in deciding what control variables to include in her analysis"). Moreover, he testified that the excluded variables were [37] accounted for in his model indirectly, through proxy variables. The Court sets forth a small portion of Professor White's lengthy testimony on this issue:

> Q. Does the fact that only some variables were selected mean that your prediction equation, your multiple regression equation, takes no account of the variables that were not selected?
> A. Not at all. . . . [A]s I explained earlier, the purpose of the ensemble is to give the best prediction that includes not too many variables and not too few. The variables that are included act on their own together with the other variables that are included but they also act as proxies for other variables that don't make the grade. The reason those other variables don't make the grade is that the information that they contain is already included in the ensemble that I select.
> Q. Does the fact that the durable production variable [which accounted for roughly 23 percent of demand] was not selected [mean] that your model has nothing to do with reality?
> A. Absolutely not. . . . [A]s I've just explained, the variables that are included act for themselves but also as proxies for other variables that are not included. And if a variable isn't included [38] it's because its information is already contained in the ensemble. So, in essence, it's redundant to put it in again.

Id. at 47-48; see also id. at 41-42.

Professor White testified similarly with respect to his rationale for excluding capacity from his prediction equation. Although Professor White did not include capacity "in the model as an explicit variable" [*680] because it was tainted by the conspiracy, > it is included indirectly through the process by which I modeled the but-for price during the benchmark period. So that even though capacity as a tainted variable isn't taken account of, the benchmark behavior of capacity, which is presumably lawful and more competitive, is taken into account, and I also described the exercise earlier this morning where I included that capacity and found that it didn't have much of an impact, if any, on the ultimate but-for prices.

July 2, 2007 Tr. at 80-82.

*Lanning v. Southeastern PA Transp. Auth., 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9388, 1998 WL 341605, 66 (E.D. Pa. Jun. 25, 1998), rev'd on other grounds, 181 F.3d 478 (3d Cir. 1999).

Moreover, in response to defendants' arguments, Professor White reran a number of variables in his model that defendants claim were overlooked. In doing so, he included containerboard capacity, containerboard inventories at mills, containerboard inventories at box plaints, total containerboard inventories, [39] and OCC prices. White Rebuttal Rpt. at 15. "The damage estimates resulting from this exercise [were] very similar to those resulting from [Professor White's] final prediction equation." July 2, 2007 Tr. at 38. Professor White explained that this "means that the variables that I included in my final prediction equation essentially captured all of the information that otherwise would have been present in those capacity or inventory series." [19] Id.

The Court notes that Professor White's analysis bears no similarity to the expert analysis excluded in In re Aluminum Phosphide Antitrust Litig., 893 F. Supp. 1497 (D. Kan. 1995), a case upon which defendants rely. In that case, the expert "did not perform a regression analysis to address such obvious points as . . . the effect [40] of supply, demand, competition or other factors that might impact price levels during both normative periods." Id. at 1504. The court held that, because the expert's testimony on antitrust damages was "based on unjustified assumptions and does not account for changes in other relevant market conditions, it would not assist a trier of fact to determine the fact or amount of plaintiffs' damages." Id. at 1507. In contrast, in this case, Professor White applied regression analysis to calculate a but-for price that reflected all salient exogenous factors, such as costs and demand, either directly or indirectly. See Blue Cross and Blue Shield United of Wisconsin v. Marshfield Clinic, 152 F.3d 588, 593 (7th Cir. 1998) (Posner, J.) ("Statistical studies that fail to correct for salient factors, not attributable to the defendant's misconduct, that may have caused the harm of which the plaintiff is complaining do not provide a rational basis for a judgment.").

Accordingly, the Court rejects defendants' argument that Professor White's model does not exclude the possibility that exogenous factors such as costs, capacity restraints, or increase in demand caused the alleged overcharge. In this case, [41] that is an issue for the jury to resolve.

2. Disaggregation of Lawful and Unlawful Conduct

According to defendants, there is "no way to isolate the pricing effect of lawful conduct from that of unlawful conduct" because Professor White "removed all variables that could be affected by Defendants' conduct - lawful or unlawful." [*681] Reply at 11-12. Defendants argue that Bazemore and its progeny are inapposite to this case because Professor Whites "excludes the most important variables in this case -- production and inventory. These variables are at the heart of Plaintiff's claims. Prof. White's model does not provide any direct way to connect a change in inventory or production to a change in price." Memorandum Regarding Authorities Identified by the Court at 2. The Court rejects this argument because, although Professor White's model does not isolate how any specific change in inventory or production led to a change of price, it isolates defendants' alleged collusive behavior as the cause of the alleged overcharge.

First, it was appropriate for Professor White to remove all variables that could be affected by defendants' conduct, lawful or unlawful. As Professor White explained in his rebuttal [42] report,

> To correctly estimate the impact of a treatment (the alleged conspiracy) the researcher must be careful to identify factors that affect the outcome of the concern (in our case corrugated container prices) but are not themselves affected by the treatment. Factors such as interest rates and electricity prices are examples of factors that are not themselves influenced by the alleged conspiracy. The researcher must also identify factors that affect the outcome of concern but are affected by the treatment. Inventory levels, market downtime, capacity and capacity utilization are all examples of the latter category. It is well established in the treatment > effects literature that the inclusion of variables in this second category introduces bias into the estimation of the effect of interest.

[19] Defendants stressed during the Daubert hearing that Professor White did not rerun his model using capacity utilization, but offered nothing to support that doing so would significantly affect Professor White's results. July 2, 2007 Tr. at 182-83; see Bazemore 478 U.S. at 385. The absence of this variable is discussed further in the Court's discussion of the disaggregation of defendants' lawful and unlawful conduct, supra.

White Rebuttal Rept at 14. See also *Gutierrez, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 80834, [WL] at 6 (noting that the expert "specifically chose not to include performance in her analyses because performance reviews were under the control of [defendant] and may incorporate discrimination rather than providing a neutral measure of productivity").

Second, defendants are incorrect in their assertion that, because Professor White's [43] model was a predictive model rather than a structural model, Professor White cannot isolate defendants' unlawful behavior as the cause of the alleged overcharge. Professor White testified at length on this issue at the Daubert hearing:

> The important distinction here is that the but-for price . . . is constructed as a prediction model. I am not using a structural model for obtaining the but-for price. Nevertheless, there is a crucial and indeed focal structural element to my analysis, and that is the estimation of the effect of the alleged conspiracy by comparing the actual price to this prediction.
> [A] structural model is one that permits the data analysis to reveal the effect of a cause . . . . [M]y model is structural in that it permits me to reveal the effect of a specific cause, that is, the cause of the alleged conspiracy.
> [I]t's an important distinction to understand where the causality is being measured, that is, the effect of the alleged conduct in the conspiracy period, and where I am not attempting to measure cause and effect, which is in creating the but-for price. . . . [I]t suffices there to make a prediction . . . . [because] I'm being asked to make a prediction [44] under the identical market circumstances during the alleged conduct period, not some set of hypothetical market conditions that might occur . . . . If I were attempting to do that, then I would be concerned [*682] about understanding structural elements of the cost-and-demand factors, but that's not my goal. Because I am making predictions under the identical market conditions except for the presence of the alleged conspiracy, there's no need to have a structural analysis of the causal effect of each and every cost-and-demand shifter . . . .
> Even though I'm not saying what the effect of each and every cost-and-demand shifter was, I am taking them into account and then I am comparing that to the actual prices that occurred during the alleged conspiracy.

July 2, 2007 Tr. at 107-09.

Finally, the fact that Professor White excluded all variables within the defendants' control, rather than only those variables representing defendants' unlawful conduct, does not imply that Professor White's estimated overcharge may be attributable to non-collusive, lawful behavior on the part of defendants. Professor White testified that he could "rule out all [causal factors underling the alleged overcharge] [45] but the alleged conspiracy by a process of elimination." Id. at 40. As Professor White elaborated,

> The principle of creating a but-for price requires that that prediction not be tainted by conduct associated with the alleged conspiracy. So in order to isolate that conduct that's not impacted by the alleged conspiracy, it's possible to reach back, in other words, go back through the decisions that are under the defendants' control and represent their behavior by the ultimate drivers, the cost and demand factors, that are not under their control or influence. So the cost and demand factors operating in the benchmark period then drive whatever those defendant decisions are as to inventories, downtime, et cetera, the aspects of those that are not contaminated by the alleged conspiracy because it's the benchmark period, as well as driving prices and quantities directly. The net result of that is this total relationship between the cost and demand factors driving prices and quantities. . . . So by being able to use the benchmark period to understand how prices respond to the underlying cost and demand factors I'm able to incorporate, albeit indirectly but also inherently, how decisions as [46] to defendants' choice of inventories or down time or other variables ultimately impact prices and quantities.

Id. at 33-34. Thus, the model inherently accounts for defendants' "[l]awful choices with respect to inventory and down time." Id.

What Professor White is saying is this: It matters not that defendants' lawful conduct was not directly included in the variables that he selected for his regression equation. What matters is that the selected variables resulted in a predicted price during the benchmark period that was almost identical to the actual price in the benchmark period. Defendants' lawful conduct in the benchmark period was indirectly included through the selection of underlying variables; hence, it was indirectly included in the predicted but-for price in the damages period. That enabled Professor White to opine that the price difference in the damages period was attributable to the collusive conduct of the defendants and not attributable to lawful conduct on the part of defendants.

Accordingly, the Court rejects defendants' argument that there is "no way to isolate the pricing effect of lawful conduct from that of unlawful conduct" because Professor White "removed all variables [47] that could be affected by Defendants' conduct - lawful or unlawful." Reply at 11-12.

[*683] 3. Segregation of Causal Factors

Relatedly, defendants argue that Professor White "fails to quantify the degree to which any economic factor-downtime, restricted production, or other-affected prices during the relevant period" and "ignores the timing and quantity of downtime taken . . . ." Mot. at 2. This argument pertains to disaggregation of specific acts alleged to be unlawful, beyond mere disaggregation of defendants' lawful and allegedly unlawful conduct.

The Third Circuit's decision in LePage's Inc. v. 3M, 324 F.3d 141 (3d Cir. 2003), which recognizes that these arguments are interrelated, elucidates that HN18[] quantifying the particular effect of any single factor is not essential to prove causation of damages in antitrust cases. As in this case, the defendant in LePage's "argue[d] that [plaintiff's expert] improperly failed to disaggregate damages, thereby providing the jury with no mechanism to discern damages arising from [defendant's] lawful conduct or other facts from damages arising from [defendant's] unlawful conduct." Id. at 166. The Third Circuit "noted that it would be extremely difficult, [48] if not impossible, to segregate and attribute a fixed amount of damages to any one act as the theory was not that any one act in itself was unlawful, but that all the acts taken together showed [an antitrust] violation." Id. (citing Bonjorno v. Kaiser Aluminum & Chemical Corp., 752 F.2d 802, 812 (3d Cir. 1984)). Accordingly, the Third Circuit ruled that the antitrust defendant's "actions, taken as a whole, were found to violate [the antitrust laws], thus making the disaggregation that [defendant] speaks of to be unnecessary, if not impossible." Id. at 166.

Professor White reliably isolated defendants' alleged collusive behavior "taken together" as the cause of the alleged overcharge; he need not have "segregate[d] and attribute[d] a fixed amount of damages to any one act" or factor in the alleged conspiracy in order to separate defendants' "lawful conduct . . . from [defendant's] unlawful conduct." Id.; see also Rossi, 156 F.3d at 485 (finding it inappropriate to preclude the model even though it did "not deal with the particularized effects of specific injuries, but rather aggregate[d] all . . . damages into one figure").

Accordingly, the Court rejects defendants' argument that Professor [49] White "fails to quantify the degree to which any economic factor-downtime, restricted production, or other-affected prices during the relevant period" and "ignores the timing and quantity of downtime taken . . . ." Mot. at 2.

4. Collusion in the Benchmark Period

During the Daubert hearing, defense counsel argued that Professor White's testimony should be excluded because he incorrectly assumed that his benchmark period was free of collusion. July 2, 2007 Tr. at 187. The Court rejects this argument.

Professor White explained that "[t]he benchmark period has been taken as a period that represents the presumably lawful, more competitive conduct, which was the basis on which I constructed my but-for price prediction equation."

Id. at 87. The Court approved of this technique in its class certification opinion. In re Linerboard Antitrust Litig., 203 F.R.D. 197, 218-19 (E.D. Pa. 2001) ("Dr. Beyer stated that he would estimate linerboard prices that would have existed absent the conspiracy based on an analysis of linerboard pricing behavior during a more competitive period of time, either before or after the conspiracy." (emphasis added)). Professor White elaborated that the benchmark period [50] is "a more competitive [*684] period, presumably free of unlawful conduct, but . . . that if it were indeed a period that contained unlawful conduct my but-for price would be higher than would otherwise be the case. . . . [I]f there were some unlawful activity, my but-for price is higher than it would otherwise be and my damage estimate is conservative." Id. at 87-88. In other words, if there was in fact collusion during the benchmark period, Professor White's but-for price estimate would be too high, causing his estimate of the overcharge (the difference between actual prices and but-for prices) to be too low.

Accordingly, the Court rejects defendants' argument that Professor White incorrectly assumed that his benchmark period was free of collusion.

V. CONCLUSION

The Court concludes that Professor White reliably estimated the alleged overcharge caused by the defendants' alleged price-fixing conspiracy, and that his methodology fits the facts of this case. "[S]hould the jury find that defendants conspired to fix prices, [Professor White's] proffered testimony will assist the jury in determining the amount of damages, if any, that plaintiffs incurred as a result of that conspiracy." *In re Indus. Silicon Antitrust Litig., 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20459, [WL] at 4. [51] Accordingly, defendants' Motion to Exclude is denied.

HN1[] Appellate Jurisdiction, Interlocutory Orders

Generally, the "law of the case" doctrine dictates that prior judicial decisions on rules of law govern the same issues in subsequent phases of the same case. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit has acknowledged, however, that the rule is a flexible one that allows courts to depart from erroneous prior rulings, as the underlying policy of the rule is one of efficiency, not restraint of judicial power. That is, the doctrine is merely a presumption, one whose strength varies with the circumstances. It is discretionary, rather than mandatory. If the original ruling was issued by a higher court, a district court should depart from the ruling only in exceptionally narrow circumstances. The Tenth Circuit has recognized three "exceptionally narrow" grounds supporting a district court's departure from an appellate court's earlier ruling: (1) when the evidence in a subsequent trial is substantially different; (2) when controlling authority has subsequently made a contrary decision of the law applicable to such issues; or (3) when the decision was clearly erroneous and would work a manifest injustice. On the other hand, district courts generally remain free to reconsider their earlier interlocutory orders.

Although the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit generally defers to an agency's interpretation of an ambiguous statute that it implements, different types of agency pronouncements are entitled to different degrees of deference. As the U.S. Supreme Court has explained, administrative implementation of a particular statutory provision qualifies for Chevron deference when it appears that the U.S. Congress delegated authority to the agency generally to make rules carrying the force of law, and that the agency interpretation claiming deference was promulgated in the exercise of that authority. Delegation of such authority may be shown in a variety of ways, as by an agency's power to engage in adjudication or notice-and-comment rule-making, or by some other indication of a comparable congressional intent. Regulations promulgated by an agency exercising its congressionally granted rule-making authority are clearly entitled to Chevron deference. So too is an agency's adjudication of matters over which it has the authority to adjudicate, as such decisions carry the force of law.

Liability may be enforced either by complaint to the U.S. Secretary of Agriculture as provided in 7 U.S.C.S. § 210 or through proceedings instituted in federal district court. 7 U.S.C.S. § 209(b). Under 7 U.S.C.S. § 210, however, only stockyard owners, market agencies, and dealers (not including live poultry dealers) may be found liable in proceedings before the Secretary of Agriculture. In addition, the Secretary may issue cease and desist orders and assess civil penalties against packers and swine contractors, but not poultry dealers, under 7 U.S.C.S. § 193. In other words, the Secretary has no adjudicative authority over live poultry dealers. Hence, the only way to enforce § 202 of the PSA, 7 U.S.C.S. § 192, against a live poultry dealer is to file suit in federal district court under 7 U.S.C.S. § 209.

Unlike 7 U.S.C.S. § 192(c), (d), and (e), which list specific acts that are unlawful only when they have the tendency or effect of restraining commerce or creating a monopoly, § 192(a) is a general prohibition on unfair, unjustly discriminatory, or deceptive practices, and it provides no further guidance on what type of act falls within its parameters. Not to require a showing of competitive injury or the likelihood thereof would make a federal case out of every breach of contract. Nothing in the Packers and Stockyards Act, 7 U.S.C.S. § 181 et seq., suggests that the U.S. Congress intended this result.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Governments > Agriculture & Food > Packers & Stockyards Act

HN14[] Regulated Practices, Monopolies & Monopolization

The U.S. Congress intended the Packers and Stockyards Act (PSA), 7 U.S.C.S. § 181 et seq., to have a broader scope than the antitrust laws. The antitrust requirement that monopoly power be acquired willfully and include the power to exclude competitors does not apply in the context of the PSA. By holding that § 202(a), 7 U.S.C.S. § 192(a), requires proof that a practice has injured or is likely to injury competition, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit has not required a showing that the defendant engaged in an unfair practice with the intent to cause the injury or other unlawful effect. Indeed, it has recognized that § 202(a) focuses on conduct and does not require proof of wrongful intent. Instead, plaintiffs need only prove that specific practices have the effect of injuring competition or are likely to do so. Moreover, when analyzing whether a buyer's "monopsony" power injures competition, the inquiry is somewhat different from the inquiry into whether a seller's monopoly power injures competition.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > General Overview

HN15[] Regulated Practices, Private Actions

A monopsony is a market condition in which there is but one buyer for a particular commodity. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit has acknowledged that a monopsony may exist when sellers are unable to find alternative buyers and must sell to a single purchaser. Furthermore, it has acknowledged that, like a monopoly, a monopsony can threaten competition. According to economists, without competition from other buyers, a monopsonist will lower prices paid to sellers, which over time results in higher consumer prices. Depression of prices potentially injures both producers and consumers. By manipulating prices to suppliers, a monopsonist threatens to injure the end-users. Thus, monopsonies fall under antitrust purview because monopsonistic practices will eventually adversely affect consumers. Hence, to establish that the practices of a monopsonist have injured or are likely to injure competition, a plaintiff does not have to be a competitor of the buyer or demonstrate that the buyer has improperly excluded other competitors. Instead, the plaintiff must show that the monopsonist's practices have caused or are likely to cause the anticompetitive effect associated with monopsonies, namely the arbitrary manipulation of market prices by unilaterally depressing seller prices on the input market with the effect (or likely effect) of increasing prices on the output market.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Governments > Agriculture & Food > Packers & Stockyards Act

HN16[] Agriculture & Food, Packers & Stockyards Act

To demonstrate that a monopsonist has engaged in "unfair practices" under § 202(a), 7 U.S.C.S. § 192(a), of the Packers and Stockyards Act, 7 U.S.C.S. § 181 et seq., a seller must show that the buyer's practices threaten to injure competition by arbitrarily decreasing prices paid to sellers with the likely effect of increasing resale prices.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > General Overview

HN17[] Regulated Practices, Monopolies & Monopolization

Courts have routinely noted that, short of predatory pricing, a monopolist's uncompetitive prices do not violate antitrust laws. But if a monopsonist's uncompetitive prices are a result not solely of its market power, but also of practices that result in complete control of the input (supply) market, the effect of the monopsonist's practices may be an injury to competition.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit holds that § 202(a), 7 U.S.C.S. § 192(a), of the Packers and Stockyards Act (PSA), 7 U.S.C.S. § 181 et seq., is violated when a monopsonist engages in specific practices that result in, or are likely to result in, the anticompetitive effects that the PSA was designed to prevent. To prove a violation, plaintiffs may not rely on the sum total of various practices that individually are not likely to injure competition, but must instead prove that specific practices have caused, or are likely to cause, injury.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit reviews a district court's denial of a motion to reopen discovery during summary judgment proceedings for an abuse of discretion. Under this standard, a trial court's decision will not be disturbed unless the appellate court has a definite and firm conviction that the lower court made a clear error of judgment or exceeded the bounds of permissible choice in the circumstances.

HN20[] Opposing Materials, Motions for Additional Discovery

The U.S. Supreme Court has held that, under *Fed. R. Civ. To benefit from the rule, a party, at a minimum, must ask the court to refrain from acting on the summary judgment request until additional discovery can be conducted. A party ordinarily may not attempt to meet a summary judgment challenge head-on but fall back on Rule 56(f) if its first effort is unsuccessful.

Contracts Law > Defenses > Unconscionability > General Overview

HN24[] Defenses, Unconscionability

Under Oklahoma law, an unconscionable contract is one in which, at the time of making of the contract, and in light of the general commercial background and commercial needs of a particular case, clauses are so one-sided as to oppress or unfairly surprise one of the parties. Unconscionability has generally been recognized to include an absence of meaningful choice on the part of one of the parties, together with contractual terms which are unreasonably favorable to the other party. Whether a party lacked any meaningful choice is determined by all the circumstances surrounding the transaction. Relevant factors include whether the aggrieved party had a reasonable opportunity to understand the terms of the contract and whether the important terms were hidden in a maze of fine print or were minimized by deceptive sales practices. Generally, one who signs an agreement without full knowledge of its terms might be held to assume the risk that he has entered a one-sided bargain. On the other hand, if there is a gross inequality of bargaining power and the aggrieved party signs a commercially unreasonable contract with little or no knowledge of its terms, it is hardly likely that his consent, or even an objective manifestation of his consent, was ever given to all the terms.

HN25[] Jury Trials, Province of Court & Jury

In assessing whether a contract or a particular provision is unconscionable under Arkansas law, a trial court must review the totality of the circumstances surrounding the negotiation and execution of the contract, taking into consideration whether there is a gross inequality of bargaining power between the parties and whether the aggrieved party was made aware of and comprehended the provision in question. Importantly, however, it is generally not the province of the courts to scrutinize all contracts with a paternalistic attitude and summarily conclude that they are partially or totally unenforceable merely because an aggrieved party believes that the contract has subsequently proved to be unfair or less beneficial than anticipated. Indeed, in Arkansas, parties are free to make contracts based on whatever terms and conditions they agree upon, provided it is not illegal or tainted with some infirmity such as fraud, overreaching, or the like.

This appeal presents a matter of first impression for this Circuit, namely whether § 202(a) of the Packers and Stockyards Act ("PSA"), 7 U.S.C. § 181 et seq., requires a plaintiff to prove that an allegedly "unfair practice" injures or is likely to injure competition. The District Court held that such proof is required and, finding that the Plaintiffs had failed to present any evidence of a competitive injury, granted summary judgment [2] in favor of the Defendants. The court also granted the Defendants' motion for summary judgment on the Plaintiffs' state law claim of unconscionability. We take jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1291, and for the reasons that follow, we affirm in part and reverse in part, remanding to the District Court for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

I. BACKGROUND

Defendants-Appellants OK Industries, OK Farms, Inc., and OK Foods, Inc. (collectively "OK") constitute a vertically integrated poultry producer operating in Arkansas and Oklahoma. OK is involved in almost every stage of the production and wholesale of poultry and poultry products: it breeds, hatches, provides feed for, transports, slaughters, and processes poultry. One aspect of poultry production OK does not handle is the raising of broiler chickens to slaughtering age. OK enters into contracts with various "growers" who handle that part of the production process.

The Plaintiffs-Appellants ("Growers") are a class of growers operating in Oklahoma under contract with OK. In addition to alleging that the process by which OK and its growers enter into contracts is unconscionable under Arkansas law, the Growers argue that the [3] terms of the contracts, as well as OK's performance under the contracts, violate the Packers and Stockyards Act, 7 U.S.C. § 181 et seq. Their claims hinge on the following undisputed facts.

OK is the largest poultry integrator in Oklahoma. With limited exceptions, no other integrators operate in the geographic markets in which OK operates. At the time of this lawsuit, OK had a waiting list of over 130 persons desiring to become growers for OK or to expand their existing operations. When OK needs to expand its production, it contacts persons on the waiting list to determine whether they are still interested, and if so, whether they will be suitable growers. Prior to entering into a contract with a grower, OK requires the grower to first obtain financing and build chicken houses to specifications set by OK. In exchange for a grower's expenditure of money to build the requisite chicken houses, OK signs a letter of intent, agreeing to enter into a broiler contract with the grower upon satisfactory completion of the chicken houses. One chicken house can cost a grower nearly $ 160,000, not including the cost of land and equipment.

All the broiler contracts are materially identical; they are [4] standard contracts drafted by OK and are not subject to negotiation. Under the standard contract, a grower agrees to use only chicks, feed, and medicine supplied by OK. OK is not [*1223] liable, however, for any loss a grower incurs as a result of OK's failure to provide feed and supplies; nor is OK liable for birds condemned due to certain diseases. The contract also provides that a grower may not sell its chickens to poultry integrators other than OK and may not transfer its broiler contract to other potential growers without OK's prior approval. Under the terms of the contract, OK agrees to provide the grower with only one flock of chicks, which typically takes a grower seven weeks to raise. [1] Thereafter, OK may provide the grower with replacement flocks "from time to time." In addition to deciding when to deliver replacement flocks, OK determines the breed of chicken, the number of chicks per flock, and the number of flocks. Furthermore, at the end of each growing cycle, OK may require that a grower update its houses to meet OK's most recent specifications before it will place another flock of chicks with the grower. These required changes result in significant costs to growers.

The contract also details the method OK uses to calculate a grower's pay. OK uses a "competitive ranking" system to reward growers who produce chickens at the least cost to OK. Under OK's system of payment, OK first calculates the production cost per pound [2] of each grower's flock and labels this production cost the grower's "flock prime cost." It then lists the flock prime cost of each grower in order from lowest to highest. The flock prime cost of the grower that is numerically in the middle of the list is designated as the "average prime cost." If any individual grower's flock prime cost is less than the average prime cost, then OK pays that grower a higher rate per pound than those whose flock prime cost is higher than the average prime cost. In other words, a grower's pay is based on how growers in a group rank against each other, not on the individual grower's production.

The Growers in this case filed suit in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Oklahoma. They obtained class certification to challenge the following conduct: (1) OK deducts from the Growers' pay certain charges for medicine and supplies; (2) OK sometimes delivers dead chicks to the Growers and causes the Growers to pay for them because OK counts chicks to be delivered at the hatchery, rather than at the Growers' premises; and (3) OK has reduced the number of birds placed per year with the Growers, causing a substantial decrease in the Growers' income. The Growers also challenged OK's competitive ranking system, arguing it is unfair and unconscionable because (1) OK uses the median flock prime cost as the average prime cost, which alters the rankings in a way that benefits OK to the detriment of the Growers; (2) OK exercises control over factors affecting the Growers' performance; and (3) OK calculates the weight of condemned birds, for which OK will not pay Growers, based on the weight of healthy birds, even though condemned birds can weigh up to 50% less than healthy birds. The Growers alleged that OK's conduct constitutes a breach of contract and violates [7] § 202(a) of

[1] Because [5] of the large capital commitments needed to become a grower for OK, growers must typically raise chickens for fifteen to twenty-five years to recover their initial investment.

[2] The production cost per pound takes into account the weight of the chickens raised by growers, as well as the cost for chicks, medicine, [6] and feed.

the PSA, 7 U.S.C. § 192(a). They also alleged that the broiler contract is unconscionable and therefore unenforceable under state law.

OK moved for judgment on the pleadings, arguing, inter alia, that proof of an [*1224] injury to competition is a required element of a claim brought under § 202(a) of the PSA. The district court judge denied OK's motion, holding that § 202(a) does not require proof of an injury to competition. Approximately eighteen months later, in a motion for summary judgment before a different district court judge, OK re-raised the issue. The Growers argued that the doctrine of the law of the case bound the District Court to its prior ruling and that § 202(a) did not require proof of an injury to competition. In the alternative, they argued that they had presented sufficient evidence of an injury to competition to withstand summary judgment. The court disagreed with all three arguments. After concluding that the law of the case did not bind the court to the prior ruling, the District Court held that § 202(a) requires proof that a practice injures or is likely to injure competition and that the Growers had failed to establish a genuine issue of material fact concerning [8] competitive injury. Consequently, the court entered summary judgment in favor of OK on the Growers' PSA claim. The Growers then moved to reopen discovery for the purpose of determining whether OK's conduct injured or was likely to injure competition. The District Court denied the motion.

Subsequently, in response to a motion filed by the Growers for an interlocutory appeal, the District Court supplemented its summary judgment ruling disposing of the PSA claim. It held that, even if § 202(a) does not require a competitive injury, whether particular conduct is "unfair" within the meaning of § 202(a) is a question of law, and OK's conduct in this case was not "unfair" as a matter of law.

In yet another order, the District Court entered summary judgment in favor of OK on the Growers' unconscionability claim. With respect to the broiler contracts governed by Oklahoma law, [3] the court concluded that Oklahoma would not recognize an affirmative claim for damages based on unconscionability. With respect to the broiler contracts governed by Arkansas law, the court concluded that, although Arkansas recognizes an affirmative cause of action for unconscionability, the Arkansas courts have not specifically [9] addressed an affirmative claim for damages, and in any event, these contracts were not unconscionable under Arkansas law.

Following these rulings, the parties settled the pending class claims for breach of contract. The Growers now appeal the District Court's rulings on their PSA and unconscionability claims.

II. DISCUSSION

A. The Packers and Stockyards Act § 202(a)

1. Law of the Case

The Growers first contend that the District Court's initial ruling that § 202(a) does not require proof of an injury to competition represents the law of the case, which should not be disturbed except in very narrow circumstances not present here. We disagree. HN1[] Generally, the "law of the case" doctrine dictates that prior judicial decisions on rules of law govern the same issues in subsequent phases of the same case. See Homans v. City of Albuquerque, 366 F.3d 900, 904 (10th Cir. 2004). We have acknowledged, however, that "the rule is a flexible one that allows [10] courts to depart from erroneous prior rulings, as the underlying policy of the rule is one of efficiency, not restraint of judicial power." Prairie Band Potawatomi Nation v. Wagnon, 476 F.3d 818, 823 (10th [*1225] Cir. 2007) (internal citation omitted). That is, the doctrine is merely a "presumption, one whose strength varies with the circumstances." Avitia v. Metro. Club of Chicago, Inc., 49 F.3d 1219, 1227 (7th Cir. 1995); see also Homans, 366 F.3d at 904 ("[T]he doctrine is discretionary rather than mandatory."). If the original ruling was issued by a higher court, a district court should depart from the ruling only in exceptionally narrow circumstances. See McIlravy v. Kerr-

[3] Beginning in 1997, OK's broiler contracts included a choice-of-law provision designating the law of Arkansas as the governing law. The District Court therefore applied Arkansas law to those contracts and Oklahoma law to the contracts pre-dating 1997.

McGee Coal Corp., 204 F.3d 1031, 1035 (10th Cir. 2000). [4] On the other hand, district courts generally remain free to reconsider their earlier interlocutory orders. Harlow v. Children's Hosp., 432 F.3d 50, 55 (1st Cir. 2005); see also United States v. Smith, 389 F.3d 944, 949 (9th Cir. 2004) (explaining that a district court may review its prior rulings so long as it retains jurisdiction over the case).

Finding no Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit authority interpreting § 202(a) to require proof of a competitive injury, the first district court judge denied OK's motion for judgment on the pleadings. In reviewing OK's motion for summary judgment eighteen months later, however, the second judge found persuasive authority from other circuits holding that such proof is required. In light of these circumstances and the interlocutory nature of the initial ruling, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in reconsidering the prior ruling. See Harlow, 432 F.3d at 55-56 (HN2[]] reviewing a district court's reconsideration of a prior interlocutory order for abuse of discretion).

2. Interpretation of "Unfair Practices" under § 202(a)

Section 202 of the PSA HN3[] makes it unlawful for a "live poultry dealer" [5] to

> (a) Engage in or use any unfair, unjustly discriminatory, [12] or deceptive practice or device; or > (b) Make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person or locality in any respect whatsoever, or subject any particular person or locality to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever; or

7 U.S.C. § 192.

At issue in this case is only what constitutes an "unfair" practice within the meaning of § 202(a). The District Court held that an "unfair" practice is one that "injures or is likely to injure competition." The Growers contend that this interpretation of the statute is belied by the United States Department of Agriculture's ("USDA") interpretation, as well as the statute's plain language and purpose.

[4] This Court had recognized three "exceptionally narrow" grounds supporting a district court's departure from an appellate [11] court's earlier ruling: "(1) when the evidence in a subsequent trial is substantially different; (2) when controlling authority has subsequently made a contrary decision of the law applicable to such issues; or (3) when the decision was clearly erroneous and would work a manifest injustice." McIlravy, 204 F.3d at 1035 (quotation omitted).

[5] It is undisputed that OK is a "live poultry dealer," defined as "any person engaged in the business of obtaining live poultry by purchase or under a poultry growing arrangement for the purpose of either slaughtering it or selling it for slaughter by another." 7 U.S.C. § 182(10).

We first address the Growers' [14] suggestion that we must defer to the USDA's reasonable interpretation of the statute because the agency is authorized to make rules and regulations necessary to carry out the PSA. See Chevron U.S.A. Inc. v. NRDC, 467 U.S. 837, 843, 104 S. Ct. 2778, 81 L. Ed. 2d 694 (1984) (holding that when Congress has implicitly delegated legislative authority to an agency, "a court may not substitute its own construction of a statutory provision for a reasonable interpretation made by the administrator of an agency"). To that end, the Growers claim that the USDA "has consistently taken the position that in order to prove that any practice is 'unfair' under [§] 202(a) . . . of the Act, it is not necessary to prove predatory intent, competitive injury, or likelihood of injury; and that it is the Department's duty to stop unlawful practices in their incipiency prior to actual injury." In re Ozark County Cattle Co., Inc., 49 Agric. Dec. 335, 365 (1990), 1990 WL 320312. They also note that the USDA filed an amicus brief before the Eleventh Circuit in London v. Fieldale Farms Corp., 410 F.3d 1295 (11th Cir. 2005), cert. denied, 546 U.S. 1034, 126 S. Ct. 752, 163 L. Ed. 2d 574 (2005), stating that the Secretary of Agriculture's position is [15] that the PSA prohibits all unfair practices, regardless of whether a practice causes a competitive injury.

HN4[] Although we generally defer to an agency's interpretation of an ambiguous statute that it implements, "[d]ifferent types of agency pronouncements are entitled to different degrees of deference." Newton v. FAA, 457 F.3d 1133, 1136 (10th Cir. 2006). As the Supreme Court has explained:

> [A]dministrative implementation of a particular statutory provision qualifies for Chevron deference when it appears that Congress delegated authority to the agency generally to make rules carrying the force of law, and that the agency interpretation claiming deference was promulgated in the exercise of that authority. Delegation of such authority may be shown in a variety of ways, as by an agency's power to engage in adjudication or notice-and-comment rulemaking, or by some other indication of a comparable congressional intent.

United States v. Mead Corp., 533 U.S. 218, 226-27, 121 S. Ct. 2164, 150 L. Ed. 2d 292 (2001).

Regulations promulgated by an agency exercising its congressionally granted rule-making authority are clearly entitled to Chevron deference. Newton, 457 F.3d at 1137. So too is an agency's adjudication of matters over which [16] it has the authority to adjudicate, as such decisions carry the force of law. See id.; [*1227] Southern Ute Indian Tribe v. Amoco Prod. Co., 119 F.3d 816, 832 (10th Cir. 1997) (recognizing the rule that an agency "may establish binding policy either through rule-making procedures or through adjudications that create binding precedents" (quotation omitted)), rev'd on other grounds, Amoco Prod. Co. v. Southern Ute Indian Tribe, 526 U.S. 865, 119 S. Ct. 1719, 144 L. Ed. 2d 22 (1999). Here, however, the Secretary has not promulgated a regulation applicable to the practices the Growers allege violate § 202(a), and the USDA HN5[] has no authority to adjudicate alleged violations of § 202 by live poultry dealers. See London, 410 F.3d at 1304 (citing administrative complaint procedures under 7 U.S.C. § 193(a)); Jackson v. Swift Eckrich, Inc., 53 F.3d 1452, 1456-57 (8th Cir. 1995) (holding that the only means of enforcing § 202 against live poultry dealers is to file suit in federal district court under § 308, 7 U.S.C. § 209(a)). [6] Moreover, we afford the USDA's position as stated in its amicus brief before the Eleventh Circuit little to no deference. See Shikles v. Sprint/United Mgmt. Co., 426 F.3d 1304, 1315 (10th Cir. 2005) (HN6[] "[A]micus [17] briefs . . . do not reflect the deliberate exercise of interpretive authority that regulations and guidelines demonstrate." (quotation omitted)). The agency's views so stated "may be accepted by a court only as they have power to persuade." First Am. Kickapoo Operations, L.L.C. v. Multimedia Games, Inc.,

[6] HN7[] Under 7 U.S.C. § 209, any person subject to the PSA may be held liable for damages. Liability may be enforced either by complaint to the Secretary of Agriculture "as provided in section 210 of this title," or through proceedings instituted in federal district court. 7 U.S.C. § 209(b). Under 7 U.S.C. § 210, however, only stockyard owners, market agencies, and dealers (not including live poultry dealers) may be found liable in proceedings before the Secretary of Agriculture. In addition, the Secretary may issue cease and desist orders and assess civil penalties against packers and swine contractors, but not poultry dealers, under 7 U.S.C. § 193. In other words, the Secretary has no adjudicative authority over [18] live poultry dealers. Hence, the only way to enforce § 202 of the PSA against a live poultry dealer is to file suit in federal district court under 7 U.S.C. § 209.

412 F.3d 1166, 1174 (10th Cir. 2005) (citing Skidmore v. Swift, 323 U.S. 134, 140, 65 S. Ct. 161, 89 L. Ed. 124 (1944)). As we explain below, we are not persuaded by the USDA's interpretation of the statute. [7]

Having concluded that we need not defer to the agency's interpretation of the statute, we turn to the District Court's construction of § 202(a). [19] HN8[] We review issues of statutory construction de novo, "interpret[ing] the words of the statute in light of the purposes Congress sought to serve." Wright v. Fed. Bureau of Prisons, 451 F.3d 1231, 1233-34 (10th Cir. 2006) (quotation omitted). In so doing, we begin with "the language employed by Congress," and we "read the words of the statute in their context and with a view to their place in the overall statutory scheme." Id. at 1234 (quotation omitted).

[*1228] As the Growers note, nothing in the plain language of § 202(a) indicates that a practice is unfair only if it adversely affects competition or is likely to do so. But neither does the statute otherwise define an unfair practice. Enacted in 1921, the "primary purpose of [the PSA] is to assure fair competition and fair trade practices in livestock marketing and in the meatpacking industry" and "to safeguard farmers . . . against receiving less than the true market value of their livestock." H.R. Rep. No. 85-1048, at 1 (1957), reprinted in 1958 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5213, 5213. The "chief evil" Congress feared was the monopolistic practices of the packers, "enabling them unduly and arbitrarily to lower prices to the shipper, who sells, and unduly [20] and arbitrarily to increase the price to the consumer, who buys." Stafford v. Wallace, 258 U.S. 495, 514-15, 42 S. Ct. 397, 66 L. Ed. 735 (1922). Although intended to be broader than antecedent antitrust legislation, § 202 "nonetheless incorporates the basic antitrust blueprint of the Sherman Act and other pre-existing antitrust legislation." De Jong Packing Co. v. USDA, 618 F.2d 1329, 1335 n.7 (9th Cir. 1980).

Against this backdrop, other circuits have concluded that "unfair[ness]" under § 202(a) requires evidence that the challenged practice will likely lead to a competitive injury. The issue is most thoroughly treated in Armour & Co. v. United States, 402 F.2d 712 (7th Cir. 1968). Armour involved a meat packer's coupon promotion, which allegedly had the effect of diverting sales from competitors to the defendant. After recognizing the PSA's ancestry in antitrust law, where Congress has expressed a "basic public policy distinguishing between fair and vigorous competition on the one hand and predatory or controlled competition on the other," id. at 717, the court reasoned that the "fact that a given provision does not expressly specify the degree of injury or the type of intent required, does not imply that these [21] basic indicators of the line between free competition and predation are to be ignored," id. Even though the test of unfairness under § 202(a) is "less stringent than under some of the anti-trust laws," the court still concluded that the coupon program at issue could not violate § 202(a) "absent some predatory intent or some likelihood of competitive injury." Armour, 402 F.2d at 717; [8] see also IBP, Inc. v. Glickman, 187 F.3d 974, 977 (8th Cir. 1999)) (concluding that the challenged conduct did not "potentially suppress or reduce competition sufficient to be proscribed by the [PSA]"); Parchman v. USDA, 852 F.2d 858, 864 (6th Cir. 1988) ("[The PSA] does not require that the Secretary prove actual injury before a practice may be found unfair. The Secretary need only establish the likelihood that an arrangement will result in competitive injury to establish a violation." (alterations, internal quotation marks, and citation omitted)); DeJong, 618 F.2d at 1337 (holding that "unfair practices under § 202 are not confined to those where competitive injury has already resulted, but includes those where there is a reasonable likelihood that the purpose will be achieved and that the result will [22] be an undue restraint of competition").

[7] In addition, we emphasize that we are interpreting the meaning of unfairness solely in the context of the PSA. Consequently, the Supreme Court's decision in FTC v. Sperry and Hutchinson Co., 405 U.S. 233, 92 S. Ct. 898, 31 L. Ed. 2d 170 (1972), which addresses similar language in § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45(a)(1), does not dictate a particular interpretation in this case. Unlike the case before us, the question in Sperry and Hutchinson was one of agency jurisdiction, namely whether § 5 empowered the FTC to define "unfair practices" to include practices without anticompetitive effects and of a noncompetitive nature. Id. at 239. Conversely, as we note above, the present case does not involve the USDA's interpretive or enforcement authority under the statute. Instead, we are faced with the task of construing a statute that only the federal courts may enforce against live poultry dealers.

[8] We are not concerned here with predatory intent on the part of OK. That issue was not raised by the parties, and we therefore express no opinion on whether evidence of predatory intent can make an act "unfair" when there is no concomitant showing of a likelihood of competitive injury.

In a more recent case, based on facts similar to those at issue here, the Eleventh Circuit similarly held that a claim brought under § 202(a) required some showing of a competitive injury or the likelihood of competitive injury. London, 410 F.3d at 1303. Like the case before us, London involved a [*1229] vertically integrated poultry company that entered into contracts with growers to raise broiler chickens. Id. at 1298-99. One grower filed suit against the company, arguing that the company violated the PSA when it terminated his broiler contract. Id. at 1299. After a jury returned a verdict in favor of the grower, the district court set aside the verdict and granted the defendant's motion for judgment as a matter of law. Id. at 1300. Relying in part on Armour, the Eleventh Circuit held that to prevail under § 202(a), a plaintiff must show that the defendant's practice "adversely [23] affects competition or is likely to adversely affect competition." Id. at 1304. In reaching this decision, the court identified the policy implications of a contrary holding: "Eliminating the competitive impact requirement would ignore the long-time antitrust policies which formed the backbone of the PSA's creation. Failure to require a competitive impact showing would subject dealers to liability under the PSA for simple breach of contract . . . ." Id.

The Growers argue, however, that because § 202's other subsections contain language prohibiting acts that tend to restrain commerce or create monopolies, see, e.g., 7 U.S.C. § 192(c), (d), (e), the absence of similar language in § 202(a) conclusively means that proof of a competitive injury is not required. We disagree. HN9[] Unlike subsections (c), (d), and (e), which list specific acts that are unlawful only when they have the tendency or effect of restraining commerce or creating a monopoly, subsection (a) is a general prohibition on "unfair, unjustly discriminatory, or deceptive practice[s]" and provides no further guidance on what type of act falls within its parameters. Not to require a showing of competitive injury or the likelihood [24] thereof would make a federal case out of every breach of contract. Nothing in the PSA suggests that Congress intended this result.

The Growers also argue that because other subsections require proof of a competitive injury, limiting subsection (a) to anticompetitive acts would render it superfluous and would therefore violate HN10[] one of the "cardinal principle[s] of statutory construction" to "give effect, if possible, to every clause and word of a statute." Williams v. Taylor, 529 U.S. 362, 404, 120 S. Ct. 1495, 146 L. Ed. 2d 389 (2000) (quotation omitted). To the contrary, such an interpretation is far from rendering subsection (a) superfluous because it serves as a catchall for acts that Congress could not, at the time of enactment, have foreseen and specified. Cf. Excel Corp. v. USDA, 397 F.3d 1285, 1293 (10th Cir. 2005) (recognizing that HN11[] new techniques and tools utilized by covered entities can violate the PSA even if the USDA has not previously declared them unlawful). While the other subsections make certain acts explicitly unlawful, Congress acknowledged with subsection (a) [25] that it could not list the full panoply of unfair, unjustly discriminatory, or deceptive practices or devices that a covered entity might utilize.

Although we have never expressly held that unfairness under § 202(a) requires a likelihood of injury to competition, our circuit precedent is not to the contrary. In resolving unfairness cases, we have often suggested that a showing of competitive injury can be determinative. In Capitol Packing Co. v. United States, 350 F.2d 67 (10th Cir. 1965), for example, we reviewed a decision issued by the USDA's Judicial Officer that various practices engaged in by the defendants violated § 312(a) of the PSA, 7 U.S.C. § 213(a), "which makes it unlawful for any market agency to engage in or use any unfair, unjustly discriminatory, or deceptive practice or device in connection with the marketing or selling of livestock." Capitol Packing Co., 350 F.2d at 73 (quotation omitted). The Judicial Officer found that a practice called "order [*1230] buying" (i.e., the sale of livestock before it arrives at the stockyards) violated the PSA because the livestock had the misleading appearance of being for sale to the highest bidder by virtue of its presence in the market. [26] Id. at 74. But this Court concluded, as a matter of law, that "order buying" was not a violation of § 312(a) in part because the record lacked "evidence . . . tending to show [order buying] lessens competition." Id. (emphasis added).

In Excel Corp. v. USDA, 397 F.3d 1285 (10th Cir. 2005), we reviewed the USDA's determination that Excel violated § 202(a) and one of the PSA's implementing regulations, 9 C.F.R. § 201.99(a), by failing to disclose to hog producers a change in its formula for computing the weight of carcasses. Although it admitted that it had changed the formula, the meat packer argued that it had not violated the act because, inter alia, "practices are not violative where they are required by the exigencies of the business." Excel Corp., 397 F.3d at 1293. We rejected this claim, stating that "Congress and the USDA are the arbiters of what practices will impede competition." Id. (emphasis added). Hence, "the fact that a particular act is 'required by the exigencies of the business' . . . has no impact on whether that act is violative of the [PSA] and the implementing regulations." Id. By failing to notify hog producers of the changed formula, Excel prevented the producers [27] from shopping their hogs to other packers to determine if they could obtain a better price. In light of these facts, we upheld the Judicial Officer's conclusion that Excel's practice "impeded competition." Id. at 1294.

In Hays Livestock Commission Co. v. Maly Livestock Commission Co., 498 F.2d 925, 929 (10th Cir. 1974), we reviewed the Secretary of Agriculture's determination that a dealer's refusal to honor a draft to pay for livestock was "unjust and unreasonable" under 7 U.S.C. § 208. In upholding the Secretary's decision, we did not discuss what a plaintiff must show to establish that a practice is unjust or unreasonable, but we did note that "dishonoring of drafts in this context . . . placed an inordinate burden on the barns, contrary to the purpose of the Packers and Stockyards Act to secure the free and unburdened flow of livestock." Hays Livestock Comm'n, 498 F.2d at 932 (emphasis added) (quotation omitted). Like our decisions in Capitol Packing Co. and Excel Corp., our opinion in Hays Livestock Commission indicates that an impediment to competition, though never expressly required, was implicit in our prior decisions.

The Growers note, however, that we have also resolved [28] cases under § 202(a) without any mention that the relevant practice injures competition. They direct our attention to Peterman v. USDA, 770 F.2d 888 (10th Cir. 1985), in which we upheld the Secretary's determination that a meat packer was guilty of deceptive trade practices, including its "bait and switch" tactic, whereby the packer would advertise one product and then convince customers seeking the product to buy a more expensive one instead. Id. at 890. To the extent our silence on the competitive injury requirement is relevant, this case is distinguishable because it involved an act alleged to be deceptive, as opposed to unfair. We are concerned here only with whether unfairness requires a showing of a likely injury to competition, not whether deceptive practices require such a showing. HN12[] We therefore join the those circuits requiring a plaintiff who challenges a practice under § 202(a) to show that the practice injures or is likely to injure competition.

3. OK's Alleged Violations of § 202(a)

After determining that § 202(a) requires proof of an injury or likely injury to competition, [*1231] the District Court concluded that the Growers had failed to raise a genuine issue of material fact [29] regarding competitive injury. HN13[] We review the District Court's grant of summary judgment de novo, Bryant v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 432 F.3d 1114, 1124 (10th Cir. 2005), and will affirm its decision only if the record "show[s] that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the moving party is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c). In reviewing the record, "we must view the evidence and draw reasonable inferences therefrom in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party." Bryant, 432 F.3d at 1124.

In granting summary judgment in OK's favor, the District Court held:

> To prove monopoly power typically requires the wilful acquisition or maintenance of such power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident. Monopoly power includes power to exclude competition. Plaintiffs have not presented evidence demonstrating entry barriers or other circumstances which improperly preclude other integrators from competing in this market with defendants. The mere fact that the defendants are the sole integrator does not demonstrate an illegal monopsony. Moreover, the plaintiffs are not competitors [30] of defendants. Thus, injury to them by the allegedly "unfair" contract does not demonstrate injury to competition.

(internal citations omitted). The Growers argue that the District Court erred because it implied that (1) an injury to competition only arises in the context of unlawful monopolization; and (2) an injury to competition only arises when a competitor is injured.

We agree that the District Court erred in its legal analysis of what constitutes a competitive injury under § 202(a). As we noted above, HN14[] Congress intended the PSA to have a broader scope than the antitrust laws. The antitrust requirement that monopoly power be acquired willfully and include the power to exclude competitors does not apply in the context of the PSA. By holding that § 202(a) requires proof that a practice has injured or is likely to injury competition, we have not required a showing that the defendant engaged in the unfair practice with the intent to cause the injury or other unlawful effect. [9] Instead, the Growers need only prove that specific practices have the effect of injuring competition or are likely to do so. Moreover, as we explain below, when analyzing whether a buyer's "monopsony" power injures [31] competition, as in this case, the inquiry is somewhat different from the inquiry into whether a seller's monopoly power injures competition.

The record contains evidence that supports the Growers' contention that OK is a monopsony in the relevant regional market. HN15[] A monopsony is "a condition of the market in which there is but one buyer for a particular commodity." Telecor Communs., Inc. v. Southwestern Bell Tel. Co., 305 F.3d 1124, 1133 n.4 (10th Cir. 2002) (quotation omitted). Because the poultry market is vertically integrated, if OK is the only integrator in the area, as the Growers suggest, it may constitute a monopsony. The District Court's characterization of this logic as a "non sequitur" is therefore incorrect. We have previously acknowledged [*1232] that a monopsony may exist when sellers are unable to find alternative buyers and must sell to a single purchaser. Id. at 1135-36.

Furthermore, we have acknowledged [32] that, like a monopoly, a monopsony can threaten competition. Id. at 1135 ("Economists . . . have long recognized that market inefficiencies created by anticompetitive restraints on input markets can be as destructive of a free market economy (and therefore ultimately damaging to consumers) as restraints on output markets."). According to economists, without competition from other buyers, a monopsonist will lower prices paid to sellers, which over time results in higher consumer prices. [10] In other words, a poultry processor with monopsony power can fix and manipulate prices resulting in injury to both poultry producers (i.e., growers) and end-users (i.e., consumers). We explained why depression of prices potentially injures both producers and consumers in Telecor: "Some producers will either produce less or cease production altogether, resulting in less-than-optimal output of the product or service, and over the long run higher consumer prices, reduced product quality, or substitution of less efficient alternative products." Id. at 1136.

In addition, in the vertically integrated poultry market, a processor with a monopsony need not wait for poultry growers to produce less to increase prices on the wholesale market because the processor also controls the growers' supply. It may simply deliver fewer chicks to the growers, pay them the same low prices, and resell at the same or a higher price. When this happens, both the growers and the end-users are adversely affected. That is, by manipulating prices to suppliers, a monopsonist threatens to injure the end-users. Id. at 1136 ("[M]onopsonies fall under antitrust purview because monopsonistic practices will eventually adversely affect consumers."); id. at 1134 ("Tenth Circuit case law . . . reject[s] the notion that a monopsony plaintiff must prove end-user impact."); see also Mandeville Island Farms v. Am. Crystal Sugar Co., 334 U.S. 219, 235, 68 S. Ct. 996, 92 L. Ed. 1328 (1948) (holding that sugar beet growers had stated a valid monopsony claim under the Sherman Act even though they did not allege end-user impact). Hence, to establish that the practices of a monopsonist have injured or are likely [34] to injure competition, a plaintiff does not have to be a competitor of the buyer or demonstrate that the buyer has improperly excluded other competitors. Instead, the plaintiff must show that the monopsonist's practices have caused or are likely to cause the anticompetitive effect associated with monopsonies, namely the arbitrary manipulation of market prices by unilaterally depressing seller prices on the input market with the effect (or likely effect) of increasing prices on the output market.

As we noted above, shortly after the PSA's passage, the Supreme Court identified these very harms as the reason Congress passed the Act: the "'chief evil'" Congress sought to prevent was "'the monopoly of the packers, enabling them unduly and arbitrarily to lower prices to the shipper who sells, and unduly and arbitrarily to increase the price to the consumer who buys.'" Mahon v. Stowers, 416 U.S. 100, 106, 94 S. Ct. 1626, 40 L. Ed. 2d 79 (1974) (quoting Stafford v. Wallace, 258 U.S. 495, 514-15, 42 S. Ct. 397, 66 L. Ed. 735 (1922)); see also Swift & Co. v. United [9] Indeed, we have recognized that § 202(a) focuses on conduct and does not require proof of wrongful intent: "Nothing in the language of [§ 202(a)] . . . requires a showing of wrongful intent. To the contrary, the focus is solely on the acts committed or omitted." Excel Corp., 397 F.3d at 1294.

[10] The danger of increased consumer prices is especially acute when the monopsonist resells in a monopolized market. See PHILLIP E. AREEDA & HERBERT [33] HOVENKAMP, 3 ANTITRUST LAW: AN ANALYSIS OF ANTITRUST PRINCIPLES AND THEIR APPLICATION § 720a n.1 (2005).

States, 393 F.2d 247, 254 (7th Cir. 1968) ("The lack of competition between buyers, [*1233] with the attendant possible depression of producers' prices, was one of the evils at which the Packers and Stockyards [35] Act was directed."); Bruhn's Freezer Meats of Chicago, Inc. v. USDA, 438 F.2d 1332, 1337 (8th Cir. 1971) (noting one of the purposes of the PSA was "to assure fair trade practices in the livestock marketing and meat-packing industry in order to safeguard farmers and ranchers against receiving less than the true market value of their livestock"). Although Congress did not intend to "'upset the traditional principles of freedom of contract,'" see Pickett v. Tyson Fresh Meats, Inc., 420 F.3d 1272, 1280 (11th Cir. 2005) (quoting Jackson, 53 F.3d at 1458), it did intend to prevent those practices that facilitate the packers' arbitrary manipulation of prices and complete subversion of normal market forces.

Although other circuits have noted that supply contracts between producers and processors of livestock can increase efficiency, they tend to focus on the benefits to the processor, rather than the market as a whole. See Pickett, 420 F.3d at 1283 ("[B]eing able to keep its processing plants operating at capacity has increased [the processor's] efficiency."); IBP, Inc., 187 F.3d at 978 (concluding that the terms of the contracts allowed the processor "to have a more reliable and efficient [36] method of obtaining a supply of cattle"). But even if supply contracts increase a processor's efficiency, they may threaten the efficiency of the relevant market when a monopsony is able to manipulate the market by depressing producers' prices and increasing resale prices. [11] Hence, HN16[] to demonstrate that a monopsonist has engaged in "unfair practices" under § 202(a), a seller must show that the buyer's practices threaten to injure competition by arbitrarily decreasing prices paid to sellers with the likely effect of increasing resale prices.

After reviewing the record in the case before us, we find that a genuine issue of material fact exists as to whether OK engaged in unfair practices in violation of § 202(a). In particular, we note that the record contains evidence of the classic monopsony injury, namely that OK is depressing the prices it pays the Growers and reselling at inflated prices. If OK does not compete with other buyers and completely controls the supply to its growers, it may be able to manipulate prices by controlling supply and demand. The record contains expert testimony identifying specific practices that are likely to injure competition in this way. For example, when wholesale prices are weak, OK delays delivery of chicks to growers, thereby decreasing the production of broilers by growers and causing prices to rise on the wholesale market (which eventually adversely affects consumers). Growers are also adversely affected because they produce (and therefore sell) fewer chickens. Furthermore, the record contains evidence that the Growers are paid the same under OK's pricing system during periods of reduced production as they are [38] during periods of average and above average production. In other words, OK can decide to reduce production (to reap the benefits of higher prices on the wholesale market), [*1234] but it does not have to pay its growers the higher prices that a reduction in supply would demand in a competitive market. We are not suggesting that uncompetitive prices alone are unlawful. HN17[] Courts have routinely noted that, short of predatory pricing, a monopolist's uncompetitive prices do not violate antitrust laws. See, e.g., Kartell v. Blue Shield of Mass., Inc., 749 F.2d 922, 927 (1st Cir. 1984) ("Ordinarily . . . even a monopolist is free to exploit whatever market power it may possess when that exploitation takes the form of charging uncompetitive prices."). [12] But if a monopsonist's uncompetitive prices are a result not solely of its market power, but also of practices that result in complete control of the input (supply) market, the effect of the monopsonist's practices may be an injury to competition. Moreover, although PSA claims against processors for practices associated with supply contracts have not enjoyed much success, these cases are factually different from the one before us. See Pickett, 420 F.3d 1272; [39] IBP, Inc., 187 F.3d 974. For example, the producers in these cases did not allege the existence of a monopsony. In addition, the supply contracts guaranteed producers a price tied to market prices, and overall, the arrangements created incentives and efficiencies that benefitted consumers. Pickett, 420 F.3d at 1284 ("[I]t was undisputed . . . that marketing agreements are a more efficient means for both meat packers and cattle producers to operate in the market."); IBP, Inc., 187 F.3d at 978 (explaining that the marketing agreements "essentially ensure[] that the potential for undue or arbitrary lowering of prices is eliminated"); see also Griffin v. Smithfield Foods, Inc., 183 F. Supp. 2d 824, 827 (E.D. Va. 2002) (granting summary judgment in favor of a defendant packer because the plaintiff producers had not identified any specific practices that violated the PSA).

[11] Although this case does not involve horizontal price-fixing by a group of buyers, OK's alleged practices manipulate the market in a similar fashion: "[M]arket manipulation in its various manifestations is implicitly an artificial stimulus applied to (or at times a brake on) market prices, a force which distorts those prices, a factor which prevents the determination of those prices by free competition alone." United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U.S. 150, 223, 60 S. Ct. 811, 84 L. Ed. 1129 (1940) (explaining price-fixing as a form of market manipulation). Like illegal price-fixing agreements, a monopsonist's use of supply contracts to manipulate the market poses the risk [37] that prices will be determined by artificial, rather than market, forces.

[12] In acknowledging that an insurer could use its market power to "keep prices down," the court in Kartell noted that the lower prices the insurer paid doctors for their services did not result in higher consumer prices, 749 F.2d at 930-31, and that both parties "sit on opposite sides of the bargaining table," id. at 929 [40] (quotation omitted). We are confronted with a potentially different arrangement in the case before us. The record contains evidence that OK's practices are likely to increase end-user prices. Moreover, the supply contracts with the Growers give OK complete control over the input market (i.e., the chickens available to OK for purchase), leaving the growers with little, if any, ability to bargain.

We therefore conclude that, if the Growers prove that OK engaged in the arbitrary price manipulation described above with the effect or likely effect of depressing prices to the growers and reselling at increased prices, they may establish that OK engaged in unfair practices in violation of § 202(a). We are by no means suggesting that vertically integrated markets will always violate the PSA. Rather, HN18[] we hold that § 202(a) is violated when a monopsonist engages in specific practices that result in or are likely to result in the anticompetitive effects the PSA was designed to prevent. To prove a violation, the Growers may not rely on the sum total of various practices that individually are not likely to injure competition, but must instead prove that specific practices have caused or are likely [41] to cause injury. Capitol Packing Co., 350 F.2d at 76-77 ("[S]pecified methods of dealing which are not themselves violations of the [PSA] cannot, when added together, become a violation."). Because the record contains evidence that OK may engage in specific practices that are likely to injure competition, we reverse the District Court's grant of summary judgment in favor of OK and [*1235] remand for further consideration in light of this opinion.

4. Discovery Ruling

Following the District Court's adverse ruling on their PSA claim, the Growers moved the court to reopen discovery for the limited purpose of discovering information regarding the likelihood of an injury to competition. The District Court denied the motion. The Growers argue that, because of the first judge's ruling that such proof is not required and because discovery had closed in the interim, the District Court erred in refusing to reopen discovery.

HN19[] We review a district court's denial of a motion to reopen discovery for an abuse of discretion. SIL-FLO, Inc. v. SFHC, Inc., 917 F.2d 1507, 1514 (10th Cir. 1990). "Under this standard, a trial court's decision will not be disturbed unless the appellate court has a definite and firm [42] conviction that the lower court made a clear error of judgment or exceeded the bounds of permissible choice in the circumstances." Id. (quotation omitted).

When OK moved for summary judgment on the Growers' PSA claim, it explicitly re-raised the issue in dispute. [13] The Growers therefore had fair warning that the issue was back on the table for resolution. In fact, they addressed the argument in their response to OK's motion. They argued that the law of the case bound the court to the prior ruling, but that in any event they had presented sufficient evidence of an injury to competition to withstand summary judgment. Only when the District Court disagreed with both propositions did the Growers seek to reopen discovery, arguing that they did not have an opportunity to discover the relevant information.

HN20[] "[T]he Supreme Court has held that, under Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(f), 'summary judgment [should] be refused where the nonmoving party has not had the opportunity to discover information that is essential to his opposition.'" Dreiling v. Peugeot Motors of Am., Inc., 850 F.2d 1373, 1376 (10th Cir. 1988) (alteration in original) (quoting Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 250 n.5, 106 S. Ct. 2505, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1986)). Rule 56(f)'s [13] At this juncture, we would like to note that both parties flouted their duty under this Circuit's rules to include in the record the relevant motion for summary judgment, supporting brief, and response. See 10th Cir. R. 10.3(D)(2). Though we are not required to do so, we have obtained copies of the documents. But we advise that in the future the parties diligently adhere to the rules of [43] the Circuit if they wish to avoid unwittingly waiving arguments.

protection is not absolute, however, as its protection "arises only if the nonmoving party files an affidavit explaining why he or she cannot present facts to oppose the motion." Id. To benefit from the rule, a party "at a minimum must ask the court to refrain from acting on the summary judgment request until additional discovery can be conducted." C.B. Trucking, Inc. v. Waste Mgmt., Inc., 137 F.3d 41, 44 (1st Cir. 1998); see also Allen v. Sybase, Inc., 468 F.3d 642, 662 (10th Cir. 2006) (concluding that a party's "footnote request in its [response] brief for additional discovery time does not pass muster under rule 56(f)"). "[A] party ordinarily may not attempt to meet a summary judgment challenge head-on but fall back [44] on Rule 56(f) if its first effort is unsuccessful." C.B. Trucking, Inc., 137 F.3d at 44. The Growers, with full knowledge that the District Court would be re-evaluating the competitive injury requirement under § 202(a), took no steps to request time for additional discovery; nor did they take steps to fulfill the requirements of Rule 56(f). In such a case, we are not left with a "definite and firm conviction that the [*1236] lower court made a clear error of judgment or exceeded the bounds of permissible choice in the circumstances." SIL-FLO, Inc., 917 F.2d at 1514 (10th Cir. 1990). We note, however, that on remand the parties may seek to reopen discovery, and the District Court may, in its discretion, grant such requests.

B. The Growers' Unconscionability Claim

The Growers claim that the broiler contract is unconscionable because of the gross imbalance of obligation borne by growers. For example, they point to the fact that the contract guarantees only a single flock of chicks although a grower must raise broilers for at least fifteen years to recoup its investment. They also note that OK is not obligated to place a minimum number of chicks or flocks with each grower, and growers are obligated [45] to make improvements to chicken houses before OK will place additional flocks with them.

We must first address a threshold choice-of-law question. Beginning in 1997, OK's broiler contracts included a choice-of-law provision, designating the law of Arkansas as the governing law. Consequently, in its order granting summary judgment, the District Court held that Oklahoma law governed the pre-1997 contracts and Arkansas law governed the contracts entered into thereafter.

HN21[] To decide the effect of the contractual choice-of-law clause, we look to the forum state's choice-of-law rules. See Dang v. UNUM Life Ins. Co. of Am., 175 F.3d 1186, 1190 (10th Cir. 1999) ("A federal court adjudicating state law claims must apply the forum state's choice of law principles."). HN22[] Under Oklahoma law, "a contract will be governed by the laws of the state where the contract was entered into unless otherwise agreed and unless contrary to the law or public policy of the state where enforcement of the contract is sought." Williams v. Shearson Lehman Bros., Inc., 1995 OK CIV APP 154, 917 P.2d 998, 1002 (Okla. Civ. App. 1995). Because we conclude that the Growers' unconscionability claim fails under both Oklahoma and Arkansas law, we [46] need not decide whether the application of Arkansas law would be contrary to Oklahoma's law or public policy. In reaching this decision, HN23[] we review the District Court's interpretation of state law de novo. Steiner Corp. v. Johnson & Higgins of Cal., 135 F.3d 684, 690 (10th Cir. 1998) (citing Salve Regina College v. Russell, 499 U.S. 225, 111 S. Ct. 1217, 113 L. Ed. 2d 190 (1991)).

As an initial matter, the Oklahoma Supreme Court has never addressed whether Oklahoma common law would recognize an affirmative cause of action seeking damages for unconscionability in contract. Nevertheless, Oklahoma's unconscionability standard is so onerous that the Growers cannot meet that standard here. HN24[] An unconscionable contract is one in which, "at the time of making of the contract, and in light of the general commercial background and commercial needs of a particular case, clauses are so one-sided as to oppress or unfairly surprise one of the parties." Barnes v. Helfenbein, 1976 OK 33, 548 P.2d 1014, 1020 (Okla. 1976). "Unconscionability has generally been recognized to include an absence of meaningful choice on the part of one of the parties, together with contractual terms which are unreasonably favorable to the other party." Id.

Whether the [47] Growers lacked any meaningful choice is determined by "'all the circumstances surrounding the transaction.'" Id. at 1020 n.12 (quoting Williams v. Walker-Thomas Furniture Co., 121 U.S. App. D.C. 315, 350 F.2d 445, 449-50 (D.C. Cir. 1965)). Relevant factors include whether the aggrieved party had a reasonable opportunity to understand the terms of the contract and whether the important terms were [*1237] hidden "in a maze of fine print" or were "minimized by deceptive sales practices." Id. (quotation omitted). Generally, "one who signs an agreement without full knowledge of its terms might be held to assume the risk that he has entered a one-sided bargain." Id. (quotation omitted). On the other hand, if there is a gross inequality of bargaining power and the aggrieved party signs a "commercially unreasonable contract with little or no knowledge of its terms, it is hardly likely that his consent, or even an objective manifestation of his consent, was ever given to all the terms." Id. (quotation omitted).

Similar principles apply in Arkansas. HN25[] In assessing whether a contract or a particular provision is unconscionable, the court must "review the totality of the circumstances surrounding the negotiation and execution of [48] the contract," taking into consideration "whether there is a gross inequality of bargaining power between the parties and whether the aggrieved party was made aware of and comprehended the provision in question." Jordan, 207 S.W.3d at 535. Importantly, however, "it is [generally] not the province of the courts to scrutinize all contracts with a paternalistic attitude and summarily conclude that they are partially or totally unenforceable merely because an aggrieved party believes that the contract has subsequently proved to be unfair or less beneficial than anticipated." Assoc. Press v. S. Ark. Radio Co., 34 Ark. App. 211, 809 S.W.2d 695, 697 (Ark. Ct. App. 1991) (quotation and alteration omitted). Indeed, in Arkansas, "parties are free to make contracts based on whatever terms and conditions they agree upon, provided it is not illegal or tainted with some infirmity such as fraud, overreaching, or the like." Hancock v. Tri-State Ins. Co., 43 Ark. App. 47, 858 S.W.2d 152, 154 (Ark. Ct. App. 1993) (en banc).

None of these circumstances are present here. Although the District Court recognized the potential for some inequality of bargaining power, it was not a "gross inequality of bargaining power." The court noted that [49] the availability of the broiler contracts is well-known in the region and has produced a waiting list of people who wish to become growers under the contract--a contract which is available for review prior to engaging in the capital investment needed to become a grower.

The Growers argue that the inequality of bargaining power should not be determined by reference to the availability of contracts and the fact that many people want to become a grower for OK. Rather, they suggest that the court consider whether they lacked any meaningful choice as to the terms of the contract and whether they had an alternative source for obtaining the desired service or product. Although Arkansas case law does suggest that these are relevant considerations, see Nat'l Union Fire Ins. Co. of Pittsburgh v. Guardtronic, Inc., 76 Ark. App. 313, 64 S.W.3d 779, 783-84 (Ark. Ct. App. 2002), the Growers are incorrect in dismissing the fact that they initiated the contracting process with OK (i.e., OK did not solicit their business) as irrelevant to the analysis.

In Jordan, the plaintiff was a landscaper who rented large equipment from the defendant. 207 S.W.3d at 528. The rental agreement contained a boilerplate provision excusing [50] the defendant from liability for the consequences of its own negligence in connection with the rental of the equipment. Id. at 531-32. After the plaintiff was injured by the equipment, he sued, arguing that the exculpatory clause was unconscionable and therefore unenforceable. The Arkansas Supreme Court disagreed. The court found no evidence of a "gross inequality of bargaining power" when the plaintiff "sought out the services" of the defendant and "paid for the rental equipment after being shown how to [*1238] operate it." Id. at 536; see also Barnes, 548 P.2d at 1021 (applying Oklahoma law, court held that defendant did not behave unconscionably when the plaintiff's representative sought out the defendant to enter into a contract).

Furthermore, the Growers do not suggest that they are unsophisticated parties unable to evaluate the risks of the contract prior to entering into it. And they do not suggest that they failed to read and understand the terms of the contract prior to entering into it or even prior to building the chicken houses. Also worthy of note is that some of the named plaintiffs have been operating under this allegedly "unconscionable" contract for nearly twenty years. HN26[] Generally, [51] "[t]he fairness or unfairness, folly or wisdom, or inequality of contracts are questions exclusively within the rights of the parties to adjust at the time the contract is made." Id. We therefore affirm the District Court's grant of summary judgment in favor of OK on the Growers' unconscionability claim.

III. CONCLUSION

Section 202(a) of the Packers and Stockyards Act requires a plaintiff who claims that a defendant's conduct was "unfair" to show that such conduct results in or is likely to result in an injury to competition. Because the record contains evidence that raises a genuine issue of material fact concerning the Growers' § 202(a) claim, we REVERSE the District Court's order granting OK summary judgment on this claim and REMAND for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. The Growers have, however, failed to show that the contracts at issue are unconscionable under state law. Accordingly, we AFFIRM the decision of the District Court granting summary judgment in OK's favor on the Growers' unconscionability claim. In addition, we AFFIRM the District Court's denial of the Growers' motion to reopen discovery, but do so without prejudice to subsequent requests to reopen discovery [52] on remand. We also deny the Growers' motion to file a second supplemental appendix because the document they seek to add was not part of the record before the District Court.

HARTZ, Circuit Judge, concurring/dissenting

I join Chief Judge Tacha's thorough and scholarly opinion for the panel except for Part II.A.2, entitled "Interpretation of 'Unfair Practices' under § 202(a)" and Part II.A.3, entitled, "OK's Alleged Violations of § 202(a)." I arrive at almost the same destination regarding statutory interpretation, but through a rather different route. In my view a practice may be "unfair" under § 202(a) of the Packers and Stockyards Act (PSA) even though it causes no competitive injury. In interpreting that provision we owe respect to the longstanding view of the United States Department of Agriculture (USDA), although I would reach the same interpretation even without reference to that view. On the other hand, the majority opinion's conception of competitive injury, which I do not share, appears to be broad enough that many, perhaps all, of the practices that could properly be labeled unfair would satisfy its competitive-injury requirement. Finally, I would affirm the district [53] court's decision that the Growers failed to provide evidence showing that the practices challenged on appeal were unfair.

I. DEFERENCE TO THE USDA

The deference issue in this case is a very interesting one. The majority opinion appears to acknowledge that we would need to grant Chevron deference to the USDA's interpretation of PSA § 202(a), 7 U.S.C. § 192(a), if the USDA had "authority to [*1239] adjudicate alleged violations of § 202 by live poultry dealers." Op. at 13. See Chevron USA, Inc. v. Natural Res. Def. Council, Inc., 467 U.S. 837, 104 S. Ct. 2778, 81 L. Ed. 2d 694 (1984) (court should defer in certain circumstances to agency's reasonable interpretation of ambiguous statutory language). Certainly such deference would appear to be required by the Supreme Court's gloss on Chevron in United States v. Mead Corp., 533 U.S. 218, 226-27, 121 S. Ct. 2164, 150 L. Ed. 2d 292 (2001):

> [A]dministrative implementation of a particular statutory provision qualifies for Chevron deference when it appears that Congress delegated authority to the agency generally to make rules carrying the force of law, and that the agency interpretation claiming deference was promulgated in the exercise of that authority. Delegation of such authority may be shown in a variety of ways, as [54] by an agency's power to engage in adjudication or notice-and-comment rulemaking, or by some other indication of a comparable congressional intent.

As the majority opinion correctly notes, the USDA does not have adjudicatory authority over § 202(a) violations by live-poultry dealers. The USDA does, however, have authority to adjudicate § 202(a) violations by packers. See 7 U.S.C. § 193. Most of the judicial decisions cited by the majority opinion involved packers, see, e.g., Armour & Co. v. United States, 402 F.2d 712 (7th Cir. 1968); IBP, Inc. v. Glickman, 187 F.3d 974, 977 (8th Cir. 1999), so we have the peculiar situation of not granting Chevron deference to the USDA in this case but relying on cases in which Chevron deference would have been proper.

I confess to having no idea how the Supreme Court would resolve this conundrum. Perhaps it would avoid the issue as I do, by agreeing with the USDA's interpretation. But at the least I would think that we owe respect to the experience and expertise of the USDA regarding the PSA. See Skidmore v. Swift & Co., 323 U.S. 134, 139-40, 65 S. Ct. 161, 89 L. Ed. 124 (1944). In that regard it is worth noting that 26 years ago a treatise could report that the USDA "has consistently [55] taken the position that in order to prove that a practice violates the broad prohibitions in §§ 202(a) and (b) . . . of the [PSA], it is not necessary to prove predatory intent, competitive injury, or likelihood of injury." 1 John H. Davidson et al., Agricultural Law § 3.47, at 244 (1981). Such a longstanding view of an agency is entitled to more respect than an ad hoc litigating position. Cf. INS v. Cardoza-Fonseca, 480 U.S. 421, 446 n.30, 107 S. Ct. 1207, 94 L. Ed. 2d 434 (1987) ("An agency interpretation of a relevant provision which conflicts with the agency's earlier interpretation is entitled to considerably less deference than a consistently held agency view." (internal quotation marks omitted)).

In any event, even if the USDA had never addressed the matter, I would interpret the term unfair practices as not requiring competitive injury. I am persuaded by the Supreme Court's interpretation of the term unfair practices in the Federal Trade Commission Act (FTCA), the relationship between the PSA and that Act, and an early Supreme Court decision explaining the purpose of the PSA.

In Federal Trade Commission v. Sperry & Hutchinson Co., 405 U.S. 233, 92 S. Ct. 898, 31 L. Ed. 2d 170 (1972), the Supreme Court construed § 5(a)(6) of the FTCA, 15 U.S.C. § 45(a)(6), [56] which stated in pertinent part:

> The Commission is empowered and directed to prevent persons, partnerships, or corporations . . . from using unfair methods of competition in commerce and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in commerce.

[*1240] (amended and now recodified as 15 U.S.C. § 45(a)(2)). The Federal Trade Commission (FTC) had held that Sperry & Hutchinson (S&H) had violated the FTCA by attempting "to suppress the operation of trading stamp exchanges and other 'free and open' redemption of stamps." Sperry & Hutchinson, 405 U.S. at 234. S&H challenged the resulting cease-and-desist order, and the Fifth Circuit agreed, holding that the FTC could halt only conduct that "violated either the letter or the spirit of the antitrust laws." Id. at 235. Before the Supreme Court the FTC did not dispute that S&H's conduct violated neither the letter nor spirit of the antitrust laws; rather, it contended that its authority was not limited to such conduct. Id. at 239. The Court held that the FTCA "empower[s] the [FTC] to proscribe practices as unfair or deceptive in their effect upon consumers regardless of their nature or quality as competitive practices or their effect on competition." Id.

The prior [57] history of the Court's interpretations of § 5(a)(6) and Sperry & Hutchinson's comments on that history have, as we shall see, particular implications for interpreting the PSA. The original version of the FTCA, enacted in 1914, did not include the language empowering the FTC to prevent "unfair or deceptive acts or practices in commerce"; the Act provided power only to prevent "unfair methods of competition in commerce." Federal Trade Commission Act, Pub. L. No. 63-203, § 5, 38 Stat. 717, 719 (1914) (emphasis added). In 1920 (the year before enactment of the PSA) the Supreme Court, over the dissent of Justice Brandeis, one of the FTCA's drafters, adopted a limiting interpretation of "unfair methods of competition," restricting the covered practices to those "heretofore regarded as opposed to good morals because characterized by deception, bad faith, fraud or oppression, or as against public policy because of their dangerous tendency unduly to hinder competition or create monopoly." FTC v. Gratz, 253 U.S. 421, 427, 40 S. Ct. 572, 64 L. Ed. 993, 2 F.T.C. 564 (1920); see Sperry & Hutchinson, 405 U.S. at 241. Later, in Federal Trade Commission v. Raladam Co., 283 U.S. 643, 649, 51 S. Ct. 587, 75 L. Ed. 1324, 15 F.T.C. 598 (1931), the Court made clear that an unfair method must [58] be unfair to competitors. It said:

> [T]he word 'competition' imports the existence of present or potential competitors, and the unfair methods must be such as injuriously affect or tend thus to affect the business of these competitors--that is to say, the trader whose methods are assailed as unfair must have present or potential rivals in trade whose business will be, or is likely to be, lessened or otherwise injured.

Three years later, however, the Supreme Court changed course in Federal Trade Commission v. R.F. Keppel & Bro., Inc., 291 U.S. 304, 54 S. Ct. 423, 78 L. Ed. 814, 18 F.T.C. 684 (1934). As explained in Sperry & Hutchinson, 405 U.S. at 242-43, the Court in Keppel upheld an FTC cease-and-desist order against a candy marketing scheme on the ground that it "contravened public policy insofar as it tempted children to gamble and compelled those who would successfully compete with Keppel to abandon their scruples by similarly tempting children." The marketing scheme "was 'unfair,' though any competitor could maintain his position simply by adopting the challenged practice." Id. at 243. Sperry & Hutchinson concluded its summary of Keppel as follows: "Thenceforth, unfair competitive practices were not limited to those likely [59] to have anticompetitive consequences after the manner of the antitrust law; nor were unfair practices in commerce confined to purely competitive behavior." Id. at 244. The Court then noted that the Keppel decision's "perspective" of the [*1241] FTCA "was legislatively confirmed" in 1938 when Congress amended the Act by adding the phrase "unfair or deceptive acts or practices" to the original ban on "unfair methods of competition." Id. at 244 (internal quotation marks omitted). The Court thought that the language unfair or deceptive acts or practices clearly did not require anticompetitive conduct. See id.

To return to the PSA, the original 1921 language of § 202(a) made it unlawful to "Engage in or use any unfair, unjustly discriminatory, or deceptive practice or device in commerce." Pub. L. No. 67-51, § 202, 42 Stat. 161. The language "unfair . . . practice . . . in commerce" is the very language construed by Sperry & Hutchinson as not requiring an "effect on competition." 405 U.S. at 239. Moreover, the language is part of the same language in the 1938 amendments to the FTCA that Sperry & Hutchinson described as "confirm[ing]" the Keppel view that unfair practices under the FTCA were not "confined [60] to purely competitive behavior." Id. at 244.

Particularly noteworthy is that the language of PSA § 202(a) more clearly omits a competitive-effect requirement than does the FTCA language construed in Keppel. Section 202(a) does not include the phrase "restraining commerce" that appears in other subsections of § 202. See § 202(c) ("if such apportionment has the tendency or effect of restraining commerce"); § 202(d) (transferring or reviewing an article "for the purpose or with the effect of . . . restraining commerce"); § 202(e) (doing "any act for the purpose or with the effect of . . . restraining commerce"). And perhaps more striking, § 202(a) does not use the FTCA's language "unfair methods of competition" construed in Keppel. Perhaps this failure to adopt the language of the FTCA, enacted seven years earlier, was to avoid the narrow construction of the FTCA by the Supreme Court in Grata, decided shortly before enactment of the PSA.

Comparison of the PSA to the FTCA is sensible because the PSA is an offspring of the FTCA. In 1917 President Wilson ordered an FTC investigation of the food industry. See Davidson et al., supra, § 3.02, at 187. The FTC's report condemned the practices [61] of the meat-packing industry. See id. The five largest packers entered into a consent decree under the Sherman Act in 1920, but the PSA was enacted in 1921, presumably because the antitrust laws and the FTCA were deemed inadequate to the task of dealing with the problem. See id. at 187-88. In that light it would be somewhat surprising if "unfair practices" under the PSA had a narrower meaning than "unfair methods of competition" in the FTCA.

Supporting this view is the discussion of the recently enacted PSA in Stafford v. Wallace, 258 U.S. 495, 42 S. Ct. 397, 66 L. Ed. 735 (1922), which upheld the PSA's constitutionality. Some courts have relied on the Supreme Court's statement in that opinion that "[t]he chief evil feared is the monopoly of the packers." Id. at 514. But the purpose of the PSA was not just to end the packers' monopoly. The 1920 consent decree should have accomplished that task. The PSA's purpose was to end the sort of practices engaged in by the monopoly, practices that could certainly be characterized as unfair but could not easily be characterized as restricting competition. This point is made clear by quoting at length from Chief Justice Taft's opinion for the Court:

> The object to be secured by [62] the act is the free and unburdened flow of live stock from the ranges and farms of the West and the Southwest through the great stockyards and slaughtering centers on the borders of that region, and [*1242] thence in the form of meat products to the consuming cities of the country in the Middle West and East, or, still, as live stock, to the feeding places and fattening farms in the Middle West or East for further preparation for the market.
> The chief evil feared is the monopoly of the packers, enabling them unduly and arbitrarily to lower prices to the shipper who sells, and unduly and arbitrarily to increase the price to the consumer, who buys. Congress > thought that the power to maintain this monopoly was aided by control of the stockyards. Another evil which it sought to provide against by the act, was exorbitant charges, duplication of commissions, deceptive practices in respect of prices, in the passage of the live stock through the stockyards, all made possible by collusion between the stockyards management and the commission men, on the one hand, and the packers and dealers on the other. Expenses incurred in the passage through the stockyards necessarily reduce the price received by [63] the shipper, and increase the price to be paid by the consumer. If they be exorbitant or unreasonable, they are an undue burden on the commerce which the stockyards are intended to facilitate. Any unjust or deceptive practice or combination that unduly and directly enhances them is an unjust obstruction to that commerce. The shipper, whose live stock are being cared for and sold in the stockyards market is ordinarily not present at the sale, but is far away in the West. He is wholly dependent on the commission men. The packers and their agents and the dealers who are the buyers, are at the elbow of the commission men, and their relations are constant and close. The control that the packers have had in the stockyards by reason of ownership and constant use, the relation of landlord and tenant between the stockyards owner, on the one hand, and the commission men and the dealers on the other, the power of assignment of pens and other facilities by that owner to commission men and dealers, all create a situation full of opportunity and temptation to the prejudice of the absent shipper and owner in the neglect of the live stock, in the mala fides of the sale, in the exorbitant prices obtained, [64] in the unreasonableness of the charges for services rendered.

The scope of the PSA is further reflected in the accompanying House Report, which states:

> A careful study of the bill, will, I am sure, convince one that it, and existing laws, give the Secretary of Agriculture complete inquisitorial, visitorial, supervisory, and regulatory power over the packers, stockyards and all activities connected therewith; that it is a most comprehensive measure and extends farther than any previous law in the regulation of private business, in time of peace, except possibly the interstate commerce act.

H.R. Rep. No. 67-77, at 2 (1924).

It appears to me that the condemned practices described by Chief Justice Taft are of the same ilk as those that the majority opinion holds are covered by the PSA. Where I differ from the majority opinion in this regard is that I would not describe the injuries caused by those practices as competitive injuries. The majority opinion does not explain how the alleged practices hurt OK's competitors or even how they injure competition among the Growers. The alleged injuries may be caused by the existence of a monopoly. But it is unclear to me how the practices (such as unilaterally [65] decreasing production by delivering fewer chicks to growers) reduce competition among either growers or dealers. If competitive injury were required [*1243] by § 202(a), I would agree with the district court that the Growers had not presented sufficient evidence of such injury.

Turning to the specific allegations of this case, I depart from the majority opinion in that I would affirm the decision below because the Growers have not presented sufficient evidence to support their claims that the practices at issue on appeal are unfair. My reasons are essentially the same as the majority opinion's reasons for rejecting the Growers' unconscionability claims. The Growers are not existing producers who sought a market for their product and were confronted with OK's take-it-or-leave-it contracts. Rather, they entered into their businesses only after approaching OK and seeking approval to become its suppliers. The terms of the contract were known. The Growers made an informed decision to enter the industry. To the extent that the Growers claim that the contract misrepresents OK's actual practice, those are deceptive-practice claims; and it is my understanding that such claims are not before us. Perhaps [66] OK's exercise of its authority under the contract to reduce the number of birds placed with the Growers could be an unfair practice if it were the result of an effort by OK to drive up prices for its products. But the Growers' briefs on appeal do not allege that any reduction in placement has occurred.

DENYING Plaintiff Bamberg County Memorial Hospital's Motion to Determine that Bamberg is a "Direct Purchaser" Under Section 4 of the Clayton Act (Fld 6-4-07)

DENYING Defendants' Motion to Determine that Bamberg is a "Direct Purchaser" (Fld 7-2-07)

GRANTING Plaintiff Delaware Valley Surgical Supply Co., Inc.'s Motion for Partial Summary Judgment Related to Issue of Clayton Act Standing (Fld 7-2-07)

I. BACKGROUND

The instant motions arise out of actions brought against Ethicon Inc., Ethicon Endo Surgery, Inc., Johnson & Johnson Health Care Systems, Inc., and Johnson & Johnson (collectively, "the Endosurgical Defendants"), alleging antitrust violations in the sale of endosurgical products. Three separate actions were filed, brought by plaintiffs Delaware Valley Surgical Supply Company, Inc. ("Delaware"), Niagara Memorial Medical Center ("Niagara"), and Bamberg County Memorial Hospital and Nursing Center ("Bamberg"). Each original complaint proposed to represent a class of direct purchasers of endosurgical products. (Delaware [*2] Compl. ¶¶ 14, 20; Niagara Compl. ¶¶ 12, 22; Bamberg Compl. ¶¶ 12,22). By stipulation of the parties, the Court consolidated the three separate cases in its June 12, 2006 Consolidation Order.

Delaware and Niagara subsequently brought a motion to sever their actions from the one brought by Bamberg, claiming that an "irreconcilable conflict" existed because they were direct purchasers of endosurgical products but Bamberg had only purchased the relevant products indirectly. Delaware and Niagara asserted that, as an indirect purchaser, Bamberg lacked standing to bring federal antitrust claims for overcharge damages and no exception to the direct purchaser rule applied. Although the Court denied the motion to sever, it made no determination on the issue of Bamberg's standing to sue for federal antitrust damages.

Delaware now moves for partial summary judgment on the issue of Bamberg's standing to seek damages under Section 4 of the Clayton Act. Bamberg and the Endosurgical Defendants bring their own motions for summary judgment on the issue.[1]

II. LEGAL [*3] STANDARD

Summary judgment is appropriate only where the record, read in the light most favorable to the non-moving party, indicates that "there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and . . . the moving party is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c); see also Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 323-24, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986). Material facts are those necessary to the proof or defense of a claims, and are determined by reference to substantive law. Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 248, 106 S. Ct. 2505, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1986). A fact issue is genuine "if the evidence is such that a reasonable jury could return a verdict for the nonmoving party." (Id. at 248.) In deciding a motion for summary judgment, "[t]he evidence of the nonmovant is to be believed, and all justifiable inferences are to be drawn in his favor." (Id. at 255.)

The burden initially is on the moving party to demonstrate an absence of a genuine issue of material fact. Celotex, 477 U.S. at 323. If, and only if, the moving party meets its burden, then the non-moving party must produce enough evidence to rebut the moving party's claim and create a genuine issue of material fact. (See id. at 322-23.) If the non-moving party meets this burden, then the motion will be defied. Nissan Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Fritz Co., Inc., 210 F.3d 1099, 1103 (9th Cir. 2000).

Where the parties have made cross-motions for summary judgment, the Court must consider each motion on its own merits. Fair Hous. Council v. Riverside Two, 249 F.3d 1132, 1136 (9th Cir. 2001). The Court will [*4] consider each party's evidentiary showing, regardless of which motion the evidence was tendered under. See id. at 1137.

III. DISCUSSION

In Illinois Brick v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (1977), the Supreme Court held that, because a direct purchaser is allowed to recover the full overcharge under Hanover Shoe v. United Shoe Machinery, 392 U.S. 481, 88 S. Ct. 2224, 20 L. Ed. 2d 1231 (1968), indirect consume are generally precluded from receiving overcharge damages. Illinois Brick, 431 U.S. at 733-36. The Illinois Brick bar to recovering damages does not preclude an indirect purchaser's suit for an injunction. See, e.g., Campos v. Ticketmaster, 140 F.3d 1166, 1172 (8th Cir. 1998), cert. denied, 525 U.S. 1102, 119 S. Ct. 865, 142 L. Ed. 2d 768 (1999).

Bamberg does not purchase endosurgical supplies directly from the Endosurgical Defendants. Instead, Bamberg orders endosurgical supplies from a distributor, Owens & Minor ("O&M"), which maintains its own inventory of endosurgical supplies purchased from the Endosurgical Defendants. The price that Bamberg pays for those supplies is set, in part, by a contract negotiated on behalf of hospitals like Bamberg by Premier, a Group Purchasing Organization ("GPO"), with the Endosurgical Defendants.[2] Bamberg pays O&M the GPO contract price plus a percentage mark-up, which is separately negotiated with or established by O&M.

[1] Although styled as "motions to determine," the Court treats Bamberg's and the Endosurgical Defendants' motions as motions for partial summary judgment.

[2] At oral argument, counsel for the Endosurgical Defendants noted that Bamberg also had a contract directly with the Endosurgical [*5] Defendants which committed it to a specific pricing plan under the Premier GPO agreement.

In opposing the motion to sever, Bamberg contended that it falls within one or both of the two exceptions to the bar announced in Illinois Brick. First, Bamberg argued that it purchased the endosurgical products though a pre-existing fixed-markup contract. Second, Bamberg argued that the GPO through which it purchases the endosurgical products is owned and controlled by hospitals, including Bamberg, such that Bamberg is, in effect, a direct purchaser.

Bamberg now appears to concede that neither of the two exceptions applies. (See Bamberg's Opp'n at 14 ("[T]his case is not so much about the exceptions to Illinois Brick as about the definition of 'indirect purchaser' in light of modern systems of product distribution and the policies underlying Illinois Brick."); see also Endosurgical Defendants' Opp'n at 1 ("[Delaware] devotes most of its brief to arguing that Bamberg does not satisfy either of the Illinois Brick exceptions that allow indirect purchasers to bring overcharge claims. But that is not [the Endosurgical Defendants] argument. The issue to be decided here is whether Bamberg is a direct purchaser, [*6] not whether, as an indirect purchaser, it qualifies for standing under one of the exceptions articulated by the Supreme Court.").)

A. Pre-Existing Cost-Plus Contract

Under a pre-existing, cost-plus contract, the direct purchaser 's unit profit and volume are fixed. In the event of overcharge by the supplier, the direct purchaser suffers no injury because it passes on the increased cost to the indirect purchaser. In such a case, the indirect purchaser is allowed to recover the full overcharge from the upstream violator. Arizona v. Shamrock Foods Co., 729 F.2d 1208, 1213 (9th Cir. 1984) (recognizing the exception); Illinois v. Borg, 548 F.Supp. 972, 975 (N.D. Ill. 1982) ("What is significant is not the tyranny of labels—direct vs. indirect purchaser, cost-plus v. fixed-price contracts—but who has been directly damaged by the overcharge.").

Bamberg is not a party to any contract under which it is obligated to purchase a fixed volume of endosurgical products, regardless of price or demand. (Nelson Decl., Exh A at 9, RFA No. 17.) As the Supreme Court made clear in Kansas & Missouri v. Utilicorp United, 497 U.S. 199, 218, 110 S. Ct. 2807, 111 L. Ed. 2d 169 (1990), the exception requires that the contract specifies the quantity such that the alleged overcharges cannot affect the volume of products purchased. See also P. Areeda & H. Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law § 346e (2d ed. 2000). Since there was never [*7] a fixed-volume contract, whether it pre-dated the alleged antitrust behavior is a non-issue. Because there no such contract, the Court cannot "know what might have happened in the absence of an overcharge." Utilicorp, 497 U.S. at 218. Accordingly, the Court concludes that Bamberg does not have standing under the pre-existing cost-plus contract exception.

B. Ownership or Control of the Direct Purchaser

A second possible exception exists in cases where the direct purchaser is owned or controlled by the indirect purchaser. See Illinois Brick, 431 U.S. at 736 n.16. In such cases, the indirect and direct purchases are, in effect, a single entity that bears the entire overcharge. See Areeda & Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law § 346f. To fit within the exception, Bamberg must demonstrate a relationship between itself and the direct purchaser "involving such functional economic or other unity . . . that there effectively has been only one sale." Jewish Hospital Ass'n v. Stewart Mechanical Enters., Inc., 628 F.2d 971, 975 (6th Cir. 1980); see also Shamrock Foods, 729 F.2d at 1212 n.2 ("Courts analyzing this exception have held that it also applies where the direct purchaser is owned or controlled by its supplier." (citing cases)).

The distributors such as Delaware and O&M are not subsidiaries of the Endosurgical Defendants. Neither Bamberg nor the Endosurgical defendants present any evidence that [*8] the Endosurgical Defendants own or control the distributors through which Bamberg purchased endosurgical supplies. Similarly, Bamberg is not a subsidiary or corporate affiliate of O&M or other distributors. Neither Bamberg nor the Endosurgical defendants present any evidence that Bamberg owned or controlled the distributors through which it purchased endosurgical supplies. Accordingly, the Court concludes that Bamberg does not have standing under the ownership and control exception.

C. Alternative Theories.

Supreme Court jurisprudence makes clear that the Court intended to create a bright line in identifying the proper plaintiff when an antitrust violator sells through a multi-tiered distribution system. The rationales advanced by Bamberg and the Endosurgical Defendants may be reflective of conditions in a peculiar market, but they also cloud the analysis. An antitrust violator should only be required to pay once, and for the benefit of both the antitrust violator and the Court, the determination of the quantum of liability and the appropriate recipient should not be a labored. That is in full accord with Illinois Brick and its progeny.

The Court declines to look through, or ignore, O&M [*9] on the theory that it plays an economically irrelevant role in the distribution scheme. In theory, there is a demand curve for the bundle of goods and services which O&M sells. If the price of the goods is artificially inflated by the anti-competitive practices of the party from whom O&M purchases that portion of its offering, that will affect the attractiveness of its bundle in the market place. O&M can reduce its markup and keep volume, or it can forego volume by not responding. There is no reason to believe, and no evidence in the record to support a finding, that the market forces do not work on O&M and its offerings. The Court does not find, therefore, that the contract between the Endosurgical Defendants and Bamberg supersedes the market forces. See Illinois Brick, 431 U.S. at 736 & n.16. The fact that Bamberg may have a contract with the Endosurgical Defendants does not change the fact that O&M is the direct purchaser here.

The arguments for conferring direct purchaser status on the most economically efficient market participant or the most motivated market participant are attractive ones and philosophically interesting, but represent a diversion into amorphous, albeit fact-specific, inquiry. Part of the virtue [*10] of a bright-line test is to provide rules which can be easily applied. This is not a case where the Court should grapple with the complexities of a particular market place, lest there be no plaintiff to enforce the antitrust laws. Clearly, there are other motivated plaintiffs who unquestionably meet the standing requirements of Illinois Brick to serve the role of private attorney general contemplated by Section 4 of the Clayton Act. 15 U.S.C. § 15.

The Court acknowledges that other courts and commentators have reached a different conclusion in similar if not identical circumstances. E.g., In re Lorazepam & Clorazepate Antitrust Litigation, 202 F. Supp. 2d 12, 25 (D.DC. 2001); In re NASDAQ Market-Makers Antitrust Litigation, 169 F.R.D. 493, 501-02, 504-05 (S.D. N.Y. 1996); Areeda & Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law § 346j, at p. 377. The Court simply parts company with those authorities in the belief that the present result is truer to Illinois Brick.

IV. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, Delaware's motion for partial summary judgment is granted. Bamberg and the Endosurgical Defendants' motions for partial summary judgment are denied.

Resolution of the standing issue has some significant consequences. Accordingly, the Court would entertain an application to certify the question to the Ninth Circuit on an interlocutory appeal, 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b).

The object of all interpretation and construction of laws is to ascertain and effectuate the intention of the legislature. Minn. Stat. § 645.16 (2006). Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > General Overview

HN5[] Regulated Practices, Private Actions

Antitrust laws should be broadly construed to effectuate their purpose. The primary purpose of antitrust laws is to protect interbrand competition. The private causes of action created by Minnesota antitrust law reflect a clear legislative policy encouraging aggressive prosecution of statutory violations.

Civil Procedure > ... > Justiciability > Standing > General Overview

HN6[] Justiciability, Standing

Standing is a legal requirement that a party have a sufficient stake in a justiciable controversy to seek relief from a court. The primary goal of the standing requirement is to ensure that the factual and legal issues before the courts will be vigorously and adequately presented. Standing is acquired in two ways: either the plaintiff has suffered some injury-in-fact or the plaintiff is the beneficiary of some legislative enactment granting standing. An injury-in-fact is a concrete and particularized invasion of a legally protected interest.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Clayton Act

HN7[] Standing, Clayton Act

Federal antitrust law does not provide a remedy for every injury flowing from an antitrust violation. Standing under federal antitrust law, rather, has prudential limits based on remoteness of injury and complexity of proof. An antitrust violation may be expected to cause ripples of harm to flow through the Nation's economy; but despite the broad wording of § 4, 15 U.S.C.S. § 15, of the Clayton Act, there is a point beyond which the wrongdoer should not be held liable. It is reasonable to assume that Congress did not intend to allow every person tangentially affected by an antitrust violation to maintain an action to recover threefold damages for the injury to his business or property.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Clayton Act

HN8[] Standing, Clayton Act

An antitrust defendant can not argue that a plaintiff was not injured because the plaintiff had "passed on" any illegal overcharges to downstream consumers.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Clayton Act

HN9[] Standing, Clayton Act

An indirect purchaser of price-fixed goods is not a party injured in his business or property within the meaning of § 4, 15 U.S.C.S. § 15, of the Clayton Act.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Clayton Act

HN10[] Standing, Clayton Act

With respect to federal antitrust standing, federal case law undertakes to evaluate the plaintiff's harm, the alleged wrongdoing by the defendants, and the relationship between them. The factors addressed by the case law include: (1) whether the plaintiff is a consumer or competitor in the allegedly restrained market; (2) whether the injury alleged is direct or indirect; (3) whether there are more directly injured plaintiffs with motivation to sue; (4) whether the damages claims are speculative; and (5) whether the plaintiff's claims risk duplicative recoveries and would require a complex apportionment of damages. Case law counsels against across-the-board rules, suggesting that courts should analyze each situation in light of the factors set forth in the case law.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Trade Practices & Unfair Competition > State Regulation > General Overview

HN11[] Trade Practices & Unfair Competition, State Regulation

Minnesota antitrust law is generally interpreted consistently with federal antitrust law. As the purposes of Minnesota and federal antitrust law are the same, it is sensible to interpret them consistently. Minnesota is not required, however, to abide by federal antitrust standing limitations. The desire for harmony between federal and state antitrust law relates more to prohibited conduct than to who can bring a lawsuit. The purpose behind both state and federal antitrust law is to apply a uniform standard of conduct so that businesses will know what is acceptable conduct, but to achieve this uniformity or predictability, Minnesota courts are not required to define who may sue in the state courts in the same way federal courts have defined who may maintain an action in federal court.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Requirements

HN12[] Standing, Requirements

In 1984, the Minnesota Legislature added the words "directly or indirectly" to Minn. Stat. § 325D.57 (2006) to make clear that, contrary to federal case law, Minnesota antitrust law permits indirect purchasers to recover.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Clayton Act

HN13[] Standing, Clayton Act

None of the factors identified by the United States Supreme Court in Associated General Contractors of California, Inc. v. California State Council of Carpenters was intended to be determinative, even under the more restrictive boundaries of federal antitrust standing.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Requirements

HN14[] Standing, Requirements

Even viewed as guideposts rather than requirements, the factors established by the United States Supreme Court for determining federal antitrust standing are not harmonious with Minnesota's antitrust law.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > General Overview

HN15[] Regulated Practices, Private Actions

Minn. Stat. § 325D.57 (2006) allows a court to take any steps necessary to avoid duplicative recovery against a defendant in a subsequent action arising from the same conduct. To the extent that Minnesota courts cannot ameliorate the risk of duplicative recovery, as where parallel proceedings in federal courts or courts in other states may result in later awards based on the same injuries, this risk is inherent in the dual system of private antitrust enforcement created by federal case law. While this risk is a legitimate and important consideration, it is not a risk that the Supreme Court of Minnesota may remedy by restricting Minnesota antitrust law in ways that the Minnesota Legislature has not.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Requirements

HN16[] Standing, Requirements

Federal case law does not make a plaintiff's status as a consumer or competitor in the restrained market a sine qua non of antitrust standing. Rather, federal case law uses that status as a tool to compare the plaintiff's alleged injury to the goals of antitrust law. While Minnesota courts should analyze an alleged injury's relation to the goals of antitrust law by identifying the markets involved, the market analysis is not the focus of the standing inquiry.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Requirements

HN17[] Standing, Requirements

The federal case law factor that looks at whether the damages claims are speculative is relevant to standing under the Minnesota antitrust law.

Governments > Courts > Judicial Precedent

HN18[] Courts, Judicial Precedent

The Supreme Court of Minnesota will often look to case law from other states for guidance when its own jurisprudence is undefined.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Requirements

HN19[] Standing, Requirements

The Supreme Court of Minnesota believes that application of the federal antitrust standing factors in Minnesota would contravene the plain language of Minn. Stat. § 325D.57 (2006) and in some cases thwart the intent of the legislature by barring indirect purchaser suits for the reasons articulated in federal case law.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Requirements

HN20[] Standing, Requirements

Case law from the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, whatever its precedential value to the Supreme Court of Minnesota, cannot be read to foreclose antitrust claims in Minnesota by indirect purchasers of goods manufactured with price-fixed components.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Requirements

HN21[] Standing, Requirements

Analysis of the markets involved in an antitrust claim helps assess the relation of the alleged injury to the goals of antitrust law, but the lack of a principled way to define the market restrained by the antitrust violation means that this analysis alone cannot determine whether a plaintiff has antitrust standing under Minnesota law.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Requirements

HN22[] Standing, Requirements

Any person injured by an antitrust violation may sue under Minnesota's antitrust law. Minn. Stat. § 325D.57 (2006). The Supreme Court of Minnesota has recognized and applied the broad effect of the words "any person."

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Requirements

HN23[] Standing, Requirements

In spite of the apparently limitless language of Minn. Stat. § 325D.57 (2006), there are injuries so remotely related to antitrust violations that courts simply cannot provide relief. Standing under Minnesota antitrust law must be defined by some prudential limits informed by foreseeability, proximate cause, remoteness, and relation of the injury to the purposes of the antitrust law.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Requirements

HN24[] Standing, Requirements

Whatever the precise prudential limits on Minnesota antitrust standing, the Supreme Court of Minnesota does not believe that the legislature intended to create consumer standing by allowing every person in the state to sue for an antitrust violation simply by virtue of his or her status as a consumer.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

HN25[] Regulated Practices, Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade

Antitrust laws, federal and state, provide a remedy for consumers who have purchased goods manufactured with price-fixed components.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

HN26[] Regulated Practices, Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade

An antitrust injury occurs when a purchaser is overcharged as a result of anticompetitive conduct, not when she physically acquires a price-fixed good. An antitrust violator should not escape liability simply because, by happy accident, its price-fixed goods are consumed in the manufacturing process.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > State Regulation

Evidence > Burdens of Proof > Allocation

HN27[] Private Actions, State Regulation

The antitrust plaintiffs bear the burden of proving the damages caused by a defendant's wrongful conduct. If the plaintiffs cannot present admissible and convincing proof, they cannot recover.

Opinion

ANDERSON, G. BARRY, Justice.

Plaintiff, a consumer, brought a class action lawsuit under Minnesota antitrust law alleging that she paid more for tires as a result of defendants' conspiracy to fix the prices of rubber-processing chemicals. The district court granted defendants' motion to dismiss on the pleadings for lack of standing, and the court of appeals affirmed. We reverse and hold that the plaintiff has standing to sue under Minn. Stat. § 325D.57 (2006).

In this antitrust class action, Plaintiff Diane Lorix alleges that defendants Crompton Corporation, Uniroyal Chemical Company, Inc., Uniroyal Chemical Company, Limited, Flexsys NV, Flexsys America LP, Bayer AG, Bayer Corporation, Rhein Chemie Rheinau GmbH, and Rhein Chemie Corporation (collectively "Crompton"), [2] manufacturers of rubber-processing chemicals, agreed to fix the prices of chemicals sold to tire manufacturers. Price fixing is a violation of Minnesota antitrust law. Minn. Stat. § 325D.53, subd. 1(1)(a) (2006). Lorix alleges that she, along with the rest of the putative class, purchased tires manufactured using the price-fixed chemicals and that she paid more for the tires than she would have in the absence of the anticompetitive agreement. Lorix's complaint asserts that she purchased tires "manufactured using rubber processing materials sold by Defendants." Lorix stated at oral argument that she does not know whether the chemicals are present in the tires she purchased or were consumed in the manufacturing [*623] process, and that discovery would provide an answer to that question.

This lawsuit is one of several filed in state courts across the country against manufacturers of rubber-processing chemicals, sparked by government investigations into price fixing in Europe and the United States. Some of the defendants pleaded guilty in criminal cases and paid criminal fines. See Moniz v. Bayer Corp., 484 F. Supp. 2d 228, 229 (D. Mass. 2007); *Crouch v. Crompton Corp., Nos. 02 CVS 4375, 03 CVS 2514, 2004 NCBC 7, 2004 NCBC LEXIS 6, 2004 WL 2414027, at 20 (N.C. Super. Oct. 28, 2004). [3] Direct purchasers of rubber processing chemicals have also filed a nationwide class action suit against manufacturers of rubber-processing chemicals. See In re Rubber Chems. Antitrust Litig., 232 F.R.D. 346, 355 (N.D. Cal. 2005) (granting plaintiffs' motion for class certification).

In this case, the district court applied the factors in Associated General Contractors of California, Inc. v. California State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 103 S. Ct. 897, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723 (1983) (hereinafter "AGC"), and granted Crompton's motion to dismiss on the pleadings, concluding that to sue in antitrust in Minnesota, a plaintiff must be "either a consumer or a customer in the particular industry and there must be neither speculative damages nor risk of duplicative recoveries." The court of appeals affirmed, holding that Minnesota antitrust law requires that an antitrust plaintiff "be a participant or competitor in the market restrained by the alleged antitrust violation." Lorix v. Crompton Corp., 720 N.W.2d 15, 19 (Minn. App. 2006). Noting that Lorix did not allege that she purchased the chemicals manufactured by the defendants, the court held that she lacked standing. Id at 18-19. [4] We granted Lorix's petition for review.

I.

Lorix argues that the plain language of Minn. Stat. § 325D.57 affords her standing. The statute provides:

> HN1[] Any person * * * injured directly or indirectly by a violation of sections 325D.49 to 325D.66, shall recover three times the actual damages sustained, together with costs and disbursements, including reasonable attorneys' fees. In any subsequent action arising from the same conduct, the court may take any steps necessary to avoid duplicative recovery against a defendant.

Crompton argues that, despite the broad language of section 325D.57, antitrust standing has well-established boundaries, and that one such boundary prevents suit by a plaintiff who never purchased the product that was the subject of the alleged price fixing. Crompton argues that "any person" cannot be read literally and that the "direct or indirect" language only removes federal antitrust law's per se bar to indirect purchaser suits. According to Crompton, the district court and court of appeals correctly applied "common-sense principles of remoteness and proximate cause."

HN2[] We review an appeal from a dismissal on the pleadings de novo. See Barton v. Moore, 558 N.W.2d 746, 749 (Minn. 1997). [5] HN3[] When considering a motion for judgment on the pleadings, the court must accept the allegations contained in the pleading under attack as true, and assumptions made and inferences drawn must favor the non-moving party. State ex rel. City of Minneapolis v. Minneapolis St. Ry. Co., 238 Minn. 218, 223, 56 N.W.2d 564, 567 (Minn. 1952). It is immaterial at the pleadings stage whether the plaintiff can prove the facts alleged. Martens v. Minn. Mining & Mfg. Co., 616 N.W.2d 732, 739 (2000). HN4[] "The object of all interpretation and construction of laws is to [*624] ascertain and effectuate the intention of the legislature." Minn. Stat. § 645.16 (2006). "When the words of a law in their application to an existing situation are clear and free from all ambiguity, the letter of the law shall not be disregarded under the pretext of pursuing the spirit." Id.

HN5[] Antitrust laws should be broadly construed to effectuate their purpose. Minnesota-Iowa Television Co. v. Watonwan T.V. Imp. Ass'n, 294 N.W.2d 297, 305 (Minn. 1980). The primary purpose of antitrust laws is to protect interbrand competition. State Oil Co. v. Khan, 522 U.S. 3, 14, 118 S. Ct. 275, 139 L. Ed. 2d 199 (1997). The private causes of action created by Minnesota antitrust law "reflect [6] a clear legislative policy encouraging aggressive prosecution of statutory violations." State by Humphrey v. Philip Morris Inc., 551 N.W.2d 490, 495 (Minn. 1996).

HN6[] Standing is a legal requirement that a party have a sufficient stake in a justiciable controversy to seek relief from a court. Sierra Club v. Morton, 405 U.S. 727, 731-32, 92 S. Ct. 1361, 31 L. Ed. 2d 636 (1972). The primary goal of the standing requirement is to ensure that the factual and legal issues before the courts will be vigorously and adequately presented. Channel 10, Inc. v. Ind. Sch. Dist. No. 709, St. Louis County, 298 Minn. 306, 314, 215 N.W.2d 814, 821 (1974). Standing is acquired in two ways: either the plaintiff has suffered some "injury-in-fact" or the plaintiff is the beneficiary of some legislative enactment granting standing. Philip Morris Inc., 551 N.W.2d at 493; Snyder's Drug Stores, Inc. v. Minn. State Bd. of Pharmacy, 301 Minn. 28, 31-32, 221 N.W.2d 162, 165 (1974). An injury-in-fact is a concrete and particularized invasion of a legally protected interest. Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560, 112 S. Ct. 2130, 119 L. Ed. 2d 351 (1992).

To determine whether Lorix has standing, we first review several key points of federal and Minnesota antitrust law, including [7] the Supreme Court's decisions in Hanover Shoe, Inc. v. United Shoe Machinery Corp., 392 U.S. 481, 88 S. Ct. 2224, 20 L. Ed. 2d 1231 (1968), Illinois Brick Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (1977), and AGC; the 1984 amendment to Minn. Stat. § 325D.57; and our own decision in Philip Morris Inc.

A. Federal Antitrust Law

HN7[] Federal antitrust law does not provide a remedy for every injury flowing from an antitrust violation. Standing under federal antitrust law, rather, has prudential limits based on remoteness of injury and complexity of proof. "'An antitrust violation may be expected to cause ripples of harm to flow through the Nation's economy; but 'despite the broad wording of § 4 there is a point beyond which the wrongdoer should not be held liable.'" AGC, 459 U.S. at 534 (quoting Blue Shield of Va. v. McCready, 457 U.S. 465, 476-77, 102 S. Ct. 2540, 73 L. Ed. 2d 149 (1982)). "'It is reasonable to assume that Congress did not intend to allow every person tangentially affected by an antitrust violation to maintain an action to recover threefold damages for the injury to his business or property.'" Id. at 535 (quoting Blue Shield, 457 U.S. at 477). The Supreme Court explored the scope of federal antitrust law injury and standing in Hanover Shoe, Illinois Brick, [8] and AGC.

In Hanover Shoe, the Court held that HN8[] an antitrust defendant could not argue that a plaintiff was not injured because the plaintiff had "passed on" any illegal overcharges to downstream consumers. 392 U.S. at 491-92. The case involved a treble damages action by a shoe [*625] manufacturer against a manufacturer of shoe machinery. Id. at 483. The Court rejected the defendant's pass-on defense as a matter of law (with limited exceptions not relevant here) for two reasons. Id. at 492-94. First, the defense would burden courts with attempts to trace the effects of an overcharge through the entire chain of purchase and apportion the damages among direct and indirect purchasers. Id. at 492-93. Second, direct purchasers are better situated to sue for antitrust violations, because any individual indirect purchaser would have an insufficient stake in the lawsuit to prompt her to pursue relief. Id. at 494.

In Illinois Brick, the Court held that HN9[] an indirect purchaser of price-fixed goods was not a party "injured in his business or property" within the meaning of section 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 15 (2000). 431 U.S. at 728-29. The plaintiffs, various state and local government entities, [9] alleged a price-fixing conspiracy among manufacturers of concrete blocks. 431 U.S. at 726. The plaintiffs did not purchase concrete blocks directly, but did purchase buildings made with the blocks. Id. The plaintiffs alleged that overcharges from the manufacturers were passed to them through masonry contractors and general contractors. Id. at 726-27. The Court refused to recognize this "offensive pass-on" theory for two policy reasons. Id. at 730. First, "allowing offensive but not defensive use of pass-on would create a serious risk of multiple liability for defendants" because a direct purchaser could recover an overcharge that had been passed on to an indirect purchaser, who could also recover it. Id. Second, the "evidentiary complexities and uncertainties" that precluded a pass-on defense in Hanover Shoe were "multiplied in the offensive use of pass-on by a plaintiff several steps removed from the defendant in the chain of distribution." Illinois Brick, 431 U.S. at 732. Faced with the choice of overturning Hanover Shoe or barring federal indirect purchaser suits, the Court chose the latter. Illinois Brick, 431 U.S. at 736-37. The Court noted that "the question of which persons [10] have been injured by an illegal overcharge for purposes of § 4 is analytically distinct from the question of which persons have sustained injuries too remote to give them standing to sue for damages under § 4." Id. at 728, n.7. Illinois Brick thus did not address federal antitrust standing. Id.

Justice Brennan, joined by Justices Marshall and Blackmun, dissented in Illinois Brick. Id. at 748. Justice Brennan argued that the majority's bar to indirect purchaser suits "flouts Congress' purpose and severely undermines the effectiveness of the private treble-damages action as an instrument of antitrust enforcement" by precluding injured consumers from recovering damages while leaving middlemen, who may pass on any illegal overcharges, with little incentive to sue. Id. at 749 (Brennan, J., dissenting). Conceding that "despite the broad wording of § 4 there is a point beyond which the wrongdoer should not be held liable," Justice Brennan concluded that "if the broad language of § 4 means anything, surely it must render the defendant liable to those within the defendant's chain of distribution. It would indeed be 'paradoxical to deny recover[y] to the ultimate consumer while permitting the [11] middlemen a windfall recovery.'" Id. at 760-61 (Brennan, J., dissenting) (quoting P. Areeda, Antitrust Analysis: Problems, Text, Cases 75 (2d ed. 1974)).

The Supreme Court provided its most comprehensive statement on federal antitrust standing in AGC. The Court held [*626] that a labor union lacked standing to sue a contractors' association under the Sherman Act for an alleged conspiracy to restrain the union's business activities. AGC, 459 U.S. at 520-21. The Court noted that when Congress enacted the Sherman Act, it intended established common-law limits on liability to shape the scope of antitrust liability. AGC, 459 U.S. at 532. HN10[] The AGC Court, accordingly, undertook to "evaluate the plaintiff's harm, the alleged wrongdoing by the defendants, and the relationship between them." Id. at 535. The factors addressed by the Court included: (1) whether the plaintiff is a consumer or competitor in the allegedly restrained market; (2) whether the injury alleged is direct or indirect; (3) whether there are more directly injured plaintiffs with motivation to sue; (4) whether the damages claims are speculative; and (5) whether the plaintiff's claims risk duplicative recoveries and would require a complex [12] apportionment of damages. [1] Id. at 538-45. The Court counseled against across-the-board rules, suggesting that courts should "analyze each situation in light of the factors set forth" in the opinion. Id. at 536 n.33. Applying all the factors, the Court concluded that the labor union had not suffered an injury compensable under federal antitrust law. Id. at 545. Many state courts, including a Minnesota state district court, have since applied the AGC factors to determine if an antitrust plaintiff has standing. See, e.g., *Gutzwiller v. Visa U.S.A., Inc., No. C4-04-58, 2004 WL 2114991, at 5-6 (Minn. Dist. Ct. Sept. 15, 2004).

[1] The Court's wide-ranging discussion did not include a comprehensive list of the factors relied on, but courts and commentators have generally recognized these five. See, e.g., Am. Ad Mgmt., Inc. v. Gen. Tel. Co., 190 F.3d 1051, 1054-55 (9th Cir. 1999); see also, e.g., McCarthy v. Recordex Serv., Inc., 80 F.3d 842, 850 (3d Cir. 1996) (identifying different factors).

B. Minnesota Antitrust Law

HN11[] Minnesota antitrust law is generally interpreted consistently with federal antitrust law. Minn. Twins P'ship v. State by Hatch, 592 N.W.2d 847, 851 (Minn. 1999). As the purposes [13] of Minnesota and federal antitrust law are the same, it is sensible to interpret them consistently. Minnesota is not required, however, to abide by federal antitrust standing limitations. See Snyder's Drug Stores, 301 Minn. at 31-32, 221 N.W.2d at 165. The desire for harmony between federal and state antitrust law relates more to prohibited conduct than to who can bring a lawsuit. "'The purpose behind both state and federal antitrust law is to apply a uniform standard of conduct so that businesses will know what is acceptable conduct,'" but "'to achieve this uniformity or predictability, we are not required to define who may sue in our state courts in the same way federal courts have defined who may maintain an action in federal court.'" Bunkers Glass Co. v. Pilkington, PLC, 75 P.3d 99, 106, 206 Ariz. 9 (Ariz. 2003) (quoting Comes v. Microsoft Corp., 646 N.W.2d 440, 446 (Iowa 2002)); see Comes, 646 N.W.2d at 446 (noting that the purpose of Iowa's antitrust harmonization statute was to "achieve uniform application of the state and federal laws prohibiting monopolistic practices," not to define who can sue under state antitrust law); see also 13A Charles Alan Wright, Arthur R. Miller & Edward H. [14] Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 3531.14 (2d ed. 1984) ("Federal courts have stated that state law of standing should be applied as to state rights * * *.").

HN12[] In 1984, our legislature added the words "directly or indirectly" to Minn. Stat. § 325D.57 to make clear that, contrary to [*627] Illinois Brick, Minnesota antitrust law permits indirect purchasers to recover. Philip Morris Inc., 551 N.W.2d at 497; Hearing on Sen. F. 1807, Sen. Jud. Comm., 73rd Minn. Leg., Mar. 19, 1984 (minutes) (Statement of Steve Kilgriff, Assistant Attorney Gen.) ("All we're saying is that under Minnesota law we recognize that indirect purchasers should have his or her [sic] rights to determine damages as well as the direct purchaser."). Minnesota is one of 25 states to enact such "Illinois Brick repealer" statutes. Daniel R. Karon, "Your Honor, Tear Down that Illinois Brick Wall!" The National Movement Toward Indirect Purchaser Antitrust Standing and Consumer Justice, 30 Wm. Mitchell L. Rev. 1351, 1361 (2004). Eight other "non-repealer" states permit indirect purchasers to sue under state consumer protection statutes or under judicial construction of state antitrust acts. Id. Altogether, 33 states and the [15] District of Columbia allow claims by indirect purchasers. Id.

This court's only substantive discussion of antitrust standing since the 1984 amendment to section 325D.57 occurred in Philip Morris Inc., where we noted that Minnesota antitrust law contains an "expansive grant of standing" designed to protect Minnesota citizens from "sharp commercial practices." 551 N.W.2d at 496-97. We held that Blue Cross, a nonprofit health services organization, had standing to sue tobacco companies under Minnesota antitrust law for increased health care costs due to the tobacco companies' conspiracy to suppress research on the deleterious effects of smoking and to manipulate nicotine levels in cigarettes in order to induce addiction in smokers. Id. at 491-92. We based our holding on the plain language of section 325D.57, stating that "[i]t is clear that this expansive grant of standing reaches the injuries suffered by Blue Cross." Philip Morris Inc., 551 N.W.2d at 496.

II.

The district court and court of appeals relied on AGC and other federal case law to hold that an antitrust plaintiff must be a consumer or competitor in the market restrained by the antitrust violation. We conclude that both courts [16] misinterpreted Minnesota antitrust law and that the AGC factors do not provide the benchmark for antitrust standing in Minnesota.

A. AGC

The district court correctly recognized that AGC factors (2) (whether the injury alleged is direct or indirect) and (3) (whether there are more directly injured plaintiffs with motivation to sue) cannot apply in Minnesota because indirect purchasers are explicitly vested with a cause of action under Minn. Stat. § 325D.57. The district court's application of AGC factors (1) (whether the plaintiff is a consumer or competitor in the allegedly restrained market) and (5) (whether the plaintiff's claims risk duplicative recoveries and would require a complex apportionment of damages), however, was misplaced. For one thing, HN13[] none of the AGC factors was intended to be determinative, even under the more restrictive boundaries of federal antitrust standing. The district court, nevertheless, turned AGC factors (1) and (5) into absolute requirements for standing under Minnesota antitrust law by stating that an antitrust plaintiff must be "either a consumer or a customer in the particular industry and there must be neither speculative damages nor risk of duplicative [17] recoveries." The rule espoused by the district court is contrary to the Supreme Court's acknowledgement that "'it is simply not possible to fashion an across-the-board and easily applied standing rule which can serve as a tool of decision for every case,'" AGC, 459 U.S. at 536 n.33 [*628] (quoting Sherman, Antitrust Standing: From Loeb to Malamud, 51 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 374, 407 (1976), and makes Minnesota antitrust standing more restrictive than federal antitrust standing, in contravention of the 1984 amendment to Minn. Stat. § 325D.57.

HN14[] Even viewed as guideposts rather than requirements, the AGC factors are not harmonious with our antitrust law. For example the first part of AGC factor (5) (complexity of apportionment and risk of duplicative recoveries) was at the heart of Illinois Brick's bar to indirect purchaser suits. Illinois Brick explained that an indirect purchaser suit is, by nature, complicated and uncertain: "[t]he demonstration of how much of the overcharge was passed on by the first purchaser must be repeated at each point at which the price-fixed goods changed hands before they reached the plaintiff." 431 U.S. at 732-33. By expressly permitting indirect purchaser suits, our legislature [18] has rejected the notion that Minnesota courts are not to be burdened with the complex apportionment inherent in those suits.

With regard to the risk of duplicative recoveries under AGC factor (5), HN15[] section 325D.57 allows a court to "take any steps necessary to avoid duplicative recovery against a defendant" in a subsequent action arising from the same conduct. To the extent that our courts cannot ameliorate the risk of duplicative recovery, as where parallel proceedings in federal courts or courts in other states may result in later awards based on the same injuries, this risk is inherent in the dual system of private antitrust enforcement created by Illinois Brick and California v. ARC America Corp., 490 U.S. 93, 101, 109 S. Ct. 1661, 104 L. Ed. 2d 86 (1989) (holding that federal antitrust law's bar to indirect purchaser suits does not preempt state courts from entertaining such suits). See Report of the Indirect Purchaser Task Force, 63 Antitrust L.J. 993, 994 (Spring 1995) (concluding that the current system of antitrust enforcement creates the risk that the full amount of an anticompetitive overcharge, trebled, will be recovered by direct purchasers under federal law and indirect purchasers at every successive stage [19] of distribution under state law). While this risk is a legitimate and important consideration, it is not a risk that our court may remedy by restricting Minnesota antitrust law in ways that our legislature has not.

As for AGC factor (1), the AGC Court noted that the plaintiff labor union was "neither a consumer nor a competitor in the market in which trade was restrained" only to highlight that the union may have suffered no injury at all-because it was not clear "whether the Union's interests would be served or disserved by enhanced competition in the market," 459 U.S. at 539-and to highlight that any injury suffered was not related to the Sherman Act's "central interest in protecting the economic freedom of participants in the relevant market." Id. at 538. HN16[] AGC did not make a plaintiff's status as a consumer or competitor in the restrained market a sine qua non of antitrust standing. Rather, AGC [20] used that status as a tool to compare the plaintiff's alleged injury to the goals of antitrust law. While Minnesota courts should analyze an alleged injury's relation to the goals of antitrust law by identifying the markets involved, the market analysis is not the focus of the standing inquiry.

HN17[] AGC factor (4), whether the damages claims are speculative, is relevant to standing under the Minnesota antitrust law. As we explain below, we conclude that at this stage of litigation Lorix's damage claims are not so speculative as to place her outside the protection of Minnesota antitrust law.

[*629] It is true, as Crompton notes, that "the question of which persons have been injured by an illegal overcharge * * * is analytically distinct from the question of which persons have sustained injuries too remote to give them standing" and that Illinois Brick addressed the scope of antitrust injury, not standing, under the Clayton Act. Illinois Brick, 431 U.S. at 728 n.7. Crompton urges, therefore, that the 1984 amendment to Minn. Stat. § 325D.57, as a response to Illinois Brick, has no effect on our standing analysis and that we must apply AGC. We do not agree. AGC was informed by Illinois Brick and repeated, [21] as antitrust standing guidelines, Illinois Brick's reservations about indirect purchaser suits. "In Illinois Brick * * * we held that treble damages could not be recovered by indirect purchasers * * * . The same concerns should guide us in determining whether the Union is a proper plaintiff under § 4 of the Clayton Act." AGC, 459 U.S. at 544 (emphasis added). We do not believe that the legislature repudiated Illinois Brick and invited indirect purchaser suits only for courts to dismiss those suits on the pleadings based on the very concerns that motivated Illinois Brick.

We recognize that some state courts have applied the AGC factors to state antitrust claims. See, e.g., Kanne v. Visa U.S.A., Inc., 272 Neb. 489, 723 N.W.2d 293, 297-301 (Neb. 2006) (holding that the Nebraska Antitrust Act required the court to follow federal courts' construction of the Clayton Act); *Fucile v. Visa U.S.A., Inc., No. 51560-03 CNC, 2004 WL 3030037, at 2 (Vt. Super. Ct. Dec. 27, 2004) (applying AGC factors). Other courts do not apply the AGC factors. See, e.g., Moniz, 484 F. Supp. 2d at 231 (denying defendants' motion to dismiss in a state indirect purchasers class action and stating that defendants' reliance on AGC [22] was inapposite). HN18[] We will often look to case law from other states for guidance when our own jurisprudence is undefined. Gordon v. Microsoft Corp., 645 N.W.2d 393, 402 n.9 (Minn. 2002). But we conclude that our jurisprudence in this area is sufficient and, with due respect to courts that have chosen to apply AGC, HN19[] we believe application of the AGC factors in Minnesota would contravene the plain language of the statute and in some cases thwart the intent of the legislature by barring indirect purchaser suits for the reasons articulated in Illinois Brick.

B. Market participant requirement

In upholding the district court, the court of appeals did not rely on the AGC factors but stated that "[f]ederal courts have consistently held that an antitrust plaintiff must be a consumer or competitor in the market restrained by alleged antitrust violations." Lorix, 720 N.W.2d at 18. The two federal appellate decisions cited by the court of appeals do not compel us to impose a market-participant requirement. The court of appeals quoted Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 489, 97 S. Ct. 690, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977), for the proposition that to recover, a plaintiff must suffer "an injury of the type the antitrust [23] laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful." Lorix, 720 N.W.2d at 18-19. It does not follow from this proposition that Minnesota antitrust law provides a remedy only to participants in the immediately restrained market, and Brunswick itself mentioned no such restriction. The court of appeals also cited S.D. Collectibles, Inc. v. Plough, Inc., 952 F.2d 211 (8th Cir. 1991). Lorix, 720 N.W.2d at 19. In S.D. Collectibles, Collectibles was the sole representative in a five-state territory for the manufacturer of Zinca, a zinc oxide sun care product. 952 F.2d at 212. When Plough obtained the [*630] exclusive right to market Zinca in the territory and Collectibles' agreement was terminated, Collectibles sued Plough, alleging antitrust injury. Id. at 212-13. The court noted that "[t]he antitrust laws were designed to protect competition and therefore standing is generally limited to actual market participants," id. at 213, and held that Collectibles lacked standing because it was neither a consumer of Zinca nor a competitor of Plough, id. at 214. Collectibles did not enjoy antitrust protection because it was not a consumer of any product related to [24] the antitrust violation. HN20[] S.D. Collectibles, whatever its precedential value to this court, cannot be read to foreclose antitrust claims in Minnesota by indirect purchasers of goods manufactured with price-fixed components.

Our decision in Philip Morris Inc. further counsels against a rigid market-participant requirement. In Philip Morris Inc., tobacco companies conspired to "suppress research on the deleterious effects of smoking," 551 N.W.2d at 492, and we held with little discussion that Blue Cross had standing to sue in antitrust based on the increased amounts it paid for healthcare, id. at 496. But Blue Cross was a participant in neither the cigarette market (the market in which the tobacco companies participated) nor the healthcare research market (the market restrained by the conspiracy). It is no answer to assert, as Crompton does, that Blue Cross participated in, and the tobacco companies manipulated, the "healthcare market." The patient services market, in which Blue Cross participated, is distinct from the healthcare research market, which the tobacco companies manipulated. [2] Applying Crompton's expansive method of defining markets, we might find standing by noting that Lorix [25] was injured in the "market for rubber-related products," the same market in which Crompton fixed prices. HN21[] Analysis of the markets

[2] The complaint in Philip Morris Inc. alleged, inter alia, that tobacco companies restrained and suppressed research on the harmful effects of smoking and restrained and suppressed the dissemination of information on the harmful effects of smoking. 551 N.W.2d at 492. It did not allege that the tobacco companies interfered with or manipulated delivery of patient care.

involved in an antitrust claim helps assess the relation of the alleged injury to the goals of antitrust law, but the lack of a principled way to define the "market restrained by the antitrust violation" means that this analysis alone cannot determine whether a plaintiff has antitrust standing.

III.

The fact that the district court and court of appeals erred in applying AGC and imposing a market-participant requirement does not necessarily mean that Lorix has standing. The real difficulty lies in defining the outer limits of indirect purchaser standing in Minnesota. HN22[] "Any person" injured by an antitrust violation may sue under our antitrust law. Minn. Stat. § 325D.57. We have recognized and applied [26] the broad effect of the words "any person." See Hyatt v. Anoka Police Dep't, 691 N.W.2d 824, 826 (Minn. 2005) ("The word 'any' is given broad application in statutes, regardless of whether we consider the result reasonable."); Group Health Plan, Inc. v. Philip Morris Inc., 621 N.W.2d 2, 8-9 (Minn. 2001) (stating that "any person" is plain and unambiguous); Philip Morris Inc., 551 N.W.2d at 496 (applying the plain meaning of Minn. Stat. § 325D.57 to hold that "[i]t is clear that this expansive grant of standing reaches the injuries suffered by Blue Cross").

HN23[] In spite of the apparently limitless language of section 325D.57, however, [*631] there are injuries so remotely related to antitrust violations that courts simply cannot provide relief. Group Health Plan, 621 N.W.2d at 11 n.7 ("[W]e do not hold that the scope of those enforcement statutes is entirely without limit."). Standing under Minnesota antitrust law must be defined by some prudential limits informed by foreseeability, proximate cause, remoteness, and relation of the injury to the purposes of the antitrust law; otherwise, almost any antitrust violation would provide almost any citizen with a cause of action arising from the resulting [27] ripples of harm throughout the state's economy.

We find it unnecessary today to define the outer limits of antitrust standing in Minnesota, because whatever those limits may be, Lorix falls well within them. Lorix alleges that she is an end user of a consumer good whose price was inflated by anticompetitive conduct earlier in the chain of manufacture. [3] The violation complained of-price fixing-is a per se violation of the law that strikes at the heart of antitrust law's purpose of protecting competition. See Minn. Stat. § 325D.53, subd. 1(1)(a) (2006). The injury alleged-overcharge-is exactly the sort that would be expected to flow from the violation.

Furthermore, as an end user, Lorix is the party most likely to be injured by an anticompetitive overcharge because she is the only party in the chain of purchase [28] who cannot pass on part or all of that overcharge. See Illinois Brick, 431 U.S. at 764 (Brennan, J., dissenting) (noting that direct purchasers ordinarily "pass on the bulk of their increased costs to consumers"); Freeman Industs. v. Eastman Chem. Co., 172 S.W.3d 512, 520 (Tenn. 2005) (noting that indirect purchasers are frequently the "real victims of the antitrust violations"); Cynthia Urda Kassis, Comment, The Indirect Purchaser's Right to Sue Under Section 4 of the Clayton Act: Another Congressional Response to Illinois Brick, 32 Am. U. L. Rev. 1087, 1087 (1983) ("Price fixing and other antitrust violations most frequently injure * * * those who purchased goods through retailers and other middlemen rather than directly from the antitrust violator."). To find that an end user such as Lorix lacks standing would be to deny an injured party the opportunity to recover while allowing a windfall to middlemen who passed on the overcharge or, more likely, allowing the violator to escape liability entirely when the middlemen decline to pursue relief. We recognize that Crompton's direct purchasers have chosen to pursue relief in federal court, see In re Rubber Chems. Antitrust Litig., 232 F.R.D. at 348, [29] but this appears to be the exception, not the rule. See Illinois Brick, 431 U.S. at 764 (Brennan, J., dissenting) (noting that middlemen are ordinarily reluctant to sue their suppliers); Comes, 646 N.W.2d at 450 ("[D]irect purchasers likely will not enforce antitrust laws out of fear of retaliation by their suppliers * * * ."); Hyde v. Abbott Labs., Inc., 473 S.E.2d 680, 687, 123 N.C. App. 572 (N.C. Ct. App. 1996) ("[T]here are few, if any, reported instances of a defendant paying treble damages to two different classes of purchasers based on a single antitrust violation.") (citing Thomas Greene, Should Congress Preempt State Indirect Purchaser Laws? Counterpoint: State Indirect Purchaser Remedies Should [*632] be Preserved, 5 Antitrust 25, 26-27 (1990)).

Crompton advances several reasons why Lorix lacks standing to sue. Crompton's primary argument is that the task of tracing the alleged overcharge from the chemical manufacturers to the end user will be extraordinarily complex and result in overly speculative damage calculations. Crompton directs our attention to various cases in the Visa/Mastercard litigation that Crompton asserts are analagous, including that of our own district court in Gutzwiller, 2004 WL 2114991. [30] In these cases, consumers alleged that they paid more for consumer goods due to Visa and Mastercard's illegal tying of debit card services with credit card services. These cases, for the most part, have applied the AGC factors to hold that the consumers' injuries are too remote and speculative to afford antitrust standing. See, e.g., *Gutzwiller, 2004 WL 2114991, at 9; *Beckler v. Visa U.S.A. Inc., No. Civ. 09-04-C-00030, 2004 WL 2475100, at 4 (N.D. Dist. Ct. Sept. 21, 2004); *Fucile, 2004 WL 3030037, at 3-4.

The AGC factors, as we have explained, do not provide the benchmark for standing under Minnesota antitrust law. Gutzwiller, however, does provide an example of an injury that is most likely too remote and speculative to afford standing. The plaintiffs in Gutzwiller did not purchase, directly or indirectly, any product or service provided by or manufactured with components from Visa or Mastercard. *2004 WL 2114991, at 6. Rather, they alleged that the overcharges forced upon merchants by Visa and Mastercard were passed on to consumers in the form of higher prices on essentially every good sold in the state of Minnesota, even those purchased with cash. *Id. at 2. Thus, the market [31] affected by the anticompetitive conduct was in essence the market for all goods bought and sold in Minnesota. HN24[] Whatever the precise prudential limits on Minnesota antitrust standing, we do not believe that the legislature intended to create "consumer standing" by allowing every person in the state to sue for an antitrust violation simply by virtue of his or her status as a consumer.

Lorix's claim, in contrast, is relatively focused: it is limited to purchasers of tires manufactured with price-fixed chemicals. According to Crompton's characterization of Lorix's allegations, Lorix will need to trace overcharges from chemical manufacturers to tire companies, then to tire wholesalers and distributors, then to tire retailers, and finally to consumers. [4] In principle and in practice, this is a far cry from the situation in Gutzwiller, where overcharges from Visa and Mastercard would need to be traced through every merchant to every good purchased by every consumer in the state of Minnesota. Lorix, furthermore, alleges price fixing, which at least in theory provides a sounder basis for calculation of damages than the illegal tying arrangement alleged in Gutzwiller. Tying cases present unique [32] damages issues because the plaintiff must not only demonstrate that the tying product possesses monopolistic leverage in the market, but also prove the cost or value of [*633] the tied products free from the unlawful arrangement. See generally Will v. Comprehensive Accounting Corp., 776 F.2d 665, 670-73 (7th Cir. 1985) (describing the process of proving damages in a tying case); Kypta v. McDonald's Corp., 671 F.2d 1282, 1284-85 (11th Cir. 1982) (same).

Nor can we accept, in the context of a motion to dismiss, Crompton's assertion that Lorix's damages are so speculative [33] as to render proof impossible. Drawing all assumptions and inferences in favor of Lorix, as we must, it is possible that the discovery process will reveal the amount of overcharge from Crompton, the chain of distribution through which the overcharge flowed to Lorix, the degree to which the overcharge may have been absorbed by more direct purchasers, and the impact of other market factors on the price of tires manufactured with price-fixed chemicals. See Mendoza v. Zirkle Fruit Co., 301 F.3d 1163, 1171 (9th Cir. 2002) (refusing to find damages too speculative at motion to dismiss stage because antitrust plaintiffs must be afforded an opportunity to present evidence to support their allegations); D.R. Ward Const. Co. v. Rohm & Haas Co., 470 F. Supp. 2d 485, 504 (E.D. Pa. 2006) ("Nor is this Court able to conclude as a matter of law at the motion to dismiss stage that a determination of the existence and amount of any overcharge suffered by the instant plaintiffs requires inappropriate guesswork or unmanageably complex analyses, particularly without the benefit of any discovery or expert testimony.").

[4] Lorix indicated at oral argument that her proposed class did not include purchasers of tires attached to used cars, and that any suggestion to the contrary in her complaint was a "drafting error." We find this limitation sensible and are confident the district court can craft other sensible limits on the proposed class. We also note that Lorix has apparently abandoned her earlier position, espoused at the court of appeals, that any Minnesota citizen could sue Crompton because the price-fixing raised the price of tires, which raised the price of transportation, which raised the price of all goods transported by truck within the state.

Ultimately, Crompton's argument that Lorix's alleged damages are too complex and remote [34] to be remedied simply repeats the concerns that motivated Illinois Brick and that our legislature, along with many others, has rejected by permitting indirect purchaser litigation. Crompton distinguishes this from other indirect purchaser actions by noting that there are more stages of distribution through which to trace the alleged overcharge. This difference is one of degree, not kind, and Crompton has not persuaded us that the alleged injuries are so far removed from the alleged price fixing as to be unreasonably remote.

Crompton also attempts to wash its hands of the effects of the alleged price fixing by stating that it does not make, market, distribute, or sell the product (tires) that Lorix purchased. We ascribe little meaning to this formality. HN25[] Antitrust laws, federal and state, provide a remedy for consumers who have purchased goods manufactured with price-fixed components. See, e.g., D.R. Ward Const. Co., 470 F. Supp. 2d at 490-91, 505, 509 (denying defendants' motion to dismiss, for lack of standing, claims under the Arizona, Tennessee, and Vermont antitrust acts by consumers who purchased products containing price-fixed plastic additives); Fed. Trade Comm'n v. Mylan Labs., Inc., 62 F. Supp. 2d 25, 49 (D.D.C. 1999) [35] (allowing, under Minnesota state antitrust law, claims for civil penalties and damages by the state of Minnesota on behalf of the state and indirect purchasers against suppliers of pharmaceutical ingredients); Carnivale Bag Co., Inc. v. Slide-Rite Mfg. Corp., 395 F. Supp. 287, 288-89, 294 (S.D.N.Y. 1975) (holding that purchasers of zippers manufactured with price-fixed "slider" components had standing to sue slider manufacturer). We find it beside the point that, in this case, the price-fixed component may or may not be present in the finished product. HN26[] An antitrust injury occurs when a purchaser is overcharged as a result of anticompetitive conduct, not when she physically acquires a price-fixed good. An antitrust violator should not escape liability simply because, by happy accident, its price-fixed goods [*634] are consumed in the manufacturing process.

We find it instructive that the 1984 amendment to Minn. Stat. § 325D.57 was intended to restore Minnesota antitrust law to its pre-Illinois Brick contours. See Hearing on Sen. F. 1807, Sen. Jud. Comm., 73rd Minn. Leg., Mar. 19, 1984 (minutes) ("We don't want to be creating causes of action where they wouldn't have existed prior to the Illinois [36] Brick case."). Claims of overcharge due to price fixing of components several steps removed from the ultimate consumer proceeded past motions to dismiss and for summary judgment in federal courts prior to Illinois Brick. See, e.g., Illinois v. Ampress Brick Co., Inc., 536 F.2d 1163, 1167 (7th Cir. 1976) (holding that various governmental entities who allegedly purchased buildings at prices inflated due to defendants' fixing of prices of concrete blocks had standing to sue under the Sherman Act), rev'd sub nom Illinois Brick Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (1977); In re W. Liquid Asphalt Cases, 487 F.2d 191, 194-95, 200 (9th Cir. 1973) (holding that plaintiffs, states that accepted bids for road construction projects including liquid asphalt supplied to contractors at inflated prices, had standing to sue asphalt suppliers); *In re Master Key Antitrust Litig., No. 45, 1973 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12175, 1973 WL 855, at 1, 6 (D. Conn. 1973) (denying defendants' motion for summary judgment in an action by plaintiffs who alleged that they paid higher prices for buildings as a result of overcharges due to defendants' conspiracy to fix prices of locks, keys, and latches); Armco Steel Corp. v. North Dakota, 376 F.2d 206, 207-08 (8th Cir. 1967) [37] (allowing action by a state against a steel company for overcharges in bids submitted for highway construction projects involving price-fixed metal products).

Lorix's claims also satisfy the "target area" test commonly employed in federal courts prior to Illinois Brick. Under the "target area" test, a plaintiff must prove "injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful. * * * It should, in short, be 'the type of loss that the claimed violations . . . would be likely to cause.'" Brunswick Corp., 429 U.S. at 489 (internal citations omitted) (quoting Zenith Radio Corp. v. Hazeltine Research, Inc., 395 U.S. 100, 125, 89 S. Ct. 1562, 23 L. Ed. 2d 129 (1969)); see also, e.g., GAF Corp. v. Circle Floor Co., Inc., 463 F.2d 752, 757-58 (2d Cir. 1972) ("Whether viewed in terms of 'lack of standing' or the absence of antitrust damages, the courts, in denying recovery to various kinds of plaintiffs, have sought to confine recovery to those who have been injured by restraints on competitive forces in the economy."); Mulvey v. Samuel Goldwyn Prods., 433 F.2d 1073, 1076 (9th Cir. 1970) (noting that the right to sue under section 4 of the Clayton Act was [38] restricted to those persons "within that area of the economy which is endangered by a breakdown of competitive conditions in a particular industry") (internal quotations omitted). Justice Brennan, dissenting in Illinois Brick, noted that "the more liberal, and more widely accepted [test for antitrust standing focused] on whether the plaintiff is within the 'target area' of the defendant's violation." 431 U.S. at 760 (Brennan, J., dissenting). While we decline to adopt the target area test, we find it noteworthy that Lorix's injury-artificially inflated price of a consumer good-is precisely one which Crompton's price fixing would foreseeably have caused and which antitrust law is intended to prevent and remedy.

We do not mean to minimize the formidable complexities of proof posed by Lorix's claim. Complexity, however, is [*635] hardly foreign to antitrust litigation. "Complex antitrust cases * * * invariably involve complicated questions of causation and damages." Forsyth v. Humana, Inc., 114 F.3d 1467, 1478 (9th Cir. 1997). We have confidence in the ability of our district courts to manage difficult cases. "The complexity of proving damages through multiple levels of sales is a daunting task, [39] but one to which our courts are equal." Bunker's Glass Co., 75 P.3d at 108.

Our decision does not mean that Lorix will recover, nor do we intimate any view regarding the outcome of this litigation. [5] It is entirely possible that she cannot prove her damages, or that they are minimal. [6] If her claims are purely speculative or unmanageably complex, they will be barred at the summary judgment stage. HN27[] "The plaintiffs bear the burden of proving the damages caused by a defendant's wrongful conduct. If the plaintiffs cannot present admissible and convincing proof, they cannot recover." Bunker's Glass Co., 75 P.3d at 108. We also expect, in light of the variety of tires available from different manufacturers through different retail outlets, that Lorix faces a challenge meeting the class certification requirements of Minn. R. Civ. P. 23.01. See William H. Page, The Limits of State Indirect Purchaser Suits: Class Certification in the Shadow of Illinois Brick, 67 Antitrust L.J. 1, 3 (1999) ("[T]rial courts in a number of the jurisdictions have effectively terminated indirect purchaser class actions by refusing to certify them [as class actions]."). We decide today only that our antitrust law affords [40] her an opportunity to try. We hold that Lorix has standing under Minn. Stat. § 325D.57 to pursue her claim.

Reversed and remanded.

[5] We recognize that the cost and difficulty of settlement administration, combined with attorneys' fees, mean that indirect purchaser suits sometimes result in no meaningful recovery for consumers. See *Crouch, 2004 NCBC LEXIS 6, 2004 WL 2414027, at 12 ("[T]he complexities and administrative costs and difficulties [in administering settlements] result in settlements that are something less than sterling from the consumer's point of view."); William M. L.Rev. 602, 634 (1979) ("In a class action, much of even the compensatory portion of the judgment may end up in the pockets of lawyers or in state treasuries, rather than in the pockets of the people who were actually harmed by the antitrust violation."). We also recognize that indirect purchasers suits sometimes use the threat of unmanageable and complex litigation to compel settlement. See Milton Handler, The Shift From Substantive to Procedural Innovations in Antitrust Suits--The Twenty-Third [41] Annual Antitrust Review, 71 Colum. L. Rev. 1, 9 (1971). Whatever benefits or detriments indirect purchaser litigation confers on society, it is not the place of this court to restrict remedies that the legislature has made available.

[6] The court in Crouch summarized the difficulties:

> First, the price-fixed item is a product consumed or altered in the manufacturing process. Accordingly, its use will vary with the type of rubber product being made. It may also vary with the nature of the product (chemical) being used and how it is used in the manufacturing process. Different direct purchasers (here, tire manufacturers) might use the various chemicals in various ways in differing products.

*2004 NCBC LEXIS 6, 2004 WL 2414027, at 21. The Crouch court also estimated, based on the price of tires, amount of rubber processing chemicals present, and capacity for price inflation in the industry, that an individual purchaser may have been damaged by $ 0.01 to $ 0.11 per tire. Id. While we take note of the Crouch court's thorough, thoughtful opinion, it includes facts that are not part of the record before us.

REPORT AND RECOMMENDATION

TO THE HONORABLE RICHARD M. BERMAN, U.S.D.J.:

The plaintiffs in this action are contractors that employ members of the Communication Workers of America, AFL-CIO (the [*3] "CWA") to install low-voltage telecommunications and data ("tel-data") wiring for commercial customers in the New York City metropolitan area. The defendants are Local Union Number 3 ("Local 3") of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO (the "IBEW") and several electrical contractors that employ Local 3 members. [1] The plaintiffs seek damages and injunctive relief, alleging that the defendants conspired to exclude CWA contractors from the tel-data installation market in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Antitrust Act, [2] 15 U.S.C. § 1, and New York State's Donnelly Act, N.Y. Gen. Bus. Law § 340. The plaintiffs have also brought common law claims for tortious interference with contract and prospective business advantage. The defendants have moved for summary judgment on each of the plaintiffs' claims. [3] For the reasons set forth below, the defendants' motion should be granted.

Background

A. Tel-Data and Electrical Installation Markets

---

[1] I will refer to contractors that use Local 3 labor as "Local 3 contractors," and to contractors that use CWA labor as "CWA contractors."

[2] The plaintiffs initially asserted claims under both § 1 and § 2 of the Sherman Antitrust Act but have since withdrawn their § 2 claims. *U.S. Info. Sys. v. IBEW Local Union No. 3, No. 00 Civ. 4763, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52870, 2006 WL 2136249, at 1 n.1 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 1, 2006).

[3] All [*4] claims against defendants IPC Communications, Inc. ("IPC") and Forest Electric Corporation have been dismissed by stipulation.

Commercial construction projects in New York City are usually overseen by a general contractor or construction manager, who is hired by the owner to coordinate the process of construction. (Defendants' Joint Statement of Facts About Which There is No Genuine Dispute ("Def. 56.1 Stmt."), P 4; Plaintiffs' Rule 56.1 Counterstatement in Response to Defendants' Rule 56.1 Statement ("Pl. 56.1 Stmt."), P 4). The general contractor then subcontracts specific parts of the job to trade contractors that perform services such as electrical, plumbing, and dry wall installation. Electrical contractors such as the defendants generally employ trained electricians who are members of Local 3 to install high-voltage wiring and equipment. (Def. 56.1 Stmt., P 7; Pl. 56.1 Stmt., P 7).

Commercial construction projects often also require the installation of low-voltage electrical systems, including tel-data, fire alarm, and security systems. (Def. 56.1 Stmt., P 9; Pl. 56.1 Stmt., P 9). Some electrical contractors, including defendants [*5] Hugh O'Kane Electric Company LLC ("Hugh O'Kane"), Five Star Electric Corporation ("Five Star"), and ADCO Electrical Corporation ("ADCO"), also hire members of Local 3 to perform low-voltage installation. (Def. 56.1 Stmt., PP 13, 174, 215, 349; Pl. 56.1 Stmt., PP 13, 174, 215, 349). Local 3 electricians who perform low-voltage work are paid the same wage that they make when performing high-voltage work. Low-voltage systems can also be installed by members of the CWA who typically receive lower hourly wages than Local 3 members. (Memorandum of Law in Opposition to Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment ("Pl. Memo.") at 6, 8-9). According to the plaintiffs, this is because

> [t]raditional electrical installation, with its emphasis on high voltage work, requires a variety of skills obtained through many years of training and apprenticeship. Because of training and the safety risks associated with high voltage, Local 3 journeymen electricians command a premium wage. . . . [L]ow voltage workers do not have the same skill levels or face the risks associated with high voltage and accordingly, their compensation is lower. This enables CWA contractors who are not bound by the wage strictures of [*6] Local 3 to significantly underbid Local 3 contractors[.]

(Pl. Memo. at 8-9).

There is a long history of jurisdictional disputes between the CWA and the IBEW, of which Local 3 is a chapter. (Def. 56.1 Stmt., PP 146-147; Pl. 56.1 Stmt., PP 146-147). According to Local 3, low-voltage electrical work has historically been the province of the IBEW. Local 3 claims that in recent years the CWA has "challenge[d] the IBEW for this work, often succeeding in obtaining it, ousting the IBEW electricians and performing the work at pay rates that were, and still are, substandard by any relevant criteria." [4] (Affidavit of Thomas Van Arsdale dated Aug. 23, 2005 ("Van Arsdale Aff."), P 19). Although the IBEW and the CWA signed a treaty designed to resolve the dispute between the two unions (Affidavit of Morton Bahr dated March 27, 2007 ("Bahr Aff."), attached as Exh. 33 to Declaration of John E. Andrews dated April 2, 2007 ("Andrews Decl."), P 13; Van Arsdale Aff., P 21), the plaintiffs claim that Local 3 has tried to "exclude non-Local 3 labor" from the industry. (Pl. Memo. at 34-40). This case involves the plaintiffs' claim that Local 3 has enlisted the aid of electrical contractors in an attempt to [*7] force CWA contractors out of the telecommunications installation market.

B. Plaintiffs' Claims

The plaintiffs contend that Local 3 has conspired with the defendant contractors "to coerce and induce building owners and tenants, building managers, general contractors, information technology consultants, and others in the construction industry to exclude the plaintiffs from the market for telecommunications installation work." (Second Complaint dated Feb. 22, 2002 ("Sec. Compl."), P 36). According to the plaintiffs, CWA contractors have been able to capture a substantial portion of the New York low-voltage installation market in recent years by submitting lower bids than Local 3 contractors, in part because, as explained above, their labor costs are lower. (Pl. Memo. at 9). The plaintiffs contend that the defendants, afraid that they would lose tel-data work to lower-priced CWA contractors, > have resorted to measures that allow them to win bids for low voltage projects without lowering their price, specifically, [*8] their tried and true tactic of creating fear among owners, consultants and general contractors > that completion deadlines will be missed, sabotage and vandalism will occur and significant costs [will be] incurred if a CWA contractor is awarded the job.

[4] The plaintiffs, by contrast, contend that "[i]n the early days of telecommunications, installations were done only by the telephone company monopolies utilizing CWA labor." (Pl. Memo. at 8).

(Pl. Memo. at 7). They assert that the defendants' "key tactic" consists of "threats communicated to potential customers or their agents that Local 3 workers employed by the defendant contractors to do the high voltage electric work would take measures to cause scheduling delays resulting in cost overruns if a non-Local 3 contractor was chosen to perform the telecommunications work on a particular project." (Pl. Memo. at 1). The plaintiffs also contend that, in some instances, Local 3 members disrupted work when tel-data contracts were awarded to CWA contractors and that, as a result, those contracts were rescinded and awarded to Local 3 contractors instead. (Pl. Memo. at 2).

C. Plaintiffs' Evidence

1. A R Communication Contractors Inc.

Defendant A R Communication Contractors Inc. ("A R") performs only low-voltage telecommunications work. (Def. 56.1 Stmt., P 166; Pl. 56.1 Stmt., P 166). However, it uses Local 3 labor. The plaintiffs have [*9] submitted an affidavit from Terence McDonough, the president of plaintiff Odyssey Group, Inc. ("Odyssey"), in which he states that Odyssey bid on "turret installation work" on the "ABN Amro project" at 1290 Avenue of the Americas. (Affidavit of Terence McDonough dated Dec. 8, 2000 ("McDonough Aff."), attached as Exh. 64 to Andrews Decl., P 5). Odyssey submitted the bid to Syntegra, another contractor that had been "awarded the contract for the sale of turret equipment." (McDonough Aff., P 5). Mr. McDonough states that "a Syntegra official informed [him] that a business agent of IBEW Local No. 3 had threatened ABN Amro that the project would not be completed on time unless IBEW Local No. 3 labor was used for all of the telecommunications installation work on the project." (McDonough Aff., P 5). The turret installation work was then awarded to A R allegedly "because of the 'Local 3 issue.'" (McDonough Aff., P 5).

2. ADCO

The only evidence related to defendant ADCO involves the NBC Experience project at 30 Rockefeller Plaza. (Def. 56.1 Stmt., PP 196-197; Pl. 56.1 Stmt., PP 196-197). NBC hired plaintiff U.S. Information Systems ("USIS") to do the telecommunications installation work. (Affidavit [*10] of Stan Walczak dated April 15, 1999 ("Walczak Aff."), attached as Exh. 56 to Andrews Decl., P 7). USIS began work in February 1999. (Walczak Aff., P 8). At that time, ADCO had already been working on the NBC project for four or five months. (Excerpts of Deposition of Stanley Walczak dated Aug. 2, 2002 ("Walczak Dep."), attached as Exh. 30 to Andrews Decl. and Exh. 47 to Declaration of Kevin J. Toner dated Feb. 16, 2007 ("Toner Decl."), at 32; Walczak Aff., P 4). During those months, ADCO electricians regularly worked overtime as needed to "[s]upport other trades and stay on schedule." [5] (Walczak Dep. at 32; Walczak Aff., P 4).

On February 1, when CWA members arrived on the job site, an ADCO foreman complained to ADCO project manager Tom Conte and to Stan Walczak, a Senior Project Manager in the NBC Facilities Department, that "USIS' employees were performing work that was not within the jurisdiction of the CWA, but rather, within the jurisdiction of Local 3 employees." (Walczak Aff., [*11] P 9; Excerpts of Deposition of Thomas Conte, attached as Exh. 20 to Toner Decl., at 95). The foreman allegedly informed Mr. Walczak that "Local 3 employees . . . would not work overtime and would engage in work slowdowns as long as USIS' employees continued performing the telecommunications work in question." (Walczak Aff., P 9). On that day, ADCO electricians worked half an hour before and after the standard workday in order to supply power and light for other tradespeople working at the site, but performed no additional overtime. (Def. 56.1 Stmt., P 198; Pl. 56.1 Stmt., P 198).

On February 2, 1999, ADCO transferred six of the electricians who had refused to perform overtime to another project. (Def. 56.1 Stmt., P 199; Pl. 56.1 Stmt., P 199). Despite this measure, ADCO workers continued to refuse to work overtime; according to the plaintiffs, all of the ADCO electricians left the job site at approximately 3:15 p.m. for the next week to ten days. (Walczak Dep. at 42, 75; Walczak Aff., P 11; Affidavit of Thomas Yuen dated April 9,

[5] In many cases, construction projects are placed on an accelerated schedule, and contractors must use overtime labor in order to complete the project on time. (Def. 56.1 Stmt., P 8; Pl. 56.1 Stmt., P 8).

1999 ("Yuen Aff."), attached as Exh. 53 to Andrews Decl., P 9). NBC replaced USIS with ADCO for the telecommunications work, and the work slowdowns ceased. [*12] (Walczak Aff., PP 12, 14; Letter of Frank Lazzaro dated Feb. 18, 1999, attached as Exh. 57 to Andrews Decl.). ADCO did not directly request that NBC terminate the USIS contract; NBC did so because ADCO employees' refusal to work overtime jeopardized the construction schedule. (Walczak Dep. at 79, 99, 100). ADCO agreed to "do the balance of the work for the same price as USIS." (Walczak Dep. at 45-46, 82; E-mail of Stan Walczak dated Feb. 8, 1999, attached as Exh. 55 to Andrews Decl.).

3. Five Star

The evidence against Five Star involves the Hotel Sofitel project. After USIS was awarded the telecommunications installation contract on the project, Five Star employees allegedly shut down elevators and refused to supply power to the construction site on a number of occasions, apparently at the direction of Howie Tensor, the Five Star foreman. (Excerpts of Deposition of Fred Lott ("Lott Dep."), attached as Exh. 15 to Andrews Decl., at 105, 109-11, 117-19, 171). In addition, Five Star's electricians refused to work overtime. [6] (Lott Dep. at 139). Fred Lott, construction manager for the building owner, testified that Mr. Tensor told him that Robert King, the Five Star project manager, had directed [*13] him not to supply power or bring workers to the job site until the issue with USIS had been resolved. (Lott Dep. at 104-08). However, Mr. Lott also testified that other representatives of Five Star told him that the problem was that Local 3 had refused to provide the company with overtime labor because the telecommunications work had been given to USIS. (Lott Dep. at 108, 151-53, 326-27). [7]

Mr. King met with Mr. Tensor and Rodney Graves, the assistant superintendent, and asked them to speak to the electricians who were refusing to work overtime to see if they could "do something about it." (Excerpts of Deposition of Robert King ("King Dep."), attached as Exh. 11 to Andrews Decl., at 118). The electricians indicated to Mr. Tensor and Mr. Graves that they would not work "as long as CWA is present." (King Dep. at 120; Meeting Notes dated Nov. 29, 1999, attached as Exh. 57 to Andrews Decl.; Excerpts of Deposition of John Lagana ("Lagana Dep."), attached as Exh. 12 to Andrews Decl., at 1142). At a meeting held to discuss the issue, Mr. Graves "assured [Mr. Lott and others] that Local 3 would be sure that the project was not completed if the work was not taken away from USIS," and he made references to elevator cables being cut, things going missing, and people refusing to work. (Lott Dep. at 139-40). Mr. Lott interpreted this as a threat and also felt that Mr. Graves was threatening him personally. (Lott Dep. at 139-42, 160-61, 187). According to Mr. Lott, Mr. King "tried to quiet Mr. Graves down" [*15] during this meeting. (Lott Dep. at 142). Eventually, after discussing the matter with Thomas Van Arsdale, business manager of Local 3, Mr. King removed Mr. Graves from the project because "that was not the way that [Mr. King] chose to do business." (Lott Dep. at 155, 332).

At a meeting with representatives of the building owner, LMB indicated that if USIS and Five Star were to continue working on the project together, "concessions would have to be made to [Local 3]." (Lott Dep. at 180). The parties at that meeting discussed the possibility of making a contribution to the Local 3 retirement fund and giving the "wire pull" portion of the telecommunications contract to Five Star and the "terminations" portion to USIS. (Lott Dep. at 180-83, 281). An e-mail from Keith Fordsman, a project manager for Constructa, states that Local 3 believed that a specific task that had been assigned to USIS was a "Local 3 work task" and that he had "negotiated a middle ground with Local 3." (E-mail of Keith Fordsman dated June 13, 2000, attached as Exh. 58 to Andrews Decl.). It is not clear what that "middle ground" entailed, but it appears that Five Star did ultimately perform some part of the telecommunications [*16] installation work on the project. (Lott Dep. at 294, 312-13).

4. Hugh O'Kane

[6] During the same time period, telecommunications cables, light fixtures, and "bathroom speakers" disappeared from the job site. (Lott Dep. at 133-36).

[7] After these problems began, the vice-president of Lehrer McGovern Bovis ("LMB"), the general contractor on the project, wrote to Arthur Blee of Constructa, Inc. ("Constructa"), a representative of the building owner, stating that "LMB verbally advised Constructa . . . on numerous occasions that it would not be wise to award this contract to a non-Local 3 contractor." The letter lists a number of problems encountered as a result of the decision to use CWA labor, including the refusal of Local 3 electricians to perform overtime when asked, and states that "there is no way that LMB can force the men to work if they don't want to." (Letter of Harold Lyons [*14] dated Nov. 29, 1999 ("Lyons Letter"), attached as Exh. 58 to Andrews Decl.).

The evidence against defenant Hugh O'Kane involves a project for Qwest Communications International, Inc. ("Qwest") at 32 Avenue of the Americas. Although Hugh O'Kane was initially hired as the telecommunications contractor on that project, Qwest replaced the company with plaintiff Blue Diamond Fiber Optic Networks, Inc. ("Blue Diamond") because of problems with Hugh O'Kane's performance. (Declaration of Patrick Marshall dated Aug. 20, 2002 ("Marshall Decl."), attached as Exh. 40 to Andrews Decl., P 5). After the change, Patrick Marshall, the Northeast Region Splice Coordinator for Qwest, did a "walk-through" of the building with several Blue Diamond employees and sub-contractors. During this walk-through, he was informed by the Qwest project manager that the Local 3 shop steward employed by Hugh O'Kane had "threatened that there would be trouble in the building if Blue Diamond were permitted to perform any work at this location." (Marshall Decl., PP 6-7). Before Blue Diamond started working on the project, "Local 3 members began slowing work down at 32 Avenue of the Americas and at other Qwest projects all [*17] over Manhattan" by calling in sick or refusing to work overtime. (Marshall Decl., P 8; Excerpts of Deposition of Richard Mullarkey ("Mullarkey Dep."), attached as Exh. 36 to Toner Decl., at 185). As a result, the telecommunications work on the Qwest project was reassigned to Hugh O'Kane. (Marshall Decl., P 11). After that, the problems with Local 3 members promptly ceased. (Marshall Decl., P 12).

5. Nead Information Systems, Inc.

Nead Information Systems ("NIS") is a telecommunications contractor, while Nead Electric is an electrical contractor, and both employ Local 3 members. Only NIS is a defendant in this case. The parties dispute whether NIS can be held liable with respect to projects that involved only Nead Electric. (Def. 56.1 Stmt., PP 356-365; Pl. 56.1 Stmt., PP 356-365; Joint Memorandum of Law in Support of Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment ("Joint Def. Memo.") at 19).

a. Agency.com

Both NIS and Nead Electric may have bid on a project for Agency.com (Excerpts of Deposition of Liz Pastore ("Pastore Dep."), attached as Exh. 21 to Andrews Decl. and as Exh. 38 to Toner Decl., at 46), but only Nead Electric actually performed work on the project. (Def. 56.1 Stmt., PP 371-372). [*18] At some point, Structure Tone, the general contractor, told Liz Pastore, facilities manager for Agency.com, that she should "use Local 3 for cabling," but did not specifically reference Nead. (Pastore Dep. at 39, 190). Agency.com nevertheless awarded the telecommunications contract to USIS. (Lagana Dep. at 944; Pastore Dep. at 86). After USIS workers arrived on the job, almost all of the Nead electricians already working on the project refused to work overtime, causing the project to run behind schedule. [8] (Lagana Dep. at 944-45; Pastore Dep. at 63, 65-68, 169). Nead put more men on the project during the day to make up for the lack of workers willing to work overtime. (Pastore Dep. at 194). Structure Tone told Ms. Pastore that these problems were a result of the fact that she had hired a non-Local 3 contractor. (Pastore Dep. at 121, 134, 218).

b. Random House (280 Park Avenue)

The only evidence that relates to the project for Random House is the testimony of Peter Babigian of Walsh-Lowe, an IT consulting firm, that at a meeting with Random House representatives, the general [*19] contractor directed Walsh-Lowe to limit bidding for the telecommunications installation at 299 Park Avenue and 280 Park Avenue to Local 3 contractors. (Excerpts of Deposition of Peter Babigian, attached as Exh. 1 to Andrews Decl., at 248-49, 411). It does not appear that NIS received the telecommunications contract, although Nead Electric performed the electrical installation. (Declaration of Robert Eccles dated Aug. 26, 2005, attached as Exh. 123 to Toner Decl., P 19; Declaration of Dana Reed dated Aug. 26, 2005, attached as Exh. 128 to Toner Decl., P 17).

c. Shearman & Sterling (850 Third Avenue)

On a project for the law firm of Shearman & Sterling, Nead Electric performed the electrical contracting work and NIS performed the tel-data work. (Def. 56.1 Stmt., P 382; Pl. 56.1 Stmt., P 382). Michael Yee, director of New York operations for Shearman & Sterling, testified that the firm's landlord at 850 Third Avenue had a list of preferred vendors. Nead Electric was the landlord's favored electrical contractor. (Excerpts of Deposition of Michael Yee ("Yee Dep."), attached as Exh. 48 to Toner Decl. and as Exh. 31 to Andrews Decl., at 25-26). Although the landlord required tenants to allow [*20] preferred contractors to bid on projects, it did not require tenants to hire those contractors if their bids were not the lowest. (Yee Dep. at 32). While the landlord did not have a preferred telecommunications vendor, it did require the firm to hire a Local 3 contractor for the telecommunications work in order to "avoid labor issues." (Yee Dep. at 22-23, 32, 35). Shearman & Sterling was prepared to "try to talk the landlord out of this requirement" if the lowest bid from a Local 3 contractor was significantly higher than the lowest bid from a non-Local 3 contractor. (Yee Dep. at 36-37).

---

At some point after the bids came in, the landlord asked Mr. Yee to award both the electrical and the telecommunications contracts to Nead. (Yee Dep. at 43). The landlord's representative indicated that the landlord preferred that Nead do the telecommunications work because, as the house vendor, "they were familiar with the building systems." (Yee Dep. at 44). He did not mention possible labor unrest or delays. (Yee Dep. at 45). Shearman & Sterling then gave Nead an opportunity to match the lowest bids for both electrical and telecommunications installation, and the firm subsequently chose to hire both [*21] Nead Electric and NIS. (Yee Dep. at 58, 63-64, 186).

Russell Ramey, a Shearman & Sterling employee involved in supervising the project, testified that Mark Kanyuk, a technical specialist for the firm, told him that Shearman & Sterling "wouldn't be able to use the freight elevator unless Local 3 was doing the data work." (Excerpts of Deposition of Russell W. Ramey ("Ramey Dep."), attached as Exh. 23 to Andrews Decl., at 99). It is unclear where Mr. Kanyuk got this information. Mr. Ramey also testified that he felt pressure from "the building" (presumably meaning the landlord) and from the general contractor to hire Nead although it was not the lowest qualified bidder. (Ramey Dep. at 102-03, 107-08, 199-200). He testified that Mr. Kanyuk and another Shearman & Sterling employee informed him that the general contractor made statements indicating that "he had been pressured to behave in certain ways, or to give contracts to certain people," but could not say who had put pressure on the general contractor. (Ramey Dep. at 200).

Discussion

A. Summary Judgment Standard

Pursuant to Rule 56 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, summary judgment is appropriate where the evidence offered demonstrates [*22] "that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the moving party is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c); see also Tocker v. Philip Morris Companies, Inc., 470 F.3d 481, 486-87 (2d Cir. 2006); Andy Warhol Foundation for the Visual Arts, Inc. v. Federal Insurance Co., 189 F.3d 208, 214 (2d Cir. 1999). The moving party bears the initial burden of demonstrating "the absence of a genuine issue of material fact." Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 323, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986). Where the moving party meets that burden, the opposing party must come forward with "specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(e). "[A]ll inferences must be drawn in favor of the non-moving party." Apex Oil Co. v. DiMauro, 822 F.2d 246, 252 (2d Cir. 1987) (internal citations and quotation marks omitted).

However, "to defeat a motion for summary judgment [the non-moving party] cannot rely on conjecture or surmise, and must do more than simply show that there is some metaphysical doubt as to the material facts." Heilweil v. Mount Sinai Hospital, 32 F.3d 718, 723 (2d Cir. 1994) (internal quotation marks and citations omitted). If the court determines [*23] that "the record taken as a whole could not lead a rational trier of fact to find for the non-moving party, there is no genuine issue for trial." Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 587, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986) (citing First National Bank of Arizona v. Cities Service Co., 391 U.S. 253, 289, 88 S. Ct. 1575, 20 L. Ed. 2d 569 (1968)) (internal quotation marks omitted).

B. Non-Statutory Labor Exemption

The defendants contend that, even assuming that there was an agreement between the defendant contractors and Local 3 as alleged by the plaintiffs, that agreement is beyond the reach of the federal antitrust laws because it is subject to the non-statutory labor exemption. The Second Circuit has found that the "classic formulation" of the non-statutory labor exemption is as follows:

> agreements between a union and an employer are exempt from antitrust scrutiny if they are "so intimately related to wages, hours and working conditions that the unions' successful attempt to obtain that provision through bona fide, arm's-length bargaining in pursuit of their own labor union policies, and not at the behest of or in combination with nonlabor groups, falls within the protection of the national labor policy and therefore [*24] is exempt from the Sherman Act."

Local 210, Laborers' International Union v. Labor Relations Division Associated General Contracting, 844 F.2d 69, 79 (2d Cir. 1988) (quoting Local Union No. 189, Amalgamated Meat Cutters v. Jewel Tea Co., 381 U.S. 676, 689-90, 85 S. Ct. 1596, 14 L. Ed. 2d 640 (1965) (plurality opinion)); accord Clarett v. NFL, 369 F.3d 124, 132 n.12 (2d Cir. 2004); Berman Enterprises Inc. v. Local 333, United Marine Division, International Longshoremen's Association, 644 F.2d 930, 935 n.8 (2d Cir. 1981). [9]

The Supreme Court has noted that, "[a]s a matter of logic, it would be difficult, [*25] if not impossible, to require . . . employers and employees to bargain together, but at the same time forbid them to make . . . any of the competition-restricting agreements potentially necessary to make the process work or its results mutually acceptable." Brown v. Pro Football, Inc., 518 U.S. 231, 237, 116 S. Ct. 2116, 135 L. Ed. 2d 521 (1996).

> Union success in organizing workers and standardizing wages ultimately will affect price competition among employers, but the goals of federal labor law never could be achieved if this effect on business competition were held a violation of the antitrust laws. . . . Labor policy clearly does not require, however, that a union have freedom to impose direct restraints on competition among those who employ its members. Thus, while the statutory exemption allows unions to accomplish some restraints by acting unilaterally, . . . the nonstatutory exemption offers no similar protection when a union and nonlabor party agree to restrain competition in a business market.

Connell Construction Co. v. Plumbers and Steamfitters Local Union No. 100, 421 U.S. 616, 622-23, 95 S. Ct. 1830, 44 L. Ed. 2d 418 (1975) (internal citations omitted); see also Allen Bradley Co. v. Local Union No. 3, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, 325 U.S. 797, 808, 65 S. Ct. 1533, 89 L. Ed. 1939 (1945) [*26] ("Congress never intended that unions could, consistently with the Sherman Act, aid non-labor groups to create business monopolies and to control the marketing of goods and services.").

The purpose of the non-statutory exemption is "to prevent intrusion upon the collective bargaining process." *U.S. Info. Sys., 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1038, 2002 WL 91625, at 3. However, the exemption does not apply only "to understandings embodied in a collective-bargaining agreement -- for the collective-bargaining process may take place before the making of any agreement or after an agreement has expired." Brown, 518 U.S. at 243. Rather, the exemption applies "where needed to make the collective-bargaining process work." Id. at 234.

The defendants contend that, even assuming there was an agreement between Local 3 and the defendant contractors, such an agreement is exempt from antitrust scrutiny because it arose "in the context of collective bargaining." (Joint Def. Memo. at 42). The Court rejected this claim when it denied the defendants' motion to dismiss. See *U.S. Info. Sys., 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1038, 2002 WL 91625, at 3. In the present motion, the defendants assert that the collective bargaining agreement between Local 3 and the contractors' [*27] associations to which the defendant contractors belong, which the Court may consider on summary judgment, makes it clear that the exemption is applicable here. (Joint Def. Memo. at 42). The defendants maintain that Article III of the collective bargaining agreement gives members of Local 3 the right to refuse overtime, [10] while Article VIII forbids members to disrupt work when there are jurisdictional disputes with other unions. [11] (Memorandum of Law on Behalf of Defendant Local 3 in Support of the Motion for Summary Judgment ("Local 3 Memo.") at 15-16). The defendants claim that because the collective bargaining agreement contains these provisions, any "communications" between Local 3 and the defendant contractors regarding job site vandalism or workers' refusal to work overtime are protected by the non-statutory labor exemption. (Local 3 Memo. at 16-17). This argument is utterly lacking in merit. The agreement alleged by the plaintiffs is not one reached by an employer and a union in the course of collective bargaining. The fact that the collective bargaining agreement addresses work stoppages and overtime does not mean that a conspiracy between Local 3 and the defendant contractors [*28] to use or threaten to use such tactics in order to exclude CWA contractors from the tel-data installation market is somehow embodied in the collective bargaining agreement. Nor is the alleged agreement in any way "needed to make the collective bargaining process work." Brown, 518 U.S. at 234. Consequently, subjecting the defendants' actions to antitrust scrutiny does not risk intruding upon the collective bargaining process. [12]

D. Sherman Act

1. Elements of § 1 Claim

Section 1 of the Sherman Act provides that "every contract, combination, in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal." 15 U.S.C. § 1. To establish a § 1 violation, the plaintiffs must produce evidence sufficient to show: (1) a combination or some form of concerted action between [*31] at least two legally distinct economic entities; and (2) that such combination or conduct constituted an unreasonable restraint of trade either per se or under the "rule of reason." [13] *U.S. Info. Sys., 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1038, 2002 WL 91625, at 4 (citing Tops Mkts., Inc. v. Quality

[10] Article III, Rule 3(m) states that the foreman must call the union to ask for permission for the electricians to work overtime. (Agreement and Working Rules between New York Electrical Contractors Association, Inc., Association of Electrical Contractors, Inc., and Local 3 ("CBA"), attached as Exh. 114 to Toner Decl. and as Exh. 50 to Andrews Decl., Art. III, Rule 3(m)). Rule 5 states that overtime is not permitted except in emergencies and that members may not work overtime without permission from the Local 3 Business Manager's Office. (CBA, Rule 5). The defendants note that "[t]here is no clause in the CBA which obliges an individual worker to work any overtime at all." (Affidavit of Joseph D'Angelo dated Aug. 24, 2005, attached as Exh. 122 to Toner Decl., [*29] P 4). However, Thomas Carino, Sr. formerly the Chief Operating Officer of IPC, testified that under the collective bargaining agreement, workers do not have the right to refuse to work overtime if the contractor requests it. (Excerpts of Deposition of Thomas Carino, Sr., attached as Exh. 3 to Andrews Decl., at 195-97).

[11] Article VII states in part that "[t]here will be no strikes, no work stoppages or slow down[s] or other interferences with the work because of jurisdictional disputes." (CBA, Art. VIII).

[12] The defendants also claim that the alleged agreement between the defendants would be subject to the "construction industry proviso" of § 8(e) of the National Labor Relations Act (the "NLRA"), 29 U.S.C. § 158(e). That provision exempts certain aspects of the construction industry from the NLRA's ban on so-called "hot cargo clauses" in collective bargaining agreements. Local 210, 844 F.2d at 72-73. A "hot cargo clause" is an agreement by an employer, at the union's behest, "to boycott the goods or services of other employers that did not comply with union standards or recognize a union." Id. at 72 (citations omitted). The alleged conspiracy at issue here does not involve such an agreement, [*30] and therefore does not appear to fall within the scope of the proviso. However, even assuming that it does, the proviso protects employers and unions within the construction industry only from scrutiny under § 8(e) of the NLRA. In order to be exempt from antitrust scrutiny, an agreement that is subject to the construction industry proviso must also fall within the scope of "'one of two recognized labor law exemptions from antitrust scrutiny -- the statutory and non-statutory exemptions.'" *Drywall Tapers & Pointers, Local Union Local 1974 v. Bovis Lend Lease Interiors, Inc., No. 05 Civ. 2746, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19632, 2005 WL 2205836, at 15 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 9, 2005) (quoting Local 210, 844 F.2d at 79). As explained above, neither of these exemptions applies here.

[13] "Conduct considered illegal per se is invoked only in a limited class of cases where a defendant's actions are so plainly harmful to competition and so obviously lacking in any redeeming pro-competitive values that they are 'conclusively presumed illegal without further examination.'" Capital Imaging Associates, P.C. v. Ed. 2d 1 (1979)); see also *Leegin Creative Leather Prods. v. PSKS, Inc., U.S. , , 127 S. Ct. 2705, 2713, 168 L. Mkts., Inc., 142 F.3d 90, 95-96 (2d Cir. 1998)). In addition, the plaintiffs must establish that they have "antitrust standing" and that they have suffered "antitrust injury." British Airways PLC, 257 F.3d 256, 263 (2d Cir. 2001); accord Capital Imaging Associates, 996 F.2d at 542. [*33] To prevail on their § 1 claim, therefore, the plaintiffs must demonstrate that the defendants conspired together, meaning that they "were consciously committed 'to a common scheme designed to achieve an unlawful objective.'" A threshold showing may be made using circumstantial evidence alone, since "direct proof of an illegal agreement is rarely available." *Building Indus. Fund v. Local Union No. 3, IBEW, 992 F. b. Evidence of Conspiracy Business Electronics Corp. v. Sharp Electronics Corp., 485 U.S. 717, 723, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808 (1988)). "Most antitrust claims . . . are analyzed under a 'rule of reason' analysis which seeks to determine if the alleged restraint is unreasonable because its 'anti[-]competitive effects outweigh its pro[-]competitive effects.'" E & L Consulting, Ltd. v. Doman Industries Ltd., 472 F.3d 23, 29 (2d Cir. 2006) (quoting Atlantic Richfield Co. v. USA Petroleum Co., 495 U.S. 328, 342, 110 S. Ct. 1884, 109 L. Ed. 2d 333 (1990)).

[14] The plaintiffs must also "adequately . . . define the relevant product market." Rock TV Entertainment, Inc. v. Time Warner, Inc., No. 97 Civ. 0161, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 799, 1998 WL 37498, at *2 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 30, 1998) (quotations and citation omitted). However, the defendants have stated that they "are not challenging the 'relevant market' for purposes of this motion." (Joint Def. Memo. at 4 n.4).

The plaintiffs first contend that while circumstantial evidence is sufficient to prove a conspiracy, in this case "the defendant[] contractors have . . . actually agreed in writing to 'continually endeavor' to shill for Local 3 workers." (Pl. Memo. at 3). The plaintiffs maintain that Article III, Rule 2(f) of the collective bargaining agreement between the defendant contractors and Local 3 is direct proof of a conspiracy. That provision reads as follows:

> Every individual Employer agrees in addition to his regular work to solicit and perform residential, industrial and small types of work. The Employer will continually endeavor to make available and increase the volume of employment for electrical workers through salesmanship, enterprising [*36] business methods, being properly equipped to render efficient electrical services to the community, by promoting and encouraging modern installations and aiding the industry to educate the public of the need for improved electrical installations and expansion.

(CBA, Art. III, Rule 2(f)). The plaintiffs interpret this provision as an agreement by the contractors to use improper means, such as threats of work stoppages and vandalism, to force telecommunications contracts to be awarded to Local 3 contractors, thereby ensuring employment for Local 3 workers. The plaintiffs claim that this provision, when considered in conjunction with the other evidence they have submitted, "could readily be found by a jury as furthering a common purpose, and is certainly consistent with the classic conspiracy paradigm of an agreement coupled with overt acts in furtherance of an agreement." (Pl. Memo. at 3). However, there is no reason to believe that, in this context, "enterprising business methods" means anything sinister. The remainder of the plaintiffs' evidence does not justify an inference that Article III, Rule 2(f) is anything other than what it appears to be: a promise to use whatever lawful means [*37] are available to increase the demand for Local 3 labor.

The plaintiffs also make much of a meeting between representatives of Local 3 and various electrical contractors that apparently took place in 1996 or 1997. (Pl. Memo. at 9-10). Robert Eccles, Executive Vice President of defendant Nead Information Systems, testified that he put together a list of topics for Robert Marziotto, who is affiliated with both Nead Information Systems and Nead Electric, to bring up at the meeting. [15] (Excerpts of Deposition of Robert Eccles ("Eccles Dep."), attached as Exh. 8 to Andrews Decl., at 122-23). The first topic on the list reads: "CWA problem with respect to comp[et]ition s[c]enario, procedure when threatened by CWA and future of telecommunications with Local 3?" ("Topics for Meeting w/ Local Three," attached as Exh. 54 to Andrews Decl.). Mr. Eccles testified that he was referring to the possibility of implementing a different wage scale for workers who performed tel-data work, as opposed to high voltage work, so that Local 3 contractors would be better able to compete for telecommunications contracts:

> A. Can I go back and give this candidate labor rates, are they going to offer H rates again. [*38] . . . What do I do. What's my procedure. Since you don't have a dialogue with them and you --
> Q. With Local 3?
> A. -- there's no open communication. Is there something they can tell me to do to try and go and compete. Give me some direction that's real, that I can go to the client and say, I'll offer a great proposal, this wonderful proposal at a great number, and we can go win the work.

(Eccles Dep. at 125-26, 139). [16]

[15] The plaintiffs contend that the meeting was held specifically to discuss the issue of jobs lost to CWA contractors, but there is no evidence to that effect. Nor is there any direct evidence that any of the defendant contractors besides NIS attended the meeting. (See Eccles Dep. at 122-26, 132, 139; Excerpts of Deposition of Raymond A. Melville, attached as Exh. 20 to Andrews Decl., at 164-65).

[16] In September 1998, Mr. Eccles himself met with a representative of Local 3 to discuss the fact that Nead was losing telecommunications bids to CWA contractors. (Eccles Dep. at 108). In a letter to Mark Hansen, a business agent for Local 3, Mr. Eccles stated, "We are losing as much work to CWA as we are winning now and [it is] getting worse." (Letter of Robert Eccles dated Sept. [*39] 1, 1998 ("Eccles Letter"), attached as Exh. 54 to Andrews Decl.). Mr. Eccles sought a meeting with Mr. Hansen "to discuss this problem and review any recommendations you may have to competing in this marketplace [sic]." (Eccles Letter). Mr. Eccles eventually met with Howard Cohen of Local 3, but according to Mr. Eccles, Mr. Cohen "listened intently and nothing happened." (Eccles Dep. at 108).

The plaintiffs offer no evidence that representatives of Local 3 and the defendant contractors discussed the possibility of winning contracts by threatening to engage in vandalism or withhold overtime at that meeting or at any other time. [17] The plaintiffs themselves assert that Local 3 contractors were regularly losing telecommunications bids to CWA contractors during this time period because the higher wages commanded by Local 3 electricians made it difficult to compete. (Pl. Memo. at 8-9). It is hardly surprising that contractors employing Local 3 electricians would discuss the issue with union representatives. The evidence submitted by the plaintiffs, even when taken as a whole, does not justify an inference that the list of topics for discussion drafted by Mr. Eccles was anything other than [*40] an attempt to start a discussion with Local 3 regarding the possibility of wage concessions or other legitimate ways to increase the competitiveness of Local 3 contractors in the telecommunications market.

The plaintiffs also rely heavily on evidence of the perceptions of customers and general contractors, asserting that their "proof consists not only of evidence of specific situations where CWA's presence on the job site has led to disruptive acts by Local 3 . . . but more importantly, evidence of the state of mind fostered by the perception of the 'Local 3 problem' among those in the industry." (Pl. Memo. at 7). But even were this evidence sufficient to prove intimidation, the plaintiffs have offered little to support an inference that this "state of mind" arose as a result of the actions of anyone other than Local 3. An antitrust plaintiff cannot "rest on his allegations of a conspiracy to get to a jury without 'any significant probative evidence [*41] tending to support the complaint.'" Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, 477 U.S. 242, 249, 106 S. Ct. 2505, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1986) (quoting First National, 391 U.S. at 290). It is therefore necessary to examine the available evidence against each defendant contractor to determine whether the plaintiffs have put forward sufficient circumstantial evidence to permit an inference of conspiracy.

The plaintiffs have offered no evidence to support their claims that A R and NIS were part of a conspiracy. In the case of A R, there is evidence only that a business agent of Local 3 threatened an employee of a general contractor (Syntegra), as a result of which the work was awarded to A R. This does not support an inference that A R was part of the alleged conspiracy. Nor does the evidence implicate NIS in such a conspiracy, even assuming that NIS may be held responsible for actions taken by Nead Electric. On the Agency.com project, a general contractor (Structure Tone) told the owner's representative that she should hire a Local 3 telecommunications contractor. When she hired USIS, Nead Electric employees refused to work overtime. The plaintiffs have put forward no evidence to support an inference that Local 3 acted in concert with Nead [*42] Electric to force the owner to rescind its contract with USIS. Indeed, it appears that by putting more electricians to work during the regular work day, Nead Electric sought to ensure that its electricians' refusal to work overtime did not inconvenience the customer.

With respect to the Random House and Shearman & Sterling projects, the evidence reveals only that third parties (two general contractors and a building owner) required customers to use Local 3 contractors for telecommunications work. There is no evidence that they did so because they had been threatened by NIS, Nead Electric, or any other defendant contractor. [18]

With respect to the remaining defendants, there is some evidence that their employees told customers that hiring a CWA contractor would result in problems for the customer. In the case of Hugh O'Kane, there is evidence that a Local 3 shop steward stated that "there would be trouble in the building" if plaintiff [*43] Blue Diamond was awarded the contract. There is also evidence that employees of ADCO and Five Star told representatives of the building owners on two projects that electricians would not work overtime because the telecommunications work had been given to USIS. However, these incidents are insufficient to permit the plaintiffs to avoid summary judgment. As explained above, an antitrust plaintiff must "present evidence that 'tends to exclude the possibility that the alleged conspirators acted independently.'" *Reading Int'l, Inc., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 504, 2007 WL 39301, at 7 (quoting Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 588). In this case, the plaintiffs have not met their burden.

[17] Indeed, there is no evidence that the representatives at the meeting discussed Nead's list of concerns at all; Mr. Eccles testified that he did not think that Mr. Marziotto "ever got a chance to speak" at the meeting. (Eccles Dep. at 126).

[18] Although Shearman & Sterling's landlord did specifically ask the firm to hire NIS, its stated reason for doing so was it would make the work more efficient because Nead Electric was the "house vendor" and therefore the company was familiar with the building.

To begin with, it is not clear that the employees who made the statements at issue acted with the knowledge or approval of their employers. Each of the employees was a member of Local 3, and the Hugh O'Kane employee is identified as a union shop steward. According to the construction manager, Mr. Lott, when Mr. Graves, the Five Star assistant superintendent, threatened him at a meeting, he appeared to speak on behalf of Local 3, stating that the union "would be sure that the project was not completed if the work was not taken away from USIS." [*44] (Lott Dep. at 139). Indeed, Mr. Lott testified that the Five Star project manager removed Mr. Graves from the project after his outburst. [19]

Even assuming that the defendant contractors endorsed or condoned the statements at issue, however, it is entirely plausible that they did so in the absence of any agreement with Local 3 or with one another. Given Local 3's past actions and longstanding history of hostility toward CWA, the defendant contractors might well have been concerned that the presence of a CWA contractor on the job site would result in construction delays. Accordingly, they had an incentive to preserve their reputation by warning > the general contractor or the customer of a possible Local 3 "problem" beyond [their] control. Suppose that the contractor using Local 3 labor had been aware of the potential [*45] for disruption and delay but did not warn the general contractor or the customer. If the disruption or delay occurred and the general contractor or customer believed that the contractor using Local 3 labor was or should have been aware of this potential, the reputation of that contractor would be diminished.

(Declaration of John R. Woodbury dated Feb. 16, 2007 ("Woodbury Decl."), P 15). Furthermore, the contractor stood to benefit directly because such "warnings" increased the chances that it would be awarded telecommunications contracts. [20] (Woodbury Decl., P 16). However unfair it might seem to the plaintiffs for the defendant contractors to benefit from the misbehavior of their employees, such a benefit does not violate the antitrust laws unless it was a result of concerted, rather than independent, action.

The plaintiffs insist that "[i]n a normal business setting," a contractor that told customers that its employees were going to cause scheduling delays and raise construction costs would suffer damage to its reputation and would be fired or would lose future business. (Pl. Memo. at 4-5; Sec. Compl., P 40). They maintain that such behavior would only be rational in the context of the alleged conspiracy. According to the plaintiffs, the defendant contractors could afford to let customers know that they could not control their employees because they knew that "all other Local 3 contractors would deliver the same message" and that the customer therefore had no real choice. (Pl. Memo. at 4).

However, such behavior would also [*47] be rational in the absence of a conspiracy if each defendant contractor was aware, based upon the jurisdictional dispute between CWA and Local 3, that Local 3 members would cause problems, regardless of which electrical contractor they worked for, when a CWA contractor was on site. No other electrical contractor would have a competitive advantage, since they would encounter the same difficulties with their own employees. [21] Each electrical contractor would "deliver the same message" not because they had conspired

[19] Nor do the plaintiffs dispute that ADCO, in an apparent attempt to avoid delays, reassigned six workers who had refused to work overtime. This kind of behavior indicates that Five Star and ADCO sought to mitigate the damage caused by their workers' actions, rather than use it as a bargaining tool to force customers to give the telecommunications contract to a Local 3 contractor.

[20] Of course, the customer might be able to avoid conflict with Local 3 electricians by hiring a different Local 3 contractor for the telecommunications work. But the defendant contractors could reasonably assume that since they were already on the job and could begin right away, the customer would be reasonably likely to choose them as the replacement telecommunications contractor. [*46] Indeed, Five Star, ADCO, and Hugh O'Kane were each awarded telecommunications work on the projects in question after their employees began to cause construction delays. Although the Complaint refers to "numerous instances" in which electrical contractors whose employees stopped working overtime or committed vandalism "did not seek or obtain the telecommunications installation work" (Sec. Compl., P 40), the plaintiffs have put forward no admissible evidence to that effect.

[21] "Virtually all large commercial construction sites in the New York metropolitan area utilize only union labor" (Pl. Memo. at 6), and the vast majority of, if not all, union electricians in the New York City area are members of Local 3. (Sec. Compl., P 20).

together to do so but because none of them could control Local 3's actions. In this context, the defendant contractors would run very little risk of reputational harm or loss of business by telling customers that their employees were likely to cause problems. [22]

The plaintiffs claim that the defendant contractors' conduct is "too consistent to be coincidental rather than coordinated among themselves and through [Local 3]." (Sec. Compl., P 40). But it is equally plausible that the defendants acted in their own self-interest independent of Local 3 and of one another. In another type of case, the finder of fact might well be permitted to infer a conspiracy based upon the evidence put forward by the plaintiffs. However, "the factual and legal context within which each party presents its evidence . . . determines what are the reasonable inferences to be drawn [*49] from that evidence." R.B. Ventures, Ltd. v. Shane, 112 F.3d 54, 58 (2d Cir. 1997) (emphasis in original). On summary judgment, "although the court must draw the inferences in favor of the non-moving party, the permissible inferences are ultimately limited by the relevant substantive law." Id. Under the standard set forth by the Supreme Court in Matsushita, this Court cannot permit an antitrust case to go to trial where the evidence is "as consistent with permissible conduct as with illegal conspiracy." 475 U.S. at 588 (citing Monsanto, 465 U.S. at 764). Accordingly, summary judgment should be granted to the defendant contractors.

As explained above, unilateral conduct is outside the scope of § 1 of the Sherman Act. If Local 3 did in fact threaten building owners and general contractors and encourage its members to engage in workplace misconduct, it might well be liable for extortion. Its actions might also violate the collective bargaining agreement or constitute an unfair labor practice under the NLRA. However, Local 3's actions cannot constitute an antitrust violation under § 1 unless the union acted in concert with others. Because the plaintiffs have not put forward sufficient evidence [*50] that the defendant contractors conspired with Local 3 to exclude them from the telecommunications installation market, their claims against Local 3 should likewise be dismissed. [23]

E. State Law Claims

Generally, when all federal claims are dismissed, the remaining state claims should be dismissed [*51] without prejudice. Kolari v. New York-Presbyterian Hospital, 455 F.3d 118, 122 (2d Cir. 2006); In re Merrill Lynch Ltd. P'ships Litig., 154 F.3d 56, 61 (2d Cir. 1998). "Although this is not a mandatory rule, the Supreme Court has stated that 'in the usual case in which all federal-law claims are eliminated before trial, the balance of factors to be considered under the pendent jurisdiction doctrine -- judicial economy, convenience, fairness and comity -- will point toward declining jurisdiction over the remaining state-law claims.'" Merrill Lynch, 154 F.3d at 61 (quoting Carnegie-Mellon University v. Cohill, 484 U.S. 343, 350 n.7, 108 S. Ct. 614, 98 L. Ed. 2d 720 (1988)); see also Kolari, 455 F3d at 122.

Here, the plaintiffs allege that the defendants' conduct violated § 340 of the New York General Business Law, known as the Donnelly Act. That statute renders illegal any contract, arrangement, or agreement that restrains competition in any business. Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. v. Town of East Hampton, 997 F. Supp. 340, 352

Although a general contractor or building owner might be able to hire a non-unionized electrical contractor, that decision would hardly be a practical one, since [*48] it would invite protests by Local 3 and other building trades workers on the job site.

[22] The plaintiffs also contend that in the absence of a conspiracy, the defendant contractors would have disciplined those workers who refused to work overtime. (Pl. Memo. at 28, 30-31). However, the defendant contractors' decision not to enforce any remedy they may have had under the collective bargaining agreement could be a rational one even in the absence of a conspiracy. For example, the contractors may have chosen not to enforce the collective bargaining agreement in order to maintain peace with Local 3.

[23] It is therefore unnecessary to address the plaintiffs' request that I reconsider my August 1, 2006 decision insofar as it barred the plaintiffs from relying on a series of judicial and administrative decisions that document Local 3's "total job policy" of using work stoppages, violence, and vandalism to obtain tel-data installation work. (Pl. Memo. at 5 n.6, 33-43). Even assuming that the total job policy remains in effect, unilateral action by Local 3 to keep CWA out of the tel-data installation trade does not violate the Sherman Act. It is also unnecessary to address the defendants' contention that, under § 6 of the Norris-LaGuardia Act, 29 U.S.C. § 106, in order to hold Local 3 responsible for any acts by its members or officers, the plaintiffs must present "clear proof" that the union participated in, authorized, or ratified the alleged act. (Joint Def. Memo. at 12-13; Local 3 Memo. at 8-9).

(E.D.N.Y. 1998). It "is patterned after the Sherman Anti-Trust Act . . . and is generally construed in light of federal precedent." Id.; accord Re-Alco Industries, Inc. v. National Center for Health Education, Inc., 812 F. Supp. 387, 393 (S.D.N.Y. 1993). [*52] Thus, "[l]ike § 1 of the Sherman Act, § 340 prohibits only concerted action." Harlem River Consumers Cooperative, Inc. v. Associated Grocers of Harlem, Inc., 408 F. Supp. 1251, 1283 (S.D.N.Y. 1976); see also Reading International, 317 F. Supp. 2d at 332-33 ("Under New York law, the state and federal antitrust statutes require identical basic elements of proof." (internal quotation marks and citation omitted)).

However, it is not clear that the heightened standard for demonstrating an antitrust conspiracy that governs claims under § 1 of the Sherman Act also applies to the Donnelly Act. The parties have not identified a case from the New York state courts that establishes such a principle, and I have found none. [24] It is therefore prudent to dismiss the Donnelly claims without prejudice. See Gonzalez v. St. Margaret's House Housing Development Fund Corp., 880 F.2d 1514, 1520 (2d Cir. 1989) (if federal antitrust claims dismissed, court has discretion to decline jurisdiction over Donnelly Act claim); Omega Homes, Inc. v. City of Buffalo, 4 F. Supp. 2d 187, 194-95 (W.D.N.Y. 1998) (declining jurisdiction over Donnelly Act claims after dismissing federal antitrust claims).

Similarly, the Court should decline jurisdiction over the plaintiffs' claims of tortious interference against the defendant contractors. The analogous claims against Local 3 were previously dismissed. *U.S. Infor. Sys., 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1038, 2002 WL 91625, at 13. Conclusion

For the reasons set forth above, I recommend that summary judgment be granted to the defendants, and that the plaintiffs' claims under § 1 of the Sherman Act be dismissed. I further recommend that the plaintiffs' remaining state law claims be dismissed without prejudice. Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1) and Rules 72, 6(a), and 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the parties shall have ten (10) days from this date to file written objections to this Report and Recommendation. [*54] Such objections shall be filed with the Clerk of the Court, with extra copies delivered to the chambers of the Honorable Richard M. Berman, U.S.D.J., Room 650, and to the chambers of the undersigned, Room 1960, 500 Pearl Street, New York, New York 10007. Failure to file timely objections will preclude appellate review.

Respectfully submitted,

[24] One federal district [*53] court opinion rejected claims under both § 1 of the Sherman Act and the Donnelly Act because, based on the evidence, an inference of conspiracy was no more plausible than a finding that the defendants had acted unilaterally. *Tokarz v. Opinion

SAND, J.

Plaintiff, Klickads, Inc., d/b/a BrokersNYC (BrokersNYC), a listings information technology (IT) firm that sells listings databases and other IT products to real estate brokerage firms in New York, brought this antitrust action against the Real Estate Board of New York, Inc. (REBNY), a real estate industry trade association, several brokerage firms that are members of REBNY and their employees, and two of its competitors, RealPlus LLC and On-Line Residential, Inc. (OLR), alleging violations of section 1 and section 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1-2 (2000), violation of New York's Donnelly Act, N.Y. Gen. Bus. Law § 340, and tortious interference with economic relations. Before the Court is defendants' motion for summary judgment on all claims.

Unless otherwise noted, the following facts are not disputed in any material way:

Prior to 2002, residential real estate brokers in Manhattan did not necessarily share their exclusive sales or [*2] rental listings with other brokers. In order to capture the entire commission on a transaction, many listing brokers tried to find a buyer themselves rather than offer the listing to other brokers who would then share in the commission if they found a buyer. Brokers who did share listings, did so on a voluntary ad-hoc basis. Unlike many localities throughout the country, the majority of brokers in Manhattan do not subscribe to a centralized multiple listing service (MLS) through which they would be required to share exclusive listings with other subscribers through a centralized database. Sharing listings through some sort of mandatory co-brokerage agreement, like an MLS, helps property sellers by placing their listing in front of a wider audience of buyers and helps buyers by increasing the pool of properties available through a single broker. In short, an MLS has many procompetitive virtues. See, e.g., Pomanowski v. Monmouth County Bd. of Realtors, 89 N.J. 306, 318, 446 A.2d 83 (1982).

Because Manhattan has no centralized MLS database that all subscribing brokers can access, each brokerage firm must maintain its own database of listings. Some firms do this in-house with their own listings management [*3] systems, which allow them to electronically store, access, and search listings. These firms must therefore purchase computer systems from a listings IT vendor and employ listings staffs to compile listings, enter them into the database, and remove old listings. Other firms (especially smaller firms) outsource their listings management to companies, like plaintiff and defendant OLR, that employ a listings staff to maintain a listings database and then sell subscriptions to brokerage firms to access that database. By outsourcing to vendors like plaintiff, brokerage firms can avoid the high upfront cost of acquiring an in-house listings management system.

In 2002, REBNY, a trade association whose members make up the bulk of residential real estate brokers in Manhattan, implemented mandatory co-brokerage rules requiring its members to share their exclusive residential listings with other REBNY members within 72 hours. Initially, REBNY members were permitted to share their listings by fax, by email, or, if they were RealPlus customers, electronically through RealPlus's R.O.L.E.X. data transmission system. When listings were shared by fax or email, each firm had to manually input the shared [*4] listings into their own listings database.

Defendant RealPlus, a listings management IT vendor owned by Eric Gordon and Terra Holdings (the parent company of brokerage defendants Brown Harris Stevens and Halstead), developed a data transmission system called R.O.L.E.X., which allows listings data to be shared seamlessly between different in-house listings management systems, thus eliminating the need for listings staff to manually input listings transmitted by R.O.L.E.X. from one RealPlus system to another. RealPlus also created interfaces with the in-house listings management systems at four large brokerage firms-defendants Prudential Douglas Elliman, Corcoran, Stribling, and Bellmarc--allowing them to use R.O.L.E.X. to share listings with each other and with RealPlus systems.

In April 2003, REBNY changed the co-brokerage rules to no longer allow listings to be shared by fax. Around that time, at the request of several REBNY members who used defendant OLR's service as their listings database, REBNY created a universal email address for OLR allowing listings to be shared by email directly with OLR. Although plaintiff requested that REBNY create a similar email address for BrokersNYC [*5] and later forwarded requests from several REBNY members who used BrokersNYC's services, REBNY did not create a universal email address for BrokersNYC. In an internal memo dated April 29, 2003, REBNY outlined a "twenty-five firm policy" for listings IT vendors seeking a universal email address. In sum, REBNY would only provide a universal email address if the vendor could show that it had at least twenty-five clients who were currently members in good standing of REBNY's co-brokerage program. (Mem. from Deborah Beck, Friedman Decl. Ex. 82.) The memo also noted that only OLR and RealPlus had over twenty-five clients who were REBNY members. (Id.

In June 2004, REBNY announced that as of January 2005 all listings would have to be exchanged over the R.O.L.E.X. data transmission system. Around the same time, REBNY was engaged in discussions with Eric Gordon and Terra Holdings, the owners of RealPlus, about purchasing either the R.O.L.E.X. standard or an equity stake in RealPlus. In these negotiations, RealPlus consistently took the position that other than the four firms that already had a R.O.L.E.X. interface (defendants Prudential Douglas Elliman, Corcoran, Stribling, and Bellmarc) who would [*6] be grandfathered in, no additional interfaces would be created and all brokerage firms wishing to use

R.O.L.E.X. would have to use RealPlus as their listings management system. (See, e.g., Friedman Decl. Exs. 99, 101, 105.)

Eventually, however, at REBNY's request, RealPlus agreed to create a R.O.L.E.X. interface for OLR giving OLR customers access to real time seamless listings updates, just like RealPlus customers. In an email to RealPlus owner Eric Gordon, Dianne Ramirez, President of Halstead and Co-Chair of the board of directors of the residential division of REBNY, explained that REBNY wanted RealPlus to create an interface for OLR to appease a "major player" brokerage firm CitiHabitats, an OLR customer, and to avoid a potential antitrust lawsuit by OLR. (Friedman Decl. Ex. 103.) Plaintiff and another listings IT vendor, VLS (which has since gone out of business), made several requests for a data interface with R.O.L.E.X. on the same terms as OLR and offered to pay any costs that would be incurred in creating such an interface. RealPlus, however, did not create an interface and REBNY declined to do anything to encourage RealPlus to create an interface with plaintiff or VLS.

Once [*7] REBNY had mandated the use of R.O.L.E.X. to exchange listings, the only way for brokerage firms who did not use RealPlus or OLR to participate in the co-brokerage arrangement, which was renamed the REBNY Listing Service (RLS), was to use a link on the REBNY website to input and access listings data. Although the website link was open to all REBNY members, including plaintiff's clients, it was an inferior alternative to an interface with R.O.L.E.X. While R.O.L.E.X. provided real time and seamless updates to users' listings databases, the data available on the website was only updated periodically and still required listings staff to input manually the listings from the website into an in-house listings database. Thus brokers who did not use RealPlus or OLR had to give up access to crucial real time updates to listings data.

According to plaintiff's expert, in 2002 sales for plaintiff, RealPlus and OLR each represented about a third of the market for listings IT services in Manhattan, which plaintiff contends is the relevant market for antitrust analysis. By 2006, plaintiff claims that RealPlus's market share in Manhattan had grown to over 70% while plaintiff's had fallen to 13%. (Ludwick [*8] Decl. P 18.) RealPlus and OLR's shares of the national market for listings IT services, which defendants contend is the relevant market for antitrust analysis, is slight. Plaintiff alleges that the brokerage defendants collectively make up over 80% of the residential real estate brokerage market in Manhattan and control the board of the residential division of REBNY.

II

Section 1 of the Sherman Act provides: "Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal." 15 U.S.C. § 1 (2000). "To establish a § 1 violation, a plaintiff must produce evidence sufficient to show: (1) a combination or some form of concerted action between at least two legally distinct economic entities; and (2) such combination or conduct constituted an unreasonable restraint of trade either per se or under the rule of reason." Tops Markets, Inc. v. Quality Markets, Inc., 142 F.3d 90, 95-96 (2d Cir. 1998).

A. Concerted Action

To meet the concerted action requirement of a section 1 claim, plaintiff must show that at least two distinct legal entities formed a "conscious commitment to [*9] a common scheme designed to achieve an unlawful objective." Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 768, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775 (1984). Concerted action may be proven by direct evidence of an explicit agreement or by circumstantial evidence of an informal or tacit agreement. See Apex Oil Co. v. DiMauro, 822 F.2d 246, 252-53 (2d Cir. 1987); see also Reazin v. Blue Cross Blue Shield of Kansas, Inc., 899 F.2d 951, 963 (10th Cir. 1990). However, the range of permissible inferences that can be drawn from ambiguous evidence is limited in an antitrust case. Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 588, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986). To survive a motion for summary judgment, a plaintiff must point to evidence "that tends to exclude the possibility that the alleged conspirators acted independently." Id.

Plaintiff points to two types of concerted action that it argues give rise to section 1 liability. First, plaintiff argues that the rules and actions of REBNY as an association of brokers constitute concerted action by its member firms-namely the brokerage defendants. More specifically, plaintiff argues that the member brokerage firms agreed through REBNY that they would use only one type of transmission [*10] system (R.O.L.E.X.) provided by only two suppliers on the approved vendors list pursuant to the twenty-five firm rule (RealPlus and OLR) to exchange listings and that this agreement restricted competition between the firms by preventing them from seeking cheaper or more effective transmission systems.

Defendants are correct to note that not every action by a trade association is concerted action by the association's members. AD/SAT v. Associated Press, 181 F.3d 216, 234 (2d Cir. 1999). The Second Circuit has noted that "[t]o the extent that [trade associations] are buying and selling [products or services] in their own right, they can be fairly regarded as single entities whose selling decisions are not 'price fixing conspiracies' and whose buying decisions are not 'boycott conspiracies' of rejected suppliers." Id. (quoting 7 Phillip E. Areeda et al., Antitrust Law P 1477)(alterations in original). But neither is every action of a trade association immune from antitrust scrutiny. The Second Circuit also noted that there is no conceptual difficulty in treating trade associations as continuing conspiracies when they regulate areas where their members are in competition. Id. (citing 7 [*11] Areeda § 1477). Accordingly, "an antitrust plaintiff must present evidence tending to show that association members, in their individual capacities, consciously committed themselves to a common scheme designed to achieve an unlawful objective." Id.

In this case, plaintiff has raised a genuine issue of fact as to whether the brokerage defendants acted in concert to restrain trade through REBNY. Plaintiff points to decisions by REBNY's board of directors, where a majority of the seats are controlled by the brokerage defendants, that affect competition between REBNY members--namely adopting the twenty-five firm policy and designating approved and preferred vendors. These were not the types of purchasing or hiring decisions in the everyday operation of a trade association that Professor Areeda and the Second Circuit in AD/SAT cautioned against construing as concerted action. See 181 F.3d at 234. Whether these decisions were unreasonable restraints of trade is a separate inquiry from whether the defendants acted in concert. Plaintiff also points to circumstantial evidence that tends to support a motive for establishing policies to exclude plaintiff. Several of the brokerage defendants were [*12] owned by the same parent company as RealPlus giving them a direct financial stake in eliminating plaintiff as a competitor. Plaintiff also argues that all of the brokerage defendants, as large brokerage firms in Manhattan, had an incentive to keep plaintiff's subscription services for small brokers off the market to maintain their competitive advantage with pricey in-house listings management systems. In short, whether the brokerage defendants "consciously committed themselves," through REBNY, to exclude plaintiff from participation in the RLS as a preferred or approved vendor, is a question of fact for the jury.

The second type of concerted action that plaintiff alleges is an agreement between RealPlus and REBNY to promote RealPlus's services and to create high barriers of entry for RealPlus's competitors. Plaintiff alleges that REBNY and RealPlus agreed that, beyond the four brokerage firms which were grandfathered in and eventually OLR, no new interfaces to the R.O.L.E.X. transmission system would be created. Thus all new participants in the RLS who wanted real time access to listings would have to use RealPlus or OLR.

Plaintiff offers no direct evidence of an explicit agreement between [*13] REBNY and RealPlus on the creation of new interfaces, but points to several pieces of circumstantial evidence. Before REBNY announced its rule that all listings must be exchanged over R.O.L.E.X. and while REBNY was in negotiations with Eric Gordon and Terra to purchase an equity stake in RealPlus or just the R.O.L.E.X. transmission system, Gordon insisted that a condition of any deal would be:

> An agreement with REBNY that, other than the firms already grandfathered in, all firms wishing to utilize R.O.L.E.X. must use RealPlus as the front end for maintaining listings. No additional interfaces would be created. By having firms grand-fathered in, the four firms that have already created a RealPlus interface: Corcoran, Elliman, Stribling, and Bellmarc would be protected. All other firms would be required to use RealPlus.

(Friedman Decl. Ex. 101.) This condition created problems for REBNY because CitiHabitats, a "major player" wanted to continue to use OLR. Eventually RealPlus agreed to create an interface for OLR and REBNY mandated the use of R.O.L.E.X. as the exclusive means to exchange listings in real time on the RLS. Plaintiff has pointed to no evidence of any explicit agreement, but [*14] a jury could reasonably infer that an implicit term of this agreement was that REBNY and RealPlus would not create any more R.O.L.E.X. interfaces. Again the common ownership of RealPlus and several brokerage defendants who control a substantial number of REBNY's board seats provides circumstantial evidence of a motive to reduce the competition faced by RealPlus that would tend to exclude the possibility that REBNY and RealPlus acted independently. This is sufficient to raise a question of fact as to whether RealPlus and REBNY agreed to block any further potential competitors from access to R.O.L.E.X.

B. Restraint of Trade

The second element of a section 1 claim is that the agreement constitutes an unreasonable restraint of trade. Some types of agreements are so obviously anticompetitive that they are per se unreasonable restraints of trade. For most agreements, however, the plaintiff must show that the agreement is an unreasonable restraint of trade under the rule of reason. Plaintiff argues that defendants' conduct is an unreasonable restraint of trade under both the per se rule and under the rule of reason.

1. Per Se Rule

Per se treatment is reserved for conduct like price fixing that [*15] is "so plainly harmful to competition and so obviously lacking in any redeeming pro-competitive values" that it can be "conclusively presumed illegal without further examination." Capital Imaging Assocs. v. Mohawk Valley Med. Assocs., 996 F.2d 537, 542 (2d Cir. 1993); see also Leegin Creative Leather Prods., Inc. v. PSKS, Inc., 127 S. Ct. 2705, 2713, 168 L. Ed. 2d 623 (2007)("Resort to per se rules is confined to restraints…that would always or almost always tend to decrease competition and reduce output."). If a restraint is per se illegal, a court need not inquire into the "reasonableness of an individual restraint in light of the real market forces at work." Leegin Creative, 127 S. Ct. at 2713.

Citing the Supreme Court's decision in Klor's, Inc. v. Broadway-Hale Stores, Inc., 359 U.S. 207, 212, 79 S. Ct. 705, 3 L. Ed. 2d 741 (1959), plaintiff argues that defendants have engaged in a horizontal group boycott that constitutes a per se violation of section 1. In the boycott context, however, the per se rule is limited to cases involving horizontal agreements among direct competitors. NYNEX Corp. v. Discon, Inc., 525 U.S. 128, 135, 119 S. Ct. 493, 142 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1998). Courts will give per se treatment to group boycotts where firms with a dominant position in the [*16] relevant market or unique access to a business element necessary for effective competition cut off access to a supply, facility, or market necessary for the plaintiff to compete without any plausible procompetitive justification. Northwest Wholesale Stationers, Inc. v. Pacific Stationery & Printing Co., 472 U.S. 284, 294, 105 S. Ct. 2613, 86 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1985).

The Court need not now decide whether plaintiff's claims should be treated under the per se rule or the rule of reason. [1] It is enough, at this point, to note that plaintiff cannot sidestep its obligation to identify and prove the relevant antitrust market. Without knowing the relevant market, the Court cannot assess defendants' market power or whether access to a R.O.L.E.X. interface is an essential element for plaintiff to compete in the relevant market. Thus we turn now to the rule of reason and analysis of the relevant market.

2. Rule of Reason

[1] Plaintiff also argues that defendants' conduct should be subject to "quick look" analysis, citing Law v. NCAA, 134 F.3d 1010, 1020 (10th Cir. 1998). In Law, the Tenth Circuit applied a truncated rule of reason analysis to an NCAA rule limiting salaries of graduate-assistant basketball coaches to $ 16,000, which it characterized as [*17] a horizontal price fix with obvious anticompetitive effect and summarily condemned without an analysis of the defendant's market power. Id. Here, unlike Law, plaintiff does not allege any agreement on prices in the market for listings IT services. "Quick look" treatment is inappropriate.

Under the rule of reason, "plaintiff bears the initial burden of showing that the challenged action has had an actual adverse effect on competition as a whole in the relevant market." Capital Imaging, 996 F.2d at 543 (emphasis in original). The burden then shifts to the defendants "to offer evidence of the pro-competitive 'redeeming virtues' of their combination." Id. If the defendant comes forward with such proof, the burden shifts back to the plaintiff "to demonstrate that any legitimate collaborative objectives proffered by defendant could have been achieved by less restrictive alternatives, that is those that would be less prejudicial to competition as a whole." Id. It is then up to the factfinder to weigh the harms and benefits of the challenged behavior. Id. A plaintiff can satisfy its initial burden either by pointing to direct evidence of actual detrimental effects on competition, [*18] like reduced output or actual control over prices, or by showing that defendants possess sufficient market power in the relevant market that their "arrangement has the potential for genuine adverse effects on competition." Id. at 546 (quoting F.T.C. v. Indiana Fed'n of Dentists, 476 U.S. 447, 460-61, 106 S. Ct. 2009, 90 L. Ed. 2d 445 (1986)).

Plaintiff offers no direct evidence of actual detrimental effects on competition other than a bald assertion that REBNY "exercised actual control over prices when it set a very high price for using the e-mail/website access to send and receive RLS listings once or twice a day, thus compelling brokers to purchase Listings IT Services from [RealPlus] or OLR with real time access to RLS data for only slightly higher prices." (Pl. Mem. in Opp. at 27.) This type of showing is insufficient at the summary judgment stage. We turn therefore to analysis of the relevant market.

Defendants argue that the market for listings IT services is at least national in scope and therefore defendants do not have market power in the relevant market. Plaintiff argues that the Manhattan listings IT services market is a distinct market where RealPlus and OLR have substantial market share. Both sides have submitted [*19] expert reports supporting their market definitions and plaintiff argues that at the very least, a triable issue of fact as to the definition of the relevant market exists.

The relevant market "is composed of products that have reasonable interchangeability for the purposes for which they are produced-price, use, and qualities considered." United States v. E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 351 U.S. 377, 404, 76 S. Ct. 994, 100 L. Ed. 1264 (1956). The products or services need not be identical to be part of the same market. See id. at 394. A court may define a market as "any grouping of sales whose sellers, if unified by a hypothetical cartel or merger, could profitably raise prices significantly above the competitive level. If the sales of other producers substantially constrain the price-increasing ability of the hypothetical cartel, these others are part of the market." AD/SAT, 181 F.3d at 228 (quoting 2A Areeda P 533)(emphasis in opinion). In analyzing the relevant market, courts consider a number of factors beyond the reasonable interchangeability of product and its claimed substitutes. See Geneva Pharms. Tech. Corp. v. Barr Labs., Inc., 386 F.3d 485, 496 (2d Cir. 2004). These factors include "such practical indicia [*20] as industry or public recognition of the submarket as a separate economic entity, the product's peculiar characteristics and uses, unique production facilities, distinct customers, distinct prices, sensitivity to price change, and specialized vendors," Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 325, 82 S. Ct. 1502, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1962), as well as the existence of significant barriers to entry to the relevant market. See Geneva Pharms., 386 F.3d at 499-500 (finding market for generic drug distinct from market for "therapeutically equivalent" brand name drug because, inter alia, high barriers to entry in generic market prevented potential competitors from offering substitutes).

In this case, genuine issues of fact exist as to the definition of the relevant market. Plaintiff argues that, even if the products are similar, substantial barriers to entry keep national listings IT services vendors from selling to brokerage firms in Manhattan. Plaintiff argues that access to real time listings data from the RLS is essential for brokers to effectively compete in the Manhattan marketplace. Therefore a listings IT services vendor must be able to develop an interface with R.O.L.E.X. and the ability to send and receive RLS [*21] listings in real time to be able to compete with RealPlus and OLR to sell listings management systems to brokers in Manhattan. But the only way for a new entrant to obtain an interface with R.O.L.E.X. is for RealPlus to agree to create it. RealPlus has already shown that it is not inclined to create new interfaces by rejecting plaintiff's request and resisting OLR's and it has no rational reason to create interfaces with any new potential competitors. These barriers to entry place RealPlus and OLR in a position where, if they formed a hypothetical cartel, they could profitably raise prices above the competitive level. As long as REBNY continues to mandate exchange of listings through R.O.L.E.X., Manhattan brokers have no substitutes available.

Additional questions of fact exist with respect to the interchangeability of the products offered by Manhattan listings IT services vendors and national vendors. Plaintiff's expert listed eight factors which he claims make Manhattan listings IT products different from the products offered in the national market. Defendants' expert argues that the products share the same core functionality and that all of the differentiating features could be addressed [*22] through a small degree of customization making the products offered by national vendors adequate substitutes for the Manhattan market. The experts disagree on the degree of customization that would be required to make the products interchangeable. This is a question of fact for the jury.

Defendants argument that plaintiff cannot show antitrust injury because defendants lack market power depends on the definition of the relevant market. If the jury were to find that the relevant market was the Manhattan listings IT services market, plaintiff has offered evidence that defendants' market share in that market is over 70% and potential competitors face high barriers to entry. Therefore a jury reasonably could find that defendants have market power in the relevant market and from that infer that there was harm to competition.

Under the rule of reason analysis, once plaintiff has met its threshold burden, the burden shifts to the defendants to offer a procompetitive justification for their conduct. Here, defendants argue that promoting the exchange of exclusive listings has substantial procompetitive effects in the residential real estate brokerage market and choosing a single transmission [*23] standard makes the exchange more efficient. Plaintiff does not contest this. But a substantial question of fact exists as to whether defendants' purported justification for denying plaintiff and other potential competitors an interface with the R.O.L.E.X. system (that additional interfaces present technological difficulties, reduce efficiency, and increase the chance of errors) outweighed its anticompetitive effects.

Because substantial questions of fact exist with respect to concerted action, market definition, and procompetitive justifications, summary judgment on plaintiff's section 1 claims is inappropriate.

III

Section 2 of the Sherman Act prohibits monopolization, attempted monopolization and conspiracy to monopolize any part of trade or commerce. 15 U.S.C. § 2. Plaintiff claims that defendants have attempted or conspired to monopolize both the Manhattan listings IT services market and the Manhattan residential brokerage services market.

A. Claims of Monopolization of Manhattan Listings IT Services Market

Defendants argue that plaintiff's monopolization claims, whether for actual monopolization, attempted monopolization or conspiracy to monopolize, fail as a matter of law because [*24] liability under section 2 cannot rest on a theory of shared monopoly.

As the Eastern District explained in Flash Electronics, Inc. v. Universal Music & Video Distribution Corp., with respect to "claims of actual or attempted monopolization, the Second Circuit has specifically indicated that it will not entertain arguments based on a 'shared monopoly' theory of liability." 312 F. Supp. 2d 379, 397 (E.D.N.Y. 2004)(citing H.L. Hayden Co. of New York, Inc. v. Siemens Med. Sys., Inc., 879 F.2d 1005, 1018 (2d Cir. 1989).

In the amended complaint, plaintiff alleges that there is a dangerous probability that defendants RealPlus and OLR will be able to establish a monopoly position in the Manhattan listings IT services market. (Amended Compl. P 128.) This is a claim for actual or attempted monopolization based on a shared monopoly between RealPlus and OLR; as such, it must fail.

The complaint does not clearly allege a conspiracy to monopolize claim, but even if the Court were to construe it to raise allegations of conspiracy or allow plaintiff to amend the complaint, a claim of conspiracy to monopolize based on a shared monopoly between RealPlus and OLR would also fail as a matter of law. While [*25] the Second Circuit has not squarely addressed the question of whether a shared monopoly theory of liability is viable in the context of a conspiracy to monopolize, district courts in this and other circuits have expressed skepticism on the issue, even if they have stopped short of categorically rejecting the possibility of such a claim. See Flash Electronics, 312 F. Supp. 2d at 397. In Sun Dun Inc. of Washington v. Coca-Cola Co., 740 F. Supp. 381, 391-92 (D. Md. 1990), the court said that a claim of conspiracy to form a shared monopoly might be viable "if the aim of the conspiracy was to form a single entity to possess illegal market power," but if the goal of the conspiracy was to create a market environment where market power continued to be shared among the coconspirators as otherwise unrelated entities, no claim is stated under section 2. The Eastern District in Santana Products v. Sylvester & Associates, Ltd., 121 F. Supp. 2d 729 (E.D.N.Y. 1999), took a slightly more expansive view saying that "a [*26] claim for conspiracy to monopolize may also be stated where two or more competitors seek to allocate a market and exclude competitors, even if they do not form a single corporate entity," id. at 740 n.1, but absent an allegation that competition between the monopolizing parties has diminished, a claim of conspiracy to form a shared monopoly must fail. Id. at 738; see also Flash Electronics, 312 F. Supp. 2d at 397.

In this case, plaintiff has not pointed to any evidence that RealPlus and OLR seek to form a single entity or that competition between them has diminished or that they have allocated customers. In fact, defendants point to evidence that competition between the two defendants is robust and that RealPlus was forced to lower its prices in response to competition from OLR. Even under the more permissive view in Santana Products, plaintiff cannot make out a claim for conspiracy to form a shared monopoly. Defendants are therefore entitled to summary judgment on plaintiff's claims of actual monopolization, attempted monopolization, and conspiracy to monopolize the Manhattan listings IT services market.

B. Claims of Monopolization of Manhattan Residential Brokerage Services Market

Plaintiff [*27] alleges that the brokerage defendants violated section 2 by monopolizing or attempting to monopolize the Manhattan Residential Brokerage Services Market. Plaintiff lacks standing to prosecute such a claim because it is neither a consumer nor a competitor in the relevant market. See Associated Gen. Contractors of Cal., Inc. v. Cal. State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 537-44, 103 S. Ct. 897, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723 (1983); Illinois ex rel. Ryan v. Brown, 227 F.3d 1042, 1046 (7th Cir. 2000)("normally only consumers or competitors have standing"). Plaintiff does not buy or sell residential brokerage services. As vendor of IT services whose customers are competitors in the relevant market, plaintiff is too remote a party to have antitrust standing.

Even if plaintiff did have standing, the claim is one of shared monopoly and would fail for the same reasons plaintiff's claim for monopolization of the Manhattan listings IT services market fails.

IV

Plaintiff also brings two state law claims: (1) violation of New York's Donnelly Act, N.Y. Gen. Bus. Law § 340, and (2) tortious interference with economic relations.

The Donnelly Act is generally construed in accordance with the federal Sherman Act, see Yankees Entm't & Sports Network, LLC v. Cablevision Sys. Corp., 224 F. Supp. 2d 657, 677-78 (S.D.N.Y. 2002), [*28] and the two acts require identical elements of proof for claims of monopolization. See Int'l Television Prods. Ltd. v. Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corp., 622 F. Supp. 1532, 1540 (S.D.N.Y. 1985). Accordingly, to the extent that defendants are entitled to summary judgment under section 2 of the Sherman Act, they are also entitled to summary judgment for monopolization claims under the Donnelly Act. To the extent that plaintiff's Donnelly Act claims track its claims under section 1 of the Sherman Act, defendants are not entitled to summary judgment.

An essential element of a claim for tortious interference with economic relations in New York is that the defendant acted solely out of malice and not simply in pursuit of normal economic self interest. See Carvel Corp. v. Noonan, 3 N.Y.3d 182, 190, 818 N.E.2d 1100, 785 N.Y.S.2d 359 (2004). Plaintiff does not even allege that defendants' actions were solely for the purpose of inflicting intentional harm on plaintiff, let alone point to evidence to support such a claim. In its opposition brief, plaintiff acknowledges that defendants were acting in their own economic self interest to advance the business interests of RealPlus. (Pl.'s Mem. in Opp. at 35.) A showing that defendants [*29] acted in their competitive self interest does not demonstrate the requisite motive to prove tortious interference. See Carvel, 3 N.Y.3d at 191. Accordingly defendants are entitled to summary judgment on the tortious interference claim.

Defendants have alerted the Court to the fact that plaintiff named Prudential Real Estate Affiliates, Inc. and William B. May Co., R.E. Inc. as defendants in the amended complaint but never effected service on them. Defendants ask that the court dismiss these two parties from the action pursuant to Rule 4(m) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Plaintiff has not opposed this request. Accordingly Prudential Real Estate Affiliates, Inc. and William B. May Co., R.E. Inc. are dismissed from the action.

Finally, defendants moved to strike portions of the summary judgment record as irrelevant or inadmissible. The Court having relied on none of the material that is the subject of the motion to strike, that motion is denied as moot in light of the disposition of the defendants' summary judgment motion.

VI

For the reasons set forth above, defendants' motion for summary judgment is granted in part and denied in part. Defendants' motion for summary judgment [*30] on plaintiff's claims under section 1 of the Sherman Act is denied. Summary judgment is granted in favor of defendants on plaintiff's section 2 claims. Summary judgment is granted in favor of defendants on the Donnelly Act claims to the extent that those claims track plaintiff's claims under section 2 of the Sherman Act. Summary judgment is granted in favor of defendants on plaintiff's state law tort claims. Prudential Real Estate Affiliates, Inc. and William B. May Co., R.E. Inc. are dismissed from the action. Defendants' motion to strike is denied as moot.

The parties are directed to submit a pretrial order by September 4, 2007.

SO ORDERED.

Every contract, combination, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States is declared to be illegal. 15 U.S.C.S. § 1. Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

HN7[] Sherman Act, Claims

To establish a claim under § 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, a plaintiff must establish that the defendants contracted, combined or conspired among each other, that the combination or conspiracy produced adverse, anticompetitive effects within relevant product and geographic markets, that the objects of and conduct pursuant to that contract or conspiracy were illegal, and that the plaintiff was injured as a proximate result of that conspiracy.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Per Se Rule Tests > Manifestly Anticompetitive Effects

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Sherman Act

HN8[] Per Se Rule Tests, Manifestly Anticompetitive Effects

The rule of reason requires a court to analyze the history of the restraint and the restraint's effect on competition. The rule of reason analysis employs a burden-shifting framework. First, the plaintiff must establish that the restraint produces significant anticompetitive effects within the relevant product and geographic markets. This is usually shown through the use of expert testimony regarding the geographic market and a defendant's market power. If the plaintiff meets this burden, the defendant must come forward with evidence of the restraint's procompetitive effects to establish that the alleged conduct justifies the otherwise anticompetitive injuries. If the defendant is able to demonstrate procompetitive effects, the plaintiff then must show that any legitimate objectives can be achieved in a substantially less restrictive manner. If there is demonstrable evidence that the challenged restraint is unreasonable, then there is significant evidence of competitive harm, and therefore there is no need to resort to tools such as expert testimony to define the geographic market and determination of market power.

In Daubert, the U.S. Supreme Court provided a nonexhaustive list of factors which may, in any given case, bear on a trial judge's gatekeeping determination. These factors include: (1) whether a theory or technique can be (and has been) tested, (2) whether the theory has been subjected to peer review and publication; (3) whether, with respect to a particular technique, there is a high known or potential rate of error and whether there are standards controlling the technique's operation; and (4) whether the theory or technique enjoys general acceptance within a relevant scientific community. The Court has made clear that these same factors apply to all types of expert testimony.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Market Definition > Relevant Market > Geographic Market Definition

HN11[] Relevant Market, Geographic Market Definition

The Elzinga-Hogarty test analyzes patterns of consumer origin and destination to identify relevant competitors of the contracting entities. In other words, the test measures the extent to which a product comes into (in-flow) and leaves (out-flow) the market. In-flow and out-flow are represented by the two variables of the test, LOFI (little out from inside) and LIFO (little in from outside), which are expressed in percentages. In order to show actions which indicate market power having an adverse effect on competition, a plaintiff would need to show that the in-flow and out-flow are low. Low scores would demonstrate the existence of a cohesive geographic market and show defendants' market power. Courts that have used the Elzinga-Hogarty test in antitrust cases have found that a 10 percent threshold is needed for a strong result. That is, a geographic market is properly defined when 10 percent or less of the consumers leave the area to obtain the product and when 10 percent or less of consumers who obtain the product come in from outside the area.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Market Definition > Relevant Market > Geographic Market Definition

When the evidence indicates that a large proportion of consumers within the proposed area in fact turn to alternative sources of supply outside the proposed area, the market boundaries posited by an antitrust plaintiff must be rejected.

Opinion

[*692] AVERN COHN, District Judge. This is purported to be an antitrust case. Plaintiff-Appellant Dr. [2] Sundar V. Nilavar sued defendant-appellees Mercy Health System-Western Ohio ("MHS"), Catholic Healthcare Partners, Michael J. Peterson, Jerold A. Maki, Dr. Robin Osborn, and Diagnostic Imaging of Ohio, Inc. ("DIA") [1] (collectively, "defendants"), asserting claims under state and federal antitrust law as well as related state tort claims. Plaintiff appeals from the district court's orders granting defendants' motion for summary judgment and motion to exclude plaintiff's expert's testimony, and from the denial of plaintiff's motion for reconsideration regarding the same. As will be explained, plaintiff challenges only the dismissal of his antitrust claims. For the reasons that follow, we affirm.

I.

Plaintiff, a radiologist who last practiced medicine in 1995, sued defendants, claiming injuries resulting from a decision by MHS to enter into an exclusive contract for radiology services with Dr. Robin Osborn and his medical

[*] The Honorable Avern Cohn, United States District Judge for the Eastern District of Michigan, sitting by designation.

[1] Plaintiff's claims against Dr. Osborn and DIA were dismissed and are not at issue on appeal.

corporation, DRI, to provide radiology services at the two hospitals MHS operates in Springfield and Urbana, Ohio (the "Mercy Hospitals"). [2] For some years prior to 1995, plaintiff [3] practiced radiology as part of a member of a practice group, Springfield Radiology, Inc. ("SRI"), of which Dr. Osborn was also a member. SRI served Mercy Hospitals in providing radiology services, although not under a formal exclusive relationship. Dr. Osborn left SRI sometime in early 1995 and formed DIA. In March 1995, MHS issued a Request for Proposal ("RFP") for exclusive physician radiology services at the Mercy Hospitals. Three physician groups responded to the RFP, including DIA. On September 2, 1995, plaintiff learned that DIA would be awarded the contract and that he had not been included in the DIA proposal. By September 22, 1995, plaintiff experienced severe depression which prevented him from working.

[*693] DIA was awarded the contract in December of 1995, effective January 1, 1996. As a result, MHS notified plaintiff that his clinical privileges would be terminated with MHS as of January 1, 1996. Plaintiff, however, retained privileges at Springfield Community Hospital, but declined an offer to work there due to his ongoing [4] depression.

In 1996, plaintiff sued Dr. Osborn and DIA in state court, claiming breach of contract, estoppel, breach of fiduciary duty, and fraud arising out of Dr. Osborn's failure to negotiate the exclusive contract with MHS on his behalf. As part of the state case, plaintiff admitted that he has been unable to practice medicine as of September 22, 1995, because of severe depression resulting from Dr. Osborn's actions. Plaintiff obtained a $ 100,000.00 jury verdict against Dr. Osborn. The Ohio appellate court upheld the judgment, but remanded for a new trial on damages. The case was settled on remand.

On November 19, 1999, plaintiff sued defendants in federal court, making eight claims, as follows: (1) contract in restraint of trade, in violation of section 1 of the Sherman Act; (2) tying arrangement in restraint of trade, in violation of section 1 of the Sherman Act; (3) contract and tying arrangement in restraint of trade, in violation of Ohio's Valentine [Antitrust] Act; (4) a state law claim of tortious interference with a business relationship; (5) a state law claim of breach of implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing; (6) a state law claim of civil conspiracy; (7) a state [5] law claim of denial of due process; and (8) a state law claim of breach of contract. Defendants filed a motion to dismiss, which the district court granted in part and denied in part. The district court dismissed Counts Two and Five, and parts of Counts Three and Six. Nilavar v. Mercy Health Sys.-W. Ohio, 142 F. Supp. 2d 859, 880-90, 894 (S.D. Ohio 2000). The district court later entered a stipulation dismissing all remaining claims against Dr. Osborn and DIA. Plaintiff then added a ninth claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendants then filed a motion for summary judgment based primarily on judicial estoppel as a result of plaintiff's statements in the state court case. The district court denied the motion. Nilavar v. Mercy Health Sys.-W. Ohio, 254 F. Supp. 2d 897, 911 (S.D. Ohio 2003).

Defendants filed a second motion for summary judgment on all of plaintiff's claims except Count Nine, which was added after their motion was filed. On the date of defendants' filing, plaintiff dismissed his state and federal antitrust claims based on illegal tying. Thus, only his state and federal antitrust claims relating to the exclusive contract remained. Defendants also filed [6] a motion to bar the testimony of plaintiff's economics expert, Dr. John Pisarkiewicz.

The district court granted defendants' motions. As to the motion to strike the expert, the district court found that the expert's methodology for determining a relevant "geographic market" was unreliable. As to the motion for summary judgment, the district court found that plaintiff's claims failed as a result of his failure to have expert testimony on the geographic market and on the grounds that he could not show an antitrust injury because the contract at issue was a mere "reshuffling of competitors" and the exclusive contract was of such short duration that it could not restrain trade. The district court also asked the parties to address the viability of Count Nine (intentional infliction of emotional distress).

[2] Defendant Catholic Healthcare Partners is the corporate parent of MHS, and the two individual defendants, Michael Peterson and Jerold Maki, are officers of MHS.

Plaintiff filed a motion for reconsideration. Defendants filed a motion for summary judgment on Count Nine. The district court denied plaintiff's motion and granted defendants' motion. A final judgment [*694] was entered. Plaintiff appeals, challenging the dismissal of his antitrust claims and exclusion of his expert's testimony.

Plaintiff's antitrust theory is that defendants excluded plaintiff [7] and other radiology providers from the Mercy Hospitals by granting an exclusive contract to DIA to supply radiology services and that DIA complied with MHS's "cost-cutting interests" by utilizing "dangerous and less expensive contrast agents," which resulted in higher prices and reduced quality of radiology services at the Mercy Hospitals that dominated the Springfield-Urbana area of Southwestern Ohio.

B.

Plaintiff argues that the district court misconstrued the facts and misapplied the law regarding antitrust actions. Plaintiff says he presented evidence of actual harm resulting from the exclusive contract and therefore expert testimony on the relevant geographic market was not necessary. Plaintiff alternatively argues that his expert's methodology was reliable and should not have been excluded. He further argues there are genuine issues of material fact as to whether he suffered an antitrust injury and whether the exclusive contract was anticompetitve.

Defendants argue that there is no evidence of an antitrust injury and that exclusive contracts, such as the one at issue, are commonplace in the medical field and do not violate the antitrust laws. Defendants further argue that plaintiff's expert's ever-changing reports demonstrate the flaws in his methodology in determining the relevant market.

C.

Plaintiff claims that defendants' exclusive contract for radiology services with DIA violates section 1 of the Sherman Act and Ohio's Valentine [9] Act, chapter 1331 of the Ohio Revised Code. (1982) (internal quotation marks omitted). However, the Supreme Court has long recognized that Congress intended to outlaw only "unreasonable" restraints. State Oil Co. v. Ed. 259 (1898), for the proposition that Congress does not always intend a literal interpretation of the word "every").

We have stated:

> HN7[] to establish a claim under section 1, the plaintiff must establish that the defendants contracted, combined or conspired among each other, that the combination or conspiracy produced adverse, anticompetitive effects [10] within relevant product and geographic markets, that the objects of and conduct pursuant to that contract or conspiracy were illegal and that the plaintiff was injured as a proximate result of that conspiracy.

Crane & Shovel Sales Corp. v. Bucyrus-Erie Co., 854 F.2d 802, 805 (6th Cir. 1988) (internal quotation marks omitted) (quoting Davis-Watkins Co. v. Serv. Merch., 686 F.2d 1190, 1195-96 (6th Cir. 1982), overruled in part by Bailey's, Inc. v. Windsor Am., Inc., 948 F.2d 1018, 1029 n.5 (6th Cir. 1991)).

As noted above, the district court granted summary judgment to defendants on the grounds that plaintiff (1) failed to show sufficient evidence of anti-competitive conduct, including defining the relevant geographic market, (2) failed to establish a genuine issue of material fact as to antitrust injury, and (3) failed to show that the exclusive contract restrained trade. The first ground overlays the district court's decision regarding the exclusion of plaintiff's proposed expert. Each ground is discussed in turn.

As to whether plaintiff produced sufficient evidence of anticompetitive conduct, "[t]wo analytical approaches are used to determine whether a defendant's conduct unreasonably [11] restrains trade: the per se rule and the rule of reason." Law v. Nat'l Collegiate Athletic Ass'n, 134 F.3d 1010, 1016 (10th Cir. 1998) (citing S.C.F.C. I.L.C., Inc. v. Visa U.S.A., Inc., 36 F.3d 958, 963 (10th Cir. 1994)). The district court previously determined that the rule of reason applied. See Nilavar, 142 F. Supp. 2d at 873-74.

HN8[] "The rule of reason . . . requires a court to analyze the history of the restraint and the restraint's effect on competition." Nat'l Hockey League Players' Ass'n v. Plymouth Whalers Hockey Club, 325 F.3d 712, 718 (6th Cir. 2003). "The rule of reason analysis employs a burden-shifting framework." Id. (citing Cal. Dental Ass'n v. FTC, 526 U.S. 756, 775 n.12, 119 S. Ct. 1604, 143 L. Ed. 2d 935 (1999)). First, the plaintiff must establish that the restraint produces significant anticompetitive effects within the relevant product and geographic markets. See Tanaka v. Univ. of S. Cal., 252 F.3d 1059, 1063 (9th Cir. 2001). This is usually shown through the use of expert testimony regarding the geographic market and a defendant's market power. "If the plaintiff meets this burden, the defendant must come forward with evidence of the restraint's procompetitive effects" to establish that the alleged [12] conduct justifies the otherwise anticompetitive injuries. Id.; see also United States v. Brown Univ., 5 F.3d 658, 669 (3d Cir. 1993). If the defendant is able to demonstrate procompetitive effects, the plaintiff then must show that any legitimate objectives can be achieved in a substantially less restrictive manner. Law, 134 F.3d at 1019.

However, the Supreme Court has found that if there is demonstrable evidence that [*696] the challenged restraint is unreasonable, then there is significant evidence of competitive harm, and therefore there is no need to resort to tools such as expert testimony to define the geographic market and determination of market power. The rationale is that market power is simply a surrogate for actual detrimental effects. See FTC v. Ind. Fed'n of Dentists, 476 U.S. 447, 458-61, 106 S. Ct. 2009, 90 L. Ed. 2d 445 (1986).

When faced with the exclusion of his expert, plaintiff argued in his motion for reconsideration that the expert's testimony was not necessary because the record contained significant evidence of competitive harm. The district court rejected this argument. Plaintiff points to the same evidence considered by the district court, contending that it raises a genuine issue of material fact [13] as to whether actual detrimental effects flowed from the exclusive contract between MHS and DIA. We agree with the district court that none of plaintiff's evidence rises to the level of significant competitive harm.

First, plaintiff points to the fact that under the exclusive contract, defendants were able to use less expensive ionic contrast agents in radiology procedures, a practice which plaintiff has long opposed. While plaintiff says the use of ionic, instead of non-ionic, contrast agents is dangerous, there is no evidence that any patient at MHS suffered as a result of the use of ionic contrast agents. Plaintiff also admitted at deposition that the ionic debate was a non-issue by February 1995. Thus, this is not evidence of an actual detrimental effect on competition or consumers.

Plaintiff also points to the fact that the contract permits the use of temporary or part-time physicians and that Dr. Osborn doubled his income under the contract. However, plaintiff has no evidence that any patients suffered as a result. There is also no evidence that any of the temporary or part-time physicians were unqualified.

In short, the record does not contain sufficient evidence of detrimental [14] effects that would obviate the need for plaintiff to identify the relevant geographic market and market power in order to determine whether the exclusive contract violates section 1 of the Sherman Act.

(1)

Whether plaintiff established sufficient evidence of a geographic market so as to show an antitrust violation centers on whether the district court erred in excluding plaintiff's proposed expert's testimony.

Federal Rule of Evidence 702 provides:

> HN9[] If scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue, a witness qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education, may testify thereto in the form of an opinion or otherwise, if (1) the testimony is based upon sufficient facts or data, (2) the testimony is the product of reliable principles and methods, and (3) the witness has applied the principles and methods reliably to the facts of the case.

Fed. R. Evid. 702. This rule reflects the Supreme Court's decisions in Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharm. Inc., 509 U.S. 579, 113 S. Ct. 2786, 125 L. Ed. 2d 469 (1993) and Kumho Tire Co. v. Carmichael, 526 U.S. 137, 119 S. Ct. 1167, 143 L. Ed. 2d 238 (1999). In Daubert, HN10[] the Supreme Court provided a nonexhaustive [15] list of factors which may, in any given case, bear on a trial judge's gatekeeping determination. 509 U.S. at 592-94. These factors include: (1) whether a "theory or [*697] technique . . . can be (and has been) tested," (2) whether the theory "has been subjected to peer review and publication;" (3) whether, with respect to a particular technique, there is a high "known or potential rate of error" and whether there are "standards controlling the technique's operation"; and (4) whether the theory or technique enjoys "general acceptance" within a "relevant scientific community." Id. Six years after issuing Daubert, the Court made clear in Kumho that these same factors apply to all types of expert testimony. 526 U.S. at 148-49.

The district court determined that although plaintiff's proposed expert, John Pisarkiewicz, Ph.D., could opine as to the relevant product market, his proffered testimony with respect to the proposed geographic market was inadmissible under Rule 702. The district court found two flaws in the expert's analysis: (1) adjustments made by the expert to his analysis contradicted his proposed product market definition, which resulted in his opinion being based on unreliable methods; [16] and (2) the adjustments made were incorrect as a matter of law.

Plaintiff offered the following definition of the relevant geographic market: "the physician component of diagnostic radiology services provided in [a] . . . hospital setting" with a relevant submarket consisting of "the physician component of diagnostic radiology services provided to inpatients." As to the locale, plaintiff defined it as "essentially comprising Clark and Champaign Counties," consisting of an area encompassed by nineteen ZIP codes. The expert explained that his primary tools for opining that defendants exercise market power in that geographic area were the Elzinga-Hogarty test and the critical loss test. Defendants argued, as they do here, that the expert's opinion is unreliable because he manipulated those tests to arrive at a conclusion favorable to plaintiff. The district court agreed. We also agree.

HN11[] The Elzinga-Hogarty test analyzes patterns of consumer origin and destination to identify relevant competitors of the contracting entities. See FTC v. Freeman Hosp., 69 F.3d 260, 264 (8th Cir. 1995). In other words, the test measures the extent to which a product comes into (in-flow) and leaves (out-flow) [17] the market. In-flow and out-flow are represented by the two variables of the test, LOFI (little out from inside) and LIFO (little in from outside), which are expressed in percentages. In order to show actions which indicate market power having an adverse effect on competition, a plaintiff would need to show that the in-flow and out-flow are low. Here, plaintiff would have to show that few residents of his geographic market leave the area to obtain hospital-based radiological services (LOFI) and that few patients residing outside of the geographic market come to the area to obtain hospital based radiological services (LIFO). Low scores would demonstrate the existence of a cohesive geographic market and show defendants' market power. Courts that have used the Elzinga-Hogarty test in antitrust cases have found that a 10% threshold is needed for a strong result. See Gordon v. Lewistown Hosp., 272 F. Supp. 2d 393, 426 (M.D. Pa. 2003). That is, a geographic market is properly defined when 10% or less of the consumers leave the area to obtain the product and when 10% or less of consumers who obtain the product come in from outside the area. Id.

In the expert's initial report, he found a LIFO [18] ratio of 4.8% and a LOFI of 25.0%. While the test says that 25% is a weak result, the expert described it as "good." He also suggested that the results could [*698] be strengthened by using individual ZIP codes rather than county borders. Indeed, at his deposition, the expert supplemented his report by removing from consideration ZIP codes in the southwest corner of Clark County and the northeast corner of Champaign County. This caused his out-flow to drop to 16% and in-flow to increase to 11%. Following his deposition, the expert further refined his analysis under the Elzinga-Hogarty test in an affidavit. In the affidavit, he states that after further refinement, the average LOFI and LIFO ratios are 8.7%, or within the 10% generally called for by the test.

As explained by the district court, these refinements fundamentally altered the results of the test, rendering them unreliable. The first problem is that the expert excluded patients from the geographic market who required a procedure for which more than 90% of them left the market. The district court found that such exclusion was improper as a matter of law. We agree. This Circuit has held that HN12[] "when the evidence indicates that a large [19] proportion of consumers within the proposed area in fact turn to alternative sources of supply outside the proposed area, the market boundaries posited by the plaintiff must be rejected." Re/Max Int'l, Inc. v. Realty One, Inc., 173 F.3d 995, 1017 (6th Cir. 1999) (citing Bathke v. Casey's Gen. Stores, Inc., 64 F.3d 340, 346 (8th Cir. 1995)).

The district court further noted that the expert's admission that some of the patients who left the area for services, whom he specifically excluded, did so not because the services they required were not available at one of the three hospitals, but because the services were perceived to be better elsewhere. This fact alone shows the presence of competition in the market. The expert also excluded patients who left the area to visit specialty hospitals or out-of-state hospitals or who required obstetrics and newborn care services. There is simply no proper justification for all of these exclusions. These exclusions also indicate the presence of competition, as patients are able to leave the geographic market to obtain services, which presumably are available in the market, where they desire. At best, the exclusion show an improper application of the [20] Elzinga-Hogarty test. At worst, they show an effort to manipulate the test. The district court was correct in excluding the expert's report on this ground.

The expert also justified his conclusions using the critical loss test. This test is from the Federal Trade Commission's Horizontal Merger Guidelines. It assesses whether a market participant would be able to raise prices without causing a "critical loss" of consumers that would make the price increase ultimately unprofitable. See Coastal Fuels of P.R., Inc. v. Caribbean Petroleum Corp., 79 F.3d 182, 198 (1st Cir. 1996) ("The touchstone of market definition is whether a hypothetical monopolist could raise prices."). The price increase recommended by the Merger Guidelines is 5%. As applied to this case, the test would ask how many patients would have to leave the market in order to defeat a price increase by defendants of 5% and whether those patients actually would leave the market. Defendants argue that the expert erred in using "gross charges" for inpatient and outpatient radiological services when calculating the critical loss figure, rather than actual charges. The district court bypassed this criticism, noting a more fundamental [21] flaw with utilization of the critical loss test--the fact that patients were leaving the geographic area in the absence of any price increase. As noted above, the expert's initial conclusion was that 25% of patients within the geographic [*699] market were leaving the area to obtain radiology services elsewhere. Because some patients were already leaving, it makes no logical sense that these same patients would not also leave if prices increased. In an attempt to rationalize this fact, the expert claimed that the patients who were leaving were obtaining radiology services that were unavailable in the geographic market. This statement, if true, contradicts the defined product market, which is "all diagnostic radiology services provided in a hospital setting." This definition does not distinguish between the type of services (other than inpatient or outpatient) provided. Thus, the district court did not err in finding the expert's report inadmissible on this ground.

(5)

Overall, the expert's opinion, whether based on the Elzinga-Hogarty test or the critical loss test, is flawed to the point of unreliability. While the tests themselves are appropriate and within the parameters of Daubert, the [22] way in which the expert applied the tests undercuts his opinion to the point that it is inadmissible under Rule 702.

The district court also determined, alternatively, that plaintiff's antitrust claim failed because he did not establish an antitrust injury. A private antitrust plaintiff, in addition to having to show injury-in-fact and proximate cause, must allege, and eventually prove, "antitrust injury." Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 489, 97 S. Ct. 690, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977). "Antitrust injury" is (1) "injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent" and (2) injury "that flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful." Id. As explained by the Supreme Court in Brunswick, the antitrust injury doctrine is designed to ensure that "[t]he injury . . . reflect the anticompetitive effect either of the violation or of anticompetitive acts made possible by the violation." Id. The Supreme Court has further explained the requirement as "ensur[ing] that the harm claimed by the plaintiff corresponds to the rationale for finding a violation of the antitrust laws in the first place," and, more specifically, it "ensures that a plaintiff can recover only if the loss stems from [23] a competition-reducing aspect or effect of the defendant's behavior." Atl. Richfield Co. v. U.S.A. Petroleum Co., 495 U.S. 328, 342-44, 110 S. Ct. 1884, 109 L. Ed. 2d 333 (1990).

The district court, relying on Balaklaw v. Lovell, 14 F.3d 793 (2d Cir. 1994), held that plaintiff failed to establish an antitrust injury because the exclusive contract between defendants and DIA was the result of competition between radiology providers. The facts in Balaklaw are similar to the instant case. In Balaklaw, a physician who was president of a group of anesthesiologists that had been the de facto provider of anesthesiology services at a hospital in Cortland, New York, sued claiming an antitrust violation after his group lost in the competition to be granted an exclusive-provider contract at that hospital. The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit held that plaintiff had not suffered an antitrust injury under the circumstances. The Second Circuit explained:

> "[I]t is the nature of competition that at some point there are winners and losers, and the losers are excluded." Konik v. Champlain Valley Physicians Hosp. Med. Ctr., 733 F.2d 1007, 1015 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 884, 105 S. Ct. 253, 83 L. Ed. 2d 190 (1984). Here, Dr. Balaklaw entered the competition [24] for an exclusive contract, he interviewed for it, and he lost. He was therefore excluded from further practice at CMH > during the term of the contract. Especially in [*700] light of the Supreme Court's recognition that a hospital has the "unquestioned right to exercise some control over the identity and the number of doctors to whom it accords staff privileges," Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 30, and the frequently expressed judicial approval of exclusive contracts for medical services, . . . such exclusion is not enough to constitute an antitrust injury. As we said in Konik, "the Hospital is not required to open its operating rooms to any and all anesthesiologists who wish to practice there." 733 F.2d at 1015. By closing it doors to Dr. Balaklaw in favor of one of his competitors, CMH did nothing to inflict an injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent.

Balaklaw, 14 F.3d at 801-02 (internal citations omitted).

A careful examination of the evidence shows that the exclusive contract was truly the result of a competitive process. Although plaintiff says that the process was not competitive because Dr. Osborn "duped" the members of SRI into believing that he was submitting a [25] proposal on behalf of SRI and colluded with members of Mercy to assure that DIA was awarded the contract, plaintiff admits that there were other bidders for the contract. Plaintiff offers no evidence to support his allegations, which are based solely on speculation. The facts show that SRI was the de facto exclusive provider of radiology services to Mercy for a number of years. Mercy and SRI negotiated, unsuccessfully, to establish an exclusive contractual relationship. Mercy thereafter decided to solicit proposals for an exclusive contract. RFPs were sent to seven radiology groups, including SRI. Three groups submitted proposals. MHS appointed a committee to review the proposals, and the committee recommended DIA. One marketplace participant replaced another; that does not establish an antitrust violation. The fact that an Ohio state court jury found that Dr. Osborn breached an agreement with plaintiff by not including his name in the DIA proposal, of which there is no evidence MHS had knowledge, does not mean that the overall process was anticompetitive.

Plaintiff also says that the process was anticompetitive in that the exclusive contract resulted in a significant reduction in physician [26] radiology services because physicians, including plaintiff, lost their privileges after the contract was adopted. However, a loss of staff privileges at a facility does not ispo facto establish an antitrust injury. See Oksanen v. Page Mem'l. Hosp., 945 F.2d 696, 708 (4th Cir. 1991) ("If the law were otherwise, many a physician's workplace grievance with a hospital would be elevated to the status of an antitrust action.").

Moreover, it cannot be ignored that this case involves a staffing decision by MHS regarding the provider of radiology services. There is extensive circuit precedent, including our own, that has upheld hospital-based exclusive provider agreements as not violative of the antitrust laws. Although the reasons vary for the decisions, they offer support for the finding that a hospital's decision regarding staffing, including privileges, is not anticompetitive. See, e.g., Flegel v. Christian Hosp., Ne.-Nw., 4 F.3d 682 (8th Cir. 1993) (osteopaths denied privileges because they lacked certification from a particular organization); Capital Imaging Assocs., P.C. v. Mohawk Valley Med. Assocs., Inc., 996 F.2d 537 (2d Cir. 1993) (radiologists challenging exclusive contract); Lie v. St. Joseph Hosp., 964 F.2d 567 (6th Cir. 1992) [27] (physician's surgical privileges were suspended); Tarabishi v. McAlester Reg'l Hosp., 951 F.2d 1558 (10th Cir. 1991) (physician opened up a treatment center and [*701] hospital greatly reduced his privileges); Oksanen, 945 F.2d at 696 (physician suspended, put on probation and then terminated); Bhan v. N.M.E. Hosp., 929 F.2d 1404 (9th Cir. 1991) (anesthetist was excluded by policy of allowing only physicians to perform anesthesia services); Todorov v. D.C.H. Healthcare Auth., 921 F.2d 1438 (11th Cir. 1991) (physician denied radiology privileges); Morgan, Strand, Wheeler & Biggs v. Radiology, Ltd., 924 F.2d 1484 (9th Cir. 1991) (radiologists challenging exclusive contract); Nurse Midwifery Assocs. v. Hibbett, 918 F.2d 605 (6th Cir. 1990) (midwives and obstetrician allege they were prevented from operating a maternity practice or offering midwifery services at hospitals); Beard v. Parkview Hosp., 912 F.2d 138 (6th Cir. 1990) (radiologist challenging exclusive contract); Ezpeleta v. Sys., 789 F.2d 353 (5th Cir. 1986) (physician's privileges terminated); Konik v. Champlain Valley Physicians Hosp., 733 F.2d 1007 (2d Cir. 1984) [28] (anesthesiologist challenging contract); Dos Santos v. Columbus-Cuneo-Cabrini Med. Ctr., 684 F.2d 1346 (7th Cir. 1982) (vacating preliminary injunction that was decided in favor of anesthesiologist who was challenging exclusive contract).

Finally, plaintiff contends that whether the contract restrained trade is a factual dispute over which there are genuine issues. We disagree. The contract was entered into in 1995 and nominally effective for only two years. The district court initially declined to dismiss plaintiff's antitrust claim on these grounds, noting that plaintiff alleged the evidence may show that the opportunity to compete in two years was illusory. After having the benefit of discovery, plaintiff's allegation as to the contract's illusory nature simply did not come to pass.

4.

Defendants also argue that the district court may be affirmed on other grounds, including the statute of limitations and lack of antitrust standing. Both arguments were presented to and rejected by the district court. See Nilavar, 142 F. Supp. 2d at 859. Defendants did not cross appeal from these rulings; we therefore need not address them. Defendants also offer additional grounds for excluding the [29] opinion of plaintiff's expert. We decline to address them.

III.

For the reasons stated above, the district court is AFFIRMED.
