2. Engaging the pivotal catch through the latch opening; and
3. Swinging the pivotal catch into substantially the plane of the folded closure panel.

"Tightening action is not inherent in these manipulations, which may or may not produce a tightening action, depending upon the particular overlap relationship between the closure panels and the degree to which the pivotal catch is folded relative to its associated closure panel."

The plaintiffs contend that nowhere in the Ganz patent is the claimed invention [*559] as to the tightening particularly pointed out and distinctly claimed. They contend that because of that claimed situation the Ganz patent is invalid because of vagueness and indefiniteness as to the matter of the claimed invention.

In connection with Claims 1, 2 and 4 of the Weiss patent the plaintiffs contend that those claims are invalid because they are too vague and indefinite. In their brief the plaintiffs state:

"It is essential that the public be able to read the patent claims and determine with a reasonable degree of certainty what structures are and are not covered thereby. The claim interpretation which defendant [24] presents, involving the question of whether or not the locking structure as actually manipulated has produced a 'tightening effect', makes it impossible for a competitor to determine whether his product infringes. * * * The only way one can tell is by knowing just how the carton was manipulated as it passed through the assembly machine. Anomalously, if it was manipulated as actually disclosed in the Ganz patent in suit, so that no tightening effect is produced by the locking structure, there would be no infringement. * * *"

The defendant contends that the Weiss patent is not vague and indefinite [77] as to the matter of tightening. In that connection in its brief it states:

"The disclosure of the Weiss specification makes it clear that Mr. Weiss's objective was to design a wrap-around carton blank for simultaneously forming and filling a tight, open-ended package. * * *.

"* * *

"Insofar as the issues in this case are concerned, only the 'primary lock' of the Weiss patent requires consideration. This primary lock consists of an opening in one of the overlapping closure panels and a latching flap and catch as part of the other overlapping closure panel. This arrangement, [25] in a properly designed and dimensioned carton blank, provides the rotary latching action, resulting in automatic tightening of the carton against the side walls of the cans (Weiss, Tr. 219). The 'secondary lock' is useful for keeping the primary lock in place after it has been completed (Weiss, Tr. 220-221).

"* * *

"Each of claims 1, 2 and 4 in suit includes reference to this crucial tightening action. Claim 1 states that 'the action of the catch will produce an automatic tightening of the side walls against the contents as it cams or levers the closure panels into the fully closed overlapping position.' Claims 2 and 4 refer to 'the catch [hooking] around the edge of the opening to draw the overlapping panels together.'"

The defendant contends that the Ganz patent is not vague and indefinite as to the matter of tightening. The defendant in its brief states as follows in that connection:

"* * * His [Ganz] machine was specifically designed for forming, filling, and locking wrap-around carton blanks of the Weiss patent in suit to produce multipacks. In this regard, the Ganz patent specification states (col. 1, ll. 12-23):

"'My invention has special application [26] to use with paperboard cartons of the type disclosed in the copending application of Arthur J. Weiss, Serial No. 748,728, filed July 15, 1958, a continuation-in-part of Serial No. 613,935, filed February 7, 1958, now abandoned. Such cartons have overlapping closure panels, one of which has a latch opening and the other of which includes a pivotal catch for engagement with such latch opening. In applying such a carton to cans, the closure panels in the completed package are locked together. The catch of one panel is inserted within the latch openings of the other panel, and is then swung so as to lock the catch.'

"Mr. Ganz testified (Tr. 629) that one of the objectives he wanted to accomplish [*560] was to design a locking mechanism which would provide a tight package. Reference is made to this objective in the Ganz patent specification as follows:

"'The pivotal catch must be inserted and locked so as to maintain a tight finished package.' (col. 1, ll. 39-40)

"The machine of the Ganz patent, when properly adjusted, produces and maintains 'a tight finished package' (Ganz, Tr. 628, 633-35; Myers, Tr. 833-4; 862)."

19. The contentions and arguments of the parties [27] referred to as to the matter of vagueness and indefiniteness require a consideration of certain statutes and decisions relating thereto. HN1[] Under the provisions of Section 111, Title 35 U.S.C.A., it is provided that an application for a patent shall have a specification as prescribed by Section 112, Title 35 U.S.C.A., and a drawing as prescribed by Section 113, Title HN2[] 35 U.S.C.A. Section 112, Title 35 U.S.C.A., referred to provides, in part, as follows:

"The specification shall contain a written description of the invention, and of the manner and process of making and using it, in such full, clear, concise, and exact terms as to enable any person skilled in the art to which it pertains, or with which it is most nearly connected, to make and use the same, and shall set forth the best mode contemplated by the inventor of carrying out his invention.

"The specification shall conclude with one or more claims particularly pointing out and distinctly claiming the subject matter which the applicant regards as his invention. * * *"

HN3[] It is well established that the claims of the patent constitute the measure of invention monopoly. Graver Tank & Mfg. Co. v. Linde Co. (1949), 336 U.S. [28] 271, 69 S. Ct. 535, 93 L. Ed. 672. It is also well established that the claims of a patent are to be interpreted and read in the light of the specifications. Schriber-Schroth Co. v. Cleveland Trust Co. (1940), 311 U.S. 211, 312 U.S. 654, 61 S. Ct. 235, 85 L. Ed. 132.

In the case of Graver Tank & Mfg. Co. v. Linde Co., supra, the United States Supreme Court, in discussing that portion of a [78] statute which appears as Section 112, Title 35 U.S.C.A., requiring an inventor to separately state his claims and to particularly point out and distinctly claim what he regards as his invention, stated (p. 277 of 336 U.S. p. 538 of 69 S. Ct.):HN4[]

"* * * While vain repetition is no more to be encouraged in patents than in other documents, and claims like other statements may incorporate other matter by reference, their text must be sufficient to 'particularly point out and distinctly claim' an identifiable invention or discovery. * * *"

It was heretofore noted that the two patents here in question are based on a combination of old elements. In the case of Halliburton Oil Well Cementing Co. v. Walker (1946), 329 U.S. 1, 67 S. Ct. 6, 91 L. Ed. 3, there was involved a patent based on a combination [29] of old elements. The particular issue in the case was whether the inventor had particularly pointed out and distinctly claimed what he claimed was his invention under the provisions of the statute heretofore referred to and set out. The Court stated (p. 3 of 329 U.S. p. 7 of 67 S. Ct.): HN5[] "This statutory requirement of distinctness and certainty in claims is important in patent law." The Court, after stating that the courts have viewed claims to patents based on combinations of old elements with very close scrutiny, goes on to state (p. 10 of 329 U.S. p. 11 of 67 S. Ct.): "It is quite consistent with this strict interpretation of patents for machines which combine old elements to require clear description in combination claims."

20. In neither Claim 4 of the Ganz patent nor in any other claims therein is there any mention made of any tightening effect produced by the locking mechanism of the Ganz machine. In the specification references are made to a great many matters. Included in the references is a brief reference to the matter of maintaining a "tight finished package". It [*561] is the finding of the Court that the Ganz patent does not particularly point out and distinctly [30] claim the invention presently claimed as required by Section 112, Title 35 U.S.C.A.

21. The situation is not the same as to the Weiss patent. In Claim 1 of that patent the matter of "automatic tightening" is particularly pointed out and is distinctly claimed. It is the finding of the Court that the Weiss patent does particularly point out and distinctly claim the invention claimed.

22. It was heretofore noted that it was the contention of the plaintiffs that the defendant could not enforce the Weiss patent because the provisions of Section 135(c), Title 35 U.S.C.A., hereafter set out, were not complied with in regard to the matter of the filing of the agreement between the Federal Paper Board Company and the Continental [79] Can Company, Inc., in connection with the termination of the interference proceedings between the Arneson carton and the Weiss carton. HN6[] Section 135(c), requiring the filing of settlement agreements in connection with the termination of interference proceedings, was enacted on October 15, 1962, while the interference proceedings were still pending. The attorneys have cited no cases arising under that statute.

In the House Committee Report relating to that enactment, [31] which appears in United States Code and Congressional and Administrative News, 87th Congress, Second Session, 1962, pp. 3286-3289, the following appears:

"PURPOSE

"The purpose of this bill is to amend the patent laws to require the filing in the Patent Office of agreements settling patent interference proceedings. When two or more applicants claim substantially the same invention > an interference is declared in order to determine which applicant is entitled to priority. Interference proceedings may be terminated in a manner hostile to the public interest by using patent interference settlement agreements as a means of restricting competition. To make such a practice more difficult the bill requires the filing of such agreements in the Patent Office."

In material accompanying the Report it was stated that the United States Supreme Court had, in the absence of a statute, condemned a particular private interference settlement. Precision Instrument Manufacturing Co. v. Automotive Maintenance Machinery Co. (1945), 324 U.S. 806, 65 S. Ct. 993, 89 L. Ed. 1381.

In 1955 a license agreement had been entered into between Morris Paper Mills, the corporate predecessor of Federal [32] Paper Board Company, and the Robert Gair Company, the corporate predecessor of the Continental Can Company, Inc. Various questions had arisen between the parties as to what extent the Federal Paper Board Company had rights to the JAK-ET-PAK developments of the Continental Can Company, Inc. Negotiations between the parties had extended for a considerable period of time prior to June 18, 1962. On June 18, 1962, the Federal Paper Board Company and the Continental Can Company, Inc., entered into the agreement heretofore referred to. The agreement was quite lengthy. Under it the Federal Paper Board Company secured an exclusive license for the Weiss carton and for the Ganz machine. On June 18, 1962, on the day the agreement was executed and while the interference proceedings were still pending, counsel for the defendant, Continental Can Company, Inc., wrote counsel for the Federal Paper Board Company, in part, as follows:

> "Obviously, the public use referred to in your letter of May 21, 1962 would constitute a bar to the allowance of any valid claims in the Arneson application which would cover the Weiss carton. However, the disclosures in the application and in patent No. 2,990,997 [33] are not identical and possibly limited claims could be drawn which would not be generic. Whether any such claims, if obtained, would be of any value is questionable, particularly in view of the fact that the lock per se is broadly old as shown in Trogman patent No. 2,102,497, [*562] which we note is cited in 2,990,997.
> "If you feel the interests of both parties will best be served by abandoning the Arneson application, we are authorized to drop the prosecution of the same. * * *."

It is the contention of the defendant that by the time the agreement of June 18, 1962, was entered into Federal's patent counsel were of the view that the Arneson application could not prevail over the Weiss patent in the interference proceedings and for that reason a concession of priority was filed and that the agreement of June 18, 1962, was not an agreement in connection with or in contemplation of the termination proceedings.

The agreement of June 18, 1962, contained numerous provisions covering many matters. Some of its provisions related to the Weiss patent. In those provisions Continental granted Federal an exclusive license to manufacture and sell cartons under the Weiss patent. The [34] agreement contained no specific provision for the termination of the interference proceedings as to the Weiss patent, yet the licensing of Federal under the Weiss patent, for all practical purposes, made it improbable that the interference proceedings would or could be continued. The parties to the agreement apparently recognized that fact, for on the very day the contract was entered into counsel for Continental wrote counsel for Federal in regard to the matter of terminating the interference proceedings, which was done.

Realistically, it is difficult to envision the agreement of June 18, 1962, other than as an agreement "in connection with or in contemplation of the termination of the interference." It seems clear that at the time the agreement was signed there was in the contemplation of the parties a termination of the interference proceedings. It is the finding of the Court that the agreement of June 18, 1962, did constitute an agreement within the purview of Section 135(c), Title 35 U.S.C.A.

23. The matter of the prior art relied on by the plaintiffs in connection with Claim 4 of the Ganz patent will next be considered. That claim is very short. For convenience in reference, [35] it will be set out again:

> "4. In a machine for applying to cans and the like arranged in rows, a wrap-around carton having closure panels one of which has a latch opening and the other of which includes a pivotal catch for engagement with said latch opening, the combination comprising means for folding the pivotal catch panel and for engaging the > pivotal catch through said latch opening, and means for swinging the pivotal catch into substantially the plane of the folded closure panels."

The prior art patents introduced into evidence by the plaintiffs are thirteen in number. Nine of them relate to machines for closing conventional folding cartons and four of them relate to machines for applying wrap-around cartons.

The plaintiffs make special reference to Heybach Patent No. 995,965, Banta Patent No. 2,305,130, German Patent No. 598,010, Wood Patent No. 2,625,778, Monroe Patent No. 2,780,900, and Tobey Patent No. 2,823,501. It is the contention of the plaintiffs that all of those patents disclose machines adapted to close and lock folding cartons, the cartons having a closing and locking structure which includes a pivotal catch which is adapted to be folded relative to the [36] closure panel to which it is attached, then inserted through an opening in the other overlapping closure panel, and then swung into substantially the plane of the folded closure panels, the machines in question automatically performing the described manipulation steps. The defendant contends that those patents all relate to machines having to do with folding cartons and not with wrap-around packaging as to cans arranged [80] in rows. Three of the prior art patents - Anness Patent No. 2,817,197, Arneson Patent No. 2,860,461, and Murray Patent No. 2,953,879 - do relate to machines designed for wrap-around packaging. The defendant [*563] contends that those machines are not pertinent because they are machines directed to the use of glue in the packaging.

The plaintiffs contend that the Ganz machine was directly anticipated by Arneson Patent No. 2,931,152 of April 5, 1960. About July, 1957, Arneson designed and built a carton carrier machine. It would appear that the earliest date of the conception of the Ganz machine was in October, 1957. It is the contention of the plaintiffs that Arneson's machine corresponds to Claim 4 of the Ganz patent. The plaintiffs contend that the Arneson [37] machine wrapped cartons around groups of cans and locked the cartons where the cartons corresponded to and had locking arrangements virtually identical with the cartons involved in the Ganz patent.

Arneson filed an application for a patent on the machine designed by him on June 30, 1958, which was four days after Ganz had filed an application for a patent on his machine.

It is the contention of the plaintiffs that Arneson was a prior inventor. In that connection the defendant in its brief states as follows:HN7[]

> "In order for Arneson to qualify as a prior inventor, plaintiffs must prove:
>
> (a) That Arneson conceived the invention and reduced it to practice before Ganz did so, or
>
> (b) If plaintiffs are unable to establish the facts set forth in (a), they must establish that Arneson was diligently working toward a reduction to practice at a time just prior to October, 1957, the date on which Ganz commenced his inventive activities, and that Arneson continued to work diligently thereafter until he reduced the invention to practice."

It is the view of the Court that the plaintiffs are put to the proof of either (a) or (b).

The defendant further states that the Arneson machine [38] was a single row machine and not directed to applying wrap-around cartons to "cans and the like arranged in rows" as was the Ganz machine.

The plaintiffs contend that Arneson had reduced his machine to practice before Ganz conceived his machine. They also contend that the difference between a one-row machine and one directed to the applying of wrap-around cartons to cans arranged in rows is not of significance.

Arneson testified that modification would have to be made to his single row machine to make it suitable for applying wrap-around carton blanks to double rows of cans as called for in the Ganz patent. He also testified that he did not know whether his machine, if so modified, would work.

It was heretofore noted that Arneson did not file his application until four days after Ganz filed his application.

In September, 1958, the Federal Paper Board Company caused the Arneson machine to be shipped to one T. Walter Kaestner, an outside engineering consultant relied on by it, to study and investigate the general functioning of the machine. Kaestner made trial runs on an experimental basis in which various cartons were folded into place and locked. He found that at low speeds [39] the machine functioned very well. He experienced difficulty when he tried to fold cartons at high speeds. He was of the opinion that changes were necessary, perhaps costly in character, to make the machine operate at higher speeds in order to provide the versatility desired by the Federal Paper Board Company. In his report to Federal he suggested a number of changes which might be made in the machine to give it the versatility desired. The machine was returned by Kaestner to Federal. No changes were made in it. After its return it was in Federal's plant in New Haven, Connecticut, and not used thereafter.

The Court is of the view that the plaintiffs have not established either (a) or (b) heretofore set forth.

[*564] 24. There is for consideration the question as to whether Claim 4 of the Ganz patent discloses a patentable invention over the prior art. In the preamble to the patent it is stated: "The invention relates to the packaging of cans and the like in wrap-around paperboard carriers." In Claim 4 of the patent it is stated the machine involved is "a machine for applying to cans and the like arranged in rows, a wrap-around carton * * *." Claim 4 then calls for a means [40] of producing three manipulations in relation to the carton: (1) folding the pivotal catch panel relative to the associated closure panel; (2) engaging the pivotal catch through the latch opening; and (3) swinging the pivotal catch into substantially the plane of the folded closure panels. Since, as heretofore noted, the patent does not particularly point out and distinctly [81] claim the feature of tightening, the three manipulations made by the machine in connection with wrap-around packaging are what are involved in connection with the prior art patents. Heybach Patent No. 995,965, Banta Patent No. 2,305,130, German Patent No. 598,010, Wood Patent No. 2,625,778, Monroe Patent No. 2,780,900 and Tobey Patent No. 2,823,501 all disclose machines adapted to close and lock folding cartons, the cartons having a closing and locking structure which includes a pivotal catch which is adapted to be folded relative to the closure panel to which it is attached, then inserted through an opening in the other overlapping closure panel, and then swung into substantially the plane of the folded closure panels. The machines disclosed automatically perform the described steps. The language in Claim 4 [41] of the Ganz patent relating to a wrap-around carton for cans "arranged in rows", or similar language, does not appear in the prior art patents referred to. The manipulations necessary to close and lock a carton, whether it is a wrap-around or nonwrap-around operation, would seem to be very closely related. In both instances the manipulations result in tabs being inserted into openings so as to close and lock the carton containing the cans or other containers. The locking structures employed in connection with wrap-around cartons and nonwrap-around cartons are very similar in the matter of manipulations. In view of the close relationship between the matters referred to, it would seem to be merely a matter of option and design on the part of those having ordinary skill in the art to adapt the Ganz machine to handle a wrap-around carton. It would seem that Claim 4 describes in machine terms nothing more than the functions and operations required to manually manipulate and lock cartons of the wrap-around type. It is to be noted that Lane Patent No. 1,624,257, Monroe Patent No. 2,780,900, Tobey Patent No. 2,823,501 and Wood Patent No. 2,625,778, all disclose machines adapted to close [42] and lock folding cartons by means of stationary swords and guides which is a feature of the Ganz machine. It was heretofore noted that Anness Patent No. 2,817,197, Arneson Patent No. 2,860,461 and Murray Patent No. 2,953,879 all relate to machines designed for wrap-around packaging and that the defendant contends that the machines disclosed by those patents are not pertinent, among other reasons, for the reason they are directed to the use of glue in packaging. While the Ganz machine is not directed to the use of glue in packaging, in the preamble to the Ganz patent it is stated that the pivotal catch of the Weiss carton patent could be secured "after locking either by a tongue attached to the latching flap or by gluing the latching flap directly, or both".

Since the feature of tightening was not particularly pointed out and distinctly claimed in Claim 4 of the Ganz patent, it is clear that so far as patentable invention is involved the Ganz patent has to start or fall by the manipulations accomplished by means of stationary swords and guides in relation to a carton of the type set forth in the patent. It is the finding of the Court that such does not reach the level of patentable [43] invention.

25. In the Weiss patent, different from the Ganz patent, the feature of [*565] tightening is particularly pointed out and distinctly claimed.

It is clear that the heart of the claimed patentable invention is that the structure of the Weiss carton is such that a tightening effect may be achieved by means of a rotary latching action. In the specification it is stated that such rotary latching action can "if desired" produce an automatic tightening of the package as it cams or levers the closure panels into fully closed overlapping position. In the cross-examination of A. J. Weiss, certain questions were directed to him as to the matter just referred to. Some of those questions and his answers thereto were as follows:

> "Q * * * My question has to do with the action of the locking structure in producing the tightness. As I read that sentence it says that the rotary latching can if desired produce an automatic tightening, and I am asking you if that does not imply that the rotary-latching action can be used without producing an automatic tightening?
> "A I would have to agree it does.
>
> "Q Now I ask you how can the rotary latching be used without producing a tightening [44] action?
> "A By the dimensions of it, perhaps.
> "Q Would you be more specific on that point?
> "A Well, if I foreshorten dimensions in the bottom closure panels or increase them - as the case may be - I can make a loose closure or a tight closure with the rotary-latching action."

It appears that the locking structure in the Weiss carton may or may not produce a carton-tightening action, depending upon the spatial relationship of [82] the overlapping panels at the time that carton lock structure is pivoted. If the pivotal axis of the lock structure is positioned inwardly beyond the lock-engaged edge of the opening in which the catch is received no tightening will result, but if the pivotal axis is positioned outwardly of that edge tightening action will result.

It was the testimony of witnesses for the defendant that in packaging a Weiss carton by the rotary action a 1/32nd of an inch of tightening may be achieved.

A. J. Weiss testified that the individual features of his locking arrangement were disclosed in the different prior art cartons. He further testified that he did not know of any wrap-around carton in which those individual features were combined as they were in his locking [45] arrangement.

The prior art patents introduced into evidence in connection with the Weiss patent by the plaintiffs were twenty in number. Eleven of those patents related to folding cartons and boxes; six to wrap-around cartons; and three related to envelope fasteners, fruit basket liners, and disintegrated pots.

It is the contention of the plaintiffs that the cartons shown in Morrison Patent No. 1,104,821, Close Patent No. 1,669,454, Trogman Patent No. 2,102,497, Pergande Patent No. 2,060,240, Poe Patent No. 2,316,362, Crary Patent No. 2,419,391, French Patent No. 1,063,058 and Kells Patent No. 2,572,159 all would exhibit a tightening effect if appropriately manipulated. Further, it is their contention that the Robertson Paper Box and the Ray Paper Box cartons referred to would exhibit the tightening effect if appropriately manipulated. Further, it is their contention that the tightening effect is an inherent character of the prior art cartons referred to.

The defendant controverts those contentions of the plaintiffs. In that connection it also asserts that the cartons referred to were closed-end cartons as contrasted with the open-end of the Weiss carton. The plaintiffs contend [46] that whether the cartons referred to are of the open-end or closed-end type is not of significance. It is the contention of the defendant that the tightening [*566] action, if any, which might be embodied in the prior art cartons relied on by the plaintiffs occurs as an incident to accomplishing the locks thereof and serves no usual purpose and may be undesirable. It points out that in none of those patents is there any direct reference made to the matter of tightening.

26. The prior art patents relating to wrap-around cartons were directed to closed-end rather than wrap-around cartons. There appears to be nothing in the Weiss patent which excludes closed-end cartons. Both closed-end and open wrap-around cartons were well known in the art prior to the Weiss patent.

Both the Ray Paper Box and the Robertson Paper Box in 1951 and 1954 made and sold wrap-around cartons which appear to be somewhat similar to the Weiss carton. In the packaging of containers in those cartons the product was placed on the flat carton blank and the carton blank was then folded or wrapped around the product with the overlapping outer closure panels locked in place by means of a structure similar [47] to that of the Weiss carton.

Four of the six wrap-around prior art patents - Gentry No. 2,786,572, Gentry No. 2,827,165, Andre No. 2,911,096, and Stone No. 2,975,891 - relate to cartons held together by punch locks. One of the wrap-around patents - Grinspoon No. 2,798,603 - relates to cartons held together by tuck flaps. One of the wrap-around patents - Currivan No. 2,922,561 - relates to cartons held together by glue. The six following carton prior art patents - Trogman No. 2,102,497, Morrison No. 1,104,821, Pergande No. 2,060,240, Poe No. 2,316,362, Crary No. 2,419,391 and Lighter No. 2,395,558 - teach the use of overlapping panels, matching tongues, and openings in cartons which enclose their contents on all sides. In this connection the defendant in its brief states:

> "These prior art patents relating to wrap-around cartons are enlightening evidence of the state of the pertinent art, and confirm the novelty and patentability of the Weiss combination. These patents demonstrate, as Weiss testified, that wrap-around cartons having the general characteristics of his carton, but with different locking arrangements, were old and well known. But, more importantly, they show [48] a high degree of activity in the field of wrap-around carriers during the four years immediately preceding the Weiss invention, and demonstrate that before Weiss, nobody had thought of the idea of using the Weiss locking arrangement to produce a tightening action in a wrap-around carton. This remained for Weiss to invent * * *."

27. The patentable invention claimed is, as noted, a combination of old elements. HN8[] While numerous patents involving a combination of old elements have been held invalid, yet it is possible for a combination of old elements to give rise to patentable invention [83] . In the case of Copease Manufacturing Co. v. Cormac Photocopy Corporation (D.C.S.D.N.Y.1965), 242 F. Supp. 993, this Court upheld the validity of a patent based on a combination of old elements.

HN9[] Section 103, Title 35 U.S.C.A., provides:

> "A patent may not be obtained though the invention is not identically disclosed or described as set forth in section 102 of this title, if the differences between the subject matter sought to be patented and the prior art are such that the subject matter as a whole would have been obvious at the time the invention was made to a person having ordinary skill in [49] the art to which said subject matter pertains. Patentability shall not be negatived by the manner in which the invention was made. * * *."

In the recent cases of Graham v. John Deere Plow Co. (1966), 383 U.S. 1, 86 S. Ct. 684, 15 L. Ed. 2d 545, and United States v. Adams (1966), 383 U.S. 39, 86 S. Ct. 708, 15 L. Ed. 2d 572, the Supreme [*567] Court has considered and restated the principles applicable to patentability.

In the case of Graham v. John Deere Plow Co., supra, the Court stated (pp. 17-18 of 383 U.S. p. 694 of 86 S. Ct.):HN10[]

> "* * * Under § 103, the scope and content of the prior art are to be determined; differences between the prior art and the claims at issue are to be ascertained; and the level of ordinary skill in the pertinent art resolved. Against this background, the obviousness or nonobviousness of the subject matter is determined. Such secondary considerations as commercial success, long felt but unsolved needs, failure of others, etc., might be utilized to give light to the circumstances surrounding the origin of the subject matter sought to be patented. As indicia of obviousness or nonobviousness, these inquiries may have relevancy. * * *"

[50] Prior to the conception of the Weiss carton there were cartons which met and have continued to meet the needs and wants of numerous users of wrap-around cartons. However, they had not met the needs and wants of other users. In the case of the Weiss carton, by means of a rotary latching action during the packaging operation, a tightening of the completed package up to 1/32nd of an inch is or can be brought about. Some users desire such tightening action.

28. The tightening effect in the Weiss carton packaging produced by rotary latching action represents a moderate but nevertheless commercially worth-while advance in the field of wrap-around packaging.

It is a close and troublesome question whether that advance amounted to patentable invention. That advance was made by combining certain well-known carton locking structures with a rotary latching action. It is the view of the Court that in light of all the prior art that advance was not such as to have been nonobvious to a person having ordinary skill in the art.

It is the finding of the Court that at the time the Weiss patent was obtained the differences between the subject matter of that patent and the prior art were such [51] that the subject matter of the Weiss patent as a whole would have been obvious at the time to a person having ordinary skill in the art.

29. There is another issue between the parties. It is the contention of the plaintiffs that the defendant, Continental Can Company, Inc., was guilty of a violation of the anti-trust laws in connection with the Weiss carton patent and for that reason it may not enforce that patent.

It was heretofore noted that on January 18, 1962, the defendant, Continental Can Company, Inc., and the Federal Paper Board Company entered into an agreement covering a number of matters. In the agreement Continental granted Federal a license, but without the right to grant sub-licenses, for Weiss cartons. That license was to be exclusive, save as to Continental and its subsidiaries. After the execution of that agreement, both Continental and Federal sold cartons to their respective customers.

The agreement contained no provision for the granting of additional licenses. It is the contention of the plaintiffs that in practice the parties did exercise joint control over the granting of additional licenses and in connection therewith gave Federal what amounted to a [52] veto power in connection with the granting of additional licenses.

In support of their contention, the plaintiffs cite and quote, as hereinafter set forth, from the case of United States v. Crown Zellerbach Corporation (D.C.1956), 141 F. Supp. 118, p. 127 in which it is stated:

> "* * * Here * * * it is alleged that the patentee ALSCO had agreed to confer with Crown before appointing as a distributor any paper jobber in the territory east of the Mississippi. The understanding fairly implied is that Crown's wishes will be given consideration. By serving the [*568] interests [84] of Crown and not of ALSCO, the agreement presents a genuine and triable issue under the Sherman Act. In analogous circumstances, it has been held that an agreement by the patentee giving the licensee a veto power in the selection of additional licensees is invalid. * * *"

The plaintiffs also cite and rely on the case of United States v. Besser Manufacturing Co. (D.C.1951), 96 F. Supp. 304, affirmed (1952), 343 U.S. 444, 72 S. Ct. 838, 96 L. Ed. 1063. That case was a civil action by the United States under the Sherman Act against a number of defendants. There were a number of issues in the case, [53] one of which had to do with the licensing of certain patents. In that case two of the defendants, Besser Manufacturing Company, referred to as Besser, and Stearns Manufacturing Company, referred to as Stearns, entered into an agreement with one Gelbman and one Andrus, the patentees of certain patents, under which Besser and Stearns became the exclusive licensees of the patents. The agreement provided for the granting of additional licenses only by joint consent. In that case, in the District Court opinion, it is stated (96 F. Supp. p. 310):HN11[]

> "Granting that an exclusive license may be valid * * *, the Supreme Court has recognized certain limitations, and where such a license has for its purpose the suppressing of competition, it has been held invalid. * * *
>
> "We believe that the contract under question goes further than is necessary to protect the patent monopoly of Gelbman and Andrus. It may well be that an exclusive license to one party would be valid, but here the patentees have joined hands with the two largest competitors in the industry and by terms of their agreement have virtually made it impossible for others to obtain rights under those patents. The contract even [54] gives Stearns and Besser the power to restrict competition - present and future - by requiring their joint consent before licensing others. It is this combination requiring collective action that primarily invalidates the agreement. We believe it clear that the parties intended this contract to be a means whereby control of the industry could be acquired and competition eliminated. * * *"

The exclusive license feature of the agreement here in question soon gave rise to difficulties for Continental. It had numerous customers who were large users of the Weiss cartons. Some of those customers claimed that an additional source of supply was needed to satisfactorily meet their needs and requested that additional licenses be granted to meet that situation. There were numerous conferences between Continental and Federal in connection with the matter of granting additional licenses. In some instances Continental, after conferring with Federal, granted additional licenses with the consent of Federal. In some instances Continental granted additional licenses without the consent of Federal. If Continental did not grant additional licenses to afford some of its major carton customers [55] a second source of supply, there was the possibility of losing those customers. The granting of such licenses without the consent of Federal exposed it to liability to Federal for breach of the license agreement.

The situation in regard to the granting of additional licenses became increasingly unsatisfactory. To deal with that situation, Continental and Federal on December 16, 1963, entered into an agreement amending their previous agreement. Under the agreement as amended, Continental was given the right to grant additional licenses to third parties to supply Weiss cartons to companies for whom Continental was the major supplier of such cartons.

It was heretofore noted that in the cases relied on by the plaintiffs the agreements in those cases were regarded as having for their objective the suppressing of competition in violation of the anti-trust laws.

[*569] In the present case it does not appear that neither Continental nor Federal in their handling of requests for the licensing of third parties before their agreement was amended had as their objective the suppressing of competition or did suppress competition. In fact, it would appear that their handling of them made [56] for greater competition.

It is the finding of the Court that the conduct of Continental and Federal in connection with the matter of dealing with requests for additional licenses did not contravene the anti-trust laws or constitute misuse of the Weiss patent.

30. In connection with the agreement of June 18, 1962, between Continental and Federal, the plaintiffs make an additional contention. They contend that the provisions of the agreement relating to the licensing of improvements constituted a violation of the anti-trust laws. Continental was the owner of the Weiss and Ganz patents. Federal was the owner of a patent comprising a machine referred to as the Mor-Can-Pak machine. Paragraph 3 of the agreement is as follows: [85]

> "3. CONTINENTAL agrees that it will sell to FEDERAL such JAKET-PAK machines as FEDERAL shall order. The machines so sold shall include any improvements then incorporated in the then current JAK-ET-PAK machines of the series ordered."

Paragraph 6 of the agreement is as follows:

> "6. FEDERAL agrees that it will sell to CONTINENTAL such MOR-CAN-PAK machines as CONTINENTAL shall order. The machines so sold shall include any improvements then incorporated [57] in the then current MOR-CAN-PAK machines of the series ordered."

Paragraph 9 of the agreement provides, in part:

> "9. CONTINENTAL hereby grants to FEDERAL a license * * * under CONTINENTAL'S within described Patent Rights, patents and patent applications * * * to manufacture and sell Cartons throughout the United States for use on JAK-ET-PAK machines and MOR-CAN-PAK machines. * * *."

Paragraph 11 of the agreement provides, in part, as follows:

> "11. FEDERAL hereby grants to CONTINENTAL a license * * * under FEDERAL'S within described Patent Rights, patents and patent applications to manufacture and sell Cartons throughout the United States for use on JAK-ET-PAK machines and MOR-CAN-PAK machines. * * *."

Paragraph 19 of the agreement, which is the provision relied on by the plaintiffs in support of their contentions, provides, in part, as follows:

> "19. (a) If and when either of the parties hereafter develops or acquires an Improvement of a patentable nature, it will promptly make a full disclosure of the same to the other party and as to the actual cost incurred by it in developing or acquiring the Improvement. The other party shall then have a period [58] of 45 days in which to decide whether it wishes to acquire from the first party a royalty-free license * * * which shall be for the term of the patent * * * covering such rights as the first party may have in the Improvement in return for sharing one-half said cost. If it decides that it wishes to acquire the license it shall within said period so advise the first party and pay to the first party its share of said cost, whereupon the license on that particular Improvement shall become effective.
> "* * *."

Paragraph 22 of the agreement provides, in part, as follows:

> "22. (c) The term 'Improvement ' as used herein means (1) any modification of the Cartons or Carton applying machines; or (2) any modification of inventions which are within the scope of the Patent Rights. * * *
>
> [*570] "(d) The term 'Patent Rights' as used herein means (1) all issued United States patents now owned or controlled by either party relating to Cartons and Carton applying machines; (2) all pending applications for United States patents now owned or controlled by either party relating to Cartons and Carton applying machines; and (3) all United States patents which may issue on said pending applications [59] or for any other inventions which either party has heretofore made or acquired relating to Cartons and Carton applying machines, which applications or patents may be made or acquired by either party after the date of this Agreement to the extent that the acquiring party has the right to grant licenses thereunder.
> "* * *"

Paragraph 21 of the agreement provides, in part, as follows:

> "21. Either party may terminate its obligations under Paragraph 19 hereof as to any future Improvement made or acquired by it, on the fifth anniversary of the date of this Agreement or on any anniversary thereafter, by giving the other party six (6) months' advance notice in writing of its decision to terminate. * * *"

The plaintiffs, in support of their contentions, rely on a number of cases. They cite the case of United States v. Associated Patents, Inc. (D.C.1955), 134 F. Supp. 74, affirmed Mac Inv. Co. v. United States (1956), 350 U.S. 960, 76 S. Ct. 432, 100 L. Ed. 834. They set out the following quotation from the District Court opinion in that case (p. 82 of 134 F. Supp.):

> "2. The API agreement of August 3, 1933, created an arrangement for the exclusive cross-licensing of the subject [60] matter patents and future improvement patents therein through the pooling of these patents in API. The combined effect of the provisions of the API agreement was to impose the following unreasonable restraints:
> "(a) * * *
>
> "(b) Outside parties were restricted in their manufacture of machine tools by being foreclosed from obtaining licenses on the subject matter patents or improvements thereon for any of the types of machine tools included [86] within the fields of use exclusively reserved to API members.
> "(c) Each of the parties was restricted in the licensing of improvement patents it developed by the requirements that all improvement patents be assigned to API.
> "(d) Invention and technological development have been discouraged by the limitations imposed on the members' rights to use and license improvement patents developed by them."

They also cite and quote from the opinion in the case of International Nickel Company v. Ford Motor Company (D.C.1958), 166 F. Supp. 551, 565:

"That license-back provisions are not illegal per se was established beyond cavil by Transparent-Wrap Machine Corp. v. Stokes & Smith Co., 1947, 329 U.S. 637, 67 S. Ct. 610, 91 L. Ed. 563. True it is, [61] that license agreements will not be upheld where they are used in violation of the anti-trust laws to perpetuate control over an industry long after the expiration of the basic patents or where 'through * * * patent pools or multiple licensing agreements the fruits of invention of an entire industry might be systematically funneled into the hands of the original patentee.' Similarly such agreements which tend to stifle research are antagonistic to the underlying policies of the patent laws."

They also cite and quote from the opinion in the case of United States v. Besser Manufacturing Company, supra (p. 311 of 96 F. Supp.):

"Still these contracts go further. The intent to restrain trade and the illegality is further augmented and evidenced [*571] by the provision in both the four-way agreement of 1942 and the Flam purchase contract granting exclusive rights to Besser and Stearns of all improvements to the existing patents and to inventions still unborn. Such conditions while not illegal, per se, cannot be justified as necessary to the enjoyment of or ancillary to the patent rights conveyed, United States v. National Lead Co., D.C., 63 F. Supp. 513, 524; United States [62] v. General Electric Co., D.C., 80 F. Supp. 989, 1005; Transparent Wrap Machine Corp. v. Stokes & Smith Co., 329 U.S. 637, 67 S. Ct. 610, 91 L. Ed. 563, and read in conjunction with the rest of the contract provisions and other acts herein enumerated, makes the conclusion inescapable that the Besser-Stearns group had and achieved an obvious objective that cannot be reconciled with the restrictions of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act."

The defendant, in opposition to the contention of the plaintiffs, relies upon the case of Transparent-Wrap Machine Corp. v. Stokes & Smith Co. (1947), 329 U.S. 637, 67 S. Ct. 610, 91 L. Ed. 563. In that case there was under challenge under the anti-trust laws a patent license agreement. In that case the Transwrap Corporation was the owner of a patent on a machine which filled and wrapped certain articles. It entered into a patent license agreement with the Stokes & Smith Company under which it licensed the latter to manufacture and sell the patented machine. The contract provided that the licensee assign to the licensor any improvement patents applicable to the machine and suitable for use in connection with it. The licensor sought to enforce that provision. [63] The licensee contended that the provision in question was illegal and unenforceable under the anti-trust laws. In a 5 to 4 decision the Supreme Court held as follows (p. 648 of 329 U.S. p. 616 of 67 S. Ct.): "We only hold that the inclusion in the license of the condition requiring the licensee to assign improvement patents is not per se illegal and unenforceable."

In one provision of the agreement involved in that case it was provided that if the licensee "shall discover or invent an improvement which is applicable to the Transwrap Packaging Machine and suitable for use in connection therewith" it would submit the same to the licensor which might at its option apply for Letters Patent covering the same, and if the licensor failed to apply for such Letters Patent the licensee might do so. It was also provided that during the term of the license all improvement patents, whether secured by the licensor or licensee, were to be included in the terms of the license without payment of an additional royalty. The plaintiffs in their brief herein state as follows:

"* * * Paragraph 19 provides that if at any time in the future either of the parties makes or acquires any patentable [64] development in the field of wrap-around packaging the other party can obtain a royalty-free exclusive license thereunder by paying half of the development or acquisition costs. This is nothing more or less than a patent pool without time limitation. It provides in effect, as between these two competitors, that if either one ever develops or acquires something of value in the packaging field, it must [87] share it fifty-fifty with the other party and with no one else.

"Not only does this destroy competition as between these two competitors with regard to things in being; competition is also destroyed in research and development for the future. In addition the future inventions are to be shared between these two concerns to the exclusion of all others."

The parties are in disagreement as to the extent the parties had and were making use of the provisions in their agreement as to future developments. Some, but not a great deal, use was made of those provisions but those provisions are apparently regarded by the parties as being operative.

Paragraph 23 of the agreement between Continental and Federal provides [*572] that the agreement shall be for five years with right [65] of extension from year to year. Other provisions in that paragraph make it clear that it was not the intent of the parties to extend the provisions of the agreement beyond the patent period of the patents involved. Thus, the provisions relating to future developments in connection with the patents involved would be limited to the life of those patents. Thus, it cannot be said that the provisions as to future developments in connection with the Weiss and Ganz patents are unlimited as to time.

It was previously noted that in the case of Transparent-Wrap Machine Corp. v. Stokes & Smith Co., supra, the HN12[] Supreme Court held that a provision in a license agreement which required the assignment of future development patents was not per se illegal and unenforceable.

In the present case there is absent any showing that the provisions in the agreement between Continental and Federal relating to future development patents had any anti-competitive effect or resulted in the stifling of any research. Thus, the contentions of the plaintiffs as to illegality and unenforceability of those provisions have to be based upon the provisions per se.

While the holding of the Supreme Court that a condition [66] in a license agreement requiring the assignment of future development patents is not per se illegal and unenforceable was a 5 to 4 decision, it apparently is still the law.

It is the view of the Court that the contentions of the plaintiffs as to the illegality and unenforceability of the Weiss and Ganz patents because of the situation as to future development patents are not well founded.

31. The plaintiffs contend that the rights of the defendant under the Weiss patent are unenforceable for another reason. In that connection it is the contention of the plaintiffs that fraud was practiced on the Patent Office in connection with the securing of the Weiss patent. It appears that during the prosecution of the Weiss application the Patent Office cited certain references. It is the contention of the plaintiffs that arguments were made in behalf of the applicant differentiating those references and that such arguments were false and that they were known to be false at the time they were made. The Patent Office examiner had before him the prior art references and formed his own views as to what they disclosed. It is the finding of the Court that no deception was practiced by Weiss [67] or by the defendant acting in his behalf in connection with the prosecution of the Weiss application.

32. The plaintiffs, as heretofore noted have asked for an allowance of attorneys' fees under the provisions of Section 285, Title 35 U.S.C.A. This case involved numerous important and difficult questions in the field of patent law, some of which were close and troublesome. The Court is of the view and holds that this is not such an exceptional case as to justify the allowance of attorneys' fees.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. This Court has jurisdiction of the subject matter of this action and the parties thereto.

2. Claim 4 of Ganz Patent No. 2,986,857 is invalid in that it does not particularly point out the invention claimed as required by the provisions of Section 112, Title 35 U.S.C.A.

3. Claim 4 of Ganz Patent No. 2,986,857 is invalid as lacking in invention under Section 103, Title 35 U.S.C.A.

4. Claims 1, 2 and 4 of Weiss Patent No. 2,990,997 are invalid as lacking in invention under Section 103, Title 35 U.S.C.A.

5. Any rights the defendant might have under Weiss Patent No. 2,990,997 are unenforceable under Section 135(c), Title 35 U.S.C.A.

6. The defendant has not [68] been guilty of the violation of the anti-trust laws of the United States in connection with [*573] the Weiss and Ganz patents or any misuse of those patents.

7. No fraud was practiced on the Patent Office in the prosecution of the application of the Weiss patent.

8. The counterclaim of the defendant should be dismissed with prejudice.

9. No allowance of attorneys' fees should be made to the plaintiffs. [88]

10. The plaintiffs are entitled to have taxed herein against the defendant their taxable costs and disbursements.

ORDER FOR JUDGMENT

It is hereby ordered that judgment shall be entered:

1. Adjudging and declaring that Claim 4 of United States Letters Patent No. 2,986,857 issued on June 6, 1961, to H. Ganz is invalid.

2. Adjudging and declaring that Claims 1, 2 and 4 of United States Letters Patent No. 2,990,997 issued on July 4, 1961, to A. J. Weiss are invalid.

3. Adjudging and declaring that whatever rights the defendant might have under United States Letters Patent No. 2,990,997 issued on July 4, 1961, to A. J. Weiss are not enforceable.

4. Adjudging and declaring that the defendant has not been guilty of the violation of the anti-trust laws of the United States [69] in connection with the Weiss and Ganz patents or any misuse of those patents.

5. Adjudging and declaring that no fraud was committed on the Patent Office in the prosecution of the Weiss application.

6. Dismissing the defendant's counter claim with prejudice.

7. Denying the claim of the plaintiffs for an allowance of attorneys' fees.

8. Assessing the taxable costs and disbursements of the plaintiffs against the defendant.

It is further ordered that this Memorandum shall constitute the Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law in this case.

Hawaiian Oke & Liquors, Ltd. v. Joseph E. Seagram & Sons, Inc.

United States District Court for the District of Hawaii

July 24, 1967

Civil No. 2418

Reporter
272 F. Supp. 915 *; 1967 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11556 ; 1967 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,186

Hawaiian Oke & Liquors, Ltd., Plaintiff v. Joseph E. Seagram And Sons, Inc., The House of Seagram, Inc., McKesson & Robbins, Inc., Barton Distilling Co., and Barton Western Distilling Co., Defendants conspire, unincorporated, entity, Distillers, conspiracy, heads, sales, distributors, subsidiaries, marketing, products, anti trust law, decisions, Sherman Act, organizations, wholesale, pretty Judges: [1] Pence, C.J.

Core Terms

Opinion by: PENCE

Opinion

[*916] Memorandum Decision and Ruling on Plaintiff's Requested Instruction Number 36 Concerning Possible Intracorporate Conspiracy

PENCE, C.J.:

Plaintiff Hawaiian Oke & Liquors, Ltd. (Hawaiian Oke) brought this action to recover treble damages under Section 4 of the Clayton Act (Title 15 U.S.C. § 15) for injury allegedly resulting from defendants' violations of the antitrust laws. Hawaiian Oke contended it was damaged by a "combination . . . or conspiracy, in restraint of trade" among the following entities, which eliminated plaintiff from the wholesale liquor distribution business contrary to the provisions of the Sherman Act (Title 15 U.S.C. § 1):

Joseph E. Seagram & Sons, Inc. (Joseph Seagram);
Calvert Distillers Company (Calvert), a division of House of Seagram, Inc. (House of Seagram);
Four Roses Distillers Company (Four Roses), a division of House of Seagram; Frankfort Distillers Company (Frankfort), a division of House of Seagram; McKesson & Robbins, Inc. (McKesson);
Barton Distilling Company (Barton); and
Barton Western Distilling Co. (Barton Western), a wholly-owned subsidiary of Barton.

Calvert, [2] Four Roses and Frankfort are unincorporated divisions of House of Seagram, which in turn is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Joseph Seagram.

Pre-Trial Order No. 1 required the parties to file proposed jury instructions [*917] for the court's consideration. [1] Plaintiff's requested Instruction No. 36 provided that each of the unincorporated divisions of House of Seagram here involved "should be treated as a separate corporation for purposes of determining" whether there had been a violation of the antitrust laws. [2] Defendants objected that the requested instruction did not accurately state the law. After briefing [3] and oral argument [4] the court ruled on April 20, 1967, that it would give an instruction which contained the substance of plaintiff's Number 36. Following is the text of the instruction given the jury on April 24, 1967:

> " Plaintiff's Revised Instruction No. 36
>
> "Calvert Distilling Co., Four Roses Distilling Co. and Frankfort Distilling Co. were each separate unincorporated divisions of the defendant House of Seagram, Inc. at the time that each terminated dealings with Hawaiian Oke.
>
> "Each of these divisions of defendant House of Seagram, Inc., shall be treated [3] by you as separate entities for the purpose of determining whether or not there has been a combination or conspiracy, as I have heretofore defined those terms, to terminate Hawaiian Oke as their respective distributor. For the purpose of returning a verdict, however, you will consider these divisions as being the defendant House of Seagram, Inc."

This memorandum sets forth the basis of the court's April 20, 1967, ruling.

I. The Legal Authorities

A. Basic Principles [4] of Antitrust Law.

The legal question here presented for determination is one of first impression. Previous courts have considered whether corporate subsidiaries of a single parent can conspire among themselves and/or with the parent, or whether unincorporated divisions may conspire vertically with the "parent" body. But no recorded opinions have dealt with an alleged horizontal conspiracy among the unincorporated divisions of a single corporation. In analyzing this question the court believes some consideration of the aims and purposes of the antitrust laws is necessary to put the issue in context.

Section 1 of the Sherman Act provides that "every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce . . . is . . . illegal". This broad language was interpreted by the Supreme Court in its seminal opinion in Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey v. United States, 221 U.S. 1, 55 L. Ed. 619, 31 S. Ct. 502 (1911), where the Court dismembered the Standard Oil petroleum combine. In construing the Sherman Act Mr. Chief Justice White reviewed the legal history of the language employed by Congress and concluded that Section 1 is "an all-embracing [5] enumeration to make sure that no form of contract or combination by which an undue restraint" [5] of interstate commerce is achieved can be saved from condemnation. The court then enunciated the "rule of reason" to guide each court's discretion in determining whether "in a given case a particular act had or had not brought about the wrong against which the statute provided." [6] In applying these principles the court is concerned only with the acts complained of and their results. The judiciary is entrusted with protection of the broad public policy favoring competition, and "every" act, [*918] whether its form be new or old, which unduly interferes with the interstate flow of commerce is proscribed.

---

[1] Pre-Trial Order No. 1 (filed January 20, 1967), p. 5, para. 9(c).

[2] The parties agreed that for the purposes of this litigation Barton and its wholly-owned subsidiary Barton Western should be treated as a single entity.

[3] Seagram's Objections to Plaintiff's Instructions and Memorandum (filed April 4, 1967) pp. 2-4, and Plaintiff's Memorandum in Support of Plaintiff's Proposed Jury Instruction No. 36 re Divisions of The House of Seagram, Inc., (dated April 19, 1967).

[4] Transcript of Proceedings (TR.), April 19, 1967.

[5] 221 U.S. at 59.

[6] Id. at 60.

B. Defendant's Position.

Briefly stated defendant's position is that as a matter of law a corporation cannot conspire with itself through its unincorporated divisions. The House of Seagram has relied upon the following decisions to support its view, none of which [6] are directly on point: Poller v. Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc., 109 U.S. App. D.C. 170, 284 F.2d 599 (D.C. Cir. 1960), reversed on other grounds 368 U.S. 464, 7 L. Ed. 2d 458, 82 S. Ct. 486 (1962); Deterjet Corp. v. United Aircraft Corp., 211 F. Supp. 348 (D. Del. 1962); Kemwel Automotive Corp. v. Ford Motor Co., 1966 TRADE CASES at para. 71, 882 (S.D.N.Y. 1966); Johnny Maddox Motor Co. v. Ford Motor Co., 202 F. Supp. 103 (W.D. Tex. 1960); and Nelson Radio & Supply Co. v. Motorola, 200 F.2d 911 (5th Cir. 1952), cert. denied 345 U.S. 925, 97 L. Ed. 1356, 73 S. Ct. 783 (1953). [7]

In Nelson Radio, supra at 914 (a trebledamage action for restraint of trade in communication equipment), the alleged conspirators were the defendant corporation [7] and its officers, employees, representatives and agents. However, there is no allegation that either a corporate subsidiary or division participated. The appellate court affirmed dismissal for failure to state a cause of action:

> "It is basic in the law of conspiracy that you must have two persons or entities to have a conspiracy. A corporation cannot conspire with itself any more than a private individual can, and it is the general rule that the acts of the agent are the acts of the corporation."

Each of the four other decisions advanced by defendant as authority for its position involve claims that a corporation and an unincorporated division thereof conspired in violation of the Sherman Act. The allegation in Poller, supra, was that the Columbia Broadcasting System joined with CBS-TV, an unincorporated division, [8] and others, to acquire plaintiff's television station at a price below its actual value. The charge in Deterjet, supra, was that United Aircraft Corp. combined with Pratt & Whitney Co., its division, and others, to preclude plaintiff from marketing its product (used in regulating the operation of aircraft propellers), which was allegedly an improvement [8] upon, and in competition with defendant's product. In Kemwel, supra, plaintiff asserted that Ford Motor Co. and Ford International, an unincorporated division, conspired to monopolize the export of Ford automotive parts and accessories. The claimed conspiracy in Johnny Maddox Motor Co., supra, was among Ford Motor Company, its divisions, and others, to discriminate against plaintiff (a franchised automobile distributor) in purchase price, and merchandise and services provided. In each of these actions the court granted motions for dismissal or summary judgment insofar as the complaints recited claims of conspiracy between a corporation and its unincorporated division. And in each of these decisions the courts relied upon the above quoted passage from Nelson Radio, supra. However, this court does not feel that the broad principle of law taken from Nelson, and applied unswervingly in Poller, Deterjet, Kemwel, and Johnny Maddox, is controlling of the instant factual situation. Even as enunciated in Nelson, the principle that a corporation cannot conspire with itself does not preclude divisions from being legally capable of conspiring. As quoted above, [9] "you must have two [*919] . . . entities to have a conspiracy." The interpretation given this concept to date, when related to divisions, is that a corporation and an unincorporated division thereof are but one entity in a court of law. However, we are not here dealing with a similar vertical corporate organization. Rather, the conspiracy alleged among the Seagram divisions, and others, relates to the activity of business entities on the same level of the corporate structure. The question presented is whether each business division may be considered a separate legal entity capable of conspiring.

This was also recognized in Reines Distributors, Inc. v. Admiral Corporation, 256 F. Supp. 581, 583 (S.D.N.Y. 1966), where the issue was whether a division can be a purchaser [10] or customer under Sections 2(a), (d) and (e) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act (Title 15 U.S.C. § 13). There the court stated that

---

[7] Defendant might also have pointed to Timken Roller Bearing Co. v. United States, 341 U.S. 593, 606, 95 L. Ed. 1199, 71 S. Ct. 971 (1951) (dissenting opinion of Justice Jackson) and Report of the Attorney General's National Committee to Study the Antitrust Laws (1955) p. 35.

[8] The Supreme Court specifically reserved the question whether a corporation and a division thereof are legally capable of conspiring, and reversed the appellate court on other grounds. 368 U.S. 464, 469 n. 4, 82 S. Ct. 486, 7 L. Ed. 2d 458.

"substance rather than form should govern", [9] and considered the intracorporate relationship to determine whether the division was in fact a separate business entity. In concluding that the division was not a purchaser or customer the court found that its operation was interlocked with and controlled by the "corporate" entity.

The factual conclusion that a division has independence of action in the relevant business activity is critical to a determination that the division is legally capable of conspiring. [10] As stated in Standard Oil, supra, Section 1 of the Sherman Act is "all-embracing", and covers "every" combination which restrains trade, regardless [11] of the form employed. The trial court must consider the peculiar facts of any given litigation in deciding if the division involved is a separate entity in the context of the charge in which the conspiracy is alleged.

In Nelson, supra, the court's opinion, and its statement that a person cannot conspire with himself, were founded on the facts as they there occurred. We, as judges and lawyers, should not be restricted by the semantics chosen to describe a particular factual situation. Historically and legally a corporation has been deemed a person - and normally so personified as if a man, a creature with but one brain, one medium of thought and action - and this is the concept applied by the court in Nelson, and followed in Poller, Deterjet, Kemwel, and Johnny Maddox Ford.

But are [12] all corporations, in fact, "persons", each with one brain, one nerve center, at which all decisions are reached? It is well settled that in corporate structures which consist of a parent corporation and incorporated subsidiaries, each entity is capable of conspiring. There, we have no difficulty in envisioning separate and independent conspirators, regardless of whether the intracorporate arrangement is vertical or horizontal. [11] The question, then, is what, if any, magic occurs when the paper partition is removed. Is a business group which chooses to organize as a single corporation with unincorporated divisions automatically cast in the form of a normal person? Or may we have a corporate "person" in the form of a multi-headed Siva, or as portrayed by Dali or Artzybasheff?

[13] Thus, whether a division is capable of conspiring depends on the peculiar [*920] facts demonstrated. Is each facet of the unincorporated division's operation in fact, for all purposes, controlled and directed from above, or is it endowed with separable, self-generated and moving power to act in the pertinent area of economic activity? This is the key question. If the division operates independently in directing the relevant business activity, then it is a separate business entity under the antitrust laws. [12] There is nothing sacrosanct about the "unincorporated" aspect of corporate divisions. To hold otherwise would give businessmen the power to avoid the proscriptions of the antitrust laws by the fortuitous employment of alert legal counsel.

The Supreme Court "has emphasized [14] in the past that . . . differences in form often do not represent 'differences in substance.' Simpson v. Union Oil Co., 377 U.S. 13, 22, 12 L. Ed. 2d 98, 84 S. Ct. 1051. Draftsmen may cast business arrangements in different legal modes for purposes of commercial law, but these arrangements may operate identically in terms of economic function and competitive effect. It is the latter factors which are the concern of the antitrust laws." [13]

---

[9] See also United States v. Yellow Cab Co., 332 U.S. 218, 227, 91 L. Ed. 2010, 67 S. Ct. 1560 (1947) (an antitrust action in which the court found a conspiracy among a corporation and its subsidiaries).

[10] A division may be given authority to make final decisions in some, but not all, areas of its operation. The situation extant in that phase of the operation under attack is the pertinent factual inquiry.

[11] United States v. Yellow Cab Co., supra, n. 9; Kiefer-Stewart Co. v. Joseph E. Seagram & Sons, Inc., 340 U.S. 211, 95 L. Ed. 219, 71 S. Ct. 259 (1951); Timken Roller Bearing Co. v. United States, supra, n. 7; Phi Delta Theta Fraternity v. J. A. Buchroeder & Co., 251 F. Supp. 968 (W.D. Mo. 1966).

[12] See dissenting opinion in Poller, supra, 284 F.2d at 607: "In my view, CBS could conspire with CBS-TV, a wholly-owned, but not incorporated, 'division' - as separate and distinct an organization as a wholly-owned subsidiary."

[13] U.S. v. Arnold, Schwinn & Co., 388 U.S. 365, 18 L. Ed. 2d 1249, 87 S. Ct. 1856, concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Stewart (June 12, 1967).

II. The House of Seagram Corporate Structure

The House of Seagram is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Joseph Seagram and markets "various brands of alcoholic beverages imported by it, or purchased . . . from its manufacturing parent corporation" [14] through seven unincorporated sales divisions. Among those divisions are Calvert, Four Roses and Frankfort, each of which is managed by officers who bear the titular designations of the [15] particular division represented. The House of Seagram has the position of president, which has apparently been filled on occasion, but has remained unoccupied for at least the last two years. The Calvert division is headed by a president, Mr. Arthur Murphy; Four Roses is headed by a president, Mr. Jack Wishny; and Frankfort is headed by an executive vice-president, Mr. Roy Flint. [15]

Prior to July 31, 1954 alcoholic beverages manufactured by Joseph Seagram were distributed in the United States by a group of wholly-owned subsidiaries. At that time the Seagram group of companies underwent a corporate reorganization, with each of the domestic sales subsidiaries becoming divisions of a newly formed corporation known as Distillers Distributing Corp. Pursuant to this reorganization the Calvert Distillers Corporation, for example, became the Calvert Distillers [16] Company, a division of the Distillers Distributing Corp. The latter corporation was subsequently renamed The House of Seagram, Inc., defendant herein. [16]

This organizational juggling by the Seagram companies apparently resulted from the Supreme Court's decision in Kiefer-Stewart Co. v. Joseph E. Seagram & Sons, Inc., supra, n. 11, 340 U.S. at 215. [17] In that action [*921] a wholesale liquor distributor charged that two of the Seagram sales subsidiaries had conspired to set wholesale prices. The Court rejected defendants' contention that subsidiaries of a common parent can not conspire with each other:

> "Respondents next suggest that their status as 'mere instrumentalities of a single manufacturing-merchandizing unit' makes it impossible for them to have conspired in a manner forbidden by the Sherman Act. But [17] this suggestion runs counter to our past decisions that common ownership and control does not liberate corporations from the impact of the antitrust laws. E.g. United States v. Yellow Cab Co., 332 U.S. 218, 91 L. Ed. 2010, 67 S. Ct. 1560. The rule is especially applicable where, as here, respondents hold themselves out as competitors."

Although Seagram changed the form of its corporate structure following Kiefer-Stewart, there was no substantive change in the marketing technique employed.

[18] There is nothing wrong with reorganizing to comply with court rulings. However, to avoid the judicial proscription the reorganization must be more than a shuffling of papers. Courts are concerned with applying rules

---

[14] Memorandum of Defendants Joseph E. Seagram & Sons, Inc. and The House of Seagram, Inc., filed March 3, 1967, at 2.

[15] See Seagram Exhibit No. S-17.

[16] See United States v. The House of Seagram, Inc., 1965 TRADE CASES at 81,269, 81,270, para. 71,517 (a government action to enjoin resale price maintenance of Seagram brands in Southern Florida).

[17] Seagram's present counsel has stated that the Court's decision in Kiefer-Stewart precipitated Seagram's change to the divisions organization. This is reflected in the following colloquy with the court, which occurred at the close of plaintiff's case, during argument on defendants' motion for a directed verdict (TR. April 19, 1967):

> " The Court: Now, I notice in Kiefer-Stewart v. Seagram and Sons, 340 U.S. 211, 95 L. Ed. 219, 71 S. Ct. 259, we have here the same company, the defendant Seagram and Sons. It would appear to the Court as an inference only - just for the purpose of this discussion I will take this inference - that excellent counsel advised Seagram to tear out the veil of corporate ownership; nevertheless, keep your divisions just as 'independent' as they were before, keep them as competitive as they were before, but tear out the veil, and then we will have cured the defect found in our organizational setup, as pointed out by the U.S. Supreme Court in Stewart.
>
> " Mr. Anthony: That is correct."

of law in an actual, factual context. Private parties can not evade the applicable law merely by changing the label attached to a particular business entity.

The relationship between the various divisions of The House of Seagram, and the House of Seagram and Joseph E. Seagram & Sons, was stated by Mr. Edgar Bronfman, President of Joseph E. Seagram & Sons, Inc., the parent corporation.

"Q Do the respective heads of The House of Seagram companies report directly to you, Mr. Bronfman?

"A In a manner of speaking, yes.

"Q Would you explain that further?

"A Well, we run a pretty autonomous operation, and the heads of the companies pretty well run their own shows. They keep me informed or posted on what is taking place, but they don't report to me for direction. We sort of have what you call a General Motors type concept here.

* * *

"Q To what extent do your day-to-day activities involve you in marketing of Seagram-produced products?

"A [19] Well, to the extent that I take a pretty close look at the advertising. Beyond that, very little.

"Q I take it from that answer you leave the marketing activities reside pretty autonomously with the heads of the various marketing companies?

"A That's right.

* * *

"Q At or about or even following the assignment by you of the distribution to the Calvert division did you discuss with Mr. Murphy, in terms of distributors, who should handle the distribution of the rum?

[*922] "A No, sir.

* * *

"Q What is the relationship in terms of pricing policies or choice of distributors between The House of Seagram and Joseph E. Seagram and Sons, Inc.?

" A. Well, there is no relationship.

" Q. In other words, Joseph E. Seagram and Sons, Inc. does not get into that province at all?

" A. No." [18]

These facts were echoed by Mr. Jack Yogman, the Executive Vice-President of Joseph E. Seagram & Sons:

" Q. What connection, either in staff or line responsibility, have you had with the marketing of products?

" A. Very little. I am aware of what is going on, but the heads of the sales companies report directly to the president. My functions [20] with the sales heads of course have been extensive in, say, market research, in packaging, in product, things of that nature.

"But as far as the specific marketing function, they perform that themselves and report to the president.

" Q. What do you understand to be the nature, if any, sir, of the relation between the marketing divisions or the sale companies?

" A. Between them?

" Q. Yes, sir.

" A. Well, it is pretty well designed along the General Motors setup, where they are independent sales divisions, in the sense that they compete, the same as Pontiac competes against Buick and they both compete against Oldsmobile. They are self-contained units. They have their own products. I think they fight each other as hard as they fight anyone else.

* * *

" Q. Do the heads of the various House of Seagram companies customarily report to you about a change in distributors?

" A. Not at all." [19]

* * *

---

[18] Deposition of Edgar M. Bronfman, dated March 3, 1966 at 4-6, 18, 26, introduced into evidence on March 29, 1967.

[19] Deposition of Jack Yogman, dated March 3, 1966 at 4-6, 18, introduced into evidence on March 29, 1967.

Mr. Arthur Murphy, President of Calvert, gave the following description of the relationship between the Seagram divisions:

" Q. Now, is it correct, sir, that each of the separate unincorporated divisions of the House of Seagram [21] was charged with the responsibility of marketing certain designated brand-named products?
" A. Correct.
" Q. And most of the products they market are distilled by Joseph E. Seagram and Son or one of the affiliated Seagram companies?
" A. Correct, sir.
" Q. Now, is it also correct, sir, that each of these divisions has a group of officers such as president, like yourself, or in some instances an executive vice-president, and so forth down the line?
" A. Yes, sir.
" Q. And each have their own chain of command with offices in different places in the United States and different people to man them, is that correct?
" A. Yes, sir.
* * *
" Q. Now, is it a fact, sir, that the various unincorporated divisions, for example, Calvert and Seagram Distillers Company, and Four Roses and Frankfort, actually are in competition with each other in selling the various whiskies through distributors throughout the United States?

[*923] " A. Correct.
" Q. And that you wouldn't move over and let Four Roses, you wouldn't accommodate them in any meaningful competitive way and you wouldn't expect them to do that for you?

" A. No, sir, I would [22] not.
" Q. Now, is it correct that each of these divisions, through its own management, makes the decision as to who will be the distributors in any area?
" A. That's correct, sir.
* * *
" Q. That is because each one looks at the circumstance and makes its decision independent of the others, is that correct?
" A. That's correct.
" Q. Now, is it also true, sir, that each division makes a determination for itself as to promotions that are going to be made, advertising campaigns, that sort of thing?
" A. This is my responsibility.
" Q. And as head of the division, and your counterpart heads, do they make the determination as to the price or prices throughout the country which you are going to charge to wholesalers for the products?
" A. Correct." [20]

[23] There "self-contained", "independent sales divisions" are responsible for establishing distribution systems to market the various products entrusted to them. This responsibility includes the choice of one or more wholesale distributors to represent the products in a given geographic area. Each division individually selects the distributor for its products, and decides when a change in distributorship would be appropriate.

The decisions of Four Roses, [21] [24] Frankfort [22] and Calvert [23] to terminate Hawaiian Oke were made by the authorized personnel in each division. Normally such decisions are made "entirely independently" [24] of any other division. If these autonomous divisions deviated from their normal procedure, so that separate, decision-making "heads" acted in concert, they became subject to the proscriptions of the antitrust laws.

---

[20] Tr. April 19, 1967.

[21] Deposition of Jack Wishny, (President of Four Roses), dated March 2, 1966, at 11-12, introduced into evidence on March 31, 1967. Deposition of Edwin D. Kaufman (Western Division Manager of Four Roses), dated January 17, 1966, at 14, introduced into evidence on April 3, 1967.

While reserving its position that divisions of a single corporation are legally incapable of conspiring among themselves, Seagram has pointed to a variety of factors which allegedly preclude a factual finding that these divisions were independent. The dialogue between court and counsel which followed the court's oral ruling on Plaintiff's Proposed Instruction No. 36 sets forth these factors:

> " Mr. Anthony: The court has said that the divisions of Seagram operate independently. That is confined solely to the matter of sales. All billings, all accounting, payrolls, checks, everything of that nature is done through the one corporation. There [25] is no such independence of operations as your Honor has assumed in the oral decision given prior to the recess. In other words, these are simply sales divisions.
> * * *
>
> "Next, your Honor has neglected to recognize the clear evidence in this [*924] case, namely, that the plaintiff dealt with the House of Seagram, Inc. The very contract is in the name of the House of Seagram, Inc., through its respective divisions.
> * * *
> " The Court: I was aware that the evidence showed, and . . . the Court . . . accepted the fact that the evidence showed that the organizations, each division, were sales organizations; they were sales divisions.
> " Mr. Anthony: Only . . . . Sales only.
> * * *
> "They don't even have bank accounts, these divisions, your Honor. They didn't even employ advertising agencies. All of these functions are done by the House of Seagram, Inc., all of the accounting, all of the banking, all of the employment. . . . And so what I respectfully say to your Honor is that this decision that was announced prior to the recess should be founded upon the single proposition that they had separate sales organizations, the functions of which were confined to sales." [25]

[26]

III. Conclusion

Counsel's observation that the court's decision is "founded upon the single proposition that they [the divisions] had separate sales organizations" is accurate. Plaintiff charged a conspiracy to terminate it as defendant's sales representative in Hawaii. The distribution of defendant's products is the only business function which is relevant herein. The fact that the Seagram divisions may have certain joint or common functions does not detract from the admittedly divided responsibility for marketing. Plaintiff's allegations related to defendant's sales organizations. This is the only activity which must be considered in determining each division's status as a separate legal entity capable of conspiring. Defendant has acknowledged that each division has individual responsibility for establishing its own distribution system. Seagram chose this form of business organization for reasons sufficient unto itself. Having made the divisions separate and independent for [27] this particular economic function, defendant cannot now escape the legal impact of its action. The court finds that Four Roses, Frankfort and Calvert are each distinct and separate, operating, marketing entities, legally and factually capable of entering into the conspiracy alleged. [26]

---

[22] Deposition of Roy Flint (Executive Vice-President of Frankfort), dated March 2, 1966 at 7, 10, introduced into evidence on April 4, 1967. Deposition of Joseph E. Flick (Western Division Manager of Frankfort) dated January 17, 1966 at 12, introduced into evidence on April 4, 1967.

[23] Deposition of Gerald J. Novak (Western Division Manager of Calvert), dated January 17, 1966 at 37, introduced into evidence on March 31, 1967.

[24] Id. at 33.

[25] Tr. April 20, 1967.

[26] The jury found a conspiracy among all named defendants.

End of Document

Lewis v. Seanor Coal Co.

United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit

August 16, 1967, Decided

No. 16161

Reporter

382 F.2d 437 *; 1967 U.S. App. LEXIS 5318 ; 66 L.R.R.M. 2007; 56 Lab. Cas. (CCH) P12,131; 1967 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,189

John L. Lewis et al., Appellees v. Seanor Coal Company, Appellant

Disposition: [1] Affirmed.

Core Terms

royalties, coal, employees, oral modification, district court, welfare fund, nonsignatory, invalid, royalty payment, per ton, bargaining, collective bargaining agreement, written agreement, summary judgment, reopen

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Admiralty & Maritime Law > Shipping > Regulations & Statutes > General Overview

Contracts Law > Contract Conditions & Provisions > General Overview

Labor & Employment Law > Collective Bargaining & Labor Relations > Enforcement of Bargaining Agreements

Labor & Employment Law > Collective Bargaining & Labor Relations > Protected Activities

HN1[] Shipping, Regulations & Statutes

29 U.S.C.S. § 158(e) does not invalidate an entire collective bargaining agreement because it contains a "hot cargo" provision; the statute merely makes a contract with such a provision unenforceable and void to the extent that it contains the "hot cargo" provision.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Remedies > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Defenses

HN2[] Sherman Act, Claims

The remedy for violation of the antitrust law is not avoidance of payments due under a contract, but rather the redress which the antitrust statute establishes, a private treble damage action.

Judges: Freedman, Circuit Judge. Gerald McLaughlin, Circuit Judge, dissenting.

Opinion by: FREEDMAN

Opinion

[*439] FREEDMAN, Circuit Judge:

The trustees of The United Mine Workers of America Welfare and Retirement Fund of 1950 brought this action against Seanor Coal Company, the appellant, for royalty payments of forty cents per ton as fixed by the National Bituminous Coal Wage Agreement as amended in 1964, on coal produced by the company between February 1 and June 30, 1965. They claimed also the balance on a promissory note which they alleged was accelerated because of the default in the payment of royalties. The company counterclaimed for payment it had made earlier into the welfare and retirement fund under the forty cents royalty provision of the agreement. [1] The court below entered summary judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for the royalties, amounting to $38,110.93 with interest, and for the unpaid balance of the note in the amount of $52,441.82 with interest, and also entered summary judgment in favor of the plaintiffs on the company's counterclaim. (256 F. Supp. 456 (W.D. Pa. 1966)). The company presents a number of issues. It asserts that [2] (1) the agreement requiring the payment of royalties violates the Sherman Antitrust Act; (2) it also violates § 8(e) of the National Labor Relations Act; and (3) the union did not fulfill an oral agreement made by the president of the local union on which the company relied in reopening its mine, which relieved it of its contractual obligation to pay royalties.

I.

In support of its contention that the provision for the payment of royalties under the agreement is illegal under the hot cargo prohibition of § 8(e) of the National Labor Relations Act, the company relies upon two decisions of the National Labor Relations Board. Raymond O. Lewis, 144 NLRB 228 (1963), held invalid under § 8(e) the subcontracting provision of the 1958 National Bituminous Coal Wage Agreement which required that the terms and conditions of employment for subcontracting operations be at least as favorable as those [3] fixed for employees of signatories of the agreement. Later, the board dealt with the subsequent 1964 agreement, which discontinued this requirement but added a new provision which in addition to increasing from thirty to forty cents the royalty payments to the fund for every ton of coal produced by the operator for use or for resale, also required for the first time an eighty cent royalty on coal which an operator acquired from a nonsignatory. [2] [4] The Board held that this new provision also violated § 8(e). Raymond O. Lewis, 148 NLRB 249 (1964). The first decision, dealing with the 1958 agreement, came before the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, which remanded the case to the Board for reconsideration in the light of recent decisions rejecting the Board's interpretation of § 8(e). Lewis v. NLRB, 122 U.S. App. D.C. 18, 350 F.2d 801 (D.C. Cir. 1965). The court noted that its action undermined the Board's finding in the second case that the 1964 amendment violated § 8(e). [3] A trial examiner's subsequent decision that the 1964 agreement violated § 8(e) has not yet been acted on by the Board.

---

[1] The counterclaim was in the amount of $88,322.20, representing payments made at forty cents per ton.

[2] The new addition, somewhat circumstantially phrased, reads: "On all bituminous coal procured or acquired by any signatory Operator for use or for sale there shall, during the life of this Agreement, be paid into such Fund by each such Operator signatory hereto or by any subsidiary or affiliate of such Operator signatory hereto the sum of eighty cents (80) per ton of two thousand (2,000) pounds on each ton of such bituminous coal so produced or acquired on which the aforesaid sum of forty cents (40) per ton has not been paid into said fund prior to such procurement or acquisition."

[3] See 350 F.2d at 802, n. 12.

[*440] The court below believed that the question whether the provision of the 1964 agreement was illegal as an unfair labor practice under § 8(e) was one for the exclusive jurisdiction of the Board. We believe it is unnecessary to decide this question. [4] For even if the Board should again reach the same conclusion regarding the provision before it, the company would not thereby be relieved of its obligation to pay the royalties here involved. The Board dealt in the first case with an entirely different provision from that which is here involved; and in the second case it dealt not with the forty cent royalty which is here involved, but with the effect of that provision in relation to the establishment for the first time in the 1964 agreement of a difference in the royalties exacted from an operator if he purchased from nonsignatory rather than from other signatory operators, and required him to pay double royalties where the purchase was from nonsignatory operators.

[5] It is clear, therefore, that the Board has not decided or even cast any doubt on the validity of the basic royalty provision of forty cents per ton but instead has limited its inquiry to the effect under § 8(e) of the exaction from the coal operators of the doubled royalty where they purchased coal from outside, nonsignatory operators. The basic provision of forty cents royalty per ton for coal produced by the employer is radically different from the special provision requiring an eighty cents royalty on coal acquired from outside nonsignatory operators and standing alone is beyond the range of § 8(e). The essence of a proscribed "hot cargo" agreement is that it applies pressure on an employer, directly or indirectly, to require him to cease doing business with a third party in order to persuade the third party to accede to the union's objectives. [5] Its focus, therefore, is on the effect of the agreement upon the relationship of the employer who is a party to the collective bargaining agreement with an outside employer. The Board recognized this in its second decision in Raymond O. Lewis, supra, where it held that the requirement of an eighty cent royalty on coal acquired [6] from nonsignatory operators was to restrain signatory operators from acquiring coal from nonsignatories and thus to limit the coal operators' relationships to other operators who had signed a union contract. This element of discrimination is of course absent from that portion of the agreement which fixes the forty cent royalty, for that has no relation to purchases from nonsignatory operators, and indeed existed independently of it before 1964.

In these circumstances, any finding by the Board that the 1964 agreement is invalid under § 8(e) would not affect the severable basic royalty provision. [6] HN1[] Section 8(e) does not invalidate an entire collective bargaining agreement because it contains a "hot cargo" provision; the statute merely makes a contract with such a provision unenforceable and void to the extent that it [7] contains the "hot cargo" provision. [7] Indeed, it is particularly requisite in a case such as this not to allow the possible invalidity of a provision which is not operative as to these parties to afford a basis for noncompliance with a valid obligation, for the Supreme Court has pointed out that royalty payments into a welfare fund which are bargained for [*441] have the characteristics of compensation to the workers for their services. [8]

II.

The company's claim that the agreement violates the Sherman Antitrust Act is not a defense to the trustees' action. It is now well established that HN2[] the remedy for violation of the antitrust law is not avoidance of payments due under a contract, but rather the redress which the antitrust [8] statute establishes, -- a private treble damage

---

[4] Compare San Diego Bldg. Trades Council, v. Garmon, 359 U.S. 236, 3 L. Ed. 2d 775, 79 S. Ct. 773 (1959) with Vaca v. Sipes, 386 U.S. 171, 17 L. Ed. 2d 842, 87 S. Ct. 903 (1967); Linn v. United Plant Guard Workers of America, Local 114, 383 U.S. 53, 15 L. Ed. 2d 582, 86 S. Ct. 657 (1966); Comment, 113 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1104 (1965).

[5] National Woodwork Manufacturers Association v. NLRB, 386 U.S. 612, 18 L. Ed. 2d 357, 87 S. Ct. 1250 (1967); A. Duie Pyle, Inc. v. NLRB, 383 F.2d 772 (3 Cir. 1967).

[6] See NLRB v. Rockaway News Supply Co., Inc., 345 U.S. 71, 97 L. Ed. 832, 73 S. Ct. 519 (1953).

[7] § 8(e), 29 U.S.C. § 158(e).

[8] Lewis v. Benedict Coal Corp., 361 U.S. 459, 469, 4 L. Ed. 2d 442, 80 S. Ct. 489 (1960).

action. Kelly v. Kosuga, 358 U.S. 516, 3 L. Ed. 2d 475, 79 S. Ct. 429 (1959); Bruce's Juices, Inc. v. American Can Co., 330 U.S. 743, 91 L. Ed. 1219, 67 S. Ct. 1015 (1947). See also Hanover Shoe, Inc. v. United Shoe Machinery Corp., 377 F.2d 776, 791 (3 Cir. 1967). To permit avoidance of payments required under the contract would go beyond the remedy prescribed by the antitrust statute and, as the Supreme Court has pointed out in Bruce's Juices, Inc. v. American Can Co., supra, 330 U.S. at 756-57, would have the incongruous effect of affording an injured party simple compensatory damages where he is a defendant while allowing him to treble the identical damages where he is a plaintiff. Moreover, the general rule is especially applicable here, where as we have already pointed out the payments required by the contract have the characteristics of compensation to the employees for services they have already rendered. [9] The company claims, however, that the case falls within the exception prescribed where judicial recognition of the contract would work to enforce "the precise conduct [9] made unlawful by the Act." [10] This exception is of no avail to the company, for it is directed to cases where the contract price itself has been inflated because of unlawful price fixing, whereas here there is involved a contract valid on its face and the fact that it provided the occasion for a restrictive agreement does not require that it should itself be invalidated.

III.

The company's final defense is the alleged oral modification of the 1964 agreement. It asserts that shortly after it had terminated operation of its mine in February 1965 because of heavy losses, it reopened the mine in reliance upon the statement of the president of the local union that if it did so "the productivity per employee would increase sufficiently to enable the Defendant to meet its obligations under the labor contract." The company alleges that this statement was intended to induce it to reopen the mine [10] and to incur new and additional obligations including the royalties, and that in reliance on the representation it reopened the mine but that "the increase in productivity per employee promised and represented . . . has in fact not occurred."

In its pleading the company presented these claims as establishing an estoppel against the plaintiffs from claiming that any royalties were due. It has apparently abandoned this contention and instead relies upon the circumstances as creating an oral modification of the agreement to pay royalties.

We come then to the question whether there was a valid oral modification of the agreement which absolves the company of the requirement to pay the forty cents per ton royalty.

At the outset it may be observed that the alleged agreement might well be declared ineffective because it lacks definiteness and is vague and uncertain. [11] There is, however, a more fundamental objection to the alleged oral modification; [*442] this objection is based on § 302(c)(5), 29 U.S.C. § 186 (c)(5), of the Labor-Management Relations Act, the provision under which the fund was established. This provision was written into the statute [11] because of the special concern of Congress over the welfare fund of the United Mine Workers of America, which already was in existence and which Senator Taft described as administered without restriction by the union so that "practically the fund became a war chest . . . for the union." [12] [13] It was part of the larger congressional concern over corruption of union officials and coercion of employers, to the detriment of honest bargaining relationships. [13] In § 302 of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 186, Congress therefore

---

[9] Lewis v. Benedict Coal Co., supra, n. 8.

[10] Kelly v. Kosuga, supra 358 U.S. at 520.

[11] Zukoski v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., 315 F.2d 622, 625 (3 Cir. 1963), cert. denied, 375 U.S. 856, 11 L. Ed. 2d 83, 84 S. Ct. 118 (1963).

[12] 93 Cong. Rec. 4746, reprinted in 2 Legis. Hist. of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, pp. 1310-11. See also S. Rep. No. 105, 80th Cong., 1st Sess. 52 (Supplemental Views), reprinted in 1 Legis. Hist. 458; 93 Cong. Rec. 3565-66, 3569, 1 Legis. Hist. 754-57; 93 Cong. Rec. A1910, 1 Legis. Hist. 869 (remarks of Rep. Meade); 93 Cong. Rec. 4678, 2 Legis. Hist. 1305 (remarks of Sen. Byrd); 93 Cong. Rec. 5015, 2 Legis. Hist. 1498 (remarks of Sen. Ball).

imposed a maximum penalty of imprisonment for one year and a fine of $10,000 for violation of its provisions, which prohibited in broad terms, with certain narrow exceptions, both the payment of anything of value by an employer and its receipt by a representative of any of his employees. One of the exceptions (§ 302(c)(5), 29 U.S.C. § 186(c)(5)) permitted employer contributions to welfare trust funds under rigid safeguards. It required that the fund be for the sole and exclusive benefit of the employees and their families and dependents, that all payments be held in trust to pay out only certain specified [12] benefits, [14] that "the detailed basis on which such payments are to be made is specified in a written agreement with the employer", that the employees be equally represented with the employers in the administration of the fund, together with neutral persons, that there should be an annual audit of the fund and a statement of the audit be made available for inspection by interested persons [15] and that payments intended for pensions and annuities be made to a separate trust to be used solely for that purpose. [16]

The requirement that "the detailed basis on which such payments are to be made is specified in a written agreement with the employer . . ." (§ 302(c)(5)(B), 29 U.S.C. § 186(c)(5)(B)) is not free from ambiguity. The same phrase, "such payments", appears in the proviso in § 302(c)(5)(A), 29 U.S.C. § 186(c)(5)(A), where it clearly refers to payments made by the employer. In § 302 (c)(5)(B), 29 U.S.C. § 186(c)(5)(B), however, the language seems to look to payments to be made out of the fund by the trustees to the employees. We may not, however, determine the meaning of the provision by a microscopic study of [14] its language in order to decide whether "such payments" refers only to those made by the employer to the trust fund or only to those made by the trustees to the employees. We have recently been reminded of the particular emphasis which must be given to the legislative history of labor legislation, [17] and the duty which rests on the federal courts to fashion a body of federal common law for the enforcement of collective bargaining agreements. [18] It [*443] would be, at the least, incomplete to require for the benefit of the employees and to prevent collusive or fraudulent side arrangements between employers and union representatives that the benefits which the employees are to receive from union welfare funds shall be specified in a written agreement with the employer and yet to permit the written foundation on which the welfare fund rests, in this case calling for the amount of the royalties payable on coal mined, to be the subject of oral modifications. It would expose employer and union representatives alike to the temptations of corrupt bargains, for it would permit the union to extract from an employer a secret promise to pay some other amount into the fund without requiring [15] such payments to become a matter of record and thus would frustrate the purpose of § 302(c)(5). Moreover, the employees have a right to know if the obligation to make the payments into the fund is modified; otherwise they might be led to remain at their jobs in reliance on the benefits which the formal agreement has promised, after they have been eroded by oral modification of the obligation to make the payments supporting such benefits. Thus, the policy of § 302(c)(5) requires that any modification of the basis of both the payments into the fund and out of the fund be made in writing. Thereby, we also preserve the prophylactic effect of informing not only the employees, but all other employers similarly situated, who should know what the arrangement is without fear of surreptitious side agreements. Congress knew that agreements such as the National Bituminous Coal Wage Agreement were the result of industry-wide bargaining and were to bind numerous employers. It knew, of course, that the elaborate collective bargaining agreements which resulted were reduced to writing, [19] it could

---

[13] See Arroyo v. United States, 359 U.S. 419, 3 L. Ed. 2d 915, 79 S. Ct. 864 (1959); United States v. Ryan, 350 U.S. 299, 100 L. Ed. 335, 76 S. Ct. 400 (1956).

[14] § 302(c)(5)(A), 29 U.S.C. § 186(c)(5)(A).

[15] § 302(c)(5)(B), 29 U.S.C. § 186(c)(5)(B).

[16] § 302(c)(5)(C), 29 U.S.C. § 186(c)(5)(C).

[17] National Woodwork Manufacturers Association v. NLRB, 386 U.S. 612, 18 L. Ed. 2d 357, 87 S. Ct. 1250 (1967); NLRB v. Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co., 388 U.S. 175, 87 S. Ct. 2001, 18 L. Ed. 2d 1123 (1967).

[18] Lewis v. Benedict Coal Co., 361 U.S. 459, 470, 4 L. Ed. 2d 442, 80 S. Ct. 489 (1960).

[19] See § 8(d), 29 U.S.C. § 158(d); H.J. Heinz Co. v. NLRB, 311 U.S. 514, 85 L. Ed. 309, 61 S. Ct. 320 (1941).

hardly have intended that individual operators should be permitted to enter into oral side agreements [16] with local union officials cancelling out those provisions dealing with the significant subject of payments into the union welfare fund. Whatever ambiguity lurks in the phrase "such payments" does not justify a conclusion that the provision for payment contained in the written collective bargaining agreement may be removed by oral arrangement. On the contrary, it would take clear and unambiguous language to prescribe that in order to fall within the exceptions to the criminal sanctions of § 302 only the detailed basis for the payments by the welfare fund to the employees but not the payments by the employer into the fund must be specified in the written agreement with the employer.

[17] We hold therefore that an oral modification which would have suspended the payment of the forty cents per ton royalty into the fund by the employer was ineffective because it violated § 302(c)(5)(B). [20] Nothing in our decision in Lewis v. Mears, 297 F.2d 101 (3 Cir. 1961), cert. denied, 369 U.S. 873, 8 L. Ed. 2d 276, 82 S. Ct. 1142 (1962), forecloses this conclusion. That case held only that parole evidence was admissible to show that the written agreement to make payments into a welfare trust never became effective because it was not fully executed and delivered. Here, on the other hand, it is agreed that a valid written contract existed which obligated the company to make royalty payments into the fund, under which the company in fact made substantial payments, but a claim is made of an oral arrangement which later suspended or modified it. Such an oral agreement to suspend or modify an existing written contract falling within § [*444] 302(c)(5) (B) is invalid and there can be no estoppel against the assertion of the public policy which condemns it.

[18] The judgment of the district court will be affirmed.

Dissent by: McLAUGHLIN

Dissent

McLAUGHLIN, Circuit Judge, dissenting:

The appeal here is from the granting of a motion for summary judgment by the District Court. The significant facts are simple and admitted. The union involved, through its president whose authority is conceded, agreed with appellant mine owner that if the latter would reopen its mines (which it had permanently closed) the employee productivity would increase sufficiently to enable the mines owner to meet all its obligations under an existing collective bargaining contract. Relying on that agreement, which clearly modified the underlying agreement requiring appellant to pay royalties to the union's welfare fund, appellant opened its mines. The employees did not increase their productivity and so enable appellant to pay royalties to the welfare fund. As a result appellant had to shut down its mines. Notwithstanding that situation, the trustees of the welfare fund brought this suit for said royalties and in the face of the above facts, the District Court granted the trustees' motion for summary judgment.

Both equitable estoppel and oral modification of the [19] 1964 labor contract were urged by appellant in the District Court as defeating the present action. The trial judge held that such oral modification was against public policy on the strength of Lewis v. Harcliff Coal Co., 237 F. Supp. 6, 8 (W.D. Pa. 1965). The oral agreement there was prior to the written contract. The decision is no authority to uphold the brazen repudiation of the subsequent oral agreement in this appeal. This Court in Burlesque Artists Assn. v. Hirst Enterprises, Inc., 267 F.2d 414 (3 Cir. 1959) affirmed a judgment where the jury had found that there had been a valid subsequent oral addition to the original written labor agreement. This recognition of subsequent oral modification of collective bargaining contracts is viewed as sound in labor arbitration practice. Gertman Co., Inc., 45 LA 30 (Thomas Kennedy Arbitration 1965). Metropolitan Transit Authority, 39 LA 849 (W. Fallon Arbitration, 1965).

---

[20] See Lewis v. Lowry, 295 F.2d 197, 200 (4 Cir. 1961), Sobeloff, Ch. J., dissenting, cert. denied, 368 U.S. 977, 7 L. Ed. 2d 438, 82 S. Ct. 478 (1962). See also Lewis v. Mears, 297 F.2d 101, 105 (3 Cir. 1961), Biggs, Ch. J. dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc, cert. denied, 369 U.S. 873, 8 L. Ed. 2d 276, 82 S. Ct. 1142 (1962).

The District Court considered that the modification to the original agreement under 29 U.S.C.A. § 186(c)(5)(B) had to be in writing. The majority opinion does not agree with that. It [20] cautiously considers that the statute "is not free from ambiguity". However, it never does construe it and simply goes on to fashion new law to support this judgment. I think it very clear that Section 302(c)(5)(B) of the L.M.R. Act does not touch the validity of the oral modification before us. In our Bey v. Muldoon, 354 F.2d 1005 (3 Cir. 1966) we affirmed the District Court, 223 F. Supp. 489, in holding regarding § 302(c)(5)(B) that "Reference to the legislative history shows that the Act was intended to prohibit any receipt of money by unions from employers unless the precise use to which the money shall be put is delineated." Absent a statutory provision that the oral modification involved is required by statute to be in writing that subsequent agreement is itself a valid contract. United Shoe Workers, etc. v. Le Danne Footwear, Inc., 83 F. Supp. 714 (D. Mass. 1949).

The District Court not only disposed of the above most substantial controverted issue by summary judgment but also so disposed of appellant's affirmative defenses of illegality. It is impossible to conjure away the vital fact questions raised. Appellant contended that [21] the Welfare and Retirement Fund clause of the National Bituminous Coal Wage Agreement was illegal under either or both the National Labor Relations Act and The Sherman Anti - trust Act. The District Court opinion concedes that the 1964 Amendment to the Welfare and Retirement Clause of the said Agreement with respect to its 80 cents per ton payment into the Fund by the signatory operator was held to be violative of Section [*445] 8(e) of the National Labor Relations Act. The motion of the union to have the Amendment declared valid was denied by the Board. The finality of the decision of that issue was stated by the District Court as still pending. Confronted by that inescapable situation, the Court disposed of the problem by holding that the plaintiffs' claim in this suit was not under the 80 cents provision of the Amendment but the older 40 cents provision, stating that "this being so, then the partial or even the entire invalidity of the Agreement would not alter the obligation to pay for the work already performed." From any reasonable viewpoint such an arbitrary disposal of the 1964 Amendment cannot be accomplished on this summary motion. At the very least appellant is [22] entitled to its day in court to show the intent of the parties with reference to the Amendment. Genuine, substantial questions of fact were presented to the District Court. They called for a trial on the merits of those issues, including the counterclaim of the defendant.

Clausen & Sons, Inc. v. Theo. Hamm Brewing Co.

United States District Court for the District of Minnesota, Third Division

September 7, 1967

No. 3-66-269 Civil

Reporter

284 F. Supp. 148 *; 1967 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11120 ; 1968 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,403

Clausen & Sons, Inc., Plaintiff, v. Theo. Hamm Brewing Co., Defendant alleges, beer, interstate commerce, products, Clayton Act, interstate, commerce, Robinson-Patman Act, violations, distributors, wholesalers, Counts, sales, cause of action, Sherman Act, contends, purports, interstate transaction, intrastate, antitrust, appears, prices, moves, wholesale distributor, price discrimination, substantial effect, alleged violation, resale price, purchases, reselling

Core Terms

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Sherman Act

HN1[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

The Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, provides that every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > Sherman Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Sherman Act

HN2[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

The Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 2, provides that every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

HN3[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

The Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 14, provides that it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to make a sale for resale within the United States on condition, agreement, or understanding that the purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods of a competitor of the seller, where the effect of such condition, agreement, or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > General Overview

HN4[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Vertical Restraints

See §§ 2 (a), (d) and (e) of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 13(a), (d) and (e).

Civil Procedure > ... > Responses > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss

HN5[] Defenses, Demurrers & Objections, Motions to Dismiss

The general rule is that a claim should not be dismissed for insufficiency of statement unless it appears to a certainty that the plaintiff would not be entitled to relief under any state of facts which could be proven in support of the claim.

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Heightened Pleading Requirements > General Overview

HN6[] Pleadings, Heightened Pleading Requirements

There are no special rules of pleading for antitrust cases.

Civil Procedure > Pleading & Practice > Pleadings > Rule Application & Interpretation

Evidence > Inferences & Presumptions > General Overview

HN7[] Pleadings, Rule Application & Interpretation

In evaluating pleadings a court should not require technical exactness and should construe the pleadings in the pleader's favor in order to do substantial justice and may draw reasonable inferences from the words of the pleading to this end.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Horizontal Refusals to Deal > General Overview

HN8[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Horizontal Refusals to Deal

Judicial inquiry is not to stop with a search of the record for evidence of purely contractual arrangements. When the manufacturer's actions go beyond mere announcement of his policy and the simple refusal to deal, and he employs other means which affect adherence to his resale prices, he has put together a combination in violation of the Sherman Act.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Scope

HN9[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Vertical Restraints

The prohibition of § 2 (e) of the Clayton Act is not against every discrimination, nor even against every discrimination in the course of interstate commerce. The prohibition is against discrimination in the furnishing of "services or facilities connected with the processing, handling, sale, or offering for sale of such commodity." The language is not complex nor are the words technical. Neither the legislative history nor the judicial interpretation of the quoted words requires the court to depart from their literal meaning. In other words, the services or facilities that must be made available on proportionally equal terms to all purchasers in competition are merchandising services or facilities.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

HN10[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

§ 3 of the Clayton Act makes it unlawful for any person engaged in interstate commerce to engage in certain restraints in the course of such commerce.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Robinson-Patman Act > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Competitive Injuries > General Overview

HN11[] Robinson-Patman Act, Claims

Section 2(a) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act makes it unlawful for any person engaged in interstate commerce to engage in price discrimination in the course of such commerce where either or any of the purchases involved in such discrimination are in interstate commerce.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

HN12[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

The fact that § 2(a) of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 13(a), expressly requires that some interstate transactions must be involved in the violation in addition to requiring that the violation must occur in the course of interstate commerce indicates that a violation can be "in the course of such commerce" without involving interstate transactions.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Horizontal Refusals to Deal > General Overview

HN13[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Horizontal Refusals to Deal

See § 2(c) of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 13(c).

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN14[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

Coerced adherence to a restraint in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act does not place plaintiff in pari delicto.

Judges: [1] Lord, D.J.

Opinion by: LORD

Opinion

[*149] Memorandum Order

LORD, D.J.

Pursuant to an order requiring a more definite statement, [1] [2] plaintiff, Clausen & [*150] Sons, Inc., [2] filed a second amended complaint. [3] Defendant, Theo. Hamm Brewing Co., [4] moved pursuant to Rules 12 and 56 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure for an order dismissing said complaint and parts thereof. Affidavits and memoranda of law in support of and in opposition to said motion have been received.

The complaint alleges generally that defendant is a corporation engaged in interstate commerce in the business of brewing beer and selling it to independent wholesale distributors; that upon each of these independent wholesale distributors defendant confers the exclusive right to sell Hamm's products within defined areas; and that plaintiff is one such independent wholesale distributor engaged exclusively in the distribution of Hamm's products in southern Minneapolis and the neighboring suburbs. The complaint, which purports to allege violations of the federal antitrust laws and seeks treble damages and injunctive relief, is comprised of four counts.

Briefly, Count I alleges as follows:

---

[1] The order requiring a more definite statement directed the filing of a second amended complaint in which:

"(a) a separate count is used for each offense of violation of federal antitrust law charged;

"(b) the essential facts, and not mere conclusions, are pleaded as to each such count to the greatest extent possible;

"(c) the statutory grounds allegedly prohibiting each claimed offense or violation are stated in each count;

"(d) the manner and amount in which plaintiff claims to have been damaged as a result of each such offense or violation are stated; and

"(e) the relationship between such violation and the alleged resulting injury to plaintiff is stated * * *."

[2] Hereinafter referred to as Clausen.

[3] Hereinafter referred to as the complaint.

[4] Hereinafter referred to as Hamm's.

"10. On information and belief each Minneapolis-St. Paul wholesaler and distributor of Hamm's products has been induced by Hamm's to observe Hamm's specific resale prices, which resale prices have been set at artificially low price levels.

* * *

"14. Hamm's has regularly [3] called monthly meetings of its Twin City area wholesalers or distributors for the purpose of reminding each of its area wholesalers or distributors, including Clausen, to adhere to and not to deviate from Hamm's resale price maintenance scheme.

* * *

"21. As a direct and proximate result of the foregoing actions of Hamm's, Clausen has been prohibited from reselling Hamm's products at prices that are consistent with sound economic and business principles and as a result thereof Clausen has been prevented from realizing a fair gross profit on the resale price of Hamm's beer products."

Count I further alleges that plaintiff was coerced to agree to abide by defendant's price maintenance scheme, alleges specific acts of defendant whereby plaintiff was thus coerced, alleges that defendant's conduct maintained the resale price of beer at so artificially low a level as to unreasonably restrain the flow of national and foreign beers into Minnesota, and alleges in conclusion that defendant's conduct violates Section 1 of the Sherman Act. [5]

[4] Count II in brief alleges that plaintiff has desired to and has had the opportunity to distribute products which pass through the channels of interstate commerce, specifically soft drinks and Schmidt, Budweiser, Gluek, Heineken and Lowenbrau beers, but has been precluded from doing so by threats by defendant of coercion and the immediate termination of its distributorship arrangement. Count II alleges that similar restraints have been imposed on every Hamm's distributor in the Minneapolis-St. Paul area. Count II alleges that Hamm's sales constitute 35% to 50% of the industry sales in the relevant market. Count II further alleges that as a condition to allowing plaintiff to purchase Hamm's products defendant has required plaintiff to purchase from defendant unpopular and unknown products, [*151] such as a premium beer known as Waldech and an inexpensive beer known as Buckhorn, in quantities which plaintiff did not desire and could not dispose of. Count II alleges that by the foregoing actions defendant has attempted to or has, in fact, acquired monopoly power in the sale and distribution of beer and related malt products in the Minneapolis-St. Paul area and has substantially [5] restrained commerce by making it more difficult for interstate brewers to gain access to the Minneapolis-St. Paul market area. Count II alleges that plaintiff has lost profits as a result of the foregoing acts of defendant and that these acts constitute violations of Section 2 of the Sherman Act [6] and Section 3 of the Clayton Act. [7]

[6] Count III in summary alleges as follows:

"2. Hamm's has sold Hamm's beer products to Minneapolis-St. Paul wholesalers and distributors, other than Clausen, at dock or platform prices lower than those prices charged to Clausen.

---

[5] HN1[] Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, provides as follows:

"Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal * * *."

[6] HN2[] Section 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2, provides as follows:

"Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor * * *."

[7] HN3[] Section 3 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 14, provides as follows:

"It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to * * * make a sale * * * for * * * resale within the United States * * * on condition, agreement, or understanding that the * * * purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods * * * of a competitor * * * of the * * * seller, where the effect of such * * * condition, agreement, or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce."

> "3. Hamm's has sold and continues to sell Hamm's beer products to many Minneapolis-St. Paul wholesalers or distributors, other than Clausen upon credit terms and conditions which are not extended to Clausen and has continuously and arbitrarily refused to grant similar credit terms to Clausen notwithstanding Clausen's fine credit standing and reputation in the community.
>
> * * *
>
> "8. As a direct and proximate result of the foregoing acts of price discrimination and credit preferences by Hamm's, Clausen has been unable to compete with other Hamm's distributors upon equal terms and conditions. The above acts of price discrimination and credit preferences by Hamm's have injured competition and affect interstate commerce.
>
> "9. The foregoing acts of price discrimination and credit preferences by Hamm's have unreasonably lessened competition and tend to permit Hamm's to create a monopoly in the sale of beer products in the Minneapolis-St. Paul market area."

[7] Count III further alleges that plaintiff has suffered injury as a result of the foregoing acts of defendant and that these acts constitute violations of Subsections (a), (d), and (e) of Section 2 of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act. [8]

[8] [*152] Count IV alleges briefly as follows:

> "2. Hamm's has extracted an agreement for each of its distributors and wholesalers whereby each wholesaler or distributor, including Clausen, shall resell Hamm's products solely within those areas designated and determined from time to time, by Hamm's.
>
> "3. From and after 1945 through April 1963, Clausen resold Hamm's beer products within and around the City of Bloomington, Minnesota. On or about April 1, 1963, Hamm's began to prohibit and has continued to prohibit Clausen from reselling Hamm's products within and around the City of Bloomington, Minnesota (except for Metropolitan Stadium) said action having been arbitrarily taken by Hamm's without the consent of Clausen.
>
> "4. Hamm's has and continues to prohibit Clausen from reselling Hamm's products in any area of Minneapolis other than the area commonly known as the 'South Side' of Minneapolis, even though Clausen has continuously sought to resell Hamm's beer in other areas of Minneapolis and Hennepin County.
>
> * * *
>
> "6. The foregoing wrongful acts of Hamm's have been tantamount to an agreement to eliminate intra-brand competition within the St. Paul-Minneapolis trade area. [9]
>
> * * *

---

[8] HN4[] Subsections (a), (d) and (e) of Section 2 of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 13(a), (d) and (e), provide as follows:

"(a) It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality, where either or any of the purchases involved in such discrimination are in commerce, where such commodities are sold for * * * resale within the United States * * * and where the effect of such discrimination may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce, or to injure, destroy, or prevent competition with any person who either grants or knowingly receives the benefit of such discrimination, or with customers of either of them; * * *.

* * *

"(d) It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce to pay or contract for the payment of anything of value to or for the benefit of a customer of such person in the course of such commerce as compensation or in consideration for any services or facilities furnished by or through such customer in connection with the processing, handling, sale, or offering for sale of any products or commodities manufactured, sold, or offered for sale by such person, unless such payment or consideration is available on proportionally equal terms to all other customers competing in the distribution of such products or commodities.

"(e) It shall be unlawful for any person to discriminate in favor of one purchaser against another purchaser or purchasers of a commodity bought for resale, with or without processing, by contracting to furnish or furnishing, or by contributing to the furnishing of, any services or facilities connected with the processing, handling, sale, or offering for sale of such commodity so purchased upon terms not accorded to all purchasers on proportionally equal terms."

"8. The foregoing wrongful acts of Hamm's have a pernicious effect on competition and lack any redeeming value."

Count IV further alleges that the foregoing acts of defendant have caused injury to the plaintiff and that these acts constitute violations of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. [9]

From the affidavits submitted by both parties, the following uncontradicted facts appear:

Defendant is engaged in a substantial interstate beer selling business;

Plaintiff's business is strictly intrastate;

None of Hamm's independent wholesale distributors in Minnesota sells beer across state lines;

All the beer products sold by defendant to its independent wholesale distributors in Minnesota in the past five years have been produced within the State of Minnesota; [10]

During the past five years defendant's share of the total wholesale beer sales to retailers in the Minneapolis and Hennepin County market area has been less [10] than 30%;

Neither the defendant nor any other brewer selling beer products to wholesalers [*153] in Ramsey and Hennepin Counties sells soft drink beverages to such wholesalers; and

The alleged price-fixing activities of defendant reduced the gross profit margin of Hamm's products sold by plaintiff and as a result reduced plaintiff's net profits.

The affidavits of the parties are in conflict as to whether or not Hamm's, Waldech, and Buckhorn beers are functionally interchangeable substitutes serving the same consumer markets.

HN5[] The general rule is that a claim should not be dismissed for insufficiency of statement unless it appears to a certainty that the plaintiff would not be entitled to relief under any state of facts which [11] could be proven in support of the claim. See, e.g., Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 2 L. Ed. 2d 80, 78 S. Ct. 99 (1957); P. H. Machinery, Inc. v. Harnischfeger Corp., 207 F. Supp. 392 (D.C. Minn. 1962).

HN6[] There are no special rules of pleading for antitrust cases. Nagler v. Admiral Corp., 248 F.2d 319 (2nd Cir. 1957); New Home Appliance Center v. Thompson, 250 F.2d 881 (10th Cir. 1957); Walker Distributing Co. v. Lucky Lager Brewing Co., 323 F.2d 1 (9th Cir. 1963); Bales v. Kansas City Star Co., 336 F.2d 439 (8th Cir. 1964); Louisiana Farmers' Protective Union v. Great A. & P. Tea Co., 131 F.2d 419 (8th Cir. 1942).

The Eighth Circuit philosophy of liberal pleading in antitrust litigation is amply demonstrated by the following quotation from Bales v. Kansas City Star Co., 336 F.2d at 443:

"Our action of reversal can sufficiently be cast in the summary expression of Mr. Justice Holmes in Hart v. B. F. Keith Vaudeville Exchange, 262 U.S. 271, 274, 43 S. Ct. 540, 541, 67 L. Ed. 977 (1923), in making reversal of the dismissal of a private antitrust action, as follows: 'It is enough that we are not prepared to say that nothing can be extracted from this bill that falls under the act [12] of Congress, or at least that the claim is wholly frivolous.'

"The attitude of this somewhat early case in the field seems to have been that a charge of antitrust violation, with claim of business injury therefrom, should generally be afforded the opportunity for proof to be made thereon, because of the aspect of public interest involved. Only where it is legally certain that the acts charged, in their rational implications, are incapable of constituting a violation of the antitrust laws, or where it is factually patent that the asserted claim is wholly frivolous, would a summary dismissal of the complaint be entitled to be made."

---

[9] Section 1 of the Sherman Act is quoted at footnote 5 supra.

[10] While plaintiff alleged by complaint and affidavit that it had purchased beer from defendant's California brewery, one of defendant's affidavits states that this has not occurred within the past ten years, and this affidavit by defendant has not been contradicted.

HN7[] In evaluating pleadings a court should not require technical exactness and should construe the pleadings in the pleader's favor in order to do substantial justice and may draw reasonable inferences from the words of the pleading to this end. See Fed. Rules Civ. Pro. 8(f); 1A Barron & Holtzoff, Fed. Prac. & Pro., § 283 and the cases cited therein. As the Court said in Nagler v. Admiral Corp., 248 F.2d at 325, "we are not conducting exercises in pleading; we must look beyond the mere mountain of words to the meaning sought to be conveyed."

Defendant [13] moves for dismissal of Count I on the ground that the required jurisdictional facts regarding the direct and substantial effect of the alleged restraint upon interstate commerce are not alleged. Defendant's contention in this regard is that the only "contract, combination * * * or conspiracy" alleged in Count I is that between plaintiff and defendant and that this single agreement is insufficient to have a direct and substantial effect on interstate commerce. This, it seems to the Court, is an extremely restricted and unreasonable interpretation of the allegations of Count I. Given the liberal rules of pleading and construction of pleadings, the construction of Count I proposed by plaintiff is more reasonable. This construction is that Count I alleges a vertical, [*154] and a vertically imposed horizontal, price fixing combination involving not only the plaintiff and the defendant, but also all the other independent wholesale distributors of Hamm's products in the Minneapolis-St. Paul metropolitan area. Such a combination, maintaining artificially low prices, might well substantially impede the flow of interstate beers into Minnesota and thereby have a direct and substantial [14] effect on interstate commerce. Thus, it appears that defendant is not entitled to dismissal of Count I on this ground.

Defendant also contends that Count I should be dismissed on the ground that the price maintenance alleged therein was accomplished entirely unilaterally and, therefore, falls within the rule of U.S. v. Colgate & Co., 250 U.S. 300, 63 L. Ed. 992, 39 S. Ct. 465 (1919). However, the Court's construction of Count I, indicated in the previous paragraph, requires a rejection of this contention of defendant. The Supreme Court's reasoning in refusing to apply the Colgate doctrine to the facts involved in U.S. v. Parke, Davis & Co., 362 U.S. 29, 44, 4 L. Ed. 2d 505, 80 S. Ct. 503 (1960), applies as well to the facts alleged in the instant complaint:

> "* * * HN8[] judicial inquiry is not to stop with a search of the record for evidence of purely contractual arrangements * * *. When the manufacturer's actions, as here, go beyond mere announcement of his policy and the simple refusal to deal, and he employs other means which affect adherence to his resale prices, * * * he has put together a combination in violation of the Sherman Act."

Defendant further contends that [15] Count I fails to allege a causal connection between the alleged price maintenance scheme and the alleged injury to plaintiff. However, the complaint alleges that plaintiff has lost gross profits as a result of being precluded, by defendant's scheme maintaining artificially low prices, from reselling Hamm's products at prices consistent with sound business principles, and it cannot be said that under no state of facts which might be proved in support of this allegation would plaintiff be entitled to relief. Defendant contends that gross profits is an improper measure of damages; however, since plaintiff has indicated by affidavit an intention to prove loss of net profits, no useful purpose would be served by granting dismissal on this ground.

Defendant also contends that any price fixing scheme which might have existed would have accrued to plaintiff's benefit. This contention may prove relevant at trial, but is of no relevance at this stage of the proceedings. The only statement by affidavit addressing this point contradicts defendant's contention.

Defendant moves for dismissal of Count II in so far as it purports to assert a cause of action under Section 2 of the Sherman Act [16] on the ground that the essential elements for either an actual monopolization or an attempted monopolization claim for relief are not pleaded and on the ground that the required jurisdictional facts regarding the direct and substantial effect of each alleged restraint upon interstate commerce are not alleged. Count II alleges that defendant attempted monopolization and effected actual monopolization of the Minneapolis-St. Paul metropolitan area market for beer products and sets out competing brand and product prohibitions and tying agreements as acts evidencing such violations. Also supporting the attempted and actual monopolization charges are the allegations of the other counts of the complaint. Liberally construed, the allegations of Count II encompass allegation of power to fix prices and control competition and the dangerous probability of and intent to acquire such power. A sufficient allegation of damages and causal connection with alleged wrongful acts has been made. Moreover, facts might be proved in support of Count II which would establish a direct and substantial effect on commerce. It appears, therefore, that these grounds are insufficient to justify dismissal of [17] Count II in so far as it alleges [*155] violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act.

Defendant moves for dismissal of Count II in so far as it purports to assert a cause of action under Section 3 of the Clayton Act on the ground that it fails to state a claim upon which relief may be granted. Defendant contends that none of the practices complained of in Count II is alleged to have been contained in any sale on condition, agreement, or understanding thereof; however, this contention is based upon an unreasonably restricted interpretation of the allegations of Count II and is, therefore, invalid. Defendant contends that soft drink beverages are not commodities of a competitor of defendant and that Waldech, Buckhorn, and Hamm's beers are functionally interchangeable substitutes serving the same consumer markets; however, these contentions cannot avail defendant upon a motion for summary dismissal because their validity depends entirely upon the evidence which presumably will be adduced in their support at trial. Defendant further contends that insufficient facts have been alleged in Count II regarding the effect of the alleged restraints upon competition, regarding the causal [18] relationship between the alleged wrongful acts and the alleged injury, and regarding plaintiff's opportunities to distribute beers of competitors of Hamm's; however, it cannot be said that plaintiff would not be entitled to relief under any state of facts which might be proved in support of the allegations already made with respect to these matters. Accordingly, it appears that defendant is not entitled on these grounds to dismissal of Count II in so far as it alleges a cause of action under Section 3 of the Clayton Act.

Defendant moves for dismissal of Count III in so far as it purports to state a cause of action for violation of Subsections (d) and (e) of Section 2 of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act on the ground that it fails to state a claim upon which relief may be granted. Count III alleges price discrimination and credit preferences. Subsections (d) and (e) proscribe discrimination between purchasers of a commodity in the furnishing of, or in payment in return for the furnishing by the purchaser of, services and facilities connected with "the processing, handling, sale, or offering for sale" of the commodity. Neither the price discriminations nor the [19] credit preferences alleged in Count III can be considered to be services or facilities furnished in connection with "the processing, handling, sale or offering for sale" of Hamm's beer. See Skinner v. United States Steel Corporation, 233 F.2d 762, 765-766 (5th Cir. 1956), wherein the court said:

> "* * * HN9[] The prohibition of Section 2 (e) is not against every discrimination, nor even against every discrimination in the course of interstate commerce. The prohibition is against discrimination in the furnishing of 'services or facilities connected with the processing, handling, sale, or offering for sale of such commodity '. The language is not complex nor are the words technical. Neither the legislative history nor the judicial interpretation of the quoted words requires us to depart from their literal meaning. The service, furnished to Union Supply Company and denied the appellant, does not have any connection with the processing, handling, sale or offering for sale of any of the commodities which may have been sold by the appellee to Union Supply Company * * *. This is a particularly apt situation for the application of the maxim 'expressio unius est exclusio alterius.' * [20] * *.
> "* * * In other words, the services or facilities that must be made available on proportionally equal terms to all purchasers in competition are merchandising services or facilities. * * *."

Also see Secatore's Inc. v. Esso Standard Oil Co., 171 F. Supp. 665 (D.C. Mass. 1959). Thus, it appears that Count III must be dismissed to the extent that it purports to state a cause of action for [*156] violation of Subsections (d) and (e) of Section 2 of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act.

Defendant moves for dismissal of both Counts II and III on the ground that these counts fail to comply with the order of this Court requiring a more definite statement. [11] However, the Court is satisfied that these counts adequately comply with its order. While they may not comply exactly with all the specifics of that order, they clearly comply with its spirit and give adequate notice of the conduct of which complaint is made.

---

[11] See footnote 1, supra.

Defendant moves for dismissal of both [21] Counts II and III in so far as they purport to assert causes of action for violation, respectively, of Section 3 of the Clayton Act and Section 2(a) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act on the ground that these counts fail to allege transactions in the course of interstate commerce. The sales alleged in Count II as having been made upon the condition that plaintiff comply with certain restraints were solely intrastate sales. Likewise, the discriminatory sales alleged in Count III were solely intrastate sales. Thus, no interstate transactions are relied upon in either Count II or Count III. HN10[] Section 3 of the Clayton Act makes it unlawful for any person engaged in interstate commerce to engage in certain restraints "in the course of such commerce." HN11[] Section 2(a) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act makes it unlawful for any person engaged in interstate commerce to engage in price discrimination "*in the course of such commerce * * * where either or any of the purchases involved in such discrimination are in* [interstate] commerce." Thus, both sections proscribe only violations "in the course of such commerce," and Section [22] 2(a) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act contains the additional requirement that "either or any of the purchases involved in such discrimination" be in interstate commerce. Defendant contends that the violations alleged in Counts II and III did not occur "in the course of such commerce" because said violations involved no interstate transactions. However, HN12[] the fact that Section 2(a) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act expressly requires that some interstate transactions must be involved in the violation in addition to requiring that the violation must occur in the course of interstate commerce indicates that a violation can be "in the course of such commerce" without involving interstate transactions. The case of Moore v. Mead's Fine Bread Co., 348 U.S. 115, 99 L. Ed. 145, 75 S. Ct. 148 (1954), demonstrates the expansive construction given by the Supreme Court to the phrase "in the course of such commerce". Plaintiff in that case conducted an intrastate bakery business in New Mexico. Defendant conducted an interstate bakery business. Defendant cut prices in New Mexico but not in other states and was sued for violation of Section 2(a) [23] of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act. The Supreme Court held that the violation occurred in the course of interstate commerce, applying the following rationale:

> "We think that the practices in the present case are also included within the scope of the antitrust laws. We have here an interstate industry increasing its domain through outlawed competitive practices. The victim, to be sure, is only a local merchant; and no interstate transactions are used to destroy him. But the beneficiary is an interstate business; the treasury used to finance the warfare is drawn from interstate, as well as local, sources * * *. If this method of competition were approved, the pattern for growth of monopoly would be simple. As long as the price warfare was strictly intrastate, interstate business could grow and expand with impunity at the expense of local merchants. The competitive advantage would then be with the interstate combines, [*157] not by reason of their skills or efficiency but because of their strength and ability to wage price wars. * * * No instrumentality of interstate commerce would be used to destroy the local merchant and expand the domain of the [24] combine. But the opportunities afforded by interstate commerce would be employed to injure local trade. * * *." Id. at 119.

While the facts of Moore differ from those of the instant case, the above quoted rationale compels a conclusion that Counts II and III allege violations "in the course of such commerce ". The beneficiary of such violations is an interstate business, the alleged violations were calculated to exclude interstate competition, and defendant's power to impose the restraint was enhanced by its interstate treasury. In Rangen, Inc. v. Sterling Nelson & Sons, 351 F.2d 851 (1965), the Ninth Circuit held on the basis of the Moore decision that certain commercial bribery had occurred "in the course of such commerce" within the meaning of section 2(c) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, [12] [27] notwithstanding the fact that no interstate sales were involved and the bribery

---

[12] HN13[] Section 2(c) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 13(c), provides as follows:

"It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to pay or grant, or to receive or accept, anything of value as a commission, brokerage, or other compensation, or any allowance or discount in lieu thereof, except for services rendered in connection with the sale or purchase of goods, wares, or merchandise, either to the other party to such transaction or to an agent, representative, or other intermediary therein where such intermediary is acting in fact for or in behalf, or is subject to the direct or indirect control, of any party to such transaction other than the person by whom such compensation is so granted or paid."

payments did not pass through interstate commerce because the bribery "created influences intrastate which injured the free competitive interstate commerce in fish food." 351 F.2d at 861. In that case both the plaintiff and the defendant were manufacturers of fish food [25] engaged in interstate businesses. Plaintiff, a Utah based producer, sued defendant, an Idaho based producer, for bribing a state official of Idaho to prefer defendant's fish food. The fish food sales by the defendant to the State of Idaho occurred entirely within intrastate commerce. The cases cited by defendant in support of its contention that the "in the course of such commerce" requirement is not satisfied unless interstate transactions are involved in the violation, are not persuasive because all such decisions rendered subsequent to the Moore decision either ignored that decision entirely [13] or involved Section 2(a) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act which section expressly requires that violations involve some transactions in interstate commerce. [14] Thus it appears that the violations alleged in Counts II and III occurred "in the course of such commerce ", notwithstanding the fact that said violations involved no interstate transactions. Consequently, defendant's motion for dismissal of Count II in so far as it alleges violation of Section 3 of the Clayton Act must be denied. [15] However, defendant is entitled [*158] to summary judgment with [26] respect to Count III in so far as it alleges violation of Section 2(a) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act because that section expressly applies only "where either or any of the purchases involved in such discrimination are in [interstate] commerce," and no interstate discriminatory sales are alleged in Count III. See Central Ice Cream Co. v. Golden Rod Ice Cream Co., 287 F.2d 265 (7th Cir. 1961). [16]

[28] Defendant moves for dismissal of Count IV to the extent that it purports to assert a separate cause of action for violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act on the grounds that (1) it fails to state a claim upon which relief may be granted; (2) it fails to allege sufficient facts regarding direct and substantial effect on interstate commerce; and (3) plaintiff would be in pari delicto with respect to any violation alleged in Count IV. Count IV alleges a vertically coerced territorial confinement agreement among Hamm's distributors severely restricting intra-brand competition and substantially restraining interstate commerce. It cannot be said that nothing can be proved in support of this claim which would entitle plaintiff to relief and establish the requisite effect on commerce. See United States v. Arnold Schwinn & Co., 388 U.S. 365, 87 S. Ct. 1856, 18 L. Ed. 2d 1249 (June 12, 1967). Nor can the Court accept the contention that the doctrine of in pari delicto precludes plaintiff from basing a claim for relief upon the allegations of Count IV. HN14[] Coerced adherence to a restraint in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act does not place plaintiff in pari delicto. Bales [29] v. Kansas City Star Co., 336 F.2d 439 (8th Cir. 1964). It thus appears that defendant is not entitled to dismissal of Count IV.

Upon the foregoing analysis,

It Is Hereby Ordered:

---

[13] Massachusetts Brewers Assoc. v. P. Ballantine & Sons Co., 129 F. Supp. 736 (D.C. Mass. 1955).

[14] Willard Dairy Corp. v. National Dairy Pro. Corp., 309 F.2d 943 (6th Cir. 1962); La Pointe v. Schweigert Meat Co., 282 F. Supp. 974 (D.C. Minn. 1966); Cream Crest-Blanding Dairies, Inc. v. National Dairy Products, 243 F. Supp. 331 (W.D. Mich. 1965); Borden Co. v. F.T.C., 339 F.2d 953 (7th Cir. 1964); Central Ice Cream Co. v. Golden Rod Ice Cream Co., 287 F.2d 265 (7th Cir. 1961).

[15] Defendant also moved on the ground of failure to allege transactions in the course of interstate commerce for dismissal of Count III in so far as it purports to state a cause of action for violation of Section 2(d) and (e) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act. The above analysis regarding Section 3 of the Clayton Act indicates that the Court does not consider this a valid ground for dismissal of Count III in so far as it purports to state a cause of action for violation of these subsections.

[16] The Moore decision cannot save Count III because some of the purchases involved in the discrimination therein were in interstate commerce. Nor does the fact that some of the ingredients used in the process of manufacturing beer in defendant's St. Paul, Minnesota brewery passed through interstate commerce save Count III, because these ingredients were transformed into an entirely new product. See, e.g., Rangen, Inc. v. Sterling Nelson & Sons, 351 F.2d 851, 860 (9th Cir. 1965).

That defendant's motion for summary judgment dismissing Count III herein in so far as it purports to assert causes of action for violation of Section 2(a), (d), and (e) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act is hereby granted. The Court sees no just cause for delay in entering this judgment after ten days have passed from the date this order is signed, during which time the Court will entertain any motion which plaintiff may make to amend Count III. Let Judgment Be Entered Accordingly.

It Is Further Ordered:

That all the other motions by defendant pursuant to Rules 12 and 56 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure for dismissal herein are hereby denied.

United States v. Concentrated Phosphate Export Asso.

United States District Court for the Southern District of New York

September 11, 1967

No. 64 Civ. 3914

Reporter

273 F. Supp. 263 *; 1967 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 8973 ; 1967 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,203

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff, v. The CONCENTRATED PHOSPHATE EXPORT ASSOCIATION, Inc., American Cyanamid Company, W. R. Grace & Co., International Minerals & Chemical Corporation, Tennessee Corporation and Socony Mobil Oil Company, Inc., Defendants procurements, export, foreign aid, bid, supplier, funds, sales, transactions, shipment, Webb-Pomerene Act, commodities, Regulation, phosphates, financed, Authorization, fertilizer, domestic, immunity, concentrated, delivery, certificate, invitation, exemption, prices, anti trust law, cooperating, conditions, provisions, handled, shipped

Core Terms

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Sherman Act

HN1[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

§ 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, provides in pertinent part that every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Export Trade

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Types of Commercial Transactions > Sales of Goods > General Overview

International Trade Law > General Overview

HN2[] Exemptions & Immunities, Export Trade

§ 1 of the Webb-Pomerene Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 61, provides that the words "export trade" mean solely trade or commerce in goods, wares, or merchandise exported, or in the course of being exported from the United States or any Territory thereof to any foreign nation; but the words "export trade" shall not be deemed to include the production, manufacture, or selling for consumption or for resale, within the United States or any Territory thereof, of such goods, wares, or merchandise, or any act in the course of such production, manufacture, or selling for consumption or for resale.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Export Trade

HN3[] Exemptions & Immunities, Export Trade

See § 2 of the Webb-Pomerene Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 62.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Export Trade

International Law > Authority to Regulate > Anticompetitive Activities

International Trade Law > International Commerce & Trade > Exports & Imports > General Overview

HN4[] Exemptions & Immunities, Export Trade

"To export" had at the time the Webb-Pomerene Act was enacted the same meaning that it now has, to carry or send abroad, especially to foreign countries.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Export Trade

International Trade Law > International Commerce & Trade > Exports & Imports > General Overview

International Trade Law > General Overview

HN5[] Exemptions & Immunities, Export Trade

The Webb-Pomerene Act specifically defines what is excluded from the words "export trade" by stating that they shall not be deemed to include the production, manufacture or selling for consumption or resale within the United States, which it defines as trade among the several states.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Export Trade

International Trade Law > International Commerce & Trade > Exports & Imports > General Overview

HN6[] Exemptions & Immunities, Export Trade

The word "export" as used in the Constitution and the laws of the United States means the transportation of goods from this to a foreign country.

Governments > Legislation > Interpretation

HN7[] Legislation, Interpretation

Judicial construction should be used not to create doubt, but only to resolve one. Where there is no doubt, there is nothing to construe. The court should not under the guise of "construction" rewrite the statute; obviously, this is not a judicial function.

Counsel: [1] Donald Turner, Asst. Atty. Gen., Dept. of Justice, Washington, District of Columbia, for plaintiff (Burton R. Thorman, E. Leo Backus, Larry D. Knippa, Robert K. Johnson, Washington, District of Columbia, of counsel).

Hollabaugh & Jacobs, Washington, District of Columbia, for defendant The Concentrated Phosphate Export Ass'n Inc. (Marcus A. Hollabaugh and Alan S. Ward, Washington, District of Columbia, of counsel).

Donovan Leisure, Newton & Irvine, New York, New York, for defendant American Cyanamid Co. (Samuel W. Murphy, Jr., Andrew J. Kilcarr and Vernon E. Vig, New York, New York, of counsel).

Cahill, Gordon, Sonnett, Reindel & Ohl, New York, New York, for defendant W. R. Grace & Co. (Douglas E. Cutler and Peter H. Schuck, New York, New York, of counsel).

White & Case, New York, New York, for defendant International Minerals & Chemical Corp. (Edgar E. Barton and Abdul W. Wohabe, New York, New York of Counsel).

Guggenheimer & Untermyer, New York, New York, for defendant Tennessee Corp. (Randolph Guggenheimer, Leon H. Tykulsker and Randolph Guggenheimer, Jr., New York, New York, of counsel).

Howrey, Simon, Baker & Murchison, Washington, District of Columbia, for defendant Mobil [2] Oil Corp. (Edward F. Howrey and John Bodner, Jr., Washington, District of Columbia, of counsel).

Judges: Ryan, District Judge.

Opinion by: RYAN

Opinion

[*264] RYAN, District Judge:

This is an action brought to enjoin the price-fixing and business allocation activities of five fertilizer producers in connection with sales of fertilizer, made under the United States Foreign Aid Program, which was destined for the Republic of Korea. The challenged activities were conducted through the defendant Concentrated Phosphate Export Association, Inc. (CPEA), organized by the other defendants, or their respective corporate predecessors, in 1961. All facts have been stipulated. The question of law presented is whether the exemption from the Sherman Act provided for in the Webb-Pomerene Act applies to these transactions. [1]

---

[1] HN1[] Section 1 of the Sherman Act, as amended, 26 Stat. 209, 15 U.S.C. § 1, provides in pertinent part:

> "Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal * * *".

HN2[] Section 1 of the Webb-Pomerene Act, 40 Stat. 516, 15 U.S.C. § 61, provides in pertinent part:

> "The words 'export trade' * * * mean solely trade or commerce in goods, wares, or merchandise exported, or in the course of being exported from the United States or any Territory thereof to any foreign nation; but the words 'export trade' shall not be deemed to include the production, manufacture, or selling for consumption or for resale, within the United States or any Territory thereof, of such goods, wares, or merchandise, or any act in the course of such production, manufacture, or selling for consumption or for resale."HN3[]

Section 2 of the Webb-Pomerene Act, 40 Stat. 517 (1918), 15 U.S.C. § 62, provides:

[3] The parties have stipulated as follows:

> The issue presented by the pleadings in this case is whether the Concentrated Phosphate Export Association, Inc., a nonprofit membership corporation organized and operated under the Act of April 10, 1918, Ch. 50, 40 Stat. 516, 15 U.S.C. 61-65 (commonly known as the Webb-Pomerene Act), and its members violated Section 1 of the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. 1) in connection with that portion of the Association's sales of phosphatic fertilizer which such Association made for shipment to the Republic of Korea, where the Board of five Directors of the Association composed of one Director for each Member agreed on selling prices and on allocation of sales among such Members, when United States Government foreign aid funds were made available to pay for said phosphatic fertilizer shipments in accordance with statutes, treaties and regulations applicable to the U.S. foreign aid program.

Plaintiff, conceding that the transactions involved were exports from Florida to the Republic of Korea, contends that because they were part of a United [*265] States program of foreign aid, controlled, managed and funded by the Government, they are not "export [4] trade" within the meaning of the "Webb-Pomerene Act" and consequently were in violation of the antitrust laws. The defendants rest squarely on the Act and answer that since these transactions were literally exports, the fact that they were shipped under the foreign aid program cannot convert them into domestic sales excluded from the statutory immunity. Plaintiff does not otherwise dispute the lawfulness of CPEA's operations under the Webb-Pomerene Act and the only question, therefore, is the application of the Act to these sales.

Plaintiff's reasoning is that the sales in question do not come within the Webb-Pomerene Act because they do not constitute export trade in that they were such an integral part of a United States program which paid for and closely controlled them, that they were tantamount to purchases made by the United States for the benefit of the Republic of Korea and are therefore domestic sales. Plaintiff also urges that, even if these transactions be held to be export trade, they were never within the contemplation of Congress when it legislated the immunity because (a) there was at that time no Foreign Aid Program in which the Government assumed the financial [5] burden and cost for these commodities sold; (b) the price-fixing activities of the defendants injured the United States. The Government also urges that there is no necessity for these defendants to have the benefit of the immunity of the Act for they were not required to meet unlimited competition from suppliers abroad in foreign aid sales. Finally, the Government contends that a contrary interpretation of the immunity of the Webb-Pomerene Act would destroy the purpose of the exemption and frustrate the foreign aid program as well as the Sherman Act.

Summed up, the Government's argument is one a posteriori: from the conclusion that price fixing is per se illegal under antitrust principles in that injury to competition and to the public is presumed, it takes but one step back to conclude that ergo the United States and its citizens, who bore the cost initially of these fixed prices, must have been hurt. The Government reasoning that this was not intended by Congress when it immunized certain sales reaches a conclusion that these sales do not come within the exemptions of the Webb-Pomerene Act, that they are in violation of antitrust law, and, being "illegal per se", are to be struck [6] down.

We have concluded that the answer lies in the wording of the statute. Let us, first, summarize the facts necessary to an appreciation of the question presented.

There is no dispute as to the accuracy of facts advanced by either party in support of its position. They do differ as to relevance and materiality of some of these facts and, of course, as to the conclusions to be drawn from them.

> "That nothing contained in (the Sherman Act) shall be construed as declaring to be illegal and association entered into for the sole purpose of engaging in export trade and actually engaged solely in such export trade, or an agreement made or act done in the course of export trade by such association, provided such association, agreement, or act is not in restraint of trade within the United States and is not in restraint of the export trade of any domestic competitor of such association: And provided further, That such association does not, either in the United States or elsewhere, enter into any agreement, understanding, or conspiracy, or do any act which artificially or intentionally enhances or depresses prices within the United States of commodities of the class exported by such association, or which substantially lessens competition within the United States or otherwise restrains trade therein.

The cooperation of counsel at pretrial hearings produced a statement of stipulated facts with exhibits attached; we turn to these:

The defendants are:

CPEA - a non-profit Delaware corporation with its principal place of business in New York, New York, organized on September 12, 1961 to engage solely in export trade as the term "export trade" is defined in the Webb-Pomerene Act, and specifically to engage in trade and commerce in the product known as triple superphosphate and certain other concentrated phosphatic materials. (At all material times, CPEA has been duly registered with the Federal Trade Commission as an association organized and acting under the Webb-Pomerene Act.)

CPEA's five Members: W. R. Grace & Co.; Tennessee Corporation; Socony Mobil Company, Inc.; American Cyanamid [7] Company and International Minerals and Chemical Corporation. [2]

[*266] Each of these defendant members is a domestic corporation producing chemical fertilizers known as "concentrated phosphates".

CPEA acts as an export selling agency for the concentrated phosphate products of its members. These products are shipped from Florida to Korea and other foreign ports. CPEA handles all phases of developing and negotiation of these sales and this includes all details, such as the submission of bids, shipment, transportation and billing. The management of CPEA is provided for in its by-laws. It is vested in a Board of Directors equal in number to the number of members with each member entitled to nominate one director. CPEA at all times since its formation has been governed by the Board of Directors, each director representing one of its members. The Board of Directors established the minimum price at which materials would [8] be sold by CPEA and the price at which the member would sell to the Association. The Board of Directors also allocated the available business among the members in accordance with the procedures set forth in the Membership Agreements. [3] None of the members bid as individuals on the Korean foreign aid procurements here in suit, all such sales were handled by CPEA.

The Government does not challenge the lawfulness of defendants' operations under the Act except as specifically stated in the issue stipulated. Thus, it does not charge that defendants have in any way restrained the domestic export trade of a competitor [9] or enhanced or depressed prices within the United States - activities which under the wording of the Act would deprive them of its immunity.

There were 13 shipments made from September 1961 (when CPEA was formed) through 1966, in which concentrated phosphates were procured "for shipment directly to and use by the Republic of Korea." This action is concerned with but 11 of these shipments. The materials procured and the costs of these shipments "were paid for with funds from the United States Government made available under its foreign assistance program to the Government of Korea", administered by AID, [4] or its predecessor ICA. [5]

One of the other two shipments was financed with Korean Foreign Exchange Funds, and the other shipment was financed out of a special Stabilization Fund granted in 1961 by the United States to the Republic of Korea to meet Korea's need for foreign exchange and to offset the anticipated short-term reduction in Korea's dollar earnings resulting from Korea's major reform in 1961 of its monetary exchange system. Neither of the two shipments was made subject to ICA or AID regulations; both were handled in accordance with OSROK's [6] applicable

---

[2] International Minerals and Chemical Corp. withdrew its membership on June 30, 1966.

[3] As required by the Act, copies of CPEA's corporate charter, by-laws and membership agreement were filed with the FTC. Annual reports for the years 1961-1965 were also so filed, as well as special reports of annual sales volume. In 1964, at the Commission's request, CPEA submitted a report separately stating the dollar volume of CPEA's 1961-1962 sales believed to have been subject to AID financing.

[4] "AID" - Agency for International Development, an agency of the United States Department of State, established in 1961.

[5] "ICA" - International Cooperation Administration, the predecessor agency of AID.

procurement [10] procedures. Although payment for this last mentioned shipment was made with United States funds, the Government does not challenge the lawfulness of this transaction.

The authority for the foreign assistance program since 1961 is contained in the Act for International Development of 1961 (AID) (22 U.S.C. § 2151, 75 Stat. 424, 427), which provides authority [*267] to the President "to furnish assistance on such terms and conditions as he may determine in order to promote the economic development of less developed friendly countries and areas, with emphasis upon assisting the development of human resources through such means as programs of technical [11] cooperation and development." (Sec. 211)

Among the terms and conditions, which must be met before eligibility for foreign aid is determined, is that the President find that the assistance proposed would not have a substantially adverse effect on the United States economy.

Following World War II, the United States Government made funds available to many countries to pay for commodities, including fertilizer, sold by commercial companies and shipped from the United States and other free-world sources to the recipient countries. Foreign aid funds have been made available from time to time both prior to and after 1961 to pay for various commodities such as fertilizer, including concentrated phosphates for the Republic of Korea through Acts of Congress beginning with the Mutual Security Act of 1954, 68 Stat. 832. [7]

[12] This assistance is made available to Korea through various treaties and agreements. The relevant agreement here is "The Economic Technical and Related Assistance Agreement between the United States and the Republic of Korea of February 8, 1961". Concern for the economic and general welfare of the United States in the furnishing of this foreign aid is reflected in this Agreement for it is provided that the assistance to be given shall be subject to applicable United States laws and regulations. It is also provided that the Korean Government is to cooperate with the United States Government to assure that procurement will be at reasonable prices and on reasonable terms. It is further provided that

> "All or any part of the program of assistance provided hereunder may be terminated by the Government of the United States if it determines that because of changed conditions the continuation of such assistance is unnecessary or undesirable."

The Foreign Aid program was supported by funds appropriated annually by Congress on budget requests and recommendations of the State Department and AID, stating the basis of detailed proposals which were made following negotiations with [13] foreign countries seeking assistance. The funds appropriated by Congress were made available by AID in the form of loans or grants in accordance with the applicable statutes, agreements, and regulations. Foreign aid funds have not been used to procure commodities for use or resale in the United States.

The expenditure of funds AID allocated for Korean commodity imports was subject to AID's approval of "Procurement Authorization Applications", submitted by agencies of the Korean Government to AID from time to time. AID's approval of Korean fertilizer procurements was made either in the form of a "Procurement Authorization" issued to OSROK or a "Procurement Authorization, U.S. Government Agency Purchase Requisition" issued to GSA.

AID, which was officially characterized as essentially a financing institution, did not itself procure any concentrated phosphates for Korea.

The Government of Korea had no obligation to repay the amounts granted by the United States, but the concentrated phosphates procured with AID financing were sold to Korean consumers by a Korean Government agency and the Korean currency (hwan) received from such sales was deposited by the selling [*268]

---

[6] "OSROK" - Office of Supply, Republic of Korea, the Korean governmental agency responsible for procurement of commodities for the Government of Korea.

[7] Although plaintiff disputes their similarity, defendants say that foreign aid programs go back at least to 1948 and the Marshall Plan and even farther to the time the Webb-Pomerene Act was enacted, when Congress also enacted the Organization of American Relief in Europe in 1918. The significance of this will appear later.

agency [14] in an account at the Bank of Korea in accordance with agreements between the United States and Korean governments. The Korean currency generated by such sales was not necessarily equal to the United States dollar value of the fertilizer sold. Such deposits were called "counterpart funds" and were used to support, in part, Korean and United States military establishments in Korea and for other purposes mutually agreed upon by the governments of the United States and Korea, including financing public works projects of the Korean Government. These funds were also available to the United States "as requested" but the Korean Government could also draw against them. Agreement between the two countries as to the disposition of unencumbered balances was subject to approval of Congress.

It appears that of the 13 transactions in which Korea purchased concentrated phosphates for import and consumption, 11 were handled directly by OSROK issuing the invitation for bids and that the other 2 transactions were handled by General Services Administration (GSA). Where OSROK was the procuring agency, CPEA registered in Korea as a bidder as required by Korean regulations, and its bids were submitted [15] there to OSROK and shipped on OSROK's call or requisition. OSROK, as buyer, handled the insurance; all disputes arising from the performance under the contract were adjusted and settled in Korea.

The following administrative procedure was taken where the procurement authorization issued to OSROK:

1. OSROK's submission to AID of a Procurement Authorization Application.
2. AID's issuance of a Procurement Authorization, a portion of which constituted a letter of commitment by AID to a specified United States Banking Institution to reimburse the bank for payment made to suppliers of the material being procured.
3. Invitation for Bids issued by OSROK requesting bids in compliance, inter alia, with AID Regulation No. 1.
4. AID's issuance of a Small Business Circular entitled "Trade Opportunities for American Suppliers", publishing the invitation for bid.
5. OSROK's Abstract of Bids received.
6. Lists of Successful Bidders prepared by OSROK and transmitted to AID.
7. Notice of Award issued by OSROK and in this instance addressed to CPEA.
8. Notice to supplier of Opening of Letter of Credit.
9. Letter of Credit with conditions issued [16] to CPEA by J. Henry Schroder Banking Corporation, New York, hereinafter called "Schroder Bank".
10. A performance bond of the supplier.
11. Voucher of Schroder Bank to the United States Government claiming payment and stamped by the United States Treasury Department as "paid", and attached documents in support thereof, including the invoice of CPEA and its Supplier's Certificate.

OSROK described on its application the type and amount of fertilizer it required; the proposed area of source; the proposed basis and time of delivery; the United States Banking Institution; the estimate of cost; how it would ship the commodities f.o.b. on United States flagships; how it would evaluate the bids; the condition of the fertilizer (that it meet United States Federal Specification Inspection terms); and a detailed "End-use Justification" for such authorization.

Where GSA was the procuring agency it issued "Invitations for Bids" on its standard form and its acceptance of any bid was endorsed at the foot of the face [*269] page of the form in the name of the "United States of America by the Contracting Officer". Bids were invited to be submitted to GSA which indicated the recipient [17] country, and code and delivery was specified as FAS or FOB vessel.

The bid tabulation of GSA shows that bids were received for delivery FOB vessel at Tampa, Florida, and for delivery FOB vessel in Tunisia and Portugal. Awards to successful bidders were made after review by GSA personnel. Invoices with supporting documents, including bills of lading, were submitted to GSA for payment. The shipper was designated as GSA with consignment to OSROK. Delivery by the supplier was established by a "Material Inspection and Receiving Report".

In short, GSA handled all incidents of the procurement from the invitation to bid to acceptance at the point of shipment, made shipment of the goods and made payment of the freight as well as payment of the purchase price.

The details of the control which the United States Government exerted over the Foreign Aid Program are spelled out in the Regulations adopted by AID for carrying out the program.

Upon the filing of a Procurement Authorization Application by the cooperating country to procure specified commodities against its allotment of AID funds, AID issued the Procurement Authorization after determination that the proposed purchase was in accordance [18] with the objectives of the Act. The Procurement Authorization issued by AID either to OSROK or to GSA specified the commodity and the maximum amount of money which would be provided, the delivery periods, the source from which the commodity might be obtained, and other provisions deemed necessary by it.

Among the requirements imposed by Regulation 1 upon the cooperating country is that at least fifty percent of the gross tonnage of all commodities financed by AID transported by ocean vessels to the cooperating country must be carried in privately owned United States flag commercial vessels. Another is that where formal competitive bidding is used, as was done with all the relevant procurements, copies of the invitation for bids must be sent to the Office of Small Business, AID, to give United States suppliers an opportunity to bid. [8] It also was further provided that if it appeared that "the objective of lowest competitive market price is not being met", AID would take appropriate action to impose additional limitations and might require a refund of the entire amount or as against the supplier of the amount by which the price exceeded the maximum price permitted by the regulation. [19] Specific calculations were set forth for determining the permitted maximum price where there was no available competitive market. Even in instances of delivery FOB, AID reserved the right to divert the shipment at any time before delivery and to vest title in transit "if necessary to assure compliance with any Act of Congress."

As to the Supplier, Regulation 1 also required that, to obtain payment, the Supplier (here the defendants) had to complete an AID form called the Supplier's Certificate in which he acknowledged that the procurement was to be paid for from funds made available by the United States pursuant to AID Regulation 1. The Supplier agreed to make appropriate refund to AID upon demand, in the event of non-performance under his contract, for any breach of the certificate or for any false certification. The Supplier in addition [20] certified that (1) the price did not exceed the market price; (2) that he had not given or received and would not give or receive any side payments or "kickbacks"; and (3) that he had not paid any contingent fees or commissions except as stated. This certificate, under "Notes", provides "(b) False statements herein are punishable [*270] by United States law." An important modification of the form certificate made in 1964, further provides that the agreement between the supplier and AID incorporated in the certificate shall be deemed to be a contract made under the laws of the District of Columbia. The 1964 revision requires too that the supplier maintain his records for a period of at least five years available for examination by AID.

As to the banks involved, Regulation 1 spelled out the responsibilities of the banking institutions. Generally, the bank is responsible for collection of the documents required, including the Supplier's Certificate, and for determining whether "in accordance with good commercial practice" the shipment complies with the requirements set forth in the letter of commitment as to delivery, source, destination, description and discounts or commissions. [21] While the American bank operates under a letter of credit from the Bank of Korea, it looks not to the Bank of Korea but to the United States Government for payment, under the letter of commitment issued by AID to the bank set forth in AID's agreement to reimburse the bank for payments made against the account of the approved applicant which may be applicable to the procurement.

Adherence to these requirements was a condition imposed on suppliers by the Korean Government under OSROK's General Provisions for Bidding. These provisions limited the Korean Government's contractual liability to the suppliers by conditioning its obligation on the receipt by the latter of the pertinent letter of commitment from AID.

---

[8] It is stipulated that in all 13 purchases CPEA directly competed for AID financed sales to Korea with domestic and eligible foreign producers of concentrated phosphates.

The control of the United States over the OSROK'S procurements is clearly defined. This control is even more evident in those instances where GSA was the procuring authority, for there, although Korea appeared as the "recipient country", the award was signed on behalf of the United States of America who, through GSA, made payment to the bank upon submission of invoices to it by the supplier. By agreement between GSA and AID's predecessor, ICA, AID provided GSA with funds to [22] pay for the cost of commodities. Following ordinary usual Governmental bidding procedure, the bids were sent to Washington and one of the standard bidding provisions was that the contract would be awarded to the bidder whose bid was most "advantageous to the Government, price and other factors considered."

One cannot logically dispute plaintiff's conclusion that the GSA procurements represent the ultimate in control by the United States over the expenditure of foreign aid funds in the Korean fertilizer procurements and that they emphasize the close regulation and control provided for to insure the proper and judicious expenditure of United States funds under the foreign aid program.

We do question the Government's further statement that by reason of this control the real contracting party for the commodities was the United States and that the transactions were therefore not "export trade", but domestic trade. We find to the contrary - the transactions were "export trade", especially in view of the concession by the Government that the goods sold by defendants were "for shipment to the Republic of Korea" procured by or on behalf of Korea by either OSROK or GSA acting as "the procurement [23] agency" and that the commodities were used in Korea.

We also do not accept or agree with defendant's argument that AID was but an incidental party to the transaction - no more than the usual financing institution found in international transactions where there are problems of currency exchange. AID was at the center of the transactions, it was the force which initiated, directed, controlled and financed them. Without AID, there would have been no sale or purchase and the extent of the role it played was known in every detail to and relied on by both parties to the transaction, particularly by the supplier who looked to it for payment and obligated itself to conform to its requirements and conditions if he was to [*271] receive payment. We find, however, that defendants were selling to the Korean Government. This we find, that the transaction was an "export" even where GSA was described in its procurement authorization and related documents as the "purchaser". The AID regulations referred to these transactions as "exports". It has been stipulated that AID did not purchase concentrated phosphates for consumption or resale. It is plain from the stipulated facts and from the [24] very raison d'etre of the foreign aid program that the "cooperating country" and not the United States is the purchaser.

Plaintiff also stresses as an important factor that the Korean Government was under no obligation to repay these "grants" or "loans". [9] But we find this not to be the fact for, while Korea may not have signed a promissory note payable on demand in equivalent funds with interest, it did obligate itself to the extent that the Korean funds it received on resale of the commodities were to be deposited and used by it in accordance with its agreement with the United States and to be available to the Government of the United States in the manner required by it. This condition was hardly consistent with an outright gift of money to Korea. Indeed, the Government itself has pointed out that, despite the general statement of the purpose behind the Foreign Assistance Act, the Act makes it clear that Congress had no intention of writing a "blank check" for the underdeveloped countries to spend at will. AID Administrator David E. Bell, before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee (111 Cong.Rec. 5373 (1965)), testified:

> "The foreign aid program provides goods and [25] services to other countries which they cannot obtain through normal means - through their export earnings and through obtaining capital on commercial terms and by private investment. A successful aid program is one which enables the recipient country to strengthen its economy to the point where it can obtain goods and services it needs for steady expansion and growth by normal trade and normal capital movements - and without further need for aid grants and soft loans * * *. It is > plainly important to seek to carry out this important national program like any other, at minimum cost to the United States."

---

[9] Neither the tender nor award documents nor AID regulations make any distinction between the two forms of financing.

The commodity involved in these transactions was produced in the United States. It was loaded on ocean going vessels sailing from a United States port, with shipping documents naming the Korean Government as consumer and Korea as the destination. The risk of loss was not with the [26] supplier for title passed from the supplier to OSROK (or the designee of ICA) and the Korean Government was named as shipper and consignee in the f.o.b. vessel bills of lading. The sales in question are clearly "export trade" and exempt from the antitrust laws unless it is provided to the contrary in the Webb-Pomerene Act.

This brings us to plaintiff's second argument, which is that, although the transactions may be literally export trade, in the context and against the background of the Act, they are not or cannot be the export trade intended by the Act, and that an examination of the legislative history of the Act demonstrates that it was not Congressional intent to include this type of transaction within the statutory exemption, for the reason that it never contemplated this type of transaction where the United States Government was the financing party. The argument of the Government, attempting to divine a Congressional intent, continues that had Congress contemplated such foreign aid transactions would occur, it would not have exempted them.

In support of this ingenious argument, the Government puts emphasis upon the fact that Congress in the Act made it clear that the activities [27] exempted were not "to operate to the prejudice of the [*272] American public" or "punish the people of the United States" and that, if that should be the result of the activities, they would not be immune. The Government further argues that the defendants frustrated the AID "objective of lowest competitive market prices" because, in aggregating the manufacturing and selling resources of five very substantial size companies, whose competitors, in most of the larger procurements herein, could furnish only a limited portion of the requirements, defendants eliminated much of the competition which would otherwise have existed. Having thus frustrated the objectives of the foreign aid program, the Government reasons defendant cannot now claim the immunity of the provisions of the Webb-Pomerene Act simply because of the format of their Association.

It may be that competition within the United States was curtailed among those five, although it has been stipulated that all CPEA-AID financed sales were obtained as a result of competitive bidding and that CPEA has faced world-wide competition for all sales from eligible sources. The argument concludes that, since Congress could not have [28] intended to protect activities which injured the United States, the activities of the defendants are not protected and ergo come within the antitrust laws and are illegal under them.

Much as plaintiff strains at the meaning of the words "export trade", we are unable to find any ambiguity in them.

HN4[] "To export" had at the time the Act was enacted the same meaning that it now has - "to carry or send abroad, especially to foreign countries" There is nothing to indicate that the Congress did not intend them to have this meaning; the Act itself refers to export as "goods exported from the United States to any foreign nation. [10] On the face of the statute, the transactions were exempt from the antitrust laws.

---

[10] HN5[] The Act specifically defines what is excluded from the words "export trade" by stating that they shall not be deemed to include the production, manufacture or selling for consumption or resale "within the United States" which it defines as trade "among the several states".

The United States Department of Commerce gives the official definition of exports as "the physical movement of merchandise out of the United States customs to foreign countries without regard to the method of financing." Census Bureau, Monthly Report of U.S. Export Report F.T. 410.

In 1903, the Supreme Court defined HN6[] the word "export" as used in the Constitution and the laws of the United States to mean the "transportation [of goods] from this to a foreign country." Swan & Finch Co. v. United States, 190 U.S. 143, 146, 23 S. Ct. 702, 703, 47 L. Ed. 984.

HN7[]

[29] Judicial construction should be used not to create doubt, but only to resolve one. Where there is no doubt, there is nothing to construe (United States v. Rice, 327 U.S. 742, 753, 66 S. Ct. 835, 90 L. Ed. 982; Hamilton v. Rathbone, 175 U.S. 414, 20 S. Ct. 155, 44 L. Ed. 219). We should not under the guise of "construction" rewrite the statute; obviously, this is not a judicial function. (Palmer v. Commonwealth of Massachusetts, 308 U.S. 79, 83, 60 S. Ct. 34, 84 L. Ed. 93 (1939).)

The distinguishing feature, observes the Government, is that "In the context of the era and Congressional attitude, as reflected in the legislative history, 'export trade' has the common meaning of United States goods shipped to foreign nations and paid for by foreign buyers in a net transfer of wealth to this nation."

Accepting this definition, foreign aid financed trade is foreign trade, since there is a "net transfer of wealth to this nation", if not in dollars, certainly in its equivalence by the assurance of the economic and military stability of friendly nations. The return of wealth to this country may well be incalculable and far exceed measurement in dollar and cent standards.

But, in support [30] of its position that Congress never envisaged immunizing transactions of this sort when the United States was the one paying the fixed price, [*273] the Government points to the purpose of the Webb-Pomerene Act, which appears to have been to enable the domestic companies to compete with large foreign combines by permitting them to combine their capital and establish selling agencies to reduce their expenses of advertising and cultivating world trade as well as to affect the power of cartels. (H.R.Rep. #50, 65th Cong., 1st Sess. p. 2, 1917; 55th Cong.Rec. 3576 and 2785.)

Defendants say that it had another purpose - foreign aid, because at the time that Congress was making extremely large appropriations for foreign assistance and was authorizing the issuance of bonds to provide the funds for those appropriations under the form of "export credits" to be expended by the foreign countries for the purchase of American goods, there was no real prospect that these loans or credits would be repaid. Therefore, defendants urge that Congress did envisage the transactions in suit.

In further support of its argument, the Government contends that it is clear from the discussions leading [31] up to the exclusions contained in the Act that the reason Congress immunized these trade export associations was that Congress was not overly concerned with what price was being exacted of a foreign purchaser, because there the American public was not bearing the financial brunt.

Herein is the core of the Government's argument; we cannot say that it does not have appeal. It seems obviously unfair to the United States, which paid these defendants, to permit the defendants to charge an artificially set price and deprive the Government of price benefits which might come from competitive trade conditions within the United States.

It is plain from the remarks of the proponents of the Act made in Congress when the Act was being considered that they were concerned that no injury befall to the domestic purchaser from this Act.

The remarks of Senator Pomerene were, in part, that:

> "* * * although an association organized under the pending bill should enter into some agreement or perform some act in a foreign country which met the requirements of law there, if at the same time the effect of it were such as to materially interfere with the policy of the United States under its trust [32] laws, then it would be subject to the jurisdiction of the authorities of this country, including both the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Justice." (56 Cong.Rec. 170) Congressman Webb stated:
> "I would be willing that there should be a combination between anybody or anything for the purpose of capturing the trade of the world, if they do not punish the people of the United States in doing it." (55 Cong.Rec. 3580)

Another proponent of the bill said that its purpose was "to make that which is illegitimate relating to the people of the United States perfectly legitimate when relating to foreign peoples;" (55 Cong.Rec. 2788); and that it was not the duty of Congress to look after the interests of foreign nations.

The Report of the Senate Committee states:

> "But while the purpose of these associations is to improve and extend our foreign trade, their business ought to be so conducted as to harmonize with the requirements of our laws respecting domestic trade and without injuring any domestic competitor in the foreign trade or unduly thereby enhancing prices to domestic consumers." Sen.Rep.No.109, 65th Congr., 1st Sess. p. 2 (1917).

It was because Congress [33] was concerned that the Act be not used to the detriment of domestic trade that it limited immunity to an association, agreement or act which was not in restraint of trade within the United States and not in restraint of the export trade of any domestic competitor of such association or which artificially, or intentionally, enhanced or depressed prices of lessened competition or restrained trade within the United States, none of which is charged here.

[*274] The Government's final argument is that the defendants' activities burdened and frustrated the Foreign Aid Program because the burden of any price-fixing activities as to foreign aid procurements is borne directly by the American taxpayer, not by a foreign nation or consumer as in the ordinary export trade transaction. The added charge upon AID financed procurements, it urges, limited the attainment of the United States' foreign aid objectives.

It is undisputed, however, that officials of AID, OSROK and GSA were aware of CPEA's status as a "Webb" association; its membership was no secret to them; and they knew CPEA's material was being offered for sale in response to invitations to bid to supply phosphatic materials for [34] shipment directly to Korea. Defendants, along with other "Webb" associations, were encouraged by the Government agencies to participate in these programs. [11] It is true that this was an entirely business-motivated participation of the "Webb" associations but that is not to say that all these associations fixed prices and allocated territories for there is no evidence one way or the other. We assume, however, if several competitors do join in such an association, they do so for their mutual benefit.

Factually, it does [35] appear that the activities of CPEA were known for as required by the provisions of the Webb-Pomerene Act, a report of CPEA's formation was made to the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) on October 6, 1961; and copies of the corporate charter, bylaws and membership agreements were filed with that report. All amendments to the charter and the membership agreements were reported to the FTC. CPEA also filed with the FTC annual reports for the years 1961 through 1965 in accord with provisions of the Webb-Pomerene Act, and responded to FTC's requests for special reports of, among other things, annual sales volume. In 1964, CPEA submitted to the FTC, at the Commission's request, a report which separately stated the dollar volume of CPEA's 1961-1962 sales believed to have been subject to AID financing.

If these activities were found to have been harmful to the foreign aid program, AID was not without remedy or means to discourage and stop such activities. Regulation I provided that the price was not to exceed the market price prevailing in the United States, or a price to be determined if there was no available market, with the privilege on the part of AID to seek a refund of the entire amount [36] or of the excess charge and to cancel the transaction. These were terms to which the suppliers agreed. AID, however, has taken no action in this respect; perhaps, it is because it has found that the price, although artificially fixed, is not unreasonable.

All that we have before us is a claim of violation of antitrust laws.

We conclude that there is no violation of antitrust laws because the activities of defendants were immunized by the Webb-Pomerene Act. [12]

---

[11] Webb associations other than CPEA have sold and are selling under the AID program and have sold under foreign aid programs administered by ICA. In addition, under different statutory and regulatory requirements, the U.S. Government has furnished funds to finance export sales of agricultural products by Webb associations under the Public Law 480 program administered by the United States Department of Agriculture. Webb associations sold, too, under the Lend Lease program at least from 1941.

[12] Apparently the question of whether defendants who are selling in connection with foreign aid programs should enjoy such immunity is not novel. It appears that Congress has reviewed the Webb-Pomerene Act on a number of occasions over the years

Complaint is dismissed upon the merits and the Clerk of the Court is directed to enter judgment of dismissal in favor of the [37] defendants. So ordered.

End of Document

---

and, on such occasions, spokesmen for the Justice Department often have advocated its outright repeal. Congress, however, has thus far declined to either amend or repeal the statute.

Wash. v. Am. Pipe & Constr. Co.

United States District Court for the Western District of Washington, Southern Division; United States District Court for the Western District of Washington, Northern Division; United States District Court for the District of Oregon; United States District Court for the District of Hawaii; United States District Court for the Northern District of California; United States District Court for the Eastern District of California; United States District Court for the Central District of California; United States District Court for the Southern District of California

September 14, 1967

C.A. Nos. 3157, 6568, 65-266, and related pipe cases in the D. of Or. bearing C.A. No. 65-299, 65-301, 2360, 9160, 42929, and related pipe cases in the N.D. of Calif. bearing C.A. Nos. 42930-42933, 43403-43407, 43729, 43752-43754, 44930-44935, 44953, 44954, 44983-44985, 44989, 44990, 44994, and 45001, 64-832 and related pipe cases in the C.D. of Calif. bearing C.A. Nos. 64-833 - 64-836, 65-378, 65-911 - 65-915, 65-926, 65-935 - 65-950, 65-952, 65-1057, 65-1126, 66-557, 66-626 - 66-634, 66-640, 66-645 - 66-647, 66-649 - 66-653, 66-655 - 66-659, 66-800 and 66-801, 3396 and related pipe cases in the S.D. of Calif. bearing C.A. Nos. 3525-3528, 3531 and 3532

Reporter
274 F. Supp. 961 *; 1967 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11211 ; 1967 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,233

State of Washington et al. v. American Pipe & Construction Co. et al. Washington Public Power Supply System v. American Pipe & Construction Co. et al. State of Oregon et al. v. American Pipe & Construction Co. et al. State of Hawaii et al. v. American Pipe & Construction Co. et al. Sacramento Municipal Utility District v. Kaiser Steel Co. et al. East Bay Municipal District et al. v. Kaiser Steel Co. et al. United States et al. v. American Pipe & Construction Co. et al. City of San Diego et al. v. American Pipe & Construction Co. et al.

Core Terms

pipe, distributors, manufacturer, contractors, products, cause of action, defense motion, estimating, antitrust, wax

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Hearings > Oral Arguments

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Hearings > General Overview

HN1[] Private Actions, Standing

The antitrust laws provide that any person injured in his business or property, 15 U.S.C.S. § 15, may seek redress for an alleged antitrust violation. Within the limitation that the litigant must show he was proximately and not incidentally damaged, anyone who falls within that area of the economy which is endangered by a breakdown of competitive conditions may recover.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Inchoate Crimes > Conspiracy > Elements

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Inchoate Crimes > Conspiracy > General Overview

HN2[] Private Actions, Standing

One is not in the "target area" for purposes of a private antitrust action unless he was "aimed at" by the conspirators. But in using the words "aimed at," the Ninth Circuit did not mean to imply that it must have been a purpose of the conspirators to injure the particular individual claiming damages. Rather, a plaintiff must show that, whether or not then known to the conspirators, plaintiff's affected operation was actually in the area which it could reasonably be foreseen would be affected by the conspiracy.

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Appellate Jurisdiction > Certified Questions

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Appellate Jurisdiction > Interlocutory Orders

HN3[] Appellate Jurisdiction, Certified Questions

When a district judge, in making in a civil action an order not otherwise appealable under 28 U.S.C.S. § 1292 shall be of the opinion that such order involves a controlling question of law as to which there is substantial ground for difference of opinion and that an immediate appeal from the order may materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation, he shall so state in writing in an order certifying the question for interlocutory appeal pursuant to § 1292(b).

Judges: [1] Pence, Chief Judge.

Opinion by: PENCE

Opinion

[*962] Memorandum Decision on Defendant's Motion for Summary Judgment on Purchases Made Through an Intermediary

PENCE, Chief Judge:

Plaintiffs in the above-captioned actions are seeking recovery under the antitrust laws (Title 15 U.S.C. § 15) for injuries allegedly sustained as a result of price fixing by the manufacturers of concrete and steel conduit pipe. Defendant American Pipe & Construction Co. (American), contending "that plaintiffs have no standing to sue for damages allegedly resulting from sales of pipe to [*963] anyone other than themselves . . . who [may] in turn [have] sold to the plaintiffs projects which included that pipe," [1] moved for summary judgment pursuant to Rule 56, F.R. Civ. P., on all claims based on purchases in which plaintiffs and defendant were not in privity of contract. On September 7, 1967, after hearing, the court orally denied defendant's motion. This memorandum decision augments and sets forth in greater detail the basis for that ruling.

---

[1] Memorandum of Points and Authorities in Support of Motion of Defendant American Pipe and Construction Co. for Partial Summary Judgment Under Rule 56 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, page 1 (dated July 11, 1967).

[2] In implementing a project for the installation of pipe lines or other construction work that might include pipe, the normal procedure of the plaintiffs was to award a single contract for the project. Frequently plaintiffs had direct consultations with defendant concerning a particular project prior to awarding the contract. Mr. C. David Herlihy, defendant's Vice-President for Marketing, has described this process:

> "In most every instance that I can recall in my experience the agency for whom the pipeline was being designed, or the agency doing the design work, would call upon us for estimating prices. We might have furnished estimating, or we did furnish - I'll put that quite definitely - we did furnish estimating prices to projects which were in the feasibility stage of study, and then later on, preliminary design phases, and later, final design; and in many, many cases the estimating prices that we figured in response to their specific request for them, and in terms of the designs which they presented to us even in a preliminary way to evaluate, were worked out as carefully as any final prices that we would - any final estimate that we would make in terms of our own quotation." [3] [2]

General contractors in bidding for the right to perform a project, of course included a pipe quotation in the bid, and, if the successful bidder, independently purchased pipe and "resold" it to plaintiffs as part of the completed job. Generally the pipe used was specifically designed and manufactured by defendant for and to conform with plaintiffs' project specifications. Normally the contractors would but incorporate defendant's quotations in their bids, and purchase the pipe only when awarded a contract. Defendant was fully aware of and participated in this procedure.

As previously ruled at the oral hearing, defendant's motion for a summary judgment must fail. HN1[] The antitrust laws provide that "any person . . . injured in his business or property . . ." [3] may seek redress for the alleged antitrust violation. Within the limitation that the "litigant must of course show he was proximately and not incidentally damaged . [4] . .", [4] anyone who falls "within that area of the economy which is endangered by a breakdown of competitive conditions . . ." [5] may recover. In Karseal, supra n. 4, the plaintiff manufacturer of automobile polish asserted injury resulting from Richfield's practices which precluded independent service stations from handling Karseal's products. The Ninth Circuit denied Richfield's motion to dismiss even though plaintiff sold through distributors, and not directly to the gasoline stations which were allegedly forced to boycott Karseal's wax:

> "Primarily the operation and effect of the illegal practices was on the products (including Karseal's wax) which were competitive to the Richfield sponsored products. The impact was on the market. The gist of the [*964] violation was the prevention or impeding of the sale of these competitive products. Logically, and as found in the findings and conclusions of the trial judge in the Richfield case, the illegal acts were directed against the manufacturers and distributors of the competing products, including Karseal's wax. Such persons and such products were the 'target' of the illegal practices.
>
> " . . . Apparently, Richfield's [5] argument is in part, that the independent distributors of Karseal's Wax might have a cause of action, but that Karseal is once removed from the distributors and therefore may not sue. We need not pass on whether such distributors have a cause of action. But it would appear that both the manufacturer and the independent distributor have such a cause of action. . . . Classes or categories effected by a statute must rest on a realistic basis. To say to a manufacturer of wax that he may have the protection of the antitrust laws in private litigation if he hires salesmen for his product, and not have such protection if he decides to contract with a distributor, would appear to be an unequal application of the law and unjustified dictation as to how he operated his business." 221 F.2d 358 at 364-365.

---

[2] Deposition of C. David Herlihy at page 79 (dated December 6, 1966).

[3] Title 15 U.S.C. § 15.

[4] Karseal Corporation v. Richfield Oil Corporation, 221 F.2d 358, 365 (9 Cir. 1955).

[5] Conference of Studio Unions v. Loew's Inc., 193 F.2d 51, 55 (9 Cir. 1951), cert. denied 342 U.S. 919, 96 L. Ed. 687, 72 S. Ct. 367 (1952).

[6] In a more recent opinion the Ninth Circuit elaborated upon this "target" area concept, Twentieth Century Fox Film Corporation v. Goldwyn, 328 F.2d 190, 220 (9 Cir. 1964):

> "Discussing what it meant by 'target area,' this court, in Karseal, referred to it as a factor in determining whether there was proximate causation. At two places in that opinion, there is language indicating that HN2[] one was not in the 'target area' unless he was 'aimed at' by the conspirators.
>
> "But in using the words 'aimed at' this court did not mean to imply that it must have been a purpose of the conspirators to injure the particular individual claiming damages. Rather, it was intended to express the view that the plaintiff must show that, whether or not then known to the conspirators, plaintiff's affected operation was actually in the area which it could reasonably be foreseen would be affected by the conspiracy."

As heretofore indicated, it was standard procedure for defendant to consult with, and thereafter tailor its pipe to the specifications of, the ultimate purchaser, i.e., plaintiffs here. American knew the specific jobs for which contractors placed orders for pipe, and willingly participated [7] in the sales chain with knowledge that plaintiffs would eventually obtain title to and use that pipe. Plaintiffs here are clearly within the "area which it could reasonably be foreseen would be affected by the [defendant's alleged] conspiracy." They constitute "a recognizably small enough class to enforce the antitrust law", [6] and each is entitled to recover insofar as it can establish causation and injury.

Defendant American has referred the court to numerous cases which allegedly preclude recovery by these plaintiffs, [7] [9] and, relying thereon, contends [*965] that the alleged conspiracy spent itself on the contractors, so that any injury to the "end-users", i.e., plaintiffs here, is too inconsequential and remote to support a cause of action. Defendant asserts the law only takes the "first step" [8] in awarding damages, and that the first step here leads to and stops with the contractors. Not alone does this argument conflict with the language in [8] Karseal, supra, to the effect that both the manufacturer and independent distributor would fall within the area of the economy endangered by a breakdown of competitive conditions, but also, none of the cases relied on by American are factually analogous to the instant situation. There are, however, three reported opinions with a similar factual basis: Armco Steel Corp. v. State of North Dakota, (8 Cir. 1967); State of Missouri v. Stupp Bros. Bridge & Iron Co., 248 F. Supp. 169 (W.D. Mo. 1965); and State of Washington v. General Electric Co., 246 F. Supp. 960 (W.D. Wash. 1965). This court now does but apply Judge Boldt's decision in State of Washington where the product purchased through a contractor was electrical equipment:

> "[This] Court is unwilling to deny plaintiff its right to sue merely because it purchased the equipment through a third party rather than directly from the manufacturer." 246 F. Supp. at 962.

Defendant has also raised the specter of double liability if sued by the general contractors. [9] Defendant's argument does nothing more than present this court with a hypothetical question concerning the allocation of provable injury,

---

[6] Statement of counsel for American at oral hearing.

[7] E.g., Southern Pacific Co. v. Darnell-Taenzer Co., 245 U.S. 531, 62 L. Ed. 451, 38 S. Ct. 186 (1918); Commonwealth Edison Co. v. Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co., 315 F.2d 564 (7 Cir. 1963); Hanover Shoe, Inc. v. United Shoe Machinery Corp., 185 F. Supp. 826 (M.D. Pa. 1960) aff'd per curiam, 281 F.2d 481 (3 Cir. 1960), cert. denied 364 U.S. 901, 81 S. Ct. 234, 5 L. Ed. 2d 194 (1960); Commonwealth Edison Co. v. Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co., 335 F.2d 203 (7 Cir. 1964); Loeb v. Eastman Kodak Co., 183 Fed. 704 (3 Cir. 1910); Gerli v. Silk Association of America, 36 F.2d 959 (S.D.N.Y. 1929); Productive Inventions, Inc. v. Trico Products Corp., 224 F.2d 678 (2 Cir. 1955), cert. denied, 350 U.S. 936, 100 L. Ed. 818, 76 S. Ct. 301 (1956); Volasco Products Co. v. Lloyd A. Fry Roofing Co., 308 F.2d 383 (6 Cir. 1962), cert. denied, 372 U.S. 907, 9 L. Ed. 2d 717, 83 S. Ct. 721 (1963); Snow Crest Beverages, Inc. v. Recipe Foods, Inc., 147 F. Supp. 907 (D. Mass. 1956); United Copper Sec. Co. v. Amalgamated Copper Co., 232 Fed. 574 (2 Cir. 1916); Miley v. John Hancock Mut. Life Ins. Co., 148 F. Supp. 299 (D. Mass. 1957) aff'd per curiam, 242 F.2d 758 (1 Cir. 1957), cert. denied 355 U.S. 828, 78 S. Ct. 38, 2 L. Ed. 2d 41 (1957); Ames v. American Telephone & Telegraph Co., 166 Fed. 820 (D. Mass. 1909).

[8] Southern Pacific Co. v. Darnell-Taenzer Co., supra n. 7.

[9] Reply Brief of Defendant American Pipe & Construction Co. in Support of Its Motion for Partial Summary Judgment (Indirect Purchaser) at pp. 10-11 (dated August 11, 1967).

not with that of the standing necessary to maintain a cause of action. However, the question of the contractor's standing to sue is not presented here for decision, and this court does not reach that issue. [10]

Certification

At the conclusion of the court's oral ruling on September 7, 1967, American orally moved for an order certifying this question for interlocutory appeal pursuant to Title 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b). [10] [11]

The court denied defendant's motion, holding that under Karseal, Twentieth Century Fox Film Corp., and State of Washington v. General Electric, supra, the law on the subject is well settled in the Ninth Circuit [12] and this question therefore does not present substantial ground for difference of opinion.

Defendant's motions (1) for [11] summary judgment and (2) for certification are denied.

End of Document

[10] Cf., however, Karseal, supra.

[11] HN3[] "When a district judge, in making in a civil action an order not otherwise appealable under this section, shall be of the opinion that such order involves a controlling question of law as to which there is substantial ground for difference of opinion and that an immediate appeal from the order may materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation, he shall so state in writing in such order." etc.

[12] (as well as in the Eighth Circuit, viz.: Armco Steel Corp. v. North Dakota, supra).

Hensley Equip. Co. v. Esco Corp.

United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit

September 15, 1967

No. 23723

Reporter

383 F.2d 252 *; 1967 U.S. App. LEXIS 5107 ; 155 U.S.P.Q. (BNA) 183 ; 1967 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,209; 1967 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,210; 11 Fed. R. Serv. 2d (Callaghan) 137

HENSLEY EQUIPMENT COMPANY, Inc., Appellant, v. ESCO CORPORATION, Appellee

Core Terms

patent, wear, adapter, surfaces, manufactured, infringement, misuse, conical, license, royalties, products, district court, tooth, dealers, teeth, invention, patentee, socket, replacement, revolution, monopoly, expired, pin, licensees, marketed, plug, anti trust law, Sherman Act, termination, machine

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Patent Law > Jurisdiction & Review > Standards of Review > General Overview

Patent Law > Claims & Specifications > Invention Theory

HN1[] Jurisdiction & Review, Standards of Review

It is fundamental that patent claims are to be construed in the light of the specifications and both are to be read with a view to ascertaining an invention.

Patent Law > Nonobviousness > Evidence > Fact & Law Issues

Patent Law > Anticipation & Novelty > General Overview

Patent Law > ... > Claims > Claim Language > General Overview

Patent Law > ... > Specifications > Definiteness > General Overview

Patent Law > ... > Specifications > Enablement Requirement > General Overview

Patent Law > Nonobviousness > Elements & Tests > General Overview

Patent Law > Nonobviousness > Elements & Tests > Ordinary Skill Standard

Patent Law > Nonobviousness > Elements & Tests > Prior Art

HN2[] Evidence, Fact & Law Issues

It is desirable that district courts make specific findings on the following factual matters that the Supreme Court holds determines obviousness: the state of the prior art; the level of ordinary skill in the art; and the difference between the prior art and the claims of a patent at issue.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Infringement Actions > Infringing Acts > Indirect Infringement

Patent Law > Infringement Actions > Claim Interpretation > General Overview

Patent Law > Infringement Actions > Infringing Acts > General Overview Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Infringement Actions > Infringing Acts > Repair & Replacement

HN3[] Infringing Acts, Indirect Infringement

To supply patented parts of a patented combination without authority from a patentee to purchasers of a combination is a direct infringement of the claims of a patent on a part and a contributory infringement of the claims of a patent on a combination, assuming that the requirements of 35 U.S.C.S. § 271(c) are otherwise met.

Constitutional Law > Congressional Duties & Powers > Copyright & Patent Clause

Governments > Federal Government > US Congress

Patent Law > Infringement Actions > Exclusive Rights > General Overview

Constitutional Law > Congressional Duties & Powers > General Overview

Governments > Courts > Authority to Adjudicate

HN4[] Congressional Duties & Powers, Copyright & Patent Clause

The constitutional provision authorizing congressional grants of patents is both a grant of power and a limitation. Neither Congress nor courts may exercise or apply the patent authority in such manner as to give a patentee more than the rewards of his discovery.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Intellectual Property > Ownership & Transfer of Rights > Assignments

Patent Law > Infringement Actions > Exclusive Rights > Manufacture, Sale & Use

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > General Overview

Patent Law > Infringement Actions > Exclusive Rights > General Overview

HN5[] Ownership & Transfer of Rights, Assignments

Under the patent law, a patentee is given by statute a monopoly of making, using, and selling a patented article. Pursuant to this monopoly a patentee may exploit his exclusive rights as he sees fit, but should his exploitation exceed means normally and reasonably adapted to secure pecuniary reward for a patent monopoly, his actions become subject to the same restraints as are imposed upon those not protected by a patent's monopoly, such as the antitrust laws.

Constitutional Law > Congressional Duties & Powers > Copyright & Patent Clause

Patent Law > Infringement Actions > Exclusive Rights > General Overview

Constitutional Law > Congressional Duties & Powers > General Overview

HN6[ ] Congressional Duties & Powers, Copyright & Patent Clause

See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Intellectual Property > Misuse of Rights > Patent Misuse Defense

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Affirmative Defenses > Unclean Hands

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Defenses > Inequitable Conduct > Anticompetitive Conduct

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Intellectual Property > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Intellectual Property > Bad Faith, Fraud & Nonuse > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Intellectual Property > Misuse of Rights > General Overview

Patent Law > ... > Defenses > Inequitable Conduct > General Overview

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Infringement Actions > Defenses > Misuse

HN7[ ] Misuse of Rights, Patent Misuse Defense

One who attempts to exploit a patented invention beyond the scope of a patent monopoly may be the subject of a judicially imposed disability to enforce a patent. It is now familiar law that courts will not aid a patent owner who has misused his patents to recover any of their emoluments accruing during the period of misuse or thereafter until the effects of such misuse have been dissipated, or "purged." The rule is an extension of the equitable doctrine of "unclean hands" to the patent field.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Infringement Actions > Defenses > Misuse

Governments > Courts > Authority to Adjudicate

HN8[ ] Defenses, Misuse

It is a principle of general application that courts may appropriately withhold their aid where a plaintiff is using a right asserted contrary to the public interest. It is the adverse effect upon the public interest of a successful infringement suit in conjunction with a patentee's course of conduct that disqualifies him to maintain a suit, regardless of whether a particular defendant has suffered from misuse of a patent. A patentee, like other holders of an exclusive privilege granted in the furtherance of a public policy, may not claim protection of his grant by courts where it is being used to subvert that policy.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Infringement Actions > Defenses > Misuse

HN9[] Defenses, Misuse

Misuse of a patent in no way affects the validity of a patent itself, and once a patentee has "purged" himself, he may again enforce his patent by infringement suits.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Intellectual Property > Misuse of Rights > Patent Misuse Defense

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Defenses > Inequitable Conduct > Anticompetitive Conduct

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Intellectual Property > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Intellectual Property > Misuse of Rights > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Trade Practices & Unfair Competition > General Overview

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Infringement Actions > Defenses > Misuse

HN10[] Misuse of Rights, Patent Misuse Defense

Since the activities giving rise to patent misuse frequently have actual or anticipated adverse effects on competition, there is a close relationship between the patent misuse doctrine and antitrust law. So long as a patent owner is using his patent in violation of the antitrust laws, he cannot restrain infringement of it by others.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Intellectual Property > Ownership & Transfer of Rights > Licenses

Patent Law > Infringement Actions > Exclusive Rights > General Overview

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Ownership > Conveyances > Licenses

Patent Law > Ownership > Conveyances > General Overview

HN11[] Ownership & Transfer of Rights, Licenses

Patent monopoly is "exhausted" by the first authorized sale of a patented item, and patent law does not protect attempts by a patentee or his licensees to control use of a product after such sale.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Per Se Violations

HN12[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

It a per se violation of the Sherman Act for a manufacturer to restrict persons to whom an article may be traded after a manufacturer has parted with dominion over it.

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Declaratory Judgments > General Overview

Patent Law > Jurisdiction & Review > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Counterclaims > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Crossclaims > General Overview

HN13[] Judgments, Declaratory Judgments

The right of a party to seek a declaratory judgment is subject to the "same transaction or occurrence" requirement of Fed. R. Civ. P. 13(a) and the "same subject matter" test of Fed. R. Civ. P. 13(b), relating to counterclaims.

Judges: [1] Bell, Godbold and Dyer, Circuit Judges.

Opinion by: GODBOLD

Opinion

[*185] [*255] GODBOLD, Circuit Judge:

Hensley Equipment Company, Inc., appeals from an adverse decision in a patent infringement action brought by Esco Corporation, assignee of United States Patent No. 2,919,506 (the " '506 patent"). [1]

The suit concerns excavating teeth to be attached to the digging edge of power shovel buckets and similar excavating equipment. Because of the stress and abrasion to which such a digging edge is subject the teeth must be replaceable. For a number of years two-part teeth have been available, each consisting of an "adapter" affixed to the bucket or digging apparatus and a "wear point" which is the forward or "spike" portion of the tooth. A projection of the adapter fits into a socket in the rear of the wear point. The wear point is held on the [*256] adapter by a removable pin. While adapters periodically must be replaced, the wear points bear the brunt [2] of the abrasion and are replaced more frequently. [2]

Prior to the marketing of teeth produced under the '506 patent most two-piece excavating teeth had a wedge-shaped projection on the adapter with a correspondingly-shaped socket in the rear of the wear point. The horizontal surfaces of wedge-shaped adapter and point were the bearing surfaces at which the two parts came in contact. The bearing surfaces were flat. Under some operating conditions lateral pressure or thrust on the tooth caused sideways movement, producing a pivoting action between adapter and wear point, reducing the full (or substantial) contact or bearing between the [3] two parts, causing instead "point contact" concentrated in a small area of the two bearing surfaces. Under these conditions the teeth were subject to rapid distortion and wear and often broke under the concentrated pressure.

---

[1] 251 F. Supp. 631 (N.D.Texas, 1966).

[2] On some pieces of equipment, (drag lines used in strip mining coal) the bucket weighs 100 tons and moves 85 cubic yards of material at a bite, each tooth is 13 inches wide and weighs 425 pounds, and in use the teeth become so hot that they smoke and cannot be touched with the hand. Esco conical teeth vary from that size to as small as two inches wide, weighing three pounds.

Insofar as can be stated in non-technical terms, the invention which the '506 patent (described as "Excavating Tooth and Base Support Therefor") purports to embody is as follows. A conical bearing surface is employed on the adapter and on a correspondingly shaped socket in the wear point. Both the conical surface of the adapter and the conical surface of the wear point have, as a matter of geometry, a common vertical axis. Each conical surface comprises only a segment of a cone. See Figures 5 and 7 of drawings contained in the patent and made an appendix to this opinion showing a structure with a complete conical surface (labelled 40) and demonstrating how a segment thereof (labelled 43 in Figure 7) is used to form the bearing surface of the adapter. [3]

[4] Employing more technical language, the bearing surfaces of adapter and point are described in a number of claims as "surfaces of revolution" around a vertical axis. [4] The concept of use of a "surface of revolution," as opposed to surfaces which cannot be created by a single line rotated about a constant axis, is significant, and the creation of the two conical bearing surfaces of wear point and adapter around a common vertical axis likewise is significant.

[5] The invention contemplates that because of the design of the bearing surfaces lateral movement produces little [186] or no change in bearing contact between wear point and adapter. Irrespective of the relative positions of the two members [*257] their bearing surfaces remain in substantial contact, and no concentration of pressure develops at one or more points.

The conical tooth enjoyed significant commercial success, and in 1962 Esco received for it an award by a trade magazine, based on selection made by a panel of international mining and metallurgical experts, for "achievement in equipment development by aiding the technological advancement of the mining industry."

In 1965 Hensley began to sell wear points designed, intended, and advertised and held out to the public, as replacement points for Esco adapters. It did so after having supplied a steel company with models of Esco points and an Esco adapter and ordering the points be copied with certain modifications. Hensley publicly referred to its said wear points as "Esco-type points." The points will not fit adapters of any company other than Esco. Later Hensley began to market adapters for one of Esco's smaller conical [6] points. In its catalogs it describes these wear points and adapters as "conical." Since the beginning of this litigation Hensley has acquired a steel foundry and now manufactures as well as sells the products described above. [5] Hensley also markets parts corresponding to products manufactured by Esco but not under the patent at issue [6] and by other manufacturers.

Esco's complaint alleged that Hensley had infringed the '506 patent by making and selling tooth points. Hensley answered, denying the validity of the '506 patent and infringement and alleging that sale of wear points [7]

---

[3] Figure 6 demonstrates a nose and socket structure comprised of a conical surface on the adapter engaging a corresponding conical surface on the point (see 44, 47 and 48) but with a flat surface (45) of the adapter engaging the flat surface (46) of the upper socket wall of the point -- this is a "single cone" construction. Figure 4 shows a nose and socket structure with conical surfaces on upper and lower socket surfaces of the adapter and corresponding surfaces on the point -- this is "double cone" construction, and its advantage is that the point, when worn on one side, can be reversed on the adapter.

[4] Hensley's expert defined "surface of revolution" as follows:

> "A surface * * * is a two dimensional figure and * * * can be described by or * * * produced by a single dimensional figure or line. * * * We can take any line whatsoever and rotate it about a constant vertical axis and the figure which the line sweeps out is a surface of revolution. * * * [The shape of the surface] depends entirely on the shape of the line which generates it."

An umbrella demonstrates the concept more graphically. If the handle is considered the vertical axis and a single rib the rotating line, spinning the handle (thus rotating the line around the axis) causes the rib to define a surface of revolution in the shape of the cloth of the umbrella.

[5] Texas Steel Company, which manufactured the accused articles prior to Hensley's acquiring its own manufacturing facilities, was named as a defendant but was dismissed by stipulation.

[6] Recently the Ninth Circuit affirmed a judgment against Hensley for infringement of another Esco patent. Hensley Equipment Co. v. Esco Corp., 375 F.2d 432 (9th Cir., 1967), affirming 265 F. Supp. 863 (N.D.Cal., 1965).

constitutes legitimate repair. It also alleged that Esco was barred by misuse from enforcing the '506 patent. Several counterclaims were asserted, alleging in substance that Hensley manufactured and sold replacement wear points for those manufactured by Esco under United States Patents No. 3,026,947 and No. 3,079,710 as well as the '506 patent; that these patents were invalid; that Esco had violated the antitrust laws by bringing the present suit and by using the patents on products outside their scope. Hensley asked a declaratory judgment that all three patents are invalid, that Hensley was not infringing any of them, and that Hensley, its supplier and customers, could continue to manufacture, use, and sell the teeth and wear points without interference. Injunctive relief, and triple damages also were demanded.

The district court held that the '506 patent is valid; that Hensley has infringed it; that Esco has not misused the patent, and that Esco is entitled to damages. Hensley was enjoined from further infringement of the '506 patent. The counterclaims were dismissed with prejudice except as related to validity and infringement of the '947 and '710 patents.

I.

[8] Hensley challenges the position of the district court that the patent claims included a conical surface of revolution.

The claims, construed in the light of the specifications and drawings, [7] make clear to one familiar with the field involved that the surfaces of revolution -- the bearing surfaces -- are to be conical, or nearly so, and are not to be flat. We hold that the patent was properly considered as claiming conical surfaces of revolution.

II. Validity.

The district court did not err in finding against Hensley on its defenses of anticipation under 35 U.S.C.A. § 102 and [*258] obviousness within the meaning of 35 U.S.C.A. § 103.

[9] We need discuss at length only the closest prior art, the Hensley '601 wear point, marketed by Hensley since 1955 for use on its single-shank "rippers." [8] Testimony was produced that as rippers were used with tractors of higher power more breakage was experienced with the wear points, which had rectangular, or flat-surfaced, sockets to receive the wear collars. Therefore, Hensley began experimenting in 1951 or 1952 with a [187] socket containing curved top and bottom, and in 1954 began marketing a wear point with such a feature. Subsequently larger models differing somewhat in the contour of the socket were marketed by Hensley. The 601-H, the model introduced at trial and relied upon by Hensley, was marketed in 1955 or 1956. Conflicting evidence was produced of the nature of the contour of the socket of the 601-H, and the district court found as a fact that it did not constitute a conical surface of revolution. Hensley argues that this is clearly erroneous and that the 601-H tooth literally anticipated the '506 patent or made its subject matter obvious to one skilled in the art.

[10] It is clear that the 601-H point was an attempt to use a rounded socket connection between a wear point and its support to reduce breakage. But Esco's expert, Professor William Tiller of Stanford University's Department of Material Science, testified that the '506 conical point differed significantly in both theory and engineering design from the Hensley 601-H point. The socket shape of the 601-H point, he testified, was approximately an elliptical paraboloid. While it avoided some problems encountered with the rectangular socket models, rotational forces would cause the outer part of the 601-H to "ride up" over the inner part so as to cause "line contact", i.e., contact along a line of limited dimension as opposed to substantial surface-to-surface contact of bearing surfaces. This resulted in wearing of the adapter so as to distort its original shape. The '506 conical design possesses all the advantages of the 601-H shape plus the advantage of accommodating the rotational forces and movement; any wear, he testified, simply makes the cone fit better. He concluded there was little relationship between the '506 conical tooth and the Hensley 601-H. [9]

---

[7] HN1[] "It is fundamental that claims are to be construed in the light of the specifications and both are to be read with a view to ascertaining the invention." United States v. Adams, 383 U.S. 39, 49, 86 S. Ct. 708, 713, 15 L. Ed. 2d 572, 579 (1966).

[8] A "ripper" is a device installed on the front or rear of a bulldozer or on the sides of a tractor. It consists of a shank extending beneath the surface of the ground which, when pulled or pushed through the ground, "rips" it up. Hensley's rippers had replaceable wear points attached to "wear collars," corresponding in function to adapters.

[11] The district court did not err in finding that the 601-H tooth (and other prior patents) did not anticipate the '506 patent insofar as that patent claimed a conical surface of revolution about a vertical axis. Nor does the evidence establish that the conical design would have been obvious to one skilled in the art at the time of the invention. [10] In this connection the district court gave appropriate recognition to the secondary indicia of commercial success and industry recognition of satisfaction of unsolved needs, referred to in John Deere. 383 U.S. at 17-18, 86 S. Ct. at 693-694.

[12] Hensley contends that prior patents disclosing flat bearing surfaces (especially [*259] Baer, No. 2,483,032) anticipated. But the testimony was in conflict whether a flat surface correctly can be described as a "surface of revolution." Also we have held that the '506 claims, read in light of the specifications, disclose that the invention included nose and socket contours either conical or similar or equivalent thereto. Nor does the fact that the Hensley 601-H device, and prior patents (especially Morrison, No. 2,050,014), employed the concept of concave-convex bearing surfaces for wear point and adapter necessarily make obvious the particular type of surfaces embraced by the '506 patent, though they are within the generic term "concave-convex." Much more is embraced in the '506 than concavity and convexity.

Downie, No. 1,399,337, had a flat surface plus some tin inserts which from use conceivably might be worn or extruded so as to create arched or curved surfaces. [11]

[13] The appellant contends the trial court erred in stating the presumption of validity prescribed by 35 U.S.C.A. § 282 must be overcome by clear and convincing evidence, arguing that the Patent Office failed to consider pertinent prior art and thereby removed or weakened the presumption. See Zero Mfg. Co. v. Mississippi Milk Producers Ass'n, 358 F.2d 853 (5th Cir., 1966); Up-Right, Inc. v. Safway Prods., Inc., 364 F.2d 580 (5th Cir., 1966). But we have no hesitancy in holding that the patent in issue meets standards of validity without the necessity of resting it upon any presumption. [188]

The findings and conclusions of the district court on the issue of validity are affirmed.

III. Infringement

The evidence was in conflict whether the configuration of the Hensley point was such that it embraced surfaces of revolution. Likewise there was evidence both ways on whether the Hensley point, when placed on an Esco adapter, sufficiently meets and remains in contact with it that it is within the requirement of the claims that bearing surfaces of wear point and adapter "remain in fitting contact" during movement of the wear point. [12] We [14] are not able to say the district court was plainly erroneous on these factual questions.

---

[9] Another witness, Grove, described the inside surface of the 601-H point, viewed as though cut through in vertical sections, to be a series of ellipses, starting from an ellipse at the front end, to an ellipse at the rear end, and midway approximately a circle.

[10] HN2[] It is desirable that the district courts make specific findings on the factual matters which the Supreme Court, in Graham v. John Deere Co., 383 U.S. 1, 86 S. Ct. 684, 15 L. Ed. 2d 545 (1966), held determined obviousness: the state of the prior art, the level of ordinary skill in the art, and the difference between the prior art and the claims of the patent at issue. 383 U.S. at 17, 86 S. Ct. 684. That case was decided after the trial and decision in the present case, so it is understandable that the findings of the district court are not as explicit as they might be; however, we see no necessity of remanding for more explicit findings.

[11] While we specifically discuss Baer, Morrison and Downie we note that Hensley's expert testified none of them were as close to the patent in suit as the Hensley 601-H, which he considered the closest prior art.

[12] For example, there was evidence that the lesser surface contact of the Hensley point is caused by inevitable variations in mass production; that the relevant contact is that encountered under the severe pressures of actual operation, and that

Hensley also contends that sale of wear points alone cannot be infringement because, insofar as the '506 patent attempts to claim the wear point alone as an invention, it lacks the statutory requirement of utility. 35 U.S.C.A. § 101. Hensley reasons that the wear point alone serves no useful function unless combined with the adapter. It is urged that we treat the situation as one of replacement of an unpatented part of a patented machine in the exercise of the right of legitimate repair. [13]

[15] But the invention of the '506 patent is not simply a combination of elements, all previously known, into a purportedly new machine. It is a machine composed of two basic parts, a wear point and an adapter, each of which contains an integral portion of the novel factor, a bearing surface made in the form of a conical surface of revolution. The claims embrace the complete machine, i.e., the excavating tooth, and also the two basic parts, wear point and adapter. Utility of the wear point is not lost because it [*260] must be used with something else to produce an advantageous result.

Since in manufacturing and selling patented wear points Hensley infringed specific claims of the patent, it cannot be protected by the doctrine of legitimate repair. Walker, Patents §§ 379, 509 (1937 Ed.). HN3[] "To supply patented parts of a patented combination without authority from the patentee to purchasers of the combination is a direct infringement of the claims of the patent on the part and a contributory infringement of the claims of the patent on the combination, assuming that the requirements of [16] 35 U.S.C. § 271(c) are otherwise met. (citing cases)." Warner & Swasey Co. v. Held, 256 F. Supp. 303, 311 (E.D.Wis., 1966).

IV. Misuse

Assuming validity and infringement of the '506 patent, is Esco barred from enforcing its rights because it has misused the patent?

HN4[] The constitutional provision authorizing congressional grants of patents [14] is "both a grant of power and a limitation," Graham v. John Deere Co., supra. Neither Congress nor the courts may exercise or apply the patent authority in such manner as to give a patentee more than the rewards of his discovery. HN5[] "Under the patent law the patentee is given by statute a monopoly of making, using and selling the patented article." United States v. General Electric Co., 272 U.S. 476, 485, 47 S. Ct. 192, 195, 71 L. Ed. 362, 363 (1926). Pursuant to this monopoly the patentee may exploit his exclusive rights as he sees fit, but should his exploitation exceed means "normally and [17] reasonably adapted to secure pecuniary reward for the [patent] monopoly," his actions become subject to the same restraints as are imposed upon those not protected by a patent's monopoly, such as the antitrust laws. United States v. General Electric, supra.

HN7[] One who attempts to exploit a patented invention beyond the scope of the patent monopoly may be the subject of a judicially-imposed disability to enforce the patent. "It is now * * * familiar law that the courts will not aid a patent owner who has misused his patents to recover any of their emoluments accruing during the period of misuse or thereafter until [18] the effects of such misuse have been dissipated, or 'purged' as the conventional saying goes. The rule is an extension of the equitable doctrine of 'unclean hands' to the patent field." United States Gypsum Co. v. National Gypsum Co., 352 U.S. 457, 465, 77 S. Ct. 490, [189] 494, 1 L. Ed. 2d 465, 471 (1957). But the simplicity with which the rule may be stated is misleading. In 1955 the Attorney General's National Committee to Study the Antitrust Laws commented that "the outer reach of the misuse doctrine has not yet been fully defined." [15] Eleven years later in 1966 the President's Commission on the Patent System reported that

---

Hensley's points functioned adequately on Esco's adapters; that Hensley checks all its conical points for fit against an Esco adapter before shipping them.

[13] See Wilbur-Ellis Co. v. Kuther, 377 U.S. 422, 84 S. Ct. 1561, 12 L. Ed. 2d 419 (1964); Aro Mfg. Co. v. Convertible Top Replacement Co., 365 U.S. 336, 81 S. Ct. 599, 5 L. Ed. 2d 592 (1961); Fromberg, Inc. v. Thornhill, 315 F.2d 407 (5th Cir., 1963).

[14] Art. I, § 8 of the Constitution authorizes Congress HN6[] "to promote the Progress of * * * useful Arts, by securing for limited Times to * * * Inventors the exclusive Right to their * * * Discoveries."

uncertainty as to the precise nature of the patent right coupled with lack of doctrinal clarity in the misuse rule has "produced confusion in the public mind and a reluctance by patent owners and others to enter into contracts and other arrangements pertaining to patents or related licenses." [16]

[19] The doctrine of misuse was developed by the Supreme Court in a series of early cases as a defense against contributory infringement. [17] In 1942 the [*261] Court applied it in a case of direct infringement. Morton Salt Co. v. G. S. Suppiger Co., 314 U.S. 488, 62 S. Ct. 402, 86 L. Ed. 363 (1942). See also B. B. Chemical Co. v. Ellis, 314 U.S. 495, 62 S. Ct. 406, 86 L. Ed. 367 (1942). The rationale of the doctrine is a rejection of the concept of the patent as an absolute property right in favor of its definition as a right which must not be exercised in a manner not consistent with the constitutionally-defined purpose for which it was conferred, i.e., to "promote the Progress of * * * useful Arts." In Mercoid Corp. v. Mid-Continent Invest. Co., 320 U.S. 661, 665, 64 S. Ct. 268, 271, 88 L. Ed. 376, 380 (1944) Mr. Justice Douglas emphasized that to allow an infringement suit by a patentee who has misused his patent "would be to extend the aid of a court of equity in expanding the patent beyond the legitimate scope of its monopoly." It is not necessary that the defendant asserting the misuse defense has been -- or would be -- injured by the [20] misuse. In Morton Salt Co. v. G. S. Suppiger, supra, Mr. Justice Stone wrote:

> HN8[] "It is a principle of general application that courts * * * may appropriately withhold their aid where the plaintiff is using the right asserted contrary to the public interest.
> * * *
>
> "It is the adverse effect upon the public interest of a successful infringement suit in conjunction with the patentee's course of conduct which disqualifies him to maintain the suit, regardless of whether the particular defendant has suffered from the misuse of the patent. * * * The patentee, like those other holders of an exclusive privilege granted in the furtherance of a public policy, may not claim protection of his grant by the courts where it is being used to subvert that policy." 314 U.S. at 492-495, 62 S. Ct. at 405-406.

[21] HN9[] Misuse of a patent in no way affects the validity of the patent itself, and once the patentee had "purged himself" he may again enforce his patent by infringement suits. E.g., United States Gypsum Co. v. National Gypsum Co., supra. [18]

Where a contract clause forms the basis for a misuse defense a mere showing that the clause is not enforced has been held insufficient to dissipate the misuse or to prevent a successful assertion of the defense. Berlenbach v. Anderson & Thompson Ski Co., 329 F.2d 782 (9th Cir.,), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 830, 85 S. Ct. 60, 13 L. Ed. 2d 39 (1964). [22]

HN10[] Since the activities giving rise to patent misuse frequently have actual or anticipated adverse effects on competition, there is a close relationship between the patent misuse doctrine and antitrust law. "So long as the

---

[15] Report of the Attorney General's National Committee to Study the Antitrust Laws 251 (U.S. Government Printing Office, 1955).

[16] To Promote the Progress of * * * Useful Arts 37 (U.S. Government Printing Office 1966).

[17] E.g., Motion Picture Patents Co. v. Universal Film Mfg. Co., 243 U.S. 502 37 S. Ct. 416, 61 L. Ed. 871 (1917); Carbice Corp. of America v. American Patents Development Corp., 283 U.S. 27, 51 S. Ct. 334, 75 L. Ed. 819 (1931); Leitch Mfg. Co. v. Barber Co., 302 U.S. 458, 58 S. Ct. 288, 82 L. Ed. 371 (1938).

[18] See McCullough Tool Co. v. Well Surveys, Inc., 343 F.2d 381, 407-408 (10th Cir., 1965), cert. denied, 383 U.S. 933, 86 S. Ct. 1061, 15 L. Ed. 2d 851 (1966); Turbo Machine Co. v. Proctor & Schwartz, Inc., 241 F. Supp. 723, 729 (E.D.Pa., 1965), aff'd, 362 F.2d 5 (3rd Cir., 1966).

patent owner is using his patent in violation of the antitrust laws, he cannot restrain infringement of it by others." Hartford-Empire Co. v. United States, 323 U.S. 386, 415, 65 S. Ct. 373, 388, 89 L. Ed. 322, 362 (1945). [19]

[*190] [23] [*262] With these preliminary observations, we return to the case before us.

A. Exclusive dealerships

Esco products, including teeth manufactured under the '506 patent, are sold through a network of independent dealers. A policy statement distributed by Esco to its dealers contains, among other clauses, the following:

"Dealers will not stock or sell competitive products unless prior arrangements have been made with ESCO."

Appellant urges that Esco, by requiring its dealers to sell only Esco products, is misusing the patents under which these products are manufactured.

There is no proof in this case of an absolute contractual duty that Esco dealers not handle competing products. [20] There was evidence that because of the limited market for points and adapters it is neither practical nor economical for a dealer to carry more than one manufacturer's line of products. There was testimony that some Esco dealers did carry teeth made by other manufacturers (though Esco did characterize these as very minor situations which it has "chosen to overlook"). There was no evidence that Esco has refused to make "prior arrangements" with any dealer indicating a [24] desire to stock or sell competitive products, and the district court found that Esco has not terminated any dealership for failure to comply with the policy statement.

Because no contractual condition was proved to exist there was no proof of misuse in the form of exclusive dealerships. [21]

---

[19] Because of the decision we reach we need not decide between conflicting views of whether it is necessary to a successful assertion of the defense of misuse that all elements of civil or criminal liability under the antitrust laws be shown. The cases indicate no such standard of proof is required. Morton Salt Co. v. G. S. Suppiger Co., supra, 314 U.S. at 490, 62 S. Ct. 402; Berlenbach v. Anderson & Thompson Ski Co., supra, Laitram Corp. v. King Crab, Inc., 245 F. Supp. 1019 (D.Alaska, 1965). Note the conclusion of the Attorney General's Committee that "from some abuses of patent policy [sufficient to justify non-enforcement of the patent] may flow consequences not drastic enough to meet antitrust prerequisites of effect on competition. In addition, many patent abuses are more effectively curbed by simply denying relief as a matter of patent policy," (Report, at 254.)

But compare the view of Kennedy, Patent and Antitrust Policy; the Search for a Unitary Theory, 35 Geo.Wash.L.Rev. 512 (1966), at 560: "Faulty reasoning * * * underlies the widely held view that extra patent restraints of no competitive significance justify the denial of injunctive relief. * * * Attempts at metaphysical distinctions between patent policy and antitrust policy violations serve no constructive purpose * * * [Defendants asserting misuse] defenses should be held to substantive standards of violation evolved under the Sherman, Clayton or Federal Trade Commission Acts."

Certainly a case of misuse not sufficient to constitute a violation of the antitrust laws requires careful synthesis of the policies represented by the patent and the antitrust laws. Kennedy, supra. Baxter, Legal Restrictions in Exploitation of the Patent Monopoly: An Economic Analysis, 76 Yale L.J. 267 (1966).

[20] A contractual duty (even if not enforced) may be sufficient to constitute misuse. See Berlenbach v. Anderson & Thompson Ski Co., supra. A specific agreement not to handle competitive products without prior written approval may be enough. F. C. Russell Co. v. Consumers Insulation Co., 226 F.2d 373 (3rd Cir., 1955).

[21] In addition, the trial court found that the existence of the company policy had not substantially lessened competition or created a monopoly in any line of commerce. As to whether, in a case where a contractual condition does exist, misuse is established merely by proof of the condition, or there must be proof of effect on the relevant market, see McCullough v. Kammerer Corp., 166 F.2d 759 (9th Cir., 1948); National Lockwasher Co. v. George K. Garrett Co., Inc., 137 F.2d 255 (3rd Cir., 1943); Waco-Porter Corp. v. Tubular Structures Corp., 220 F. Supp. 724, as modified by 222 F. Supp. 332 (S.D.Cal., 1963) [in the second opinion, the district court expressly adopted the view, rejected in the first opinion, that it was not necessary to show lessened competition to establish misuse]; Steffen v. W. J. Schoenberger Co., 90 F. Supp. 710 (N.D.Ohio, 1950); Park-In Theatres Inc. v. Paramount-Richards Theatres, Inc., 81 F. Supp. 466 (D.Del., 1948). Compare Preformed Line Products Co. v. Fanner Manufacturing Co., 225 F. Supp. 762 (N.D.Ohio, 1962), aff'd, 328 F.2d 265 (6th Cir., 1964).

[25] B. The Esco-Caterpillar License

The Esco-Caterpillar agreement, insofar as pertinent to our purposes, may be summarized as follows: Caterpillar is granted a license "to manufacture, to have manufactured, to use and to sell" articles embodying the inventions covered by all patents contained in an incorporated schedule; this includes, in addition to the '506 patent, two other United States [*263] patents and the foreign equivalents to these. The license extends only to tooth points, adapters, pins and plugs of dimensions and designs corresponding to incorporated exhibits. The items involved are parts for Caterpillar equipment. The license is stated to be "exclusive," but Esco, and others it may choose to license, are not excluded from manufacturing the parts and selling them to Caterpillar, if [191] Caterpillar wishes to buy them. Royalties are fixed by a formula (discussed below), but no royalties are payable on items manufactured by Esco or its subsidiaries, successors, assignees or licensees and purchased by Caterpillar.

The "exclusive" nature of the agreement may be terminated by Esco if Caterpillar's use of the patents falls below a prescribed level (see discussion below).

[26] Provision is made for Caterpillar to extend its license to subsidiaries and licensees if Caterpillar agrees to assume liability and responsibility to Esco for the acts and omission of the extendees pertaining to the agreement.

Under the agreement Caterpillar may manufacture the parts, or have them manufactured for it by one other than an Esco licensee or subsidiary. If it does so it pays royalties on parts so made. In practice it has not exercised this right, although it has investigated the feasibility of doing so in several instances, particularly in foreign countries. In practice Caterpillar has continued to purchase all the parts from Esco and its subsidiaries and licensees. (Esco is bound to use its best efforts to have any licensee who may obtain from it a license agreement covering its tooth points and adapters enter into an agreement to manufacture and sell to Caterpillar the items involved. In practice Esco has sought such agreement with at least some of its licensees.) Parts thus made for Caterpillar have the Caterpillar name thereon.

The agreement contains a specific condition which we set out in the margin. [22] The agreement does not restrict the condition to [27] items manufactured by Caterpillar. HN11[] Patent monopoly is "exhausted" by the first authorized sale of the patented item, and the patent law does not protect attempts by the patentee or his licensees to control use of the product after such sale. United States v. Univis Lens Co., 316 U.S. 241, 62 S. Ct. 1088, 86 L. Ed. 1408 (1942). See also Motion Picture Patents Co. v. Universal Film Mfg. Co., 243 U.S. 502, 37 S. Ct. 416, 61 L. Ed. 871 (1917), overruling Henry v. A. B. Dick Co., 224 U.S. 1, 32 S. Ct. 364, 56 L. Ed. 645 (1912). United States v. Arnold, Schwinn & Co., 388 U.S. 365, 87 S. Ct. 1856, 18 L. Ed. 2d 1249 (June 12, 1967) holds HN12[] it a per se violation of the Sherman Act for a manufacturer to restrict persons to whom an article may be traded after the manufacturer has parted with dominion over it.

> "Under the Sherman Act, it is unreasonable without more for a manufacturer to seek to restrict and confine areas or persons with which an [28] article may be traded after the manufacturer has parted with dominion over it. White Motor, supra [White Motor Co. v. United States, 372 U.S. 253, 83 S. Ct. 696, 9 L. Ed. 2d 738]; Dr. Miles, supra [Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co., 220 U.S. 373, 31 S. Ct. 376, 55 L. Ed. 502]. Such restraints are so obviously destructive of competition that their mere existence is enough. If the manufacturer parts with dominion over his product or transfers risk of loss to another, he may not reserve control over its destiny or the conditions of its resale. To permit [*264] this would sanction franchising and confinement of distribution as the ordinary instead of the unusual method which may be permissible in an appropriate and impelling competitive setting, since most merchandise is distributed by means of purchase and sale. (388 U.S. 365, 87 S. Ct. 1865, 18 L. Ed. 2d 1249)

---

[22] "Provided, however, that such license is further restricted to the use of licensed products and/or sale of licensed products for original installation on products or equipment manufactured by or for CATERPILLAR and sold by CATERPILLAR and by CATERPILLAR dealers throughout the world and to use as replacement parts sold by CATERPILLAR and by CATERPILLAR dealers throughout the world for such products and equipment."

> * * *
>
> "Once the manufacturer has parted with title and risk, he has parted with dominion over the product, and his effort thereafter to restrict territory or persons to whom the product may be transferred -- whether by explicit [29] agreement or by silent combination or understanding with his vendee -- is a per se violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act." (388 U.S. at 382, 87 S. Ct. 1867, 18 L. Ed. 2d at 1262)

Under Hartford-Empire, supra, this per se violation of the antitrust laws bars Esco from enforcing its patent in this case.

There are equitable considerations present running both ways. It is not clear that the restriction limiting resale of parts to Caterpillar dealers was required by Esco for its purposes or even desired by it. Schwinn was pursuing its own interests. There [30] was some evidence that Esco actually does not know, though it assumes it, whether Caterpillar is making resales to its dealers only, and there is no evidence of Esco taking any action to enforce the condition or even caring whether it is enforced. The Supreme Court found Schwinn "firm and resolute" in insisting upon observance of customer (and territorial) restrictions. Schwinn combined customer restrictions with territorial restrictions; there are no territorial restrictions [192] in the case before us. Schwinn confined access to its product to dealers it selected; the agreement here confines access to dealers Caterpillar selects. Only a small fraction of Schwinn's sales were involved, while Caterpillar is the giant of the equipment industry and is Esco's best customer. As we understand the interplay of Schwinn and Hartford-Empire, and the underlying patent policy, there is no inquiry into purity of heart vs. bad motive, or market impact, or matters of what may seem to be essential fairness -- a per se violation of the Sherman Act is deemed such a monopolistic action that the patentee is barred from enforcing the limited and special monopoly given him by the patent laws.

[31] C. Attempt to extend royalty payments beyond life of patent

The agreement with Caterpillar does not attempt to extend royalty payments on the '506 and other patents beyond the life of those patents.

In Brulotte v. Thys Co., 379 U.S. 29, 85 S. Ct. 176, 13 L. Ed. 2d 99 (1964), the Supreme Court considered a suit for royalties on a use license covering twelve patents, all but one of which expired before the expiration of the agreement (17 years after the sale). Only seven were incorporated in the purchased article (a portable hop picking machine) which the license permitted the purchaser to use; all of these expired before the termination of the agreement. The royalty payable under the agreement was a $500 minimum per season or $3.33 1/3 per 200 pounds of hops harvested, whichever was greater. The Court held that no royalties could be collected which accrued after expiration of the last patent incorporated into the machine, as "a projection of the patent monopoly after the patent expires is not enforceable." Significantly, the Court voiced no objection to the fact that the royalty rate did not vary when some, but less than all, of the patents incorporated into [32] the device expired. American Securit Co. v. Shatterproof Glass Corp., 268 F.2d 769 (3rd Cir.), cert. denied, 361 U.S. 902, 80 S. Ct. 210, 4 L. Ed. 2d 157 (1959); Ar-Tik Systems Inc. v. Dairy Queen, Inc., 302 F.2d 496 (3rd Cir., 1962), and Rocform Corp. v. Acitelli-Standard Concrete Wall, Inc., 367 F.2d 678 (6th Cir., 1966); *Technograph Printed Circuits, Ltd. v. Bendix [265] Aviation Corp., 218 F. Supp. 1, 48-49 (D. Md., 1963), aff'd, 327 F.2d 497 (4th Cir., 1964). [23]

We need not further discuss the case law because Hensley's contention is based on a misconstruction of the agreement. In addition to the '506 patent the agreement covers two other United States Letter Patents and the foreign equivalents of all three. Patent No. 3,126,654 covers [33] the pin and plug used in connection with the wear point and adapter ordered by the '506 patent. The agreement, as related to Patent No. 3,079,710, also covers wear points for use on "rippers", devices used on Caterpillar's front end loaders when the loading apparatus has been removed. The royalty provisions provide for royalties "for each tooth point, adapter, pin or plug manufactured by or for and sold by Caterpillar during the life of this Agreement and embodying an invention disclosed and claimed in a Licensed Patent." For each tooth point, pin or plug, the royalty is set at five per cent of the net price of the item; for each adapter, the royalty is seven and one-half per cent of the aggregate net prices for the tooth point, pin and plug used on the adapter. The agreement specifically provides that "no royalties shall be * * * paid by Caterpillar on points, adapter, pins or plugs manufactured and sold in any country or countries in which ESCO has neither an unexpired patent nor a pending application for a patent disclosing and claiming an invention incorporated in the point, adapter, pin or plug."

---

[23] See generally, Comment, Post Expiration Royalty Payments and Mandatory Package Licensing as Patent Misuses, 11 Vill, L.Rev. 382 (1966). Note, 1965 Duke L.J. 836.

No single item which Caterpillar is licensed to manufacture will embody more [34] than one of the United States Patents covered by the agreement. The district court made a specific finding that the agreement imposed no liability on Caterpillar to pay royalties on articles covered under an expired Esco patent. This agreement is one step further from illegal extension of royalty payments than the situation in Brulotte v. Thys Co., supra, where the court refused to disapprove a requirement that royalties on an item embodying the inventions of more than one patent be maintained when some but less than all the patents had expired. [24]

[*193] [35] D. Termination of exclusivity

Hensley theorizes that par. 11 of the agreement, [25] dealing with termination [*266] of the so-called "exclusivity" feature of the license, violates Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act as a contract in restraint of trade and an attempt by Esco to monopolize commerce in the replacement market for wear points and adapters for the types of Caterpillar-made equipment on which they are usable. Its argument runs as follows. Caterpillar must continue purchasing or using the license products exclusively or face competition from the Esco dealers in the replacement market for wear points and adapters for Caterpillar equipment. Caterpillar is deterred from changing to non-patented products or products outside the license agreement, and Esco is insured against competition from such products being used in lieu of the Esco conical teeth. The agreement is, in effect, one between two manufacturers not to compete with each other.

[36] The agreement does not require as a consideration for securing the "exclusive" license that Caterpillar use the licensed products to the exclusion of all others. At all times Caterpillar may offer competing products as replacement parts even to the total exclusion of the licensed products, so long as there has been no previous

---

[24] Cf. Automatic Radio Mfg. Co. v. Hazeltine Research, Inc., 339 U.S. 827, 70 S. Ct. 894, 94 L. Ed. 1312 (1950). Nor can there be any question of coercive package licensing. See United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., 334 U.S. 131, 156-159, 68 S. Ct. 915, 92 L. Ed. 1260, 1292 (1948); American Securit Co. v. Shatterproof Glass Corp., 268 F.2d 769 (3rd Cir.), cert. denied, 361 U.S. 902, 80 S. Ct. 210, 4 L. Ed. 2d 157 (1959); Note, 73 Harv.L.Rev. 1628 (1960). There is no indication here that Caterpillar was in any way coerced into unwillingly accepting any of the patents as a condition of being licensed to practice the others; in fact, the evidence suggests inclusion of all was necessary for the accomplishment of Caterpillar's objectives. See McCullough Tool Co. v. Well Surveys, Inc., supra.

[25] "The exclusive license herein granted shall cease to be exclusive and shall become nonexclusive as to a tooth point, adapter, pin and plug of the design and dimensions illustrated in any of Exhibits A, B, C, D, E and F and any Exhibits added hereto by amendment, if CATERPILLAR shall totally discontinue both the use and sale of such tooth point, adapter, pin and plug and if following such discontinuance ESCO shall give CATERPILLAR ninety (90) days' prior written notice of its election to make the license herein granted a nonexclusive one for such tooth point, adapter, pin and plug. In addition, the exclusive license herein granted shall cease to be exclusive and shall become nonexclusive as to a tooth point, adapter, pin and plug of the design and dimensions illustrated in any of Exhibits A, B, C, D, E and F and any Exhibits added hereto by amendment, if at any time after December 31, 1966, CATERPILLAR (including its extendees who for this purpose shall be considered in the aggregate with CATERPILLAR) shall substantially discontinue the use of such tooth point, adapter, pin and plug on original equipment manufactured by or for CATERPILLAR, and if in any calendar year after such discontinuance the aggregate sales (based on net price as defined in paragraph 3 hereof) of such tooth point, adapter, pin and plug amounts to less than forty per cent (40%) of one third of the aggregate sales (based on net price as defined in paragraph 3 hereof) of such tooth point, adapter, pin and plug in the three (3) calendar years immediately preceding such discontinuance and ESCO subsequently gives CATERPILLAR written notice of its election to make the license herein granted a nonexclusive one for such tooth point, adapter, pin and plug."

"substantial discontinuance" of use on new equipment. There are no agreements not to use the products of competitors of Esco. Caterpillar has the full right to have the items manufactured for it by others, who are or would be Esco's manufacturing competitors. It was shown that Caterpillar is a giant of the industry that manufactures equipment employing the conical teeth, but its status as a manufacturer of teeth (and other parts) -- new or replacement -- is another matter. Also the agreement insures that Caterpillar may not, through non-use, deprive the patentee and the public of benefits of the patent as applied to Caterpillar parts. If Caterpillar limits the practice of the invention as to Caterpillar parts to below the limits prescribed then Esco is free to practice it. There are no price fixing agreements, no division of geographical markets, no [37] effort to extend the grant of the patent to unpatented devices.

Hensley does not suggest that the termination of exclusivity clause is within the narrow range of monopolistic practices denoted as per se violations of the Sherman Act.

Insofar as par. 11 is concerned the district court was not plainly erroneous in finding there was no misuse.

V. Counterclaims

The district court held it had no jurisdiction of validity and infringement of Esco's patents 3,026,947 and 3,079,710, which Hensley had sought to raise by counterclaims, since Esco had not charged Hensley with infringement thereof. Hensley asserts this as error but cites no authority or explanation for its contention. HN13[] The right of a party to seek a declaratory judgment is subject to the "same transaction or occurrence" requirement of Fed.Rule Civ.Proc. 13(a) [194] and the "same subject matter" test of Rule 13(b), relating to counterclaims. The district court correctly found it had no jurisdiction to litigate validity and infringement of these two patents.

[*267] * * *

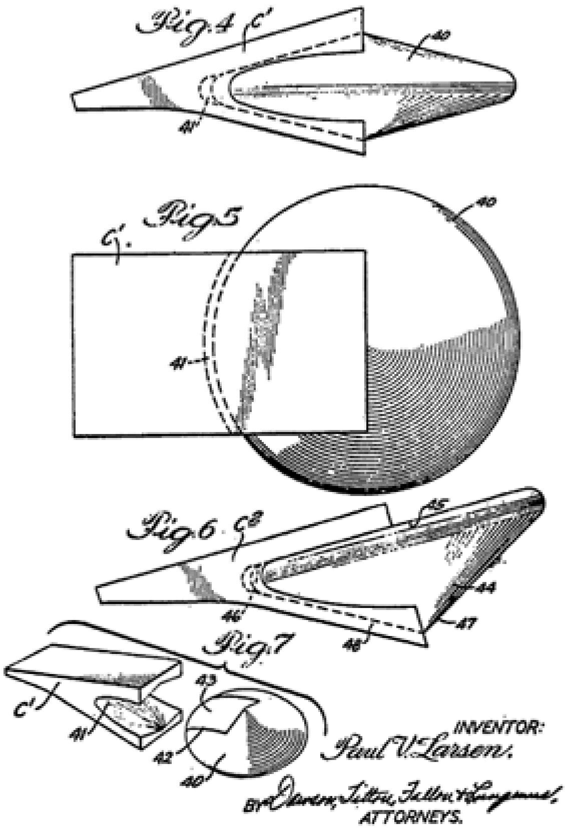
The findings of the district court that the patent [38] is valid and that Hensley has infringed the patent are affirmed. The finding that Esco has not misused the patent is reversed. Remanded to the district court with direction to dismiss the case.

APPENDIX

Jan. 5, 1960 P. V. LARSEN 2,919,506

EXCAVATING TOOTH AND BASE SUPPORT THEREFOR

Filed April 21, 1958 4 Sheets-Sheet 2



End of Document

Trucking Unlimited v. California Motor Transport Co.

United States District Court for the Northern District of California.

October 6, 1967.

No. 45073.

Reporter

1967 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11536 *; 1967 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,298

Trucking Unlimited, et al. v. California Motor Transport Co., et al.

Core Terms

competitors, patent, Sherman Act, monopoly, infringement, antitrust, courts, defendants', combined, regulatory agency, anti trust law, railroads, oppositions, conspired, monopolize, concerted, restrain, cases, probable cause, manufacturer, plaintiffs', conspiracy, campaign, damages, destroy, public convenience, trial court, proceedings, agencies, truckers

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Time Limitations > General Overview

HN1[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

A complaint should not be dismissed under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) for insufficiency unless it appears to a certainty that plaintiff is entitled to no relief under any state of facts which could be proved in the claim.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Noerr-Pennington Doctrine > General Overview

HN2[] Exemptions & Immunities, Noerr-Pennington Doctrine

The Sherman Act does not prohibit two or more persons from associating together to persuade the legislature or the executive to take particular action with respect to a law that would produce a restraint or a monopoly.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Noerr-Pennington Doctrine > General Overview

HN3[] Exemptions & Immunities, Noerr-Pennington Doctrine

The fact that a business' sole purpose in seeking to influence the passage and enforcement of laws is to destroy a competitors' business would not transform conduct otherwise lawful into a violation of the Sherman Act.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Noerr-Pennington Doctrine > General Overview

HN4[] Exemptions & Immunities, Noerr-Pennington Doctrine

The use by a business in their campaign to influence governmental action of the so-called third party technique, involving deceptive and unethical public relations propaganda, would not constitute a violation of the Sherman Act because the Sherman Act is directed at trade restraints, not against political activity designed to influence governmental action.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Noerr-Pennington Doctrine > General Overview

HN5[] Sherman Act, Claims

Violation of the Sherman Act cannot be predicated upon combined attempts to influence the passage of laws or attempts to influence public officials in the enforcement of laws even when the sole purpose and intent of the persons engaging in such activity is, and the result may be to destroy their competitors.

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Amendment of Pleadings > General Overview

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Freedoms > Freedom of Speech > Scope

Constitutional Law > Bill of Rights > Fundamental Freedoms > General Overview

HN6[] Pleadings, Amendment of Pleadings

The right of access to judicial agencies is within the protection of the First Amendment right of petition and a statute impairing such right is, therefore, unconstitutional.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Intellectual Property > Ownership & Transfer of Rights > Assignments

Patent Law > ... > Specifications > Enablement Requirement > Scope of Enablement

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Ownership > Conveyances > Assignments

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Defenses > Inequitable Conduct > Anticompetitive Conduct

HN7[] Ownership & Transfer of Rights, Assignments

A patentee has been given a privilege of limited monopoly conditioned, however, by a public purpose; that, although he may enforce his patent rights either directly obtained or acquired from others under assignment or license, he may not use his limited monopoly in such manner as enables him to acquire a broader monopoly than is within the strictly confined and precise terms of his patent grant; that the method by which his monopoly is sought to be extended is immaterial and that, when the patent is thus diverted from its statutory purpose, the antitrust laws apply.

Opinion by: [*1] SWEIGERT

Opinion

Memorandum of Decision

SWEIGERT, J.: This is a civil antitrust class action for treble damages brought under Section 4 of the Clayton, Act, 15 U.S.C. § 15, by fourteen plaintiffs, each engaged in transportation of goods by motor vehicle under regulation of the California Public Utilities Commission (PUC) and the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC), charging nineteen individually named defendants, similarly engaged and regulated, with violations of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1 and 2.

The case is before the Court on defendants' motion under Rule 12(b)(6) Fed. R. Civ. P., to dismiss the First Amended Complaint for "failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted."

The record consists of the Complaint, the First Amended Complaint and the pending motion. No facts beyond the pleading are presented by either party through affidavit or otherwise except as may be hereafter specifically noted.

The First Amended Complaint alleges in substance and effect (See: First Amended Complaint, par. 8, A-I, pp. 6-13 [not reproduced]) that ever since February, 1961, defendants have conspired to put plaintiffs and their other competitors out [*2] of business and for that purpose have combined their financial and other resources to carry out a consistent, systematic and uninterrupted program of instituting through the procedural machinery of the California PUC, the ICC and of the courts, opposition to every request or application (mainly applications for certification under the public convenience and necessity provisions of the California Public Utilities Act, §§ 1061-1073) made by plaintiffs or by other competitors of defendants before such agency, and to appeal any rulings of those agencies to the courts, all "without probable cause" and "regardless of the merits of the cases of plaintiffs and defendants' other competitors or of the merits of defendants' opposition."

It is further alleged that defendants have contributed to a special trust fund for this purpose according to their respective yearly gross incomes and regardless of whether a contributor has a competitive interest in any particular request or application made by plaintiffs or other competitors; that without such an agreement to jointly finance such oppositions, such oppositions would not be made at all because of the great expense involved in such a program [*3] of protests; that, upon prevailing against plaintiffs and other competitors, defendants engage in a joint program of also resisting rehearings, reviews or appeals sought by plaintiffs or other competitors; that defendants have made known to plaintiffs and other competitors their intended program of combined and well-financed opposition in order to induce plaintiffs and their other competitors to abandon existing applications or requests and to refrain from making further applications or requests; that defendants have thus depleted the resources of plaintiffs and other competitors expended in resisting or overcoming the defendants' conspiracy of opposition; that defendants have thereby deprived the agencies and courts of the benefit of facts and information, and that defendants have defeated applications and requests of plaintiffs and other competitors on the basis of decisions which, but for defendants' combination, would not have been rendered adversely to plaintiffs and other competitors because, absent such conspiracy of opposition, no opposition would have been made.

Defendants contend that this First Amended Complaint should be dismissed upon the ground that under the doctrine [*4] of Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc. 365 U.S. 127 (1961) and United Mine Workers v. Pennington , 381 U.S. 657 (1965) the kind of activities alleged are immune from challenge under the antitrust laws.

We recognize, of course, that HN1[] a complaint should not be dismissed under Rule 12(b)(6) Fed. R. Civ. P., for insufficiency unless it appears to a certainty that plaintiff is entitled to no relief under any state of facts which could be proved in the claim. Moore's Federal Prac. Vol. 2A § 12.08.

Before considering the applicability of Noerr and Pennington , we point out that the First Amended Complaint does not charge acts in restraint of trade or attempts at monopoly except in the one respect that defendants associated for the purpose of intervening in regulatory proceedings to oppose plaintiffs' applications.

There is no allegation that defendants have engaged in, or conspired to engage in, any other conduct designed to restrict the competition of plaintiffs or to monopolize the industry, e.g., rate control, restriction of service, boycott or blacklisting of plaintiffs or plaintiffs' customers or any similar conduct which might violate the antitrust [*5] laws.

Thus, plaintiffs' First Amended Complaint has been narrowly drawn to present the single question of whether defendants' association for intervention in regulatory proceedings before the PUC or the ICC - without any other alleged anti-competitive conduct - is rendered violative of the anti-trust laws by reason of defendants' alleged anti-competitive purpose and intent.

As plaintiffs state in their brief, "The misuse of judicial process constitutes plaintiffs' entire factual and legal case, not an insignificant matter incidental to different facts and legal theories." (Plt. Brief filed 5/16/67; p. 42). Further, the First Amended Complaint states that "Plaintiffs, and other competitors of defendants who are joined herein or who are members of the designated class, do not complain of any activities of defendants or their conspirators toward, or in reference to, any function of the ICC or PUC except as such activities pertain to the precise proceedings before such bodies." (First Amended Complaint, Par. 7, p. 5).

Noerr, supra , was an action by a group of trucking companies under Section 4 of the Clayton Act for treble damages and injunctive relief against a group of railroads, [*6] alleging that the railroads had engaged a public relations firm to conduct a publicity campaign against the truckers designed to foster the adoption and retention of laws and law enforcement practices destructive of the trucking business.

The trial court, disclaiming any purpose to hold illegal mere efforts on the part of the railroads to influence the passage of new legislation or the enforcement of existing law, rested its judgment against the railroads upon findings, first, that the railroads' publicity campaign, insofar as it was actually directed at lawmaking and law enforcement, was malicious in that its only purpose was to destroy the truckers as competitors and, further, was fraudulent in that it involved deceiving the lawmaking and law enforcement authorities by use of the so-called third party technique; and, secondly, that the railroads' campaign also had as an important, if not overriding purpose, the destruction of the truckers' good will among the general public and the truckers' customers, thus injuring the truckers in ways unrelated to the passage or enforcement of laws.

On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed the judgment. After stating the principle that HN2[] "the Sherman [*7] Act does not prohibit two or more persons from associating together to persuade the legislature or the executive to take particular action with respect to a law that would produce a restraint or a monopoly," the Supreme Court held that none of the factors reflected in the trial court's findings were sufficient to remove the case from this controlling principle.

Specifically, the Supreme Court held that HN3[] the fact, established by the trial court's finding, that "the railroads' sole purpose in seeking to influence the passage and enforcement of laws was to destroy the truckers as competitors for the long distance freight business", would not "transform conduct otherwise lawful into a violation of the Sherman Act." (365 U.S. 127, at pp. 138, 139).

The Supreme Court further concluded that HN4[] the use by the railroads in their campaign to influence governmental action of the so-called third party technique, involving deceptive and unethical public relations propaganda, would not constitute a violation of the Sherman Act because the Act is directed at trade restraints, not against political activity designed to influence governmental action. (365 U.S. 127, at pp. 140, 141).

The Supreme [*8] Court further at p. 144, concluded that, assuming application of the Sherman Act might be justified in situations in which a publicity campaign, ostensibly directed toward influencing governmental action, would be a "mere sham to cover what is actually nothing more than at attempt to interfere directly with the business relationship of a competitor" such was not the case before it since no one denied that the railroads were making a genuine and apparently successful effort to influence legislation and law enforcement practices.

Pennington, supra , was an action by the United Mine Workers (U.M.W.) for royalty payments. The defendants, certain coal companies, filed a cross-claim for damages alleging that the U.M.W. and certain other large coal companies had violated Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act by: (1) entering into a Wage Agreement, which was later established under the Walsh-Healy Act by the Secretary of Labor, that provided a minimum wage for employees of contractors selling coal to the T.V.A., (2) imposing this Wage Agreement on all coal companies without regard to their ability to pay, and (3) waging a destructive and collusive price-cutting campaign in the T.V.A. "spot [*9] market" (which was exempt from the Walsh-Healy order) with the purpose of eliminating the smaller companies from the market.

After a jury trial, a verdict was returned in favor of the defendants on their antitrust cross-claim against the union.The trial court set aside the antitrust verdict against the plaintiffs, but denied a union motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict or in the alternative for a new trial - a motion based on the ground that the union was exempt from liability under the facts of the case and also upon claimed trial court errors. The Court of Appeals affirmed denial of the union's motion, holding that the union was not exempt from liability under the Sherman Act and, further, that the instructions were adequate and that the evidence was sufficient to support the verdict.

The Supreme Court agreed that the agreement between the U.M.W. and the larger coal operators was not exempt from the antitrust laws under § 20 of the Clayton Act, and § 4 of the Norris-LaGuardia Act. However, the Supreme Court went on to hold that the trial court had erroneously denied the motion of the U.M.W. for a new trial on the ground that there had been errors in the admission [*10] of evidence and in instructions, stating on pages 669 and 670:

"We agree with the U.M.W. that both the Court of Appeals and the trial court failed to take proper account of the Noerr case. In approving the instructions of the trial court with regard to the approaches of the union and the operators to the Secretary of Labor and to the TVA officials, the Court of Appeals considered Noerr as applying only to conduct 'unaccompanied by a purpose or intent to further a conspiracy to violate a statute.' * * * Joint efforts to influence public officials do not violate the antitrust laws even though intended to eliminate competition. Such conduct is not illegal, either standing alone or as part of a broader scheme itself violative of the Sherman Act. The jury should have been so instructed and, giving the obviously telling nature of this evidence, we cannot hold this lapse to be mere harmless error."

The Noerr and Pennington cases establish the rule that HN5[] violation of the Sherman Act cannot be predicated upon combined attempts to influence the passage of laws or attempts to influence public officials in the enforcement of laws even when the sole purpose and intent of the persons engaging [*11] in such activity is, and the result may be to destroy their competitors.

The reasons given by the Supreme Court for this rule are threefold: (1) That this type of combination is essentially dissimilar from the type of agreements traditionally condemned by the Sherman Act; (2) That holding this kind of activity subject to the sanctions of the Sherman Act would impair the power of government to act upon the basis of information provided to it by interested parties, and (3) That a construction of the Sherman Act, bringing this kind of activity within its purvue, would raise important constitutional questions, e.g., the right to petition.

Thus, the Supreme Court has in effect weighed these factors in balance with the factor of the antitrust intent or result of certain kinds of concerted activity and has concluded that the latter factor must be risked in order to subserve other governmental needs and political rights.

The Noerr doctrine has been recognized and applied in United States v. Johns-Mansville , 259 F.Supp. 440 (E.D. Pa. 1966) (involving alleged combination for informal approaches to municipal authorities to obtain restrictive specifications for certain pipe with intent [*12] to injure competitors); A.B.T. Sightseeing v. Gray Line , 242 F.Supp. 365 (S.D.N.Y. 1965) (involving alleged combination to lobby lawmaking and administrative agencies of the City of New York with intent to ultimately eliminate competition); Harmon v. Valley Natl. Bank , 339 F.2d 564 (9th Cir. 1964) (involving alleged combination by defendants with the Attorney General of Arizona to commence a court action for the purpose of injuring a competitor); Assn. of Western Ry. v. Riss , 299 F.2d 133 (D.C. Cir. 1962) (involving an alleged combination of four Ry. Associations to influence legislative and administrative action with intent to destroy competition); and in Baltimore & Ohio Ry. v. New York, NH & HR Co. , 196 F.Supp. 724 (S.D.N.Y. 1961) (involving alleged combination to propagandize the ICC to impose certain rates on competitors together with the filing of a suit to obtain enforcement of the ICC rates).

In Woods v. Aluminum Co. , 36 F.R.D. 107 (S.D. Tex. 1963), the court refused to apply the Noerr doctrine on a motion for summary judgment where the allegation was to the effect that defendants had conspired to file "false nominations" with the Texas Railroad Commission (whose regulatory [*13] Act provided that every oil producer should file monthly forecasts ("nominations") of the amount of gas that could be produced and sold from oil fields. In that case, however, the court, posing the question whether the conduct complained of was "political in nature" held that, if defendants were enjoined from conspiring to submit "false nominations" with the Railroad Commission, (there are no such charges in our pending case) they would not thereby be deprived of any constitutional right to petition or participate in the governmental process; that defendants would only be prohibited from undertaking "certain joint business behavior which would not remotely infringe upon any of the constitutionally protected freedoms spoken of in Noerr; and, further, that, assuming plaintiff's activities were "political" in nature, the complaint also tendered the issue (unlike the pending case) whether defendants had conspired in other respects , apart from the filing of false nominations, to restrain competition."

In Harmon, supra , a civil action brought under the antitrust laws, our Court of Appeals, reversing dismissal of the action on ground of failure to state a claim, considered an allegation [*14] to the effect that defendants had combined to induce the Attorney General of Arizona (alleged to have been a participant in the combination) to file a court suit under a state statute (authorizing the Attorney General to bring such action against building and loan associations in the event of certain irregularities specified in the statute) which suit resulted in placing Arizona S & L Association in receivership and closing its business. In the course of the receivership plaintiffs' contractual rights, acquired in dealings with the Arizona S & L Association, had been disallowed by the state court receiver.

The court, discussing the applicability of Noerr, supra , (and also of Pennington, supra , and Association of Western Railways v. Riss, supra) agreed that Noerr would apply whether or not the proceeding brought by the Attorney General had substantive merit and, that defendants' conduct (informing the Attorney General of alleged irregularities and persuading him to take the action) "would be essentially political in nature" and immune from attack for the reasons set forth in Noerr .

The court held, however, that the complaint in that particular case (unlike the First Amended [*15] Complaint here) could be read as alleging defendants' joint effort to influence the Attorney General "was but one element in a larger, long continued scheme to restrain and monopolize" the financial industry, pointing out that there was nothing in the complaint which would preclude proof that the alleged conspiracy was aimed, in part, directly at the refinancing arrangements between plaintiff and the Arizona S & L Association.

In Washington Brewers v. United States , 137 F.2d 964, (9th Cir. 1943) a criminal prosecution against the defendants, Brewers Institute and others, for violation of the Sherman Act §§ 1 and 3, the court, although affirming the trial court's refusal to dismiss the indictment (alleging concerted fixing of prices) on demurrer, pointed out that, insofar as the indictment charged defendants with conspiring to influence the formulation of state policy concerning liquor and with combining to police the enforcement of state laws, it charged no antitrust offense saying: "We know of no reason why brewers, like other people, may not jointly advocate state legislation thought by them to be desirable, nor why they may not single or in concert, aid the authorities in the [*16] policing of any legislation which it is within the competency of states to adopt."

Plaintiffs first contend that the doctrine of Noerr and Pennington, supra , is applicable only to activities directed to the legislative branch of government for the enactment of laws or to the executive branch for the enforcement of laws and that the doctrine is not applicable to activities conducted through the procedural machinery of the courts or of regulatory agencies like the California PUC or the ICC in which certain quasi judicial functions are vested.

Although it is true that in Noerr and Pennington , the court was speaking in terms of the "legislative" and "executive" branches of government there involved, this Court is of the opinion that the rationale of the Noerr-Pennington doctrine is clearly and equally applicable to activities directed to the courts or to regulatory agencies for the purpose of taking positions on points of fact or law pertinent to the regulatory acts.

The gist of the Noerr-Pennington doctrine is that concerted activities "conducted along lines normally accepted in our political system" are not rendered violative of the antitrust laws even though the purpose or [*17] result may be to injure a competitor.

The right of access to courts and regulatory agencies is just as much a political right as the right of access to the legislative and executive branches.In fact, the Supreme Court has expressly recognized that HN6[] the right of access to judicial agencies is within the protection of the First Amendment right of petition and has held that a statute impairing such right is, therefore, unconstitutional. NAACP v. Button , 371 U.S. 415 at 430 (1963).

Both the ICC and PUC Acts, involved in the pending case, are framed in such manner as to invite intervention by members of the regulated industry and other interested persons in opposition to applications for certificates of the kind here involved. The regulatory agencies often encourage such intervention in order to provide them with pertinent information concerning public convenience and necessity without which these applications would be in effect mere onesided proceedings.

In seems clear that, under the rationale of Noerr , the mere fact of association by defendants for the purpose of resort to the regulatory agencies of the courts in order to oppose applications by others in the manner provided [*18] by law could not be held a violation of the antitrust law - even if the intent of defendants is, or the result might be, the injury of competitors.

The Noerr Doctrine

Plaintiffs next contend that defendants' purported access to and use of the procedures of the regulatory agencies and of the courts in the exercise of their rights is mere "sham" within the meaning of that term as used by the Supreme Court in Noerr, supra .

However, the First Amended Complaint does not allege that all or any of the oppositions mentioned in the pleading were filed or were to be filed without probable cause. The pleading carefully refrains from charging that the oppositions were false, misleading to the agency or lacking in factual allegation and legal theory arguably relevant to the function of the regulatory agency in determining public convenience and necessity. The allegation is merely that defendants combined to file them "with or without probable cause". This allegation falls far short of charging that the oppositions would not be upon probable cause. On the contrary, it implies that all or at least some of the oppositions may have been filed with probable cause.

Nor does the First Amended [*19] Complaint allege that all or any of the applications made by plaintiffs (which defendants oppose) were meritorious under the applicable regulatory acts. The allegation carefully refrains from alleging that they were. Plaintiffs merely allege that defendants combined to oppose their applications "regardless of the merits of" the applications. This falls short of alleging that the applications were meritorious. On the contrary, it implies that all or at least some might be without merit.

Plaintiffs, themselves, in their Brief filed 5/16/67, p. 8, present certain exhibits showing that 21 out of 40 matters which had reached the decision stage as of 11/28/61, resulted in action favorable to defendants either because the opposed application was denied by the agency in whole or in part or substantially reduced in scope or because the application was dismissed by the applicant after defendants appeared in opposition.

In the light of the pleading, considered either alone or in the light of such exhibit, and in a light most favorable to plaintiffs, it is impossible for this Court to say that the pleading supports plaintiffs' conclusionary claim of "sham" as that term was used in Noerr [*20] .

On the contrary, just as the findings in Noerr negatived the theory of sham, so also the allegations here negative that theory and show, as in Noerr , that, whatever the ultimate purpose and intent of defendants may have been, the oppositions were not, so far as the pleading is concerned, sham but were genuine and in part successful.

To hold that this complaint alleges an antitrust violation would be to hold in effect that defendants are liable in damages for having associated to present their oppositions to the agencies regardless of the merit of the oppositions or lack of merit in the applications opposed solely because defendants, according to the complaint, entertained an ulterior motive of injuring or destroying defendants' competition.

Whatever the law would be without Noerr , the Supreme Court has resolved the problem of bad purpose or intent vis a vis freedom of resort to public officials and agencies by holding that the latter is to be subserved notwithstanding the risk of tolerating an anti-competition purpose of such resort and a possible anti-competitive result.

There is no good reason why regulated business firms may not freely submit their information and [*21] views on public convenience and necessity to the regulatory agency without subjecting themselves to antitrust attack upon the ground that their purpose was to restrict competition - an objective which may be easily implied because it is inherently involved in the regulatory act, itself, which is designed to restrict entries into the industry to those justified by findings of public convenience and necessity. In our opinion, the rationale of Noerr is such that this result is not required.

As impliedly recognized in Noerr , the "probable cause" or "merit" of such applications or oppositions as are presented to the regulatory agency (or to the legislative or other executive officials) can be left to their responsible expertise (and appropriate judicial review) rather than be presented to the courts in the guise of an antitrust suit.

The gist of plaintiffs' complaints is that the resort of defendants to the regulatory agencies to oppose and thereby put plaintiffs to the proof in support of their applications has made it "exceedingly expensive" for plaintiffs and others to obtain certificates.

Unfortunately, proceedings before courts or regulatory agencies, if opposed, entail [*22] expense in terms of time and money for both sides. But, this is inherent - so much so that, as plaintiffs say in their own brief, "Individually, the members of the Dwyer group" (defendants) "would not take the action against plaintiffs which their conspiracy has allowed them to take" (Plt. Brief of 5/16/67, p. 6, line 6) and in their Amended Complaint they make the significant statement that decisions of the agency "but for defendants' combination and conspiracy, would not have been rendered adverse to plaintiffs and other competitors of defendants, because no opposition would otherwise have been commenced." (Amended Complaint, par. 8(4)10, p. 12).

The Patent Cases

Plaintiffs mainly rely upon cases involving the claim that combinations involving the threat or actual commencement of patent infringement suits were violations of the antitrust laws.

In United States v. Singer Manufacturing Co. , 374 U.S. 174 (1963) the United States sued to restrain Singer, the sole American manufacturer of certain sewing machines, from conspiring with two of its competitors, an Italian manufacturer (Vigorelli) and a Swiss manufacturer (Gegauf) to restrain interstate and foreign trade in sewing [*23] machines, specifically certain Japanese competition.

The District Court ruled for defendants on the ground that there did not appear to be a concert between Singer and its alleged co-conspirators to restrain the Japanese competition and that Singer was merely acting within its right to protect its own patent. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that, according to its interpretation of the trial court's findings, a conspiracy to exclude Japanese competition in violation of the Sherman Act was shown.

The findings were to the effect that defendants had combined (1) to withdraw opposition to each other's applications in the Patent Office in order to secure broad claims regardless of validity; (2) to crosslicense and assign their respective patents on a world-wide royalty free basis, and (3) assignment of an American patent (owned by the Swiss manufacturer in order that this patent could be more effectively enforced by Singer in the United States against the Japanese competition through infringement suits and certain Tariff Commission proceedings.

The Court said:

"Thus, by entwining itself with Gegauf and Vigorelli in such a program Singer went far beyond its claimed purpose [*24] of protecting its own 401 machine - it was protecting Gegauf and Vigorelli, the sole licensees of the patent at the time, under the same umbrella. This the Sherman Act will not permit. * * * The fact that the enforcement plan likewise served Singer is of no consequence, the controlling factor being the overall common design, i.e., to destroy the Japanese sale of sewing machines in the United States by placing the patent in Singer's hands the better to achieve this result.It is this concerted action to restrain trade that condemns the transaction under the Sherman Act. * * * It is well settled that 'beyond the limited monopoly which is granted, the arrangements under which the patent is utilized are subject to general law. * * * By aggregating patents in one control the holder of the patents cannot escape the prohibitions of the Sherman Act. That Act imposes strict limitations on the concerted activities in which patent owners may lawfully engage."

In Kobe v. Dempsey Pump Co. , 198 F.2d 416 (10th Cir. 1952), an action for patent infringement, defendants counterclaimed alleging that plaintiff's misuse of its patent monopoly, including, among other things, the bringing of an infringement [*25] suit, violated Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act.

Affirming a judgment for defendants on their antitrust counterclaim, the Court, dealing with plaintiff's contention that its monopolistic practices did not reach the defendants until the commencement of the infringement suit and that to allow recovery of damages would be a denial of free access to the courts, recognized that although free and unrestricted access to the courts should not be denied or imperiled in any manner, the courts should not be made a vehicle for maintaining and carrying out an unlawful monopoly having for its purpose the elimination and prevention of competition, adding, however, on p. 425:

"We have no doubt that, if there was nothing more than the bringing of the infringement action resulting damages could not be recovered, but that is not the case. The facts as hereinbefore detailed are sufficient to support a finding that, although Kobe (plaintiff) believed some of its patents were infringed, the real purpose of the infringement action … was to further the existing monopoly and to eliminate Dempsey as a competitor. The infringement action and the related activities, of course, in themselves were not [*26] unlawful, and standing alone would not be sufficient to sustain a claim for damages which they may have caused, but when considered with the entire monopolistic scheme which preceded them, we think, as the trial court did, that they may be considered as having been done to give effect to the unlawful scheme. …" distinguishing Virtue v. Creamery Package Co. , 227 U.S. 8 (1913) and International Visible Systems v. Remington-Rand , 65 F.2d 540 (6th Cir. 1933) as involving "single and isolated actions not preceded by a long history of unlawful monopolization," 198 F.2d 416, at 425.

In Lynch v. Magnavox , 94 F.2d 883, 888-890 (9th Cir. 1938), the Court reversed a dismissal on demurrer of an antitrust complaint which alleged that defendants, who had cross-licensed their respective patents, had combined to restrain competition and to monopolize the radio speaker business by threatening radio manufacturers with a ruinous commercial campaign of letter writing and by threatening and commencing in bad faith groundless actions against the manufacturers and their customers for infringement of their allegedly invalid patents in order to force the manufacturers to discontinue purchase of radio [*27] speakers from anyone but defendants.

The Court held that, assuming each of the alleged acts to be lawful in themselves, the combination would be a violation of the antitrust laws if its purpose was to restrain competition or to attempt monopoly, saying: "In other words, if the purpose of the plan is to effect a monopoly or to fix prices … then the act is violated by use of any means to that end, including a cross-licensing agreement."

The theory of these cases, as set forth in Mercoid v. Mid-Continent , 320 U.S. 661, 665-666 (1943), is that HN7[] a patentee has been given a privilege of limited monopoly conditioned, however, by a public purpose; that, although he may enforce his patent rights (either directly obtained or acquired from others under assignment or license), he may not use his limited monopoly in such manner as enables him to acquire a broader monopoly than is within the strictly confined and precise terms of his patent grant; that the method by which his monopoly is sought to be extended is immaterial and that, when the patent is thus diverted from its statutory purpose, the antitrust laws apply.

Further, in these cases the combinations involved other acts of the [*28] conspirators, e.g., illegal cross-licensing schemes and similar activities, of which the infringement suits, or threats thereof were merely the effectuating means.

In none of these patent cases did the court hold or say that mere association for the bringing or threatening of a patent infringement suit - without more - is, itself, an antitrust violation merely because the associates may contemplate injury to a competitor.

On the other hand, it was early recognized in International Visible Systems v. Remington-Rand , 65 F.2d 540 (6th Cir. 1933) at 542, that the mere bringing of a patent infringement suit, even if alleged to have been brought maliciously and with the purpose of monopolizing an industry, does not state a violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act (attempt to monopolize, i.e., regardless of concert of action) the Court saying:

"The suit brought by appellee for the infringement of its patents cannot of itself be characterized as an attempt to monopolize trade or commerce. It was nothing more than a lawful method of protecting appellee's claimed monopoly under the patent laws * * * Moreover, the declaration in the petition that the suits for infringement were brought [*29] against appellant 'maliciously and without probable cause' adds nothing to the weight of the claim that the infringement suit was an attempt to monopolize trade or commerce", citing Virtue v. Package Creamery , 227 U.S. 8, 38 (1912).

In any event, the defendants in this pending case have not combined to bring patent infringement suits nor are they grantees of any monopoly which could possibly have been misused. They are simply certificated business entities in an industry which is competitive within a framework of regulation according to standards of public convenience and necessity.

It is, therefore, unnecessary to decide whether the patent cases indicate a special area to which the immunization doctrine of Noerr does not extend.

We only hold that the narrowly framed allegations of this Amended Complaint are such that the activities for which defendants have associated are and must be held immune from the antitrust laws - even though their ultimate purpose may be to reduce, injure or destroy competition.

The pleading has already been once amended and, presumably, plaintiffs have gone as far as they can truthfully go toward alleging an antitrust violation. The First Amended [*30] Complaint will, therefore, be dismissed without leave to amend subject to the condition that, if plaintiffs move for leave to amend within fifteen (15) days from the date of this order, the Court will consider whether their amended pleading is sufficient to state a claim upon which relief could be granted.

Bracken's Shipping Center, Inc. v. Ruwe

United States District Court for the Southern District of Illinois, Northern Division

October 9, 1967

Civil Action No. P-2907

Reporter

273 F. Supp. 606 *; 1967 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11215 ; 1967 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,247

Bracken's Shopping Center, Inc., et al. v. Stuart Ruwe, et al.

Core Terms

anti-trust, municipal ordinance, motion to dismiss, shopping center, defendants', plaintiffs', probable cause, state court, trial court, good faith, invalid, motive

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Remedies > General Overview

HN1[] Private Actions, Remedies

Seeking lawful legislative, executive, or judicial action does not violate federal antitrust laws, even if interstate commerce is involved and even if the purpose and effect is to curtail competition.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > State Regulation

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Declaratory Judgments > General Overview

Governments > Local Governments > Ordinances & Regulations

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Remedies > General Overview

HN2[] Private Actions, State Regulation

The individual citizen has a right under Illinois law to seek a declaratory judgment on the validity of a municipal ordinance. Ill. Rev. Stat. ch. 110, § 57.1. Exposing citizens who exercise that right to possible fine and imprisonment under the anti-trust laws could only be justified by plain and unmistakable language to that effect.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN3[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

The Sherman Act (United States) does not prohibit two or more persons from associating together in an attempt to persuade the legislature or the executive to take particular action with respect to a law that would produce a restraint or a monopoly.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Noerr-Pennington Doctrine > General Overview

HN4[] Exemptions & Immunities, Noerr-Pennington Doctrine

Joint efforts to influence public officials do not violate the antitrust laws even though intended to eliminate competition.

Judges: [1] Morgan, D.J.

Opinion by: MORGAN

Opinion

[*607] Opinion and Order

MORGAN, D.J.

The question whether the plaintiffs have stated a claim for relief under the Sherman and Clayton anti-trust acts arises upon defendants' several motions to dismiss. The gist of the plaintiffs' complaint is that defendants, opposing the construction of a shopping center which might reduce the business of "downtown" Kewanee merchants, conspired to file in the state court a representative suit challenging the validity of the statute under which the city fathers had vacated certain streets needed for the proposed shopping center.

Since the complaint alleges no other act or conspiracy, the court grants the defendants' motions to dismiss because it does not believe that resort to the judiciary, even in concert or in an effort to restrict competition, can violate the anti-trust laws of the United States.

The novelty of plaintiffs' argument that the filing of a suit testing the validity of a municipal ordinance constitutes an anti-trust violation may account for the dearth of judicial decisions directly in point. The Supreme Court has, however, recently enunciated on two occasions the general principle that [2] HN1[] seeking lawful legislative, executive, or judicial action does not violate the anti-trust laws, even if interstate commerce is involved and even if the purpose and effect is to curtail competition. See Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464, 81 S. Ct. 523 (1961) and United Mine Workers v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657, 14 L. Ed. 2d 626, 85 S. Ct. 1585 (1965).

HN2[] The individual citizen has a right under Illinois law to seek a declaratory judgment on the validity of a municipal ordinance. Ill. Rev. Stat. Ch. 110, § 57.1. Exposing citizens who exercise that right to possible fine and imprisonment under the anti-trust laws could only be justified by plain and unmistakable language to that effect. This court agrees with the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit which said in Citizens Wholesale Supply Co. v. Snyder, et al., (3rd. Cir.) 201 F. 907 at page 909:

> "We cannot suppose that the general words of the Anti-Trust Act were intended [*608] to include an agreement in good faith to test a municipal ordinance in the courts."

Apparently recognizing the difficulty inherent in the proposition they urge, the plaintiffs [3] argue that it is not the filing of the law suit itself but the common motive behind the filing thereof, arrived at by agreement, that violates the

Sherman and Clayton Acts. First, it would appear that the Railroad Presidents and Pennington cases cited above foreclose inquiry into motive. In the Railroad Presidents case, the Supreme Court declared 365 U.S. at page 136:

> "We think it equally clear that HN3[] the Sherman Act does not prohibit two or more persons from associating together in an attempt to persuade the legislature or the executive to take particular action with respect to a law that would produce a restraint or a monopoly."

And in the Pennington opinion the Supreme Court observed at page 670:

> HN4[] "Joint efforts to influence public officials do not violate the antitrust laws even though intended to eliminate competition."

Second, it appears that the trial court has rendered judgment in favor of the defendants in the state court suit complained of. At least one test of good faith is the existence of probable cause; and the judgment of the trial court in the state action, even if reversed on appeal, has conclusively shown that defendants [4] had probable cause to believe that the municipal ordinance was invalid. Their decision to act on that belief, even if motivated by a desire to prevent the construction of the Bracken shopping center and thereby restrain competition, does not violate the anti-trust laws. Regardless of intent or assumed purpose, defendants have a right to have the ordinance set aside if it is invalid.

Defendants' motions to dismiss are therefore granted and the case is dismissed at plaintiffs' cost.

End of Document

Shoaf v. Triangle Publications, Inc.

United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania

October 11, 1967

Civil Action No. 41117

Reporter

43 F.R.D. 10 *; 1967 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11217 ; 1967 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,251

Orville SHOAF v. TRIANGLE PUBLICATIONS, INC.

Core Terms

onions, counterclaim, Sherman Act, summary judgment, resale price, newspapers, antitrust, alleged violation, illegal contract, futures market, treble damages, market price, nondelivery, deliver, parties, promise

Judges: [1] Masterson, District Judge.

Opinion by: MASTERSON

Opinion

[*10] Opinion

MASTERSON, District Judge.

Plaintiff, Orville Shoaf, commenced a treble damage antitrust action against the defendant, Triangle Publications, Inc., alleging a violation of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. Defendant counterclaimed and now moves for summary judgment on Count I of his counterclaim pursuant to Rule 54(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure [1] alleging that the plaintiff owes defendant $3,142.57 for newspapers sold and delivered to the plaintiff on a running account. Plaintiff has admitted by answer that he received and agreed to pay for the newspapers in question. Plaintiff defends his non-payment on the ground that the debt incurred was a result of defendant's resale price maintenance policy in violation of the Sherman Act. Plaintiff's argument made by affidavit is that defendant's fixed resale price policy forced him to sell at an unreasonably low price and thereby caused him to lose money. He maintains that, as a result of the illegal acts of defendant, he was unable to pay defendant's bills.

[2] Plaintiff thus relies on the traditional judicial policy of not enforcing illegal contracts. He reasons that, because defendant's wholesale price was tied to defendant's allegedly illegal resale price maintenance policy, to enforce payment of plaintiff's debt would be to enforce an illegal contract.

The United States Supreme Court considered and rejected this argument in a [*11] closely analogous factual context in the case of Kelly v. Kosuga, 358 U.S. 516, 3 L. Ed. 2d 475, 79 S. Ct. 429 (1959). In that case Kelly, an onion grower, agreed to purchase onions at the prevailing market price. The agreement between Kelly and Kosuga

[1] Rule 54(b) provides that: "When more than one claim for relief is presented in an action, * * * (or) as a * * * counterclaim * * * the court may direct the entry of a final judgment upon an express determination that there is no just reason for delay and upon an express direction for the entry of judgment."

included reciprocal promises not to deliver onions on the futures market in order to create an artificially high market price after the onions were delivered. Kelly refused to pay the amount due on the contract. Kosuga sued on the contract and Kelly invoked an alleged violation of the Sherman Act as an affirmative defense. The Supreme Court speaking through Justice Brennan declared the agreement not to deliver the onions severable from the agreement of purchase and sale. He stated that the purchase and sale was "an intelligible economic transaction [3] in itself", Kelly, supra page 521, despite the fact that the defendant had purchased primarily to secure the plaintiff's promise of nondelivery on the futures market. He went on to state at page 521 :

> "While the nondelivery agreement between the parties could not be enforced by a court, if its unlawful character under the Sherman Act be assumed, it can hardly be said a violation of the Act to give legal effect to a completed sale of onions at a fair price. * * * we do not think it inappropriate or violative of the intent of the parties to give it effect even though it furnished the occasion for a restrictive agreement of the sort here in question."

Kelly controls the outcome of the case at bar. Plaintiff purchased the defendant's newspapers at the price charged all other dealers of his class. Even if, as the plaintiff alleges, the contract for the purchase of papers furnished the occasion for the restrictive resale practices of the defendant, this court under the Kelly doctrine must enforce the contract since it is a completely separate claim for money owing on goods purchased, and there is no dispute as to a material fact with respect to this claim.

As [4] Judge Freedman stated in Lewis v. Seanor Coal Company, 382 F.2d 437, 441, CCH Trade Cases para. 72, 189 at 84, 274, Third Circuit, 1967, relying on Kelly:

> "It is now well established that the remedy for violation of the antitrust law is not avoidance of payments due under a contract, but rather the redress which the antitrust statute establishes,--a private treble damage case."

The granting of summary judgment on this counterclaim settles it in its entirety, and concludes an issue which is completely separable from that raised in the principal complaint and the rest of defendant's counterclaim. It will simplify the issues and thus facilitate the conduct of the trial.

Accordingly defendant's motion for summary judgment on its counterclaim is granted.

Barr Rubber Prods. Co. v. Sun Rubber Co.

United States District Court for the Southern District of New York

October 20, 1967

No. 60 Civ. 4327

Reporter

277 F. Supp. 484 *; 1967 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11398 ; 156 U.S.P.Q. (BNA) 374 ; 1967 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,248

The BARR RUBBER PRODUCTS COMPANY, Plaintiff, v. The SUN RUBBER COMPANY, and Wonder Products, Inc., Defendants

Subsequent History: [1] As Modified November 21, 1967.

Core Terms

patent, rotational, casting, plastisols, invention, heating, temperature, fusion, plasticizer, cooling, molding, hollow, teachings, gelled, layer, manufactured, liquid, fuse, gel, invalid, objects, resin, deposit, taught, references, inner surface, anticipate, hardening, purported, opening

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Patent Law > Nonobviousness > Elements & Tests > Claimed Invention as a Whole

Patent Law > Nonobviousness > Elements & Tests > General Overview

Patent Law > Nonobviousness > Elements & Tests > Prior Art

HN1[] Elements & Tests, Claimed Invention as a Whole

See 35 U.S.C.S. § 103.

Patent Law > ... > Elements & Tests > Graham Test > Secondary Considerations

Patent Law > Nonobviousness > Elements & Tests > General Overview

HN2[] Graham Test, Secondary Considerations

In determining whether a patent is void due to obviousness, evidence of long felt need of a product is a "secondary consideration."

Patent Law > Nonobviousness > Elements & Tests > General Overview

HN3[] Nonobviousness, Elements & Tests

Congress is not empowered, and has never reflected a disposition, to authorize the issuance of patents whose effects are to remove existent knowledge from the public domain, or to restrict free access to materials already available.

Patent Law > Nonobviousness > Elements & Tests > Prior Art

Patent Law > Nonobviousness > Elements & Tests > General Overview

HN4[] Elements & Tests, Prior Art

In determining whether a patent is void due to obviousness, the fact that prior art matured later than the invention of the patented product at issue is not decisive.

Patent Law > Nonobviousness > Elements & Tests > Claimed Invention as a Whole

Patent Law > ... > Specifications > Enablement Requirement > General Overview

Patent Law > Nonobviousness > Elements & Tests > General Overview

Patent Law > Nonobviousness > Elements & Tests > Ordinary Skill Standard

HN5[] Elements & Tests, Claimed Invention as a Whole

A patent is void for obviousness if the subject matter as a whole would have been obvious at the time the invention was made to a person having ordinary skill in the art. 35 U.S.C.S. § 103.

Patent Law > Anticipation & Novelty > Description in Prior Patents

Patent Law > Anticipation & Novelty > General Overview

Patent Law > Statutory Bars > General Overview

Patent Law > Statutory Bars > Prior Patents & Publications > Foreign Patenting

HN6[] Anticipation & Novelty, Description in Prior Patents

See 35 U.S.C.S. § 102(b).

Governments > Legislation > Vagueness

Patent Law > Statutory Bars > Prior Patents & Publications > Foreign Patenting

HN7[] Legislation, Vagueness

In determining whether a foreign patent under 35 U.S.C.S. § 102(b) invalidates a later-issued United States patent on a competing product, vagueness and excessive breadth are not proper standards for the test.

Patent Law > Preclusion > Collateral Estoppel

HN8[] Preclusion, Collateral Estoppel

The decision on patent validity by a federal court, especially a higher one, is entitled to great weight. Where the record leads compellingly to a different conclusion, the second court is forced, with all respect, to render a conflicting judgment. It is important, however, to state the grounds on which it appears to the second court that the first court was led into error.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Infringement Actions > Defenses > Bad Faith Enforcement

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Affirmative Defenses > Unclean Hands

HN9[] Defenses, Bad Faith Enforcement

Under the doctrine of unclean hands, a party's "tampering" with the administration of justice closes the court's doors against an affirmative claim for equitable relief pressed by such means.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Intellectual Property > Ownership & Transfer of Rights > Licenses

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Ownership > Conveyances > Licenses

Patent Law > Ownership > Conveyances > General Overview

HN10[] Ownership & Transfer of Rights, Licenses

In the absence of antitrust violations, it is not illegal for a party holding a patent to obtain from its licensees the promise of licenses from them under any patented improvements in the process.

Counsel: Ely & Golrick, Cleveland, Ohio, Albert L. Ely, Jr., Cleveland, Ohio, of counsel, Darby & Darby, New York, New York, Harvey M. Brownrout, New York, New York, of counsel, Theodore A. Lazar, Columbus, Ohio, for plaintiff.

Pennie, Edmonds, Morton, Taylor & Adams, New York, New York, Thomas F. Reddy, Jr., New York, New York, of counsel, Hamilton & Cook, Akron, Ohio, Everett R. Hamilton, Phillip L. Kenner, Akron, Ohio, of counsel, for defendant.

Judges: Frankel, District Judge.

Opinion by: FRANKEL

Opinion

[*375] [*486] FRANKEL, District Judge.

In this action, begun on November 3, 1960, plaintiff, Barr Rubber Products Company, sues The Sun Rubber Company for:

> (1) a declaration of invalidity and noninfringement with respect to United States Patent No. 2,629,134 relating to a method of casting plastic articles, and (2) damages and injunctive relief against alleged violations of the antitrust laws and allegedly unfair competitive practices. [1]

Defendant has counterclaimed for a judgment of validity and infringement of the patent.

[2] I. THE PATENT CLAIMS

In brief, non-technical language, the patent in suit covers a method for the casting of fully enclosed hollow plastic objects "from a liquid mixture of a vinyl resin and a plasticizer therefor" which solidifies and hardens through the application of heat during the procedure which the patentee, Robert P. Molitor (assignor to his onetime employer, Sun), claims to have invented. The steps of the process are: the deposit of the liquid material in one section of a two-piece mold (the amount being measured to produce the desired wall thickness of the finished hollow object); the closure of the mold; rotation of the mold, [376] causing the liquid to spread in a wall around the inside; the simultaneous application of heat to bring the plastic through the stages of "gelation" (in which the matter is a gelatinous or coagulated "cheesy mass") and then "fusion" (the point at which the material becomes hard, its ultimate degree of elasticity depending upon the varying proportions of solid matter and liquid "plasticizer" employed); the cooling of the mold below the "fusion" temperature; and the opening of the mold and removal of the finished object.

In the more artistic language [3] of the patent, Claim 1 (of the four claims) depicts the invention as follows:

> "The process of making hollow articles from a liquid mixture of a vinyl resin and a plasticizer therefor, comprising the steps of depositing a measured charge of the said mixture in a hollow sectional mold, said charge being less in volume than the volume of the mold, said mold having non-porous [*487] inner surfaces, closing the mold with the charge therein to retain the charge within the cavity, rotating the mold in a multiplicity of planes to distribute the charge as a layer over the entire inner surface of the mold cavity, heating the layer to gel it against the inner surface of the mold while the mold is rotating, then applying additional heat to the closed mold to raise the temperature thereof sufficiently to fuse the gelled layer against the inner surface of the mold, cooling the mold until the temperature of the layer is below the fusing point of the material, opening the mold and removing the article therefrom." [2] [5]

It will be noted that the material described in the patent claims is referred to as "a liquid mixture of a vinyl resin and a plasticizer therefor." According to defendant [4] and much of the testimony, the quoted words should be read to mean, more briefly, a "plastisol," which is a small-particled polyvinyl chloride resin dispersed in a liquid plasticizer (or softening agent) containing no volatile solvents or diluents. [3] While neither the patent claims nor the specifications anywhere use the word "plastisol," and while the patent's words ("liquid mixture of a vinyl resin and a plasticizer therefor") literally include things which are not plastisols, defendant has argued persuasively that the

---

[1] Wonder Products Company was also named as a defendant and charged as a conspirator with Sun in conduct said to constitute unlawful restraints and unfair competitive practices. By stipulation of the parties, Wonder Products has been permitted to stand aside awaiting the outcome of the contest between Barr and Sun. It will be sufficient, therefore, to refer to Sun as the single defendant.

[2] The quoted claim is typical; the others add nothing of consequence for present purposes. Merely to note the variations: Claims 2 and 3 describe the "liquid mixture" as "deaerated." Claims 3 and 4 describe the gelled layer as being of "uniform thickness." Claim 2 speaks of "further heating" to fuse after gelling, and Claim 4 describes the same step as the "applying" of "further heat," while the third claim, like the first, speaks of "applying additional heat."

The essential similarity of the four claims for consideration of the disputed issues is acknowledged by defendant.

[3] Close kin to a "plastisol" - or, according to some of the testimony, a more general category - is an "organosol," which differs in that its liquid phase does contain volatile elements which are freed in the course of gelation and fusion. The presence of such volatiles - and, specifically, the freeing of them when the material is solidified - renders an organosol normally unsuitable for casting in a closed mold.

references, in their context, should be deemed to focus on variously formulated plastisols. The subject is one, however, which will engage us again when we come to defendant's contention that an Italian patent claimed by plaintiff to anticipate Molitor's must be cast aside for the reason (among others) that it purports to cover an excessively broad range of materials, including many which would be unworkable.

The foregoing sketch, to be amplified as the discussion proceeds, is a sufficient background against which to consider the patent issues and explain the court's conclusions that (A) the patent is invalid and (B) assuming, for the sake of full adjudication at this level, that the patent were deemed valid, it would be held to have been infringed.

A. Invalidity of the Patent

1. Obviousness

Molitor's alleged invention was an obvious combination of old and wellknown elements, failing the test of 35 U.S.C. § 103. [4] Despite the length of the trial and the volume of the record, the facts bearing upon this point are largely undisputed.

[6] The technique dubbed "rotational casting" in this case is at least 100 years old. There is specific and persuasive evidence that Molitor, if he was ahead at all, barely preceded several others in applying to the infant subject of plastisols a procedure that would have been obvious "to a person having ordinary skill [377] in the art * * *." Postponing that for a bit, the history of rotational casting of other [*488] materials goes far (probably sufficiently far) in itself to refute Molitor's claim that he invented something.

In 1855, one Peters was granted a British patent (No. 1308) for the rotational casting of "ordnance shells and other hollow vessels." Unlike (and superior to) Molitor, Peters showed equipment and a specific mode of rotation around two axes (as against Molitor's vague reference to "a multiplicity of planes") suitable for casting "metal or other substances which can be made sufficiently fluid by heat to be acted upon in the manner * * * described, and which will set or become rigid on cooling down." (P.Ex. 38, p. 4.)

Postponing plaintiff's many other references to early methods and means of rotational casting, one other may be mentioned at this point. In 1920, [7] U.S. Patent No. 1,341,670 issued to Ransom Judd Powell for a machine and means "for shaping or forming plaster, metals and other plastic materials or substances." The invention was described as "particularly directed to the production of hollow objects * * * [consisting] broadly in achieving such result by the simultaneous turning of a matrix or mold on two different axes." The patented device was described as "adapted to be used in conjunction with molds for casting hollow objects which are substantially completely closed, and the selected embodiment of the invention * * * shown is directed to the casting or molding of relatively light-weight articles, such as statuary, artistic novelties, small figures, toys, etc." The invention described introduction of the liquid material into the mold, rotation (avoiding centrifugal force), and the hardening of the material against the mold wall during such rotation.

Purporting to dispose of such references, and speaking directly to the Powell patent, defendant's expert observed, correctly, that metals harden by cooling and plaster "by crystallization" (aside from Powell's reference to "other plastic materials or substances" and the absence [8] of any reference in Powell to such obvious factors as cooling where appropriate) whereas Molitor dealt with materials which harden upon heating. (As is noted below, all are agreed that the flowing and hardening characteristics of plastisols were commonly known in the art before Molitor, and that he "invented" nothing in this respect.) But even if the Peters and Powell inventions stood alone - as they do not by any means - this asserted distinction seems trivial to the point of being regrettable. [5] Granting the customary (and frequently wellfounded) humility lay judges are supposed to exhibit when confronted with the mysteries of natural science, machinery, and the like, it is difficult to accept that a patent should issue because somebody applies an ancient casting technique to well-known properties of some new material.

---

[4] HN1[] "A patent may not be obtained though the invention is not identically disclosed or described as set forth in section 102 of this title, if the differences between the subject matter sought to be patented and the prior art are such that the subject matter as a whole would have been obvious at the time the invention was made to a person having ordinary skill in the art to which said subject matter pertains."

[9] Furthermore, among the many items undisputedly in the prior art was the [*489] known process of rotationally casting latex, which does require heating rather than cooling to harden it. [6]

[10] However, before turning from the [378] Peters and Powell patents, another of defendant's arguments may be noted. Defendant says Peters taught the use of centrifugal force for spreading the material on the inner mold wall whereas plastisols do not spread efficiently when subjected to such force. Instead, it is argued - and the record tends to support this - that to spread a plastisol in rotational casting, the substance should rest in a pool at the bottom of the mold and then adhere as the mold walls pass the pool in turning. There are decisive answers to the point (which is, incidentally, stressed by defendant with respect to other references plaintiff invokes, and is similarly refuted by what follows here). In the first place, Powell taught the avoidance of centrifugal force for plastic and similar materials. Secondly, the evidence establishes, as even laymen might know, that this argumentation about centrifugal force concerns a matter of degree rather than an absolute choice. All rotation produces some centrifugal force. The present point about rotational casting is that the rotation should be relatively slow, minimizing the operation of such force.

Further, and more strikingly, [11] if defendant were correct on this subject, it would be acknowledging a most vital defect in Molitor's patent. There is not a word in Molitor about the speed of rotation or the necessity to avoid or minimize centrifugal force. He speaks merely, and vaguely, of "rotating the mold in a multiplicity of planes * * *." In significant contrast, the Italian Delacoste Patent, No. 440,295 of October 9, 1948 (which is claimed by plaintiff, and hereinafter found by this court, to anticipate Molitor) carefully specifies that the mold must oscillate "gently;" gives a specific speed of "uniform or cadenced" rotation in "the order of 10 revolutions per minute;" and prescribes the clear, and usually proper, procedure of rotation "around two axes preferably at right angles," a subject (among other pertinent ones) on which Molitor is also silent.

To move on now from Peters and Powell, the undisputed facts show an array of patents and other references over the years for the rotational casting of various materials capable of moving from liquid to solid form. Among the substances for which this casting technique was well known, in addition to various metals and plastics, were chocolate, wax, and, as [12] mentioned above, latex.

---

[5] Defendant puts heavy reliance upon its expert, urging that the force, learning, and "credibility" of his testimony should weigh heavily against plaintiff's efforts to defeat the patent in suit. Unfortunately for defendant, while its expert did not appear to depart from literal "truth" about concrete matters of fact, his ostensibly learned "opinions" were not impressive. He found himself in general incapable of learning anything useful from patents and other references invoked against Molitor. On the other hand, where Molitor's patent is obscure or silent, he was able to fill the gaps or dispel the clouds by easy reference to "common sense" or general knowledge. The example at this point in the text is by no means the most vivid, as subsequent discussion will show. It is notable, nevertheless, that a highly trained natural scientist should have found it a mark of "invention" to perceive that a technique usable for flowable materials which harden when heat is withdrawn could be transposed to liquids which harden when heat is added.

While plaintiff's expert was on the whole more helpful, he exhibited similar qualities of partisanship. Supporting the view that Delacoste anticipated Molitor, he professed a frequent inability to find meaning in the latter while the former struck him as pellucid in all vital respects.

[6] The fact that latex had been rotationally cast before Molitor is, like so much else, undisputed. In the court's view, there is no need to tarry, therefore, over one reference plaintiff offered and defendant opposed for lack of proper notice. The simplest course in the circumstances is readily justified, and the court follows it. Plaintiff's Exhibit 381, the Kay Patent, is excluded.

The evidence showed that rotational casting is a more elaborate and delicate process for latex than it is for plastisols because (1) water must be removed from the latex in casting and (2) full curing must be accomplished as a later, separate step. The utility of this point to defendant is at best debatable. It would seem to show that the ancient casting technique was more readily and simply adaptable to plastisols than to an earlier plastic that solidifies with heat.

If no more had been shown than the old age and wide application of rotational casting as a technique, plus the known and predictable qualities of plastisols, this might well have been enough to defeat Molitor's patent. Cf. Jungersen v. Ostby & Barton Co., 335 U.S. 560, 69 S. Ct. 269, 93 L. Ed. 235 (1949); Ruben Condenser Co. v. Aerovox Corporation, 77 F.2d 266 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 296 U.S. 623, 56 S. Ct. 145, 80 L. Ed. 443 (1935); Pierce v. Muehleisen, 226 F.2d 200 (9th Cir. 1955); Monaplastics, Inc., v. Caldor, Inc., 378 F.2d 20 (2d Cir. 1967). The defendant, confusing the question of novelty with the separate and additional test of obviousness, see Graham v. John Deere Co., 383 U.S. 1, 24, 86 S. Ct. 684, 15 [*490] L. Ed. 2d 545 (1966); United States v. Adams, 383 U.S. 39, 48, 86 S. Ct. 708, 15 L. Ed. 2d 572 (1966), argues insistently that Molitor must be deemed to have invented something because "it did not occur" to anyone before him to apply the ancient procedure to plastisols. Apart from the fact that the argument is misconceived, it is erroneous in fact. It occurred to several people, as reflected in both published and unpublished accounts, [13] to adapt the old technique to the obviously workable new material. Before recounting those instances, however, some pertinent facts about plastisols should be recorded.

As has been mentioned, Molitor claims no invention with respect to the composition, formulation, or properties of plastisols. [7] This form of plastic material first came into use on any substantial scale in Europe, primarily Germany, during World War II. In the late years of that war, work and experimentation with plastisols was carried on in England, Italy, and, somewhat later, the United States. It was around 1946 and 1947 before plastisols achieved any substantial attention, even among companies which were to become important manufacturers of the component materials, in this country. Through the years until 1950, it remained in relatively short supply and was a high-cost material as compared with rubber, which [379] was largely interchangeable for many uses. These factors of supply and price served to retard in some degree experimentation with new fabrication techniques and investment in new equipment for the manufacture of plastisol articles. And rotational casting equipment was relatively expensive in comparison [14] with the apparatus needed for other casting techniques.

Notwithstanding such temporary inhibitions, the basic properties and utility of plastisols were well known, as defendant concedes, before Molitor's claimed invention. It was commonly known that heat in the range of 180-200 degrees F. causes a plastisol [15] to "gel" - to form the "cheesy mass" mentioned earlier. It was similarly familiar that at varying temperatures in the range (usually) of 300-350 degrees, the plastisol would "fuse," the fusion temperature depending upon the particular formulation and being lower than the foregoing range for some variants. It was likewise known that a molded article had to be cooled below fusion temperature before removal from the mold to insure fixation and retention of its tensile strength.

Before the 1950's various molding techniques other than rotational casting had been adapted from their uses for other materials and were widely employed for manufacturing things from plastisols. Among these, one which has been much discussed in this case is "slush casting," a process as least as old as the work of the ancient Greeks in bronze. As transposed for use with plastisols, this process (in its most familiar variation) consists in (1) filling an open mold with plastisol, (2) heating to "gel" temperature so that a gelled layer forms around the inner surface of the mold, (3) pouring off the ungelled contents, (4) subjecting the mold to further heat sufficient to achieve fusion of the gelled layer, and, [16] finally, (5) cooling so that the finished article may be removed from the mold.

A variation on the slush casting procedure made possible the manufacture of completely enclosed hollow objects. In this variation, each portion of a twosection mold would be brought to the gel [*491] stage following step "(3)" in the preceding paragraph; the two sections would then be clamped together to join the gelled walls before the whole mold was subjected to further heat for fusion, cooling, and removal of the finished article.

In still another version, perfected and known to others before Molitor, a mold with an aperture would be brought to an early, but still somewhat flowable, gel stage, most of the excess poured off, and the mold then inverted with its opening rested on a plate, allowing the gelled wall to flow and extend before fusion across the final enclosure formed by the plate. This procedure, like the clamping of the mold sections described above, was used to create completely enclosed hollow objects.

---

[7] During the early stages of his sojourn through the Patent Office - from June 27, 1950, to February 24, 1953, during which period his original claims were all stricken and entirely rewritten - Molitor asserted he "was the first to apply the deaerating step to vinyl chlorides used in the molding of hollow articles." This assertion survives vestigially in Molitor's specifications, when he says (col. 3, lines 24-26): "The final mixing of the casting batch under vacuum is an important and essential step in the process." It is now conceded, however, under the compulsion of overwhelming evidence, that the "essential" step of deaeration was common knowledge well before Molitor among those working with plastisols.

The three preceding paragraphs sketch very briefly some versions of a plastisol molding technique known and used in the art before 1948. Given that state of affairs and the wide [17] familiarity with rotational casting as a generally usable process, it was at most a matter of brief time before people of ordinary skill came to combine these patently marriageable elements for making things from plastisols. Indeed, the alleged inventor, Molitor, in rare instances of insight and entire candor on the witness stand, twice described his achievement as "getting the jump" on the industry. This was no case of a HN2[] need long felt and long unsatisfied despite vain quests - leaving aside that this would be a "secondary consideration" in any event. Graham v. John Deere Co., supra, 383 U.S. at 17-18, 86 S. Ct. 684; Greening Nursery Co. v. J and R Tool and Mfg. Co., 376 F.2d 738, 742 (8th Cir. 1967). It was at best a successful sprint to a complaisant Patent Office, resulting in monopolization of a development that was visible and certain to be recognized in short order by anyone interested and reasonably skilled in the art. See Ruben Condenser Co. v. Aerovox Corp., supra, 77 F.2d at 268; Himmel Bros. Co. v. Serrick Corporation, 122 F.2d 740, 746 (7th Cir. 1941); Pierce v. American Communications Company, 169 F. Supp. 351, 355 (D.Mass.1958), aff'd, 280 F.2d 278 (1st Cir.), cert. [18] denied, 364 U.S. 902, 81 S. Ct. 235, 5 L. Ed. 2d 195 (1960). To deny patentability in such a case is merely to recognize that HN3[] Congress is not empowered, and has never reflected a disposition, to "authorize the issuance of patents whose effects are to remove existent knowledge from the public domain, or to restrict free access to materials already available." Graham v. John Deere Co., supra, 383 U.S. at 6, 86 S. Ct. at 688, 15 L. Ed. 2d 545.

This conclusion is not subject to the constant worry that lay judges will substitute uncritical hindsight for a legitimate judgment of what would have been "obvious" from the vantage point of the pertinent time and place. For, contrary to defendant's assertions, others than Molitor arrived at his "invention" before him or around the same time, and wholly independently of his efforts. [380]

a. American Anode, Incorporated, engaged in formulating and selling plastisols (among other materials) rather than manufacturing goods from them, experimented over the years with various molding techniques and other modes of use to increase the sales of its products. Personnel of this Company developed, publicized, made no secret of (and made no attempt to patent) [19] the process of Molitor's patent over a year before the filing of Molitor's application on June 27, 1950. The oral deposition testimony supporting this finding is somewhat vague and unsatisfying when considered by itself. But the testimony does not stand alone. It is powerfully corroborated by unquestioned documentary evidence, an American Anode bulletin of July 1949 clearly and succinctly describing the technique Molitor purports to have invented. [8] [*492] Though less wordy than Molitor, this bulletin tersely taught everything Molitor claimed. Describing one among several molding procedures (including the technique of slush molding sketched above), it outlined the steps for rotational casting as follows (P. Ex. 33, p. 3):

> "1. Pour a premeasured amount of Ameran Resin Paste (plastisol) into the mold.
>
> "2. Rotate the mold to distribute the paste uniformly over all contact areas of the mold cavity. Provisions should be made for a heating chamber or oven in which the mold may be rotated, preferably at temperatures of 350 degrees F. Exposure for 20-40 minutes during rotation will completely fuse the plastisol.
>
> "3. Allow mold to cool (if desired, the mold may [20] be cooled rapidly in cold water). Remove product from mold."

---

[8] It makes no difference for the question of obviousness treated here that the bulletin failed by a narrow margin to precede Molitor's application by more than a year, and thus presented no bar under 35 U.S.C. § 102(b). It should be observed in this connection, however, that plaintiff has urged the assignment to Molitor of some filing date later than June 27, 1950, the contention being that the initial application was not "effective" because of certain omissions and later amendments. There is no need, all things considered, to dwell upon this argument by plaintiff beyond recording that the court has rejected it.

Defendant makes no serious attempt to question that this covered fully what Molitor undertook to patent. [9] The document leaves no doubt that it reflects work preceding its publication date, as the oral testimony affirmed. Its brief, casual, informal disclosure for all the world is strong evidence that the process should be held to have been obvious for those skilled in the art.

[21] b. Properly invoked by plaintiff on a variety of grounds, the Italian Delacoste patent, No. 440,295, applied for on December 11, 1947, and granted October 9, 1948, adds further support to the argument of obviousness. Since this patent is more fully considered below in holding that it anticipates Molitor, it is sufficient merely to note its pertinence here as well. Cf. Felburn v. New York Central Railroad Company, 350 F.2d 416, 424-425 (6th Cir. 1965), cert. denied, 383 U.S. 935, 86 S. Ct. 1063, 15 L. Ed. 2d 852 (1966); Helene Curtis Industries v. Sales Affiliates, 233 F.2d 148, 154-155 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 352 U.S. 879, 77 S. Ct. 101, 1 L. Ed. 2d 80 (1956); Himmel Bros. Co. v. Serrick Corporation, supra, 122 F.2d at 745.

c. The evidence shows, and the court finds, that several other companies and people perceived the availability of rotational casting as a procedure for manufacturing plastisols before Molitor did or at about the same time, all independently of his efforts, which were kept secret until at least 1950. It was known to a Canadian company, Reliable Toy, at least as early as 1948. It was likewise known to a New York company, Ideal Toy, at about the same time. [22] It was being employed experimentally in plaintiff's laboratory in 1949 although the necessary equipment to make it effective there for commercial production was not installed until several years after that.

While these HN4[] efforts may have matured later than Molitor's, this fact is scarcely decisive on the question of obviousness. What the court finds compelling is the inference that Molitor's was in no sense a unique perception - that others all around him were arriving at, or verging upon, the simple combination of familiar things he undertook to patent.

It is pertinent, too, that the experimental character of work other than Molitor's is at most an equivocal item in his favor. The evidence demonstrates that what he taught (and failed to teach) would have left a need for considerable experimentation by anyone [381] seeking to use his teachings. He purported to emphasize, for example, the benefit of uniform wall thickness. But the evidence shows that he was himself unable to achieve this desideratum with any but [*493] the simplest of molds. [10] He spoke vaguely of rotating in a "multiplicity of planes," but his own testimony shows that experiments would be necessary with particular [23] molds to achieve the kinds of rotation that might approach desirable distribution. And so, for example, when a consultant for Reliable Toy in Canada said in 1948 that rotational casting was "difficult" though feasible, he announced little, if anything, less than Molitor later purported to teach. [11]

d. An interesting chapter in the evidence on obviousness is the deposition testimony of Frank Stefanski, described by defendant as [24] one who "consistently and repeatedly told a straightforward story of his experimental and developmental work in the rotational casting of vinyl plastisol." Plaintiff contends in this frequently bitter lawsuit that defendant "got to" Stefanski and caused him to lie. However that may be, the court finds it sufficient to accept what Stefanski said, because it represents, as it stands, additional support for plaintiff's assertion of obviousness.

At least as early as 1947 or 1948, using primitive equipment in the basement of his home, Stefanski proceeded to do what Molitor later patented, but with one assertedly fatal imperfection: the sections of his molds did not fit together perfectly so that, as defendant describes his plight, "he got leakage from the mold before the material

---

[9] Defendant's expert made some quibbling efforts (Tr. 4131 et seq.) to show teachings in Molitor assertedly absent from (or inferior in) the American Anode bulletin. The net of his suggestions is to reenforce plaintiff's thesis that the bulletin amply covered the same thing in every pertinent respect.

[10] A "Mickey Mouse" was a central character in the trial and is pictured on Molitor's patent with the much extolled and discussed "uniform wall." Samples of this figure made in defendant's plant by Molitor's process were also in evidence. They had distinctly non-uniform walls. Molitor's quaint explanation was that a uniform wall was not really wanted for the actual toy.

[11] Pressed repeatedly to specify what Molitor taught that was new, defendant's expert came finally to say that Molitor's achievement lay in his proclaiming that rotational casting of plastisols was "possible."

gelled." (Trial Brief of Defendant, p. 199.) Confronting that disaster, this "straightforward" witness said, he despaired and gave up rotational casting. Thirty or so pages after the last-cited reference, meeting an attack by plaintiff upon the adequacy of Molitor's teachings, defendant writes (id., p. 231): "It doesn't take much perception to observe that the liquid material would leak out if it were not a [25] completely closed mold."

It is enough to say of Stefanski that his rudimentary efforts as early as 1947 help to buttress plaintiff's demonstration that Molitor's patent is invalid because HN5[] "the subject matter as a whole would have been obvious at the time the invention was made to a person having ordinary skill in the art * * *." 35 U.S.C. § 103.

Defendant's extensive efforts to show novelty and nonobviousness in Molitor's patent serve in the end to help vindicate plaintiff's contrary view. Characteristically, both in its brief and in its expert testimony, defendant tends to recite the whole of Molitor's claims to support its position on this subject. Responding, however, to the pressure to focus somewhere, defendant comes finally to the assertion that Molitor was new, original, and nonobvious because he hit upon and taught "a continuous casting process utilizing only a single temperature" - the high fusing temperature to carry the material all the way from liquid through gelation to fusion. [12] Before Molitor, the argument runs, people had gelled the plastisol at a lower temperature, around 200 degrees F., then fused it, in a second step, at the higher temperature. Defendant's [26] expert said he would have been surprised to the point of incredulity to hear that the job could be done in Molitor's continuous way in a single heating step at the high temperature. And so this emerges in the end as an assertedly critical point, iterated over and over again in defendant's post-trial briefs.

But the argument is a clearly baseless afterthought for a variety of reasons.

[*494] To begin with, the text of the patent itself is inconsistent with this newly contrived theory. In each of the four claims, gelling and fusion are described as separate heating steps. Claim 1 teaches that the mold should be rotated,

> "heating the layer to gel it against the inner surface of the mold while the mold is rotating, then applying additional heat to the closed mold to raise the temperature thereof sufficiently to fuse the gelled layer * * *." [382]

Similarly, Claim 2 describes gelling, and then prescribes "further heating * * * to fuse the gelled layer * [27] * *." The two remaining claims are to the same effect. The file wrapper history shows that these references to "further" and "additional" heating were specifically and deliberately added to the final revisions toward the end of the application's tortuous journey through the Patent Office.

If the singular product of Molitor's genius was the single heat at fusion temperature for the whole process, this was a remarkably unsuitable way to teach it.

Further demonstrating the recency of defendant's insight on this subject is its inconsistency with what defendant taught the Sixth Circuit almost ten years ago in the submissions leading to the favorable decision for the patent in that Court. National Latex Products Co. v. Sun Rubber Company, 274 F.2d 224 (1959), cert. denied, 362 U.S. 989, 80 S. Ct. 1078, 4 L. Ed. 2d 1022 (1960), a decision of major interest discussed at length hereafter. In its successful brief on that appeal, defendant enumerated the several steps of Molitor, and included (p. 5):

> "4. heating the layer to gel it against the inner surface of the mold while the mold is rotating,
>
> "5. then applying additional heat to the closed mold to raise the temperature [28] thereof sufficiently to fuse the gelled layer against the inner surface of the mold * * *."

The opinion of the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals reflects that description.

Of course, the obvious advantage of rotational casting - as against slush casting, for example - is that the process can be continuous from the time the mold is closed until the finished object is removed. But this, for reasons already reviewed, was not a novel or nonobvious discovery. The focus here is on the particular point defendant has chosen now to stress - the single high temperature throughout. What has been said thus far is that this has only become in this lawsuit a supposed matter of particular consequence. It was never isolated or emphasized - but actually contradicted - in the terms of the patent and its previous defense. Cf. Graham v. John Deere Co., supra, 383 U.S. at 25, 86 S. Ct. 684, 15 L. Ed. 2d 545.

[12] Trial Brief of Defendant, p. 15.

Furthermore, the point is trivial. It is not to be supposed that defendant would concede noninfringement if the rotating mold passed through two heating chambers - one at gelling temperature, a second at the higher fusion temperature - during the continuous molding process. [13] Indeed, the [29] testimony made clear the common practice in this art, as in others, of using hanger conveyors for moving molds along through the stages of the casting process.

Finally, if Molitor had claimed some invention in this respect, the claim would lack substance. The evidence shows that it was known in the art that a mold could be exposed to the high fusion temperature to achieve the earlier (gelation) stage as well as the later condition of fusion. It is sufficient here to refer to the American Anode bulletin of July 1949, quoted earlier, which described the procedure of rotational casting and plainly contemplated (unlike Molitor) handling of the whole business in a [*495] single heating chamber at a single high temperature - namely, "preferably at temperatures of 350 degrees F."

The subject of temperature is the [30] closest defendant comes to suggesting anything nonobvious about Molitor. The suggestion must be rejected.

To conclude on the issue of obviousness, it may merit reemphasis that this barrier in § 103 commonly blocks patentability in cases where nobody has arrived independently at the result claimed by the alleged invention - and even in the face of evidence, absent here, of a need long recognized but unsatisfied. The evidence that has been canvassed of work by others serves more clearly to demonstrate the obviousness plaintiff asserts.

2. Anticipation by Delacoste Italian Patent No. 440,295

We focus more closely here upon an item noted under the preceding heading. The court holds that in light of the Italian Delacoste patent of October 9, 1948, Molitor's patent is invalid on the separate and independent HN6[] ground that

> "the invention was patented or described in a printed publication in * * * a foreign country * * * more than one year prior to the date of the application for patent in the United States * * *." 35 U.S.C. § 102(b).

The Delacoste patent, which was not cited in the Patent Office, reads in directly pertinent part as follows:

> "This invention relates [31] to a process of manufacturing hollow molded objects of natural or synthetic resin, weldless, seamless and practically without a gap * * *, as well as to a large variety of hollow molded [383] objects which can be obtained by this process.
> "According to this invention, the process consists primarily in depositing in a mold, completely closed but demountable to permit extraction of the manufactured object, an amount of natural or synthetic resin necessary to obtain by deposit on the inside surface of the mold the desired wall thickness. Said resin is mixed with a plasticizer * * *. Thereafter it is heated, letting the mold oscillate gently so that the resin deposits itself uniformly on the entire surface, and the operation is prolonged until the gel has solidified (becomes firm) * * *, whereupon the mold is opened and the manufactured object is removed.
> "Thus, for example, to produce a seamless hollow object of polyvinyl resin, said resin may be kept in suspension in a suitable plasticizer * * *.

[13] Compare the converse argument of plaintiff, considered and dismissed later on, that there is no infringement because plaintiff uses a single heating step while Molitor must be read to teach two.

"The amount of resin with its desired plasticizer is placed into the mold, the latter being closed and heated and the operations continue as indicated above. The heating of the mold can be brought [32] about by projection of Steam, by immersion in a hot (warm [14] liquid, electrically, electromagnetically, or by any other means.
* * *

"Whatever may be the resin used for obtaining the deposit on the surface of the mold of a uniform product layer, it is necessary to have the mold utilized oscillate in a methodical, slow and regular manner. Thus, in accordance with one of the characteristics of the invention, excellent results are [*496] obtained by using a mold capable of revolving in a uniform or cadenced way, at a speed which can be of the order of 10 revolutions per minute, around two axes preferably at right angles (orthogonal).
"The mold, for example, may be carried by an oscillating arm pivoted around its axis, which arm is caused to rotate around an axis perpendicular or not to the preceding one.

"One observes that the process for obtaining hollow objects or bodies without joints, by a deposit on the inside surface of a closed mold has already been suggested for other uses, and that the invention is limited to the particular and new application of this process for the purpose of obtaining objects of natural or synthetic resin capable of forming a gel or thermo-hardening. [33] This invention concerns itself also with new industrial products, hollow objects, of a regular thickness and without seams, made of natural or synthetic resin, which could not be produced heretofore.
"CLAIMS
"1. The process of manufacturing hollow objects substantially closed and without seams, by a deposit of a fluid or meltable and hardening substance on the inside surface of a closed, rotatory mold, consisting in depositing in the mold the desired amount of natural or synthetic resin, to obtain on the mold a layer of convenient thickness, to which is added if required a hardening agent, by causing the mold to rotate gently in every (any) direction in order to obtain a uniform layer of resin on the entire inside surface of the mold, by heating to transform the layer of resin into gel, thereafter opening the mold and withdrawing the hollow object thus produced."

[34] To state the court's conclusion broadly, everything Molitor purported to teach is found in the foregoing patent; the arguments of defendant for a contrary view are without merit.

a. Defendant's most insistent point - stressed in the briefs, elaborated in the testimony of defendant's expert, and deemed critical in the decision of the Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, National Latex Products Co. v. Sun Rubber Company, supra - is that Delacoste failed to reach the target because he wrote only of causing the material to "gel," omitted the further need to fuse and cool, and so taught a futility. Delacoste not only failed to mention "fusing" and "cooling," say defendant and its expert, but he mentioned "projection of steam" among the several heating means he suggested; this must be read to show a temperature not greater than 212 degrees F.; and so, the argument concludes, Delacoste obviously fell [384] short of fusing and cooling the object. Whatever might have been thought of these contentions on the Sixth Circuit's smaller and different record, they are exposed as frivolous on the record before this court.

If Delacoste is read with a view to learning from him - which is the assumed [35] stance of one with ordinary skill viewing the prior art, cf. Western States Mach. Co. v. S. S. Hepworth Co., 147 F.2d 345, 350 (2d Cir.), cert denied, 325 U.S. 873, 65 S. Ct. 1414, 89 L. Ed. 1991 (1945); Application of Hooker, 175 F.2d 558, 562, 36 C.C.P.A. 1164 (1949); Pickering v. McCullough, 104 U.S. 310, 319, 26 L. Ed. 749 (1881) - it is perfectly clear that he did not mean to have the process stopped at the "gel" stage as the quoted word is currently used [15] - i.e., that he did not mean for the user to open the mold and be rewarded with only the drooling of a useless "cheesy mass" to be discarded as waste. He announced that the goal of his process was a "manufactured [*497] object;" that the operation should be prolonged "until the gel has [solidified] * * *, whereupon the mold is opened and the manufactured object is removed." He stated repeatedly that the last step was the opening of the mold "and withdrawing the hollow object thus produced." Defendant concedes the common understanding that plastisols had to be fused and cooled (at known temperatures) before they could be withdrawn from their molds (in any casting process) as "manufactured objects." Only a persevering [36] desire to fail, or ignorance of what everyone knew, could have led to reading Delacoste as defendant insists he must be read.

---

[14] The parenthetical word, here as elsewhere in the quoted portions of the Italian patent, represents an alternative translation of the original Italian - in this instance, the word "caldo." It is conceivable that daring lawyers or judges, recalling encounters with Italian sinks or Italian colleagues or Italian-English dictionaries, might deem it knowable without more that the word "caldo" may mean either "hot" or "warm" depending upon the context. The defendant, however, announced early in the trial a disposition to mount intensive attacks upon this word in the Italian patent. Plaintiff produced a distinguished expert in the Italian language to cope with this problem. The upshot of this effort is a finding that the Italian word "caldo" may mean either "hot" or "warm" depending upon the context.

The expert upon whose persuasiveness defendant puts heavy weight came slowly and grudgingly to this conclusion. He acknowledged, finally, that reading Delacoste in 1948, and knowing what was familiar to those skilled in the art about fusion and cooling, he would have carried Delacoste's teachings through these stages. He conceded, too, that Delacoste mentioned heating means clearly adequate for achieving the necessary temperatures.

After his concessions had been made, defendant's expert clung to an insistence [37] that Delacoste was inferior to Molitor because only the latter taught that the whole procedure could be conducted at the single (fusion) temperature of over 300 degrees F. The character of this point as a recently contrived, trivial, misleading irrelevancy has been treated earlier at more than sufficient length.

b. It is also asserted that Delacoste could not be read to disclose what Molitor later taught because the Italian patent covers a broad range of materials, both workable and unworkable, and fails to focus with clear and exclusive precision upon "plastisols." Molitor, it is argued, displays the virtue of such a clear reference.

It is true that Delacoste covers many things more than plastisols. But his references clearly cover plastisols, as anyone in the art concerned with them would have seen promptly. On the other hand, it is not true that Molitor achieves the asserted clarity on this subject. To begin with, "plastisol" was a familiar and sufficient word to describe a "plastisol" when Molitor made his alleged invention. But Molitor's patent never uses the word. Secondly, the phrase he does use - "a liquid mixture of a vinyl resin and a plasticizer therefor" - is neither [38] exclusive of other things nor an apt way of saying "plastisol." Among his possibly inadvertent concessions on cross, defendant's expert was brought to admit that Molitor's language was not well suited to describing a "plastisol." He acknowledged that the words could also refer to an "organosol," obviously unsatisfactory for rotational casting. The evidence shows, in short, that anyone bent on learning nothing from Molitor (as the defense was with respect to Delacoste) could find that he described in his general words an array of other materials unsuited to the process.

To rescue Molitor from this fate, the defense expert observed, fairly enough, that he would have brought to the patent his "common sense," his appreciation of the context, his learning about plastisols, and his interest as one skilled in the art to discover practical benefits from what was being taught. But this entirely reasonable approach gives up the ghost of the theory that nothing good could have been found in Delacoste. The record makes clear that defendant's expert, like other interested persons with ordinary skill in the art, would have perceived the utility and workability in Delacoste (and Delacoste's entirely [39] ample reference to plastisols) no less than in Molitor.

Indeed, while it is not strictly essential, it bears some emphasis that Delacoste's teachings were plainly superior to Molitor's in relevant respects. Delacoste [385] defined precisely the mode and speed of rotation. While defendant's expert recognized the absence of any such teaching in Molitor, he said he would have been able to supply it by again invoking his "common sense." And defense counsel - supporting an invention he repeatedly [*498] epitomizes as "rotational casting" - came finally to the sound view that there was no need for Molitor to tell how to rotate because "the art will tell you that" (Tr. 4261).

---

[15] The record shows that when Delacoste obtained his patent, it was common, especially in Europe (including England), to use the word "gel" ambiguously, tending to bracket under it the stages now separately identified as gelation and fusion. Defendant's expert tardily conceded this. But defendant's views on the subject lack substance even apart from this pertinent item of linguistics.

Defendant formulates in various ways its attacks upon the adequacy of Delacoste's teachings. But they come in the end to the thoughts that have been discussed above. Underlying these thoughts are some legal premises on which a few words should be said. It is urged, for one thing, that foreign patents like Delacoste's should be "strictly construed." There is support in the books for this. See, e.g., National Latex Products Co. v. Sun Rubber Company, supra, 274 F.2d at 236; Adler Enterprises, Inc. v. Carson, Pirie, [40] Scott & Co., 218 F. Supp. 325, 330 (N.D.Ill.1963); Eversharp, Inc. v. Fisher Pen Co., 204 F. Supp. 649, 659 (N.D.Ill.1961). There is a good deal of weighty sentiment to the contrary. See, e.g., Dewey & Almy Chemical Co. v. Mimex Co., 124 F.2d 986, 989-990 (2d Cir. 1942); Trussell Mfg. Co. v. Wilson-Jones Co., 50 F.2d 1027, 1029 (2d Cir. 1931); Application of Moreton, 288 F.2d 708, 711, 48 C.C.P.A. 875 (1961). If it were necessary for this lower court to come down hard on the subject, the latter view would be followed. Where the essential inquiry is whether the subject was adequately and publicly taught over a year before the United States application - and noting that the statutory bar in 35 U.S.C. § 102(b) applies no less to foreign "publications" than to patents - there is no good reason in our time of international business to extend patent monopolies here by artificial excisions from foreign contributions. Cf. Greiser v. Brenner, 253 F. Supp. 906, 909 (D.D.C. 1966).

In any event, even "strict construction" does not entail the obstinate failure of comprehension urged by defendant and its expert. Reading Delacoste only with the understanding of those modestly skilled in the [41] art, it anticipates Molitor.

Defendant has seemed sometimes to suggest (although defense counsel has explicitly and correctly disclaimed the suggestion) that Delacoste fails to anticipate because its HN7[] vagueness and excessive breadth would not have met United States standards of patentability. In the circumstances, it is sufficient to note that this is not the test under § 102(b). Cf. American Infra-Red Radiant Co. v. Lambert Industries, Inc., 360 F.2d 977 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 385 U.S. 920, 87 S. Ct. 233, 17 L. Ed. 2d 144 (1966).

3. The Sixth Circuit decision and defendant's fabrications as to date of conception.

Already mentioned more than once, defendant's victory of almost a decade ago in the Sixth Circuit, National Latex Products Co. v. Sun Rubber Company, supra, has been a central subject in this lawsuit. That decision by a divided court (McAllister, J., dissenting) affirmed in all presently material respects the views of Chief Judge Jones in the District Court for the Northern District of Ohio, 159 F. Supp. 661 (1958). In this court, defendant has urged at length the heavy weight of those judgments and the burdensome anomaly of having a later decision invalidate [42] a patent upheld so long ago.

Somewhat more unusual is plaintiff's effort to employ that unfavorable precedent as an independent and affirmative ground for denying enforceability of the patent. Plaintiff's thesis is that defendant perjuriously misled the Sixth Circuit in material respects, that the same false evidence has infected this court's record, and that defendant is precluded as a result from seeking enforcement of the patent here. For reasons now to be stated, plaintiff prevails on this aspect of the case.

a. Grounds for departure from the Sixth Circuit's decision

The principles governing this aspect of our problem are familiar. HN8[] The decision on patent validity of another federal court, especially a higher one, is entitled to great weight, as defendant says. See Georgia-Pacific Corp. v. United States Plywood Corp., 258 F.2d 124, 133 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 884, [*499] 79 S. Ct. 124, 3 L. Ed. 2d 112 (1958); Cold Metal Process Company v. Republic Steel Corp., 233 F.2d 828, 837 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 352 U.S. 891, 77 S. Ct. 128, 1 L. Ed. 2d 86 (1956); Novadel-Agene Corporation v. Penn, 119 F.2d 764, 766 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 314 U.S. 645, 62 S. Ct. [43] 85, 86 L. Ed. 517 (1941). But it is not binding. See, e.g., Jungersen v. Baden, 69 F. Supp. 922 (S.D.N.Y.1947), aff'd, 166 F.2d 807 (2d Cir. 1948), aff'd, sub nom. Jungersen v. Ostby & Barton Co., 335 U.S. 560, 69 S. Ct. 269, 93 L. Ed. 235 (1949); Stanley Works v. Rockwell Mfg. [386] Co., 203 F.2d 846, 848 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 346 U.S. 818, 74 S. Ct. 30, 98 L. Ed. 345 (1953). Where, as in this case, the record leads compellingly to a different conclusion, the second court is forced, with all respect, to render a conflicting judgment. It is of importance, however, to state the grounds on which it appears to this court that the Sixth Circuit was led into error.

(1) For reasons already stated, this court has found that the Italian Delacoste patent anticipated Molitor's. Apart from the doctrine of strict construction applied by the Sixth Circuit to Delacoste (see 274 F.2d at 236), [16] that Court seems to have erred in material respects on this question. It singled out as a critical omission from Delacoste and an "essential and non-obvious step" in Molitor "the temperature change necessary to accomplish the transition of the material from gel to fusion." Id. at 235. Repeatedly emphasizing [44] this "all-essential feature" (ibid.), the Court said "Delacoste teaches gelling and not fusion." Id. at 236. In the present case, however, to go no farther than the concessions of defendant's present expert, it is perfectly clear that anyone skilled in the art would have read and used Delacoste to bring the "manufactured object" to the point of fusion, followed by cooling.

(2) The Sixth Circuit appears to have been led to an excessively expansive view of what Molitor accomplished. It observed (though he seems not to claim) that he created "a new product" (id. at 239). It seemed to credit him with evolving the slush molding of plastisols (see [45] id. at 240), though he acknowledges here that this was no part of his achievement.

(3) The Sixth Circuit was impressed by the "enormous commercial success" of Molitor's invention. Id. at 238. On the evidence here, it is difficult to perceive the basis for that characterization. Defendant has shown, to be sure, that its own plant produced some millions of "pieces" by the Molitor process in the 1950's. How "successful" or profitable this was is another question, largely unanswered, though it is perhaps relevant that defendant in 1958 (five years after Molitor's patent) was undergoing a Chapter XI reorganization when the Sixth Circuit opinion was written and for some time thereafter. As to more objective measures of patent success, defendant's case is notably unimpressive. Up to the time of the Sixth Circuit decision, defendant had acquired exactly one domestic licensee, and that a most equivocal one. The single licensee, B. F. Goodrich, was in the business of supplying materials for plastisols. At the time Goodrich took a license, at a modest price, defendant contracted to purchase for a year 75% of its resins from Goodrich, agreed to promote Goodrich resins with other licensees, [46] and thus made commercially attractive this means of ostensible tribute despite the view of Goodrich's counsel that the Molitor patent was not a valid one.

(4) Perhaps the most significant point of all diminishing for this court the weight of the Sixth Circuit's decision is the overwhelming demonstration by the plaintiff here that the Sixth Circuit's record, like the one now under consideration, [*500] was blighted by perjury in significant respects.

In the Ohio Court, as here, Sun placed Molitor's date of invention at April 10, 1948. Central to that obviously material proposition was an oddly scattered series of a few so-called "progress reports" by Molitor ranging from early April 1948 to February 1, 1949, with huge and suspicious gaps in the series. [17] For a long time, until the midst of the trial here, defendant was able to produce only copies of the papers that were before the Sixth Circuit. Employing both the copies and the ones belatedly produced - and pursuing a course of tenacious cross-examination - plaintiff was able to prove overwhelmingly the falsity of defense testimony about them and the falsity of the inference urged from them (and accepted by the Sixth Circuit) [47] that Molitor made his invention in early April of 1948. [18]

---

[16] A doctrine which appears, incidentally, to have had less standing in the same Circuit both before and since the decision in Sun's favor. See Allied Wheel Products v. Rude, 206 F.2d 752, 759-760 (6th Cir. 1953); Monroe Auto Equipment Co. v. Heckethorn Mfg. & Sup. Co., 332 F.2d 406, 413 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 888, 85 S. Ct. 160, 13 L. Ed. 2d 93 (1964).

[17] Testimony for the defense was that Molitor was to make such reports weekly at first, later monthly. But the gaps are much larger than weeks or months. A defense witness suggested the explanation that Molitor was engrossed in his work, impatient over writing things down. Yet one of the longest of the few documents ascribed to him was shown to have been copied to a large extent from publicly available writings distributed by Goodrich.

[18] For reflections of the importance asscribed to this point and the "progress reports" by the Sixth Circuit, see 274 F.2d at 231, 233, 234. It is unnecessary for our purposes to pinpoint exactly the extent to which the subject was deemed critical by that Court.

[*387] To state the [48] gist of what plaintiff has shown, it is that the reports prior to February 1949 were all concerned in fact with Molitor's work on such old techniques as slush casting, not rotational; that the testimony of defense witnesses attempting to show these papers as records of rotational casting is so clearly false and self-contradictory as to reveal deliberate untruthfulness; and that the efforts in this court to embellish and sustain what was told in Ohio serve only to highlight the falsity of the account in both places. These conclusions rest both upon the inherent incredibility of the testimony (analyzed in relation to the documents) and upon the demeanor of the witnesses. Without attempting to detail exhaustively the factors underlying these ultimate determinations, some important items should be recorded:

(1) The exposure of defendant's fraud as to the time of conception begins with a document which was not before the Sixth Circuit but was turned up toward the end of the present plaintiff's dogged discovery on another (and less fruitful) subject. The document relates to the prosecution of Sun's Canadian application for a patent on Molitor's process in the course of which the Italian [49] Delacoste patent, considered earlier herein, was cited, as it had not been in the United States Patent Office. In the correspondence on this subject, Sun's Akron patent counsel became concerned (unnecessarily as it developed) with the possible materiality of the Italian patent's grant date (October 9, 1948) as against its printing date (July 1949). Inquiring on this subject, Akron counsel wrote to the Canadian attorneys the following letter of November 30, 1956 (P. Ex. 126X):

> "I am in receipt of an Office Action, dated November 23, 1956, in the above entitled case in which the Patent Office cites Italian Patent No. 440,295, which was granted October 9, 1948, but was not printed until July 1949. We have met this patent in connection with certain litigation on the corresponding U.S. patent in this country and are prepared:
>
> > "1. To point out the essential difference between the Delacoste patent and the disclosure in the Molitor application, and
> >
> > "2. To contest the effective date of the patent.
>
> [*501] "In connection with the latter matter, will you please advise me whether under the Canadian Patent Law the date of the grant is taken as the effective date of this patent [50] or the date of the printing. We can carry the date of the Molitor invention back of the printing date, but cannot carry the date of the invention back of the granting date of the Italian patent. In this connection, of course, I will have to be advised whether an earlier invention in the United States can be used in Canada to anticipate a situation of this character."

Thus, over ten years ago, with memories fresher and all the documents more readily available, defendant acknowledged (through counsel who had obtained the United States Patent) that it could not claim a date of invention before October 1948.

Later, in the Ohio lawsuit, it became apparent that a still earlier date of invention might be necessary to defeat claims of prior invention made there. That was the inception of the false testimony about "progress reports" extending back to April 1948 found persuasive in the Sixth Circuit and perpetrated again in this court.

Plaintiff lays great stress, as well it might, upon the fatal admission in the letter of November 30, 1956, recording that the date of invention could not be placed earlier than (or, evidently, as early as) October 1948. On the other hand, defendant's [51] lengthy briefs are devoid of any reference whatever to this key exhibit. There is no attempt to explain the startling contrast between > (1) the acknowledgment closer to the events, by counsel who prosecuted the American patent application, that all the relatively recent information available to him dated the alleged invention after October 1948, and (2) the testimony here - by defendant's president, the inventor, and defendant's chief chemist, all assertedly documented by reading meanings into progress reports - that the significant and memorable achievement had been accomplished in April 1948.

The wholly unexplained contradiction goes far in itself to expose the falsity of the testimony on this subject. But the record further demonstrates this conclusion in other ways.

It is sufficient that it was obviously considered to be material and was offered by Sun, both there and here, to be so considered. See Hazel-Atlas Glass Co. v. Hartford-Empire Co., 322 U.S. 238, 247, 64 S. Ct. 997, 88 L. Ed. 1250 (1944).

(2) Although it is testified that the progress reports, starting in April 1948, announce what was characterized by defendant's president as a major and unforgettable breakthrough to the rotational [388] procedure, there is not a word about "rotation" or "rotating" (or turning or revolving or anything of the kind) in any one of them before February 1, 1949, where the simple and obvious words were used to [52] describe the then new procedure.

(3) The Sixth Circuit found impressive, and particularly noted, Molitor's report of April 20, 1948. The Court also referred to handwritten notes in the margin of this report. See 274 F.2d at 233. Our record - and, really, the report on its face - shows that the report was not about rotational casting at all. The addressee of the report, Mr. Cartlidge, testified on deposition in the present case that it referred to slush casting. At the trial, after consulting with counsel, he changed this testimony. His first account was the truthful one. The marginal notes were made long after the report. The passage deemed significant by the Sixth Circuit refers to "curing * * * under infra red lamps * * * held 4 inches above the mold" to produce a temperature of 450 degrees F. It would be difficult even for a layman to produce a more misleading description of "rotational casting" on a machine with heat sources all around the revolving and rotating arm holding the mold - the picture the testimony would have the court discern in the report. If there were doubt that this is a false picture, it would be ended by the shifting, evasive, and thoroughly [53] incredible efforts of Molitor to sustain defendant's contention on the witness stand.

(4) Molitor testified repeatedly, but not truthfully, that he was creating hollow toy lambs by rotational casting in [*502] April 1948. The evidence shows that he was using a vented lamb mold at that time, unsuited to the claimed process. When he came finally to cast a lamb rotationally, his report of February 1, 1949, said so - for the first time. The report for April 20, 1948, alleged to reflect (though it nowhere mentioned) successful rotational casting of lambs, was amplified by Molitor's testimony that these April efforts produced a number of satisfactory toys by the new process. If the testimony were true, there would be no sense in Molitor's announcement almost a year later, in the February 1, 1949, report, which said: "Using a Rotating Machine developed in our Machine Shop and a lamb mold made of cast aluminum several lambs were cast from the Vinyl Plastisol Paste." [19]

[54] (5) Molitor testified to pouring the plastisol into a cool mold before beginning rotation in April 1948. The contemporaneous document shows loading of the mold at 200 degrees F.

(6) Defendant's president, Smith, undertook to shore up the April 1948 story by recalling a middle-of-the-night telephone call from Molitor (then an $86-perweek employee paid by the hour, and only placed in the higher, salaried category months later) urging excitedly that Smith come from his home to the plant to see a successful sample of a rotationally cast lamb. [20] [55] The call and his response were etched indelibly on his memory, Smith said: "I'll never forget it." So he went, he testified, and saw the lamb. But this vivid recollection was not given to the Ohio court when Smith testified some ten years closer to the alleged event. The story is not true. There were no rotationally cast lambs at the plant in April 1948 at any time of the day or night. [21]

---

[19] Molitor was shown in other respects to have a penchant for misstatements that cannot be deemed inadvertent. He swore, for example, that a machine allegedly used in his 1948 experiments had not been known to him at the time as a "Kaysam machine" (a matter of potential consequence in the case). Confronted with a prior contradiction of this in writing, he retracted it. He swore falsely in the Patent Office to having experience working with plastisols prior to his employment by defendant. Examples could be multiplied, but it is sufficient to note that this alleged inventor was a singularly unimpressive witness whose credibility was not enhanced when he protested that he was "confused," apologized for "[appearing] so stupid," professed modesty about his ability to express himself when his explanations sounded particularly lame, and explained that the supposedly vital "progress reports" did not mean what they appeared simply to say.

[20] The evidence showed that before this nocturnal drama Molitor had little day-to-day contact with the company president, reporting normally to people lower in the hierarchy.

[21] This is not the only specific instance of false testimony by Smith. In an affidavit filed in this court to support a motion resisting in personam jurisdiction over defendant, he stated that Sun's only place of business was in Barberton, Ohio. The statement is now conceded to have been false. But it required an appeal from an order of dismissal to arrive at that concession. Another Smith affidavit denied the existence of a requirements contract with Goodrich. It has since been established that such a contract, negotiated by Smith, did in fact exist. The same affidavit denied, falsely, that defendant had ever licensed any company other than McNeil to make machines for Molitor's process - a denial that concealed a license with another company on

[56] (7) On May 1, 1948, defendant's plant was struck. Molitor - allegedly having made the invention which, according to Smith, opened a whole "new panorama" for the company - went to his home in another state while others stayed close to the plant for the four months of the strike, eagerly discussing rotational casting. This odd detail, in its context, adds to the general aura of incredibility. [389]

[*503] (8) Though defendant retained regular patent counsel, it was over two years after the alleged conception before Molitor's application for a patent was filed.

(9) The Sixth Circuit mentioned Molitor reports of October 5, and December 6, 1948, to show that "on Molitor's orders a number of Mickey Mouse toys were made by a method which employed rotational casting." 274 F.2d at 233. There is nothing in these reports about rotational casting. The testimony purporting to tie them to this process, at least in this court, is untruthful.

b. Legal consequences of defendant's false evidence

Apart from its impact on the weight of the Sixth Circuit's decision as a precedent, the perjury committed in that Court and this one supplies independent grounds for refusing enforcement of defendant's [57] patent against plaintiff. For reasons which have been outlined, this is not a case of isolated mistake or untruthfulness by a single witness. The picture is one of deliberately organized fabrication - with defendant's president, the alleged inventor, and the erstwhile laboratory chief combining to create a story which did not exist for the use of defendant's patent counsel as late as November of 1956.

As has been observed, defendant came here with the Sixth Circuit decision as a major weapon. For this reason alone, the exposure of the infection in that case would seem sufficient to defeat defendant's counterclaim under the closely apposite holding of Keystone Driller Co. v. General Excavator Co., 290 U.S. 240, 54 S. Ct. 146, 78 L. Ed. 293 (1933).

But there is a more direct and immediate basis for the same result. Whatever has happened elsewhere, an extensive pattern of fraud affecting a material issue has been spread and laid bare on this court's record. The counterclaim seeks equitable relief. The familiar principles leading to the conclusion of the preceding paragraph, summarized in the ancient but still profoundly meaningful doctrine of "unclean hands," would apply even [58] if there had never been a similar case in the Sixth Circuit. It is sufficient to defeat the counterclaim that defendant has in this very court transgressed the weighty "public policy against the assertion and enforcement of patent claims infected with fraud and perjury * * *." Precision Instrument Mfg. Co. v. Automotive Maintenance Machinery Co., 324 U.S. 806, 819, 65 S. Ct. 993, 999, 89 L. Ed. 1381 (1945); see also Hazel-Atlas Glass Co. v. Hartford-Empire Co., 322 U.S. 238, 246, 64 S. Ct. 997, 88 L. Ed. 1250 (1944). Unless the courts are to sit as "mute and helpless victims of deception and fraud", HN9[] the kind of "tampering" defendant has undertaken "with the administration of justice" (id. at 246, 64 S. Ct. at 1001) must, at a minimum, close the court's doors against an affirmative claim for equitable relief pressed by such means. Mas v. Coca-Cola Co., 163 F.2d 505 (4th Cir. 1947); Heath v. Frankel, 153 F.2d 369, 370-371 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 328 U.S. 844, 66 S. Ct. 1025, 90 L. Ed. 1618 (1946); cf. Root Refining Co. v. Universal Oil Products Co., 169 F.2d 514, 534-535 (3d Cir. 1948), cert. denied, 335 U.S. 912, 69 S. Ct. 481, 93 L. Ed. 444 (1949); Brantley v. Skeens, 105 U.S.App.D.C. [59] 246, 266 F.2d 447, 452-453 (1959); Brinson v. Brinson, 334 F.2d 155, 159-160, 10 A.L.R.3d 795 (4th Cir. 1964).

4. Plaintiff's remaining contentions as to validity

While plaintiff has prevailed on three separate and independently sufficient grounds for holding the patent unenforceable in this case, both the parties and the appellate court are entitled to a determination at this level of which plaintiff predicates claimed antitrust violations. Other instances, cited by plaintiff, need not be recounted. It is recorded, however, that Smith's manner, his repeated mistakes and bland "correction" of them when they became apparent, and his tendency toward argumentative oratory - in addition to the substance of his inaccuracies - all comprised a chapter of the evidence which has proved hurtful to defendant's case.

---

plaintiff's alternative arguments for the same result. The court's findings and conclusions on these further issues are as follows:

a. Plaintiff argues that Molitor was guilty of "late claiming" in the course of the patent's prosecution, running afoul of the rule in Muncie Gear Works, Inc. v. Outboard Marine & Mfg. Co., 315 U.S. 759, 62 S. Ct. 865, 86 L. Ed. 1171 (1942). The contention is essentially [*504] similar to one considered at some length, and found unmeritorious, in the Sixth Circuit. See 274 F.2d at 230-231. [390] This court agrees with and follows that determination.

b. Plaintiff contends that the patent is invalid both because its teachings are insufficient and because they are excessively broad and vague. This point generates a bit of perplexity in light of plaintiff's [60] successful claim of obviousness. If the court has erred on that issue, there may be substance in this one.

The evidence demonstrates, for example, that mere rotation "in a multiplicity of planes" (as Molitor vaguely described it) is not calculated to give the uniform wall thickness proclaimed by defendant as one of the patent's signal achievements. Molitor himself appears never to have achieved this result except with the simplest of spherical objects. Problems of mold wall thickness and configuration - wholly untouched by Molitor - require special handling beyond mere rotation, and modes of rotation must be experimentally tested if the claimed uniformity is actually to be achieved.

Defendant's answer is that these problems and their solution were all well known in the art, so that the claimed inadequacy of teaching is not a meritorious objection. Similarly, when plaintiff charges a failure to teach the necessity for molds completely sealed, defendant attacks this as silly, overlooking that the earlier work of Frank Stefanski (discussed above) is reported to have fallen short of Molitor for this reason alone.

The court agrees with defendant that Molitor's deficiencies were supplied [61] by the knowledge of those skilled in the art. But this, the court has concluded, is true of the patent as a whole. Indeed, defendant's arguments in this aspect - excusing Molitor's vagueness or silence on matters at the heart of the alleged invention - tend to buttress the conclusion that there was nothing nonobvious anywhere in the patent.

The short of the present subject is this: if this court is mistaken in finding obviousness, plaintiff's contention as to the insufficiency of the disclosures may warrant reexamination notwithstanding the acknowledged requirement of a full adjudication at this level to the extent possible. As the decision now stands, there is neither occasion nor meaningful basis for sustaining this one of plaintiff's alternative theories.

c. Plaintiff contends that Molitor swore falsely in the Patent Office when he claimed to be the sole inventor of the process. There is substantial evidence for this view - not the least of which is found in his appearance on the witness stand and the evasive, unpersuasive testimony he gave there, including apparent ignorance of things an inventor of his claimed process would be thought to have remembered even many years [62] later (e.g., what an "axis" is and how things rotate about it). The contention is also supported by (1) the demonstrated falsity of Molitor's story as to when he conceived the process (April 1948), and (2) President Smith's story that Molitor was away at home during the supposedly seminal months after April 1948 (the strike period) while others stayed on to consider rotational casting.

Plaintiff has not succeeded, however, in proving its primary contention under this heading - that the invention actually came to Sun from people, primarily a Mr. Collins and the Viceroy Company, in Canada. Thus, as the record stands, assuming the process was an invention, it came out of Sun's laboratory, was promptly assigned to Sun, and could plausibly have been attributed by Sun to Molitor's work at some time or other even if others made suggestions or contributed incidentally in some respects. Considering all the circumstances, the court does not sustain plaintiff's alternative argument that Molitor's oath claiming sole inventorship should be held false and made a separate, additional ground for invalidating the patent. Cf. Agawam Company v. Jordan, 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 583, 602-603, 19 L. Ed. 177 [63] (1868); Pointer v. Six Wheel Corporation, 177 F.2d 153, 157 (9th Cir. 1949), cert. denied, 339 U.S. 911, [*505] 70 S. Ct. 570, 94 L. Ed. 1338 (1950); Henry J. Kaiser Company v. McLouth Steel Corp., 257 F. Supp. 372, 406 (E.D.Mich.1966); Adams v. Columbus Manufacturing Co., 180 F. Supp. 921, 929

(M.D.Ga.1960); Becton-Dickinson Co. v. Robert P. Scherer Corp., 106 F. Supp. 665, 675 (E.D.Mich.1952), aff'd, 211 F.2d 835 (6th Cir. 1954).

d. Plaintiff contends that the patent is invalid because an application for a similar Canadian patent was filed by defendant 51 rather than 60 days after the American filing. The legal issues thus raised have been thoroughly explored in an opinion of Judge Feinberg denying plaintiff's motion for summary judgment on this ground. 253 F. Supp. 12 (1966). That opinion left open, however, an opportunity for plaintiff to press the point at trial by attacking as a factual matter the Patent [391] Commissioner's finding that the premature foreign filing was "inadvertent." See 253 F. Supp. at 22 n. 43.

The subject appeared on its face to pose potentially elaborate questions. For example, is the retroactive licensing, a matter seemingly confided to the Commissioner's [64] discretion, reviewable at all? If so, what is the scope of review? Is the Commissioner's determination prima facie correct, final if based upon substantial evidence, or subject to the de novo finding of a district court?

As the case has developed, however, these interesting subjects may be left for another day. Plaintiff has failed to show anything but "inadvertence" to account for the solecism (a filing premature by nine days) of which it complains. Even if the matter be deemed open here for the court's independent determination, this highly technical attack upon the patent must be held unfounded.

B. Infringement

If defendant's patent were valid, there is no serious doubt that plaintiff would be an infringer. Attempting to fashion a shield from one of defendant's swords, plaintiff urges that Molitor's patent must be read as limited to a two-step operation for gelling and fusing. [22] If the problem were not essentially trivial, there might be substance in this contention. It is certainly true that Molitor's original (rejected) claims sounded more like a one-step heating process than those on which the patent finally issued. It is also true that at the Examiner's instance [65] - very possibly to slide past a cited patent for rotationally casting latex - the Molitor claims were amended in the closing stages of the long struggle to insert deliberately and specifically the references to "additional" and "further" heating for fusion which have been considered earlier. This makes plausible at least the claim of "file wrapper estoppel" which is an elaboration of plaintiff's thesis that only two-step heating procedures could be held to infringe.

But the whole subject amounts in the end to a large quibble - generated, in fairness to plaintiff, by the patenting of a totally obvious procedure, however the well-known task of cooking was accomplished. Nevertheless, if the court's relative certainty on this score (as well as the other grounds of invalidity) should prove unfounded, it is recorded [66] that plaintiff would then be an infringer of Molitor's process. [23]

II. PLAINTIFF'S ANTITRUST AND UNFAIR COMPETITION CLAIMS

Under this broad heading plaintiff has asserted and attempted to prove a variety of claims. Despite their number and the earnestness with which they have been pressed, all have proved to be baseless in fact or in law or both. They merit only brief treatment here.

A. As has been noted, the Goodrich Company took a license under the patent from defendant in 1953, and [*506] defendant, in a related and substantially contemporaneous contract, agreed to purchase 75% of its resins from Goodrich for a year. Plaintiff purports to find in this an unlawful "tying" agreement. The argument is scarcely intelligible. Plaintiff says further that the deal amounted to an illegal "rebate," but this thought is also difficult to follow and unmeritorious. The evidence on this subject diminishes the significance [67] of the "tribute" defendant claims from Goodrich, but fails to make out the kind of unlawful exclusive dealing (or other antitrust violation)

---

[22] It may be recalled that the court much earlier rejected defendant's claim to the supposedly unique, novel, and nonobvious idea of heating both to gel and fuse at the single (high) fusion temperature.

[23] Plaintiff has some other "estoppel" arguments on this subject. They are without merit.

plaintiff has sought to establish. Cf. Tampa Electric Co. v. Nashville Coal Co., 365 U.S. 320, 81 S. Ct. 623, 5 L. Ed. 2d 580 (1961).

B. Plaintiff also charged that defendant had unlawfully conspired with machinery makers to restrict sales of rotational casting machines to licensees under the Molitor patent. Except for a brief and debatable contract expiring in 1955 between defendant and one machinery maker (from the existence of which plaintiff has shown no damage to itself), the evidence does not sustain, but serves to refute, this charge.

C. It is further alleged that defendant Sun effected an unlawful restraint by licensing bystander defendant Wonder Products Company (see footnote 1, supra) to use the Molitor process for hobby horses while denying this mode of use to other licensees. The argument is answered, as plaintiff substantially concedes, by General Talking Pictures Corp. v. Western Electric Co., 304 U.S. 175, 58 S. Ct. 849, 82 L. Ed. 1273, aff'd on rehearing, 305 U.S. 124, 59 S. Ct. 116, 83 L. Ed. 81 (1938). Moreover, plaintiff's [68] claim of injury from this asserted violation is wholly unsupported by the record.

D. There is a further charge that defendant engaged in unlawful "package [392] licensing," requiring licensees to take (and pay for) rights under other and lesser patents as a condition of using the Molitor process. The evidence refutes the charge.

E. Equally unsubstantial is the argument that defendant committed an unlawful restraint when it HN10[] sought and obtained from its licensees the promise of licenses from them under any patented improvements in the process. At least in the absence of antitrust violations not shown here, there is nothing wrong in this. Transparent-Wrap Machine Corp. v. Stokes Co., 329 U.S. 637, 67 S. Ct. 610, 91 L. Ed. 563 (1947).

F. Plaintiff accuses defendant of other things asserted to have been unfair competitive practices. The accusations are so unsubstantial on their face - or so wholly devoid of evidentiary support - as to be frivolous.

III. CONCLUSIONS OF LAW SUMMARIZED

A. Defendant's patent, No. 2,639,134, is invalid under 35 U.S.C. § 103 because its "subject matter as a whole would have been obvious at the time the invention was made to a person having ordinary skill [69] in the art to which said subject matter pertains."

B. The patent is also invalid on the separate and independent ground of 35 U.S.C. § 102(b), because the invention was patented more than a year before the Molitor application in Italian Patent No. 440,295 (Delacoste).

C. The Molitor patent would, in any event, be unenforceable, and the counterclaim for enforcement must be dismissed, for the further, separate reason that both in the Sixth Circuit and here defendant has sought enforcement by means of deliberately fabricated evidence as to date of invention, with false testimony on this subject given by defendant's president, the alleged inventor, and the man who was defendant's chief chemist during the material times.

D. Plaintiff's other grounds for holding the patent invalid are not sustained. [24]

[70] [*507] E. Assuming the patent in suit is valid, plaintiff has infringed it.

F. Plaintiff's antitrust and unfair competition claims are without merit.

One task remains before the formulation of a judgment based upon the foregoing findings and conclusions. Both parties have made claims for attorneys' fees. At the conclusion of the trial, since such claims would obviously be affected by the rulings on the issues now decided, it was agreed that the problem of counsel fees should be postponed pending such rulings. Accordingly, it is directed that the parties serve and file their post-trial submissions on this subject by December 6, 1967, and that any reply papers be served and filed by December 13, 1967.

[24] This summary should include, however, the court's contingent reservation on the question of allegedly vague and insufficient teachings, which would seemingly warrant further consideration if the conclusion as to obviousness is later found erroneous.

United States v. Crocker-Anglo Nat'l Bank

United States District Court for the Northern District of California

October 30, 1967

Civil No. 41808

Reporter

277 F. Supp. 133 *; 1967 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9340 ; 1967 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,258

United States, Plaintiff, v. Crocker-Anglo National Bank, Citizens National Bank and Transamerica Corp., Defendants

Core Terms

banks, merger, percent, statewide, de novo, concentration, effects, national bank, convenience, merged, loans, metropolitan area, customers, deposits, competitor, branching, service area, savings, bank merger, anticompetitive, billion, commercial bank, commerce, compete, figures, markets, resources, combined, ratio, agencies

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Governments > Legislation > Interpretation

HN1[] Legislation, Interpretation

The legislative language will be interpreted on the assumption that if change occurs in legislative language, a change was intended in legislative result.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > Bank Mergers

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > Banking Interests

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Market Definition

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

HN2[] Financial Institutions, Bank Mergers

The intent of Congress in deleting the phrase "line of commerce" from the Bank Merger Act of 1966, 12 U.S.C.S. § 1828(c), was to permit an assessment of the competitive effect of a merger, not in the narrow market consisting solely of commercial banks, but in the wider and more realistic field of all institutions which compete either for the savings or investment dollar or for the extension of credit.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > Banking Interests

HN3[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

The test as to whether any given geographic area is a relevant or economically significant market or section of the country is not based on political boundaries, but is based on economic grounds. Permissive statewide branching merely extends the political boundaries in which a bank may open branches, local units, to operate in local markets. It does not bring to any particular bank or banking unit depositors or borrowers from all over the state. Individuals and corporations typically confer the bulk of their patronage on banks in their local community; they find it impractical to conduct their business at a distance.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > Banking Interests

Banking Law > Bank Activities > General Overview

HN4[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

The fact that an area might constitute a market for the manufacturing and commerce activities of a bank's customers does not establish it as a banking market.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

HN5[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

Geographic markets must be a product of commercial realities, rather than a formal, legalistic approach.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

HN6[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

Concentration is a function of a market. Combinations are to be gauged on their effect on competition generally in an economically significant market. Unless they relate to a market, both in the geographic sense and in the line of commerce or functional sense, figures purporting to show concentration ratios are meaningless.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > Bank Mergers

Banking Law > ... > Banking & Finance > Commercial Banks > Mergers & Consolidations

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > General Overview

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > Banking Interests

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > General Overview

HN7 [] Financial Institutions, Bank Mergers

The offsetting community convenience and needs, as specified in 12 U.S.C.S. § 1828(c)(5)(B), must be pleaded and proved by the defenders of the merger. The defendant banks, to fully sustain their required burden of proof, must establish that any hypothesized anticompetitive effects stemming from the instant merger are clearly outweighed by the merged bank's increased ability to meet the convenience and needs of the community to be served.

Judges: [1] Pope, Circuit Judge, Sweigert and Zirpoli, District Judges.

Opinion by: ZIRPOLI

Opinion

[*138] Opinion and Order Dismissing Complaint

ZIRPOLI, District Judge.

Based upon reasonable probabilities arising from the actual and practical realities of the business of banking, as contrasted to possibilities arising from theoretical postulates, this court, on review de novo in the manner directed by the Supreme Court in United States v. First City National Bank of Houston, 386 U.S. 361, 18 L. Ed. 2d 151, 87 S. Ct. 1088 (1967), applying the standards prescribed by the Bank Merger Act of 1966 (12 U.S.C. § 1828(c)(5)), concludes that the merger of the defendant banks, Crocker-Anglo National Bank (here referred to as "Crocker") and Citizens National Bank (here referred to as "Citizens") was lawful and not in violation of the Bank Merger Act of 1966 (12 U.S.C. § 1828(c)), § 7 of the Clayton Act (15 U.S.C. § 18), or § 1 of the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. § 1), and in support of this conclusion, finds:

1. That prior to and at the time of the merger, defendant banks were not in actual competition with each other in any economically significant section of the country;

2. That prior [2] to and at the time of the merger, defendant banks were not in substantial potential competition with each other in any economically significant section of the country;

3. That the plaintiff has failed to prove by a preponderance of evidence that but for the merger Crocker would have branched de novo into the Los Angeles metropolitan area or any economically significant banking market in which Citizens operated;

4. That plaintiff has failed to prove by a preponderance of evidence that but for the merger Citizens would have branched de novo into the San Francisco Bay area or any economically significant banking market in which Crocker operated;

[*139] 5. That the evidence shows affirmatively that in the instant case there is no reasonable probability that absent the merger Crocker would have established de novo branches in the Los Angeles metropolitan area or that Citizens would have established de novo branches in the San Francisco Bay area;

6. That the merger of defendant banks did not have a substantial adverse effect on actual or potential competition in the business of banking in any economically significant section of the country;

7. That given the [3] desirability of establishing another statewide banking competitor to Bank of America National Trust and Savings Association (hereafter referred to as Bank of America), as conceded by plaintiff, the only economically feasible solution was and is the present merger; and

8. That even had a substantial lessening of competition occurred as a result of the merger of defendant banks, such anticompetitive effects were clearly outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served.

History of this Litigation.

Before discussing the above stated conclusions of the court and findings in support thereof and such other findings as are appropriate and relevant to the court's decision, it would be well to review the history of this litigation to date and its relationship to the Bank Merger Act of 1966. Much of this history is set forth in the opinion of this court of October 6, 1966, when it stayed further proceedings in this cause and remanded the same to the Comptroller for further consideration in the manner indicated in the court's opinion. See United States v. Crocker-Anglo National Bank, 263 F. [4] Supp. 125 (N.D. Calif. 1966). We deem that history essential to a better understanding of this final decision on the merits. Rather than rely thereon by reference, the court, for convenience of the reader, and without the use of quotation marks, here repeats much of what it then said, with such modifications as are needed to meet the de novo review directions of the Supreme Court in United States v. First City National Bank of Houston, supra.

On May 13, 1963, some 34 days prior to the decision of the United States Supreme Court in United States v. Philadelphia Nat. Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 10 L. Ed. 2d 915, 83 S. Ct. 1715 (June 17, 1963), the Crocker-Anglo National Bank of San Francisco and Citizens National Bank of Los Angeles applied to the Comptroller of the Currency for permission to merge, under the charter of the former, with the title "Crocker-Citizens National Bank ". After notice and public hearing held July 30 and 31, 1963, and receipt of some 1605 pages of testimony and exhibits, the Comptroller, on September 30, 1963, made a decision approving the proposed merger, subject to certain named conditions, based on his findings, including the finding that the proposed merger [5] would promote the public interest. The approval was to be effective on or after November 1, 1963. On October 8, 1963, this suit was filed attacking the proposed merger as unlawful under § 7 of the Clayton Act, (15 U.S.C. § 18) and § 1 of the Sherman Act, (15 U.S.C. § 1). A certificate under the Expediting Act (15 U.S.C. § 28) was filed and pursuant thereto a three judge court was named and assembled for the purpose of hearing the cause. The Government's application for a preliminary injunction was denied (United States v. Crocker Anglo Nat. Bank, 223 F. Supp. 849 (N.D.Cal. 1963)), and after completion of extensive pretrial proceedings and the making of a pretrial order, the cause came on for trial on the merits. The trial began June 1, 1965 and the taking of testimony was concluded on June 18, 1965, with orders fixing the time for filing of briefs and proposed findings by the parties.

While the court was thus in the process of hearing testimony, on June 11, 1965 the Senate passed, with no opposing vote, its S. 1698, a bill under whose provisions, if enacted, this case would have become moot, for, as stated in the report accompanying [*140] the bill, the bill "would free [6] the banks involved in such suits from further proceedings under the antitrust laws." Whether it was because of their knowledge of the pendency of this legislation or otherwise, counsel by stipulation postponed the final filing of briefs and proposed findings until shortly before the passage of this proposed legislation, as amended in the House on February 9, 1966. The enactment, designated Public Law 89-356, 80 Stat. 7, was signed by the President on February 21, 1966.

The court was thus confronted with a somewhat extraordinary situation in which the law applicable to the case was changed after the testimony had been received and the cause submitted for decision. The measure, as finally enacted, made specific reference to this and other cases similarly situated in § 2(c) thereof, which provides as follows: "Any court having pending before it on or after the date of enactment of this Act any litigation initiated under the antitrust laws by the Attorney General after June 16, 1963, with respect to the merger, consolidation, acquisition of assets, or assumption of liabilities of an insured bank consummated after June 16, 1963, shall apply the substantive rule of law set forth in [7] section 18(c)(5) of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act, as amended by this Act." [1] The so-called "substantive rule of law set forth in § 18(c)(5)" is stated in the Act as follows: "(5) The responsible agency shall not approve -

(A) any proposed merger transaction which would result in a monopoly, or which would be in furtherance of any combination or conspiracy to monopolize or to attempt to monopolize the business of banking in any part of the United States, [8] or

(B) any other proposed merger transaction whose effect in any section of the country may be substantially to lessen competition, or to tend to create a monopoly, or which in any other manner would be in restraint of trade, unless it finds that the anticompetitive effects of the proposed transaction are clearly outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served.

In every case, the responsible agency shall take into consideration the financial and managerial resources and future prospects of the existing and proposed institutions and the convenience and needs of the community to be served."

That language refers to the tests to be applied, in a case of this type, by the Comptroller of the Currency in passing upon an application for approval of a proposed bank merger. Not only did § 2(c), quoted above, specifically direct that this court, in respect to this case, "shall apply the substantive rule of law set forth in § 18(c)(5)", but § 18(c)(7)(B) provided as follows: "In any judicial proceeding attacking a merger transaction approved under paragraph (5) on the ground that the merger [9] transaction alone and of itself constituted a violation of any antitrust laws other than § 2 of the Act of July 2, 1890 (§ 2 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, 15 U.S.C. 2), the standards applied by the court shall be identical with those that the banking agencies are directed to apply under paragraph (5)."

After a special hearing conducted for that purpose, evidence was received and the parties were granted time within which to file further briefs and memoranda expounding their views as to the action which the court should take in the light of the entire testimony and in view of the new enactment.

[*141] It is the Government's view that the new statute made no substantial change in the law or standards to be applied in passing upon the issues here presented. The Government puts it thus: "It is, of course, the essential position of the Government . . . that the 1966 amendment to the Bank Merger Act (P.L. 89-356; 80 Stat. 7) has not resulted in substantial change in substantive antitrust law or in the standards used by the courts in determining the legality of bank mergers." Specifically, the Government took the position that the language of § 18(c)(5) referring to "the convenience [10] and needs of the community to be served" is but a reiteration of the "failing company doctrine" long recognized as an integral part of settled antitrust law. [2]

---

[1] It was noted in the congressional debates that this section referred to three so-called "post Philadelphia cases - in Nashville, San Francisco and St. Louis - where mergers were consummated after that Philadelphia decision." This is the San Francisco case there referred to. The Philadelphia case referred to is United States v. Philadelphia Nat. Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 10 L. Ed. 2d 915, 83 S. Ct. 1715. In that connection reference was also made to United States v. First Nat. Bank & Trust Co. of Lexington et al., 376 U.S. 665, 12 L. Ed. 2d 1, 84 S. Ct. 1033.

[2] With this view we disagree. As the Supreme Court indicated in United States v. First City National Bank of Houston, supra, 386 U.S. at 369, at best, all that one can say is that the "failing company doctrine" is "related, though perhaps remotely", to the convenience and needs of the community to be served. In our view it would be absurd to find that new standards so carefully framed from the 1966 Bank Merger Act were no more than the inclusion of a wholly unnecessary reference to the failing company doctrine.

[11] [*142] We find no difficulty in concluding that the new enactment made substantial changes in the substantive law and in the standards to be applied in this case. Not only the language of the enactment, but its legislative history, is very compelling on this point. As we have noted, both § 2(c) and § 18(c)(7)(B), quoted above, specifically direct the court in this situation to apply the new standards of this Act. (The latter refers to the standards "directed to apply under paragraph 5" and § 2(c) and refers to these as "the substantive rule of law," set forth in that section.) It would be a bit startling to assume that in making this enactment, over which the congressional committees struggled long and hard, the Congress had turned up with nothing of substance, or had accomplished no change in respect to the law applicable for testing the validity of bank mergers.

The legislative history of the Act most emphatically contradicts the position now taken by the Government. The Senate Committee report, which accompanied the introduction of the bill in the Senate, took note of what Congress had contemplated would be the result of the Bank Merger Act of 1960. The Committee [12] stated: "At that time it was clearly expected that the decision of the responsible Federal bank authority, based on its own investigation and on reports on competitive factors from the other two banking agencies and from the Department of Justice, would be final and conclusive. The Attorney General's report was expected to be advisory only." The report states that the uncertainty created by the situation resulting from the Philadelphia and the Lexington bank cases (supra, note 1) "is harmful to the banking industry and to its customers. . . . There was unanimous agreement by all the witnesses that the present situation was undesirable and should be changed." The House Committee report states

---

There is not the slightest indication in the language of the Act, or its legislative history, to support the Government's effort to thus cancel or dissipate the declared purpose of the Act. During the debate on the bill, the question of the situation of the failing bank was mentioned, and in a colloquy between Congressman Weltner, who opposed the bill, and Congressman Multer, who supported it, it was made plain that the language referred to was not limited to the failing bank situation. After Congressman Multer had given an illustration of how this language would apply in a case not involving a failing bank, the following colloquy occurred:

> Mr. Weltner: This is a case of a failing bank, which has long been recognized by the court. It has nothing to do with this legislation. I am sure the gentleman from Wisconsin will agree with me, that we do not have to pass any bill to permit the approving agency to merge a failing bank in order to save it from insolvency. I am certain that the gentleman from New York, indeed, would say, as a well-educated lawyer, that the failing bank doctrine exists independently of any statutes which has been passed in the last 20 or 30 years. I yield to the gentleman for the purpose of responding to the correctness of that proposition.
>
> Mr. Multer: The gentleman is correct as far as he goes, but I have gone beyond the failing bank theory. There are many instances where we are not concerned with the failing bank, where there is an absolute and complete diminution of competition, yet under all the circumstances and all of the factors the courts should approve that merger just as the regulatory agencies may approve the merger." Cong. Rec. Feb. 8, 1966, p. 2346.

The careful and precise description of this portion of the bill, made by Senator Robertson to the Senate as the latter body prepared to accept the House version, would clearly negative any suggestion that it was limited to the failing company situation. He said: " . . . this bill, should convince the courts that the Congress does not intend that mergers in the banking field should be measured solely by the antitrust considerations which are applied in other industries." (Cong. Rec. Feb. 9, 1966, p. 2541.) In short, something apart from the older antitrust considerations, (including the failing company rule) are imported here. He also said (p. 2542): "The courts will no longer be able to say - in the case of a merger which does not reach to the point of creating a monopoly - that proof that a merger will have demonstrable benefits or will be benign is irrelevant. On the contrary, the question whether there are or are not demonstrable benefits - whether the merger is benign or malignant - will be the heart of the issue." Again he said (p. 2542): "The effect of the merger on the public interest and on the convenience and needs of the community to be served must be measured in specific and realistic terms in the light of the kinds of business involved and the kinds of people being served. The banking agencies and the courts must be guided by the realities of the industrial, commercial, and financial worlds. They must look through theories and percentages and doctrines to the hard facts of life."

A final answer to the Government's "failing company" theory is found in the House Report's indication as to the limited extent of the use of financial resources of the affected banks. That report states (U.S. Code, Cong. and Administrative News, 89th Cong. 2d Session, p. 337): "However, only the convenience and needs of the community to be served can be weighed against anticompetitive effects, with financial and managerial resources being considered only as they throw light on the capacity of the existing and proposed institutions to serve the community."

clearly the intent to make changes in the law as follows: "The intended legal effect of the bill is to modify the foregoing provision in three respects:

First, it is intended to make clear that no merger which would violate the antimonopoly section (sec. 2) of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act may be approved under any circumstances.

Second, the bill acknowledges that the general principle of the antitrust laws - that substantially anticompetitive mergers are prohibited - applies to banks, but permits [13] an exception in cases where it is clearly shown that a given merger is so beneficial to the convenience and needs of the community to be served - recognizing that effects outside the section of the country involved may be relevant to the capacity of the institution to meet the convenience and needs of the community to be served, - that it would be in the public interest to permit it.

Third, the bill provides that this rule of law is to be applied uniformly, in judicial proceedings as well as by the administrative agencies."

The most complete exposition of the congressional view in the process of this enactment is to be found in the remarks of Senator Robertson at the time the bill, as amended to conform to the House Committee report, came back to the Senate. At that time Senator Robertson, who was Chairman of the Senate Committee which had charge of the bill and who originally introduced the bill in the Senate, was recommending that the Senate accept the House amendment. No member of Congress had remained in closer touch with the bill's progress through both houses than Senator Robertson. As he put it: "I have lived with this problem day and night for months. I am convinced that [14] we have a good bill." What he then had to say expounded at considerable length the ideas which had [*143] been expressed by various House members during consideration of the bill in the House. [3]

[15] Senator Robertson said unequivocally that the purpose of the bill was to "reverse a decision of the Supreme Court". He said (Cong. Rec. Feb. 9, 1966, p. 2538): "The bill will end the confusion and controversy which has surrounded the bank merger situation since the ill-advised and unfortunate decisions of the Supreme Court in the Philadelphia and Lexington cases and the district court decision in the New York case which followed those precedents. It will do this by establishing a uniform rule for the bank supervisory agencies and the courts to follow in bank merger cases: a rule which takes into account both the competitive factors on which the antitrust laws are based - for banks these were written into the Bank Merger Act of 1960 - and the convenience and needs of the

---

[3] Representative Ashley, one of the members principally in charge of the bill in the House, stated (Cong. Rec. Feb. 8, 1966, p. 2339): "The bill would require the court to use the new standards of the bill in all . . . 'post Philadelphia' cases now pending in court. . . . The courts have repeatedly held that under the antitrust laws the social or economic benefits of a given merger cannot even be considered." The Congressman then quoted from the statement to that effect in the Philadelphia case: "It is a primary purpose of the bill to assure that the courts will never again dismiss as irrelevant the question of the needs of a community . . . [The] merger must be shown to be sufficiently beneficial in meeting the needs of the community to be served that, on balance, it may properly be regarded as in the public interest."

During the same discussion Rep. Stanton, a member of the Committee in charge of the bill, stated (Cong. Rec. Feb. 8, 1966, p. 2343):

> It was the expressed purpose and intent of Congress when it passed the Bank Merger Act in 1960 to make certain that control of bank mergers should be in the hands of the appropriate banking supervisory agencies, and that while the competitive effects of a proposed merger should be considered, they were not to be given a predominant position. These standards were repudiated by the Supreme Court in the Philadelphia National Bank and the Lexington Bank cases in which the Court decided that the Justice Department had the final say in bank mergers. Contrary to the intent of Congress, the bank regulatory authorities were relegated to advisory roles.
>
> These provisions . . . reinstate a measure of antitrust consideration which was lacking in the Senate bill, and they provide a banking standard that may allow economic assistance to a community even though a merger tends to lessen competition in that community. It is this statutory balance that was intended in 1960. . . .
>
> The . . . bill . . . directs the courts to apply the banking standards as well as the competitive standards in any judicial proceeding attacking an approved merger transaction . . . it . . . gives these standards equal weight as between economic and competitive circumstances and it assures this equilibrium throughout the entire review procedure.

public to be served by the proposed merged bank." Referring to the pendency of the suit now before us, he said: "It would permit the continuance of proceedings against the three 'post-Philadelphia' cases - in Nashville, San Francisco, and St. Louis - where mergers were consummated after that decision, but in these three cases the courts would be directed to follow the new statutory standards laid down in the statute [16] for all mergers to be considered in the future." And in a prepared statement, which he incorporated in the record as a part of his remarks, he said of the bill: "It will strike the Philadelphia, Lexington, and New York decisions and opinions from the books." [4]

[17] [*144] Perhaps the most conclusive evidence of the fact that this Act alters the previous rules comes from a comparison of the language of this statute with what the Supreme Court said in the Philadelphia case, namely, that a bank merger such as that one "is not saved because, on some ultimate reckoning of social or economic debits and credits, it may be deemed beneficial." Section 18(c)(5), quoted above, expressly requires a consideration of similar factors thus rejected in Philadelphia.

This statute makes a further alteration in the nature of the proceeding now before us. After providing for the time of commencement of an action brought under the antitrust laws arising out of a merger transaction, § 18(c)(7)(A) stipulates: "In any such action, the court shall review de novo the issues presented." Returning now to the provisions of § 2(c), requiring this court to "apply the substantive rule of law set forth in § 18(c)(5)", and to § 18(c)(7)(B), reciting that in any judicial proceeding attacking a merger transaction approved under paragraph 5, "the standards applied by the court shall be identical with those that the banking agencies are directed to apply under [18] paragraph 5," it seems clear that what we are now called upon to do is to review a decision and determination of the Comptroller of the Currency.

This requirement that we apply the standards under paragraph 5 presented some difficulty, since the prior decision of the Comptroller of September 30, 1963, was not made under or in the light of the New Bank Merger Act of 1966.

It is true that the Comptroller then found that the proposed merger "will promote the public interest", using the language of the 1960 Act, but his determination did not contain findings covering the precise issues required to be determined by him under the language of § 18(c)(5) quoted above. Under that section it would be incumbent upon the Comptroller to determine whether any anticompetitive effects of the proposed merger were "clearly outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served." We apprehended that an appropriate finding should specify in what respect the transaction would meet the convenience and needs of the community to be served.

---

[4] In an effort to find some legislative history to bolster its position that this Act made no changes in the law, the Government has inserted in its brief some quotations from the remarks of individual congressmen during floor debate. Taken out of context, as they are, they prove nothing. It is true that the wording of § 18(c)(5) emphasized and restated the requirement that the Comptroller, and the reviewing courts, take into consideration the antitrust laws. This was noted in debate, but it was also noted that this Act definitely and positively added a new standard. As stated in the House Report of Supplemental views of Congressman Ottinger, who helped draft the bill: "It also assures that banking services available to meet the convenience and needs of a community are considered in all cases and will prevail where they clearly outweigh nonmonopolistic anticompetitive effects of a merger." Counsel's quotations from the debate ignore the rule stated in Duplex Printing Press Co. v. Deering, 254 U.S. 443, 474-475, 65 L. Ed. 349, 41 S. Ct. 172, as follows:

> By repeated decisions of this court it has come to be well established that the debates in Congress expressive of the views and motives of individual members are not a safe guide, and hence may not be resorted to, in ascertaining the meaning and purpose of the law-making body. . . . But reports of committees of House or Senate stand upon a more solid footing, and may be regarded as an exposition of the legislative intent in a case where otherwise the meaning of a statute is obscure. . . . And this has been extended to include explanatory statements in the nature of a supplemental report made by the committee member in charge of a bill in course of passage.

Counsel have largely confined their quotations to those from Congressmen Weltner and Todd, who opposed the bill, and from Congressman Patman, who bitterly fought the legislation, and finally, through a face-saving compromise, introduced the bill, while stating that if he alone were writing the bill, he "would be against it as a matter of principle." (Cong. Rec. Feb. 8, 1966, p. 2357.) Counsel's choice of makers of remarks is not very persuasive.

There is another respect in which the earlier finding of the Comptroller was [19] inadequate and out-dated. His decision of September 30, 1963 antedated the decisions of the Supreme Court in United States v. El Paso Natural Gas Co., 376 U.S. 651, [*145] 12 L. Ed. 2d 12, 84 S. Ct. 1044, decided April 6, 1964, and United States v. Penn-Olin Chemical Co., 378 U.S. 158, 12 L. Ed. 2d 775, 84 S. Ct. 1710, decided June 22, 1964. In those cases the Supreme Court developed, to an extent not previously announced, the doctrine that § 7 of the Clayton Act is designed to preserve not merely present but potential competition in the market in question. This is the doctrine of the application of § 7 to potential competition. The principal argument made by the Government here relates to alleged elimination by the merger of substantial potential competition in the State of California.

Since the Act requires this court to proceed in this case in the same manner in which it would have to deal with some future proposed merger, we were of the view that before the court could perform the required function of reviewing the action of the Comptroller, the matter should be remanded for the consideration of the Comptroller under the provisions of the 1966 Act.

Plainly enough [20] the Act is designed to set up precise rules under which the validity of proposed bank mergers may be ascertained and determined. The first required step is the application to the Comptroller of the Currency [5] for written approval of the proposed merger. Upon hearing on such an application, the Comptroller is directed to act upon the considerations set forth in § 18(c)(5) above referred to. Then, as indicated, if an action be brought attacking the merger transaction, it must be brought within a limited time and in any such action "the court shall review de novo the issues presented." Thus the Act contemplates initial action by the Comptroller, followed by a review at the instance of the Department of Justice.

[21] When we first faced the task of complying with these requirements, we were confronted with a difficulty arising out of the fact that the Act provides that this review shall be "de novo".

It will be noted that under paragraph 5 the Comptroller is charged with ascertaining two sets of facts. The first is whether the effect of the proposed merger transaction "in any section of the country may be substantially to lessen competition", and the second, whether, having found that there would be anticompetitive effects in the proposed transaction, those effects "are clearly outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served."

We found no difficulty in reviewing de novo the first of these determinations, for this court has traditionally adjudged whether mergers have anticompetitive effects. But on the problem of reviewing the second determination by the Comptroller, namely, whether the proposed transaction is clearly outweighed in the public interest, and whether it meets the convenience and needs of the community to be served, we were originally of the view that this is a legislative or [22] administrative determination of a type which this court, as a constitutional court, is prohibited from deciding. [6] We found an expression of this view in the [*146] words of the Supreme Court in the following quotation from United States v. Philadelphia Nat. Bank, supra, 374 U.S. at 371, which we have italicized:

---

[5] It is this officer who must act if the acquiring, assuming or resulting bank is to be a national bank. Where a state bank is to be the resulting one, the decision is to be made by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. In other cases, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation is to make the decision.

[6] In that connection we said:

> It will be noticed that the standards of § 5 are to be applied in granting or refusing leave to merge in the future. The contemplated action "looks to the future and changes existing conditions by making a new rule, to be applied thereafter to * * * some part of those subject to its power," as fully as the establishment of railroad rates in Prentis v. Atlantic Coast Line Co., 211 U.S. 210, 226, 53 L. Ed. 150, 29 S. Ct. 67. It involves a determination and establishment of a public policy.
>
> See Finfrock, "Trial de Novo - Panacea?" in Baylor Law Review, 135, where the Texas cases are discussed: "This criterion in essence classifies as administrative and non-judicial decisional functions which courts are not particularly equipped to decide while leaving to the courts that category of decision making with which it has traditionally dealt and is equipped to handle under the adversary type of judicial procedure. Decisions that require the inquisitorial type of procedure, investigative in nature, and which must, to attain optimum utility, be based upon a mosaic of expert opinion, judgment, and

> We are clear, however, that a merger the effect of which "may be substantially to lessen competition" is not saved because, on some ultimate reckoning of social or economic debits and credits, it may be deemed beneficial. A value choice of such magnitude is beyond the ordinary limits of judicial competence, and in any event has been made for us already, by Congress when it enacted the amended § 7. Congress determined to preserve our traditionally competitive economy.

[23] This initial difficulty on the problem of reviewing the second determination of the Comptroller has since been dissipated. It is now established that the previously held view of this court must be modified, for the Supreme Court, in passing upon the very standards here involved in United States v. First City National Bank of Houston, supra 386 U.S. at 369-370, said:

> The courts may find the Comptroller's reasons persuasive or well nigh conclusive. But it is the court's judgment, not the Comptroller's, that finally determines whether the merger is legal. That was the practice prior to the 1966 Act; and we cannot find a purpose on the part of Congress to change the rule. This conclusion does not raise serious constitutional questions by making the courts perform nonjudicial tasks. The "rule of reason", long prevalent in the antitrust field (see, e.g., Chicago Board of Trade v. United States, 246 U.S. 231, 62 L. Ed. 683, 38 S. Ct. 242), has been administered by the courts. A determination of the effect on competition within the meaning of § 7 of the Clayton Act is a familiar judicial task. The area of "the convenience and needs of the community to be served," now in [24] focus as part of the defense under the 1966 Act, is related, though perhaps remotely, to the failing-company doctrine, long known to the courts in antitrust merger cases. United States v. Diebold, Inc., 369 U.S. 654, 8 L. Ed. 2d 176, 82 S. Ct. 993. The appraisal of competitive factors is grist for the antitrust mill. See, e.g., United States v. Philadelphia National Bank, supra, 374 U.S. at 357-367. The courts are not left at large as planning agencies. The effect on competition is the standard; and it is a familiar one. If the anticompetitive effect is adverse, then it is to be excused only if "the convenience and needs of the community to be served" clearly outweigh it. We see no problems in bringing these standards into the area of judicial competence. There are no constitutional problems here not present in the "rule of reason" cases.

Not having had the benefit of the recent above quoted ruling of the Supreme Court and feeling as we did that a determination of "the convenience and needs of the community to be served" was an administrative, rather than a judicial function, we remanded the cause to the Comptroller with directions to proceed to make the determinations [25] called for by the Bank Merger Act of 1966.

It is well that we did so, for as the Supreme Court said in the above quotation, while on review de novo, "it is the court's judgment, not the Comptroller's that finally determines whether the merger is legal", yet, in so determining, [*147] "the courts may find the Comptroller's reasons persuasive or well nigh conclusive."

On remanding the cause to the Comptroller, we suggested that he should make specific findings as to:

1. The competitive situation as to which the merger may have operative effects and particularly whether the merger will have a probable tendency to lessen or do away with competition; and

2. The probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served. In this latter connection we suggested that he specify particularly what he finds to be the convenience and needs of the community, what he considers will be the effect of the merger thereon, and how and by what means he weighs these effects as against the anticompetitive effects of the transaction.

Finally, in order to avoid any possible necessity for further remand following our review of the Comptroller's order, [26] he was directed to make findings as to whether, assuming that the merger has the effect upon potential decisions are and should be regarded as non-judicial and left primarily to the administrators. They are far more able to come to grips with such problems than a court or jury in the detached and sterile atmosphere of the court room." (p. 160). United States v. Crocker-Anglo National Bank, 263 F. Supp. 125, 132, footnote 5 (N.D.Cal. 1966).

---

competition which the Government claims, that effect would be clearly outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served. [7]

Following the remand and after due notice to all interested parties, including the Attorney General of the United States, [8] the matter was further heard by the Comptroller on November 14, 1966, at which time he not only reviewed the record of the hearing on which he based the findings contained in his decision of September 30, 1963, but also all the material already introduced in evidence before this court in the course of its previous trial and rehearing of this case and additional information available to and presented by the Comptroller in the [27] course of said hearing of November 14, 1966. The hearings of the Comptroller on this merger were probably the most extensive ever held on a bank merger. Had the Attorney General participated, it would have been an adversary proceeding equivalent to that before any administrative agency or the courts.

In the extensive findings and conclusions of law filed by the current Comptroller with this court on December 27, 1966, which this court finds from the evidence presented in this case on review de novo to be correct, he reaffirmed the judgment of his predecessor. [28] Further hearings had been held in this court on April 19, 20, and 21, 1966, and following the filing of briefs and a limited hearing on February 3, 1967, to consider the findings of the current Comptroller, the cause was ordered submitted. However, because of the pending appeal in the case of United States v. First City National Bank of Houston, supra, relating to the nature of the review de novo and the burden of proof on "the convenience and needs of the community to be served", this court deferred any ruling on the merits to await the decision of the Supreme Court, which was entered on March 27, 1967.

With the previous history of this litigation and its relationship to the Bank Merger Act of 1966 in mind and behind us, we are prepared to decide this cause on the merits.

Before discussing the merits of the issues presented, a review of the history and operations of the defendant banks, the negotiations leading to the merger and the role of Transamerica Corporation therein, and the hard facts as to [*148] the nature of the business and banking in California would be helpful.

History and operations of defendant banks.

Defendant Crocker-Anglo National Bank, prior [29] to November 1, 1963, was a banking association organized under the laws of the United States, with its principal place of business at San Francisco, California.

Defendant Citizens National Bank, prior to November 1, 1963, was a banking association organized under the laws of the United States, with its principal place of business at Los Angeles, California.

Transamerica Corporation (herein referred to as "Transamerica") is a holding company incorporated under the laws of Delaware, with its principal place of business at San Francisco, California. At the time of the merger Transamerica owned approximately forty-one per cent of the capital stock of Citizens, and, as a result of the merger, it received approximately 12 per cent of the stock of Crocker-Citizens National Bank (herein referred to as "Crocker-Citizens"), the title given to the new bank under the charter of Crocker. Transamerica's ownership in Citizens, which it voted in its entirety in favor of the merger, was sufficient to give it the power to prevent any merger of Citizens with any other bank. In addition to its holdings in Citizens (now in Crocker-Citizens), Transamerica holds stock in a substantial number of insurance [30] companies, public utilities, industrial corporations and to a limited degree in Western Bancorporation, a holding company with subsidiary banks located throughout the western states,

---

[7] Note the usefulness of findings based on assumptions made by the district court in United States v. Philadelphia Nat. Bank, supra 374 U.S. at p. 335.

[8] The head of the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice in a letter to the Comptroller on November 10, 1966, took the position that "There is thus no provision for an administrative hearing by your office nor are there any standards prescribed for such a hearing", and since the court must determine de novo the legality of the merger, the Department of Justice saw no need for plaintiff to appear at the Comptroller's hearing. (BK-PPP) and Bank of America. These latter two holdings made for investment purposes, the court finds to be insufficient to have any appreciable effect on banking operations in any area relevant to this case.

Crocker and Citizens were each engaged in interstate commerce. The merger of Crocker and Citizens was not a merger of necessity because of management problems or earnings, or any of the things that make a merger compelling in that respect. While both were progressive banks with a substantial future as separate institutions and while both were expanding their branching facilities within their respective areas of operation, up to the time of the merger, with the exception of Ventura County, California, where their operations were too minor to adversely affect competition in this presumed local banking market, neither bank had branched into or otherwise made any economically significant entry into the banking market of the other. The evidence, as will be hereinafter disclosed, is clearly insufficient to [31] support a reasonable inference that either intended to, or that it was feasible for either to, enter the market of the other in the reasonably foreseeable future.

Crocker-Anglo was chartered in 1870. It was the fifth largest commercial bank in California and sixteenth largest in the United States in terms of deposits. It conducted a general commercial banking and trust business through 124 banking offices located in 29 California counties ranging from the California-Oregon boundary on the north to Santa Barbara County in the south. As of December 28, 1962, Crocker-Anglo had total deposits of about $2,134,002,000, total assets of about $2,360,014,000, and total loans and discounts of about $1,219,050,000.

Citizens was originally incorporated in 1890 under the laws of California; it received a national bank charter in 1901. Citizens was the eighth largest commercial bank in California and forty-third largest in the United States in terms of deposits. It conducted a general commercial banking and trust business through 78 banking offices located in Los Angeles, Orange, San Bernardino, Riverside, and Ventura counties. As of December 28, 1962, it had total deposits of about $713,793,000, [32] total assets of about $791,662,000, and total loans and discounts of about $357,099,000.

A map showing the locations of the banking offices of each of the merging banks in California immediately prior to the merger can be found in the court's [*149] opinion in United States v. Crocker-Anglo National Bank, 223 F. Supp. 849, 851 (N.D.Cal. 1963).

On February 10, 1956, Crocker First National Bank of San Francisco (herein "Crocker First National") and Anglo California National Bank (herein "Anglo California") consolidated under the name of Crocker-Anglo National Bank, combining the 47 offices of Anglo California located in 31 communities with the 3 offices of Crocker First located in San Francisco, Oakland and San Mateo. Anglo California also had offices in San Francisco and Oakland. Immediately prior to said consolidation Crocker First National had total deposits of about $430,488,000 and total loans of about $214,201,000, and Anglo California had total deposits of about $844,839,000 and total loans of about $440,461,000. On June 30, 1956, Crocker-Anglo National Bank offices located in San Francisco had 24.8 per cent of the total IPC (individual, partnerships and corporations) [33] demand deposits in that City and County.

On June 22, 1956, Crocker merged with the First National Bank of Scotia and with the First National Bank in Madera. On September 7, 1956, Crocker merged with Salinas National Bank. On May 29, 1959, Crocker merged with County National Bank and Trust Company of Santa Barbara. On September 25, 1959, Crocker merged with The Bank of Carmel and with The First National Bank of Monterey, and with The First National Bank of Pacific Grove. On June 23, 1961, Crocker merged with the Bank of San Rafael and with the First National Bank in San Rafael. [9]

On November 30, 1959, Citizens merged with the [34] Bank of Whittier and with the First National Bank of Vernon. On December 7, 1962, Citizens merged with the Glendora Commercial and Savings Bank.

---

[9] Even though this court can no longer order a divestiture of Crocker's prior merger of these banks, it does not follow that this court may not consider these prior mergers in its evaluation of the expansion trend of Crocker and any bearing they may have on the question of whether but for the instant merger Crocker would have branched de novo into the banking market of Citizens.

The nine banks acquired by Crocker from June 1956 to June 1961 had, combined, deposits of about $164,371,000, loans of $79,790,000, and 20 banking offices. The three banks acquired by Citizens from November 1959 to December 1962 had, combined, about $19,977,000 in deposits, $8,880,000 in loans, and 6 banking offices. All of these banks were engaged in interstate commerce.

Negotiations leading to the merger.

The purpose of creating another statewide bank to compete with Bank of America [10] was clearly stated when the subject of the merger of Crocker and Citizens was first proposed. (Tr. 1021). In September 1958, L. O. Ivey, vice chairman of the board of Citizens National Bank and its second largest stockholder, approached Paul Hoover, president of Crocker, with regard to a merger of the two banks for the purpose of forming another statewide institution. (Tr. 1020, line 21-Tr. 1021, line 10; Tr. 1029). L. O. Ivey had no connection with Transamerica. (Tr. 1031). Although the management of Citizens may not have been favorably [35] disposed to this proposal, Ivey interested Transamerica in the negotiations, but they came to an abrupt termination in March 1959, when Transamerica, as the dominant stockholder of Citizens, demanded too high an exchange ratio for the Citizens stock (Tr. 1022, 1029-1030). Although it appeared at this time that there was no possibility of merging Crocker with Citizens and although every reason now urged by plaintiff for entering Los Angeles then existed, Crocker took no steps and made no plans to establish offices in Los Angeles or any of the other southern counties, [*150] either by merger or by de novo branching.

> Judge Pope: I would like to ask this question: Was there any time subsequent to 1956 when the officers of your organization discussed the problem of establishing branch banks in the Los Angeles area? By that, I mean Los Angeles County, Orange County and vicinity.
> The Witness: Yes, the subject came up quite frequently, Your Honor, and was cast aside because we just didn't have the horses, we didn't have the capital, we just couldn't do it and we didn't have the personnel.
>
> Judge Pope: Was this at a time when you were generally agreed that [36] it would be desirable to enter -
> The Witness: It was indeed.
> Judge Pope: To enter the Los Angeles area?
> The Witness: Yes.
> (Hoover, Tr. 1038, Lines 5-19).

In January 1962, two years and nine months later, Paul Hoover and Emmett Solomon, then chairman of the board and president, respectively, of Crocker, called on John R. Beckett, the new president of Transamerica, to discuss the possibility of merger with Citizens. At that time they were informed by Beckett that Transamerica was not interested in such a move, but that if it did become interested, he would so advise Crocker (Solomon, G-337, pp. 109-110). Prior thereto, Transamerica, for reasons relating to the accounting rules of the Securities & Exchange Commission, was interested in owning more than 50 per cent of Citizens, [37] in order that it might thereby substantially increase its earnings (Beckett, Tr. 1908). Subsequently and at the meeting of its board of directors on August 31, 1962, Transamerica, fearing that its 41 per cent holding in Citizens might result in Transamerica voting more than 50 per cent of the stock of Citizens represented at an annual meeting and thereby subject it and all of its subsidiaries wherever located in the world to examination by the Federal Reserve Board at the expense of the company, decided to dispose of its Citizens holdings and instructed Mr. Beckett to see what he could do in this regard (Beckett, Tr. 1910-1913).

Pursuant to such instruction in September 1962, Beckett informed Hoover or Solomon or both that Transamerica had decided that it would be interested in a merger because Transamerica was leaning in the direction of becoming a mutual fund type operation (Solomon, G-337, p. 110; Beckett, Tr. 1913). In response to this, Hoover and Solomon negotiated with Transamerica for the purpose of determining what exchange ratio would be satisfactory to Transamerica in the event a merger was successfully negotiated with Citizens. Transamerica agreed that an exchange ratio [38] of 1.8 shares of Crocker to 1 share of Citizens would be satisfactory to it (Solomon, G-337, pp. 125-126). Transamerica also agreed that it would not interfere with the management of the resulting bank and that it would dispose of its shares in the resulting bank on an orderly basis (Solomon, G-337, pp. 127-128). Transamerica thereafter informed the executive committee of Citizens of Crocker's proposal and that Transamerica was in favor of it (Britt, G-334, pp. 10-12a). Hoover and Solomon then negotiated with the management of Citizens, not only as to the exchange ratio, but as to all other aspects of the merger agreement which were important to both groups (Britt, G-334, p. 12b; Solomon, G-337, pp. 124-125). Included were the composition of the board, adjustment of principal officers, employee benefits, location of directors' meetings, name of the combined bank, composition of the executive committee, functions of the advisory committees, location of the bank's headquarters and the multitude of other things, any one of which might have prevented agreement on a merger (Solomon, G-337, pp. 124-127; Clarke, Tr. 1246, line 18 - Tr. 1247, line 17). Finally, by a letter from the chairman [39] of the board of directors of Crocker, dated February 6, 1963, Crocker-Anglo offered to merge at an exchange ratio of 1.9 shares of Crocker-Anglo [*151] to 1 share of Citizens. (Britt, G-334, p. 22-24). The proposal also contained various provisions relating to the liabilities of the two banks, the composition of the board of directors of the resulting bank, future employment and pensions of employees of both banks (Ct. Exh. 195).

---

[10] Bank of America, described by Mr. Ivey as "the octopus", is more commonly known in financial circles as "the Colossus of the West" and is the largest bank in America and the largest private bank in the world.

In February 1963, the boards of directors of both banks approved the merger in principle and authorized and directed the officers to negotiate a definitive agreement. On February 28, 1963, Crocker initiated an examination of Citizens and discovered the possibility of exposure to liability from a certain action pending against Citizens. Being unwilling to assume, through a merger with Citizens, responsibility for that litigation and for related contingent liabilities in connection therewith unless indemnified, Crocker entered into an agreement with Transamerica whereby Transamerica, together with its subsidiaries, agreed to indemnify and save harmless Crocker against any and all liabilities which might arise from that action, to the extent of 60 per [40] cent thereof. Thereafter Crocker confirmed its offer by a letter dated April 1, 1963, from the chairman of its board. In April, the board of directors of each authorized the execution of the formal agreement to merge and it was duly executed (Ct. Exh. 195, "Application for Approval of Merger", p. 4).

On May 3, 1963, the two banks submitted their Application for Approval to Merge under section 18(c) of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act, as amended, 12 U.S.C. § 1828(c), and section 215(a) of Title 12 U.S.C., to the Comptroller of the Currency (Ct. Exh. 195).

Pursuant to notice, the Comptroller of the Currency held a public hearing on the proposed merger on July 30 and 31, 1963. The record developed at the hearing comprises 1,605 pages of testimony and exhibits (BK-A). On September 30, 1963, the Comptroller of the Currency rendered his decision approving the merger subject to the conditions that the board of directors of Transamerica agree: (1) that no more than one director or officer or other representative of Transamerica Corporation will serve as a director of the resulting bank, and (2) that it would dispose of substantially all of its stock holdings in the resulting bank [41] by December 31, 1966. Subsequently, this provision was further changed by putting the stock in a voting trust, over which Transamerica has no control. Transamerica no longer has a director on the combined board, and the percentage of the stock it now holds under the voting trust has been reduced from 12 per cent to 8.8 per cent. The trust, which cannot be altered without approval of the Comptroller, is presumably to remain in effect until Transamerica can make a fair and equitable disposition (sale) of its holdings. The influence of Transamerica on the banking operations of the old Citizens or the new Crocker-Citizens has thus been effectively removed.

In his decision approving the merger, the Comptroller found favorably to the banks on all the banking factors involved and also found that the proposed merger would have no adverse effects on competition, that it would not tend toward monopoly, and that it would not violate section 7 of the Clayton Act (BK-A).

On October 8, 1963, this action was commenced and the Government moved for a preliminary injunction restraining the consummation of the merger. After hearing, the Government's motion for a preliminary injunction was denied [42] (United States v. Crocker-Anglo Nat. Bank, 223 F. Supp. 849 (N.D. Calif. 1963)), and the merger was consummated on November 1, 1963. The subsequent history of this litigation has already been recited above.

The nature of banking in California and the economic milieu in which it operates.

In view of the broad geographic distribution of the operations of the merging banks and their branches in order to better assess and render a balanced judgment on the impact of this merger, a [*152] review of the economic milieu in which they operated is imperative.

The geographic expanse of California, comprising 158,693 square miles of land with some 800 miles of coastline and an average width of 200 miles, with all the attendant problems created by distance, can best be appreciated if its area is transported to the east coast and overlaid on the eastern seaboard. When the north-south California axis is placed on the north-south axis of the east coast, the California overlay extends from Boston, Massachusetts on the north to Charleston, South Carolina on the south. Encompassed in this area we will find all the land area of Connecticut, Rhode Island, New Jersey and Delaware and the eastern [43] half of Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina and South Carolina. It would embrace such cities as Boston, New York, New Haven, Wilmington, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, D.C., Richmond, Norfolk, Charlotte, Winston-Salem and Charleston. [11]

---

[11] On the characteristics of California's economy, Professor Weston testified:

Q. Are there any factors regarding the characteristics of particular areas of California's economy that you deem significant?

A. Yes. Again, it is well known that California is characterized by the two highly urbanized areas, the Bay Area and the L.A. area. Then in between, the North Coast area, lumber, fishing, the mountain area, the agricultural areas, the desert areas.

So that you have a great diversity in regional economic characteristics in California.

Q. And what significance did that have with regard to the instant merger?

A. This has a significance that a branching system is able to help mobilize the financial resources of the State more effectively. It can gather deposits in areas that generate deposits and use them in loans in areas that are growing rapidly, where loans are needed.

And this is particularly significant for a capital deficit area, such as California, that imports capital, because it enables the branch system to more effectively utilize the financial resources of the State.

Q. In considering -

Judge Zirpoli: Would this be a factor which indicates that there is such a thing as a statewide market?

The Witness: No. It indicates that where you have branching in an area with diverse economic characteristics, that you get benefits basically of diversification both on the deposit side and on the lending side. (Tr. 1486-1487)

Judge Zirpoli: But you have just indicated that there is a possibility of an intake at one section of the State and an outgo at another section.

The Witness: That is true.

Judge Zirpoli: Yes. Doesn't this give it a statewide characteristic?

The Witness: Insofar as you have statewide branching, the extent to which this activity of gathering by commercial banks and lending out in another place is restricted by law to a state area.

But insurance companies, for example, can gather in the diverse areas of California and take the money out of California. Legally they do.

Since California is a capital deficit area, insurance companies tend to do the opposite. They gather funds in other parts of the country and lend them out in California.

The fact that this commercial banking activity is co-terminus with the political boundaries of the State of California is not determined on economic grounds; it is determined on the grounds that statewide branching is the limit of the extent to which this branching can take place.

Mr. Zirpoli: All right.

The Witness: One other aspect of this is that again on the lending side the larger California banks in the national bank division do send their men out to talk to customers in other parts of the country, but again as a practical matter, to try to [44] It has a topography and climate probably unmatched throughout the remainder [*153] of the United States for its complexity and variety and thus accounts for the extraordinary expansion, growth and diversity in population, agriculture, business and industry, which for decades have made and continue to cause California to be a substantial capital import state (Saxon, Tr. 2066-2068). This situation, which is recognized by all the parties, is of paramount importance in any consideration of the State of California as a whole as a relevant economic section of the country in which to evaluate the competitive nature of commercial banking (the term used in the Bank Merger Act of 1966 is "the business of banking"). It is also important to the court's consideration of the convenience and needs of the community to be served.

Any attempt to divorce the entire State of California from the national market (as a submarket thereof) in assessing the anticompetitive impact of this merger by the use of concentration figures in commercial banking based upon the number of offices, assets, IPC deposits and loans of California banks alone (as plaintiff would have us do) and without consideration [45] of other financial forces in and out of California which come into play and compete with such banks for the very financial services that may cause the entire state to be a relevant market (as contrasted to those which are basically local) is an oversimplification, an oversimplification which might make the court's task easier, but which would ignore a substantial and essential part of the picture and would result in a false portrayal of the hard economic facts of banking in this assumed state market. As difficult as the task may be, ours is the obligation to clarify and establish the picture with certainty. [12]

[46] The appropriate line of commerce test.

While it is well established that commercial banking, which has as one of its prime characteristics the fact that commercial banks are the only financial institutions that can accept demand deposits, [13] [47] is an appropriate > handle their California business, although if - again, if California were not a capital deficit area these national banking division people might well be trying to make loans to firms in New York just as the New York banks and Chicago banks make loans in California.

---

>
> So that from an economic standpoint there is not a statewide commercial banking activity.
>
> (Tr. 1488-1489)

[12] From our experience in this and other cases involving regulatory agencies, we agree with the observation of District Judge McMahan in United States v. Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co., 240 F. Supp. 867, 881 (S.D.N.Y. 1965), that:

> We think that if ever there were a field requiring administrative expertise to unravel the tangled threads of the evidence and weave them into a meaningful fabric, this is it. This case involves a multitude of technical, intricate and complex problems in the field of money and banking, a subject within the special competence of the Board and outside the conventional experience of judges.

We further agree with the suggestion of Mr. Justice Harlan (dissenting) in United States v. El Paso Natural Gas Co., 376 U.S. 651, 664, 12 L. Ed. 2d 12, 84 S. Ct. 1044 (1964), that this "duplicative . . . anachronistic system of dual regulation should be re-examined."

[13] Check writing, as the most convenient way of paying debts, and the department-store-of-finance characteristics of local banks, are the basic items of convenience that make commercial banking an appropriate line of commerce in the local market. The growth of the demand deposit activity of commercial banks has lagged behind the growth of the economy as a whole. During the postwar years the economy, as measured by gross national product, has grown at a rate three or four times the growth rate of demand deposits (Weston, Tr. 1469-1470), and according to some experts, the activities of noncommercial bank financial intermediaries, have served as effective economic substitutes for the use of demand deposits (Weston, Tr. 1471). Checking accounts are sort of a loss leader. In fact, the total operating income of California commercial banks from demand deposit service charges is less than 1/20th of 1% of their total operating revenue (Weston, Tr. 1474).

As a matter of practical experience, time deposits in a savings and loan association of commercial bank are the equivalent of demand deposits in that both are paid on demand (Dirlam, Tr. 557-558). The only practical difference between a demand deposit in a commercial bank and a time deposit in commercial banks and savings and loan associations relates to the procedure by which those deposits are withdrawn. In the case of a demand deposit in a commercial bank, the procedure line of commerce within which to measure the anticompetitive [*154] effects of a banking merger in local markets, it does not necessarily follow under the 1966 Act that the totality of financial activities carried on by commercial banks and their competition in a statewide market of the magnitude of California or in the national market [14] should be ignored. It is not the view of this court that in such expanded markets commercial banking is the sole line of commerce that the court can or should consider. Hence, what we are about to say, which represents the views of the members of this court, while not essential to the findings herein made and the conclusions herein reached, is, nevertheless, clearly applicable to this case and the substantive standards by which bank mergers are to be tested under the Bank Merger Act of 1966.

In fact, the provisions and terminology of subparagraphs (A) and (B) of the Bank Merger Act of 1966, § 1828(c)(5) of Title 12 U.S.C., which set forth the substantive standards by which banking mergers are to be judged, suggest to this court that a broader test was intended and now applies. We deem the deliberate omission from the Bank Merger Act of 1966, § 1828(c)(5)(B), of the phrase "in any line of commerce" is not without significance. [15]

[48] Plaintiff argues that "it was quite unnecessary, and indeed would have been inappropriate, for the phrase 'in any line of commerce' to have been included in so obviously a statute concerned exclusively with banks. To have had it there would have been out of place and would [*155] not have made sense". (Plaintiff's Supp. Post Reply Brief, p. 12A.)

This argument ignores the canons of statutory construction that " . . . HN1[] the legislative language will be interpreted on the assumption . . . that if change occurs in legislative language, a change was intended in legislative result." [16] Furthermore, the statute itself answers plaintiff's argument. Subparagraph 5(A) immediately preceding subparagraph 5(B) provides the first substantive test for bank mergers. It is in terms of monopoly. It refers expressly consists in the use of checks, whereas with a savings and loan or time deposit, the intervening procedure consists in presenting the necessary documents at the place of deposit (Dirlam, Tr. 558-559).

If there is an advantage to commercial banks by reason of their ability to offer the unique function or service of checking accounts, the advantage is their ability to use that function as a sort of loss leader to get the customer into the bank for the purpose of selling him some other service, for which there is fierce competition with other financial institutions (Weston, Tr. 1597). While they are the only institutions which have the benefit of that loss leader, there was no evidence that this advantage would enable a commercial bank in one section of the state to be able to successfully compete with other financial institutions located in a distant community for the business of a customer located there.

[14] In making this observation we are not unmindful of the decision in Manufacturers Hanover, supra, that "commercial banking" is an appropriate line of commerce, even though a geographic market as extensive as the entire nation may be involved. However, we feel that the expanded "section of the country" considerations we urge herein are essential to a true evaluation of a bank merger in a section of the country of the magnitude of the whole of California, and it is up to us to clarify any confusion Government's counsel feel will arise in the application of these considerations.

[15] The significance of the omission of this phrase so essential to § 7 of the Clayton Act was not decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in United States v. First City Nat. Bank of Houston, supra. In footnote 1 at page 369, the Court said:

> 12 U.S.C. § 1828(c)(5)(B) provides, as we have seen, that a merger shall not be approved "whose effect in any section of the country may be substantially to lessen competition." It is pointed out that that standard omits the phrase "in any line of commerce" which is present in § 7 of the Clayton Act. It is argued that Congress meant that commercial banking is no longer to be considered as an area of effective competition and that the Act establishes in banking "a market test measurable only by larger commercial realities ".
>
> We do not reach this question and we intimate no opinion on it nor any views on the merits of these mergers or on the justifications that are urged in their support. All questions except the procedural ones treated in the opinion are reserved.

This court, however, if it is to provide a vehicle for finality on all the questions presented by the instant merger, must resolve this question, even though for alternative reasons hereinafter stated, such resolution of the question might prove not to have been necessary.

[16] Sutherland Statutory Construction, Section 4510, 3rd Edition, Horach.

to "the business of banking". Congress obviously thought it "made sense" and was not "out of place" to use the words "business of banking" when formulating the monopoly test. In the following paragraph Congress just as obviously must have thought it "made sense" to omit those words. This gives all the more credence to Senator Robertson's statement that Congress intentionally [49] omitted "any line of commerce" (as well as "business of banking") from subparagraph 5(B) of the amendment, in order to provide a less stringent test. In his remarks on the floor of the Senate when he presented the amendments of the House of Representatives to S. 1698, the bank merger bill, Senator Robertson said:

> It will be noted that the prohibitory language is based generally on the terms of section 1 of the Sherman Act and section 7 of the Clayton Act. Section 1 of the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. § 1) prohibits contracts, combinations, and conspiracies "in restraint of trade or commerce" while section 7 of the Clayton Act (15 U.S.C. § 18), as amended in 1950, prohibits acquisitions "where in any line of commerce in any section of the country the effect may be substantially to lessen competition, or to tend to create a monopoly."
>
> The text of paragraph (B) of the new bill follows the terms of section 1 of the Sherman Act and section 7 of the Clayton Act, with the exception that the reference to "any line of commerce" in the Clayton Act is not carried over into the new bill. In this respect the new bill resembles the Bank Merger Act of 1960, and calls for an appraisal [50] of the overall effects of the merger on competition, weighing increases of competition in one field against decreases in competition in another field. The banking agencies and the courts, in other words, are not intended and are not permitted to select some single, perhaps minor aspect of the banks' business and to say that, because there is some lessening of competition in this element of the business, the overall effects of the merger - the increase of competition in the entire field of banking and in the broader field of financial institutions which may result from other aspects of the merger - are irrelevant and may not be considered.
>
> As the Banking and Currency Committee said in 1959 in reporting out the Bank Merger Act of 1960, we do not want the banking agencies and the courts to say, as did Judge Weinfeld in the Bethlehem-Youngstown merger, "If the merger offends the statute in any relevant market then good motives and even demonstrable benefits are irrelevant and afford no defense." (U.S.A. v. Bethlehem Steel Corp. et al., 168 F. Supp. 576, (D.N.Y. 1958); see Senate Report No. 196, 86th Cong., S. 1062, pp. 5-6.)
>
> We do not want the court to say, as it did in the [51] Philadelphia case, that a merger which may substantially lessen competition in one line of business in one section of the country "is not saved because, on some ultimate reckoning of social debits and credits, it may be deemed beneficial." We do not want the court to apply a statute which, in the words of the court in the Philadelphia case, proscribes "anticompetitive mergers, the benign and the malignant alike." (Hearings on S. 1698, p. 403). In considering whether a proposed [*156] merger may lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly or be in restraint of trade, the banking agencies and the courts will, of course, take into consideration all the factors which I have discussed under the question of monopoly - the competition from other financial institutions in one or another part of its business, the competition from other banks and other financial institutions, locally, regionally, nationally and internationally, the inevitable limitations on competition imposed by statute and by regulatory authorities, with respect to entry into the business and with respect to the carrying on of the business. All of these factors must be taken into consideration in weighing the overall [52] anticompetitive effects of the proposed merger. (Cong. Rec. Feb. 9, 1966, p. 2541-2.)

And Congressman Ashley, as house manager for S. 1698, in reporting out his version of that bill, commented on the problem as follows:

> The Committee recognized that commercial banks face intensive competition from other financial institutions - savings and loan associations, mutual savings banks, insurance companies, finance companies, and so forth. The Committee also recognized that competition between commercial banks and other institutions includes local competition, regional competition, national competition and even international competition for one part or > another of the business. To overlook any one of these aspects of competition, or to concentrate on one of them to the exclusion of the others, would be unrealistic and might well diminish, not increase, financial competition. [17]

[53] In interpreting the Bank Merger Act of 1966 as it was finally enacted, plaintiff urges the court to listen only to the words of Representative Patman and his associate, Representative Reuss, who, plaintiff proposes "are the principal architects" of the legislation. Yet, anyone reading the legislative history of the Act cannot help but conclude that the language of Senator Robertson and Representative Ashley more properly defines the scope and intent of the Act.

Certain things are clear from the legislative history. The initial bill was offered by Senator Robertson. With an amendment by Senator Proxmire it passed the Senate and was offered in the House by Representative Ashley. It was not until after a majority of the House Banking and Currency Committee, in an allegedly "rump" session, had voted to approve the Ashley bill that Representative Patman agreed to let any bill come out of the committee. In reporting the bill which bears his name and which became the Bank Merger Act of 1966, Representative Patman reported to the Congress:

> Mr. Chairman, if I alone were writing this legislation and proposing it, I certainly would not propose it as it is before us. I would be [54] against it as a matter of principle. (Cong. Rec., Feb. 8, 1966, p. 2357.)

We think it reflects no discredit upon Representative Patman if the court, recognizing the limitations of human nature, views his interpretations of this statute with a jaundiced eye. He opposed the bill "in principle" and with all his legendary vigor. What would be more natural than for him to attempt to shave its impact as much as possible when it reached the floor of the House?

On the other hand, Senators Robertson and Proxmire had sponsored the legislation in the Senate, as had Representative Ashley [18] in the House. When the [*157] House passed the amended bill, Senator Robertson quickly sponsored the House version before the Senate Banking Committee, where it was approved by a 9 to 2 vote.

[55] Since the bill was eminently satisfactory to its original sponsors and so distasteful to Representative Patman, is it not to the "winners" that we should turn for an evaluation of the meaning of the statute?

Competing financial institutions other than banks.

The court, having concluded that HN2[] the intent of Congress in deleting the phrase "line of commerce" from the Bank Merger Act of 1966 was to permit an assessment of the competitive effect of a merger, not in the narrow market consisting solely of commercial banks, but in the wider and more realistic field of all institutions which compete either for the savings or investment dollar or for the extension of credit, now reviews this wider field.

It would be appropriate to here also note that students have pointed out that because of the regulations to which banks are subjected, the character of their competition is quite different from that of other nonregulated industries or businesses and explains in part the reasons which prompted the 1966 amendments to the Bank Merger Act. [19]

---

[17] H.R. No. 1179, 10/19/65. For a description of the bill's odyssey through Congress, see article from Wall Street Journal for February 8, 1966, entitled "The Bank Merger Bill's Zany Journey".

[18] In submitting H.R. 12173 to the Senate, Senator Robertson acknowledged the large role played by Representative Ashley in securing passage: "I want to pay a special tribute to Congressman Ashley of Ohio for his work in connection with this bill. His untiring and constructive efforts have brought about the virtual unanimity in the House . . . ." (Cong. Rec., Feb. 9, 1966, p. 2551.)

Congressman Grabowski, in the course of the debate, noted: "I am proud to have been associated with my colleagues . . . in helping to draft this legislation." (Cong. Rec., Feb. 8, 1966, p. 2355.)

[56] [*158] The following uncontroverted data, contained in the record and appropriately cited by exhibit number, demonstrates the extent to which competition exists in the State of California between banks and various other financial institutions. The information is based upon a hypothetical statewide market and demonstrates the insignificance of Crocker-Citizens' share of the savings and credits throughout the state.

(a) In 1962, California savings amounted to $46,057,807,000, only 27.12 per cent of which were held by commercial banks and only 2.63 per cent of which were held by Crocker and Citizens (BK-E-27):

	(000 omitted)
Commercial Banks
(IPC time deposits)	$12,493,031

---

[19] For an expression of these views, see: The 1966 Amendment to the Bank Merger Act, Economic Perspective and Legal Analysis, 20 Vand.L.Rev. 200 (1966), and Phillips, Competition, Confusion and Commercial Banking, 19 J. Finance 32 (1964). The writer in the Vanderbilt Law Review article, at pages 201-203, noted in part:

> While generally the occasional failure of business concerns is not considered undesirable in light of the overall benefits to be derived from unrestricted competition, the central role of banking in the national economy has fostered widespread recognition that bank solvency and liquidity are sufficiently important to require a check on competitive forces. Therefore, public regulation of commercial banking reflects an attempt to obtain the benefits of competition while guarding against widespread bank failure as a method of eliminating the less efficient competitors from the market structure. As a result the regulatory scheme is characterized by the somewhat conflicting objectives of efficiency through competition and stability through regulation.
>
> The most fundamental regulation imposed upon the market structure of commercial banking is limitation of entry. A charter for a new national bank will not be granted unless the capital structure, earnings prospects and management capabilities of the prospective bank give adequate assurance that entry will not produce excessive competition and possible failure. Similarly, inability to meet these standards may cause the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC), in effect, to prevent entry by denying an application for deposit insurance. The FDIC, Federal Reserve Board (FRB), and the Comptroller of the Currency may refuse permission to open new branches on the same grounds. Furthermore, national banks are apparently subject to state law with regard to branching limitations.
>
> Banks are also subject to numerous provisions designed to insure sound banking practices. For example, banks belonging to the Federal Reserve System (member banks) and insured non-member banks are precluded from paying interest on demand deposits. This discourages competitive efforts to attract demand deposits and the correlative tendency to make speculative loans and investments to cover the interest costs. Federal law also requires the FRB and FDIC to specify maximum rates of interest that insured banks may pay on savings and time deposits. A number of states also limit the rate of interest payable, and, where the state rate is below the federal maximum, federal law requires that national banks not exceed the state maximum rate.
>
> Regulation of competition also extends to the market for bank loans. The area within which competitive forces operate is circumscribed as to maximum rates by state usury laws, and is affected as to the minimum charge by FRB manipulation of the rediscount rate, open-market operations and modification of reserve requirements. While the FRB operations are not regulatory in the strict sense, they affect the supply of money and credit in the economy and thereby influence the "prime" or minimum bank interest rate. In the range between the practical minimum set by Federal Reserve policy and the maximum allowed under state usury laws, competitive forces are free to operate. Moreover, national banks are precluded from lending more than an amount equal to ten per cent of their paid-in capital and unimpaired surplus to any one obligor, and state banks are generally subject to similar limitations. National and state member banks are also prohibited from investing in common stocks, and from holding for their own account investment securities of a single obligor in excess of ten per cent of the bank's unimpaired capital and surplus. Such investment prohibitions, while helping to insure continued stability, have the added effect of limiting the control which banks might otherwise exert over industry in general. In addition, the broad visitorial powers of federal bank examiners provide the agencies with a flow of information based on frequent and intensive examinations. The banks must furnish detailed periodic reports of their operations, and the agencies have the power to order examinations whenever they are deemed necessary. Numerous sanctions are provided, but the vast majority of banks go to great lengths to avoid grounds for criticism. The foregoing restrictions on private initiative have caused economists to question the extent to which antitrust policy can foster a type of competition conducive to improved bank performance.

	(000 omitted)
Savings and Loan Associations
(Savings Capital)	13,400,000
U.S. Savings Bonds (Redemption value of bonds held by individuals)	4,644,000
Credit Unions
(Share capital and member deposits)	814,463
Postal Savings
(Balance to credit of depositors)	32,137
Life Insurance Reserves	9,646,176
Mutual Investment Funds
(Market value of net assets)	2,279,000
U.S. Government Marketable
Securities With Maturity Within
1 Year from Date of Issue	2,749,000

[57] [*159] As of December 28, 1962, Crocker and Citizens combined held only 2.63 per cent of the total (BK-E-27).

(b) As of January 1962, commercial banks held only 10.01 per cent of California farm mortgage loans:

	(000 omitted)
All Operating Banks	$138,604
Life Insurance Companies	208,760
Federal Land Banks	187,167
Farmers Home Administration	9,555
Individuals and Others	840,000
Total	$ 1,384,086

As to the closest available date, Crocker and Citizens together held only 1.34 per cent of California farm mortgage loans (BK-E-28).

(c) As of January 1962, total California agricultural loans amounted to $2,184,790,000, only 33.4 per cent of which were held by operating banks:

	(000 omitted)
All Operating Banks	$730,396
Life Insurance Companies	208,760
Federal Land Banks	187,167
Banks for Cooperatives	92,303
Farmers Home Administration	15,802
Rural Electrification Administration	35,020
Production Credit Associations	75,342
Individuals and Others	840,000

As of the closest available date, Crocker and Citizens combined held only 2.77 per cent of California agricultural loans (BK-E-29).

(d) As [58] of 1962, California mortgage debt on non-farm real estate amounted to $32,150,162,000, only 18.6 per cent of which was held by commercial banks:

	(000 omitted)
Commercial Banks	$5,978,775
Mutual Savings Banks	2,196,000
Savings and Loan Associations	13,941,000
Life Insurance Companies	5,634,387
Others	4,400,000

As of the same date, Crocker and Citizens held only 1.80 per cent of that total (BK-E-31). [20]

[*160] (e) In 1962, commercial banks held [59] only 32.74 per cent of the total California business loans and credit outstanding. The $21,276,061,000 total amount of such loans and credit was held as follows:

	(000 omitted)
Commercial Banks	$ 6,945,861
Commercial and Finance Company Paper	598,800
Small Business Administration	76,600
Finance Companies	1,111,700
Life Insurance Companies	2,064,400
Savings and Loan Associations	588,700
Trade Credit	9,830,000

Crocker and Citizens held 2.85 per cent of that total (BK-E-33).

(f) In 1962, commercial banks held only 44.36 per cent of California's $7,101,896,000 installment and non-installment consumer credit:

	(000 omitted)
Commercial Banks (Installment credit and single payment loans)	$ 3,150,596
Other Financial Institutions (Single payment loans)	87,500
Sales Finance Companies	1,219,400
Credit Unions	497,300
Consumer Finance Companies	379,900
Others - Installment Credit	160,000
Retail Outlets (Installment credit and charge accounts)	1,156,600
Credit Cards	51,200
Service Credit	399,400

Crocker and Citizens had 5.56 per cent of that total (BK-E-35).

---

[20] The accuracy of the above tabulation is reflected in table 14 of the Report of the Governor's Banking Study Committee on the Future of Banking in California (January 26, 1965), which is based on data for 1951 as of March 31; for 1954 and 1960 as of September 30; and 1957 and 1962 as of October 31. The table clearly demonstrates the extent to which competition from other financial institutions has materially affected a very substantial element within the banks' line of commerce between 1951 and 1962:

[SEE TABLE IN ORIGINAL]

[*161] The financial institutions [60] which compete with commercial banks are located in every part of the State of California:

(a) The Morris Plan Company has 47 offices in 46 communities located in every area of the state. Its eight San Francisco Bay area offices include at least one in each of the five counties which plaintiff claims to be the relevant local market, and its 12 offices in the Los Angeles metropolitan area include three in Orange County and nine in Los Angeles County. As of December 31, 1955, it had total assets of $115,067,049 and total loans of $116,913,051 (BK-GGG, pp. 1-2).

(b) As of December 31, 1964, there were 70 federal and 206 state chartered savings and loan associations doing business in California through 670 offices located throughout the state (BK-GGG, p. 3; Ct. 195 (Exh. 15-B, p. 2)). Their total assets amount to $23.9 billion. Of those, 43, with total loans of $3 billion and total share accounts of $2.9 billion, have their headquarters in the San Francisco Bay area. Another 112, with total loans exceeding $13 billion and total assets exceeding $12 billion, are headquartered in Los Angeles and Orange Counties (BK-GGG, p. 3).

(c) As of December 31, 1965, there were nine agencies of [61] the General Motors Acceptance Corporation in California having 18 offices in the principal economic areas of the state. Their total loans and discounts exceeded $450 million and their total assets amounted to more than $460 million. The two agencies located in the San Francisco Bay area had total loans and discounts of almost $100 million and total assets exceeding that sum. In Los Angeles and Orange Counties, five General Motors Acceptance Corporation agencies with seven offices have total loans and discounts of more than $300 million and total assets of more than $306 million (BK-GGG, p. 4).

(d) The California Department of Veterans Affairs, Division of Farm and Home Purchases, has 14 offices located in the principal economic areas of the state, and as of June 1965, had 127,201 home loan purchase contracts outstanding, with a total outstanding balance of $1.3 billion, and in addition, had 1,294 farm loan purchase contracts outstanding, with a total balance of $31.5 million. Of those, almost 25,000 home loan purchase contracts, with an outstanding balance of approximately $260 million, were held by its two offices in the San Francisco Bay area. The three offices in Los Angeles [62] and Orange Counties held almost 40,000 home loan purchase contracts, with an aggregate balance of more than $380 million (BK-GGG, p. 5).

(e) Finance companies are also very active in the California local markets. As of 1961, there were 1,183 finance company offices in California, with total loans of $695 million (Ct. 195 (Exh. 15-C, p. 6)).

(f) Credit unions are active throughout California. As of 1962, they numbered approximately 1,750, had total assets of $917 million, total loans of $765 million and total share accounts of $814 million (Ct. 195 (Exh. 15-C, p. 2)). As of 1965, there were 88 operating credit unions in the San Francisco Bay area, including 28 in the City and County of San Francisco, 8 in San Mateo County, 14 in Contra Costa County, 2 in Marin County and 36 in Alameda County (BK-GGG, pp. 6-8). On the same date, there were 136 operating credit unions in Los Angeles County and another 17 in Orange County, for a total of 153 in the Los Angeles metropolitan area (BK-GGG, pp. 9-12).

(g) Some 371 insurance companies do business in the State of California. Together they have total assets of $156.7 billion and total loans of $65.8 billion (BK-GGG, pp. 21-36). The assets [63] of 27 of them each exceed $1 billion, 16 exceed $2 billion, 11 exceed $3 billion, 8 exceed $5 billion and 2 exceed $20 billion (BK-GGG, pp. 21-36).

(h) There is no shortage of insurance companies doing business in the local markets in California. Some 200 insurance companies are represented in the five-county San Francisco Bay area. Together they have assets in excess of [*162] $149 billion and loans exceed $63 billion (BK-GGG, pp. 13-16). A slightly larger number do business in Los Angeles and Orange Counties. There some 213 insurance companies are represented, with total assets exceeding $150 billion and total loans exceeding $63.8 billion (BK-GGG, pp. 17-20).

In plaintiff's hypothetical state market, where convenience is no longer a controlling factor, not only must a drastic modification (a reduction in percentage figures, as will be hereinafter shown) be made to reflect the foregoing data showing the competition given commercial banks by all financial institutions, but a further adjustment must be made to account for both out-of-state and foreign banks. Before making such necessary adjustments to plaintiff's concentration ratios, we reiterate and re-emphasize that [64] were the court to confine its consideration of the facts of this case to commercial banking as the sole line of commerce, and thus accept the plaintiff's interpretation of subparagraph B of § 1828(c)(5) of Title 12 U.S.C., we would still make the same basic findings herein made and reach the same conclusion.

Adjustments to plaintiff's concentration ratios.

Throughout the trial, in its proposed findings and its brief, plaintiff has placed reliance on its concentration figures, so-called "concentration ratio", [21] as an assertedly reliable indicator of the probable competitive effects of the instant merger. One would think, therefore, that plaintiff would endeavor to present the court with a figure closely approximating the actual state of affairs, particularly since plaintiff has the burden of proof on that issue. Yet, plaintiff made no adjustment in any of its exhibits purporting to reflect concentration ratios for the business done in California by out-of-state banks, notwithstanding (1) its knowledge that the Supreme Court made a 16 2/3 per cent adjustment therefor (from 36 per cent to 30 per cent) in United States v. Philadelphia Nat. Bank, supra 374 U.S. at 364 n. 40; (2) [65] its concession that California is a capital import state and that out-of-state [*163] banks solicit the loans of business firms in California; and (3) prior warning that the amount of such business would be in issue.

[66] Even if there were no evidence on the extent of the adjustment required, some adjustment would have to be made. In the Philadelphia case, the Supreme Court reduced the share of the merging banks from 36 per cent to 30 per cent for business done by banks outside the relevant area, though there was no evidence reflecting the amount of that business. Since California is growing more rapidly than Pennsylvania, and since larger amounts of capital are imported to finance that growth, it would be expected that a larger percentage of bank financing would come from out of state. In an effort to make this necessary adjustment, Professor Weston not only relied upon the study of capital imports for home loans made in California by Leo Grebler, Professor of Real Estate and Urban Land Economics of the Graduate School of Business Administration at U.C.L.A., wherein he estimated that out-of-state funds provided 38 per cent of California home mortgage loan funds (and further concluded therefrom and his own knowledge and experience that a higher percentage would be expected for business loans) (Tr. 1580), but he also made an independent study based upon a 1955 loan survey of the Governors of [67] the Federal Reserve

---

[21] The recent case of United States v. Von's Grocery Co., 384 U.S. 270, 16 L. Ed. 2d 555, 86 S. Ct. 1478 (1966), definitely established that concentration is a function of the market. That case involved the merger of two competing grocery chains in the Los Angeles area. Mr. Justice Black's majority opinion makes clear that section 7 deals with the number of separate competitors and market concentration. In disregarding a finding of the district court that there had been no increase in concentration, Mr. Justice Black noted that there had been a decline of more than 1700 separate competitors in the market and, speaking for the majority, stated:

> It is thus apparent that the District Court, in finding No. 80, used the term "concentration" in some sense other than a total decrease in the number of separate competitors which is the crucial point here. (384 U.S. at 273 n. 3.)

He goes on to state:

> Thus, where concentration is gaining momentum in a market, we must be alert to carry out Congress' intent to protect competition against ever increasing concentration through mergers. (384 U.S. at 277.)

In the instant case there has been at least a 35% increase in the number of separate competitors in every local banking market which plaintiff contends are relevant for judging the effects of the instant merger (BK-M; BK-N; BK-P; BK-Q; BK-OO; BK-PP). During the period 1954-1964, 706 new entries added as many "separate competitors" in various communities throughout California (BK-H; BK-I; BK-J). In the short period since the Crocker-Citizens merger, 69 new banks have been established in various sections of California, 19 of them in Los Angeles County (G-360). Interestingly enough, even if the state as a whole is taken as a market, we find that in terms of independent competitors, there has been a substantial increase in the number of competing banks since 1945 because, as Professor Dirlam had to admit, the Government overlooked the fact that its 208 "banks" in 1945 included all the Transamerica banks, as well as other affiliated banks which were not independent competitors (Dirlam, Tr. 729-733).

System (BK-Y, Tr. 1555). On the basis of that survey, which was the only source of data from which out-of-state bank loans to California borrowers might be derived, he calculated that of the total business loans made to California borrowers by commercial banks in the United States, the combined share of Crocker First National Bank and Anglo-California National Bank (which became Crocker-Anglo National Bank in 1956) and Citizens National Bank was only 6.41 per cent, which when compared with their 9 per cent share of the reported business loans by all California banks, represents an adjustment (reduction) of 28.78 per cent (BK-Y, Table 4; Tr. 1560-1568). The effect of such an adjustment, which it would be erroneous not to make, will be hereinafter shown.

The magnitude of the adjustment required to compensate for business done by out-of-state banks is itself evidence of the fact that the whole of California is not a relevant commercial banking market (Weston, Tr. 1583), a market based on economic facts that correspond to business reality.

An adjustment of Crocker-Citizens' share of the hypothetical statewide market should also be made for available resources of [68] foreign banks. Such an adjustment is difficult, if not impossible, to measure, unless we resort to plaintiff's theory that every office of a bank has behind it all the resources of its whole system. In such event, if we were to postulate as the Government does, an adjustment of plaintiff's concentration figures for California would have to include resources from foreign banks. The resources of these foreign banks, with subsidiaries and agencies in California, totaled $23.23 billion as of December 31, 1962, as contrasted to $29.99 billion for all California banks. As of that date, the resources of such foreign banks were of such magnitude as to reduce Crocker-Citizens' hypothetical market share of deposits suggested by the Government from 9.6 per cent to 5.4 per cent (BK-Z, Table II). This we know would be an erroneous reduction, since a foreign bank, even more so than a statewide bank, cannot afford to risk all of its resources in a single market, nor are foreign banks generally able to do so because of capital export restrictions imposed by law in most countries. However, it is clear from the evidence in this case, including the testimony of plaintiff's witnesses Thomson and [69] Goto, representatives of the Chartered Bank of London and the Bank of Tokyo, Ltd., that a part of these total resources are available as a potential factor in California competition. What part of these resources are so available and the degree to which they would require a reduction of Crocker-Citizens' [*164] market share in California we cannot say nor reliably estimate. What we do know is that these foreign banks already have offices, and in one case, nine locations, in California. [22] Even though only a portion of the very substantial world-wide resources of these foreign banks are available for use in California, the availability of such resources would enable these offices to participate substantially with little effort in the asserted statewide market and in the local markets where they have offices (Goodman, Tr. 1735, 1880-1881). In the same way that a branch can shift its lending power from one particular branch to another, a foreign bank with an agency in California can shift its relative lending power from Montreal or London to San Francisco or Los Angeles (Goodman, Tr. 1737). The amount of funds that an agency of a foreign bank will divert to California is, from an [70] economist's standpoint, determined by the profits to be made. If there were a substantial increase in interest rates in California, there would be an immediate influx of funds brought into California for lending by foreign banks (Goodman, Tr. 1722-1723). Even plaintiff's staff economist testified that Crocker's ability to concentrate their total resources in the Los Angeles metropolitan area differed from the foreign banks' ability to concentrate their resources in California only in degree (Gaffey, Tr. 1100).

It is apparent from the foregoing that the resources of foreign banks operating in California would require some further adjustment in Crocker-Citizens' assumed market share, and while it could never equal a reduction from 9.6 per cent to 5.4 per cent, as the logic of plaintiff's theory [71] of availability of total resources of a bank with branches would lead us, it would, nevertheless, be substantial. However, since we are unable to measure this reduction in percentages, we make no further reference thereto, except to note that the percentage ratio of Crocker-Citizens' share of the assumed market should in fact be slightly less than the figures hereinafter established by the court.

Plaintiff's concentration figures are unreliable.

---

[22] On December 31, 1964, there were six state chartered foreign banks having 22 banking offices and agencies of seven foreign banks doing business in California. Two others had permits and stated they would open in 1965.

Primarily, for the reasons above indicated, we not only find that plaintiff's limited line of commerce figures purporting to show increases in concentration are unrealistic and inappropriate for the purpose of assessing the competitive effect of the instant merger, but we are further satisfied that these figures, which are related almost wholly to the Bank of America, are inconsistent with plaintiff's theories of market, unreliable and unsound. Furthermore, they are not supported by the banking agencies.

The trial revealed a basic inconsistency in plaintiff's theory which undermined the testimony of both its experts and its exhibits. Dirlam and Gaffey assumed that the State of California was a market and that the number of competing [72] banks had declined very substantially between 1945 and 1963. This being their theory, they had to admit that affiliated banks or banks commonly owned did not compete against each other. When this fact was brought to their attention, together with the existence of Transamerica as a holding company, [23] [74] they had to [*165] admit that instead of there being a decline in the number of banks between 1945 and 1963, there was a substantial increase in the number of competing units in California during that period. Witness the testimony of Dirlam [24] (Tr. 729, lines 20-24):

Q. How many of those 208 banks in 1945 were controlled by Transamerica Corporation?

A. That I don't know.

Q. Didn't it ever occur to you to ask that?

A. As a matter of fact, it didn't.

and (Tr. 733, lines 9-17):

---

[23] In determining how many banks were controlled by Transamerica, plaintiff's expert voiced the opinion that a 20% interest would be significant (Tr. 730). In 1949, Transamerica owned at least 20% of the outstanding stock in some 27 California banks, including Bank of America and Citizens.

In reaching his opinion as to the alleged reduction in the number of banks in California, Dirlam was of the belief that the total number of banks in the state dropped from 171 in 1954 to 129 in 1962, for an overall reduction of 42 (Dirlam, Tr. 735, lines 9-12; G-25). In reaching that conclusion, Dirlam overlooked the fact that a number of the banks in existence prior to 1962 were controlled by Firstamerica (Dirlam, Tr. 735, line 9 - Tr. 736, line 5). Under this hypothesis, however, the banks controlled by it could not be regarded as independent competing units. They were not competing against each other (Dirlam, Tr. 736, lines 6-9).

It was during the period 1954-1962 that the "old" First Western purchased 23 banks from Transamerica (G-30, nn. 2, 3). It was also during that period that The California Bank and the "old" First Western acquired 33 other banks (for a total of 56) to form the present United California Bank in February 1961, with the approval of the Department of Justice (G-26, pp. 6-7).

How many other banks in existence in 1945 and which merged prior to the end of 1964 were similarly controlled by common shareholders cannot be ascertained from the evidence. Plaintiff's witness had no way of knowing (Dirlam, Tr. 731, 732).

One group of banks under common ownership which plaintiff treated as four separate banks were the Work banks in Salinas, Monterey, Carmel and Pacific Grove. All four had been controlled by the Work family prior to Crocker-Anglo's acquisition of the Salinas bank in 1956 and of the other three in 1959 (G-26, p. 2; G-337, p. 51, lines 22-24; p. 52, lines 13-18; p. 54, lines 4-6).

Plaintiff even counted the Bank of San Rafael and First National Bank in San Rafael as separate banks, although they had identical shareholders, identical officers, shared the same building and published statements in the same annual report (G-26, p. 2; G-337, p. 94, line 20 - p. 95, line 6). Moreover the Bank of San Rafael was a savings bank without demand deposits, and by Dirlam's definition "savings banks" were outside the line of commerce (G-13; Dirlam, Tr. 493, 556, 558).

[24] The testimony of Professor Joel B. Dirlam as it related to banking in California was too speculative and hypothetical to carry much weight with this court. He had only recently been concerned with the field of banking, had never been to Los Angeles, had never been to San Francisco prior to the trial, knew nothing about the various other California communities other than what was disclosed on maps, had made "no particular study of California", and did not investigate banking in California. Contrasted to his testimony is that of Professor J. Fred Weston of the Graduate School of Business Administration of the University of California, Los Angeles, who knows California well and had had many years' experience in the problems of the financial industry in California, and Associate Professor Oscar Goodman of the Graduate School of Business at Northwestern University, who was one of the experts relied upon by the Government in the Philadelphia and Lexington cases, who had resided and taught for a period in California and who had made a special, extensive and "on the ground" study of the banking situation in California for the purposes of the trial of this case.

Q. . . . Can't we agree on one other thing, Doctor, that neither you nor I know the precise number, but from the standpoint of independent competing units, the number of independent competing units is greater in 1964 than it was in 1945? How much is the only question.
A. To the extent that Transamerica has -
Q. That's right.
A. I think I would agree on that.

Q. When you originally [73] testified on direct, you thought the reverse was true, did you not?
A. Yes.

[75] Strangely enough, plaintiff, in its opening brief, still contended that " . . . the total number of competing banks actually went down from 208 in 1945." Inasmuch as the evidence shows that there were other affiliated banks in 1945 and later and that plaintiff made no attempt [*166] to eliminate any affiliates or subsidiaries other than those of Trans-America (Pltf. Opening Brief, p. 34, n. 1), it is apparent that plaintiff's figures are unreliable. Even on plaintiff's figures, however, the number of banks increased from 178 in 1950 to 200 in 1964 (G-25A). Dr. Gaffey, plaintiff's staff economist, testified that this trend was a favorable factor (Tr. 1145-1146).

Statistically, plaintiff's analysis of the effect of the instant merger on concentration was fallacious, as well as hypothetical. All plaintiff's figures on concentration included Crocker-Citizens with the Bank of America. On almost every basis the Bank of America has approximately a 40 per cent share of the hypothetical state market. It has more offices in Los Angeles County alone than Crocker-Citizens has in the entire state. For this reason, as Professor Goodman points out, it is statistically unsound to group [76] the Bank of America together with any other bank in an attempt to analyze what effect the other bank has on markets or market structure. [25]

---

[25] On this point Professor Goodman testified as follows:

Q. Now would you tell us what is involved statistically in economics whenever you take, for example, one unit, such as Crocker-Citizens, and put it with a group such as "all others" or put it with a group such as "the first five," what is a statistican [sic] or economist trying to do when he does that?

A. One has many purposes in examining data. One ordinarily groups data in order to draw off some significant conclusions relative to particular size or particular groups. When he groups data, he must group data which will lend itself to such analysis.

If one group, as we have in No. 1, the Bank of America with "all others" in this case, the two statistics taken as a group demonstrate that the Bank of America - as a result of its presence in many, many more local markets in the state of California than any other bank in the state of California, the accumulation of the sum total of the participation of the Bank of America in all of the local markets in California is so dominant a figure that if you were to add any other figures to the Bank of America, the result: No other individual banks could affect the end result that you would get, all the figures would be dominated by the Bank of America.

It is like trying to combine a giant and a pigmy and say something about the size of a man by so doing. They are two separate classes of men and you cannot draw off a conclusion as to the average of a man by combining a 20 foot giant with a 4 foot pigmy.

Statistically this is impossible, to get relevant or meaningful figures from such a combination.

Q. And is this what occurs in the category No. 3, which shows the cumulative total for the first five banks?

A. Yes. The figure is dominated completely by the Bank of America. No changes among the other four could very much affect the end result because when you add a giant, which is in a class all by itself, with the others, which fundamentally are in a completely different class, the sum total does not reflect like items. It reflects two separate groupings of items.

Q. Sort of like saying Cashus [sic] Clay and Archer and Schoepke could lick any man in the courtroom. It is a true statement but it doesn't show much about Archer's or Schoepke's physical prowess.

A. I think that's a fair statement.

(Tr. 1766-1768)

Judge Pope: On that last exhibit I would like to ask this witness a question (Exhibit BKYY).

[77] [*167] Professor Goodman testified that such a grouping of the Bank of America with other banks produces what is known in statistics as an inverted "J", from which it is impossible to obtain a statistically meaningful analysis. Plaintiff's expert had to admit that if in the hypothetical California market, the Bank of America were omitted, there would be no economic basis for objecting to concentration in that market. On the other hand, if Crocker and Citizens were both excluded from plaintiff's statistical analysis of that hypothetical market, concentration would still exist. Accordingly, any concentration in the California hypothetical market is not a function of Crocker-Anglo or Citizens alone or together. And, further, there was no evidence that the merger of Crocker and Citizens created a bank, which, by itself or in combination with any other bank other than the Bank of America, could adversely affect competition in California banking. From an economist's standpoint a market in which about 155 (or more accurately, some 200) banks have 60 per cent of the market is a healthy market.

The Government attempts to make something out of the fact that the two voting FDIC directors [78] "deadlocked" in reporting on the merger. We rather think that the FDIC directors stood two to one in the banks' favor because the Comptroller clearly favored the merger, and though an FDIC director, abstained from voting (BK-A, p. 54).

In 1961, the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System launched a new program for comprehensive research in the field of banking structure and bank competition. This research included an over-all study of the measurement of concentration which is reported in Smith, "Measures of Banking Structure and Competition," 51 Fed. Reserve Bull. 1212-1222 (Sept. 1965). The general conclusions there reached substantiate the specific

---

Does your theory as to the effect of adding a very small peripheral concern to the market in which there is one dominant operator square with the theory that was developed by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Aluminum Company case in which the Court said something like this - this is quoted from the Philadelphia Bank case, with which I think you are familiar -

The Witness: Yes, sir.

Judge Pope:

"It is no answer that, among the three presently largest firms . . . there will be no increase in concentration. If this argument were valid, then once a market has become unduly concentrated, further concentration would be legally privileged. On the contrary, if concentration is already great, the importance of preventing even slight increases in concentration and so preserving the possibility of eventual deconcentration is correspondingly great."

And further down:

"The acquisition of Rome added, it is said, only 1.3 percent to Alcoa's control of the aluminum conductor market. But in this setting that seems to us reasonably likely to produce a substantial lessening of competition of Section 7."

How does the theory that you expounded in respect to this last exhibit square with that?

The Witness: All I have been talking about so far, Your Honor, is the question of a measurement of size.

The question that you have asked me to address myself to is the significance of changes in competitors in a particular market, the effect on competition in that market of a change of competitors.

You must, in order to do that, set up some measurement of size, study the tone of competition and come to some conclusion about the effect of competition.

The example that you posed poses a situation where the number - the giant in your case, the Aluminum Company - in this case the Bank of America - were to combine with a pigmy, and the result would be an increase in the size of a giant as a result of merger on the tone of competition in that market and on the potential competition in that market.

We do not have that situation in this case. This is a completely different situation. We have a situation where we have a giant and then many much smaller other competitors, and eventually, after - I will be glad to address myself to the question, of the effect on competition in this proposed market of a change in the relative size of two of the competitors in this market which has 200 competitors, on the tone of competition in that market at the present time and on the potentiality of competition. In other words, that is the question we address ourselves to. The example in the Aluminum case does not apply to this particular set of statistics.

(Tr. 1769-1771)

conclusions we have reached regarding markets in this case. Smith points out the weaknesses of concentration ratios which fail to consider disparity in size of banks (ibid. at 1214, 1215) and which fail to consider all competitors within the market (ibid. at 1215). He affirms the necessity for a reliable definition of market area (ibid. at 1216-1217). [*168] He also finds banking markets to be local or national (ibid. at 1217-1218). He states (ibid. at 1216-1217): "The metropolitan area may indeed be the appropriate [79] market area. If so, the State, or the nation, could not also constitute the appropriate market area." Accordingly, all plaintiff's suggested findings on concentration are without basis in fact and unsound in theory.

The largest increase in concentration in plaintiff's hypothetical statewide market in the period 1950 to 1962 was caused by the creation of United California Bank. The increase was over three times the increase in concentration caused by the merger of Crocker and Citizens. Yet none of the agencies, including the Department of Justice, viewed the creation of United California Bank as creating an increase in concentration. (1961 Ann. Report FDIC, pp. 60-62; 48th Ann. Report of Board of Governors of Fed. Reserve System, 150-52.) On the other hand, the instant merger produced only a very slight change in the market structure, even in plaintiff's hypothetical statewide market. First Western Bank was also created with Government approval.

A consistent statistical analysis of the plaintiff's hypothetical market shows that the merger was insignificant. If the statistical methods showing changes in market structure which were employed by the Department of Justice in the [80] Philadelphia case, but which it elected not to employ in the instant case, were used as demonstrated by Exhibit BK-VV, [26] the change is almost imperceptible. [*169] The market share of the nine largest banks in the

---

[26] Relative Ranking of California Banks on Theory of Government's Exhibit 32 in United States v. Philadelphia

I.

Government's Exhibit 32

Table 32

Relative Ranking of the Five Largest

Philadelphia Banks by Total Deposits

(No. 1 Bank - 100)

Before Consolidation

After Consolidation

Bank No. 1 (1st Penna.)

100

Bank No. 1 (Phila.-Girard)

100

Bank No. 2 (Phila. Nat'l)

97

Bank No. 2 (1st Penna.)

62

Bank No. 3 (Girard)

65

Bank No. 3 (Provident Trades)

28 hypothetical market at the end of 1962 was substantially the same as the market share of the nine largest banks at

---

Bank No. 4 (Provident Tradesmen's)

45

Bank No. 4 (Fidelity-Phila.)

26

Bank No. 5 (Fidelity-Phila.)

42

Bank No. 5 (Central-Penn.)

15

Source: Record on Appeal, 2413

II.

Relative Ranking of the Ten Largest California Banks by Deposits

Before Merger

After Merger

First Bank

B of A

100

B of A

100

Second Bank

Security First

34

Security First

34

Third Bank

Wells Fargo

the end of 1963 after this merger. Accordingly, if there was any significant effect on concentration, it was among

---

25

Wells Fargo

25

Fourth Bank

UCB

20

CROCKER-CITIZENS

25

Fifth Bank

CROCKER-ANGLO

18

UCB

20

Sixth Bank

Union

8

Union

8

Seventh Bank

Bank of California

7

Bank of California

7

Eighth Bank

CITIZENS NATIONAL

6

First Western

5

1st Nat'l,

Ninth Bank

First Western

5

San Diego

2

1st Nat'l,

Tenth Bank

San Diego

those banks which have statewide facilities and in this area the effect of the merger was obviously to decrease concentration.

[81] Appropriate Sections of the Country.

In its complaint and in the pre-trial proceedings, plaintiff eliminated from the consideration of this court any question of the effect of the instant merger in national and international markets (Pre-Trial Order, pp. 3-4, 9, 11). At all events, the evidence will in no way support any conclusion that the instant merger had any actual or potential adverse competitive effect in either of the markets. If anything, the evidence, as will be herein shown in the court's discussion of convenience and needs of the community, affirmatively shows that California benefited by reason of the ability of Crocker-Citizens to compete a little more effectively in these markets.

The geographic market was originally limited to the State of California as a whole, the Los Angeles metropolitan area (Los Angeles and Orange Counties), and the San Francisco Bay area (City and County of San Francisco, and counties of Alameda, Contra Costa, Marin and San Mateo), (BK-AA, No. 55). At the final pre-trial conference, plaintiff added three counties as alleged separate sections of the country: Ventura, Santa Barbara, and Kern Counties. At that time the court stated that, [82] if, at the close of plaintiff's case, plaintiff was relying on these three counties as markets for evaluating the instant merger, the defendant banks would be granted additional time within which to prepare; however, this proved unnecessary, for neither of plaintiff's experts testified that Ventura, Santa Barbara or Kern Counties were appropriate sections of the country for assessing the impact of the merger. The court regards plaintiff as having abandoned any contention that those counties are appropriate sections of the country within which to judge the instant merger. [27] In fact, there is no evidence on which it could be found that any one of these three counties was itself a market or a sub-market.

2

Hibernia

2

Source: Deposits December 28, 1962. G-29

[27] And if these counties could be said to be appropriate sections of the country in which to assess the impact of the merger, on the record before us, we would clearly find that any claimed lessening of competition, actual or potential, in these counties "would be de minimis", just as we did for Ventura County when we denied the plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction. United States v. Crocker-Anglo Nat. Bank, [1963 TRADE CASES P70,934], 223 F. Supp. 849, 854 (N.D.Cal.). The record on this score is no better today than it was then.

[83] California as a whole.

To find adverse effects of the instant merger, plaintiff asserts that the state as a whole is a section of the country. It must do this because otherwise no competition between Crocker and Citizens can be found, and if there is no competition, there can be no increase in concentration. Likewise, prior mergers in the state as a whole could not be assumed to have adversely affected competition without evidence of such effects. It is obvious, for example, and plaintiff's experts admitted, that there was no change in the banking structure in the Los Angeles metropolitan area, in the San Francisco Bay area, or in other local markets as a result of the merger (Dirlam, Tr. 638; 676).

The following pragmatic data demonstrates that the State of California is not a market or section of the country:

(1) The geographic extent of the State of California, hereinbefore described, precludes it from being a market for commercial banking services which are essentially local in nature;

(2) Notwithstanding the fact that, before the complaint in the instant case was [*170] filed, plaintiff had been supplied with the names and addresses of all customers for whose [84] business the two banks allegedly competed and the fact that it had available to it numerous files on mergers of other banks in the State of California, plaintiff could not produce the name and address of any customer in a statewide banking market, even when ordered by the court to do so (BK-CC, Order on Bank Defendants' Motion to Compel Further Answers, Tr. 462); [28] [88]

(3) The hypothesis of a statewide market assumes that banks located in different sections of the state are competing against each other (Goodman, Tr. 1870). In its exhibits purporting to show concentration ratios applicable to the statewide market, plaintiff included every bank in the state, yet:

(a) Plaintiff's expert witness had to admit that not all banks in the state were competing in metropolitan Los Angeles and that not all banks in the state were competing in the San Francisco Bay area (Tr. 732-722);

(b) In showing the structure of the San Francisco Bay area market, plaintiff's expert excluded the second largest bank in the state, Security First National Bank, which is substantially twice the size of Crocker;

(c) In showing the structure of the Los Angeles metropolitan area banking market, plaintiff's experts [85] excluded the third largest bank in the state, Wells Fargo Bank, which is substantially four times the size of Citizens;

(d) Plaintiff's expert, Gaffey, had no evidence that the Union Bank in Los Angeles was competing against the Hibernia Bank in San Francisco, and he knew of no banks that were competing with the Bank of America in San Diego who did not have offices there (Tr. 1069);

(e) Plaintiff admitted that Crocker did not compete with banks in the Los Angeles metropolitan area (BK-AA, No. 15);

(f) Plaintiff admitted that Citizens did not compete with banks in the San Francisco Bay Area (BK-AA, No. 15); [29] [89]

---

[28] At the trial the court ruled as follows on the admissibility of customer lists (Tr. 462):

> Now, with respect to the failure of the Government to give the names of customers known to them as requested, at that stage we do not observe any prejudice to the defense. I don't know how you could ask for a better admission than, in effect, the admission by the Government, "We don't know of any such customers." In other words, it approaches a statement that, "We don't have any proof that there was such competition." At any rate, our ruling has been indicated and we will proceed from there.

That observation still applies and clearly points up plaintiff's failure to prove that there are customers in the statewide market and customers for whose business Crocker and Citizens competed.

(4) A market survey of the customers of banks made by Professor Weston, [*171] whom this court finds eminently qualified to make such survey and which this court deems to have been a fair, representative, and adequate economic survey, demonstrates that there were no customers in such hypothetical statewide market (and the Government never offered any proof to the contrary) (BK-G; Weston, Tr. 1682-1686);

(5) The survey of the customers of Crocker First National Bank and Anglo California National Bank in December 1955 showed a very small number outside the five Bay Area [86] counties and none in a statewide banking market;

(6) If the State of California were itself a market, the creation of United California Bank would have caused the largest increase in concentration in that hypothetical market in recent years. Plaintiff's expert admitted that there are no factors suggesting the existence of a statewide banking market at the present time which did not exist in 1962 when the United California Bank was created (Dirlam, Tr. 742). It is therefore inconceivable that a banking market of the magnitude of that now asserted by plaintiff could have existed and gone undetected by the FDIC, the Federal Reserve Board and the Department of Justice, all three of which passed upon the creation of the United California Bank. Yet not one of those agencies stated in its report that there was a statewide banking market in California (other than for banks with statewide facilities) which would be adversely affected by the creation of that bank, nor did any of them state that concentration was increased or that earlier mergers had adversely affected any such market. (48th Ann. Report, Board of Governors, pp. 150-152; 1961 Ann. Report FDIC, pp. 60-62). It is also inconceivable [87] that plaintiff would have failed to call the court's attention to that increase in concentration at the time the settlement of the Firstamerica case was submitted to the court for approval if there had been such a market. It did not do so. United States v. Firstamerica Corp., Civil No. 38139, N.D.Cal., and letter on file therein dated September 27, 1960, from the Department of Justice. [30] The market, therefore, did not exist then, and it does not exist now.

---

[29] After admitting that Crocker and Citizens competed in different geographic areas, Professor Nicols suggested that some significance might be attached to the fact that both banks competed with branches of the Bank of America (Tr. 2276). Citizens, however, was in direct competition with 50 to 80 other banks in the Los Angeles area, including some of the largest banks in the state and in the world (BK-Q; BK-Z; BK-PP). Under those circumstances, a bank not actually operating in the area would have no effect upon local market conditions. One could as well argue that because Crocker-Citizens competes with The Bank of California, and because The Bank of California competes with banks in Seattle and Portland, Crocker-Citizens competes with banks in Portland and Seattle. A similar argument could be made with respect to the foreign banks having offices in California. It appears to us this argument was, in effect, made by other defendants and rejected in Crown Zellerbach v. FTC, 296 F.2d 800 (9th Cir. 1961), cert. denied, 370 U.S. 937, 8 L. Ed. 2d 807, 82 S. Ct. 1581 (1962), and in United States v. Philadelphia Nat. Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 10 L. Ed. 2d 915, 83 S. Ct. 1715 (1963).

Accordingly, this is not a case like United States v. Pabst Brewing Co., 384 U.S. 546, 16 L. Ed. 2d 765, 86 S. Ct. 1665 (1966), where the Government proved a state market by showing actual competition between the two beer companies throughout Wisconsin, and in fact, the nation. Instead, this is a case in which the Government's expert admitted that the defendants were not operating in the same geographical markets, the defendants proved that the combined banks did not compete against each other, and a survey of bank customers themselves showed that such competition did not exist. In addition, at the second trial it was proved that the difference in interest rates (or conversely, risks) between Los Angeles and the Bay Area was further proof that they are different markets (Goodman, Tr. 2198).

Neither can it be said that California is "any section of the country ", in which Crocker and Citizens were competing against each other and in which the merger could reduce competition, as in Pabst. The fact that beer manufactured in Milwaukee can be sold not only throughout Wisconsin but throughout the nation (e.g., Miller's High Life "brewed in Milwaukee") does not mean that the same is true of banking services. Plaintiff has successfully and correctly proved that banking services are primarily local and that banks do business where they have offices.

[30] Copies of the reports of the regulatory agencies and the Department of Justice letter referred to are attached to the Memorandum of Crocker-Anglo National Bank and Citizens National Bank in Opposition to Motion for Preliminary Injunction filed herein on October 8, 1963.

From the standpoint of opinion evidence, as we pointed out in footnote 24, supra, plaintiff relied on an expert who had absolutely no familiarity with the State of California and who could not claim to be a financial expert.

On the other hand, defendant banks' expert, Goodman, although he was far more familiar with California and California banking than plaintiff's expert, Dirlam, declined to render an opinion or otherwise aid the defense before making an exhaustive study of California and banking in California, which included making on-the-site visits to banking offices, inspecting bank loan files, interviewing loan officers, and obtaining deposit [*172] data for every bank in every area in the state. On the basis of that study and experience, he reached the same conclusion as to which he testified for the Government [90] in the Philadelphia case: banking markets are local, national and international. His opinion was that the state is neither a local market nor a relevant section of the country for the purpose of judging the effect of a change among competitors in the instant case. The court concurs in this view.

The defendant banks' expert, Professor Weston, qualifies as one of the leading financial experts in the country. His opinion that the state was not a market was supported not only by his experience but by his survey.

We find that the substantial weight of the evidence shows that there was no statewide market for Crocker or Citizens. If there was no statewide market for Crocker or Citizens or for any bank that did not have branches throughout the entire state, the fact that Bank of America had over 800 branches scattered throughout the state and in every county and that two other banks to a lesser degree had branches in many counties throughout the state does not thereby convert the entire state into a meaningful economic market. All that you actually have is three banks able to service numerous local markets throughout the state. [31]

---

[31] As to banks able to give local services throughout the state, Professor Weston testified:

> Judge Zirpoli: This is what is disturbing me. If you have a capacity to mobilize throughout the state in this fashion, such as Bank of America can do, why can it not be said that there is a relevant market, certainly as far as the Bank of America is concerned in the State of California.
>
> The Witness: For the reason that with regard to mobilizing funds, a bank is able to mobilize funds to the extent that it can locate offices to generate the acquisition of the funds.
>
> Now, the flow of funds into California, however, comes from outside the state as well, so even focusing on the flow of funds, the flow of funds real magnitude or his loans get into the insurance money flows into the state, and so the point I am making is that in a capital deficit state in the supply of funds market that is national it is still desirable from the standpoint of that state to mobilize as effectively as possible the funds within the state area since the state must depend for financing its business and commercial and individual activities in substantial measure on funds outside the state, and I am saying that it is important that the funds within the state be mobilized as efficiently as possible. But this doesn't indicate that this market is statewide because you have a flow of funds from outside the state from numerous types of institutions.
>
> Mr. Archer: Q. Well, Professor Weston, what would you say about a state-wide market from the standpoint of a company that wanted to deal with only one bank in the state and had facilities throughout the state which could be served only by the Bank of America? Would you consider that to be a market or - how would you consider that?
>
> A. I would not consider that a market either. There is a distinction that must be drawn between the performance of a particular type of banking service and the existence of a market. For example, the national banking divisions of banks in California in seeking to obtain business in California from national accounts will stress the services that they can perform in California for these customers in connection with their California business. Nevertheless, they still have to compete with out-of-state banks for the business of those national accounts in California, so that even though Bank of America might have the U.S. Steel account, it is subject to continuous competition with the Chicago and New York banks to handle the U.S. Steel account both nationally and even for their California activity.
>
> Q. Well, suppose U.S. Steel, however, determines from the standpoint of its own policy that it is going to have its deposits made daily and its payrolls paid from its various locations in California: In Pittsburg, San Francisco, Los Angeles and Torrence?
>
> A. Well, then, when you talk in those terms, I can see a basis on which one might argue that in connection with these services that there exists a market in some sense. But in that market you have only the Bank of America, United California Bank, and, to some degree, First Western. This merger would add a fourth competitor to that market, if that market exists [91] [*173] While it may very well be true, as plaintiff contends, that commercial banking can appropriately be divided into three geographic areas, local, regional and national, HN3[] the test as to whether any given geographic area is a relevant (economically significant) market or section of the country is not based on political boundaries, but is based on economic grounds. Therefore, even though the laws of California permit statewide branching, this factor, which undeniably must be considered, does not in and of itself make the whole of California a relevant market or section of the country in which to measure the competitive effects of a merger. The same can be said for the whole of the State of New York. Permissive statewide branching merely extends the political boundaries in which a bank may open branches, local units, to operate in local markets. It does not bring to any particular bank or banking unit depositors or borrowers from all over the state. "Individuals and corporations typically confer the bulk of their patronage on banks in their local community; they find it impractical to conduct their business at a distance." United States v. Philadelphia Nat. Bank, supra 374 [92] U.S. at 358. Persons and corporations in San Diego do not normally deposit their funds in San Francisco or Sacramento. Persons and corporations in San Diego do not normally borrow from banks in San Francisco.

When a customer's deposits become of real magnitude or his loans get into the category of $100,000 or more (which some economists use as an indicium of wholesale banking), cross-elasticity comes into play and extends the geographic limits and the field of financial institutions to which such depositors or borrowers will go. They will go where they can get the maximum return on their deposits and borrow from those who are prepared to take the risk at the lowest possible interest rate. The market then becomes national. These very factors prompted Professor Weston to conclude "that from an economic standpoint there is not a statewide commercial banking activity." (Tr. 1489).

As to plaintiff's contention that the application itself established the state as a market in which Crocker and Citizens competed against each other, the Comptroller to whom it was submitted did not so understand it (BK-A, p. 34). The fact that the resulting bank, Crocker-Citizens, would compete (a) in the [93] area where Citizens competed prior to the merger, (b) in the area where Crocker competed prior to the merger, and (c) with banks which offer statewide banking facilities, does not mean that each of the merging banks was competing in all of these respects prior to the merger (Ct. 195, Exh. 13, pp. 1, 7). The references to the dependence of both banks, for their future growth and strength, "upon their ability to extend their services throughout the major commercial areas of California - the North and South - as demanded by the needs of their present and potential customers", were expressly related to the necessity from a bank's standpoint of having offices where the need arises in a growing and industrially expanding state (Ct. 195, "Application for Approval of Merger", pp. 5, 6; Exh. 13, pp. 74, 87). One cannot fairly imply from the application that there is anything in California's economy which destroys the local nature of banking services. The substance of the entire application is clearly to the contrary; each bank desired to merge in [*174] order to have offices in areas it was then unable to serve (Ct. 195, Exh. 15-J, pp. 4-11). In a sense each bank wanted to further [94] emulate the Bank of America and take advantage of the benefits of commercial banking by offering the essential ingredient of "convenience" in more local markets throughout the growing and expanding state. [32] at all, and if that is regarded as a market under some definition, then this merger would decrease competition because it would add a fourth bank to a bank service activity in which only three banks exist today.

---

Judge Pope: You said "decrease competition".

The Witness: "Decrease concentration." I'm sorry.

Increase competition and decrease concentration.

(Weston, Tr. 1584-1587, line 3)

[32] The Bank of America grew to be the largest private bank in the world because its founder, A. P. Giannini, the greatest innovator in modern banking, recognized the need to serve "the little fellow" and understood that this could be effectively accomplished only through local branches offering a "convenience of location" to persons of moderate means. That is why the House of Morgan declined as the Bank of America came up. J. P. Morgan, the elder, was the banker for men of great wealth. Giannini was the banker for the locomotive firemen, who worked on the railroad systems Morgan unified, and the puddlers in the Morgan-financed steel mills. The times favored Giannini and the leveling process, as far as money goes, less for the Haves and more for the Have Nots, proved to be a good thing for branch banking, for the Bank of America and for California. And it is still [95] The court concludes that the State of California as a whole is not a relevant market or section of the country in which to measure the competitive effect, actual or potential, of the instant merger. Nonetheless, bearing in mind Professor Weston's observation (note 31, supra) that the services rendered by a bank operating a statewide system may be "a market in a sense" or "a market under some definition", the court, in order to finalize all the issues presented, will hereinafter assume the entire state to be a relevant market or section of the country and evaluate the competitive effect of the merger in such assumed market.

The Los Angeles metropolitan area.

Inasmuch as there was no competition between Crocker and Citizens in either the Los Angeles metropolitan area (Los Angeles and Orange counties) or the San Francisco Bay area (City and County of San Francisco and counties of Alameda, Contra Costa, Marin and San Mateo), the instant merger could not have affected actual competition in either of these assumed markets; however, since the main thrust of the Government's claim is that this merger forecloses potential competition, and will result in a "reasonable likelihood" of [96] a substantial lessening of competition in these sections, as well as in the whole of California, the court deems it advisable to review the economic realities in these sections in terms of "the business of banking".

Subsequently in this opinion we will call attention to the facts which demonstrate that potentially Crocker would not have entered the Los Angeles metropolitan area and that Citizens would not have entered the San Francisco Bay area. Accordingly, while Citizens may have had prior mergers in what plaintiff asserts to be the Los Angeles metropolitan area, and Crocker may have had mergers in certain counties of the San Francisco Bay area, we do not see how these can be relevant in adjudicating the validity of the instant merger which does not involve the same markets.

Plaintiff proved many things about the population, business and industries of metropolitan Los Angeles and the rate of its growth, but the essential thing it failed to prove is that the Los Angeles metropolitan area, as defined by it to include [*175] Los Angeles and Orange Counties, is in fact a relevant market in "the banking business".

The opinion of plaintiff's expert, Gaffey, that Los Angeles and [97] Orange Counties constituted a banking market was based upon the fact that the Bureau of the Budget at one time included those two counties in its definition of the Los Angeles-Long Beach Standard Metropolitan Statistical Area (Gaffey, Tr. 924-926). At the time of the Crocker-Citizens merger, however, such was not the case. The Bureau of the Budget itself states that standard metropolitan statistical areas are not intended to be market areas, and Gaffey testified that the geographic boundaries of those areas are often determined by factors wholly unrelated to those which would determine a market area. Gaffey also relied on the fact that Citizens conducted its business in Los Angeles and Orange Counties, but Citizens also had branches in San Bernardino and Riverside Counties which were located so close to Los Angeles as to be considered a part of Los Angeles metropolitan area. Plaintiff's reliance on economic data relating solely to Los Angeles County certainly does not prove that Los Angeles and Orange Counties together constitute a single banking market.

Another factor which Gaffey relied upon as establishing Los Angeles and Orange Counties as a relevant banking market was the [98] fact that the banks, in their application to merge, represented that the State of California lends itself to a rough division into nine more or less distinct geographical and economic areas, including one denominated the Los Angeles metropolitan area and composed of Los Angeles and Orange Counties (Ct. 195, Exh. 13, pp. 72, 73; Gaffey, Tr. 926, 927). Nowhere in the application did the merging banks characterize any of those so-called economic areas as banking markets or submarkets, and HN4[] the fact that an area might constitute a the " convenience of location" through its branches serving local needs that makes the Bank of America strong. It should be noted further that neither the dominant Bank of America, nor either of its two smaller statewide competitors, United California Bank or First Western Bank and Trust Co., was the product of de novo branch banking. Each achieved statewide status essentially through mergers, and in the case of United California Bank, as pointed out above, with the approval of the Department of Justice, FDIC and the Federal Reserve Board. This court is of the view that, giving proper consideration to problems of allocation of permits by the regulatory agencies, costs, location, personnel and the training thereof, it would not have been feasible to have created, as of this date, a truly statewide system of branch banking.

---

market for the manufacturing and commerce activities of a bank's customers does not establish it as a banking market.

Plaintiff's reliance on economic data relating solely to Los Angeles County as evidence that Los Angeles and Orange Counties constituted a single banking market is unfounded. Data relating to one county cannot prove that two constitute a banking market.

Professor Goodman was of the opinion that the Los Angeles metropolitan area includes many local markets but is not itself a banking market (Tr. 1836). We agree. A banking office on Wilshire Boulevard would not be in competition with banking offices in other parts of Los Angeles County, let [99] alone Orange County (Rhorer, Tr. 1357-1358).

In any event, Los Angeles and Orange Counties, separately or together, are not appropriate markets within which to judge the instant merger because, as plaintiff's experts admitted, the instant merger did not change the banking structure in any community within those counties.

The San Francisco Bay area.

Plaintiff contends that five counties in the San Francisco Bay area, the City and County of San Francisco, Alameda, Contra Costa, Marin and San Mateo, constitute a relevant market to be used in testing the competitive effects of the Crocker-Citizens merger and that it was the relevant market to be used in testing the competitive effects of the 1956 consolidation of Crocker First and Anglo California. On its very face, the suggestion that those five counties constitute a Bay area market violates the mandate expressed in Brown Shoe that HN5[] geographic markets must be a product of "commercial realities", rather than a "formal, legalistic" approach. Brown Shoe Co., Inc. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 336, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510, 82 S. Ct. 1502 (1962). What possible basis can there be for drawing the boundaries of the so-called San Francisco [100] Bay area market so as to include communities like Antioch and Pittsburg in Contra Costa County, while excluding Palo Alto and Los Altos in Santa Clara County? The San Francisco [*176] Bay is bordered by nine counties; namely, Marin, Sonoma, Napa, Solano, Contra Costa, Alameda, Santa Clara, San Mateo and the City and County of San Francisco. Prior to October 18, 1963, the San Francisco Standard Metropolitan Statistical Area, as defined by the Bureau of the Budget, encompassed six of the nine counties bordering the Bay, namely, Alameda, Contra Costa, Marin, San Mateo, Solano and the City and County of San Francisco. The San Francisco Bay area is normally regarded as including also Santa Clara as well.

In asserting that the five counties constituted a market for judging the Crocker First - Anglo California consolidation, plaintiff's witness, Dirlam, based his opinion on three premises, none of which supports his conclusion that such a market existed or that if it did exist, it was limited to those five counties. One of the factors he relied on was that the five-county area was the area in which Crocker First and Anglo California had offices. Neither bank had offices in all five [101] counties, and Anglo California, in addition to its offices located in other more remote counties, had offices in the other two Bay area counties of Santa Clara and Solano. The second factor on which Dirlam relied consisted of data designed to show that some of the Bay area offices of each consolidating bank derived the bulk of their business from customers having record addresses in those five counties. None of the tables, however, included data showing the record addresses of customers of Anglo California's Bay area offices in Palo Alto and San Jose in Santa Clara County, and Vallejo in Solano County. Whatever they may have shown, if anything, they did not provide a rational basis for excluding either Solano County or Santa Clara County. The only other factor which Dirlam cited as showing a five-county market was his belief that these five counties constituted the San Francisco Standard Metropolitan Statistical Area, as defined by the Bureau of the Budget at the time of the Crocker First - Anglo California consolidation. In that, too, he was mistaken.

There was even less reason for restricting the San Francisco Bay area market to five counties at the time of the Crocker-Citizens [102] merger. By that time the Bay area counties in which Crocker-Anglo did business had increased from six to nine. There was no evidence that the bulk of the banking business of its offices in nine Bay area counties was derived from customers located in only five of those counties. While it is true that the Bureau of the Budget changed its definition of the San Francisco Standard Metropolitan Statistical Area less than two weeks (October 18, 1963) prior to include only the five counties, Gaffey testified that such changes are frequently made for reasons wholly unrelated to those which would be determinative of a market area (Gaffey, Tr. 925, 926). Also, we doubt that plaintiff contends that the Bay area market was growing smaller. In this connection, we would point out that the larger the San Francisco Bay area market is assumed to be, the smaller would be the effect of the Crocker First - Anglo California consolidation and the acquisition of the San Rafael banks.

As in the situation applicable to the Los Angeles metropolitan area, this court finds that the San Francisco Bay area includes many local markets and that some of these local markets may include parts of an adjoining county [103] (e.g., the San Francisco market overflows into and encompasses the adjoining San Mateo County communities of Daly City, Colma and South San Francisco, with no discernible indication of where one stops and the other begins), but the San Francisco Bay area in and of itself, whether we include five, six or all nine counties bordering the Bay, is not a banking market.

In any event, it is admitted that the instant merger did not change the structure [*177] of any Bay area banking markets, regardless of which counties are in the Bay area.

There was no competition between Crocker and Citizens in any of the relevant markets referred to in the complaint.

There was no competitive overlap between the merging banks. Plaintiff offered no substantial evidence of actual competition between Crocker and Citizens in any of the relevant markets referred to in the complaint. As Dirlam testified, banks can never engage in very substantial competition in areas where they do not have offices (Dirlam, Tr. 875-876). The nature of banking markets is peculiarly local in California because of the large number of banking offices operating in virtually every area of the state. Customers in one [104] community have no need to, and ordinarily do not, go to another community to do their banking and in many localities the number of banking offices is such that customers will not consider doing their banking at an office more than a few city blocks distant. California has in excess of 200 banks and about 2400 branches, local banking offices (Saxon, Tr. 2051).

There was no evidence that any branch of Crocker was so located as to be in competition with a branch of Citizens. There was no city, town or community in which both banks had offices. Ventura County was the only one of California's 58 counties where both banks had an office at the time of the merger. The Thousand Oaks office of Citizens was some 23 miles northwest of and outside the service area of the Ventura office of Crocker and outside the service area of the subsequently established office of Crocker in Oxnard and of the town of Camarillo, where it was denied a permit. Even if that were not true and even if it were assumed that there was competition between one or even both of the Crocker offices in Ventura County and the Citizens office at Thousand Oaks, such competition was insignificant. By June 1964, these three [105] offices of Crocker-Citizens had only 7/10th of 1 per cent of the total deposits in Ventura County (BK-EE).

The California Superintendent of Banks found that Crocker and Citizens were not in competition and their merger would not lessen competition (BK-A, p. 44).

From the standpoint of economics, evidence of the record addresses of customers shows nothing as to competition or the areas in which either bank did business. The fact that the banks had customers with record addresses in areas where the other bank had offices did not indicate that either bank was performing a service at the location of the record address. Likewise, the fact that each of the banks had the same customers did not indicate that they were competing for the business of that customer. Either the banks were performing local services or they were competing for this business with most of the other banks in the country. The same would, of course, be true for correspondent bank customers; Citizens could not provide collection or other services in San Francisco nor could Crocker provide such services in Los Angeles.

Plaintiff, of course, argues to the contrary, but the argument sounds strange indeed coming from [106] plaintiff. One of its experts testified that the record address of a bank's borrower does not delimit the market within which the bank is doing business, and its other expert testified that the services performed for such customers were performed in the vicinity of the banking office and not the address of the customer (Dirlam, Tr. 533; Gaffey, Tr. 1067-1068).

Plaintiff's expert staff economist, Gaffey, testified that the question of whether there exists a class of customers [*178] in a statewide market is a subject of observation and not a subject of hypothesis (Tr. 1004). He further testified that such customers could be identified (Tr. 1001-1002), and that it was his business as an expert to engage in such work (Tr. 1003). Defendant banks submitted to the plaintiff thousands of names of their customers, and this court entered an order requiring plaintiff to identify every customer of which it had knowledge for whose business Crocker and Citizens competed. Notwithstanding all this and the burden of proof which rests with plaintiff, plaintiff was unable to identify any customers for whose business the two banks competed, other than those in the national market, such [107] as Tidewater Oil Company and C.I.T. Corporation.

By reason of the foregoing, as we stated in the beginning of this opinion, the court finds that Crocker and Citizens were not in actual competition prior to or at the time of the merger in any relevant market alleged in the complaint.

The merger did not increase concentration in California.

HN6[] Concentration is a function of a market. As stated in Brown Shoe, combinations are to be gauged on "their effect on competition generally in an economically significant market." 370 U.S. at 335. Unless they relate to a market, both in the geographic sense and in the line of commerce (or functional sense), figures purporting to show concentration ratios are meaningless.

Plaintiff's and defendant banks' experts all agreed that the instant merger did not increase concentration in the local markets (Dirlam, Tr. 676; Gaffey, Tr. 1085-1086 and 1097-1099; Weston, Tr. 1491, 1625-1626).

The evidence in the instant case, including the Weston survey, his ten year study of the question, and Goodman's investigation, shows that the characteristics of California borrowers with state mobility are such that they have national mobility and are in fact [108] in the national market. It follows that there is no statewide banking market in California, that plaintiff's statewide concentration ratios are, in the words of David A. Alhadeff of the Bureau of Business and Economic Research of the University of California, [33] "meaningless, or worse", and that the merger of Crocker and Citizens could not possibly have increased concentration. Nevertheless, we will consider plaintiff's concentration figures.

[109] [*179] The following table, adapted from Government's Exhibit 30A, shows the percentages of total deposits of all banks of the state held by the largest banks before and after the merger.

DISTRIBUTION OF DEPOSITS IN CALIFORNIA BANKS AS OF END OF YEAR 1962 AND 1963

1962

33

The concentration statistics in this chapter are highly unorthodox. Conventional concentration statistics in the field of banking are usually computed on a legalistic or political-jurisdictional base; hence, the common practice of showing concentration of banking resources on a statewide basis. Statistics computed in this manner may conceivably serve legalistic or political purposes. For economic analysis, such statistics are meaningless, or worse. It is only by chance that statistics thus computed may sometimes find a place in economic investigations." (Alhadeff, Monopoly and Competition in Banking, at p. 52, (1954)).

The fallacy of using concentration figures alone to measure the impact of a merger in bank cases was pointed out by Chief Judge William E. Miller in the Nashville case referred to in note 1, supra. In United States v. Third National Bank of Nashville, 260 F. Supp. 869, 883 (M.D.Tenn.), he said:

> As already stated, no reliable extrapolation as to future prospects may safely be predicted upon concentration or market share figures alone. But considering the totality of facts as to the institutions involved and as to the relevant market, a conclusion that the merger may substantially lessen competition in the future is wholly unwarranted. Any other view would require the Court to close its eyes to facts which are far more convincing than any possible contrary conclusions which could be drawn from the market share or concentration statistics in this case.

	Rank In California	% of Total California Each Bank	Cumulative
Bank of America	1	39.9	39.9
Security First National	2	13.5	53.4
Wells Fargo	3	9.9	63.3
United California Bank	4	8.0	71.3
Crocker	5	7.4	78.7
Union Bank	6	3.1	81.8
Bank of California, N.A.	7	2.6	84.4
Citizens	8	2.5	86.9
First Western	9	2.0	88.9
All Other Banks	10-129	11.1	100.0

DISTRIBUTION OF DEPOSITS IN CALIFORNIA BANKS AS OF END OF YEAR 1962 AND 1963

1963

	Rank In California	% of Total California Each Bank	Cumulative
Bank of America	1	40.6	40.6
Security First National	2	12.7	53.3
Wells Fargo	3	9.6	62.9
United California Bank	5	8.0	80.1
Crocker	4	9.2	72.1
Union Bank	6	3.2	83.3
Bank of California, N.A.	7	2.7	86.0
Citizens	Merged with Crocker (11-1-63)
First Western	8	1.9	87.9
All Other Banks	9-155	12.1	100.0

[110] The foregoing table, dominated by the Bank of America figures, clearly shows how meaningless the Government's figures are, since the concentration arises not by reason of the deposits of the next leading seven banks (or the remaining 154 banks) in 1963 but because of Bank of America's 40.6 per cent. The concentration is caused by Bank of America. No one of the other banks is responsible for the concentration. Bank of America alone or Bank of America in combination with even the smallest bank would be concentration. That is why Professor Goodman said that using a table of this character without giving proper consideration to Bank of America's dominance is like using a giant with a group of eight pigmies to show the average size of nine men. It just doesn't make sense. Furthermore, it will be noted that as of the end of 1962 the seven next leading banks combined with Bank of America showed a cumulative percentage total of 86.9 per cent, and at the end of 1963 the seven next leading banks combined with Bank of America showed a cumulative percentage total of 87.9 per cent, a gain of 1 per cent; however, since Bank of America's deposits rose from 39.9 per cent at the end of 1962 to [111] 40.6 per cent at the end of 1963, we find that Bank of America's deposits account for 70 per cent of this 1 per cent increase. This change, based upon commercial banking alone as the line of commerce, and without consideration of those factors heretofore set forth which call for an expansion of the line of commerce when we consider the state as a whole as the market, completely fails to satisfy this court that such change reflects a substantial lessening of competition in commercial banking. It should be noted that the fact situation presented by the present record is quite different from that which was presented in United States v. Philadelphia Nat. Bank, supra. In that case the merging banks were not only located in the same city and direct competitors of each other, but the result of the merger was a significant concentration with the merged bank controlling at least 30 per cent of the commercial banking business in the relevant area. The merger there would have resulted in an increase of more than 33 per cent in concentration (374 U.S. at 364-365). Here, in contrast, Crocker-Citizens would have 9.7 per cent (using the figures 7.2 per cent for Crocker and 2.5 per cent for Citizens, [112] as used throughout the trial, rather than the combined figure of 9.2 per cent reflected in Government's Exhibit 30A on which the foregoing table was prepared) of the deposits in the relevant area. This reflects an increase of Crocker's percentage of deposits by 2.5 per cent through the addition of the deposits [*180] of Citizens. In view of these statistics and the extent of the other banks listed in the foregoing tabulation, there can be no inherent likelihood that competition will be substantially lessened, for it is readily obvious that the merger will not produce a bank controlling an undue percentage share of the relevant market and will not result in a significant increase in the concentration of banks in that area. Furthermore, as we previously noted, had the Government employed the statistical method employed in its Exhibit 32 in the Philadelphia case (here note 26), there was no perceptible change in concentration by reason of the instant merger.

Also, as we previously noted, the Government's figures are misleading and fail to make necessary adjustments. The Government's figures show the ratio of Citizens' loans and discounts to be 2.1 per cent on all California [113] loans and discounts before the merger, with that of Crocker at 7.2 per cent for a total for Crocker-Citizens to be 9.3 per cent; however, if we adjust this figure for loans and discounts for out-of-state banks, as was done in the Philadelphia case, we find that the combined figure of 9.3 per cent tabulated by the Government should be reduced, as Professor Weston satisfactorily demonstrated, by 28.78 per cent and we arrive at a figure of 6.6 per cent. And if we apply the same percentage adjustment to Crocker-Citizens' percentage of total deposits of all California banks, we arrive at a figure of 6.8 per cent of total deposits.

An adjustment for available resources of foreign bank subsidiaries and representatives, as we previously noted, would result in a further reduction. Since no one can realistically compute or even estimate the extent of this reduction, we reject defendant banks' exhibit BK-2, table 3, and Professor Goodman's finding that an adjustment for both out-of-state banks and foreign banks and agencies would reduce Crocker-Citizens' share of the relevant market to 3.8 per cent. We find no need to adjust for this further unknown figure, since we are clearly satisfied [114] that on the Government's figures alone the record fails to reflect a merger controlling an undue percentage of the relevant market.

More significant than any of the foregoing is the fact that if the competitive impact of the instant merger is to be meaningfully measured in plaintiff's hypothetical state market (in which convenience is no longer the important factor), cross-elasticity comes into play and increases the degree of substitutability of products of other financial institutions and thereby appropriately extends the line of commerce to meet the realities of this extended market. In our previous review of this wider field in which other institutions compete with commercial banks for the savings and investment dollar or for the extension of credit, we found that in 1962 Crocker and Citizens combined held:

(1) Only 2.63 per cent of the total of California savings;

(2) Only 1.34 per cent of the total of California farm mortgage loans;

(3) Only 2.7 per cent of California agricultural loans;

(4) Only 1.8 per cent of California mortgage debt on non-farm real estate (this is a rather significant figure when one considers that savings and loan associations held $13.9 billions [115] of such loans as against $5.9 billions for commercial banks);

(5) Only 2.8 per cent of California business loans and credits; and

(6) Only 5.56 per cent of California's installment and non-installment consumer credit.

If the foregoing inter-institutional competition is taken into account, the combined share of Crocker and Citizens in each of these savings and lending activities in no case exceeded 5.56 per cent of the total in the case of installment and non-installment consumer credit, and in the case of real estate loans dropped as low as 1.8 per cent of the total. These figures, which are unchallenged, call for a conservative adjustment of plaintiff's concentration figures to at least one-half [*181] that fixed by the Government (if not to less than 2 per cent, as claimed by defendant banks). A market share of this limited magnitude can have no adverse competitive effect in a market like California with in excess of 200 banks and over 2400 branches and where ease of entry and demands for entry are probably greater than in any other section of the country. [34]

[116] Finally and before leaving our discussion of California as a relevant market, we find persuasive the testimony of the Comptroller [35] that, if there is a state market for some form of banking service, yet to be clearly defined and identified, at the time of the merger there were three (if not only two) competitors in that market, and the testimony of Professor Weston that the merger, if [*182] it affected competition at all, in the California market "increased competition and decreased concentration." The merger served an immediate need, which even the Government on more than one occasion conceded, by giving us a fourth competitor among the banks capable of giving statewide service now and not ten or twenty years from now by de novo branching, assuming contrary to past history that this could be done.

[117] The large number of successful new entries distinguishes markets in California.

---

[34] In this regard we note that one of the most significant of the Court's findings in Philadelphia Bank is absent, indeed is negatived here. The number of banks in the Philadelphia area had been dropping precipitously, from 108 in 1947 to 42 in 1961. But in California, the number of banks and trust companies rose from 117 in 1960 to 200 in 1964. (Annual Report of FDIC (1964), Chart on p. 144 measuring changes between December 31, 1960 and December 31, 1964). This important factor runs directly contrary to plaintiff's theory of reduction of consumer choice.

[35] The Comptroller testified:

> A. This case was the subject of long, extensive public hearing by our office, during which these factors were gone into at great length by various witnesses.
>
> One of the prime considerations was the question of possible lessening of competition, and our conclusion at that time was that there were no two offices - or no single office, indeed, of these two institutions which were in competitive conflict, and therefore there was no competitive overlap and there could not be any elimination of competition, and certainly, a fortiori, any substantial lessening of competition in the circumstance. This same factor applies here today, since the adoption of the new Bank Merger Act.
>
> Additionally, we have, as reaffirmed, in terms in the balancing test provided by the new statute, in other words, that the convenience and needs to the public clearly outweighs any lessening of competition, we affirm that the convenience and needs is amply demonstrated and will be more and more so in the years ahead; that while the Bank of America, as it sits in this banking structure in California, has done a formidable job, one not matched by any other commercial bank in the country, and a bank which I would in no sense ever derogate, does sit in a dominant position in this banking structure with competition of any effective sort arising only from one bank, namely, the United California Bank.
>
> I do not believe, on the basis of our day-to-day examination of and dealings with banks, that the First Western Bank and Trust Company, as alleged, is a substantial state-wide competitor and I do not believe that anyone who follows this developing picture here could so demonstrate.
>
> So that we are faced here with one really great institution, not only domestically, but internationally, the Bank of America, with but one formidable state-wide competitor, as that term is so loosely used throughout the parlance of antitrust law, in this case and also the banking business. I say the United California Bank because it, as the keystone of a large bank-holding company, the largest in the United States, Western Bank Corporation, actually has a competitive reach far exceeding any bank short of the Bank of America. Reaches into 12 states and more than 25 banking institutions, and has the benefit of controlling the flow of loans and deposits and new business and other developments.
>
> Accordingly, we would change our opinion, original opinion, to the extent of stating that the merged bank is not the fourth largest bank as the result of the merger but, indeed, the fifth, since the United California Bank resource position would have to be measured by substantially all of the resources of the Western Bank Corporation amounting now to close to $7 billion, which would put it next to the Bank of America in size.
>
> Accordingly, therefore, it seems to us, as this matter has been continuously reexamined, that this merger affords the only second substantial possibility of founding a substantial, quote, state-wide, unquote, competitor to the Bank of America.
>
> (Tr. 2036-2038)

For the period January 1, 1954 to December 31, 1964, 706 new banking office entries were made in 375 different communities in California; 91 of these were by Crocker-Citizens or its predecessors (BK-H; BK-I; BK-J). This is dramatic evidence that the banking system in California provides more banking alternatives where they are needed than do the banking systems found elsewhere in the United States. In the very years during which plaintiff asserts that the number of banks was declining, the number of competing banks in banking markets throughout the state was increasing substantially. This is true in particular of every community in the San Francisco Bay area, the Los Angeles metropolitan area, Kern County, Santa Barbara County and Ventura County (BK-M - BK-Q).

During the period 1953 through 1964, 120 new banks were established and accumulated over $1.5 billion in deposits and established 208 banking offices, including their home offices. (BK-J). Since the Crocker-Citizens merger, some 20 new banks have been established in Los Angeles and Orange Counties alone (BK-I). These new banks have shown [118] progressively larger annual increases in deposits during each of the last five years. Their rate of growth has exceeded that of California banks generally. In fact, the seventh largest bank in Los Angeles and Orange Counties as of December 31, 1962, was the City National Bank of Beverly Hills, which was established in 1953.

By way of contrast, in Philadelphia the number of banks had declined by more than 50 per cent (374 U.S. at 331), and in the ten-year period ending in 1961, only one new bank had opened in the Philadelphia four-county area, and it was established in 1951. (374 U.S. at 367 n. 44). In Lexington, there were only four other banks and apparently no new entries (376 U.S. at 668-669). In Manufacturers Hanover, there had been a 38.6 per cent decline in the number of banks, and in the decade prior to the merger only two new banks had opened and they were established by existing banks (240 F. Supp. 867, 943).

It is apparent from plaintiff's own exhibits that the only limit to the number of banking offices in any area is the number of offices which the banking authorities will permit (B-22A; G-23). In every year, the number of applications has far exceeded [119] the number of permits and charters granted (G-37). The fact that in years when the number of permits increases, there are a still larger number of denials, demonstrates that the only reason there aren't more denials is that those seeking new offices and new charters are discouraged from applying more frequently than they do. In view of the large number of denials during 1963 and 1964, it would appear that applications will exceed the number of permits which plaintiff predicts will be authorized prior to 1980 by close to 500 per cent (BK-K; BK-L; G-23A). These facts only serve to confirm the Comptroller's views of the matter (BK-A, pp. 50-53, 59-60). Accordingly, it is pure speculation, if not nonsense, to say that the merger caused a reduction in the potential number of banking alternatives in any area of the state, even if it could be assumed that Crocker or Citizens had formulated a definite plan to establish offices in the service area of the other. For example, plaintiff's expert, Gaffey, could offer no satisfactory basis for concluding that Crocker would have, by de novo branching, accumulated a larger market share than the new banks which [*183] were in fact established [120] in Citizens' service area after the instant merger (Gaffey, Tr. 1089-1093; cf. Dirlam, Tr. 841). And can anyone now say that the regulatory authorities would have authorized those new banks had the merger not occurred or that they would have permitted the establishment of those banks and a substantial number of Crocker offices as well? Cf. Dirlam, Tra. 735, lines 1-9.

Plaintiff and its experts admitted the truth of the proposition that no area will be lacking an alternative banking office because of the merger (BK-AA, Nos. 84, 85). That being the case, the number of different banks in any banking market in California will not be determined by how this court decides this case. It will be determined, instead, by whether the regulatory agencies decide to permit a new branch or to charter a new bank and what selection they make among the various banks or promoters applying. This is not a situation where there are only four (El Paso) or six (Penn-Olin) actual and potential competitors. In such cases the court might properly concern itself with effect of mergers in stifling internal growth. In this case, however, there are more people knocking at the door than can possibly [121] be admitted.

Neither bank had approved plans to enter nor was it feasible for either to enter the service area of the other.

Plaintiff argues that the evidence in this case shows that but for its merger with Citizens, Crocker would have expanded de novo and become competitive in the highly concentrated Los Angeles metropolitan area. [36] This it asserts is the most important issue in the case. It further argues that the evidence also shows that but for its merger with Crocker, Citizens would have expanded de novo into the service area of Crocker. The substantial facts to which plaintiff refuses to give consideration are that neither bank would have moved into the area of the other de novo; that it was neither desirable nor feasible to do so; and that even if they wanted to, the Comptroller would not have permitted any of the entries needed to create a statewide system.

[122] As a result of the hearing after remand, we have before us not only the official report of the Comptroller that he would not have permitted Crocker to branch into Los Angeles and Orange [*184] Counties on any basis which would have made a de novo entry economically worthwhile to applicant, but also the testimony of the Comptroller tested by cross-examination to the same effect. Important sections of the metropolitan areas have in effect been closed to additional branching by the regulatory authorities (Saxon, Tr. 2041, 2048). In addition, preference in establishing branches in those areas will be given to the newly established small banks (Saxon, Tr. 2058-2059).

During 1965 the number of applications for new branch offices throughout the state exceeded the number of applications granted by 60 per cent (BK-LLL; Stipulation of Counsel, Tr. 2229-2230). If anything, the excess of applications was higher in Los Angeles. In 1965 the number of applications for new branch permits and new bank charters in Los Angeles which were denied exceeded the number of new banking offices established (BK-LLL; G-360).

The effect of the loss of the mere presence of a potential competitor, [123] even of the size of Crocker, on the periphery of the Los Angeles market is minimal at best. The fact that competition was already vigorous, that there were at least 75 to 80 banks operating in the area, that the number of banks had increased by 50 per cent in two years, that there were at least two applications for new banking offices for each permit that became available, and that the potential competitors included some of the world's largest banks, shows that the presence or absence of one potential competitor could have no material effect upon the conduct of those competing in the market, no effect upon the tone of competition in the market and no effect upon the price or supply in that market. There are more than enough banks in and around the market, ready, willing and able to take advantage of every competitive opportunity that might become available. If one bank does not, another one will. There is no apparent limit to those seeking banking offices.

It seems to us that defendant banks are one very large step removed from Penn-Olin. In Penn-Olin the debate revolved around how much weight should be given to an unaccepted recommendation from lower echelons to [36] Long after this case was submitted on briefs counsel for plaintiff sent to each member of this court copies of articles from The Wall Street Journal and the American Banker of June 9, 1967. These articles, which are identical in language, state that Wells Fargo Bank, with its main office in San Francisco, announced plans for a major de novo branching campaign in Southern California, which if successful, would give California its sixth statewide commercial bank. The President of the bank said the campaign program "probably will get started early in 1968, with the opening of a major Los Angeles headquarters." The program calls for the annual establishment of five or six offices. The sending of these articles to influence the court is of questionable propriety. They form no part of the record in this case, are hearsay, have not been subject to cross-examination, contemplate the opening of a branch five years after the instant merger, and their presentation to us now is rather presumptuous, when we consider that during the discovery proceedings and in the course of the trial of this case plaintiff branded as "irrelevant" its files on Wells Fargo.

---

Furthermore, the establishment of a branch in Los Angeles in 1968 and a program for the possible establishment of five or six branches thereafter annually, even if a true expression of the bank's intent, proves nothing of true relevancy to this case, except possibly that if successful in its campaign to get permits (in an already overcrowded area where many others besides Wells Fargo will be permit applicants), locations and personnel, it can hope to have enough branches to qualify as a statewide in ten or twenty years, or, as the Comptroller put it, "it would take Wells Fargo 136 years to become a branch by branch statewide competitor with Bank of America ". As we previously stated, the need for another competitor to the Bank of America was already urgent at the time of the merger, November 1, 1963, and not one to be achieved ten or twenty or 136 years thereafter.

move [124] de novo into a new geographic area. In our case, the lower echelons did not make anything rising to the level of recommendations of programs which would have brought the two banks into competition, and even the lower echelons rejected the thought of their respective banks becoming statewide de novo. Accordingly, under the Supreme Court's rationale in Penn-Olin, the evidence does not sustain plaintiff's case. There the Court stated (378 U.S. at 166):

> Pennsalt claims that it finally decided . . . that it should not build a plant itself and that this decision was never reconsidered or changed. But the District Court found to the contrary.

There can be no doubt that Crocker-Anglo unequivocally rejected the idea of building even one branch in Los Angeles and adopted a de novo branching plan which excluded this possibility (Dirlam, Tr. 866-868; G-114; G-117; G-118).

The second proposition is that proof of entry or desire to enter by merger does not by itself prove the ability or desire to enter de novo. Many of plaintiff's proposed findings are based on this premise. If this line of reasoning were followed, all mergers would be illegal. In all cases [125] the fact of merger, or contemplated merger, demonstrates a desire to achieve the advantages of the merger. Plaintiff states: "Crocker-Anglo had long been interested in moving into the rapidly expanding Los Angeles area", and it speaks of "Crocker-Anglo's desire to move into Los Angeles". The Government's propositions are true only if we add, "by merger", to them. Upon analysis, therefore, the Government's propositions are simply another way of stating that all mergers (except of failing businesses), are illegal or that "the most obviously [*185] illegal aspect of the proposed merger is the merger agreement itself." This approach was clearly rejected in the majority opinion in Penn-Olin.

The third proposition is that if "potential competition" is defined as in El Paso, the Government's case clearly fails. In El Paso the Government proved potential competition by showing actual negotiation by Pacific Northwest with an El Paso customer for its business in the relevant market with tangible results: El Paso reduced its price (376 U.S. at 659). Elsewhere in this opinion we have shown that plaintiff has failed to produce (even when ordered to do so) a single customer [126] in the relevant market for whose custom both defendant banks competed. One purpose of the discovery order of this court was to determine whether plaintiff had an El Paso type case (Tr. of June 17, 1964; Tr. 16-17, 71, 73-74, 77-83). The Government's staff economist admitted he had no evidence, after searching the banks' files, that either bank was ever notified of the other's applications for branches, although such was the practice of the Comptroller in cases of competing branches. Plaintiff failed completely to prove any actual effect of potential competition such as was shown in El Paso.

The fourth proposition is that in this case the court knows what Crocker would have done had the instant merger been forbidden. This, in effect, was what happened in 1959 when Belgrano demanded too high a price for Transamerica's interest in Citizens and Hoover thought that all possibilities of merger with Citizens were gone. At that time every reason which the plaintiff and plaintiff's experts now assert for Crocker's moving into Southern California then existed. At the trial the court asked Mr. Hoover whether plans were made to move into Los Angeles at that time. As previously shown, [127] Hoover explained that:

> The subject came up quite frequently, your Honor, and was cast aside because we didn't have the horses, we didn't have the personnel.

Prior to that time, the former Chief National Bank Examiner for the area, who had had the opportunity and duty to examine all the applications for branches, had advised Hoover that it would not be economically sound for Crocker to enter this area de novo (Hudspeth G-338, pp. 18, 21). If this is not enough, we have additional proof that when Harry Rhorer, who had been hired from the Bank of America to recommend locations for the establishment of branches, developed an ambitious program of 30 branches a year, he specifically excluded the southern counties from the program. Moreover, management cut Rhorer's program approximately in half, so that for the foreseeable future Crocker would be expending all its de novo efforts in counties north of Los Angeles and expending 87 per cent of its efforts north of San Luis Obispo (G-115; G-117). In the final analysis, "desire" did not produce action and that in itself tends to negative the claim that Crocker would have entered Los Angeles de novo.

Accordingly, the [128] voluminous findings that plaintiff proposes which show that subordinate officials in Crocker considered various areas in Ventura County; that de novo branching in communities contiguous to its service areas was profitable; that Crocker was interested in areas north of Los Angeles where population was expanding (principally Fresno, the Bay area, Sacramento and San Jose); and that when merger opportunities presented themselves, Crocker was interested in expanding into smaller metropolitan areas, are not particularly relevant to show that Crocker would have entered Los Angeles de novo. The plain fact of the matter is that Crocker never established a branch in an area remotely similar to the Los Angeles metropolitan area and repeatedly rejected the idea.

Plaintiff's "evidence" that eventually Crocker would have established a branch in the service area of Citizens or that [*186] Citizens would have eventually established a branch in the service area of Crocker is speculative.

As we have already found, Crocker had no plans to enter Los Angeles other than by merger. Likewise, Citizens had no plans for establishing any branch north of Thousand Oaks in the Conejo Valley; Citizens [129] had no plans for establishing de novo offices in the San Francisco Bay area or other areas of northern and central California (Hamilton, G-335, p. 19). The only suggestion that Citizens consider a location in San Francisco did not even go beyond the lower echelon committee which was to consider it (G-60; Gaffey, Tr. 1112). Dirlam testified that he was unable to predict when, if ever, Citizens would become a statewide bank (Dirlam, Tr. 840, 841). The Government's own exhibits and testimony show that Citizens' primary de novo activity was in Los Angeles County and south into Orange County. Similarly, Crocker's past de novo activity was devoted to the addition of needed branches within its own service area. Crocker generally entered the small metropolitan areas in its service area only by merger and established de novo branches contiguous to its administrative "hubs". When pressed to identify which de novo entries by Crocker were most comparable to what would be required for entry into Los Angeles, plaintiff could identify only Tulare and the City of Ventura. Accordingly, plaintiff's evidence consists of speculations by two economists with very limited experience [130] with banking in California and with no branching experience at all. Thus, the "policies, program and history" of branch expansion by Crocker and by Citizens are valid indications only of what each bank would do within its respective areas. What factual basis does plaintiff have for saying it was more likely, advantageous or desirable for Crocker to establish branches in Los Angeles than within its own service area as it was planning to do? How can Crocker's financial success in establishing de novo branches in the smaller contiguous communities in its service area be projected into the Los Angeles metropolitan area? Are the North Coast, Sacramento Valley, San Joaquin Valley, Mountain Counties and the South Coast really like the Los Angeles metropolitan area? All of plaintiff's data on the economics of Crocker's branching is speculative and carries little weight when projected into a wholly different area.

If, as in the case of Crocker, the files showed no surveys or other documents relating to Los Angeles, plaintiff would have the court conclude that Crocker had not considered and therefore had not rejected the idea of entering Los Angeles de novo. If, on the other hand, [131] the files revealed a single sheet of paper referring to a particular locality, then the bank involved is said to have given "serious consideration" to establishing an office there, regardless of the fact that the document relied upon showed that the bank actually rejected the location as a branch site. Thus, plaintiff proposes a finding that Citizens had a "strong interest . . . in the Bay Area" because a single sheet of paper bears a notation suggesting that Citizens' bank premises committee should seriously discuss the advantages of establishing offices in downtown San Francisco and downtown San Diego (G-60; Gaffey, Tr. 1112). Similarly, plaintiff argues that Citizens was developing an interest in expanding into Porterville (it is in Tulare County) because Citizens' bank premises committee rejected a real estate broker's offer of property there (G-50).

The speculative nature of plaintiff's evidence is further demonstrated by its reliance on "half truths ". Plaintiff proposes a finding: "In September 1962, it was the opinion of Crocker's branch locations specialist Harry M. Rhorer that Crocker should make 'special effort' in the 'major growth counties' of California, as these were [132] the counties where the bank's location program had and, in Rhorer's opinion, should continue to have the greatest emphasis (Exh. G-117, [*187] p. 4)." It is in this very exhibit that Rhorer proposes some 60 locations, all in Crocker's service area, most of them north of Santa Barbara; he also states, "our need to catch up in adequate representation throughout our present service area can support this magnitude of a program ". Is it not pure speculation to rely on the so-called "policies" expressed in this document to show that Crocker-Anglo planned to go outside its service area, particularly when those "policies" are derived by misquoting the words of the document?

Rhorer's memorandum stated that "special effort should be made in our major growth counties ", not, as plaintiff would have it, in "the 'major growth counties '". (G-117, p. 4).

Plaintiff proposes a finding: "Crocker-Anglo had considered de novo branching as a possible means of expanding into the Los Angeles area. (Solomon, Tr. 1288, lines 3-15)." The full context of the reference follows (Tr. 1287, line 2 - Tr. 1288, line 15):

Q. Yes. Mr. Solomon, may I show you, please, Government's Exhibit [133] No. G-265 in evidence which you will recognize, I'm sure, as a letter signed by you to the shareholders of Crocker-Anglo Bank concerning the proposed Crocker-Citizens merger and I invite your attention to the next to the last paragraph.
A. Yes.
Q. Now, in that regard I'd just like to direct your more specific attention to one sentence in that paragraph:
"From our point of view the merger affords the most practical and economical way of immediately establishing our facilities on a large scale in the extraordinary growth areas centered in Los Angeles."
Now, you say there that this offers the most practical way. Having made a statement like that, am I correct that there were other ways that you had considered in making this statement?
A. I don't think it logically follows, Mr. Schoepke, that if this route had not been opened to us that there would have been other means which we would have availed ourselves of to get into that Los Angeles area. There was no question in our minds that the only way of getting into that area was through the merger route.

Q. Now, in making up your mind that this was the best alternative inevitably you must have considered some other alternative [134] with which you compared this in stating that it was the most economical route.
A. I don't think there is any question but what if one considers an area attractive he explores all avenues that give any possibility whatsoever for accomplishing those objectives. In the process we gave consideration to the possibility of de novo but did not entertain it as constituting a reasonable answer to our problem at any time.
Q. But you did consider it?
A. As one of the alternatives, yes.

Solomon also testified (Tr. 1281, lines 4-12):

Q. Would it have been financially disastrous for Crocker-Anglo to attempt to include Los Angeles and Orange in its service area without a merger?
A. Well, probably not, but I think it would have been so unsound from the standpoint of Crocker-Anglo to have recommended that course of action that I would not have proposed it and even though I had proposed it I would have expected our Board of Directors not to approve it.

Plaintiff's reliance on Solomon's testimony to show that Crocker would have branched de novo into Los Angeles is worse than sheer speculation because his testimony is to the contrary; possibilities don't become probabilities, [135] especially when they are rejected.

The Government's brief asserts that Crocker would have branched into Los Angeles because the Los Angeles metropolitan [*188] area "has long been noted for its tremendous economic growth and expansion"; because Crocker has long been interested in moving into the area; because Crocker was capable of entering into Los Angeles by itself; because Crocker had a nucleus of customers with record addresses in the area; because Crocker was operating offices in "Southern California". Every one of these reasons existed prior to 1959 and thereafter. Yet what happened in 1959, when after being approached by Citizens with regard to a proposed merger, the negotiations came to an "abrupt termination". Did Crocker make alternative plans to enter Los Angeles de novo? The 1959 to 1962 period is, in effect, an experimental period by which the validity of all plaintiff's theories can be tested. Being unable to enter Los Angeles by merger, Crocker nevertheless determined that the most profitable course for it was de novo branching in its then existing service area. It was not economically sound or feasible for Crocker to enter Los Angeles and it lacked [136] the necessary personnel. Accordingly, plaintiff's statement, "There is nothing in the evidence to show that Crocker-Anglo, but for the merger, would not have done what the Bank of California did . . ." is demonstrably false. Government Exhibits G-114 and G-117 show the extreme outer limits of what Crocker would have done; they do not include Los Angeles or the other southern counties.

As heretofore noted, the population and other economic growth of the Los Angeles metropolitan area has been common knowledge since long before World War II. Yet Crocker made no attempt to establish de novo offices in that area. The reason for this is quite obvious; there are many growth areas in the former service area of Crocker, and while they may not be quite as dramatic as Los Angeles, their proximity and reduced cost of entry did and would continue to make them more profitable, particularly as part of an integrated system. The record shows that there were more than enough opportunities in Crocker's service area to keep it busy for the foreseeable future. The $12 million premium in terms of stockholders' equity running from the Crocker stockholders to Citizens shows only that the Crocker [137] shareholders were willing to take a book loss in this amount in order to have the opportunity of having a well-organized and integrated bank of sound management with statewide facilities and offices in the Los Angeles metropolitan area. It does not prove that it was feasible for Crocker to so enter de novo or that it would have been advisable to expend that amount of money or the $30 million that might have duplicated such a system if they could get the permits, the locations and the personnel within the next eight or ten years at the very best. Our previous review of the situation in Los Angeles and the position of the Comptroller's office relative to this overbanked area pretty much proved Solomon's statement that any such program would have been economically unsound.

The "policies, program and history" of the Bank of California are wholly different from those of Crocker-Anglo. The Bank of California is a coastwide bank. The Bank of California had not committed its resources to a branch expansion program like that of Crocker-Anglo. Accordingly, at the time it established an office in Los Angeles, its resources in money and personnel were not otherwise committed. [138] Dirlam testified that for Crocker-Anglo to enter Los Angeles it would have had to terminate its branch program elsewhere (Dirlam, Tr. 866-868, 625-626). Thus, it cannot be said that because The Bank of California thought it economical to enter Los Angeles, it was economical for Crocker to do so. As we pointed out in United States v. Crocker-Anglo Nat'l Bank, 223 F. Supp. 849, 859 (N.D.Cal. 1963), "the Bank of California is a very special institution having the unique privilege of maintaining branches in several states, at Seattle, Portland, San Francisco and Los Angeles. One branch in Los Angeles [*189] for that bank may well be worthwhile to permit it to advertise its interstate services and representation in all large metropolitan centers up and down the Pacific Coast. But for the purpose of furnishing a substantial competition in such a metropolitan area by de novo branching it is obvious that multiple branches would be required to take care of the very considerable business communities in Los Angeles County, such as Beverly Hills, Hollywood, Westwood, Burbank, Inglewood, Whittier, Glendora, Torrence, and the like, not to mention numerous centers in Orange and Riverside [139] Counties."

Plaintiff concedes that the motivation for The Bank of California's entry into Los Angeles was "its own particular business reasons", which would not apply to Crocker.

If plaintiff were serious in its Bank of California analogy, it would have complied with the request of defendant banks to produce its files on The Bank of California's mergers with the Bank of Turlock, American National Bank of San Bernardino, Hollister National Bank and First National Bank of Long Beach to prove any alleged similarity to Crocker and Bank of California's alleged economic success in Los Angeles.

As we previously pointed out, had Crocker wanted to branch de novo into the Los Angeles area, it would have encountered serious difficulty because of the lack of available permits for which it would have been in competition with many others. The Comptroller has a policy of protecting smaller financial institutions in local markets from de novo branching by the larger banks. This being the case, Crocker could hardly expect favorable treatment in entering Los Angeles. Furthermore, it would be limited by initial costs, operating losses during the start-up period, availability of locations [140] and personnel to staff branch offices. We know from the evidence that even though in 1962 Harry Rhorer had advocated a program of 30 branches a year to "catch up" in Crocker's then existing service area, management cut the program back to a goal of approximately 18 branches a year to be attained in one or two years. One could, of course, speculate on the basis of arithmetic alone that any bank could establish any number of branches and that eventually the operation would be profitable. Practical limitations of personnel and the need for current earnings and dividends, however, set a limit on a bank's ability to expand and, accordingly, Crocker's ability on the basis of the substantial evidence in the case would seem to have been about 10 a year with a potential of approximately 18 a year. By 1963 the cost of physical facilities, already high, had gone higher; the time required to reach profitability and to recoup initial operating losses had lengthened substantially; and at the same time Crocker's management was confronted with the problem of maintaining earnings in the face of higher operating costs resulting from an increase in the rate of interest paid on savings deposits. [141] It would seem that Crocker's branch program in its existing service area was clearly all that management could (and certainly all that it would) authorize. Therefore, any further plans would have required curtailing an existing, successful program in favor of one which it believed was economically unsound.

We have previously pointed out that Crocker decided not to establish de novo branches in Los Angeles. Crocker had tremendous opportunities to branch within its then existing service area and these it decided to exploit. It was necessary to do so to remain competitive. Thus, Crocker-Anglo was not in the position of Pennsalt, which enjoyed 57.8 per cent of its existing market at the time it decided to enter southeastern United States in the joint venture with Olin-Mathieson Company (378 U.S. at 162). Pennsalt might well have exhausted its opportunities at home. Crocker was obviously not in this position, and its studies showed not only that there were opportunities in its existing service area, but that it would [*190] be disadvantageous to the bank if they were not developed as soon as possible. Thus, Rhorer found that Crocker was under-represented in communities [142] in eight important counties: Alameda, Butte, Contra Costa, Merced, San Joaquin, San Mateo, Sonoma and Stanislaus (G-114). As of the date of their merger there were at least 255 communities in Crocker's service area which had banks but in which Crocker was not represented (Tr. 1415-1417). In Rhorer's recommendation of September 1962, he listed 62 priority locations for future branching, which, with 21 outstanding permits and two pending applications for other locations, provided a backlog of 85 locations having immediate priority, none of which were south of Ventura County and only 11 were south of San Luis Obispo (G-115; G-117). In addition to those locations having immediate priority, there were sufficient other possibilities for profitable expansion within its own service area which could not be exhausted for at least 15 years (BK-U; Solomon, Tr. 1283). Thus, Crocker had adopted a specific program of future expansion which would have occupied it for the foreseeable future, which specifically excluded the southern counties.

Plaintiff's own exhibits show that the principal branching activity of Citizens during the period 1950 to 1963 was in Los Angeles County and south into Orange [143] County. Of the 51 branches added to its system in that period of time, all but one were in Los Angeles, Orange, San Bernardino and Riverside Counties (G-15; G-16). Citizens' one branch in Ventura County was 20 minutes from Los Angeles. The predominant share of its branch location surveys and investigations concerned areas in Los Angeles and Orange Counties. Regardless of various locations considered by various members of the bank premises committee, Citizens did not adopt any plan to establish a branch in the service area of a branch of Crocker-Anglo. Although some of the lower echelon officials in the bank premises committee considered locations at places such as Bakersfield, Ventura, Oxnard and Santa Barbara, the committee at no time recommended to management that a branch be established in any of these locations and its recommendation that Citizens apply for Simi was rejected by management. Of the 19 permits of Citizens pending at the time of the application to merge, one was in Orange County, one in Riverside, one was in the Agoura area of Los Angeles near the Ventura County line, and the remaining 16 were in other sections of Los Angeles County (Ct. 195, Exh. 13, p. 70; [144] Dirlam, Tr. 770). At the time of the merger there were at least 171 southern California communities having one or more banking offices in which Citizens did not have a branch, and many of these would have been desirable locations for Citizens (BK-T; Rhorer, Tr. 1413-1414, 1373). Plaintiff's expert, Dirlam, was unable to predict when, if ever, Citizens would have become a statewide bank (Tr. 840, 841). Hamilton's vague suggestion that Citizens' bank premises committee discuss the advantages of establishing a branch in downtown San Francisco was never seriously considered even by the bank premises committee.

Insofar as the economics of the situation are concerned, plaintiff is faced with the experience of Security First National Bank. It has had one or more offices as far north as Fresno since prior to 1946 and is much larger than Citizens. It has not yet established a branch in San Francisco. What makes plaintiff think that Citizens would precede Security in establishing offices in northern California? And if it did not, how many permits would be left for Citizens? As it is, plaintiff's own exhibits show that Citizens would be competing with 42 other banks in attempting to obtain [145] the one or two permits which plaintiff estimates will be authorized for San Francisco prior to December 1, 1980. Accordingly, there is no reasonable probability that Citizens would have become a statewide bank absent the instant merger [*191] or that Citizens would have established branches in Crocker's service area.

Convenience and needs of the community to be served.

Pursuant to the mandate of the Supreme Court that HN7[] "the offsetting community 'convenience and needs,' as specified in 12 U.S.C. § 1828(c)(5)(B), must be pleaded and proved by the defenders of the merger", United States v. First City National Bank, 386 U.S. 361, 364, 18 L. Ed. 2d 151, 87 S. Ct. 1088 (1967), on review de novo we find that the defendant banks fully sustained their required burden of proof and unequivocally established that any hypothesized anticompetitive effects stemming from the instant merger were clearly outweighed by the merged bank's increased ability to meet the convenience and needs of the community to be served.

The merger of Crocker and Citizens was clearly beneficial in that it (a) caused an immediate increase in the number of statewide banks competing within the state, (b) produced [146] a bank having increased ability to mobilize financial resources in a capital deficit area, (c) created a bank which is better equipped and therefore more likely to engage in credit gap financing, (d) created another substantial competitor in the underwriting of municipal bonds, and (e) enhanced the merged bank's ability to compete more vigorously in international banking and to provide additional services to those engaged in international trade.

The evidence in this case establishes that each of the above enumerated conveniences and needs of the community to be served was beneficially served by the instant merger. Each will be separately considered.

A. The merger met the need in California for another bank with statewide facilities.

Prior to the merger, the Bank of America had a near monopoly among banks capable of performing a statewide banking service (Nicols, Tr. 2263, 2264). From the standpoint of California's banking structure, the merger was desirable in that it provided an additional statewide competitor for the Bank of America (Saxon, Tr. 2062-2063, 2066). There was a need for another statewide bank to provide some statewide balance in California banking (Saxon, [147] Tr. 2066). Plaintiff concedes this (Plaintiff's Response to Request for Admission of Fact No. 6, filed July 11, 1964). The immediate and certain offset of the merger was to create a bank capable of meeting the convenience and needs of communities in California for another bank with statewide facilities (Ct. 195, Exh. 13, p. 9; BK-A, p. 59; Nicols, Tr. 2265).

The merger of Crocker and Citizens caused an immediate 50 per cent increase in the number of statewide institutions and doubled the number of effective, formidable statewide competitors of the Bank of America (Goodman, Tr. 2171; Saxon, Tr. 2037), an effect which would not have been possible by de novo branching. Had that method been attempted, it would have taken eight to ten years without any assurance that an effective statewide system would be achieved even then (Weston, Tr. 2162).

In addition to the many communities where the merged bank constitutes a second or a third statewide competitor of the Bank of America, there are many others where it provides the only statewide competition to the Bank of America. Crocker-Citizens is the only statewide competitor of the Bank of America in communities in seven counties (Colusa, [148] El Dorado, Napa, Sutter, Tehama and Yolo) (BK-QQ). Even in counties where the United California Bank or First Western have one or more offices, there are many communities where Crocker-Citizens is the Bank of America's only statewide competitor. Examples are Oxnard in Ventura County, Taft in Kern County, and Lompoc in Santa Barbara County (BK-M; BK-N; BK-O). By creating another statewide bank, the Crocker-Citizens merger improved upon the existing banking structure in [*192] California (Ct. 195, Exh. 13, p. 9; Nicols, Tr. 2265).

The merger of Crocker and Citizens afforded the only practical possibility of founding another substantial statewide competitor to the Bank of America (Saxon, Tr. 2038). No bank in California has ever become statewide de novo (Nicols, Tr. 2268, 2269; Weston, Tr. 2157). The Bank of America achieved a statewide system in the 1930s only after very extensive acquisitions consummated during the 1920s (Weston, Tr. 2157, 2158). The present First Western Bank and Trust Company and the United California Bank were both the progeny of mergers (G-26).

The public interest and the needs and convenience of the many communities where Crocker-Citizens now has [149] or will in the future establish offices will be better served by reason of the merger. The existence of a bank with statewide facilities is a distinct benefit to all users of banking services, including both borrowers and depositors (Nicols, Tr. 2255; Lishan, Tr. 2341; BK-A, p. 59).

B. The merger provides more effective mobilization of financial resources.

California is a capital import state and will be such for years to come, since it is unable to generate sufficient capital to accommodate the public and private needs to sustain the growth of the state (Saxon, Tr. 2039). The creation of another statewide bank helped to alleviate this adverse situation and served the convenience and needs of California by providing a more effective mobilization of the financial resources within the state. The importance of mobilization of funds to the state and local communities is reflected in the very substantial amount of bonds issued by the state and its political subdivisions each year (G-353; Saxon, Tr. 2067-2068). The substantial amount of federal funds imported into California is also a reflection of the need for funds to finance highways, schools and the growth of the state in general [150] (Saxon, Tr. 2070).

It is, of course, true that California was not totally lacking in institutions capable of mobilizing financial resources within the state (Weston, Tr. 2137). Other financial intermediaries contribute to mobility of funds. Correspondent banking also provides some mobility of funds (Weston, Tr. 2139). However, a statewide branching system permits more effective mobilization of funds than correspondent banking in that transfer of credits by statewide banks is less cumbersome and can be made more quickly and at less expense than through the correspondent banking system (Goodman, Tr. 2213-2215). Thus the creation of another statewide bank constitutes a substantial improvement upon the ability of California banks to mobilize the state's resources (Saxon, Tr. 2047). And if the contribution of other financial intermediaries is excluded, the resulting bank's increased ability to distribute surplus funds to areas having needs for loans in excess of deposits is a particularly significant benefit, especially to the potential borrowers affected (Weston, Tr. 2169).

In adopting laws permitting statewide branch banking, California endeavored to achieve the most efficient [151] allocation and distribution of financial resources within the state, that being one of the principal attributes of statewide branching (Goodman, Tr. 2172, 2173; Saxon, Tr. 2047, 2048). Thus the merger of Crocker and Citizens improves upon the banking structure by creating a bank of a type the state has found to be beneficial (Saxon, Tr. 2047).

The Crocker-Citizens merger enabled the resulting bank to make more effective use of the state's financial resources by permitting the bank to transfer funds from areas in which there may be an excess of deposits to areas where there is a greater need for loans (Weston, Tr. 2168, 2169). Lending credits not needed in an agricultural area can be transferred to an industrial area experiencing more rapid growth, and seasonal credit needs in one area can be met with seasonal [*193] surpluses in another (Goodman, Tr. 2172).

The merger also had the effect of increasing the banks' aggressiveness in meeting the convenience and needs of the community for loans in another respect. Crocker-Citizens now has a loan to deposit ratio of approximately 70-71 percent, which is in line with that of other California banks. Had there been no merger, Citizens' [152] ratio would have remained substantially lower. It followed a much more conservative loan policy than Crocker, as indicated by the contrast between its pre-merger ratio of 56 per cent and Crocker's pre-merger ratio of 64 per cent. (Solomon, Tr. 2095, 2096). Thus the merger has resulted in a larger amount of funds available for loans in southern California communities.

The Government sought to meet the effect of this evidence by asserting through Professor Nicols that the capital deficit in California was a consequence of high concentration. Nicols admitted, however, that his opinion was contrary to the general opinion, that the subject was highly controversial and that his opinion assumed that the state as a whole was a market. But there is no convincing evidence that the state is a market; the only empirical evidence is to the contrary. The substantial evidence leads this court to find that the instant merger provides a more effective and needed mobilization of financial resources.

C. The increased size and geographical and industrial diversification of the merged bank increases its ability to engage in credit gap financing and the probability of its doing so.

Credit gaps [153] exist for various kinds of loans for which the amount of financing available is not as large as is thought socially desirable. That such credit gaps exist and that it is socially desirable to fill those gaps is shown by federal programs aggregating over one hundred billion dollars in direct and insured loans in housing, small business and transportation (Weston, Tr. 2122). Geographical diversification increases a bank's ability to engage in credit gap financing and to undertake a volume of higher-than-normal risk loans because of the principle of statistical averaging. The increased size and geographical and industrial diversification resulting from the merger will not only increase the merged banks' ability to undertake credit gap financing but it will also increase the probability of its doing so (Weston, Tr. 2139-2140). This has been the experience of the Bank of America (Weston, Tr. 2124). Professor Nicols admitted that large banks provide more financing for small businessmen than do smaller banks. From an economic standpoint, it is desirable to increase the number of institutions willing to undertake filling of the credit gaps. Large risks are associated with loans to new [154] industry and new and small businesses. Yet their contributions to the economy are substantial. Therefore, any increase in the number of banks willing to undertake financing small business is beneficial.

D. The merger created increased competition among underwriters of municipal bonds.

There can be no doubt that since the merger Crocker-Citizens has become a significant competitor in municipal bond underwriting. Prior to the merger, Citizens did not engage in this business and Crocker was not a significant competitor. There was no actual or potential competition between Crocker and Citizens in the municipal bond business. The effect of additional competitors for municipal bonds is demonstrated by the fact that the creation of United California Bank and the creation of Crocker-Citizens and the resulting increased activity in bidding for bonds coincided in each instance with a substantial drop in the cost of municipal bond financing to California communities.

To illustrate the effect of increased competition upon the cost of bond financing for California municipalities, defendant banks prepared an exhibit comparing [*194] the yield (interest costs) of California municipal [155] bonds with the national average yield, which, for purposes of comparison, was shown as "100". Plaintiff had no question as to its accuracy (Statement of Plaintiff's Counsel, Tr. 2024). The exhibit shows that prior to February 1961, when the United California Bank was formed (G-30, n. 2), the yield on California bonds was seldom below 102 per cent of the national average, that it was frequently above 104 per cent and averaged approximately 103.4 per cent of the national average (BK-HHH). During the period February 1961 to February 1963 there was a sharp drop in the California bond yield. During that period of time the California yield was in excess of 102 per cent of the national average in only five months, was less than 101 per cent of the national average in eleven months and averaged 100.96 per cent of the national average. In February 1963 Crocker sharply increased its competition in the underwriting of municipal bonds in anticipation of the pending merger (Solomon, Tr. 2085, 2086). The yield on California bonds again took a sharp drop and at no time since has the yield ever gone as high as 102 per cent of the national average. Notwithstanding an almost 50 per cent increase [156] in the total amount of municipal bonds sold during the period 1963 to 1965 (G-353) and an increasingly tighter money market and rising interest rates (G-361, pp. 9, 11), the average yield on California municipal bonds during this period dropped to 100.31 per cent of the national average. This reduction in the yield on California municipal bonds is a direct result of increased competition (Goodman, Tr. 2179). Although other factors undoubtedly affect the yield on California municipal bonds, the lower interest rates of California municipal bonds was in large part due to the increasing competition by United California Bank and the advent of Crocker-Citizens as a substantial underwriter of California municipal issues.

California municipalities are now issuing bonds at a rate in excess of $1.5 billion a year (G-353; Goodman, Tr. 2182). If increased competition results in lowering the interest cost of those bonds by fifteen basis points, the resulting savings to California municipalities would amount to approximately $22.5 million, which might then be more beneficially employed for better schools and similar undertakings (Goodman, Tr. 2182).

Plaintiff's witness, Lishan, characterized [157] most of the municipal bond issues on which Crocker-Citizens bid as being small (Lishan, Tr. 2344). It is on just such issues where increased competition might have the most beneficial effects. As a general rule, municipalities have to pay higher interest costs on small issues (Lishan, Tr. 2333).

The merger was particularly important to southern California communities because as a result of the merger Crocker-Citizens has submitted bids in smaller southern California communities in which neither Crocker nor Citizens submitted bids prior to the merger.

Plaintiff's attempt to contradict this showing was less than candid; its evidence omitted dollar amount; it used 1963 as the base year, when in fact Crocker stepped up its underwriting activities that year in anticipation of the merger; it omits many smaller issues of bonds; it omits two purchases totaling $510,000 in 1965; it excludes all out-of-state issues; and one exhibit purporting to show the effect of Crocker-Citizens' competition omits every issue on which Crocker-Citizens had submitted the highest bid other than one or two which were included by mistake. Considering the fact that unsuccessful bidders provide effective competition, [158] United States v. El Paso Natural Gas Co., 376 U.S. 651, 661, 12 L. Ed. 2d 12, 84 S. Ct. 1044 (1964), it is unrealistic to say that Crocker-Citizens has not been a highly competitive and effective bidder. Since 1962 it has more than tripled the dollar value of its successful bids, made more than a tenfold increase in the dollar value of bonds it has helped underwrite as a comanager, established itself as a first or second bidder from 25 [*195] to 40 per cent of the time and cut deeply into the Bank of America's share.

E. The merger created a bank capable of substantially greater participation in international banking.

Neither Crocker nor Citizens were substantial factors in international banking prior to the merger. It is desirable to have another bank in California endeavor to become a substantial factor in international banking so as to provide better service to exporters and an additional competitor to the Bank of America.

Lishan's initial opinion that prior to the merger each of the merging banks had substantial international business was based on a misconception. On cross-examination, however, it became apparent that he had misread certain figures and that his conclusion [159] was admittedly based on erroneous assumptions and would have to be modified (Tr. 2357, 2359). The increase in the merged bank's financial base resulting from the merger enabled the merged bank to undertake expansion of its international banking business consistent with prudence and sound banking. As Mr. Solomon testified, it would not have been prudent for Crocker to have undertaken such expansion prior to the merger (Tr. 2107-2109). Banks the size of Crocker are not significant in the international banking business. Size is of great importance in international banking because of the risks involved, the need for specialized experts, and the desirability of opening foreign offices. Significantly, the foreign banks doing business in California have a substantial number of offices in their home territories and elsewhere. Since the merger, Crocker-Citizens has definitely indicated its interest and desire to expand into the international banking field. It has formed an Edge Act corporation; it has established foreign offices in Manila and London and has taken steps to open an office in Brussels; it has substantially increased the amount of funds available for use in international [160] banking; the total footings of the balance sheet of the merged bank's international department have increased more than 50 per cent. Crocker-Citizens' expansion in international banking would have progressed further were it not for the restrictions imposed by the Government's voluntary restraint program. Even so, its record is one of solid achievement and in at least one respect Crocker-Citizens has surpassed all California banks other than the Bank of America. No other California bank has more than one foreign office. With the opening of its Brussels office in June, Crocker-Citizens now has three.

Plaintiff's attempt to minimize the progress which Crocker-Citizens has made in this field by an exhibit purporting to show the amount of acceptances held by defendant banks and the eight largest banks is incomplete and deceptive because it reflects very substantial domestic as well as foreign trade acceptances, because the amount of acceptances held on specific dates shows neither the bank's commitment to international banking nor the volume of business handled and because acceptances purchased by the bank or sold on the open market are transferred to loan accounts.

While there may [161] be some argument as to whether a particular transaction may or may not benefit the balance of payments problem, there can be no serious argument that the creation of another competitor to the Bank of America in various communities in California in this field and the stimulation of additional international banking activity is other than desirable.

F. These benefits clearly outweigh any hypothesized anti-competitive effects of the merger.

Plaintiff produced no direct evidence on the "weighing" issue. Plaintiff sought only to minimize the beneficial effects of the merger. On the other hand, both Professors Goodman and Weston rendered opinions as to whether the admitted benefits clearly outweighed the alleged anticompetitive effects. Consistent with his original hypothesis that there were no anticompetitive effects and [*196] that the effects of the merger had to be weighed in the total financial market, Professor Weston opined that the merger was desirable from a competitive standpoint and that it had neither immediate nor potential anticompetitive effects (Weston, Tr. 2136). Because he viewed the effects of the merger in the context of a line of commerce which included [162] all competing financial institutions, he readily admitted that the benefits accruing from the merger would be small in relationship to the total line of commerce, but by the same token, he testified that any assumed anticompetitive effects could not be large. In his opinion the overall effects of the merger were procompetitive, in the right direction and beneficial (Weston, Tr. 2145-2146).

Professor Goodman went further in hypothesizing anticompetitive effects in order to obtain a relationship to permit a "weighing". From an economic standpoint, Professor Goodman carefully attempted to weigh the alleged anti-competitive effects against the benefits to the public interest in meeting the needs and convenience of the communities to be served by the resulting bank. It is something new in antitrust law (Goodman, Tr. 2194-2195). He drew upon his experience in other fields and in particular upon the economic "cost-benefit theory", which was developed to determine the relative advantages and disadvantages of public projects. This theory provides a method of weighing the costs in terms of existing advantages which will be lost by a particular public project against the benefits to be [163] gained by it. Familiar examples involve freeway construction where the costs include the removal of property from the tax roll and the eviction of people from their homes and where the benefit is increased speed of transportation through the community and lowering of transportation costs (Goodman, Tr. 2195). In using that theory, Goodman assumed (contrary to his opinion) that the merger had anticompetitive effects (Goodman, Tr. 2186, 2194). As costs, he weighed these effects against the merger's benefits set forth in A through E immediately above and concluded that when the costs were balanced against the benefits, the benefits clearly outweighed any and all the anticompetitive effects which could be hypothesized (Goodman, Tr. 2197). The Government's witnesses did not render any countervailing opinions encompassing these aspects of the case. Furthermore, the Comptroller of the Currency reached a similar conclusion in his decision and at the trial testified that the benefits of the merger clearly outweighed any possible anticompetitive effects and will do so to an even greater extent in the years ahead (Tr. 2036-2037, 2066; BK-A, pp. 58-60).

The Government's principal attack on [164] this conclusion seemed to be the assertion that this particular merger was not an absolute necessity in order to obtain these desirable results. Yet plaintiff conceded the need for additional statewide banks and its expert, Professor Lishan, readily testified that in considering the matter of convenience and needs from an economic standpoint, he would admit that an additional competitor met the convenience and needs of a community, even though existing facilities were adequate to handle existing trade and the establishment of an additional competitor was not an absolute necessity (Tr. 2278).

Before concluding our discussion of the convenience and needs of the community to be served, we note that in the laboratory of two and one-half years' experience since the merger, [37] the Government has failed to produce any instance of any adverse effect of this merger, while defendant banks have produced evidence of substantial, tangible benefits to the communities served by the resulting bank. Even if we were to accept the Government's allegations at face value, the benefits of immediately adding an additional competitor, in markets consisting of three (statewide facilities) or six or seven [165] (municipal bonds and international finance) competitors, would clearly outweigh [*197] the possible loss of an additional competitor in markets consisting of 85-90 (Los Angeles and Orange Counties) and over 200 (state as a whole).

The Clarke Memoranda.

---

[37] Plaintiff's expert, Gaffey, testified that such harmful effects should be observable in two or three years.

Before concluding, the court deems it advisable to briefly review the memoranda of Dwight Clarke (G-329; G-330), upon which plaintiff so heavily relies. The review is made at the close of this opinion, in order that it may be more effectively weighed in the light of the preceding pertinent facts. These two documents are virtually identical and were prepared to present Clarke's reasons "Why shareholders of Citizens National Bank would benefit from an exchange of their stock for that of Crocker Anglo National Bank in a merger where 'Citizens' would appear prominently in the new bank's name." The first was prepared for presentation to the Executive [166] Committee of Citizens on December 6, 1962, and was based upon the then exchange offer of 1.8 shares of the combined bank for 1 share of the then Citizens National Bank, and the second was presented to the Board of Directors of Citizens on February 7, 1963, and was based upon the exchange offer of 1.9 shares of the combined bank for 1 share of the then Citizens National Bank. The essential portion of the memorandum of February 7, 1963 recites:

> In only a little more than a decade, Los Angeles and San Francisco have grown much closer geographically. A very few years back it required an eleven or twelve hour journey to go from one city to the other; now it takes a little over an hour, and who is bold enough to say that that time will not continue to shrink? The completion of the vast Central Valley-Feather River water project will eventually bring greater unity of interests to the entire state.
>
> Considering the policy of the federal government concerning mergers and anti-trust, we may never again have as happy a conjunction of events enabling us to become part of what would be the second largest statewide bank in California and the third or fourth largest bank in the state. [167] Citizens and Crocker at present do not compete, yet the territory separating our two systems is constantly narrowing. When either bank goes very far north or south of their present areas, a serious bar to any merger would automatically be created.
>
> If we make no deal with Crocker, our future possible choices for a merger would be extremely limited. None of these other possibilities would be as mutually complementary as a Citizens-Crocker marriage. There is such a thing as compatibility among banks. Citizens and Crocker-Anglo have progressed along similar enough lines in the development of new business, credit policies and branch expansion to lead one to believe that in a merger the two managements would establish a harmonious basis for cooperation. As correspondents participating in loans, the officers of the two institutions have become well acquainted so would start their combined management with probably the minimum of friction.
>
> Only a few days ago the Bank of California announced that it will open its first branch in Los Angeles. That means one more competitor and one less possibility of a merger. Since Crocker has stated its desire to enter Southern California, [168] it is inevitable that if the present proposal is not concluded, Crocker will otherwise enter this area through merger or through de novo branches. Also the recent sale of the First Western Bank suggests that this statewide bank may be expected to become a more aggressive competitor.
>
> All these facts impel me to urge that this subject be given very serious study lest we gravely cripple the future progress of our institution.

When called as a witness by plaintiff, Clarke testified as to his position with [*198] Citizens, the circumstances relating to the preparation of the memorandum and the purpose he hoped to achieve thereby. [38] Now, who was

---

[38] Clarke testified as follows:

> Q. Now, during the time, that period of time that you were a director [of Citizens], would you say that you were a representative of Transamerica on the Board?
>
> A. I suppose I could be called that. I was elected by their stock, stock they controlled, together with some other people.
>
> . . . .
>
> A. I was on their Executive Committee . . . . (Tr. 1235)
>
> Q. Could you tell us how you went about preparing this document?
>
> A. Well, at this time, the date on this is December 1962, at this time active consideration was being given to the offer that had been made of an exchange of stock of Crocker for Citizens and I was very much convinced of the desirability of such an exchange. I felt it was greatly in the interest of the stockholders of the bank, of the staff of the bank and of the customers and the general public, and I was an active and vigorous proponent of the merger.

Dwight Clarke? True, he [*199] was a banker of thirty years' experience and a member of the Board of Directors

---

> There was opposition in the beginning, considerable serious opposition on the part of some of the other directors, some of the members of the Executive Committee, and we had many meetings about it and much discussion. . . .
>
> . . . .
>
> Therefore, I do this as a, what I considered like a sales approach, it was a sales approach, it was all the arguments I could think of to back up my claim that the merger was most desirable and I tried to do a selling job in preparing this argument and develop the various facts that appear in it as to - from data of various sorts that I gathered, had gathered. (Tr. 1238-1239).
>
> A. Yes, that's right, this is dated February 7, 1963. This is the one that I read aloud to the Board of Directors and provided each, presented each one of them with a copy of it. (Tr. 1241)
>
> A. I showed a copy of it to - in fact, gave a copy of it to Mr. Brauer as a Chairman of the Board of Transamerica and a copy to Mr. John Beckett, the President of Transamerica, because they were such large stockholders and they were cognizant of what I was doing and I gave them copies of it about the time they were made.
>
> . . . .
>
> A. . . . the merger could not be made without their full cooperation, full approval, and so they knew everything I was doing about that because I had originally heard about the offer through Mr. Beckett. (Tr. 1242).
>
> A. Yes, it was voted on after this was presented, this second document dated February 7, it was voted on in a meeting, I think, the 19th of February 1963 and both the argument for and the argument against were presented at that time. (Tr. 1247-1248).
>
> Q. Then, Mr. Clarke, since you prepared these two documents, the opinions that appear in there are yours, are they not?
>
> A. They are my opinions, they are my guesses as to a lot of things. It was my sales argument. (Tr. 1249).
>
> Mr. Archer: May I ask one question?
>
> Q. Mr. Clarke, do you have any information about what Crocker-Anglo's plans for branching were other than what appears right in the memorandum itself?
>
> A. None whatsoever.
>
> Q. Did you negotiate this at all with either Mr. Hoover or Mr. Solomon?
>
> A. I never saw nor talked to nor had correspondence with either Mr. Hoover or Mr. Solomon during the negotiations. In fact, I had never met Mr. Solomon until after the merger agreement was signed . . . . And only saw Mr. Hoover, although I knew him, I had known him a number of years before, but I only saw them for the first time sometime after the merger agreement in the spring of '63. (Tr. 1250-1251).

The court thereafter, ruling on the offer of G-329 and G-330 in evidence, through Judge Pope, said:

> Now, this tends to confirm what he has said in respect to his activities, and we therefore think that it is admissible solely for the purpose, as against Transamerica and as against Citizens, to show that they collaborated in bringing about this merger.
>
> So far as the opinions in there are expressed, we regard those as wholly inadmissible and they will be disregarded by the Court, particularly the opinion as to what Crocker-Anglo might do, because this witness has not shown himself to be privy to the inter-workings of the management of Crocker-Anglo.
>
> So if it is expected by the Government that this will tend to prove what the plans and purposes and intent of Crocker-Anglo would have been at that time, we regard that as wholly inadmissible and when it was first offered we regarded that as so entirely inadmissible and prejudicial that we first ruled that it would not be admitted for any purpose.
>
> But for the limited purposes which I have just stated, it will be received. We do not regard it as any proof whatsoever as to the purposes and intentions of Crocker-Anglo, in fact, the witness, if I heard him accurately, said it contained some of his guesses.
>
> That is the ruling of the Court. It is admissible for the limited purposes indicated as against Transamerica and Citizens only. (Tr. 1253-1254).

and the Executive Committee of Citizens, but his basic role in Citizens was that of representative and spokesman of Transamerica (he was placed there by Transamerica and was referred to by Mr. Britt, President of Citizens, as the "Transamerica representative" on the Board) and protector of Transamerica's 41 per cent interest in Citizens. When he prepared the memoranda and before presenting them to the Citizens organization, [169] he discussed them with Beckett and Brauer of Transamerica and secured their approval. The success of the merger was vital to Transamerica because (1) it wanted to divest itself of its 41 per cent interest in Citizens for fear that by voting it at a meeting of the stockholders it might turn out to be a vote in excess of 50 per cent of the stockholders voting at a meeting and thereby make Transamerica a bank holding corporation with all its enterprises and subsidiaries throughout the world subject to examination by the Federal Reserve Board at the expense of Transamerica, and (2) because it was getting the equivalent of 41 per cent of a $12 million premium, a sum equal to $4,920,000. This was the interest for which he was making his "sales pitch" against considerable opposition. Hence, it matters not how you characterize his memorandum of February 7, 1963, whether as an opinion, sales approach, selling job or guess, it was a statement made purely in the interest of Transamerica and could never qualify as an unbiased, objective opinion of probative value. We attach very little weight to Mr. Clarke's statements, for his words do not begin to speak as loudly as the deeds of Crocker in [170] centering its branching activities within present service areas and its refusal to entertain or make plans for entry into the Los Angeles service area of Citizens. In view of the banking situation in the Los Angeles area, his statement could not have affected knowledgeable bankers in that already over-banked area, since new competition is ever present at the periphery, and it makes little difference who that competition is, since, as we already know and previously related, in recent years there have been twice as many applicants as there have been permits granted for the Los Angeles area.

[171] Conclusion.

Throughout the trial plaintiff contended that a decision in this case upholding the legality of the instant merger would violate the basic legal principles on potential competition enunciated in the more recent opinions of the Supreme Court. The short answer to this contention is that plaintiff failed to prove that the probable effect of the merger would be a substantial lessening of competition in any section of the country. This is a fact question. Our decision in this case in no way runs counter to the teachings of the Supreme Court, since it turns not on any differing legal principles, but upon a particular factual situation which is entirely different from that prevailing in any of the cases relied upon by plaintiff and one from which no potential adverse competitive effect in any section of the country may be reasonably inferred. A further detailed analysis of these factual differences beyond [*200] that already herein expressed would serve only to encumber what is already an all too voluminous opinion.

The court repeats that plaintiff has failed to prove that the instant merger may tend substantially to lessen competition, actual or potential, or [172] tend to create a monopoly, in any section of the country, and that even if we were to hypothesize any such anticompetitive effects, such effects are clearly outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served. Accordingly, judgment is granted in favor of defendants and against plaintiff and the complaint is dismissed. Defendant banks shall prepare and submit an appropriate form of judgment to the court.

The foregoing opinion and footnotes constitute the court's findings of fact and conclusions of law, as required by Fed. R. Civ. P. 52(a).

Austin v. House of Vision, Inc.

United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit

November 1, 1967

No. 16098

Reporter

385 F.2d 171 *; 1967 U.S. App. LEXIS 4664 ; 1967 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,259; 11 Fed. R. Serv. 2d (Callaghan) 249

Richard D. Austin, Plaintiff-Appellant v. The House of Vision, Inc., et al., Defendants Disposition: [1] Vacated and remanded.

Core Terms

interstate commerce, amended complaint, employees, second amended complaint, defendant corporation, trial court, antitrust, restrain, alleges, amend, summary disposition, cause of action, anti trust law, district court, treble damages, grant leave, Conspiracy, competitor, conspiring, unmindful, notified, Vacated, grounds, optical

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Sherman Act

Civil Procedure > Pleading & Practice > Pleadings > Rule Application & Interpretation

HN1[] Standing, Sherman Act

To state a claim on which relief can be granted under 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, allegations adequate to show a violation. In a private treble damage action, that plaintiff was damaged thereby is all that the law requires.

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Complaints > Requirements for Complaint

Civil Procedure > Pleading & Practice > Pleadings > Rule Application & Interpretation

HN2[] Complaints, Requirements for Complaint

Under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, a plaintiff is not required to allege the detailed facts which support his claim; he need only make a brief, plain statement sufficient to notify the defendant of the theory of his claim and the grounds which support it.

Judges: Hastings, Chief Judge, and Castle and Fairchild, Circuit Judges.

Opinion by: PER CURIAM

Opinion

[*171] On July 20, 1966, plaintiff-appellant filed a complaint for treble damages under 15 U.S.C.A. § 15 against defendants The House of Vision and The House of Vision Employees' Benefit Trust.

The trial court granted plaintiff leave to amend his complaint to substitute the five trustees of the Employees' Benefit Trust for the Trust itself.

As amended, the complaint alleges that for ten years plaintiff worked as an optical technician and dispenser in defendant company's Chicago area stores; that he and other employees were members of the Trust, to which contributions were made by both the defendant company and the employees; that the Trust was amended in 1958 to provide that any employee-beneficiary who goes to work for a competitor of the defendant company will lose his beneficial interest in the Trust; that plaintiff left defendant company's employ on June 15, 1966, and became an employee of a competitor of defendant company; that thereafter plaintiff was notified by the defendant trustees that [*172] his interest in the [2] Trust was terminated; and that "the defendant corporation has been and is through its officers, agents and related personnel, conspiring with the defendant Trustees to restrain competition in interstate commerce, by preventing former employees of the defendant corporation from competing with the defendant corporation, and by reason of such conspiracy have actually used its employment contracts, Trust provisions in conjunction with various forms of coercive activity in an illegal manner which has resulted in an actual restraint of competition in interstate commerce by reason of defendants' monopolization and control of the availability of optical industry employees in interstate commerce."

Upon motion of defendants, the trial court dismissed the complaint, on the grounds that "an essential element of any private antitrust action under 15 U.S.C. § 15 is an explicit allegation of facts showing injury to the public as a result of the alleged antitrust violation charged," and that "there is no allegation in the instant complaint that the plaintiff has been unable to compete as a result of the alleged monopolistic practices."

Subsequently, the court denied plaintiff's [3] motion for leave to file a second amended complaint on the ground that given the facts of this case, plaintiff could not state a cause of action under the antitrust laws.

Plaintiff appeals from the dismissal of his amended complaint and the denial of leave to file a second amended complaint.

Although plaintiff prays for relief under 15 U.S.C.A. § 2, he alleges in the body of his complaint that defendants are conspiring to restrain competition in interstate commerce. Conspiracy to restrain trade falls within the ambit of 15 U.S.C.A. § 1.

We are not unmindful of the Supreme Court's decision in Radiant Burners v. Peoples Gas, Light and Coke Co., 364 U.S. 656, 5 L. Ed. 2d 358, 81 S. Ct. 365 (1960), in which the Court stated that HN1[] "to state a claim on which relief can be granted under [section 1], allegations adequate to show a violation and, in a private treble damage action, that plaintiff was damaged thereby are all that the law requires." Id. at 660.

Nor are we unmindful of the Court's decision in Simpson v. Union Oil Co. of California, 377 U.S. 13, 12 L. Ed. 2d 98, 84 S. Ct. 1051 (1963). [4] There the lessee of a service station selling gasoline on a consignment basis lost his lease because he refused to maintain the prices established by the lessor-consignor oil company. The Court reversed the decision below that plaintiff had not alleged an actionable injury.

HN2[] Under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 28 U.S.C.A., a plaintiff is not required to allege the detailed facts which support his claim; he need only make a brief, plain statement sufficient to notify the defendant of the theory of his claim and the grounds which support it. Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 47, 2 L. Ed. 2d 80, 78 S. Ct. 99 (1957).

Where, as here, plaintiff seeks an opportunity to amend his complaint in order to meet the objections stated by the trial court, we feel that he should be accorded such an opportunity. Whether such an amended complaint will state a cause of action cannot be determined unless and until such an amended complaint is filed and tested.

The dismissal of a complaint for failure to state a claim is an even more stringent and summary disposition than is summary judgment. In the antitrust area, which has seen rapid and sometimes surprising development in [5] recent years, there has developed resistance to summary disposition, at least until a full exploration of the law and the facts has been afforded. Cf. Poller v. Columbia Broadcasting System, 368 U.S. 464, 7 L. Ed. 2d 458, 82 S. Ct. 486 (1962).

In view of our disposition of this appeal, we need not now decide the question of whether the present amended complaint [*173] sufficiently states a claim under the federal antitrust laws.

We think the issues here involved may be more thoroughly considered if plaintiff is granted leave to further amend his complaint.

Accordingly, the judgment of the district court is vacated and this cause is remanded to the district court with directions to grant leave to plaintiff to file a second amended complaint, and for such further proceedings as may be deemed appropriate.

Vacated and remanded.

Kaplan v. Lehman Bros.

Supreme Court of the United States

November 13, 1967, Decided

No. 197

Reporter

389 U.S. 954 *; 88 S. Ct. 320 ; 19 L. Ed. 2d 365 ; 1967 U.S. LEXIS 2997 *; 1967 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,272

KAPLAN ET AL. v. LEHMAN BROTHERS ET AL.

Prior History: [1] C. A. 7th Cir. Reported below: 371 F.2d 409.

Core Terms

rates, anti trust law, Stock, Securities Exchange Act, shares

Counsel: Anthony Bradley Eben and Peyton Ford for petitioners. Hammond E. Chaffetz for respondents Lehman Brothers et al., and John T. Chadwell and Richard M. Keck for respondent New York Stock Exchange.

Opinion

[*954] [*365] Certiorari denied. MR. JUSTICE MARSHALL took no part in the consideration or decision of this petition.

Dissent by: WARREN

Dissent

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE WARREN, dissenting.

This is no ordinary case. It is of utmost importance to millions of investors, and concerns practices which have an impact on the entire economy of the Nation. It presents for consideration basic principles of antitrust law not previously decided by this Court, and, consequently, is not controlled by precedent. It comes here without representation of the public interest by an agency charged with enforcement of the antitrust laws.

This case draws into question the legality under the Sherman Act of the practice of the New York Stock Exchange in adopting rules fixing minimum rates for the commissions charged by Exchange members for the purchase and sale of securities on the Exchange. Petitioners brought this action pursuant [*2] to § 4 of the Clayton Act, 38 Stat. 731, 15 U. S. C. § 15, derivatively on behalf of five mutual fund investment companies of which they are shareholders and representatively on behalf of other shareholders against the New York Stock Exchange and five of its member firms. Their complaint charges that the practice of the Exchange in fixing minimum commission rates for transactions in securities listed on the Exchange constitutes a price-fixing conspiracy under § 1 of the Sherman Act, 26 Stat. 209, as amended, 15 U. S. C. § 1. They sought treble damages, a declaratory judgment, and an injunction, the effect of which would be to restrain the Exchange from interfering with the rights of individual Exchange members to set their [*955] own competitive rates of commission. The District Court granted summary judgment for the Exchange and member firms. The Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit affirmed.

Members of the New York Stock Exchange transact over 90% of all brokerage business in stocks in the United States. Based on the current trading volume, the investing public is now paying over $ 1,200,000,000 annually, at the uniform [*3] minimum rate, for the privilege of trading on the Exchange. More than 12,000,000 persons own shares listed on the Exchange. Mutual investment funds pay about $ 100,000,000 annually in commissions to trade on the Exchange, and over 3,000,000 persons own shares in mutual funds.

Only members can trade on the New York Stock Exchange, and its constitution severely limits membership. Exchange rules set uniform minimum commission rates to be charged by members for transactions on the Exchange. The same commission rate is charged, based [322] on the value of the round lot (100 shares), for each transaction regardless of size; the commission on an order for 10,000 shares is 100 times that on an order for 100 shares. Exchange rules prohibit any "member, [366] allied member, member firm or member corporation" from making "a proposition for the transaction of business at less than the minimum rates of commission." Before a member is allowed trading privileges he must sign a pledge to abide by the constitution and rules of the Exchange, and any member or allied member adjudged guilty of violating the constitution or a rule may be suspended or expelled by the Board of Governors.

[4] This Court has long held that rates fixed by agreement are unreasonable per se. United States v. National Assn. of Real Estate Boards, 339 U.S. 485, 489 (1950); United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U.S. 150, 218 (1940); United States v. Trenton Potteries Co., 273 U.S. 392, 396-398 [*956] (1927). Therefore, the Exchange practice here attacked, just as that in Silver v. New York Stock Exchange, 373 U.S. 341 (1963), would, "had it occurred in a context free from other federal regulation, constitute a per se violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act." Id., at 347. Here, as in Silver, the other federal regulatory scheme is the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, and the clear question presented is whether there is anything "built into the regulatory scheme which performs the antitrust function . . . ." Id., at 358.

Section 19 (b) of the Securities Exchange Act, 48 Stat. 898, 15 U. S. C. § 78s (b), authorizes the SEC by certain procedures "to alter or supplement the rules" of the Exchange "in respect of such matters as . [*5] . . (9) the fixing of reasonable rates of commission . . . ." Respondents contend that this provision sufficiently demonstrates the SEC performs a supervisory function in respect of the Exchange's rate-fixing to exempt the practice from review under the antitrust laws. Petitioners claim that for many reasons the possibility of SEC review is an insufficient substitute for application of the antitrust laws. For example, the SEC's review of rates is discretionary. Further, the regulatory scheme fails specifically to enjoin the SEC, in determining what rates are reasonable, to "enforce the competitive standard," United States v. Philadelphia National Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 351 (1963), and furthermore neither the SEC nor the Exchange has ever articulated any standard of reasonableness. Petitioners also claim that the underlying data used by the SEC in reviewing each of the five rate increases since 1934 have been essentially those supplied by the Exchange, and have been very limited in scope and content. Finally, they claim that if and when the SEC exercises its discretion to review rates, it is not required to hold a hearing, and because the matter is committed to [*6] the [*957] SEC's discretion, there is no effective [367] judicial remedy to require it to initiate a rate proceeding.

If, as petitioners claim, the regulatory scheme provides no assurance that antitrust policy will be implemented, perhaps a repeal of the antitrust law may be implied "if necessary to make the Securities Exchange Act work, and even then only to the minimum extent necessary." Silver v. New York Stock Exchange, supra, at 357. However, "repeals of the antitrust laws by implication from a regulatory statute are strongly disfavored." United States v. Philadelphia National Bank, supra, at 350. Moreover, petitioners claim that nothing about the Securities Exchange Act or the workings of the Exchange requires that the Exchange set minimum rates.

The court below, in a two-page opinion, held that a repeal of the antitrust laws was required to make the Securities Exchange Act work, and that "the self-regulatory function of the exchange has been exercised by virtue of § 19 (b)," 371 F.2d, at 411. In my view, this blunderbuss approach falls far short of the close analysis and delicate weighing process mandated [*7] by this Court's opinion in Silver.

The importance of the New York Stock Exchange in the functioning and livelihood of this Nation cannot be gainsaid. Ever-increasing millions of persons and billions of dollars are affected by the Exchange's practices. Without expressing any final view on the merits of the controversy, I am concerned that the law on this subject is to be permitted to lie where it has aimlessly fallen by virtue of the scanty opinion below. In my judgment, the claims advanced by petitioners raise important questions not only as to the compatibility of the Exchange's rate-fixing practice with this Nation's commitment, embodied in the antitrust laws, to competitive pricing, [*958] but also as to the fulfillment of the goal of investor protection embodied in the securities laws.

I would grant certiorari and invite the Solicitor General to participate in argument so that the public interest may be fully explored.

LexisNexis

Wurzberg Bros., Inc. v. Head Ski Co.

United States District Court for the District of New Jersey

November 15, 1967

Civil Action No. 832-66

Reporter

276 F. Supp. 142 *; 1967 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11554 ; 1967 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,294

Wurzberg Brothers, Inc. v. Head Ski Co., Inc.

Core Terms

Ski, Dealer, products, franchise, manufacturer, retail, prices, terminated, Sherman Act, summary judgment, parties, renew, shop, entitled to judgment, matter of law, customers, commerce, seller

Judges: [1] Wortendyke, District Judge.

Opinion by: WORTENDYKE

Opinion

[*143] WORTENDYKE, District Judge:

Plaintiff, Wurzberg Brothers, Inc. (hereinafter Wurzberg), a New Jersey corporation, with its principal place of business in the City of Paterson, in that State, is engaged in the business of selling sporting goods equipment at retail. Defendant Head Ski Co., Inc. (hereinafter Head), a Delaware corporation, having its principal place of business in Maryland, is engaged in the manufacture and nationwide distribution of metal skis and ski poles.

Wurzberg invokes this Court's jurisdiction under Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. §§ 1 and 2) and Section 4 of the Clayton Act (15 U.S.C. § 15). Wurzberg seeks the recovery of treble damages from Head and also injunctive relief.

The complaint alleges that the skis and ski poles manufactured by Head have gained national acceptance, and that the public demand therefor is such that sporting goods stores or ski shops which are unable to obtain Head cannot compete in the sale of metal skis or other ski products. It is charged that Head, for the purposes of eliminating competition and creating a monopoly in the sale of metal skis and ski [2] poles, developed a franchise system whereby certain limited business entities are granted yearly franchises, terminable at the will of Head which permit a dealer to sell "Head" ski products. It is further alleged that the policy of Head under its franchise system is to (a) maintain uniform retail prices on all Head products; (b) prohibit discounts on any ski products when sold with a product manufactured or distributed by Head; (c) control the advertisement of Head and other ski products; (d) eliminate all competition between retail outlets of Head Ski products; (e) deprive the general public of discounts on ski products not manufactured by Head, when such products are sold with any [*144] Head products; and (f) eliminate competition in the sale of Head products by limiting the number of its authorized dealers.

Wurzberg had been an authorized franchise dealer of Head prior to June 8, 1966, and as such had become a successful and profitable outlet for Head's products. During the period of the franchise, Wurzberg adhered to the retail prices suggested by Head, but refused to participate in Head's program which prohibited Wurzberg or any other store from offering discounts to [3] the general public on any ski products when that product was sold with a product manufactured by the defendant.

The complaint charges that the Head franchise system and its program restrain interstate commerce and have "tended to and actually created a monopoly in the line of interstate commerce in this State" to the injury of the plaintiff in its business and property. Wurzberg charges that on June 8, 1966 Head terminated Wurzberg's Franchise and refused to sell any Head products to Wurzberg; thereby eliminating Wurzberg's ability to compete with other sporting goods and/or ski shops in the market for metal skis controlled by Head. Wurzberg contends that, in consequence of the termination of its franchise by Head, Wurzberg lost and will continue to lose great profits and good will and has suffered destruction of its reputation in the retail distribution of ski products of all types. The foregoing allegations were thereafter repeated by incorporation by reference in the succeeding counts of the complaint, which, respectively, seek damages and other relief for the impairment of Wurzberg's ability to compete and to sell to the general public nationally known-products such as those [4] manufactured by Head.

Head has moved this Court for summary judgment upon the asserted grounds that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that defendant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. In support of the motion, movant relies upon the pleadings, various depositions on file and affidavits annexed to the motion papers. A sample, but unexecuted copy of the franchise agreement between the parties for the season 1965-1966, entitled "Statement Of Mutual Agreement Between Head Ski Co., Inc. And Authorized Head Ski Dealer", concededly executed in behalf of each of the parties to this litigation, and terminated June 8, 1966, provided in pertinent part as follows:

> "This Agreement when signed by an officer or principal of the Dealer and by Howard Head, President, Head Ski Co., Inc. constitutes the establishment of the Dealer as an Authorized Head Ski Dealer, and confers on the Dealer the right to sell Head Ski Products at retail.
> This Agreement shall be in effect from date of acceptance by Head Ski Co., Inc. until July 31, 1966, unless otherwise terminated as herein provided.
>
> Dealerships may be renewed from year to year only by mutual agreement [5] and by the execution of a new agreement form between Head Ski Co., Inc. and the Dealer.
> This Agreement between Head Ski Co., Inc. and the Authorized Head Ski Dealer becomes invalid with any change of ownership or change of management of the Dealer, and may not be assigned or passed on to any other Dealer or management without the written consent of Head Ski Co., Inc.
> This Agreement may be terminated without cause at any time on written notice either by Head Ski Co., Inc. or by the Authorized Head Ski Dealer.
>
> In the event of termination of this Agreement by either party, Head Ski Co., Inc. will have the prior right, but not the obligation, to repurchase from the Dealer any Head Ski Co. products then in possession of the Dealer at the original cost to the Dealer. In the event of the Authorized Head Ski Dealer terminating, liquidating, or selling his business, the Dealer agrees to notify Head Ski Co., Inc. in writing [*145] and to offer for sale to Head Ski Co., Inc. any and all Head Ski products then in the Dealer's possession at the original cost of the products to the Dealer.
>
> This agreement does not confer any specific or implied exclusive territorial rights [6] to the Authorized Head Ski Dealer. Head Ski Co., Inc. reserves the right to appoint additional Dealers from time to time in locations of its choice where in the judgment of Head Ski Co., Inc., a valid reason for such appointment exists.
> A separate Agreement with the consent of the Head Ski Co., Inc. is required for each principal place of business, and for each branch shop where Head Ski Co., Inc. products are to be displayed and sold, by the Authorized Head Ski Dealer.
> The Authorized Head Ski Dealer agrees not to sell or transfer Head Ski Products to any shop other than an Authorized Head Ski Dealer."

Head's argument in support of its motion is subdivided into four grounds, viz: (1) "Consideration of plaintiff's claim is limited to the legal effect of the reasons for defendant's refusal to renew plaintiff's franchise." (2) "There is no violation of Section One of the Sherman Act." (3) "There is no violation of Section Two of the Sherman Act." (4) "Plaintiff is not entitled to additional discovery before the Court rules on this motion for summary judgment."

With respect to the fourth ground above-stated, the Court is neither aware of, nor has it considered, for the [7] purposes of this motion, anything other than "the pleadings, depositions, answers to interrogatories and admissions on file, together with the affidavits" submitted in support of and contra the motion. F.R.C.P. 56(c). This being a civil suit under the Antitrust Laws, "Summary judgment should be entered only when the pleadings, depositions, affidavits and admissions filed in the case 'show that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the moving party is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law.' Rule 56(c) Fed. Rules Civ. Proc. This rule authorizes summary judgment 'only where the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law, where it is quite clear what the truth is * * * no genuine issue remains for trial * * * the purpose of the rule is not to cut litigants off from their right of trial by jury if they really have issues to try." Poller v. Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc., 368 U.S. 464, 467, 7 L. Ed. 2d 458, 82 S. Ct. 486 (1962). Summary judgments are not appropriate "'where motive and intent play leading roles.'" White Motor Co. v. United States, 372 U.S. 253, 259, 9 L. Ed. 2d 738, 83 S. Ct. 696 (1963).

In Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. Park & Sons [8] Co., 220 U.S. 373, 55 L. Ed. 502, 31 S. Ct. 376 (1911) Miles maintained a system of contracts between itself as manufacturer and retail merchants by which Miles attempted to control, not merely the prices at which its agents might sell its products, but also the prices for all sales by all of its dealers at retail, whether such Dealers were purchasers or sub-purchasers from the manufacturer. That system of contractual relationship was held to be invalid under the Sherman Act because it eliminated all competition and fixed the amount which the consumer was required to pay. In so doing the imposition of the terms of such contracts amounted to restraint of trade and, insofar as it affected interstate commerce, was invalid under the Sherman Act. In White Motor, supra, which was a Government civil Antitrust Action, a summary judgment for the defendant was reversed where it was based upon agreements between the truck manufacturer and its distributors and dealers by the terms of which territorial limitations were imposed upon the distributors and sales to governmental departments were forbidden. Although the manufacturer did not appeal from the trial court's ruling that the contracts [9] fixing retail prices were unlawful, the Opinion in the Supreme [*146] Court at p. 260 stated:

> "Price-fixing arrangements, both vertical (United States v. Parke, Davis & Co., 362 U.S. 29, 4 L. Ed. 2d 505, 80 S. Ct. 503; Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. Park & Sons, 220 U.S. 373, 55 L. Ed. 502, 31 S. Ct. 376) and horizontal (United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U.S. 150, 84 L. Ed. 1129, 60 S. Ct. 811; Kiefer-Stewart Co. v. Seagram & Sons, 340 U.S. 211, 95 L. Ed. 219, 71 S. Ct. 259), have also been held to be per se violations of the antitrust laws; and a trial to show their nature, extent, and degree is no longer necessary."

Consideration of plaintiff's claim is not to be limited to the legal effect of the reasons for defendant's refusal to renew the plaintiff's franchise. If, as plaintiff contends, the defendant required that the plaintiff enter into the Dealer's Agreement as a condition precedent to the grant and/or renewal of a franchise to sell the defendant's products, the terms of that agreement operated in restraint of trade and constituted a per se violation of Section One of the Sherman Act. If so, it follows that the reasons for defendant's refusal [10] to renew the plaintiff's franchise become immaterial and irrelevant.

In support of defendant's contention that no violation of the Antitrust law arises from the unilateral refusal of a seller to deal with a potential purchaser regardless of the seller's reasons, Head cites United States v. Colgate & Company, 250 U.S. 300, 307 63 L. Ed. 992, 39 S. Ct. 465 (1919) and quotes from the Opinion therein that:

> "In the absence of any purpose to create or maintain a monopoly, the act does not restrict the long-recognized right of trader or manufacturer engaged in an entirely private business, freely to exercise his own independent discretion as to parties with whom he will deal. And, of course, he may announce in advance the circumstances under which he will refuse to sell."

In Colgate the Court quoted from Dr. Miles at p. 306:

> "'The retailer, after buying, could, if he chose, give away his purchase, or sell it at any price he saw fit, or not sell it at all; his course in these respects being affected only by the fact that he might by his action incur the displeasure of the manufacturer, who could refuse to make further sales to him, as he had the undoubted right [11] to do.'"

The Colgate decision however was construed in United States v. Bausch & Lomb Co., 321 U.S. 707, 88 L. Ed. 1024, 64 S. Ct. 805 (1944) and Federal Trade Comm. v. Beech-Nut Co., 257 U.S. 441, 42 S. Ct. 150, 66 L. Ed. 307 (1922) as meaning no more than that a simple refusal to sell to customers who would not resell at prices suggested by the seller is permissible under the Sherman Act. As United States v. Bausch & Lomb Co., supra, pointed out in Colgate, supra, held insufficient on demurrer an indictment under the Sherman Act against a manufacturer for requiring its dealers to maintain prices. The indictment alleged only specification of resale prices by the manufacturer and refusal to deal with customers who did not maintain them. The Court held the indictment insufficient because no reference was made in it to a purpose to monopolize, and stated that the Sherman Act "does not restrict the long recognized rights of trader or manufacturer engaged in an entirely private business, freely to exercise his own independent discretion as to parties with whom he will deal." F.T.C. v. Beech-Nut Packing Co., supra, while recognizing that "a simple refusal to sell to others [12] who do not maintain the first seller's fixed resale prices is lawful, * * * the seller may not, consistently with the Sherman Act, go beyond the exercise of this right, and by contracts or combinations, express or implied, [*147] unduly hinder or obstruct the free and natural flow of commerce in the channels of interstate commerce. * * * The Beech-Nut Company, without agreements, was found to suppress the freedom of competition by coercion of its customers through special agents of the company, by reports of competitors about customers who violated resale prices, and by boycotts of price cutters." United States v. Bausch & Lomb, supra at 722.

The franchise agreement between the parties in the present case by its terms expressly restrains trade in favor of Head to the disadvantage of Wurzberg and the retail customers of the latter. The dealer may only acquire the right to sell Head Ski's products at retail provided the dealer executes and becomes bound by the terms of the franchise agreement. The franchise is limited in duration, i.e., to a year or season. The franchise may only be renewed from year to year provided the manufacturer and the dealer execute a new agreement. [13] A further provision of the agreement renders it invalid upon any change of ownership or change of management of the dealer. The franchise may not be assigned or passed on to any other dealer or management without the written consent of Head, and it may be terminated without cause at any time on written notice by either of the parties. In the event of termination, Head shall have the prior right, but not the obligation, to repurchase from Wurzberg any of Head's products then in the dealer's possession at the original cost to the dealer. Despite these limits on the rights of the dealer, the manufacturer reserves the right to appoint additional dealers from time to time in locations of its choice where in its judgment, a valid reason for such appointment exists. A separate agreement, with the consent of Head, is required for each principal place of business and for each branch shop of the dealer where Head Ski products are to be displayed and sold. Finally, the dealer agrees not to sell or transfer any Head Ski products to any shop other than that of an Authorized Head Ski Dealer.

Any doubt that Head is not entitled to judgment as a matter of law is dissipated by Simpson v. Union [14] Oil Co. of California, 377 U.S. 13, 16, 84 L. Ed. 2d 98, 84 S. Ct. 1051 (1964) in which Mr. Justice Douglas, speaking for the Court, stated:

> "There is actionable wrong whenever the restraint of trade or monopolistic practice has an impact on the market; and it matters not that the complainant may be only one merchant. See Klor's v. Broadway-Hale Stores, 359 U.S. 207, 213, 3 L. Ed. 2d 741, 79 S. Ct. 705; Radiant Burners v. Peoples Gas Co., 364 U.S. 656, 660, 5 L. Ed. 2d 358, 81 S. Ct. 365."

and further at p. 17:

> "We made clear in United States v. Parke, Davis & Co., 362 U.S. 29, 4 L. Ed. 2d 505, 80 S. Ct. 503, that a supplier may not use coercion on its retail outlets to achieve resale price maintenance. We reiterate that view, adding that it matters not what the coercive device is. United States v. Colgate, 250 U.S. 300, 63 L. Ed. 992, 39 S. Ct. 465, as explained in Parke, Davis, 362 U.S., at 37, was a case where there was assumed to be no agreement to maintain retail prices. Here we have such an agreement; it is used coercively, and, it promises to be equally if not more effective in maintaining * * * prices than were the Parke, Davis techniques in fixing [15] monopoly prices on drugs."

I consider the foregoing language peculiarly apposite to the situation disclosed by the record in the case at bar. Because, therefore, the record fails to show that the defendant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law as required by F.R.C.P. 56(c), the motion for summary judgment must be and is denied.

Plaintiff may present an appropriate draft of order.

Reimel v. Alcoholic Beverage Control Appeals Board

Court of Appeal of California, First Appellate District, Division One

November 21, 1967

Civ. No. 22905

Reporter

256 Cal. App. 2d 158 *; 64 Cal. Rptr. 26 ; 1967 Cal. App. LEXIS 1839 ***

JAMES O. REIMEL, as Director, etc., Plaintiff and Appellant, v. ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGE CONTROL APPEALS BOARD, Defendant and Respondent; CHARLES COHON et al., Real Parties in Interest and Respondents. [And 5 other cases.] *

Subsequent History: [*1] Rehearing Denied 256 Cal. App. 2d 158 at 176.

Prior History: APPEALS from judgments of the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco. Joseph Karesh, Judge.

Proceeding in mandamus to review decisions of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Appeals Board revoking decisions of the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control to suspend and revoke several liquor licenses for alleged violation of minimum price fair trade regulations.

Disposition: Reversed with directions. Judgments denying writs reversed with directions.

Core Terms

licensees, retailer, branded, minimum retail price, schedules, notice, distilled spirits, license, open competition, price schedule, trade journal, producer, actual notice, effective, appeals, package, words, fair trade contract, general circulation, legislative intent, minimum price, retail price, provisions, suspension, prices, mail, alcoholic beverage, make public, cases

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Trademark Law > Conveyances > Licenses

Trademark Law > Subject Matter of Trademarks > Labels, Packaging & Trade Dress

Governments > State & Territorial Governments > Licenses

* James O. Reimel v. Alcoholic Beverage Control Appeals Board (Jack Dorian et al.), Civ. No. 22906; James O. Reimel v. Alcoholic Beverage Control Appeals Board (Catherine Carella et al.), Civ. No. 22994; James O. Reimel v. Alcoholic Beverage Control Appeals Board (Michael Carella et al.), Civ. No. 22995; James O. Reimel v. Alcoholic Beverage Control Appeals Board (Charles Cohon et al.), Civ. No. 23282; James O. Reimel v. Alcoholic Beverage Control Appeals Board (Fred Lancelotti et al.), Civ. No. 23401.

Trademark Law > ... > Particular Subject Matter > Names > General Overview

HN1[] Conveyances, Licenses

Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 24755 provides that no package of distilled spirits which bears the brand, trademark or name of the owner or person in control shall be sold at retail in this state for consumption off the license premises unless a minimum retail price for such package first shall have been filed with the department in accordance with the provisions of this section. A price for each of such packages shall be in a minimum retail price schedule setting forth with respect to each package the exact brand, trademark or name, capacity, and type of package, type of distilled spirits, age and proof, where stated on the label, and the minimum selling price at retail. Any person filing such schedule shall cause such schedule to be published in a manner which will result in each retailer affected by such schedule being advised of the contents of such schedule prior to the effective date thereof. Such schedule shall be filed by the owner of the brand (or any of certain other designated persons). No offsale licensee shall sell any package of distilled spirits at any price less than the effective filed price of such package.

Governments > State & Territorial Governments > Licenses

HN2[] State & Territorial Governments, Licenses

Under the authority of Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 24757 the department adopted its Rule 99(k), Cal. Admin. Code, tit. IV, § 99k, which provides that the person filing minimum retail price schedules shall cause prices for all items on every original price schedule and for every change of price or new price on every replacement price schedule to be published in a trade journal of general circulation in the trading areas affected on or before the effective date thereof.

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Alcohol Related Offenses > Distribution & Sale > General Overview

Governments > State & Territorial Governments > Licenses

Criminal Law & Procedure > Criminal Offenses > Alcohol Related Offenses > General Overview

HN3[] Alcohol Related Offenses, Distribution & Sale

A state has particularly wide powers with respect to the traffic in alcoholic beverages and may provide for their prohibition or impose such conditions and regulations as it may deem proper.

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Rights > Procedural Due Process > General Overview

Governments > State & Territorial Governments > Licenses

HN4[] Fundamental Rights, Procedural Due Process

Unlike the rule with respect to the right to deal in ordinary commodities there is no inherent right in a citizen to sell intoxicants and a license to do so is not a proprietary right within the meaning of the due process clause of Cal. Const., art. I, § 13, nor is it a contract; it is but a permit to do what would otherwise be unlawful.

Administrative Law > Separation of Powers > Legislative Controls > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > Criminal Offenses > Acts & Mental States > General Overview

Governments > State & Territorial Governments > Licenses

HN5[] Separation of Powers, Legislative Controls

Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 24755 does not require as an element of its violation that a sale below the effective minimum retail price schedule be made knowingly. A strict liability is imposed on those exercising the privilege of selling alcoholic beverages. The duty to enforce and administer the act is vested in the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, and it has a broad range of power and discretion in carrying out this duty.

Governments > State & Territorial Governments > General Overview

Governments > Legislation > Effect & Operation > Operability

HN6[] Governments, State & Territorial Governments

To publish is defined as to disclose, reveal, proclaim, circulate or make public and to proclaim, to advertise.

Governments > Legislation > Effect & Operation > General Overview

HN7[] Legislation, Effect & Operation

Publish is not synonymous with communicate or to divulge or to make known. Inseparable from the term is the idea of publicity and circulation. The thought running through all the uses of the words is an advising of the public or the making known of something to the public for a purpose.

Governments > Legislation > Interpretation

HN8[] Legislation, Interpretation

If reasonably possible, conflicting provisions of a statute should be reconciled and brought into harmony with each other. In doing so, effect and meaning should be given to each word and phrase under consideration. A construction should be avoided which implies that the legislature was ignorant of the meaning of language employed, or that it used words in vain, the legal intendment being that each and every clause was inserted for some useful and reasonable purpose. The use of a word with settled legal meaning is some indication that such meaning was intended.

Administrative Law > Judicial Review > Standards of Review > Clearly Erroneous Standard of Review

HN9[] Standards of Review, Clearly Erroneous Standard of Review

The court is required to accord great respect to a statutory interpretation by the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control. It must be followed unless it appears to be clearly erroneous.

Governments > State & Territorial Governments > Licenses

HN10[] State & Territorial Governments, Licenses

Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 24875 relates to minimum price schedules for wine. That section provides for publishing by the person filing the schedules in a trade journal of general circulation among affected licensees. It then recites: instead of publishing, such person may mail his price schedule or any changes therein to licensees affected.

Governments > Legislation > Interpretation

HN11[] Legislation, Interpretation

It is a well-established rule of construction that when a word or phrase has been given a particular scope or meaning in one part or portion of a law it shall be given the same scope and meaning in other parts or portions of the law.

Governments > Legislation > Interpretation

HN12[] Legislation, Interpretation

When the scope and meaning of words or phrases in a statute have been repeatedly interpreted by the courts, there is some indication that the use of them in a subsequent statute in a similar setting carries with it a like construction.

Governments > Legislation > Interpretation

HN13[] Legislation, Interpretation

The intention of the legislature must be ascertained, if possible, and, when once ascertained will be given effect, even though it may not be consistent with the strict letter of the statute.

Governments > Legislation > Effect & Operation > General Overview

HN14[] Legislation, Effect & Operation

All statute-directed publications of notice are made in privately owned newspapers or journals.

Governments > Legislation > Interpretation

HN15[] Legislation, Interpretation

While an intention to change the law is usually inferred from a material change in the language of the statute, the circumstances may indicate merely a legislative intent to clarify the law.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

HN16[] Regulated Practices, Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade

Fair and open competition is a positive requirement of the Cartwright Antitrust Law, Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code, §§16700-16758. Minimum retail price schedules resulting from any combination for the purpose of stifling fair and open competition would be an offense against that law.

Administrative Law > Judicial Review > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Discovery > Methods of Discovery > Stipulations

Environmental Law > Administrative Proceedings & Litigation > Judicial Review

Governments > State & Territorial Governments > Licenses

HN17[] Administrative Law, Judicial Review

Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 23095 provides, in part, as follows: whenever a decision of the department suspending a license for 30 days or less becomes final, whether by failure of the licensee to appeal the decision or by exhaustion of all appeals and judicial review, the licensee may, before the operative date of such suspension, petition the department for permission to make an offer in compromise.

Administrative Law > ... > Formal Adjudicatory Procedure > Hearings > General Overview

Governments > State & Territorial Governments > Licenses

HN18[] Formal Adjudicatory Procedure, Hearings

In administrative matters, consideration of prior disciplinary proceedings is entirely proper, and the prior record of a licensee is relevant and material evidence of his knowledge of and compliance with the pertinent laws.

Headnotes/Summary

Headnotes
CALIFORNIA OFFICIAL REPORTS HEADNOTES

CA(1)[] (1)

Intoxicating Liquors—Alcoholic Beverage Control Act—Offenses.

--Bus. & Prof. Code, § 24755, relating to minimum price schedules for branded distilled spirits and providing sanctions for sales below such prices, does not require as an element of its violation that a sale below the effective minimum retail price schedule be made knowingly; and a strict liability is imposed on those exercising the privilege of selling alcoholic beverages.

CA(2)[] (2)

Id.—Alcoholic Beverage Control Act—Duty of Enforcement.

--The duty to enforce and administer the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act (Bus. & Prof. Code, §§ 23000-25762) is vested in the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, and it has a broad range of power and discretion in carrying out this duty.

CA(3)[] (3)

Words and Phrases—"Publish."

--In cases dealing with statutory requirements of publication in a newspaper, "publish," is defined as to disclose, reveal, proclaim, circulate, or make public, to proclaim, to advertise; the word is not synonymous with communicate, to divulge, or to make known, and inseparable from the term is the idea of publicity and circulation.

CA(4)[] (4)

Statutes—Construction—Giving Effect to Statute.

--In construing a statute, if reasonably possible, conflicting provisions should be reconciled and brought into harmony with each other, and in doing so, effect and meaning should be given to each word and phrase under consideration.

CA(5)[] (5)

Id.—Construction—Giving Effect to Statute.

--Statutory construction should be avoided which implies that the Legislature was ignorant of the language employed, or that it used words in vain, the legal intendment being that each and every clause was inserted for some useful and reasonable purpose.

CA(6a)[] (6a) CA(6b)[] (6b)

Intoxicating Liquors—Alcoholic Beverage Control Act—Suspension of License.

--The Legislature intended in Bus. & Prof. Code, § 24755 (prior to amendment effective November 8, 1967), relating to minimum price schedules for branded distilled spirits and publication thereof, and providing sanctions for sales below such prices, the common accepted meaning of the word "publish"; and the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control in its interpretation of the statute gave the word "publish" its accepted meaning in concluding that the Legislature intended that price schedules be published in a manner most likely to give notice to affected licensees, and thus required publication in a trade journal of general circulation.

CA(7)[] (7)

Statutes—Construction—Aids to Construction—Departmental Construction.

--A court is required to accord great respect to the interpretation of a statute by the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control which must be followed unless it appears to be clearly erroneous.

CA(8)[] (8)

Id.—Construction—Reference to Other Laws.

--In construing a provision of any code, reference may properly be made to other codes or statutes for clarification; and when the scope and meaning of words or phrases in a statute have been repeatedly interpreted by the courts, there is some indication that the use of them in a subsequent statute in a similar setting carries with it a like construction.

CA(9)[] (9)

Id.—Construction—Departure From Literal Meaning.

--If necessary, in order to give meaning to words contained in a statute, a court can depart from a literal construction of the words employed; the intention of the Legislature must be ascertained, if possible, and, when once ascertained will be given effect, even though it may not be consistent with the strict letter of the statute.

CA(10)[] (10)

Intoxicating Liquors—Alcoholic Beverage Control—Licensing Agency—Rules and Regulations.

--A determination of the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control that the words requiring publication of minimum price schedules for branded distilled spirits "in a manner which will result in each retailer being advised of [its] contents" in the context of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act and Bus. & Prof. Code, § 24755, indicated a legislative intent that the price schedules be published in a manner most likely to give notice to the affected licensees, was reasonable and correct, as was its requirement that such schedules be published in a trade journal of general circulation in the trading area affected.

CA(11)[] (11)

Id.—Alcoholic Beverage Control Act—Construction.

--The circumstances that the Legislature used the word "published" in the 1961 amendment to Bus. & Prof. Code, § 24755, did not indicate that publication of minimum price schedules for branded distilled spirits be discontinued in favor of actual notice to licensees where for many years prior to the amendment such schedules had been published in a trade journal of general circulation by rules of the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control and its predecessor, but rather indicated an intent to confirm the practice of publication by placing express directions therefor in the act.

CA(12)[] (12)

Statutes—Construction—Change of Language.

--While an intention to change the law is usually inferred from a material change in the language of a statute, the circumstances may indicate merely a legislative intent to clarify the law.

CA(13)[] (13)

Intoxicating Liquors—Alcoholic Beverage Control Act—Revocation and Suspension of License—Sufficiency of Evidence.

--In proceedings against licensees for sanctions for violations of Bus. & Prof. Code, § 24755, relating to minimum price schedules for branded distilled spirits and publication thereof and providing sanctions for sales below such prices, in selling at less than minimum prices contained in the schedules, the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control sustained its burden of proving publication of minimum price schedules as required by Bus. & Prof. Code, § 24755, by proof of publication in accordance with its reasonable and not erroneous interpretation of the publication provisions of the act.

CA(14)[] (14)

Id.—Alcoholic Beverage Control Act—Validity.

--To the extent that the retail price maintenance provisions of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act enable a producer to control the bargaining process between those who sell and those who buy his own product, the Legislature could reasonably assume that competition among producers, coupled with the bargaining power of those low-overhead retailers who desire lower retail prices, would provide a safeguard against excessive prices.

CA(15)[] (15)

Id.—Alcoholic Beverage Control Act—Validity.

--The former statutory requirement that a producer establish a minimum price for his product by securing a fair trade contract with at least one retailer before it became binding on all retailers was not in substance or practical effect different from the requirement of Bus. & Prof. Code, § 24755, relating to minimum prices for branded distilled spirits, that the producer unilaterally fix such price, so as to constitute an unlawful delegation of legislative power without necessary guide lines and safeguards against excessive prices.

CA(16)[] (16)

Id.—Alcoholic Beverage Control Act—Validity.

--The absence from Bus. & Prof. Code, § 24755, relating to minimum price schedules for branded distilled spirits, of the specific requisite that brands be in fair and open competition with alcoholic beverages of the same general class produced by others, creates no constitutional infirmity in the act, such fair and open competition being a positive requirement of the Cartwright Antitrust Law (Bus. & Prof. Code, §§ 16700-16758), where minimum retail price schedules resulting from any combination for the purpose of stifling fair and open competition would be an offense against the latter law.

CA(17)[] (17)

Id.—Alcohol Beverage Control Act—Validity.

--Bus. & Prof. Code, § 24755, relating to minimum price schedules for branded distilled spirits, publication thereof, and providing sanctions for sale below such prices, and rule 99 of the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control (Cal. Admin. Code, tit. 4, § 99 (adopted in furtherance thereof)) are not violative of the due process clauses of the federal and state Constitutions.

CA(18)[] (18)

Id.—Alcoholic Beverage Control Act—Revocation and Suspension of License—Evidence.

--In a proceeding before the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control to impose sanctions on a licensee for violations of Bus. & Prof. Code, § 24755, relating to minimum prices for branded distilled spirits, the department did not err in considering four previous accusations against the licensee as final determinations and considering them in fixing penalties where in each of the previous cases it was decided that the license be suspended for 30 days; and where, as to each decision, administrative or judicial review was pending when the parties stipulated to a penalty compromise under Bus. & Prof. Code, § 23905, the compromise stipulation providing that one case would be permitted to become final, while suspensions in the other proceedings were merged.

CA(19)[] (19)

Id.—Alcoholic Beverage Control Act—Revocation and Suspension of License.

--In a proceeding before the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control to impose sanctions on a licensee for violations of Bus. & Prof. Code, § 24755, relating to minimum prices for branded distilled spirits, consideration of prior disciplinary proceedings is entirely proper, and the prior record of the licensee is relevant and material evidence of his knowledge of and compliance with the pertinent laws.

CA(20)[] (20)

Id.—Alcoholic Beverage Control Act—Review.

--On appeal from proceedings before the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control to impose sanctions on a licensee for violations of Bus. & Prof. Code, § 24755, providing for minimum prices for branded distilled spirits, points relating to questions of fact or mixed questions of law and fact not raised before the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, the Alcoholic Beverage Control Appeals Board, or the superior court, may not be urged for the first time on appeal from a decision of the superior court.

CA(21)[] (21)

Id.—Alcoholic Beverage Control Act—Grounds for Revocation and Suspension.

--Bus. & Prof. Code, § 24755.1, providing that the license of a Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control licensee shall not be suspended or revoked for a violation of Bus. & Prof. Code, § 24755, and establishing monetary penalties as sanction for such violations, does not apply to a license suspension or revocation preceding its effective date and cannot be given retroactive application to such proceedings.

CA(22)[] (22)

Id.—Alcoholic Beverage Control Act—Judicial Review.

--The rule that a party is not permitted to change his position and adopt a new and different theory on appeal is applicable to appeals from decisions of the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control and the Alcoholic Beverage Control Appeals Board. (Opinion on denial of rehearing.)

Counsel: Thomas C. Lynch, Attorney General, and L. Stephen Porter, Deputy Attorney General, for Plaintiff and Appellant.

Charles P. Just and Robert Martin for Defendant and Respondent.

J. Bruce Fratis, Saveri & Saveri, Richard Saveri, Barbagelata, Broderick, Carmazzi & Arnold and Rinaldo A. Carmazzi for Real Parties in Interest and Respondents.

Judges: Elkington, J. Sims, Acting P. J., and Christian, J., [*] concurred.

Opinion by: ELKINGTON

Opinion

[*163] [28] These consolidated appeals primarily concern the interpretation of Business and Professions Code [1] section 24755 as amended in 1961 which relates to minimum retail [2] price schedules for branded distilled spirits. The section is part of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act (§§ 23000-25762) which herein will be called the Act.

The individual respondents and real parties in interest were holders of off-sale general liquor licenses issued by the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control (hereinafter called Department). Against each respondent licensee the Department filed an accusation alleging the sale of branded distilled spirits at prices less than the stipulated minimum retail schedules duly filed with the Department. After hearings the Department found the charges to be true. As to some of respondent licensees, license suspension was ordered; as to the others the sanction was license revocation.

Appeals in each case were taken to the Alcoholic Beverage Control Appeals Board (hereinafter called Appeals Board). The Appeals Board reversed the several decisions of the Department. It [3] held in each case that the record did not establish publication as required by section 24755; therefore the evidence did not support the Department's findings that the licensees sold at prices "below the minimum retail price schedule duly filed."

The Department thereupon filed in the superior court applications for mandate (Code Civ. Proc., § 1094.5) seeking reversal of the decisions of the Appeals Board. The superior court, after hearings, entered judgment in each case denying the prayed for relief. Each of the judgments recited: "The [*164] foregoing judgment is rendered by this Court upon the grounds that, as determined by the Appeals Board in its decision, the record does not contain substantial evidence that the petitioner sustained its burden of proving publication of the price schedule in the manner required by section 24755 of the Business and Professions Code."

It is from these judgments that the instant appeals were taken.

As pertinent here HN1[] section 24755 provided:

"(a) No package of distilled spirits which bears the brand, trademark or name of the owner or person in control shall be sold at retail in this State for consumption off the license premises unless a [4] minimum retail price for such package first shall have been filed with the department in accordance with the provisions of this section.

"(b) A price for each of such packages shall be in a minimum retail price schedule setting forth with respect to each package the exact brand, trademark or name, capacity, and type of package, type of distilled spirits, age and proof, where stated on the label, and the minimum selling price at retail. . . . Any person filing such schedule shall cause such schedule to be published in a manner which will result in each retailer affected by such schedule being advised of the contents of such schedule prior to the effective date thereof.

"(c) Such schedule shall be filed by (1) the owner of the brand [or any of certain other designated persons]. . . .

" [29] (e) No offsale licensee shall sell any package of distilled spirits at any price less than the effective filed price of such package. . . ." [2] (Italics added.)

---

[*] Assigned by the Chairman of the Judicial Council.

[1] All statutory references unless otherwise noted are to Business and Professions Code.

[*5] HN2[] Under the authority of section 24757 [3] the Department adopted its rule 99 (k) (tit. IV, Cal. Adm. Code) which as pertinent here states: "(k) Publication. The person filing minimum retail price schedules shall cause prices for all items on every original price schedule and for every change of price or new price on every replacement price schedule to be published in a trade journal of general circulation in the trading areas affected on or before the effective date thereof. . . ." (Italics added.)

[*165] It seems proper at this point before discussing the respective contentions of the parties to consider certain fundamental principles relating to the enforcement of the Act.

Our Supreme Court in Allied Properties v. Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, 53 Cal.2d 141, 147 [346 P.2d 737], has said, HN3[] "A state has [6] particularly wide powers with respect to the . . . traffic in alcoholic beverages and may provide for their prohibition or impose such conditions and regulations as it may deem proper."

This court in State Board of Equalization v. Superior Court, 5 Cal.App.2d 374, 377 [42 P.2d 1076], stated: HN4[] "Unlike the rule with respect to the right to deal in ordinary commodities . . . there is no inherent right in a citizen to sell intoxicants [citations]; and a license to do so is not a proprietary right within the meaning of the due process clause of the Constitution ([Cal.] Const., art. I, § 13), nor is it a contract [citation]; it is but a permit to do what would otherwise be unlawful. . . ." (See also Kirchhubel v. Munro, 149 Cal.App.2d 243, 247-248 [308 P.2d 432]; Schaub's Inc. v. Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, 153 Cal.App.2d 858, 869-870 [315 P.2d 459].)

CA(1)[] (1) HN5[] Section 24755 does not require as an element of its violation that a sale below the effective minimum retail price schedule be made knowingly. A strict liability is imposed on those exercising the privilege of selling alcoholic beverages. (See DeMartini v. Department of Alcoholic [7] Beverage Control, 215 Cal.App.2d 787, 815 [30 Cal.Rptr. 668]; Morell v. Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, 204 Cal.App.2d 504, 513 [22 Cal.Rptr. 405]; Munro v. Alcoholic Beverage Control Appeals Board, 154 Cal.App.2d 326, 329 [316 P.2d 401]; Mercurio v. Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, 144 Cal.App.2d 626, 630-631 [301 P.2d 474].)

CA(2)[] (2) The duty to enforce and administer the Act is vested in the Department, and "it has been given a broad range of power and discretion in carrying out this duty, . . ." (Harris v. Alcoholic Beverage Control Appeals Board, 238 Cal.App.2d 24, 30 [47 Cal.Rptr. 424].)

We shall state the several contentions on these appeals as they are outlined by respondents.

The first and principal contention of respondents [4] may be stated as: *The record discloses that the Department did not [166] sustain its burden of proving publication of the minimum retail price schedules as required by section 24755.

[*8] The specific contention of respondents takes the following form. In order that section 24755 be violated there must be a [30] sale below the "effective" filed minimum retail price schedule (§ 24755, subd. (e)). For such a schedule to be "effective" there must have been a compliance with subdivision (b) of the section which provides that the "person filing such schedule shall cause [it] to be published in a manner which will result in each retailer affected by such schedule being advised of [its] contents." The schedule was not so published; it follows that there was no "effective" price schedule and accordingly no violation.

---

[2] Section 24755 also delineates "trading area" for which the minimum retail price schedules may be filed separately and differently. Here we are concerned with the northern California trading area.

Effective November 8, 1967, section 24755 was again amended. Among the changes the requirement of publication was deleted.

[3] "The [Department] may adopt such rules as it determines to be necessary for the Administration of sections 24754 to 24756 inclusive. . . ." (Bus. & Prof. Code, § 24757.)

[4] This is the only contention urged by respondent Appeals Board.

Further it is contended: The specification that the schedules be published in a manner which will result in each retailer being advised of their contents is a requirement of some form of actual notice by personal service or by mail.

The records of the administrative hearings show the following: Publication of the minimum retail price schedules was made in the Beverage Industry News, a privately owned monthly publication in business since 1946. It was a trade journal of the liquor industry in general circulation in the area here concerned. Its [9] subscription price was $ 7.50 per year. Since 1946, copies of the publication had been mailed monthly to a majority of the offsale retail licensees authorized to sell alcoholic beverages in the northern California trading area.

It is clear that publication here was not made in a manner designed to effect actual notice by personal service on, or mailing to, each retailer affected.

CA(3)[] (3) In cases dealing with a statutory requirement of publication in a newspaper, California's appellate courts have defined HN6[] publish as to "disclose, reveal, proclaim, circulate or make public" (Application of Monrovia Evening Post, 199 Cal. 263, 266 [248 P. 1017]; Western States Newspapers, Inc. v. Gehringer, 203 Cal.App.2d 793, 795 [22 Cal.Rptr. 144]) and "'to proclaim, to advertise.'" (Arthur v. City of Petaluma, 27 Cal.App. 782, 788 [151 P. 183].) [5]

[*10] Black's Law Dictionary (4th ed. 1954) defines "publish" as "To make public; to circulate; to make known to people in general. . . . An advising of the public or making known of something to the public for a purpose." It defines "publication" [*167] as "To make public; to make known to people in general; . . . The act of publishing anything; offering it to public notice, or rendering it accessible to public scrutiny." Webster's New International Dictionary, Unabridged (2d ed. 1953), defines "publish" as "To make public announcement of; to make known to people in general; . . . To promulgate or proclaim, as a law or an edict. . . . To make public in a newspaper, book, circular or the like." (See also 73 C.J.S. 1250-1251.)

HN7[] "Publish" has been held not to be synonymous with "communicate" or "to divulge" or "to make known." (United States v. Baltimore Post Co., 2 F.2d 761, 764; 15A C.J.S. 84; 51 C.J.S. 463.) Inseparable from the term is the idea of publicity and circulation. (United States v. Williams, 3 F. 484, 486; People v. Burns, 178 App. Div. 845 [166 N.Y.S. 323, 325]; Cox v. First Mortg. Loan Co., 173 Okla. 392, 394 [48 P.2d 1060, 1063].) [11] "The thought running through all the uses of the words . . . is an advising of the public or the making known of something to the public for a purpose. . . ." (Estill County v. Noland, 295 Ky. 753 [175 S.W. 2d 341, 346]; Marx v. United States, 96 F.2d 204, 206; Associated Press v. International News Service, 245 F. 244, 251 [157 C.C.A. 436, 2 A.L.R. 317].)

We have before us conflicting statutory provisions. If we accept respondents' interpretation we must ignore the phrase, "shall cause such schedule to be published." Conversely, if we give "published" its ordinary and accepted meaning we must hold that actual notice to each licensee is not required.

CA(4)[] (4) HN8[] If reasonably possible, conflicting provisions of a statute should be reconciled [31] and brought into harmony with each other (Hough v. McCarthy, 54 Cal.2d 273, 279 [5 Cal.Rptr. 668, 353 P.2d 276]; County of Placer v. Aetna Cas. etc. Co., 50 Cal.2d 182, 188-189 [323 P.2d 753].) In doing so, effect and meaning should be given to each word and phrase under consideration. (Select Base Materials v. Board of Equalization, 51 Cal.2d 640, 645 [335 P.2d 672]; Brown v. [12] Cranston, 214 Cal.App.2d 660, 672 [29 Cal.Rptr. 725].) CA(5)[] (5) A construction should be avoided which implies that the Legislature was ignorant of the meaning of language employed, or that it used words in vain, the legal intendment being that each and every clause was inserted for some useful and reasonable purpose. (Prager v. Isreal, 15 Cal.2d 89, 93 [98 P.2d 729]; Siler v. Industrial Acc. Com., 150 Cal.App.2d 157, 161 [309 P.2d 910].) The use of a word with settled legal meaning is [5] We consider "publish" and "publication" in the sense of transmitting information or knowledge. They have, of course, other connotations such as in the law of defamation, negotiable instruments, wills, etc.

some [*168] indication that such meaning was intended. (Perry v. Jordan, 34 Cal.2d 87, 93 [207 P.2d 47]; City of Long Beach v. Payne, 3 Cal.2d 184, 191 [44 P.2d 305].)

CA(6a)[] (6a) In its interpretation of section 24755 the Department has given to the word "published" its accepted meaning. It has concluded that the intent of the Legislature was that the price schedules be published in a manner most likely to give notice to the affected licensees. Rule 99(k) requiring publication "in a trade journal of general circulation" gives rational effect to this interpretation. Such a publication may reasonably be considered as most likely to give the desired notice.

CA(7)[] (7) HN9[] We [13] are required to accord great respect to this interpretation by the Department. It must be followed unless it appears to be clearly erroneous. (Cohon v. Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, 218 Cal.App.2d 332, 339 [32 Cal.Rptr. 723]; see also Adoption of Parker, 31 Cal.2d 608, 615 [191 P.2d 420]; Bodinson Mfg. Co. v. California Employment Com., 17 Cal.2d 321, 325-326 [109 P.2d 935]; Neely v. California State Personnel Board, 237 Cal.App.2d 487, 491 [47 Cal.Rptr. 64]; Rich v. State Board of Optometry, 235 Cal.App.2d 591, 604 [45 Cal.Rptr. 512].) Accordingly, we now direct our inquiry into the reasonableness of the Department's interpretation.

The search for the Legislature's intent is aided by a consideration of HN10[] section 24875 of the Act relating to minimum price schedules for wine. That section provides for publishing (by the person filing the schedules) in a trade journal of general circulation among affected licensees. It then recites: "Instead of publishing, [such person] may mail his price schedule or any changes therein to licensees affected." (Italics added.) An intent to give the word "publishing" a meaning [14] other than the giving of actual notice as insisted by respondents, is demonstrated. Elsewhere in the Act where actual notice is intended, appropriate words are used, i.e., sections 23328, 23329, 23987, prescribing "written notice," and section 25760 calling for notice "personally or by mail." HN11[] "[It] is a well-established rule of construction that when a word or phrase has been given a particular scope or meaning in one part or portion of a law it shall be given the same scope and meaning in other parts or portions of the law." (Stillwell v. State Bar, 29 Cal.2d 119, 123 [173 P.2d 313].)

Throughout the statutes and codes of this state the Legislature has many times provided for publication of notices. So [*169] far as we can determine the term has never been construed to require actual notice. CA(8)[] (8) In construing a provision of any code, reference may properly be made to other codes or statutes for clarification. (In re Porterfield, 28 Cal.2d 91, 100 [168 P.2d 706, 167 A.L.R. 675]; People v. Vassar, 207 Cal.App.2d 318, 323 [24 Cal.Rptr. 481].) HN12[] "When the scope and meaning of words or phrases in a statute have been repeatedly interpreted by the courts, there [15] is some indication that the use of them in a subsequent statute in a similar setting carries with it a like construction." (Perry v. Jordan, supra, 34 Cal.2d 87, 93.)

CA(6b)[] (6b) It seems reasonable to conclude that the Legislature intended in its amended section [32] 24755 the common and accepted meaning of the word "published."

However, the Department was required, as are we on these appeals, to give meaning, if possible, to the words "in a manner which will result in each retailer . . . being advised of [its] contents." CA(9)[] (9) If necessary, in order to reach such a result, we can depart from a literal construction of the words employed. (County of Los Angeles v. Frisbie, 19 Cal.2d 634, 639 [122 P.2d 526]; In re Kernan, 242 Cal.App.2d 488, 491 [51 Cal.Rptr. 515]; Brown v. Cranston, supra, 214 Cal.App.2d 660, 672-673. HN13[] "[The] intention of the Legislature must be ascertained, if possible, and, when once ascertained will be given effect, even though it may not be consistent with the strict letter of the statute." (Struckman v. Board of Trustees, 38 Cal.App.2d 373, 376 [101 P.2d 151].)

CA(10)[] (10) We conclude that the Department's determination that the words [16] in question, in the context of the Act and its section 24755, indicated a legislative intent that the price schedules be published in a manner most likely to give notice to the affected licensees is reasonable and correct. This interpretation gives effect to each of the words and phrases under consideration. It brings them to a degree of harmony with each other not otherwise possible. And it is consistent with the usual meaning given the word "published" by the Legislature and by the courts.

The Department's interpretation is in accord with the general legislative practice of prescribing publication in such a manner as is best designed to give notice to persons concerned. [6] [*170] And it imposes no hardship upon the individual licensee who is under an affirmative duty to conduct his business in accordance with law. (See Morell v. Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, supra, 204 Cal.App.2d 504, 514; Munro v. Alcoholic Beverage Control Appeals, Board, 181 Cal.App.2d 162, 164 [5 Cal.Rptr. 527]; Cooper v. State Board of Equalization, 137 Cal.App.2d 672, 678 [290 P.2d 914].) If he cannot conveniently check the price schedules filed with the [17] Department he may have the information delivered to him by subscribing to the Beverage Industry News.

Respondents urge that such a construction of section 24755 makes it "incumbent on a retailer [18] to assume the burden of subscribing to a private trade journal which has no official blessing, sponsorship or information at its disposal."

The Act simply provides that the retailer shall not sell at prices below the effective minimum price schedules under peril of administrative sanction. The publication provisions of section 24755 and rule 99 (k) make these price schedules readily available to him. He may, however, obtain the retail price information from the Department where it is on file or in any manner he chooses. As to the claimed compulsion to subscribe to a private trade journal without official blessing or sponsorship, we see no illegality. HN14[] All statute-directed publications of notice are made (so far as we can determine) in privately owned newspapers or journals. Indeed, as we have previously pointed out, section 24875 of the Act expressly calls for publication in a trade journal or industry price book of general circulation among wine licensees.

Respondents point out that prior to the 1961 amendment of section 24755, publication [33] as now directed by rule 99 (k) was then also directed by Department rule. Publication was not then expressly directed by the [19] Act as it is now. They contend that by amending section 24755 the Legislature is presumed to have intended a change in the method of giving notice to retailer licensees.

CA(11)[] (11) By rules of the Department, and of its predecessor agency, the State Board of Equalization, minimum retail price schedules for branded distilled spirits have been published [*171] (except for a few years during and after World War II) since 1939 [7] in a trade journal of general circulation. If the Legislature intended by its 1961 amendment of section 24755 that such publication be discontinued in favor of actual notice it seems likely that it would not have used the word "published." Instead it would have called for "written notice" or notice "personally or by mail" as it has elsewhere in the Act. (See for instance, §§ 23328, 23329, 23987, 25760.) The circumstances seem more likely to indicate an intent to confirm the practice of publication by placing express direction therefor in the Act.

[*20] CA(12)[] (12) HN15[] While an intention to change the law is usually inferred from a material change in the language of the statute (Loew's Inc. v. Byram, 11 Cal.2d 746, 750 [82 P.2d 1]; People v. Weitzel, 201 Cal. 116, 118 [255 P. 792, 52 A.L.R. 811]) "the circumstances may indicate merely a legislative intent to clarify the law." (W. R. Grace & Co. v. California Employment Com., 24 Cal.2d 720, 729 [151 P.2d 215]; see also San Joaquin Ginning Co. v. McColgan, 20 Cal.2d 254, 264 [125 P.2d 36]; Martin v. California Mut. Bldg. & Loan Assn., 18 Cal.2d 478, 484 [116 P.2d 71]; Union League Club v. Johnson, 18 Cal.2d 275, 279 [115 P.2d 425]; County of Alameda v. Clifford, 187 Cal.App.2d 714, 723 [10 Cal.Rptr. 144].)

---

[6] I.e., Code of Civil Procedure section 1277, in a "newspaper of general circulation . . . printed in the county"; Health and Safety Code section 4785, in a "newspaper having a general circulation in the [sewer] district"; Labor Code section 1181, "by advertisement in at least one newspaper published in each of the cities of Los Angeles, Oakland, Sacramento, San Jose, Fresno, Eureka, San Diego, Long Beach, Alameda, Berkeley, Stockton, San Bernardino, and San Francisco"; Business and Professions Code section 23986, "in a newspaper of general circulation in the city in which the premises are situated"; Revenue and Taxation Code section 3391, publication "within the county as they [the board of supervisors] shall determine most likely to afford adequate notice to owners whose property is upon the delinquent lists."

[7] Rule 42 (1939, 1940) and rule 22 (1941-1944), State Board of Equalization, rule 99, title 4, California Administrative Code (1947).

CA(13)[] (13) We conclude that the Department's interpretation of the publication provisions of section 24755 is reasonable and certainly not "clearly erroneous." It should be followed by us. (See Cohon v. Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, supra, 218 Cal.App.2d 332, 339.) Accordingly, the record before us discloses that the Department did sustain its burden of proving publication of minimum retail price schedules as required [21] by section 24755.

Respondent licensees' second contention is stated as " Section 24755 of the Business and Professions Code and Rule 99 are unconstitutional."

The argument here is that section 24755 as amended, "is now nothing more than a naked 'price fixing' statute by which the Legislature has unlawfully delegated its power to producers and brand owners (who no longer are required to be in fair and open competition) and which permits them unilaterally to fix the price at which liquor must be retailed without any protective 'standards,' 'price guidelines,' 'ordinary play of competition' or 'bargaining processes' whatsoever." [*172] Such a grant of power, it is argued, is an unlawful delegation of legislative authority and is so arbitrary as to amount to a denial of due process of law as guaranteed by the federal and state Constitutions.

The appellate courts of this state apparently have never considered the constitutionality of section 24755 as amended in 1961. However, the general argument now made by respondent licensees has frequently been directed at distilled spirits minimum price statutes and regulations both in this state and elsewhere. While other states [22] are not in agreement, the question in California appears to be resolved by the cases of Wilke & Holzheiser, Inc. v. Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, 65 Cal.2d 349 [55 Cal.Rptr. 23, 420 P.2d 735], and Allied Properties v. Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, supra, 53 Cal.2d 141. These cases concerned the mandatory fair trade minimum [34] price fixing provisions of the Act as they existed prior to the 1961 amendment of section 24755.

The earlier law permitted (and still permits) fair trade contracts relating to the sale of any branded distilled spirits, "which is in [any] fair and open competition with alcoholic beverages of the same general class produced by others. . . ." (Section 24750.) Section 24755 (before its 1961 amendment) provided that all "distilled spirits sold at retail shall be . . . sold pursuant to [such a fair trade] contract." As amended in 1961, section 24755 provides that no branded distilled spirits shall be sold at retail at a price below the filed effective minimum price schedule, without regard to whether there is a related fair trade contract.

It will be seen that since 1961 under section 24755 there is no longer [23] a requirement that at least one fair trade contract be negotiated with a retailer, nor is there an express requirement that brands be in fair and open competition with other brands. These omissions, respondents urge, present new questions of constitutionality not decided by Wilke & Holzheiser, Inc., supra, and Allied Properties, supra, which should now be considered by this court.

Wilke & Holzheiser, Inc. v. Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, supra, 65 Cal.2d 349, 365-369, considering the pre-1961 mandatory minimum price fixing provisions of the Act, rejected the contention that they unlawfully delegated legislative power by enabling a producer or wholesaler to fix retail prices. CA(14)[] (14) It held that (pp. 365-366): "To argue that the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act unlawfully delegates legislative power because it is a 'price-fixing act' is to overlook the [*173] crucial distinction between the fixing of a price for all products in a given market and the setting by the producer of the retail price at which his own product is to be sold." The court found no tendency in the Act to allow one to regulate the business of his competitors or to exclude potential [24] competitors from the liquor industry. It concluded (p. 367): "To the extent that the retail price maintenance provisions enable a producer to control the bargaining process between those who sell and those who buy his own product, the Legislature could reasonably assume that competition among producers, coupled with the bargaining power of those low overhead retailers who desire lower retail prices, would provide a safeguard against excessive prices." The holding of Allied Properties v. Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, supra, 53 Cal.2d 141, generally was to the same effect.

CA(15)[] (15) Respondents contend that the earlier statutory requisite of a negotiated fair trade contract was a necessary guideline and safeguard now wholly missing from the Act. We cannot agree that the former requirement that a producer establish a minimum price for his product by securing a fair trade contract with at least one retailer before it became binding on all retailers was in substance or practical effect any different from the present section 24755 requirement that he unilaterally fix such a price. In each case the producer effectively sets the price for which his own product is to be sold. [25] The competition between producers and their respective brands is not affected. This, coupled with the bargaining power of low overhead retailers who desire lower retail prices, could, as said by the Wilke & Holzheiser court, reasonably be assessed by the Legislature to be a safeguard against excessive prices.

CA(16)[] (16) Nor do we deem the absence from section 24755 of the specific requisite that the brands be in "fair and open competition with alcoholic beverages of the same general class produced by others" to create a constitutional infirmity. Such HN16[] fair and open competition is a positive requirement of the Cartwright Antitrust Law (Bus. & Prof. Code, §§ 16700- 16758). Minimum retail price schedules resulting from any [35] combination for the purpose of stifling fair and open competition would be an offense against that law. (DeMartini v. Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, surpa, 215 Cal.App.2d 787, 808-809.)

Respondents complain that the Department is no longer required under section 24755 to produce affirmative evidentiary [*174] proof, or make express findings, that the brands involved are in such fair and open competition. This contention assumes that [26] there was such a requirement prior to 1961. DeMartini v. Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, supra, 215 Cal.App.2d 787, 808-809, considering the pre-1961 Act, held that certain statutory presumptions [8] constituted evidence, in similar proceedings before the Department, that the filed price schedules were in fair and open competition. (See also Dave's Market, Inc. v. Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, 222 Cal.App.2d 671, 677-678 [35 Cal.Rptr. 348]; United Liquors, Inc. v. Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, 218 Cal.App.2d 450, 453-454 [32 Cal.Rptr. 603].) DeMartini v. Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, supra (pp. 813-814), also held that express findings that the products were in fair and open competition were not required.

[*27] CA(17)[] (17) Applying the principles announced in Wilke & Holzheiser, Inc. v. Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, supra, 65 Cal.2d 349, and Allied Properties v. Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, supra, 53 Cal.2d 141, we hold section 24755 and rule 99 not to be violative of the due process clauses of the federal and state Constitutions.

Respondents Carella and Carella (1 Civ. 22994) and Carella and Maniscalco (1 Civ. 22995) further contend: "The Department erred by considering four unproven prior accusations in determining the penalty imposed herein.

HN17[] Section 23095 provides, in part, as follows:

"Whenever a decision of the department suspending a license for 30 days or less becomes final, whether by failure of the licensee to appeal the decision or by exhaustion of all appeals and judicial review, the licensee may, before the operative date of such suspension, petition the department for permission to make an offer in compromise, . . ."

CA(18)[] (18) Four previous accusations concerning the named licensee respondents were found to be true by the Department. In each case it was decided that the license be suspended for 30 days or less. As to each decision, administrative [28] or judicial review was pending when the parties stipulated to a penalty compromise (§ 23905) under which respondents would make a payment of $ 2,000. The compromise stipulation further provided that one case would be "permitted to become final" [*175] while the suspensions in the other "proceedings mentioned were merged." The $ 2,000 payment was made and the respective reviews or appeals were dismissed.

---

[8] Code of Civil Procedure section 1963, subdivision 15, "that official duty has been regularly performed"; idem, subdivision 19, that "private transactions have been fair and regular"; idem, subdivision 33, that "the law has been obeyed." (See Evid. Code, § 12.) They were repealed effective January 1, 1967, and reenacted in substance elsewhere.

In the instant cases the Department found each of the four prior decisions was a final determination and considered all of them in fixing the penalties. Respondents contend that such findings were not supported by the evidence and that such consideration was error.

CA(19)[] (19) HN18[] In administrative matters such as those before us, consideration of prior disciplinary proceedings is entirely proper, and the prior record of a licensee is relevant and material evidence of his knowledge of and compliance with the pertinent laws. (Dave's Market, Inc. v. Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, supra, 222 Cal.App.2d 671, 679-680.)

[36] We conclude that the evidence before the Department gave sufficient support to the questioned findings, and that the Department did not err in considering [29] the four prior proceedings.

CA(20)[] (20) Certain respondent licensees have in their briefs urged several additional points which were not raised before the Department, the Appeals Board or the superior court. With the hereinafter discussed exception these points relate to questions of fact or mixed questions of fact and law which could have been presented to and considered by the Department. Under well-established rules such matters may not be urged for the first time on appeal. (See Ward v. Taggart, 51 Cal.2d 736, 742 [336 P.2d 534]; Damiani v. Albert, 48 Cal.2d 15, 18 [306 P.2d 780]; Algeri v. Tonini, 159 Cal.App.2d 828, 832 [324 P.2d 724].)

We think it proper, however, to consider one matter which is now urged for the first time by the following contention: The penalties of revocation and suspension ordered by the Department should be vacated and a monetary penalty as provided by section 24755.1 should be applied retroactively.

In 1965, and following the Department's hearings and decisions in the matters before us, the Legislature enacted section 24755.1. This section provides among other things that the license of a Department licensee shall not be suspended [30] or revoked for a violation of section 24755. It establishes monetary penalties as the sanction for such violations.

CA(21)[] (21) Respondent licensees ask us to give retroactive application of section 24755.1 to their cases. We are precluded from doing so by Wilke & Holzheiser, Inc. v. Department of Alcoholic [*176] Beverage Control, supra, 65 Cal.2d 349, where a similar request was made. The court in Wilke & Holzheiser, Inc. (p. 373) held "Section 24755.1 clearly does not apply to a license suspension or revocation proceeding its effective date." However, in view of the current legislative intent concerning license revocation and suspension demonstrated by section 24755.1 the Department may elect to review respondent licensee's penalty assessments before they are placed in effect, as permitted by section 24211, added in 1963.

Each of the judgments appealed from is reversed. The superior court in each case will grant a writ of mandate commanding respondent Appeals Board to set aside its decision reversing the decision of the Department and to affirm such decision of the Department.

End of Document

Southern Pacific Co. v. United States

United States District Court for the District of Nebraska

December 6, 1967

Civ. No. 02577

Reporter

277 F. Supp. 671 *; 1967 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9251 **

SOUTHERN PACIFIC COMPANY and Union Pacific Railroad Company, Plaintiffs, v. The UNITED STATES of America and the Interstate Commerce Commission, Defendants route, Railroad, solicitation, transportation, preferential, practices, conditions, lines, connections, carriers, transcontinental, freight, interstate commerce, traffic, River, roads, public interest, circumstances, consolidation, modification, modified, national transportation policy, district court, discriminatory, territory, purposes, shipper, stock, connecting line, discriminations

Core Terms

Counsel: [1] Raymond E. McGrath, Omaha, Nebraska, Alan C. Furth and Robert L. Pierce, San Francisco, California, for plaintiff Southern Pacific.

G. Clark Cummings, New York, New York, William P. Higgins, Omaha, Nebraska, for plaintiff Union Pacific.

David F. Turner, John H. D. Wigger, Larry Meyer, Dept. of Justice, Washington, District of Columbia, Theodore L. Richling, U.S. Atty., Omaha, Nebraska, for defendant the United States.

Robert W. Ginnane, Fritz Kahn, Betty Jo Christian, Washington, District of Columbia, for defendant Interstate Commerce Commission.

Dennis McCarthy, Salt Lake City, Utah, Ernest Porter, Denver, Colorado, Donald R. Ross, Omaha, Nebraska, for defendant intervener Denver & Rio Grande.

E. Barrett Prettyman, Washington, District of Columbia, Yale C. Holland, Omaha, Nebraska, for defendant intervener Western Pacific.

Judges: Lay, Circuit Judge, and Richard E. Robinson and Van Pelt, District Judges. Richard E. Robinson, District Judge (dissenting).

Opinion by: LAY

Opinion

[*672] LAY, Circuit Judge.

Plaintiffs, Southern Pacific and Union Pacific seek equitable relief to enjoin the Interstate Commerce Commission [*673] from enforcement of a supplemental order, dated January [2] 6, 1966, modifying the Commission's order of February 6, 1923, entitled Control of Central Pacific by Southern Pacific, Finance Docket No. 2613.

While the one general issue before us is the legality of the preferential routing and solicitation by the Southern Pacific Company and the Union Pacific Railroad, [1] plaintiffs argue their case within the frame work of two basic questions. First, they challenge the propriety of modifying a condition originally imposed by the Interstate Commerce Commission upon the Southern Pacific when it acquired the Central Pacific Railway in 1923 (the Control case, 76 I.C.C. 508 (1923)). The second question concerns the legality of a 1924 agreement and the practices thereunder, providing for reciprocal solicitation and routing by Union Pacific and Southern Pacific in each other's behalf.

[3] By its 1923 order the Commission approved and authorized, subject to nine conditions, the acquisition by the Southern Pacific of control of the Central Pacific Railway Company through lease and stock ownership. The fifth condition, hereinafter referred to as condition (e), read as follows:

> "That the Southern Pacific Company shall cooperate with the Union Pacific Railroad Company to secure by active solicitation the routing of the maximum of freight traffic via the lines of the Union Pacific Railroad Company and the Central Pacific Railway Company through the Missouri River and Ogden, Utah, as parts of one connected continuous line, between all points in California and Oregon north of and including Caliente and Santa Margarita, Calif., and south of and including the Klamath Falls branch and Kirk, Ore., on the one hand, and points north and west of a line along the northern boundaries of Oklahoma and Arkansas, to the Mississippi River, thence along the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers (but not including intermediate cities on the Ohio River) to Wheeling, W. Va., and thence on a line drawn just east of Pittsburgh, Pa., and Buffalo, N.Y., to Niagara Falls, N.Y."

At the time, [4] the Denver and Rio Grande Western Railroad (hereinafter the Rio Grande) acquiesced in the 1923 condition. However, in 1957, the Rio Grande sought to reopen the control proceedings for modification of condition (e). In 1962, the Commission in a 6-5 decision refused to modify the original condition so as to eliminate all reference to the Union Pacific. The Rio Grande then sought relief from the District Court in Colorado. The Commission's order was set aside by the District Court and the proceeding remanded for the Commission to consider additional evidence. Denver & R.G.W. R.R. v. I.C.C., D.C., 229 F. Supp. 249 (1964). Upon reconsideration, the Commission revised its prior holding and modified the condition omitting the Union Pacific's name as originally recommended by the Examiner. [2] [*674] The Commission likewise held the 1924 agreement and practices of the Southern Pacific and the Union Pacific contrary to the National Transportation Policy (49 U.S.C. prior to § 1), and their preferential routing in violation of Section 3(4) of the Interstate Commerce Act, 49 U.S.C. § 3(4).

[5] We sustain the action of the Commission and deny the injunctive relief requested.

---

[1] This same case was heard by the District Court in Colorado in 1963, but was remanded to the Commission for consideration of additional evidence. The District Court in discussing the issues, observed:

> "This preferential solicitation was attacked as being improper or illegal under several sections of the Act as well as the antitrust law. The origin and the authority for these practices were contained in both condition (e) and the 1924 agreement. These two items constituted the physical evidence of the authority for the practice, but it was the practice, or the authority for the practice, which was attacked by the plaintiff, and where this authority might be physically found would seem to be of minor importance. Thus in effect there was but one general issue before the Examiner and before the Commission, although in somewhat different context." Denver & R. G. W. R.R. v. I.C.C., D.C., 229 F. Supp. 249, 253, 254 (1964).

[2] The modified condition reads:

"That the Southern Pacific Company shall continue to secure by active solicitation the routing of the maximum of freight traffic through the Missouri River and Ogden, Utah, between all points in California and Oregon, north of and including Caliente and Santa Margarita, Calif., and south of and including the Klamath Falls branch and Kirk, Oreg., on the one hand, and points north and west of a line along the northern boundaries of Oklahoma and Arkansas, to the Mississippi River, thence along the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers (but not including intermediate cities on the Ohio River) to Wheeling, W. Va., and thence on a line drawn just east of Pittsburgh, Pa., and Buffalo, N.Y., to Niagara Falls, N.Y. ".

It is helpful to understand the routes of the various carriers as demonstrated on the attached map, Appendix A. The Union Pacific operates the route east of Ogden via Cheyenne to Omaha, and also makes interchanges at Denver with the Rio Grande, via routes through northeastern Colorado and central Kansas east to Omaha and Kansas City. The southern route of the Southern Pacific is a transcontinental route from the west coast to Kansas City via El Paso. The Central Pacific, now the Southern Pacific, by complete merger in 1959 (Southern Pac. Co. Merger, 307 I.C.C. 806) connects at the Utah Gateway with both the Rio Grande and the Union Pacific and goes west to California.

Western Pacific, an intervening defendant, [3] competes with the Southern Pacific both on its north-south route through California and Oregon and its east-west route from San Francisco to Ogden. Western Pacific connects at Salt Lake City with both the Rio Grande and the Union Pacific. The Rio Grande operates two main lines between Denver and Ogden. One is via Pueblo, the other is through the Moffat Tunnel and the Dotsero cutoff. [6] West of Dotsero the lines are identical to Ogden. The Dotsero cutoff and the Moffat Tunnel were opened in 1934, thereby reducing the distance between Denver and Ogden by 175 miles.

The Commission observed:

> "The differences in distance, whether in favor of the Southern Pacific-Rio Grande routes or the Southern Pacific-Union Pacific routes, are insignificant from the standpoint of length of hauls [and 'maintenance of schedules'], and therefore the two routes are [7] substantially comparable. * * *" 317 I.C.C. 469, 475-76 (1962).

Under condition (e) and the 1924 agreement between Southern Pacific and Union Pacific, the plaintiffs have been routing and soliciting in favor of each other's lines at the Utah Gateway, in preference to any other interchanging lines.

Plaintiffs now urge that the Commission has no power to reopen the 1923 Control proceeding or to modify condition (e). We disagree. As the Commission said in its 1966 order:

> "[Future] changes of circumstances were undoubtedly one of the reasons which prompted inclusion of condition (i) reserving jurisdiction to reopen [*675] for supplemental orders as appropriate in the light of future events." [4]

[8] The Commission "has the power to retain jurisdiction for the purpose of making modifications that it finds necessary in the light of subsequent circumstances * * *." Baltimore & O.R.R. v. United States, 386 U.S. 372, 387, 87 S. Ct. 1100, 1108, 18 L. Ed. 2d 159 (1967). See also 49 U.S.C. § 5(9). Any rule to the contrary could illogically bind our national transportation system to archaic philosophies beneficial only for conditions of the past, but detrimental to the public welfare today.

We turn to the substantive problems involved. A brief background is necessary. In 1862 and 1864 the Pacific Railroad Acts [5] were passed by Congress. These Acts authorized the building of the first transcontinental railroad

---

[3] Western Pacific observes in its brief, p. 10, n. 7:

"In January 1966, Western Pacific filed with the Commission a complaint against Union Pacific and Southern Pacific, alleging that the Agreement of 1924, the Memorandum of 1947, and the preferential practices implemented there-under violate Section 1 of the Sherman Act, the National Transportation Policy, and Sections 3(4), 5(1) of the Interstate Commerce Act. By stipulation of the parties, a hearing on that complaint is being stayed pending the ultimate disposition of the instant case."

[4] Condition (i), also part of the 1923 I.C.C. order, provides:

> "That this proceeding may be reopened at any time by order of the Commission either upon the initiative of the Commission or, in the discretion of the Commission, upon the motion of any person claiming an interest in the matter, for the purpose of making such orders as the Commission may deem necessary or appropriate supplementary to the present order."

[5] Act of July 1, 1862, ch. 120, 12 Stat. 495; Act of July 2, 1864, ch. 216, 13 Stat. 362 (codified in 45 U.S.C. § 83).

in this country which found completion in the historic joinder at Promontory, Utah, of the two roads, the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific, on May 10, 1869.

Thereafter, in 1887, [9] the Interstate Commerce Act was passed, and at that time, as recently observed, the railroads, then "had a practical monopoly of freight transportation * * * and discriminations flourished." American Trucking Assoc., Inc. v. Atchison, T. & S.F. Ry., 387 U.S. 397, 406, 87 S. Ct. 1608, 1613, 18 L. Ed. 2d 847 (1967). As other roads began to develop in this country, railroads began to view the competitive future. In 1912 the Supreme Court was confronted with the control of the Southern Pacific by the Union Pacific. This was disapproved in United States v. Union Pac. R.R., 226 U.S. 61, 33 S. Ct. 53, 57 L. Ed. 124 (1912), as being a restraint of trade violative of the Sherman Antitrust Act of 1890.

Thereafter, because of the interlocking financial and physical relationships between Central Pacific and Southern Pacific's California lines, the Southern Pacific was forced to defend a lease and stock acquisition of the Central Pacific. This was similarly denied, with the Supreme Court making this relevant observation:

> "The proof is ample that the policy of the Southern Pacific system has been to favor transportation on its line by securing for itself, whenever practicable, the carriage [10] of freight which would normally move eastward or westward over the shorter line of the Central Pacific Railroad and its connections [the central route], for its own much longer and wholly owned southern route. This course was limited by an arbitrary rule during the time the Union Pacific dominated the Southern Pacific from the stock purchase [of Southern Pacific's stock by Union Pacific] in 1901 until the so-called 'unmerger' in 1913, as the result of the decision of this court in the Union Pacific Case [United States v. Union Pac. R.R., 226 U.S. 61 [, 33 S. Ct. 53, 57 L. Ed. 124]]. The compelling motive of this course of conduct is obvious. The Southern Pacific owns and controls the southerly route, and receives 100 per cent. of the compensation for freight transported by its road and water lines. Over the Central Pacific route it receives but a fraction of the freight, because the Union Pacific with its Eastern connections take up the carrying from Ogden to the East. Self-interest dictates the solicitation and procurement of freight for the longer haul by the Southern Pacific lines." United States v. Southern Pac. Co., 259 U.S. 214, 231, 42 S. Ct. 496, 499, 66 L. Ed. [11] 907 (1922).

In 1920 the first Transportation Act was passed. 41 Stat. 456 (1920). It recognized [*676] that the "public welfare" would be better served by a national transportation system. Subject to the Interstate Commerce Commission's approval and direction, common carriers could otherwise merge or join together notwithstanding the prohibtion of antitrust or other laws. [6]

Immediately thereafter, the Southern Pacific sought authorization from the Commission to acquire control of Central Pacific under the Act, 41 Stat. 480-482, as amended, 49 U.S.C. § 5(2) (1964). This was opposed by the Union Pacific. After a long hearing the Union Pacific and others withdrew their objection [7] [13] and the Commission attached to its approval of the merger nine specified conditions. Condition (e), supra reflected similar concern of the Commission over Southern Pacific's favoring its longer route to the jeopardy of the [12] transcontinental route of Central Pacific and Union Pacific. The newly approved merger and conditions [8] were embodied in the decree of

---

[6] The Interstate Commerce Act was further amended by the Transportation Act of 1940, 54 Stat. 899.

[7] In the recent order of the Commission denying control of the Western Pacific by either the Southern Pacific or the Santa Fe, the Commission observed:

> "We have considered the possibility of authorizing one or the other of the applicants herein to acquire control of Western Pacific subject to a solicitation condition to safeguard the central route of Western Pacific similar to the condition imposed in the Central Pacific case. However, the situation here does not contain the element of intermingled properties and operations necessitating the control authorization in the Central Pacific case, and, moreover, Santa Fe has recorded its objection to any condition which would require solicitation from its own territories for Western Pacific, either to the West or East of the Utah gateways." Southern Pacific Co. - Control - Western Pacific R.R., 327 I.C.C. 387, 400 (1965).

[8] The other relevant conditions generally required the Southern Pacific to cooperate or join the Union Pacific in maintaining service, schedules and rates via the Ogden Gateway and the line of the Central Pacific.

the District Court. United States v. Southern Pac. Co., 290 F. 443 (D.Utah 1923). No appeal was taken from the order of the Commission or court.

THE PACIFIC RAILROAD ACTS

In the present proceeding the Union Pacific and the Southern Pacific urge that condition (e) is not only lawful but accords with a mandate of the Pacific Railroad Acts. They argue that all conditions attached to the 1923 order by the Commission were nothing more than the fulfillment of the Acts.

Subsequent to the Commission's approval of the acquisition of Central Pacific by the Southern Pacific, an agreement was entered into with the Union Pacific which was theoretically premised upon condition (e). The 1924 agreement (1) obligated Union Pacific and Central Pacific to preferentially solicit for each other, (2) obligated Union Pacific and Central Pacific to preferentially route freight unrouted by the shipper along the Union Pacific and Central Pacific line and (3) expanded the territory of the preferential solicitation and routing beyond condition [14] (e). The failure of the Commission in the 1962 proceeding to consider this agreement and practices thereunder motivated the District Court to remand the case to avoid "splintered issues," under authority of A. L. Mechling Barge Lines, Inc. v. United States, 376 U.S. 375, 84 S. Ct. 874, 11 L. Ed. 2d 788 (1964).

Plaintiffs similarly defend the 1924 agreement and the practices under the Pacific Railroad Acts, arguing that, like the conditions in the Interstate Commerce Commission order, they too simply embody the statutory benefits accorded them by the Acts, and therefore cannot be countermanded by order of the Commission. [9]

[15] [*677] In 1962, in their first supplemental order, the Commission interpreted the Pacific Railroad Acts in accord with plaintiffs' contention. 317 I.C.C. 469 (1962). Upon reconsideration in its 1966 order, the Commission reversed itself. We feel the 1966 order and its interpretation is in accord with the correct construction of the Pacific Railroad Acts. These Acts provide in part as follows:

> "The track upon the entire line of railroad and branches shall be of uniform width, to be determined by the President of the United States, so that, when completed, cars can be run from the Missouri River to the Pacific coast; * * * the whole line of said railroad and branches and telegraph shall be operated and used for all purposes of communication, travel, and transportation, so far as the public and government are concerned, as one connected, continuous line; * * *" Act of July 1, 1862, ch. 120, § 12, 12 Stat. 495.
>
> "* * * the several companies authorized to construct the aforesaid roads are hereby required to operate and use said roads and telegraph for all purposes of communication, travel, and transportation, so far as the public and the government are concerned, as [16] one continuous line; and, in such operation and use, to afford and secure to each equal advantages and facilities as to rates, time and transportation, without any discrimination of any kind in favor of the road or business of any or either of said companies, or adverse to the road or business of any or either of the others * * *." Act of July 2, 1864, ch. 216, § 15, 13 Stat. 362 (codified in 45 U.S.C. § 83).

This language was interpreted by the Supreme Court in United States v. Union Pac. R.R., 226 U.S. 61, 33 S. Ct. 53, 57 L. Ed. 124 (1912). Mr. Justice Day stated:

> "These acts, it is said, are only intended to secure the permanent physical connection of the roads, and to provide for equal accommodations upon the basis of independent carriage, and outline no method by which the two roads can be compelled to make a joint through rate, and that at the time of the stock transfer there was no such provision in the interstate commerce acts. Therefore, it is said that the Union Pacific, no less than the Rio Grande, would have been practically at the mercy of the Southern Pacific in the favorable or unfavorable > treatment which might have been accorded to it in the matter of [17] through business to be transported eastwardly. The purpose of Congress to secure one permanent road to the coast so far as physical continuity is concerned is apparent, but we do not think the acts stop with that requirement. It is provided that facilities as to rates, time and transportation shall be without any discrimination of any kind in favor of either of said companies, or adverse to the road or business of any or either of the others; and the purpose of Congress to secure a continuous line of road, operating from the Missouri river to the Pacific coast as one road, is further emphasized in the act of Congress of June 20, 1874, [c. 331, 18 Stat. 111,] making it an offense for any officer or agent of the companies authorized to construct the roads, or engaged in the operation thereof, to refuse to operate and use the same for all purposes of communication, travel and transportation, so far as the public and government are concerned, as one continuous line, and making it a misdemeanor to refuse, in such operation and use, to afford and secure to each of said roads equal advantages and facilities as to rates, time and transportation, without any discrimination of any kind in [18] favor of or adverse to any or either of said companies." 226 U.S. at 91-92, 33 S. Ct. at 59.

---

[9] Plaintiffs urge that in 1923 it was the mutual understanding of the parties, including the Rio Grande, that condition (e) was in furtherance of the Pacific Railroad Acts and therefore should not be set aside. Apropos here is Mr. Justice Brennan's statement that "the ICC is not prisoner of the parties' submissions." See Baltimore & O. R.R. v. United States, 386 U.S. 372, 430, 87 S. Ct. 1100, 1129, 18 L. Ed. 2d 159 (1967) (concurring opinion).

[*678] Plaintiffs construe the above language of the Court to mean that the Union Pacific and Central Pacific must prefer one another to the prejudice of a connecting line, but that no other carrier may discriminate against either of them. This contradicts not only the spirit of the acts, but the plain language as well.

Mr. Justice Day added:

> "Such practices of systematic and preconcerted discrimination as are said to have destroyed the Rio Grande's carrying trade as a connection for the East for business at Ogden would have violated the statute as discriminations adverse to the Union Pacific, and be equally violative of the letter and spirit of the acts of Congress. Certainly such discriminations could be restrained by the courts (Union Pacific Railway Co. v. Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Co., 163 U.S. 564, 603, 604 [16 S. Ct. 1173, 41 L. Ed. 265]), and might possibly have resulted in a forfeiture of all rights under the acts of Congress." 226 U.S. at 92, 33 S. Ct. at 59.

Section 15 of the Act prohibits "discrimination of any kind in favor [19] of [10] the road or business of any or either of said companies, or adverse to the road or business of any or either of the others * * *."

The case of Union Pac. Ry. v. Chicago, R.I. & P. Ry., 163 U.S. 564, 16 S. Ct. 1173, 41 L. Ed. 265 (1896), as cited by Mr. Justice Day, is contrary to plaintiffs' position. Under the authority of the Pacific Railroad [20] Acts, the Supreme Court enjoined the Union Pacific from discriminatory practices to other connecting lines. The Union Pacific reasoned it would fail in its public duty by fulfilling a trackage and bridge agreement with connecting roads across the Missouri River. The Court enforced the contracts between the carriers and said:

> "For the provisions of the Pacific Railroad acts relating to the bridge over the Missouri river, its construction and operation, imposed on the Pacific Company the duty of permitting the Rock Island Company to run its engines, cars and trains over the bridge and the tracks between Council Bluffs and Omaha * * *." 163 U.S. at 586, 16 S. Ct. at 1181.

> "It is impossible for us to ignore the great policy in favor of continuous lines thus declared by congress, and that it is in effectuation of that policy that such business arrangements as will make such connections effective are made." 163 U.S. at 589, 16 S. Ct. at 1183.

---

[10] The Union Pacific openly acknowledges this construction in a footnote on page 67 of Union Pacific's brief, when it argues:

> "The 1864 Pacific Railroad Act prohibits 'any discrimination of any kind in favor of the road or business of any or either of said companies and adverse to the road or business of any or either of the others.' Yet to compel Southern Pacific only to solicit the Central Pacific portion of the Central Pacific-Union Pacific route is discrimination in favor of the Central Pacific portion. This is quite apart from the fact that Southern Pacific solicitation via Rio Grande is discrimination against Union Pacific."

The original Section 15 of the Act of 1862, and its amendatory provisions, are clear indication that the vision of Congress was not confined to the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific or just their branch lines, nor were [21] their privileges to be forever exclusive:

> "* * * any other railroad company now incorporated, or hereafter to be incorporated, shall have the right to connect their road with the road and branches provided for by this act, at such places and upon such just and equitable terms as the President of the United States may prescribe. Wherever the word company is used in this act it shall be construed to embrace the words their associates, successors, and assigns, the same as if the words had [*679] been properly added thereto." [11]

[22] Mr. Justice Strong said in review of the Pacific Railroad Acts in Union Pac. R.R. v. Hall, 91 U.S. 343, 345-346, 23 L. Ed. 428 (1875):

> "The scheme of the act of Congress, then, is very apparent. It was to secure the connection of the main line, by at least three branches, with the Missouri and Iowa Railroads, and with a railroad running eastwardly from Sioux City in Iowa, either through that State or through Minnesota. An observance of this scheme, we think will aid in considering the inquiry at what place the act of Congress, and the orders of the President made in pursuance thereof, established the eastern terminus of the Iowa branch. From it may reasonably be inferred that the purpose of Congress was to provide for connections of the branches of the main line of the Union Pacific road with railroads running through the States on the east of the Territory, and to provide for those connections within those States, at points at or near their western boundaries."

The purpose of Congress by the passage of the Pacific Railroad Acts was to create a strong link between the East and the West, sufficient to ensure military protection for the isolated areas if [23] needed, as well as a dependable and speedy means of commercial and social access. But it is clear that Congress envisioned not only a single, unbroken cross-nation line, but a network of railroads feeding and complementing the transcontinental route. [12]

---

[11] This section is now codified as 45 U.S.C. § 82. Congress recognized that the Act might be further amended when it said:

"And be it further enacted, That congress may, at any time, alter, amend, or repeal this act." 13 Stat. 356 § 22. And as observed in Union Pac. Ry. v. Chicago, R.I. & P. Ry. supra, 163 U.S. at 589, 16 S. Ct. at 1183:

> "On June 15, 1866, an act was approved, [c. 124, 14 Stat. 66,] 'to facilitate commercial, postal and military communication among the several states,' carried forward as section 5258 of the Revised Statutes, which provided that 'every railroad company in the United States, whose road is operated by steam, its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to carry upon and over its road, boats, bridges and ferries, all passengers, troops, government supplies, mails, freights and property on their way from any state to another state, and to receive compensation therefor, and to connect with roads of other states so as to form continuous lines for the transportation of the same to the place of destination.'"

[12] Despite numerous attempts during the Congressional debates to cut off the proposed branch lines, the majority consistently voted to retain them for such reasons as Senator Wade of Ohio expressed in his speech of June 19, 1862:

> "I believe the branches are as essential as the main trunk; that they will assist in building it; that they will furnish a motive for the embarking of money in the main line. It will be a mighty lonesome business to commence the main line in a mere wilderness, where it has nothing to attach itself to. You have got to begin it where it will seem to the world of no use whatever. Why, sir, it is like building a bridge across a magnificent river and never framing your abutments, by which you can get on to it. I do not think it is best that this should be done." Cong. Globe, 37th Cong., 2d Sess. 2807 (1862).

In Section 9 of the 1862 Act, the Leavenworth, Pawnee, and Western Railroad Company of Kansas was granted authority to build a line from a point on the Missouri River in Kansas to the Union Pacific line to the north, "upon the same terms and conditions in all respects as are provided in this act for the construction of the railroad and telegraph line first mentioned * * *." In Section 13, the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company of Missouri was specifically authorized to connect itself to the new transcontinental route. In the amendatory act passed in 1864, which is to be construed together with the 1862 Act (14 Opinions of Atty. Gen. 233 (1873)), Congress further authorized the Kansas railroad companies to make connection with the proposed Union Pacific line where practicable or desirable; in addition, if the Union Pacific company by the time of such connection was [24] [*680] Plaintiffs insist that to afford equal solicitation to the Rio Grande at Ogden would constitute discrimination against the Union Pacific under the Pacific Railroad Acts. We cannot agree. Preferences and discrimination are among the prohibitions of the Acts and are in no sense sanctioned by them. [13]

We conclude that plaintiffs' reliance on the Pacific Railroad Acts is unavailing.

MODIFICATION OF CONDITION (e) UNDER § 5(2)(a).

Plaintiffs argue alternatively that the Commission did not have sufficient grounds to find that condition (e) was no longer "just and reasonable" [25] under Section 5(2)(a) of the Interstate Commerce Act.

The Commission considered evidence which clearly demonstrated the change since 1923 in the circumstances of Rio Grande as a competing line using the Ogden Gateway. The Commission points out that the "primary objective" of the conditions in the 1923 Control proceeding, wherein stock acquisition by Southern Pacific of Central Pacific was approved, was "the protection of the competitive position of the transcontinental route of the Central Pacific via Ogden against the Southern Pacific's possible preference for its long-haul southern route via El Paso." 328 I.C.C. 345, 354 (1966). The Commission states:

> "The Rio Grande in no way seeks to disturb such a method of operation. But the Rio Grande now also maintains through routes and joint rates with the Southern Pacific at Ogden, and by means of its several eastern connections also operates as one connected, continuous central or Overland transcontinental line through Ogden and the Missouri River to points beyond, and we now see no valid reason for a continuance of a requirement by this Commission under which Rio Grande is precluded from equality of treatment by the Southern [26] Pacific so far as traffic solicitation is concerned. The Rio Grande does not seek to have the Southern Pacific prefer it at the Ogden interchange to the prejudice of the Union Pacific or any other railroad. It only seeks an equal competitive position.
> * * *
>
> "Had the petitioner's competitive situation at Ogden been more than that of a minor connecting line in 1923, we have no doubt that the requirements of condition (e) would have been different from those actually imposed in the Control case.
>
> "After consideration of the full record, without the procedural limitations before imposed, we now find that the present effect of the discriminatory practices against the Rio Grande in the preferential solicitation and routing of traffic results in a stifling of competition between the Union Pacific and the Rio Grande on Transcontinental traffic. It tends to relegate the Rio Grande to a secondary status as a transcontinental carrier. The concern of Congress in 1862 and 1864 that there be a strong transcontinental rail [*681] line operated as one connected, continuous line, is not thwarted by the existence of several such transcontinental lines operating today.
>
> "Upon [27] reconsideration, we now find that in view of changed circumstances and developments since its imposition, condition (e) is no longer just and reasonable. Under present day circumstances it is contrary to the public interest and the national transportation policy. The Congressional desire reflected in the Pacific Railroad Acts has been fulfilled by the existence of several central transcontinental routes. The Rio Grande is an not "proceeding in good faith to build the said railroad through the territories," the Kansas company was authorized to take over the project and build to the junction with the Central Pacific. Sections 9, 12. In Section 18, the Burlington and Missouri Railroad Company was given specific authority to join its line to the Union Pacific. For discussion of the decision to include branches and connecting lines within the scope of the Acts, see Russell, Improvement of Communication with the Pacific Coast as an Issue in American Politics 1783-1864 at pp. 296-320 (1948). See also Trottman, History of the Union Pacific 10-22 (1923).

---

[13] As the district court stated in United States v. Southern Pac. Co., 239 F. 998, 1006-1007 (D. Utah 1917), rev'd on other grounds, 259 U.S. 214, 42 S. Ct. 496, 66 L. Ed. 907 (1922):

> "Those statutes require physical connection with the Union Pacific to make a through line and the furnishing of equal advantages and facilities as to rates, time and transportation without discrimination of any kind."

important segment of one of these routes. The national defense and the public welfare of the country will not now be served by favoring one of these central transcontinental routes at the expense of another under present day circumstances."

Plaintiffs place much significance upon the Commission's original denial of modification in 1962 and subsequent reversal in 1966 after remand "without additional facts before it." However, it is apparent to us, at least, that in 1962 the Commission was guided more by an erroneous interpretation of the Pacific Railroad Acts than it was by considerations of "public interest." Furthermore, at the time of the remand from the district court, nothing had been finally decided. Cf. United States v. United States Smelting, [28] Refining & Min. Co., 339 U.S. 186, 198, 70 S. Ct. 537, 94 L. Ed. 750 (1950). Under these circumstances it is "consistent with a concept of administrative power which emphasizes a broad and continuing administrative initiative. * * *" to gauge the Commission's action by the public interest, rather than by its previous statements. See Jaffe, Judicial Control of Administrative Action 714 (1965). And, when the Commission reheard the case in 1966, it did consider as new evidence the 1924 Agreement and the implications and practices thereunder, in accordance with the direction of the remanding district court.

The Commission found that pursuant to said agreement:

> "In December 1946, representatives of the parties adopted a map on which areas are marked 'as the areas described in the [1924] agreement although the said representatives recognize that the areas so marked are not precisely those described in the language of the agreement and that they are not authorized to modify or supplement the said agreement.' The eastern territory outlined includes western trunkline territory west of the Missouri River in Colorado, Wyoming, Kansas, Nebraska, South Dakota, and North Dakota. Southern [29] Pacific also solicits and routes traffic via Union Pacific from and to Nevada and Utah, and in Oregon, North of Kirk, to but not including Portland.
>
> "Southern Pacific has also agreed to preferentially solicit and route via Ogden and the Union Pacific (1) export and import traffic moving through California ports in the western preferred territory; (2) traffic from or to points on lines constructed or acquired subsequent to the Commission's 1923 order; and (3) traffic requiring stop to complete loading or to partially unload within the preferred western territory where the western origin or destination is located outside of such territory."

The testimony of traffic managers for the plaintiffs indicated that all freight agents were frequently and fully instructed to carry out the solicitation and routing practices outlined by the agreement.

Our National Transportation Policy is said to be "the yardstick by which the correctness of the Commission's actions will be measured." Schaffer Transp. Co. v. United States, 355 U.S. 83, 87-88, 78 S. Ct. 173, 176, 2 L. Ed. 2d 117 (1957), as recently cited with approval in American Trucking Assoc., Inc. v. Atchison, T. & S.F. Ry., 387 U.S. 397, [30] 421, 87 S. Ct. 1608, 18 L. Ed. 2d 847 (1967). Mr. Justice Clark stated in [*682] Baltimore & O.R.R. v. United States, 386 U.S. 372, 386, 87 S. Ct. 1100, 1107, 18 L. Ed. 2d 159 (1967):

> "This Court has often pointed out that the national transportation policy 'is the product of a long history of trial and error by Congress. * * *.' McLean Trucking Co. v. United States, 321 U.S. 67, 80, 64 S. Ct. 370, 88 L. Ed. 544 (1944). In that case it found that the Transportation Act of 1920 'marked a sharp change in the policies and objectives embodied in those efforts.' [Ibid.] In that Act the Congress directed the Commission to adopt a plan for consolidation of the railroads of the United States into 'a limited number of systems.' 41 Stat. 481 (1920). Consolidation would be approved by the Commission upon a finding that the transaction was in harmony with and in furtherance of the complete plan of consolidation and that the public interest would be promoted. But the Commission was warned that 'competition shall be preserved as fully as possible.' [Ibid.] The initiation of this unification, however, the Congress left wholly with the carriers. The Commission was given no power [31] to compel mergers. This pattern was carried forward in the Transportation Act of 1940, 54 Stat. 898; however, § 5 of the former Act was amended to authorize the Commission to approve carrier-initiated proposals which it found to be consistent with the public interest and upon just and reasonable conditions."

And Mr. Justice Brennan in a concurring opinion, 386 U.S. at 402, 87 S. Ct. at 1116, observed:

> "The ICC has recognized that inquiry into a proposed transaction does not end with the possibilities for increased economies, but extends to 'the effect of the transaction upon adequate transportation service to all parts of the public which would be so affected, * * *." [14]

Here, the Commission determined that the routes of the Southern Pacific formed at Ogden with [32] the Union Pacific and the Rio Grande are now "substantially similar." Although the 1962 and the 1966 Commission orders lend appearance, as Mr. Justice Douglas says in Baltimore & O.R.R. v. United States, supra, 386 U.S. at 449, 87 S. Ct. at 1141 (dissenting in part), of having been "decided by different regulatory bodies rather than the same commission," nevertheless we feel there exist sufficient findings to support modification of condition (e) as being no longer "just and reasonable" nor in accord with the "public interest."

In this regard, it should be recalled that it is only "our task to scrutinize the Commission's authority, not the substance of its exercise." American Trucking Assoc., Inc. v. Atchison, T. & S.F. Ry., supra, 387 U.S. at 412, 87 S. Ct. at 1617. As Mr. Justice Frankfurter said in Rochester Telephone Corp. v. United States, 307 U.S. 125, 145-146, 59 S. Ct. 754, 764, 83 L. Ed. 1147 (1939):

> "So long as there is warrant in the record for the judgment of the expert body it must stand. * * * Having found that the record permitted the Commission to draw the conclusion that it did, a court travels beyond its province to express concurrence therewith as an original [33] question. 'The judicial function is exhausted when there is found to be a rational basis for the conclusions approved by the administrative body.'"

PRACTICES UNDER 1924 AGREEMENT.

Despite the admonition of the District Court of Colorado that the agreements and practices arising from condition (e) must be considered together with the condition itself, plaintiffs nevertheless urge that their practices were not specifically passed upon, and that the 1924 agreement can survive with or without the modification of condition [*683] (e) in the Control proceedings. There are many reasons why this position must fail.

First, we defer to the approach of the Colorado District Court in construing the condition, agreement and practices as one issue. Notwithstanding plaintiffs' protestations of their own use of awkward language in their 1924 agreement, we join in the observation of the Commission that the agreement was devised for "the stated purpose of arriving at a common understanding of the meaning of the conditions and for making them reciprocally obligatory. * * *" With condition (e) modified, any authority for preferential routing or solicitation between the Union Pacific [34] and Central Pacific must cease. See note 1, supra.

Secondly, these practices between the parties, as we have observed, are not required by the Pacific Railroad Acts, but in fact are in direct contravention of them. The only possible sanction for the practices and the agreement was the original 1923 version of condition (e), which embodied a Commission-approved exemption pursuant to a provision of the Transportation Act of 1920, now codified as 49 U.S.C. § 5(11). However, it is seriously in doubt whether within the Control proceedings the Commission could authorize the Union Pacific to preferentially solicit and route for the Southern Pacific (Central Pacific) in contravention of the Pacific Railroad Acts.

It is true that the Commission under Section 5(11) of the Act could grant immunity from the "antitrust laws" as well as from "all other restraints, limitations and prohibitions of law." But it is important to consider that immunity can only be given under Section 5(11) to those "carriers * * * participating in a transaction approved or authorized under * * * this section * * *." The Union Pacific was not a "carrier * * * participating" in the merger or lease and stock acquisition [35] of the Central Pacific by Southern Pacific. It is true they intervened to file objections, but it is agreed that the Commission had no jurisdiction over the Union Pacific to impose obligations on it. As the Commission acknowledges, the Union Pacific only acquiesced in the proceedings and conditions set forth. [15] Under these circumstanstances, the Commission had no authority to relieve the Union Pacific from any "restraints * * * or prohibitions of law" under Section 5(11). In any event it should be clear, as we have observed, that by modification of condition (e) the Commission has removed any ostensible approval for discrimination by the parties.

---

[14] Citing Chicago, B. & Q.R. Co. - Control, 271 I.C.C. 63, 146. See also Detroit, T. & I.R. Co. - Control, 275 I.C.C. 455, 489, sustained sub nom. New York, C. & St. L. R.R. v. United States, 95 F. Supp. 811 (N.D.Ohio 1951).

[36] Third, the Commission observed that both practices are contrary to the national transportation policy, as declared by the Transportation Act of 1940. [16] As [*684] the Commission has observed, the preferential solicitation and routing by the plaintiffs "tends to relegate the Rio Grande to a secondary status as a transcontinental carrier." The Commission found that the preferential soliciting and routing "stifle competition"; that the "public welfare" and "national defense" are better served by the maintenance of several strong, central transcontinental routes; and that "equality of treatment" must be a dominant consideration when dealing with competing lines that are "substantially similar," such as the Union Pacific and the Rio Grande.

[37] The Commission's discretionary appraisal of the facts with regard to the national transportation policy must stand if there is evidence to warrant the decision. McLean Trucking Co. v. United States, 321 U.S. 67, 64 S. Ct. 370, 88 L. Ed. 544 (1944). Mr. Justice Rutledge commented in McLean:

> "The national transportation policy requires the Commission to 'promote * * * economical * * * service and foster sound economic conditions in transportation and among the several carriers; to encourage the establishment and maintenance of reasonable charges for transportation services, without unjust discriminations, [or] undue preferences or advantages * * *."
>
> "In short, the Commission must estimate the scope and appraise the effects of the curtailment of competition which will result from the proposed consolidation and consider them along with the advantages of improved service, safer operation, lower costs, etc., to determine whether the consolidation will assist in effectuating the over-all transportation policy. Resolving these considerations is a complex task which requires extensive facilities, expert judgment and considerable knowledge of the transportation industry. Congress [38] left that task to the Commission 'to the end that the wisdom and experience of that Commission may be used not only in connection with this form of transportation, but in its coordination of all other forms.' 79 Cong.Rec. 12207. 'The wisdom and experience of that commission,' not of the courts, must determine whether the proposed consolidation is 'consistent with the public interest.' Cf. Interstate Commerce Commission v. Illinois Central R. Co., 215 U.S. 452, [30 S. Ct. 155, 54 L. Ed. 280;] Pennsylvania Co. v. United States, 236 U.S. 351, [35 S. Ct. 370, 59 L. Ed. 616;] United States v. Chicago Heights Trucking Co., 310 U.S. 344, [60 S. Ct. 931, 84 L. Ed. 1243]; Purcell v. United States, 315 U.S. 381, [62 S. Ct. 709, 86 L. Ed. 910]. If the Commission did not exceed the statutory limits within which Congress confined its discretion and its findings are adequate and supported by evidence, it is not our function to upset its order." 321 U.S. at 86-88, 64 S. Ct. at 380.

---

[15] "Conditions (a) through (d) generally require the Southern Pacific to cooperate or join with the Union Pacific in maintaining service, schedules, and rates via the Ogden gateway and the line of the Central Pacific.

"It was observed in the Control case that there was no jurisdiction therein to enforce an order against the Union Pacific or carriers other than the Southern Pacific and Central Pacific. However, the Union Pacific accepted and approved the conditions made, as they apply to the Southern Pacific and its constituent lines, and evinced its intention to comply therewith so far as its cooperation was necessary or required." 317 I.C.C. at 472.

[16] "It is hereby declared to be the national transportation policy of the Congress to provide for fair and impartial regulation of all modes of transportation subject to the provisions of this Act [chapters 1, 8, 12, 13, and 19 of this title], so administered as to recognize and preserve the inherent advantages of each; to promote safe, adequate, economical, and efficient service and foster sound economic conditions in transportation and among the several carriers; to encourage the establishment and maintenance of reasonable charges for transportation services, without unjust discriminations, undue preferences or advantages, or unfair or destructive competitive practices; to cooperate with the several States and the duly authorized officials thereof; and to encourage fair wages and equitable working conditions; all to the end of developing, coordinating, and preserving a national transportation system by water, highway, and rail, as well as other means, adequate to meet the needs of the commerce of the United States, of the Postal Service, and of the national defense. All of the provisions of this Act [chapters 1, 8, 12, 13, and 19 of this title] shall be administered and enforced with a view to carrying out the above declaration of policy." 49 U.S.C. (prior to § 1).

Public interest germane to this case includes (1) adequacy of service, (2) economy and (3) the efficient use of transportation facilities. See New York Central Securities Corp. v. United States, 287 U.S. [39] 12, 24-25, 53 S. Ct. 45, 77 L. Ed. 138 (1932). But also, until we totally evolve a new approach toward railroad consolidation, [17] Congress requires the Commission, as well as the courts, to give "consideration of all important consequences including anticompetitive effects." Denver & R.G.W.R.R. v. United States, 387 U.S. 485, 492, 87 S. Ct. 1754, 1759, 18 L. Ed. 2d 905 (1967).

Finally, the Commission determined that the preferential routing of [*685] traffic not routed by the shipper was a direct violation of Section 3(4) of the Interstate Commerce Act. Section 3(4) reads in part as follows: "All carriers * * * shall not * * * unduly prejudice any connecting line in the distribution of traffic that is not specifically routed by the shipper."

Plaintiffs urge that this holding is erroneous since there exists no proof (other than evidence received in 1922 that at that time from 2 to 4 per cent of the freight was [40] unrouted) that sufficient shipping was affected to create "undue prejudice" at the present time by reason of the preferential routing. However, this overlooks the fact that the agreement attacked involves preferential solicitation as well as preferential routing, and that between the two practices 100 per cent of the freight originated by the plaintiffs and not routed before the railroad is contacted, is either solicited or directly routed for the plaintiffs. [18]

[41] The prohibition of Section 3(4) is against discriminatory conduct of the carrier against connecting lines. The Act cannot be circumvented by wrongfully inducing the shipper to commit the discrimination in place of the carrier. In other words, the legislation is not to be so weakly construed that it permits the carrier to accomplish indirectly what he cannot do by direct preferential routing. In view of the clear policy expressed by the statute, we see no meaningful distinction between arbitrarily soliciting the unrouted freight at that time and arbitrarily routing it should the shipper leave it unrouted.

The statute must be interpreted broadly to effectuate its purposes in the public interest. B & C Truck Leasing, Inc. v. I.C.C., 283 F.2d 163, 164-165 (10 Cir. 1960). As is stated in the Shreveport case, Houston, East & West Texas R. Co. v. United States, 234 U.S. 342, 356, 34 S. Ct. 833, 838, 58 L. Ed. 1341 (1914), "there is no basis for the contention that Congress intended to exempt any discriminatory action or practice of interstate carriers affecting interstate commerce which it had authority to reach." In Western Pac. R.R. Co. v. United States, 382 U.S. 237, 244, 86 [42] S. Ct. 338, 343, 15 L. Ed. 2d 294 (1965), the Supreme Court said:

> "In the absence of any settled construction of § 3(4), then, its manifest purpose to deprive railroads of discretion to apportion economic advantage among competitors at a common interchange must be the basic guide to decision."

Thus, we feel that preferential solicitation when done on a "preconcerted" and "systematic" discriminatory basis, as conducted by the parties herein, falls within the statutory prohibition of Section 3(4) as well. The preferential solicitation dictated by the agreement is without concern for competitive benefits of similar lines and without relationship to the best possible service to the shipper. It is as much an apportionment of "economic advantage" as direct routing itself. As plaintiffs argue, preferential solicitation has been referred to without disapproval by the Commission occasionally under special circumstances. See, e.g., Chicago, I. & L. Ry. Co. Reorganization, 254 I.C.C. 539, 557, 559 (1943), 254 I.C.C. 673, 689 (1944); Minneapolis, St. P. & S.S.M. Ry. Co. Reorganization, 252 I.C.C. 525, 574-75, 252 I.C.C. 615, 653 (1942). Of course the present case where Southern [43] Pacific was [17] See National Transportation Policy, S.Rep.No. 445, 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 260-61 (1961).

---

[18] The agreement states, "the parties * * * shall cooperate to secure by active solicitation the routing of the maximum of freight traffic via Union Pacific and Central Pacific lines * * *.

> "It is understood that such traffic as has origin or destination east of the Missouri River will be solicited and routed via the Union Pacific between the Missouri River and Ogden, and via the Southern Pacific west of Ogden; such traffic as has origin or destination west of the Missouri River will be solicited and routed via Ogden so as to afford Union Pacific and Southern Pacific respectively the longest practicable haul."

obliged to solicit for the Central Pacific route rather than its own El Paso route is another example. But special circumstances [*686] were involved, such as the reorganization and merger of two formerly separate lines. Discrimination on a purely arbitrary anticompetitive basis, where the connecting lines prejudiced offer equal facilities and service, is far outside the scope of permissible activity and must be disapproved. [19]

[44] Since all freight that is not independently routed by the shipper is solicited or routed discriminatorily to the prejudice of the Rio Grande, Section 3(4) prohibits both such practices as being "unduly prejudicial," without further facts before us.

The Commission applied Section 3(4) only to the preferential routing. We are cognizant that we are "powerless" to affirm discretionary agency action other than on the grounds invoked by the agency. Burlington Truck Lines, Inc. v. United States, 371 U.S. 156, 169, 83 S. Ct. 239, 9 L. Ed. 2d 207 (1962). However, in the construction of Section 3(4), we are not reviewing agency discretion. And although fully relying upon the expertise of the Commission in review of this entire matter, apropos is Professor Jaffe's statement:

> "The judgment of the expert may, as we have seen, be relevant to the decision, but it cannot by reason of its 'pure' quality, its specifically expert character, transform a question of law into a question of fact and so insulate the decision from legal judgment." Jaffe, Judicial Control of Administrative Action, p. 580 (1965).

Other arguments are made by the defendants and intervenors concerning violation [45] of Section 15(1) and of the antitrust laws. Since the Commission has not relied upon these grounds, they require no discussion.

In conclusion, we find no authority under (1) the Pacific Railroad Acts, (2) the National Transportation Policy or (3) Section 3(4) of the Interstate Commerce Act for the plaintiffs' discriminatory routing and solicitation agreement or practices, or for the retention of the original condition. We find the Commission made adequate findings to support the modification of its 1923 order under Section 5(2) of the Interstate Commerce Act.

We deny plaintiffs' request to enjoin, set aside, annul and suspend the supplemental order of the Commission dated January 6, 1966, entered in Finance Docket No. 2613, Control of Central Pacific by Southern Pacific, and accordingly dismiss the complaint and enter judgment for the defendants herein

It is so ordered.

[*687] [SEE APPENDIX A IN ORIGINAL]

Dissent by: ROBINSON

Dissent

---

[19] As the parties, including the Interstate Commerce Commission, have observed in their briefs and arguments, solicitation on a reciprocal basis, as well as routing, are to some degree found in industry practices. We note the discussion in Conant, Railroad Mergers and Abandonments 34-35 (1964):

> "If the shipper does not control the entire routing of shipment, the initial carrier will be free to choose which connecting carriers will transport the shipment to its final destination. At major connecting points, such as Chicago, St. Louis, Kansas City, and Omaha, an initiating carrier must choose which of a number of connecting lines should receive shipments bound for major cities on two or more routes. In the absence of price competition, the choice is usually made on the principle of reciprocity. A railroad transfers to connecting carriers as many cars as it receives from them, or, if traffic is not balanced in both directions, a railroad transfers cars to connecting carriers in some proportion to cars received.
>
> "But the reciprocity of interchange of connecting railroads is not short-term. A railroad will develop long-run interchange preference patterns to protect its own longest hauls by favoring connecting carriers that are not its rivals for any segment of traffic. Thus, the Chicago and North Western, which has a main line from Chicago to Omaha, has established wide interchange with the complementary Union Pacific which extends from Omaha west to Denver, Ogden, and Portland. Neither the North Western nor the Union Pacific has substantial interchange at Omaha with the Rock Island or the Burlington, both of whose lines run from Chicago to Denver and thus rival the North Western and part of the Union Pacific."

RICHARD E. ROBINSON, District Judge (dissenting).

I would respectfully submit that the construction of the Pacific Railroad Acts offered by the majority relies too heavily upon a 1967 interpretation of the language chosen. "Discrimination" has become [46] colored by its present use in the Interstate Commerce Act; "branch lines" have assumed proportions far beyond those obviously contemplated by the Acts. One could hardly expect to find language in the Pacific Railroad Acts which would specifically guard against the application of an Interstate Commerce Act not yet envisioned; and any argument based on its absence could not survive its own statement.

The Congress designed the system so that "branch lines" would connect with the "main trunk"; [1] the question remains whether they could foresee competing systems. A word used indicates that they did not.

> "* * * the several companies * * * are hereby required to operate * * * as one continuous line."

I am constrained to find the "branches" to which discrimination was forbidden were [47] feeder lines, not competitors. The "discrimination" referred to [*688] appears to have been directed, in addition to the two segments of the "main trunk", to the branches who were to compete between themselves, not with the "one continuous line". [2] I believe that Congress intended to create one railroad; the two organizations were formed to accomplish this end and were not intended to diminish their right to operate as such. I would agree that the obligations of the parties under the Acts were fulfilled by mere physical connection and the absence of discrimination between themselves and their branches, but I would not equate fulfillment of duty with exhaustion of rights. The duty of preferential solicitation and routing arises from the control of Central Pacific by Southern Pacific and the arrangements which resulted. In other words, if my interpretation is correct, the Pacific Railroad Act gives the parties the right to agree to exert in concert any lawful competitive force available to them; the control of Central Pacific by Southern Pacific demands that such an agreement be made. It is also worth noting that the separate companies were given the express right to consolidate [48] their corporate structures. Act of July 2, 1864, ch. 216, § 16, 13 Stat. 363.

[49] I do not agree that the cases cited in the majority opinion add weight to the position therein taken. In particular, I cannot agree that in the case of Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Chicago, R.I. & P. Ry. [supra] [3] [50] the

---

[1] "Branch lines" and "main trunk" were the descriptions often given of the system in the Congressional debates; in particular the quotation offered by the majority. Cong. Globe 37th Cong.2nd Session, 2807 [1862].

[2] Senator Sherman offered the following argument for private ownership of the branch lines: "I hope that this proposition, which will add another prong to this many-pronged railroad, will be voted down, and that the proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire will be adopted, and that we may agree upon the construction of one main Pacific railroad, which may be promptly constructed, and give such reasonable aid as we can to diverging routes, all pointing to the main line, and I think that all these diverging lines ought to be under different corporations. There is one part of this bill that I do not like. I do not wish to criticise it, but I do not think the Pacific Railroad Company ought to build any of these diverging lines. They ought to be built by different companies so that all the diverging lines will compete with each other, and compete with each other fairly, while they all pour their streams of commerce into one great line, which is aided by the Government. But under the operation of the bill as you have it now framed, the Pacific Railroad Company will own one of these branch lines, and may to the sacrifice of other interests involved in these roads divert the whole travel and transportation to one line, thus destroying the property in which you yourself invest to the tune of $16,000 a mile. I think it would be much wiser to leave these various branches to be built by the local interests concerned." Cong.Globe, 37th Cong., 2nd Sess., 2784 [1862].

[3] That case was an action for specific performance of certain contracts entered into by the Union Pacific and the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway Company and the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company in which the Union Pacific had leased the use of their bridge across the Missouri to the two latter named companies. The Union Pacific claimed that it had no authority to lease the use of its lines and that the contract was therefore ultra vires. The Court found that the contract did not disable the Union Pacific from fulfilling its obligations to the public. The Court then cited the Pacific Railroad Acts as authority for the proposition that the Congressional policy favored "continuous lines". "It is impossible for us to ignore the great public policy

Supreme Court enjoined "discriminatory practices" under the authority of the Pacific Railroad Acts. Reference to the Acts gave support to the Court's finding of Congressional policy; neither the questions involved nor the answers given shed light here. The other authorities might well be cited in favor of the position taken by the Union Pacific as well as those conclusions for which they were cited. Each of the cases refer to the "main line" and "connecting branches." I would not agree that the language can be transplanted to apply equally to competing [*689] systems. Each of the cases recognize that the Acts demand something more than mere physical connection. [4]

[51] The position I have taken is not novel. It was stated by the Interstate Commerce Commission when it originally adopted the five conditions now under review, and cited as the correct interpretation when the Commission first ruled on the petition for reopening and modification. The following is taken from Control of Central Pacific by Southern Pacific, 317 I.C.C. 469, at 484:

> "The existing conditions are consistent with the stated purposes of the Pacific Railroad Acts, and one of the purposes of those conditions is to protect the rights of the Union Pacific and the public under those acts, which are still in force and effect. In imposing the conditions, we stated:
>
> > 'By virtue of the Pacific Railroad acts the Union Pacific and Central Pacific have certain reciprocal rights, including the right to cooperation in the establishment and maintenance via the Central Pacific-Union Pacific route of through train service and joint rates reasonably necessary to meet competition by other routes, and to cooperation in other respects, to the end that the lines of said companies shall be operated and used as one connected, continuous line. We think that the rights of the Union Pacific [52] and all interests of the public under the Pacific Railroad acts may be protected by imposing upon the acquisition and exercise of control by the Southern Pacific the five conditions set out above. * * *'
>
> The proposed modified condition is directed solely to the protection of the Central Pacific line and, thus, would favor it over the Union Pacific line. Although the proposed modified condition is directed toward continued protection of the Central Pacific line, it would fall short of its purpose as the Union Pacific could not be expected to preferentially solicit for that line in the absence of a reciprocal obligation upon the Southern Pacific. It is clear that mere physical connection does not satisfy the purposes of the Pacific Railroad acts; and it is noteworthy that both the 1862 act and the 1864 act authorized the roads concerned 'to form themselves into one consolidated company.'"

Even counsel for the Government expressed a similar view of the proper construction of the acts in his argument of United States v. Southern Pac. Co., 259 U.S. 214, at p. 217, 42 S. Ct. 496, 66 L. Ed. 907 [1922]:

> "The Pacific Railroad laws imposed on the franchise of the Central [53] Pacific Railroad and on the franchise of the Union Pacific Railroad the reciprocal duty of the one railroad not to discriminate against the other in favor of any other railroad, but to exert together [*690] in normal voluntary cooperation all of the natural forces of a single railroad naturally competing with the parallel Southern Pacific Railroad * * *."

---

in favor of continuous lines thus declared by congress, and that it is in effectuation of that policy that such business arrangements as will make such connections effective are made." Union Pacific Ry. Co. v. Chicago, R.I. and P. Ry. Co., 163 U.S. 564, at 589, 16 S. Ct. 1173, at 1183, 41 L. Ed. 265.

[4] I refer particularly to United States v. Union Pac. R.R., 226 U.S. 61, 33 S. Ct. 53, 57 L. Ed. 124 [1912]. As I read that case the Court made two observations which are important here. First, they found that the Pacific Railroad Acts require more than mere physical connection. The Court then listed reasons why they believe that physical connection was not the only requirement; but they did not proceed to define the obligations which did exist. Some light is shed on the question, however, by another comment contained in that opinion. While the Court was not disturbed about discrimination by Southern Pacific against the Rio Grande, they stated definitely that such discrimination against the Union Pacific would be contrary to the Act.

> "Such practices of systematic and preconcerted discrimination as are said to have destroyed the Rio Grande's carrying trade as a connection for the East for business at Ogden would have violated the statute as discriminations adverse to the Union Pacific and be equally violative of the letter and spirit of the acts of Congress. * * *" 226 U.S. at 92, 33 S. Ct. at 59.

I believe that the opinion clearly indicates that the Union Pacific and Central Pacific were to be given special treatment because of the Acts that created them. While the extent of their rights is not defined, their existence is nevertheless acknowledged.

Most persuasive, in my opinion, is the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission has recognized and the Pacific railroads themselves have operated under this interpretation for a long period of time. This "long-continued reliance", was made an express finding in the Commission's 1962 decision. Control of Central Pacific by Southern Pacific [supra at p. 483]. It is undisputed that the Rio Grande had aspirations at the time the nine conditions were imposed of becoming competitive with the Union Pacific. The Rio Grande participated in the Control case; the conditions affected the operation of that route to a certain extent when imposed; the interpretation of the Pacific Railroad Acts was clearly stated; and the conditions were accepted as reflecting the law up until 1957. The rights which are reflected in "condition [54] e" were granted by the Congress; they cannot be deleted by the Commission. I must therefore, respectfully dissent.

American Mfrs. Mut. Ins. Co. v. American Broadcasting-Paramount Theatres, Inc.

United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit

December 15, 1967, Decided

No. 31528

Reporter

388 F.2d 272 *; 1967 U.S. App. LEXIS 4149 ; 1967 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,315; 11 Fed. R. Serv. 2d (Callaghan) 1220; 11 Rad. Reg. 2d (P & F) 2079

American Manufacturers Mutual Insurance Co., American Motorists Insurance Co., Federal Mutual Insurance Co. and Lumbermens Mutual Casualty Co. v. American Broadcasting-Paramount Theatres, Inc.

Core Terms

stations, lineup, network, package, summary judgment, negotiate, advertisers, sponsor, card, Evening, cleared, film, antitrust, broadcast, license, tie-in, segments, issue of fact, differential, offering, summary judgment motion, television, products, markets, prices, sheet, terms, television station, discount, disputed

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Opposing Materials > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Summary Judgment > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Motions for Summary Judgment > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Trials > Judgment as Matter of Law > General Overview

HN1[] Summary Judgment, Opposing Materials

It is a fundamental maxim that on a motion for summary judgment the court cannot try issues of fact; it can only determine whether there are issues to be tried. And, on summary judgment the inferences to be drawn from the underlying facts contained in such materials must be viewed in the light most favorable to the party opposing the motion. Thus, the standard to be applied on a motion for summary judgment is analogous to that used on a motion for a directed verdict. Of course, the law provides no magical talisman or compass that will serve as an unerring guide to determine when a material issue of fact is presented. As is so often true in the law, this is a matter of informed and properly reasoned judgment.

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

HN2[] Summary Judgment, Entitlement as Matter of Law

The well settled rule is that cross-motions for summary judgment do not warrant the court in granting summary judgment unless one of the moving parties is entitled to judgment as a matter of law upon facts that are not genuinely disputed.

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Standards of Review > General Overview

HN3[] Appeals, Standards of Review

The function of an appellate court is not to determine whether there is sufficient evidence in the record to substantiate findings of fact that were never made. On the contrary, the district court must at a trial resolve contested factual issues and draw the appropriate inferences in the first instance with full recognition that the issues are disputed, and only after sufficient evidence has been introduced to permit an informed judgment.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

HN4[] Regulated Practices, Private Actions

The use of summary judgment in complex antitrust litigation must be closely scrutinized. And, this admonition is apt where too little is known of the practical impact of the challenged transactions. But, this is not to say that summary judgment never has a place in the antitrust field.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > General Overview

HN5[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Tying Arrangements

Where there is no quality or distinguishing desideratum between a product offered singly or in a package, the seller cannot charge substantially higher for the individual product if the price differential has the effect of conditioning the sale of the single product to the sale of the entire package and if the difference in price cannot be legitimately justified by cost considerations.

Judges: [1] Friendly, Kaufman and Anderson, Circuit Judges.

Opinion by: KAUFMAN

Opinion

[*274] KAUFMAN, Circuit Judge:

Several insurance companies generally known as the Kemper Insurance Companies group, the appellants here, instituted this action on May 23, 1963 against American Broadcasting-Paramount Theatres, Inc. seeking a declaratory judgment that a television sponsoring agreement between Kemper and ABC constituted a tie-in which violated Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1. The complaint, inter alia, sought treble damages in addition to a decree that the agreement was illegal and unenforceable. On May 31, 1967 -- almost 2 years after the parties had moved for summary judgment -- the District Court granted ABC's motion and denied Kemper's. This appeal followed from the judgment against Kemper. We believe that summary judgment, as intended to be utilized pursuant to Rule 56 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, was inappropriately and imprudently employed in this case to resolve the important and exceedingly complex factual and legal dispute presented to the trial judge. We are of the view that the antitrust questions cannot be resolved for there [2] remain material issues of fact that are not brought into sharp focus or clarified by the record before us. We therefore reverse and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

I.

A substantial portion of the District Court's careful and elaborate opinion (reported at 270 F. Supp. 619) is devoted to a detailed presentation of the factual background of the dispute. While we shall make an effort to avoid repetition, the complexities of the litigation will be sketched in order to clarify the reasons for our belief that summary judgment was inappropriate in this case.

ABC is one of 3 major television networks in the United States and during 1962-1963 approximately 260 television stations were affiliated with that network. [1] The greater part of network income [*275] is derived from selling programs to sponsors (advertisers). All the networks arrange financial terms and details with their advertisers, such as providing network programs, technical facilities and scheduling programs for clearance. The programs and "commercials" are ultimately broadcast to the public over the facilities of local stations which are licensed by the Federal Communications [3] Commission. [2] The networks and local stations share the sponsor's payments on a percentage basis under the terms of an affiliation agreement.

In April 1961, ABC announced it would produce a nightly news program -- the "Evening Report" -- which [4] it offered to its network stations on a 5-nights-per-week basis and by August, 95 stations had "cleared" (accepted) the program. These cleared stations are known in industry parlance as the "going lineup."

Under the typical affiliation agreement then employed by ABC, when a station cleared a program it was compelled to accept the sponsor provided by the network as well as those portions of the program for which the network could not find a sponsor. The local station did not receive any payment from ABC for broadcasting the unsponsored parts, but the apparent harshness of this arrangement was mitigated by the network's practice of "releasing" the unsold time to its affiliates for direct sale by them. [3] Another facet of these complex arrangements was that the local stations were required to "option" certain time periods and to accept programs (and sponsors) provided by ABC for those hours. "Evening Report," however, was not broadcast during an option period and the local stations were therefore free to accept or reject the program as they saw fit.

[5] From time to time, it was the practice of ABC to issue "offering sheets" concerning "Evening Report." In essence, these are notices advising potential advertisers of the number of clearing stations, the prospective cost of the program, the names of other advertisers, if any, already sponsoring the program, and other relevant details. The gross price mentioned in the offering sheets was in large measure dependent on the hourly station rates of the individual local stations which had cleared the program. ABC published these rates in a so-called "rate card" which was designed to reflect such factors as the number of homes with television sets reached by the particular station,

---

[1] For interesting discussions of the structure of the television industry and television advertising rate practices see Blake & Blum, Network Television Rate Practices: A Case Study in the Failure of Social Control of Price Discrimination, 74 Yale L.J. 1339 (1965); Note, Antitrust Implications of Network Television Quantity Advertising Discounts, 65 Colum. L. Rev. 1213 (1965).

[2] Each of the networks, however, is owner and licensee of 5 local stations -- the maximum permitted by FCC regulations. See Amendment of Multiple Ownership Rules, 18 Fed. Reg. 7796, 9 P. & F.R.R. 1563 (FCC 1953).

Where the program is not a network program, the station is free to sell the broadcast time on that program directly to advertisers.

[3] Such sales are known as sales on the "local market." The time released for local sales was, however, subject to recapture on 3 weeks' notice. In this connection, it should be noted that ABC had two types of affiliation agreements -- "primary" and "secondary" -- which contained different terms. The vast majority of clearing stations were primary affiliates and the description in the text is of their relation with ABC. (For example, of the 95 stations that had cleared "Evening Report" in August 1961, approximately 90 per cent were primary affiliates which had their major network association with ABC.)

the quality of its signal and the number of competing stations. In addition to the rate card time charge, the gross price contained in the offering sheet included a program charge and a "networking" charge. The offering sheet of April 27, 1961 is typical and its essential terms are set out in the margin. [4] We have been told that the offering [*276] sheet gross price was only a starting point for negotiations; a variety of "special discounts" were offered potential advertisers. [5] And, the ultimate price [6] charged was the product of detailed negotiations between advertiser and network. [6] In fact, Kemper alleges and ABC does not deny that "Evening Report" was not sold by ABC to a single sponsor at full rate card.

[7] The Kemper-ABC contract, dated August 15, 1962 (and resulting from extended negotiations), provided inter alia, that Kemper would sponsor "Evening Report" one evening per week for 26 weeks over 130 local television stations. But Kemper insists that it did not want to advertise over 32 of these stations and that it had agreed to take them only because ABC refused to make available the 95 stations it did want -- except at an unreasonable cost -- unless Kemper agreed to take the entire lineup. [7] According to Kemper, a detailed analysis convinced it that it did not do a sufficient amount of business in the markets served by the 32 stations to justify advertising over them. Moreover, it claims that it did not seek business from these areas because it could not adequately service customers located there. ABC admits that Kemper sought to eliminate the 32 stations but contends that the lineup question was of minor importance in Kemper's advertising policies. It also states that Kemper ultimately took the entire package offered by ABC because it best served Kemper's needs. On its surface, it would appear that the contract does not reflect an illegal tie-in; it merely recites an agreement [8] to sponsor a program over 130 different stations. But, we are urged not to overlook that ABC's alleged coercion is said to have taken place during the extensive period of negotiations which culminated in the contract.

Since the history of the negotiations is fully set forth in Judge Tenney's opinion, we will repeat only so much of it as will aid in comprehending our ultimate conclusion. It is not disputed that at a meeting in ABC's New York offices on January 25, 1962, Edgar Sherick, then ABC's vice president in charge of network sales, offered Buckingham W. Gunn, a senior official of Kemper's advertising agency, Clinton E. Frank, Inc., the right to sponsor "Evening Report" at a package price of $22,000 per one quarter-hour segment for 2 segments per week over a 26 week period. The talks were preliminary, and [9] detailed negotiations continued between officials of Kemper and the Frank agency and members of ABC's Chicago office. These talks culminated in a meeting that was held in the Chicago offices of the Frank agency on April 27, 1962 -- by which time the going lineup consisted of approximately 99 stations. The subject matter under considerable discussion was that Kemper would order 39 segments of "Evening Report" over a 26 week period but would have the right to reduce its order to one segment per week if within 30 days of signing the contract not all the stations in Kemper's key markets cleared the program. The price was to be $22,000 per segment for 39 segments and $24,000 if only 26 segments were ordered. In addition, Kemper expressed an interest in 28 stations which had not yet cleared the program. ABC was willing to agree to furnish 15 of these stations at a maximum charge of $3,000 (assuming [*277] all cleared) and the remaining 13 at "no charge."

On or about May 4, 1962 Kemper submitted its first "order letter" for "Evening Report" in which it asked for 39 segments over a 26 week period. The lineup requested consisted of 95 stations -- 67 of the 99 already cleared as [10] well as the 28 requested at the April 27th meeting. For this package Kemper offered a total price of

---

4 The program was offered for periods of 13 or 26 weeks for each weekday in one-quarter hour segments. The estimated lineup was 110 stations and the approximate gross was $34,500. This was based on rate card time charges for the clearing stations to which was added a program charge of $5,000, a 15 per cent commission of $750, and a networking charge of $500. A "Special Discount" of 35 per cent off rate card was offered for the purchase of 2 quarter-hour segments over 26 weeks (or $28,675, including all charges) and a 30 per cent discount (or $30,400 in toto) was offered if 1 quarter-hour was taken.

5 For a detailed description of ABC's pricing practices see Blake & Blum, supra, 1351-53.

6 Id. at 1347. The legality of these practices under the principles of the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 13, has received much attention but is not now before us. See generally articles cited in note 1.

7 In the record, the precise number of unwanted stations is sometimes said to be 32 and at other times 35. Apparently 3 unwanted stations were added to the lineup after Kemper accepted ABC's terms.

$24,250 which its order letter broke down into a time charge which was not to exceed $18,750, a program charge of $5,000 and a $500 networking charge. The time charges were to be reduced by the "package rate" of any of the ordered stations that did not clear the program. Kemper conditioned its order on all the stations in its 41 "key markets" clearing.

According to ABC, Kemper's May 4th order improperly substituted the 28 stations it had requested at the April 27th meeting for 32 of the stations that were part of the going lineup which ABC had offered. And, Kemper attempted to get these stations at the package rates discussed at the April 27th meeting even though the time charges for the 28 stations totaled more than twice those for the 32 stations. Accordingly, ABC rejected Kemper's order and on May 10, 1967 counter-offered Kemper the full 99 station lineup (which included the 67 stations ordered on May 4th) at a time charge of $15,750 and the 28 stations at a total cost of $3,000. With the program and network charges included, the cost was $24,250 -- the same as in Kemper's [11] May 4th order. Although it was thus offered extra stations at no extra cost, Kemper maintains that it wanted and preferred the package as it ordered it on May 4th. It alleges that ABC consistently refused to sell it the lineup it sought except at full rate card -- that is, without the 47 1/2 per cent discount reflected in the April 27th discussions. ABC admits that it refused to sell Kemper its limited lineup at the April 27th package rate although Kemper was asking for fewer stations at the same price; but, it responds (and Kemper denies) that it would be expensive to black out Kemper's commercials on the unwanted stations. Also, ABC tells us that it never insisted on Kemper paying full rate card for the smaller lineup but rather offered to negotiate further. In any event, Kemper ultimately accepted the entire lineup of 130 stations and a contract was signed.

II.

The life of the Kemper-ABC agreement (dated August 15, 1962) proved to be less than the period consumed by the negotiations already discussed. After only 4 of the 26 ordered broadcasts, Kemper notified ABC that it considered its obligations under the contract at an end. It declared that on November 11, 1962, ABC [12] had broadcast a program titled "The Political Obituary of Richard M. Nixon" during which Alger Hiss was permitted to evaluate Mr. Nixon's role in the Hiss perjury case. The program was promoted on broadcast time sponsored and paid for by Kemper and in substance it contended that ABC violated the contract by associating Kemper with a program that was in poor taste. Two days later Kemper advised ABC that it was cancelling its sponsorship. Efforts at reconciliation proved fruitless and on January 9, 1963 ABC filed suit in the New York Supreme Court for breach of contract. A final judgment was ultimately entered for $265,047.21. 48 Misc. 2d 397, 265 N.Y.S. 2d 76, aff'd, 24 App. Div. 2d 851, 265 N.Y.S. 2d 577 (1st Dept. 1965), aff'd, 17 N.Y. 2d 849, 218 N.E. 2d 324, 271 N.Y.S. 2d 284 (1966). Kemper asserted for the first time its claim that the agreement with ABC violated the Sherman Act in its answer in the state court suit and in the complaint it filed in federal court. [8]

[13] [*278] On May 31, 1963, ABC moved in the federal court to dismiss Kemper's complaint on the ground that it failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. Judge Cooper denied this motion, 221 F. Supp. 848 (S.D.N.Y. 1963), noted, 39 Notre Dame Law. 719 (1964), holding that the allegation that ABC refused to make available a limited lineup of 95 stations except at a disproportionately high price stated a cause of action under the Sherman Act. The case was then assigned to Judge Tenney as a Rule 2 Judge (Rule 2, General Rules for the Southern and Eastern Districts of New York) and the motions for summary judgment were then argued to him. After examining voluminous affidavits, exhibits and depositions, he granted ABC's motion for summary judgment in a painstaking opinion which consumes almost 70 pages in the appendix on this appeal.

Judge Tenney advanced 4 grounds for his decision. First, he ruled that ABC sold Kemper a single "product" -- the privilege of being identified as the sponsor of "Evening Report." Since only a single product had been sold, a tie-in could not have occurred. Second, assuming arguendo that the transaction [14] was properly characterized as the sale of different television stations, for purposes of tie-in analysis the different stations were components of a single product because it was "a reasonable and economically justified requirement of the industry" to sell them all as one package. Third, assuming arguendo that more than one product was involved in the sale, ABC was legally justified in rejecting Kemper's May 4th order and reverting to its higher rate card prices "even though said prices are substantially higher than the average price per unit for all the components of the package." Finally, he ruled that Kemper was not coerced by ABC because it never attempted to negotiate a lower price after ABC rejected its May 4th order. Although we understand the reasons which would motivate a district judge in seeking to avoid a complex and grating trial, we believe that material questions of fact were presented with respect to each of these alternative grounds for decision and that summary judgment was improper.

---

[8] The state court chose not to adjudicate the validity of the contract under the antitrust laws although it indicated that on its face the contract was enforceable. 42 Misc. 2d 939, 249 N.Y.S. 2d 481 (1963), aff'd, 20 App. Div. 2d 890, 251 N.Y.S. 2d 906 (1st Dept. 1964), aff'd, 17 N.Y. 2d 849, 218 N.E. 2d 324, 271 N.Y.S. 2d 284, cert. denied, 385 U.S. 931, 87 S. Ct. 291, 17 L. Ed. 2d 213 (1966). ABC does not contend that the state court judgment bars Kemper from pressing the instant litigation.

III.

The importance of summary judgment in the structure of modern federal practice as a procedural weapon to pierce sham claims and resolve actions where the facts are undisputed [15] has been frequently noted by this court. See, e.g., Dressler v. MV Sandpiper, 331 F.2d 130 (2d Cir. 1964). Although some of the older decisions of this court had put in question the wisdom of granting summary judgment, we interpreted the 1963 amendments to Rule 56 as suggesting that the courts thereafter were to approach the Rule with less reticence and more resoluteness. Dressler v. MV Sandpiper, supra (discussing cases); 6 Moore's Federal Practice para. 56.15 [1], 1966 supp. at 102.

The functions and purposes of summary judgment have been stated thus:

> "It is intended to prevent vexation and delay, improve the machinery of justice, promote the expeditious disposition of cases, and avoid unnecessary trials where no genuine issues of fact are raised. The procedure enables a party to pierce the allegations of fact in the pleadings and obtain relief by showing that there are no issues to be tried. Its purpose is to separate the formal from the substantial issues, eliminate improper issues, determine what, if any, issues of fact are present for the jury to determine, and enable the court to give judgment on the issues of law where no disputed [16] issues of fact are found." 3 Barron & Holtzoff, Federal Practice and Procedure, [*279] § 1231, at 97-100 (Wright ed. 1958).

But HN1[] it is a fundamental maxim that on a motion for summary judgment the court cannot try issues of fact; it can only determine whether there are issues to be tried. And, "on summary judgment the inferences to be drawn from the underlying facts contained in such materials must be viewed in the light most favorable to the party opposing the motion." United States v. Diebold, 369 U.S. 654, 655, 8 L. Ed. 2d 176, 82 S. Ct. 993 (1962) (per curiam). [9] Thus, the standard to be applied on a motion for summary judgment is analogous to that used on a motion for a directed verdict. Empire Electronics Co. v. United States, 311 F.2d 175, 180 (2d Cir. 1962). See 6 Moore, supra, para. 56.02 [10]; 3 Barron & Holtzoff, supra, § 1234, at 133. Of course, the law provides no magical talisman or compass that will serve as an unerring guide to determine when a material issue of fact is presented. As is so often true in the law, this is a [17] matter of informed and properly reasoned judgment.

The instant litigation is somewhat atypical because both parties clamor for summary judgment urging that the record presents no disputed material issue of fact -- as if a trial is to be avoided like the plague. But, rather typical of such "agreements" to end the case by summary judgment, this admirable harmony does not carry over to agreement on what the "undisputed" facts are or the permissible inferences to be drawn from [18] them. While a substantial part (but not all) of the evidence is documentary, the parties sharply dispute the inferences to be drawn, see United States v. Diebold, Empire Electronics v. United States, supra, and, as we shall see below, the depositions present conflicting testimony. In any event, "HN2[] the well settled rule is that cross-motions for summary judgment do not warrant the court in granting summary judgment unless one of the moving parties is entitled to judgment as a matter of law upon facts that are not genuinely disputed." 6 Moore, supra, para. 56.13, at 2247. See also Barron & Holtzoff, supra, § 1239, at 176. Nor, have we lost sight of the fact that neither ABC nor Kemper requested a jury trial and that ultimately the unresolved questions will be decided by the District Judge. But HN3[] the function of an appellate court is not to determine whether there is sufficient evidence in the record to substantiate "findings" of fact that were never made. Compare Bollenbach v. United States, 326 U.S. 607, 614, 90 L. Ed. 350, 66 S. Ct. 402 (1946). [19] On the contrary, the District Court must at a trial resolve contested factual issues and draw the appropriate inferences in the first instance with full recognition that the issues are disputed, and only after sufficient evidence has been introduced to permit an informed judgment. As we said in Empire Electronics Co. v. United States, supra, 311 F.2d at 180-1: "If reasonable inferences could be drawn . . . such that the issue would be submitted to the trier of fact, then Rule 56(c) leaves us no latitude and we must return that issue to the trier of fact in this case the judge." See 6 Moore, supra, para. 56.15 [1-02], at 2291-92; Asbill & Snell, "Summary Judgment Under the Federal Rules -- When an Issue of Fact is Presented," 51 Mich. L. Rev. 1143, 1146 n. 15 (1953). Cf. Colby v. Klune, 178 F.2d 872, 874 (2d Cir. 1949).

[9] In light of the history of the Kemper-ABC agreement one may suspect that the claim of Sherman Act illegality was an afterthought to justify having broken a contract that had turned sour. And, it is understandable that the District Court looked with a jaundiced eye on Kemper's allegations that it was coerced into accepting all 130 stations. But, "that it might be surmised that the adverse party is unlikely to prevail at the trial is not sufficient to authorize summary judgment against him." 3 Barron & Holtzoff, supra, § 1234, at 132.

Moreover, we have been forewarned that HN4[] the use of summary judgment in complex antitrust litigation must be closely scrutinized. *Poller v. Columbia [280] Broadcasting System, 368 U.S. 464, 473, 7 L. Ed. 2d 458, 82 S. Ct. 486 (1962). [20] And, this admonition is apt where too little is known of the practical impact of the challenged transactions, White Motor Co. v. United States, 372 U.S. 253, 263-4, 9 L. Ed. 2d 738, 83 S. Ct. 696 (1963). But, this is not to say that summary judgment never has a place in the antitrust field. See White Motor Co. v. United States, supra, 372 U.S. at 259; 6 Moore, supra, para. 56.17 [5]; 3 Barron & Holtzoff, supra, § 1232 (1967 supp.).

The question before us is not the availability of the rule in any specific category of cases, but whether the record in this particular case adequately clarifies the complex and convoluted issues that are so common in antitrust litigation. Thus, our holding here does not weaken the force of Rule 56, but "simply recognizes that there are instances where summary judgment is too blunt a weapon with which to win the day, particularly where so many complicated issues of fact must be resolved in order to deal adequately with difficult questions of law which remain in the case." Miller v. General Outdoor Advertising Co., 337 F.2d 944, 948 (2d Cir. 1964). Cf. Allied Mutual Insurance Co. v. Lysne, 324 F.2d 290 (8th Cir. 1963); [21] S.J. Groves & Sons Co. v. Ohio Turnpike Commission, 315 F.2d 235 (6th Cir. 1963). In the context of this case, Judge Weinfeld stated the precept well:

> "I am persuaded that a decision after trial will be the more desirable procedure in the matter. It will serve to bring into sharper focus certain issues of importance which have been obscured by the voluminous affidavits with their statements, counter-statements and alternative positions, and the conflicting conclusions which the parties contend are to be drawn from the multitude of facts and statistics presented.
>
> Under all the circumstances the application of the summary judgment rule is questionable and the Court deems it sound judicial administration to permit a trial for such additional evidence and clarification as may be relevant." United States v. Bethlehem Steel Corp., 157 F. Supp. 877, 879 (S.D.N.Y. 1958) (Bethlehem was ultimately tried to the court, 168 F. Supp. 576).

See also Kennedy v. Silas Mason Co., 334 U.S. 249, 256-7, 92 L. Ed. 1347, 68 S. Ct. 1031 (1948); H.J. Heinz Co. v. Beech-Nut Life Savers, Inc., 181 F. Supp. 452 (S.D.N.Y. 1960).

[22] IV.

With these principles in mind, we turn to the grounds for decision advanced by the District Court. Judge Tenney reasoned that ABC had not tied the sale of the 95 stations Kemper wanted to the sale of 32 stations it did not want because, conceptually, only a single "product" was involved in the transaction. Indeed, it is axiomatic that a tie-in analysis begins with the question of separability -- the requirement that the tying and tied products be different, or, stated simply, that the forced purchase be of a second distinct commodity. As Professor Turner (now Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Anti-Trust Division) stated:

> "The requirement that they [the tying and tied products] be 'different' obviously cannot be dropped out. Every manufactured item is a combination of various materials and components. There are obvious cases in which we would say either that there is no tie-in because the object of the sale is a single product, or that if there is a tie-in, it should not be deemed illegal per se or even illegal at all." Turner, The Validity of Tying Arrangements Under the Antitrust Laws, 72 Harv. L. Rev. 50, 67-68 (1958).

See Times-Picayune Publishing Co. v. United States, 345 U.S. 594, 614, 97 L. Ed. 1277, 73 S. Ct. 872 (1953); [23] Susser v. Carvel Corp., 332 F.2d 505, 512 (2d Cir. 1964), cert. dismissed, 381 U.S. 125, 85 S. Ct. 1364, 14 L. Ed. 2d 284 (1965); Pearson, Tying Arrangements and Anti-trust Policy, 60 Nw. U.L. Rev. 626, 627 (1965).

[*281] Times-Picayune, supra, has been cited to us as a case where the Court was presented with a question for determination not too dissimilar from the one before us. The government contended that the defendant had unlawfully tied the sale of advertisements in its morning newspaper to the sale of advertisements in an afternoon paper it also published. The Court stated that:

> "two newspapers under single ownership at the same place, time, and terms sell indistinguishable products to advertisers; no dominant 'tying' product exists (in fact, since space in neither the Times-Picayune nor the States can be bought alone, one may be viewed as 'tying' as the other); no leverage in one market excludes sellers in the second, because for present purposes the products are identical and the markets the same." 345 U.S. at 614.

But the issue of separability here is not quite the same [24] as in Times-Picayune; it is manifest that whether one or more products is involved in a given transaction must be dependent upon the nature of that transaction. One factor that may distinguish this case from Times-Picayune, for example, is that commercials over different local television stations reach what are clearly different markets. [10] Moreover, as Judge Tenney recognized, the influence of the Court's analysis of the tying issue in Times-Picayune has been relatively restricted in later cases. See, e.g., Associated Press v. Taft-Ingalls Corp., 340 F.2d 753, 760-61 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 382 U.S. 820, 15 L. Ed. 2d 66, 86 S. Ct. 47 (1965).

[25] The District Judge, in determining that a single product was involved in the Kemper-ABC transaction, placed major reliance on Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. v. Amana Refrigeration, Inc., 295 F.2d 375 (7th Cir. 1961) cert. denied, 369 U.S. 812, 7 L. Ed. 2d 612, 82 S. Ct. 689 (1962). [11] In Amana, CBS sued to recover monies due under a television sponsorship agreement and Amana counter-claimed that CBS's rate structure violated sections of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 13(a), 14 and 15. The court held that "a purchase by Amana of the privilege of having itself identified as sponsor of the program broadcast and making use of the permissible portion thereof for advertising its products" was not the purchase of a "commodity" within the meaning of the Act. Id. at 378. [12]

---

[10] Compare Blake & Blum, supra, at 1385-86: "Characterizing the network's discount practices as tying arrangements does not present the difficulties encountered by the Court in Times-Picayune. Even assuming the Court there had sound basis for treating readership of the morning and evening papers as homogenous, which seems doubtful, network tie-ins are of much more distinct products. Evening and afternoon viewers of television, for example, constitute a substantially different market, as do viewers in New York and Dubuque. Furthermore, the morning and evening papers effected critical economies by leaving ad materials intact in page layouts from morning to evening editions. Network time tie-ins have no comparable claim to achieving economic efficiency."

[11] Amana has not received a welcome reception from the commentators. See, e.g., Blake & Blum, supra at 1379-80; Columbia Note, supra at 1232-34.

[12] The Sherman Act, of course, is not limited to "commodities."

Whether or not Amana correctly characterizes the nature of the sale in this case, a point we do not decide, we see nothing in the rationale of that opinion which compels a holding that in analyzing the tying issue "the privilege of being identified as the sponsor of a program" should not or may not be considered a different "product" for each [26] station sold. We have already noted that each local station is licensed independently by the F.C.C. and serves different markets. To absolutely preclude applicability of the Sherman Act -- a broad remedial statute -- merely by characterizing a transaction by some ipse dixit formulation would be to frustrate the Congressional intent in a most mechanical fashion. In any event, this is merely to recognize the problem, not to solve it; there may yet be ample justification for [*282] treating a sale of advertising time over different stations as a single "product" for purposes of the antitrust laws. Compare Dehydrating Process Co. v. A.O. Smith Corp., 292 F.2d 653, 655 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 368 U.S. 931, 7 L. Ed. 2d 194, 82 S. Ct. 368 (1961).

Recognizing [27] these considerations, Judge Tenney held that it "is a reasonable and economically justified requirement of the industry" to sell many-station lineups as a single package. [13] [29] The trial judge applied the four criteria of separability laid down in United States v. Jerrold Electronics Corp., 187 F. Supp. 545, 559 (E.D. Pa. 1960), aff'd per curiam, 365 U.S. 567, 81 S. Ct. 755, 5 L. Ed. 2d 806 (1961), and for present purposes we accept his summary of Jerrold. The first test is: "Did competitors of the seller offer all the components of the alleged 'product' separately and not exclusively as a single package?" Kemper alleges, and ABC does not deny, that when it advertised over the NBC network it was allowed to select its own lineup. And, there is some indication in the record that this practice was not uncommon in the industry. The second test is: "Was the number of components of the product variable 'so that hardly any two versions of the alleged product were the same?'" It is not disputed that ABC offered a going lineup to all prospective purchasers. But an uncontroverted affidavit submitted by Kemper alleges that on a number of occasions ABC sold [28] "Evening Report" on a selective partial lineup basis. [14] Moreover, ABC admits that it was willing to sell Kemper the lineup it desired; ABC merely demanded that Kemper pay more. Third, "Was the purchaser charged for each component and not a lump sum for the total product?" It is undisputed that ABC's offering sheets set a total price per broadcast but it is also true that ABC published a rate card time charge for each individual station. Finally, "Did the seller offer similar components for sale separately?" As noted above, there was evidence suggesting that ABC did this on occasion.

Thus, applying the criteria suggested by Jerrold to the case before us, and drawing all inferences in favor of Kemper as we are required to do, United States v. Diebold, supra, we are unable to determine on the record before us whether the Kemper-ABC transaction concerned a single product for purposes of a tie-in analysis. [15] The evidence submitted on this motion for summary judgment was simply insufficient to make a determination that the practices just described were typical or economically necessary in the television industry. ABC urges that it is in the public interest for it to build a "strong network." But it is not at all clear from the facts what added burden would have been imposed upon ABC had Kemper sponsored the program over only some of the stations which had [*283] cleared it for broadcast. [16] [31] For example, would the network [30] or local stations have incurred substantial

---

[13] A number of commentators have argued that the sales of commercial time over different television stations constitute different products for purpose of tie-in analysis. See, e.g., Schwartz, Antitrust and the FCC: The Problem of Network Dominance, 107 U. Pa. L. Rev. 753, 779-80 (1959). ABC seeks to explain away such authorities by pointing out that they deal with "must buy" practices by the networks and it asserts it does not have a "must buy policy." That may well be true but it misses the point. An analysis that "must buy" constitutes an illegal tie-in necessarily presupposes that the sale of time over different stations constitutes more than one product.

[14] For example, Kemper claims that in May 1963 General Mills purchased 69 stations from a master lineup of 106 stations; that in February 1964 Armour & Co. bought 37 stations out of a lineup of 109 and Sun Oil bought 44 of 104 stations.

[15] We note in this connection that the actual holding of Jerrold was that the defendant was justified in treating the "components" it sold as one "product" only for a short period following its introduction as a new "product," 187 F. Supp. at 559-61. And, we have stated that "tying arrangements have been given short shrift under the antitrust laws." Susser v. Carvel Corp., supra, 332 F.2d at 512.

[16] Neither party has cited, and we have not found, any recent study of the FCC dealing with these problems. And generally, the FCC appears not to have been overly concerned with antitrust considerations. See Schwartz, Antitrust and the FCC: The Problem of Network Dominance, supra note 13, 781-86.

costs by blacking out the undesired stations? Was there a ready national market where ABC could have sold the remaining stations? Would local stations refuse to clear the program if they knew that they might not be sponsored by particular advertisers? On the record presented, we find it impossible to answer these and similar relevant questions. In order that our decision not be misconstrued, it should be emphasized that we do not now hold that more than one "product" is involved in the sale of commercial time over many stations; we merely hold that additional evidence and clarification is required. [17]

V.

Finally, the District Court decided that Kemper failed to demonstrate that ABC had employed an illegal tie-in (assuming, arguendo, that more than one "product" was involved) because "the necessary element of coercion, economic or otherwise, has not been proven." See Osborn v. Sinclair Refining Co., 286 F.2d 832, 836 (4th Cir. 1960), cert. denied, 366 U.S. 963, 6 L. Ed. 2d 1255, 81 S. Ct. 1924 (1961). Two independent reasons were given: (a) ABC was legally justified in rejecting Kemper's May 4th letter order and reverting to its rate card time charges for Kemper's selected lineup; and (b) Kemper never attempted to negotiate a discount price after ABC rejected its May 4th order. This argument, we assume, is based on the premise that if Kemper never attempted to open the door, [32] it cannot claim it was slammed in its face.

Here too, we find it impossible on the record before us to determine whether ABC was justified in reverting to its higher rate card prices. As we view the law, HN5[] where there is no quality or distinguishing desideratum between a product offered singly or in a package, the seller cannot charge substantially higher for the individual product if the price differential has the effect of conditioning the sale of the single product to the sale of the entire package and if the difference in price cannot be legitimately justified by cost considerations.

The leading case in this area is United States v. Loew's Inc., 371 U.S. 38, 9 L. Ed. 2d 11, 83 S. Ct. 97 (1962), in which the government challenged the "block booking" of feature motion picture films for sale to television exhibitors. The lower court decree had enjoined the defendants from:

> "(C) Entering into any agreement to sell or license the right to exhibit any feature film over any television station in which the differential between the price or fee for such feature film when sold [33] or licensed alone and the price or fee for the same film when sold or licensed with one or more other film [sic] has the effect of conditioning the sale or license of such film upon the sale or license of one or more other films." Id. at 43, 83 S. Ct. at 101.

The government contended that this provision was too vague for effective enforcement and the court responded:

> "The final judgments as entered only prohibit a price differential between a film offered individually and as part of a package which 'has the effect of conditioning the sale or license of such film upon the sale or license of one or more other films.' . . . Differentials unjustified by cost savings may already be prohibited under the decree as it now appears. Nevertheless, the addition of a specific provision to prevent such differentials will prevent uncertainty in the operation [*284] of the decree . . . . to ensure that all proper bases of quantity discount may be used, the modification [of the decree] should be worded in terms of allowing all legitimate cost justifications." Id. at 54-5.

We do not read this to mean, of course, that a purchaser can [34] select the most expensive individual item from a package and demand it at the average price for all the items in the package -- a price which necessarily reflects the charges for the less costly components of the package. But Kemper was not selecting a limited number of stations and demanding them at the average package price; it insists it was willing to pay for its limited 95 station lineup what ABC was demanding for all 130 stations. The trial judge seemed more certain than we are that in its May 4th order Kemper substituted the 28 more expensive for the 32 cheaper stations. [18] In any event, regardless of [17] Similarly, we voice no opinion on the rule of law that would apply if a sponsor demanded a lineup of two or three stations. See Pearson, Tying Arrangements and Antitrust Policy, supra at 628-29, commenting on Judge Cooper's opinion below. We will cross that bridge when we come to it.

---

how Kemper arrived at the figures it used in its May 4th order, we are still faced with Kemper's claim that it was requesting fewer stations than ABC was offering at the price ABC was demanding. And, under the circumstances of this case, we do not think it is an answer to say that the rate card prices to which ABC reverted were pre-established. Apparently, full rate card prices were never charged by ABC. Moreover, to hold that a seller can avoid the impact of the Loew's rationale merely by setting a pre-established price for each individual item -- even if that price is [35] rarely if ever charged and is, in relation to the package price, fanciful and unjustified by cost -- would mean that the antitrust laws could be flouted at will.

[36] On the incomplete record before us, we find it impossible to determine whether there were justified cost differentials between ABC's individual and package prices. The extent of the extra administrative burden, if any, that ABC would incur if it had to negotiate on a less than full lineup basis is unclear. And, Kemper maintains steadfastly that ABC would incur no cost by having to black out the unwanted stations. While there are suggestions in the record that would seem to lend some support to this contention, it is possible that although blacking out involves no cost to the network, it would impose a substantial burden on the individual stations -- a burden which might ultimately have to be borne by the network. In any event, additional evidence is needed before a determination can be made that ABC's price differentials were cost justified.

As we have already noted, the District Judge found that Kemper never attempted to negotiate with ABC after it rejected its May 4th letter order. Judge Tenney seems to suggest that Kemper [*285] had a duty to approach the hierarchy of officialdom at ABC's New York office with respect to a discount on its selected lineup, and should [37] not have been content to accept the rejection it received from the lower echelon in the network's Chicago sales office. But the law does not demand that Kemper joust with windmills; it would have been reasonable to require it to negotiate only if there was a chance of success. If all the inferences are resolved in favor of Kemper -- as we are required to do on ABC's motion for summary judgment, United States v. Diebold, supra -- we believe that on the record before us it is a disputed issue of fact whether, under all the circumstances of this case, it was reasonable to have required Kemper to attempt to negotiate further after ABC rejected its order.

Kemper has insisted in these summary proceedings that ABC adamantly refused to sell the desired lineup at other than rate card. And, an ABC official asserted that he had been told by his superior that "if they insist on a specific lineup, they must pay rate card." Of course, if this ABC policy was never communicated to Kemper, it could not have been a factor in the decision not to negotiate; but, this is not clear. It is also true that there was some evidence that at a meeting held on May 18th, Kemper was told that "we [38] would be willing to renegotiate the deal." However, the record also discloses that at another point in the meeting Kemper was told that the selected lineup would cost "rate card and then some." Moreover, an official of the Frank agency stated that after the May 18th meeting he was informed that "ABC New York" wanted Kemper to take the full lineup and the price seemingly was to be rate card. Following all these meetings and conversations, Kemper alleges that it concluded that any further efforts to get ABC to modify its position would be doomed to failure. Consequently, it capitulated and agreed to ABC's terms. [19] [39] It is apparent to us that the facts underlying the negotiations are in serious conflict and [18] As we understand the parties' contentions, there are two different equations submitted for arriving at the figures in Kemper's May 4th order. Kemper claims it was willing to pay for 67 of 99 stations the $15,750 ABC was asking for the full lineup of 99. It asserts that it added to this figure the $3,000 charge for the 28 additional stations it wanted, to arrive at the $18,750 station time charge found in its May 4th order. ABC claims that Kemper treated all 99 stations as fungible and deducted a proportional amount ($2,871.23) for the 32 unwanted stations from the time charge used at the April 27th meeting. It then added $5,588.88 -- the discounted rate for the 28 stations it wanted -- to arrive at a figure of $18,467.65, which was rounded to $18,750 in the May 4th letter.

---

It is apparent that either theory would account for the figure Kemper used. While it is relatively clear that Kemper, in an intra-office memo sometime previous to the April 27th meeting, employed the method of computation suggested by ABC, an official of the Frank agency swore in an affidavit submitted on the motion that these earlier computations were not reflected in Kemper's orders. We have already indicated in part II that on a motion for summary judgment, with no opportunity to evaluate the demeanor of the witnesses, it is not the function of the court to determine whether the affiant is telling the truth or that he seems "persuasive." We note in this connection that it is not obvious to us why Kemper should have used a figure of $5,588.88 for the 28 extra stations when ABC had previously stated at the April 27th meeting that it would agree to charge only $3,000.

thus it is impossible to resolve them on this motion or to draw inferences adverse to Kemper, as would be necessary for a holding that Kemper's refusal to negotiate was unreasonable. [20]

[40] VI.

In sum, we are of the opinion that this case was not ripe for summary judgment. While this matter has already been pending for an inordinate amount of time, we cannot grant or withhold summary judgment merely because it would save time or expense. Cf. 3 Barron & Holtzoff, supra, § 1231 (1967 supp.). We suggest in the interest of judicial economy, however, that the District Court first determine at trial whether it was reasonable for Kemper not to have attempted to negotiate further. A negative answer based [*286] on adequate evidence and findings would obviate the need for further proceedings with respect to the issues discussed in part IV of this opinion. [21]

[41] Summary judgment in favor of ABC is reversed.

End of Document

---

[19] The District Court placed great emphasis on a number of Kemper memoranda that did not indicate the lineup problem was of importance to the company. The significance of many of these documents without further evidence must be discounted, however, since they were written after Kemper alleges it capitulated to ABC's demands.

[20] We frankly find the positions advanced by both parties in this summary proceeding somewhat puzzling and incongruous. Kemper claims it refused extra stations although they would cost nothing additional because it could not adequately service potential customers. ABC, on the other hand, apparently insisted that Kemper take something for nothing, allegedly because it would be expensive to cut out the unwanted stations. But when Kemper ordered its limited lineup, ABC did not respond "you can have your lineup at the package rate but you will, of course, have to pay any expenses we will incur by cutting out stations." Instead, it spoke of "rate card and then some" -- to an important customer -- although it is clear that it apparently never charged anyone rate card. The only fact of possible monetary significance that we can detect between Kemper's offer and ABC's counteroffer is that Kemper stipulated that the charge "shall be reduced by the package rate of any station not clearing." But the maximum price effect appears to be relatively insignificant and it does not rationalize for us the positions of the parties.

[21] Another issue, not raised by ABC, which could well be explored before confronting the important and difficult problem of application of the "tie-in" principle to network broadcasting, is the possible bearing of Kelly v. Kosuga, 358 U.S. 516, 3 L. Ed. 2d 475, 79 S. Ct. 429 (1959). The principal, indeed almost the sole, item of damage which plaintiffs seek to recover is the state court judgment for their breach of contract committed for a reason wholly unrelated to the antitrust laws; if, under Kelly, the antitrust laws did not give Kemper a valid antitrust defense to that suit, they can hardly permit it to recover three times the amount of the judgment. The case arguably differs from Kelly in that here the contract included the sale of something alleged to constitute an illegal tie-in; however, it is also unlike Associated Press v. Taft-Ingalls Corp., 340 F.2d 753 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 382 U.S. 820, 86 S. Ct. 47, 15 L. Ed. 2d 66 (1965) in that, although the record is not completely clear on this point, the price for the entire package of 130 stations appears to have been no greater than Kemper was willing to pay for the 95 stations they wanted. We note also that the discussion in Kelly assumed that there was a "lawful sale for a fair consideration," 358 U.S. at 521, a fact upon which the District Court made no findings.

Otto Milk Co. v. United Dairy Farmers Cooperative Asso.

United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit

September 25, 1967, Argued ; December 26, 1967, Decided

No. 16386

Reporter

388 F.2d 789 *; 1967 U.S. App. LEXIS 4027 ; 1967 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,318

OTTO MILK COMPANY, Plaintiff-Appellee, v. UNITED DAIRY FARMERS COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION, United Dairy Farmers, Ernest Hayes, J. D. Smouse, Joseph M. Piper, Stanley Yagla and Adam Babiarz, United Dairy Farmers Cooperative Association, Ernest Hayes, J. D. Smouse, Joseph M. Piper, Stanley Yagla and Adam Babiarz, Appellants

Disposition: [1] Affirmed.

Core Terms

milk, pickets, Farmers, Dairy, customers, sales, products, buy, defendants', signs, Co-Operative, storekeepers, conspiracy, handle, Farms, front, interstate commerce, trial judge, Sherman Act, injunction, answered, supplied, entity, induce, district court, milk product, retail store, cross-examination, discontinue, purchases

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Defenses

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN1[] Sherman Act, Defenses

The Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 and §2, does not require actual monopoly of the territory sought.

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Freedoms > Freedom of Speech > Scope

HN2[] Fundamental Freedoms, Freedom of Speech

The constitutional freedom for speech and press does not extend its immunity to speech or writing used as an integral part of conduct in violation of a valid criminal statute.

Judges: McLaughlin, Hastie and Forman, Circuit Judges.

Opinion by: McLAUGHLIN

Opinion

[*790] OPINION OF THE COURT

McLAUGHLIN, Circuit Judge.

Appellee sued defendants under sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. Sections 1 and 2) for engaging in an unlawful conspiracy in restraint of trade and for endeavoring to monopolize the marketing of milk in the particular southwestern area of Pennsylvania involved. The third count of the complaint, urged under the pendent jurisdiction of the district court, was for unlawfully interfering with plaintiff's relations with its customers. The case was heard on the merits of all three of plaintiff's charges on June 14 and 22, 1966. The three counts were sustained by the trial judge. A decree was issued which permanently enjoined the defendants.

> "* * * from inducing, or attempting to induce, directly or indirectly, any present or potential customer of plaintiff to refuse to purchase products from plaintiff and, in connection therewith, from picketing or demonstrating, or threatening to picket or demonstrate, before or about any retail store in and around Western Pennsylvania, or in any other place [2] which is, or may become, a purchaser of the bottled milk or dairy products of plaintiff."

Appellee buys raw milk, then processes, bottles and sells it to retail stores. The milk comes from Western Pennsylvania farms, is handled at appellee's receiving plants in Pennsylvania and Ohio and sold as bottled milk and other dairy products in Pennsylvania, Ohio and West Virginia. Plaintiff's milk supplier during the critical period was Dairymen's Co-Operative Sales Association (DCSA). Plaintiff's [*791] president, Thomas P. Otto, as a witness, testified that there are in the neighborhood of 4,000 members of the DCSA with approximately 700 of these having furnished milk to plaintiff. Defendant-appellant United Dairy Farmers Cooperative Association (Association) is an incorporated association under the laws of Pennsylvania. Defendant United Dairy Farmers (UDF) admittedly was an unincorporated association. Defendant-appellant Hayes was sued individually and is designated in the complaint as currently president of the Association and of UDF. He admits being president of the Association. Defendants-appellants Smouse, Piper, Yagla and Babiarz were all sued as individuals and were [3] stated to be currently respectively Vice President, Treasurer, Secretary and Assistant Secretary of the Association and UDF. An answer was filed on behalf of all defendants. The individual defendants admitted they were officers of the Association. They denied they were then officers of UDF. The trial court found as a fact that the individual defendants are officers of said organization.

Plaintiff Otto Milk Company sought a permanent injunction against the defendants from inducing or attempting to induce customers of plaintiff to refuse to purchase products from plaintiff and in connection therewith, from picketing or demonstrating before any retail store which was a purchaser of plaintiff's products. Defendants agreed voluntarily to stop the complained of conduct pending the outcome of this case.

So that the entire situation appears in its true perspective it is necessary to set out at some length highlights of the hearing testimony. As stated the president of plaintiff company was a witness. He said that on April 29, 1966 at the last contact he had with defendant Hayes the latter "asked that we discontinue the purchase of our milk supplies from the Dairymen's Cooperative Sales [4] Association and buy the Class I needs from the United Dairy Farmers. He also at that time indicated that he couldn't be responsible for what might happen if we did not do so." Otto said that by May 26, 1966 "in various areas, pickets appeared before the stores of our very good customers." With reference to an article in the Pittsburgh Post Gazette titled "Dairymen to picket Otto outlets" in which defendant Hayes was purportedly quoted (Pltf's Ex. 2) the latter was called to the witness stand by the plaintiff. He was asked how many members the UDFCA had. He said that the last tally made probably two months previously, showed in the neighborhood of 600 members. He stated they were taking in new members all the time. After some back and forth he was asked "All right now, I will get back to you later, sir, but are we agreed that you did tell the reporter from the Pittsburgh Post Gazette that you were going to tell your story and 'this', meaning walking around with cards or signs was the only way to do it? A. I didn't say the only way, I said this was a way that we would inform the public." Hayes, shown a sign by his lawyer, identified it as "a sign that our members was carrying, * * *. [5] " He agreed with his attorney that it was the typical sign that was carried by the persons who were telling their story. A little later plaintiff's attorney referring to the same sign asked Hayes "Incidentally on the back, it says 'UDF and DSCA'. What's that?" Hayes answered saying "This is an old sign." and went on to explain that they "just turned it over and used the side that there was nothing printed on it."

Otto, returning to the stand, stated that his company since that May had been obtaining all their dairy products from Western Pennsylvania farms. A letter from the Pennsylvania Milk Control Commission to plaintiff company advised "that the audit recently completed by our auditors reveals that your company purchased its entire milk supply for the month of May, 1966 from 740 Pennsylvania producers." The witness testified that because of the pickets the numbers of stores that discontinued the Otto product totaled a weekly purchase from Otto of some $3,670. In addition leaflets or pamphlets [*792] which the defense attorney said were printed by UDFCA were distributed by persons wearing the alluded to signs and walking up and down in front of stores belonging to Otto customers. [6] Hayes, as a witness, said United Dairy Farmers paid for the printing and that "it was written back when we negotiated the contract with Beverly Farms." (Emphasis supplied). The leaflet or pamphlet was marked in evidence as plaintiff's exhibit 5. It was read into the record as follows:

> "A. The heading in bold type, 'Help your local farmer help you. When you buy milk today, please buy Beverly Farms United Dairy Farmers milk. When you do this you are actually helping your local farmers stay in business and you are getting better milk. The only carton of milk guaranteed to have local farmers' milk in it, is the one which has the black "United Dairy Farmers" handle. We local farmers need your help and support. When you buy Beverly Farms United Dairy Farmers milk you help us help you keep the price down. If your dealer does not have the milk with the United Dairy Farmers label from Beverly Farms -- ask him for it. Thanks and God bless you for helping us stay in business to better serve you and your children. United Dairy Farmers Cooperative Association.'" (Emphasis supplied).

Otto denied that Beverly milk was better than his. He was asked one other way customers [7] could be sure of obtaining local milk and answered. "They can buy it from Otto Milk and they can buy from other dairies." Otto went on to say that their customers had been reporting to them that they had been asked and in some cases demanding that they take Otto milk off sale. "In addition to this," he said, "the good will of the Otto Milk Company is definitely in jeopardy when our customers feel that when they handle our product, which is all from Pennsylvania and all from Western Pennsylvania and all paid for at the Pennsylvania Milk Control prices, they are incurring the wrath of a group of producers, farmers." Plaintiff's ex. 6 in evidence was a statement over Radio Station KQV, June 10, 1966 by Mr. MacIlvane one of the two attorneys who tried this suit on behalf of defendants. It was read into the record by the witness. It appears in Footnote. [1] It flatly accused the Pennsylvania Milk Control Commission of "approving the conniving and carrying-ons between Otto and the DCSA to water down the price the farmer actually receives for his milk."

---

[1] " THE STATEMENT OF JOHN MACILVANE FOR U.D.F.

KQV -- June 10, 1966

The fact that the Pennsylvania Milk Control Commission approves of the audit (ah) of the Otto books means nothing. It only means that they are (ah) approving the conniving and carrying-ons between Otto and the DCSA to water down the (ah) price the farmers actually receives for his milk. Now the facts are that the farmer himself he gets his milk checked at at end of the month only receives eight (8) cents a quart on the average. Now, (ah) we can produce literally hundreds of farmers -- and, aw I would say, farmers that are also shipping to Otto itself -- where their checks will show that they only get eight (8) cents when they put, when they put it in their pockets. Now what happens to the, to the 12.47 cents that Otto says they pay to the DCSA we don't know." (Emphasis supplied).

[8] Mr. DiGuglielmo, a storekeeper, testified he had handled Otto products over two years, since he had owned the store. On June 1st a man and a woman came to his store, told him they were from United Farmers Dairy Association and that if he wouldn't quit handling the Otto product, they would put a picket line at his doors. They told him they would allow him to get rid of his stock and would be back to check. He answered "O.K. I would not,". He then talked to the Otto company and, as he testified, "I told them what happened so I told them I didn't want their drivers to stop until this thing was settled." He has not had any Otto products since that time.

Otto, recalled, testified that twenty-three stores had turned out their Otto [*793] milk in the last three weeks and he named them all.

Mr. Marcinek, another storekeeper, told of being visited on May 31, 1966 by four ladies who said they represented United Dairies and United Dairy Farmers. They told him if he didn't take Otto milk out of the case, they would demonstrate in front of his store. They admitted Otto milk was paying the full price but said they were not getting it. Marcinek refused and stated that they picketed in [9] front of the store with a card that had the name "United Dairy Farmers" printed on top of it. The pickets were later increased from the four ladies to around twenty-two people. This was a store in an industrial section, a strong union labor center. Marcinek said he lost business because of the picketing. In addition, an attempt was made by one of the pickets to persuade a person delivering non related merchandise to the store, not to make the delivery, as unfair to union labor.

Hayes, recalled, under cross-examination for the plaintiff, admitted that possibly all Ott's milk in the immediately preceding month of May came from Pennsylvania. Later he said that he never told the newspaper reporter above referred to "that Otto was buying milk out of the state." He also said "At the present time, I would say that this is correct, that they are buying all their milk in Pennsylvania." He agreed that the Otto Milk Company pays the applicable Pennsylvania prices.

Louis E. Milks, Jr., a driver salesman for Otto, on May 25, 1966 in calling on a Sligo Market customer found eight to ten pickets walking in a tight little circle in front of the store. They carried signs saying Otto was unfair [10] to the farmers. The signs at least had the letters "UDF". Shortly after that the market owner left a note for the witness' relief driver that due to circumstances beyond his control he was going to discontinue Otto milk at the present time. That market had been a customer of Otto for at least three years. After leaving the above noted market, Milks visited another Sligo store right up the street from the first one. Coming out of the second store he saw that his gas cap was missing from his car. The pickets from the first store had followed him to the second place. Going on to the town of Clarion to the A & P store there, he found men pickets in front of the premises with the same sort of signs having UDF on them. He left less than half his normal delivery at that store. The pickets told him that when they got Otto signed up they would go after another dairy. On his next trip to that store he found that all Otto milk had been removed from the service store and that there was nothing in the dairy case. At the supermarket in Clarion, the witness "had to take all the milk out * * *." His ordinary sales to that store ran $400 to $450 a week. He made no sales at all there that day. His sales [11] during the picketing declined around a thousand dollars a week.

Hayes again on the stand for cross-examination was questioned as to the United Dairy Farmers. He was asked "Well, did it exist in April (Mr. Simmons, attorney for defense) Which year, sir? (Plaintiff's attorney) Of 1966 I think this is. A. (Hayes) I couldn't be correct about this, but I think it had." (Emphasis supplied). Asked "And you were president of United Dairy Farmers also, weren't you? A. I was." Confronted with his testimony of March 18, 1966 before the Milk Control Commission he admitted that he had stated to the Commission "We have 2,000 people that have signed membership cards to be members of United Dairy Farmers. I would say they are United Dairy Farmers, yes, sir." Answering here he stated "Well, these are cards that were signed as United Dairy Farmers, yes. Q. Not the co-op? A. We didn't have the co-op yet." Asked "All right, in March you had 2,000. Today how many members do you have? A. I said the last count I had was something over 600." Asked, "I am trying to find out where are those 2,000 people today, in what organization? A. Well, I would say there's some of them that's in United [12] Dairy Farmers. Some of them [*794] that has not yet joined United Dairy Farmers co-op." (Emphasis supplied).

With regard to the use of the word "pickets" and Hayes' knowledge of the persons who walked in front of the various stores he was asked and answered as follows:

"Q. Who is your picket captain?
A. There's picket captains in different areas.
Q. Tell me who they are.
A. I don't know them.
Q. Tell me the areas.
A. The county officers of each county can probably know the picket captains. As far as myself, I don't pick them.
Q. Who picks the picket captains?
A. Membership theirself.
Q. Who picks them?
A. Membership.
Q. Well, do you know any picket captains?
A. Offhand no. I don't keep tab on any of them.
Q. You don't know the names of a single picket captain?
A. No, I have enough to do without worrying about them.
Q. Do you know the name of any person who has picketed?
A. I would know quite a few, yes."

Rudolph Svrcek, an Otto driver salesman, was the next witness. He has had eighteen years experience as such salesman. He serves several Western Pennsylvania towns. On May 31, 1966 he saw pickets outside an [13] Otto delivery store in Browneville. The next day the store authority made him buy back his Otto milk with the store refusing any more deliveries of it. He was shown the sign in evidence about Otto milk with the UDF initials on the back thereof. He said it was similar in all respects to signs the pickets had except that the language on the latter about not boycotting or picketing Otto was in smaller letters. At another store the next day a woman whom he had seen picketing came in and told the owner "You could sell any milk except Otto." Svrcek had to take his milk out of the store. He specifically stated that he saw that woman the same afternoon carrying a sign similar to the one introduced into evidence by the defendants. In the first talk he had with the woman she "made the statement that they would upset the Otto trucks." She favored this "to hurry up the situation." The witness added that the woman told the above mentioned storekeeper, "We don't want you to handle Otto milk." He said that because of the pickets he was unable to serve four of his stops and named them. This meant his route was down close to a $1,000 a week.

John Martin, secretary and controller of the plaintiff, [14] was a witness. He said that for the last several years plaintiff had averaged $644,000 paid for plastic milk containers to out of state manufacturers; that plaintiff is starting to make them itself in Pittsburgh; that its projected out of state purchase of plastic for these during the next year is a quarter of a million dollars. Containers for its other milk products are supplied from named sources in New Jersey, Ohio and Michigan. Otto's average purchases of these amounted to $135,000. The milk cases come from Massachusetts. These average per year, $18,000. Other products, fruit flavoring and sugar, are obtained from stated companies in Michigan, Illinois, New York and Ohio. These total to $258,000 worth a year. Replacements for vehicle parts, etc., are obtained from Detroit, Michigan. The witness said that during the picketing, thirty of the Otto customer stores completely discontinued Otto products; that the weekly company loss of sales from this was $3,677; that the total reduction in route sales per week amounted to $6,700. Since the activities complained of stopped, the sales came back up. He affirmatively stated that if the conduct continued and sales declined they would have [15] to reduce their purchases from out of state.

Jackson Dixon was the concluding witness for the plaintiff. He is supervisor for the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea [*795] Company of fourteen A & P stores in Western Pennsylvania. He had personal knowledge of the picketing of his stores in the latter part of May or early June, 1966. He said 85 per cent of his store items come from outside Pennsylvania. The annual A & P purchases for his stores run into millions of dollars. The picketing of those stores did have some effect on their sales. The A & P continued to sell Otto milk and that action had a decreasing effect on their overall sales.

Hayes and Harry W. Wolfgang comprised the defense witnesses. The former said that they used the name United Dairy Farmers "until we got the co-op." He attempted no explanation of his earlier statement that some of his group were still using the name United Dairy Farmers. Hayes indicated very strongly that he did not want Otto to buy milk through the Dairymen's Co-Operative Sales Association but to buy direct from these farmers. He was asked on cross-examination "why don't you have your people go around in front of the stores that handle the milk [16] that comes from Ohio, with these signs on it instead of Mr. Otto's customers." He answered "Well, we can only go to certain stores right now. We only have so many people." He was asked on cross-examination "Wouldn't it be helpful, most helpful, if everybody only purchased Pennsylvania milk at Pennsylvania prices, all dairies? A. I would say this would be helpful also. Q. It would be very helpful wouldn't it? And Mr. Otto now does that? A. That's correct. Q. That's all."

Mr. Wolfgang said he was a milk producer, a member of both DCSA and UDFCA. He was asked on cross-examination "Now you are a shipper to Otto, which has a high class I utilization. If Otto dealt directly with you, what would happen to the member farmer producer of the DCSA who ships to somebody, dairy that has only a 35 per cent Class I utilization as opposed to Otto's about 60 per cent? A. I don't think that would happen in Western Pennsylvania. The Ohio milk blends us down. Q. So the answer is buy Pennsylvania milk? A. Yes, definitely." (Emphasis supplied).

Plaintiff had four affidavits of other storekeepers marked in evidence. These had been for use on its motion for preliminary injunction. After that [17] proceeding was telescoped into a final hearing on the merits under the stipulation of the parties, plaintiff introduced the said affidavits on the theory that they were properly a part of the full proceedings before the court. The court accepted them over the objection of defendants. Plaintiff argues forcibly that but for the stipulation converting the initial proceeding for preliminary injunction into final hearing, it would have produced the affiants in court as witnesses at the final hearing. The affidavits are cumulative of the testimony presented on behalf of the plaintiff. We see no need of adding the question of their validity to the issues before us in this appeal. We therefore have not considered them and express no opinion on that problem at this time.

No pretension is made that the above testimony has been tightly catalogued. However, it does present a cohesive, clear picture of the purposes and actions of the defendants which brought about the situation in which plaintiff found itself in June of 1966. None of plaintiff's evidence was validly contradicted, indeed little if any attempt was so made on the part of the defense. In large part on appellants' side the hearing [18] was devoted to the shotgun argument efforts for the defense to the effect that assuming what was said and offered in evidence by the plaintiff was true, the latter had no right to be in court on any of its grievances.

The defendants-appellants put forward as a primary contention that there was not sufficient evidence of them having violated the Sherman Act by engaging in an unlawful conspiracy in restraint of trade. They seem to be quite content to base their position that there was no conspiracy at all, on the testimony of the defendant Hayes. They say Hayes denied there was such an unincorporated association as United Dairy Farmers and that he said it ceased to exist legally on [*796] November 5, 1965. They fail to mention that United Dairy Farmers, sued as a defendant, has been and still is represented in this litigation by counsel; that there was never any motion to strike UDF as a defendant; that according to Hayes, the 2,000 farmers, signed up in March 1966, were so signed as members of the UDF and not the co-op. Hayes himself under oath then said as to March 1966 "We didn't have the co-op yet." The above quoted record shows he thought the UDF was in existence in April [19] 1966. He concluded that sequence of his testimony by answering in response to counsel's query as to where the 2,000 UDF people are today, "Well I would say there's some of them that's in United Dairy Farmers. Some of them that has not yet joined United Dairy Farmers co-op." This evidence from the president of UDF and actually most of the other testimony bearing on UDF in the record make it plain that UDF down to and including trial time was an existing organization sharing in the concerted activity against Otto. And it is plain that the pickets or marchers carrying UDF signs do indicate the participation in that movement by that group. Cf. William Goldman Theatres, Inc. v. Loew's, Inc., 150 F.2d 738, 743-744 (3 Cir. 1945), cert. den. 334 U.S. 811, 68 S. Ct. 1016, 92 L. Ed. 1742 (1945). The evidence of record concerning UDF being a live group during the critical period which, with the Association, Hayes and the other individuals who were officers of both, marched in front of the various Otto West Pennsylvania customer stores carrying signs bearing the insignia of the two organizations and statements that "Otto Milk Company refuses to pay fair prices for [20] milk", "* * * refuses to pay fair prices to farmers", "* * * unfair to the farmer", was believed by the trial judge who so found as a fact. Among other items fully justified by the evidence included in the Findings of Fact were that the pickets of the defendants UDF and the Association advised the store people they would leave if the latter stopped selling Otto milk and that they tried to have the stores substitute Beverly Farms' products for Otto's. It will be remembered that Beverly Farms, a competitor of Otto, was the company that had a contract with UDF which Hayes definitely implied at least also related to the Association. It will be remembered too that the pickets distributed the leaflets put out by UDF urging the purchase of Beverly milk.

Appellant Association contends vigorously that it is an agricultural cooperative association within the Capper-Volstead Act, Section 1, 7 U.S.C. Section 291. There is no dispute on this point. In that genuine status it of course is not in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. However, based on sufficient evidence which the trial court accepted as credible, the Association was found to have conspired with UDF (which [21] was not protected by the Capper-Volstead Act) and Hayes and the other officers of UDF in express violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. Under the evidence, the trial judge rightly refused to go along with the defendants' assertion that their conceded movement against Otto was simply that of one business entity. Defendants' fundamental theory, all of its argument, all of its cited decisional law is founded on the false premise that the UDF and its president Hayes in that capacity were not involved in palpably wrongful acts and conduct against plaintiff and therefore there was no conspiracy. Appellants finally suggest on this conspiracy proposition that if this Court finds that UDF exists and assuming all plaintiff's evidence to be true, the defendants are in law a single entity and there is no proof of conspiracy with another person or entity to substantially restrain trade. They propose in support of this, Isaly Dairy Co. of Pittsburgh v. United Dairy Farmers, 250 F. Supp. 99 (W.D.Pa.1966). As the trial judge here found, "the facts in the Isaly case are entirely different from the facts in this case." There in what was originally a state litigation, the defendants [22] were the UDF and Hayes, Yagla and Elkin individually and as officers of UDF. In Isaly, it was the plaintiff's plant which was picketed as [*797] agreed to by the defense attorney before us who represented the defendants in Isaly. There was no picketing of innocent third parties in that suit or any of the intimidation and pressure we have in this litigation. The citation of the latter by appellants is of some passing interest only because it sharply shows the there confessedly independent entity of UDF, Hayes and its other officers. See also Case-Swayne Company, Inc. v. Sunkist Growers, Inc., 389 U.S. 384, 88 S. Ct. 528, 19 L. Ed. 2d 621, opinion filed December 18, 1967.

The trial judge found as facts that the pickets were associated with and that what they did was authorized by the defendants, that as a result plaintiff suffered business losses of some $3600. a week, that those losses will continue if defendants are not prohibited from those practices. Appellee strongly stresses that the agreements forced upon the Otto storekeepers by the defendants were illegal under the Sherman Act, that by them the storekeepers became coerced coconspirators against appellee. [23] Under the facts before us we think this argument sound. The whole integrated course of unlawful conduct directly brought about substantial loss of trade to Otto. The storekeepers by means of defendants' threats and pressures participated in the illegal scheme against Otto. Of itself this was a conspiracy under the Sherman Act. Flintkote Co. v. Lysfjord, 246 F.2d 368, 374-375 (9 Cir. 1957), cert. den. 355 U.S. 835, 78 S. Ct. 54, 2 L. Ed. 2d 46 (1957). The picketing in this appeal was not, as defendant Hayes continually proclaimed at the hearing, to tell defendants' story. The testimony reveals that it was affirmatively an attempt to stop Otto sales in the Western Pennsylvania milk products market. It was a raw endeavor on the part of defendants to monopolize that market by forcing Otto out of its retail connections because it would not bow to the defendants' demands, leave its distributor Dairymen's Co-Operative Sales Association and function under the defendants' groups. That tactic illustrated defendants' ultimate goal. As announced callously by defendants and above quoted, after they harassed plaintiff into submission they intended moving along to the [24] next processor, with the unmistakable objective, found by the trial judge, of destroying their major competitor, Dairymen's Co-Operative Sales Association and taking over the Western Pennsylvania milk products field. United States v. Addyston Pipe & Steel Co., 85 F. 271, 46 L.R.A. 122 (6 Cir. 1898), affd. 175 U.S. 211, 20 S. Ct. 96, 44 L. Ed. 136 (1899); Northern Pacific Ry. v. United States, 356 U.S. 1, 78 S. Ct. 514, 2 L. Ed. 2d 545 (1958). Even the boycott against Otto standing alone was wrong as could be. Klor's, Inc. v. Broadway-Hale Stores, Inc., 359 U.S. 207, 79 S. Ct. 705, 3 L. Ed. 2d 741 (1959); Evening News Publishing Co. v. Allied Newspaper Carriers, 263 F.2d 715 (3 Cir. 1959), cert. den. 360 U.S. 929, 79 S. Ct. 1449, 3 L. Ed. 2d 1544 (1959); Paramount Pictures, Inc. v. United Motion Picture Theatre Owners, 93 F.2d 714 (3 Cir. 1937).

Appellants dispose of the serious question of their acts substantially affecting interstate commerce by saying "at no place has the Plaintiff shown that Defendants' acts affect interstate commerce in any substantial manner." The District Court [25] found that "Defendants' activities if continued would have an effect on interstate commerce which would not be insubstantial." It further held that in the picketing retail grocery dealers and asking them to remove Otto's products from their stores, defendants have engaged in an operation amounting to a boycott of Otto and DCSA, designed to restrain and monopolize interstate commerce. There was sufficient proof to support this in the above quoted testimony of the Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company executive, Mr. Dixon and in the concise evidence of the Otto controller, Mr. Martin, above outlined.

We think that defendants interfered directly with the flow of interstate commerce which need not be in substantial degree. United States v. Columbia Steel Co., 334 U.S. 495, 68 S. Ct. 1107, 92 L. Ed. 1533 (1948); Apex Hosiery Co. v. [*798] Leader, 310 U.S. 469, 60 S. Ct. 982, 84 L. Ed. 1311 (1940), and indirectly by intrastate restraint affecting interstate commerce to a degree not "insignificant or insubstantial". International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U.S. 392, 396, 68 S. Ct. 12, 92 L. Ed. 20 (1947). In this connection it should [26] be additionally noted that the defendants drive against DCSA could not help but affect interstate commerce as that Association serviced Ohio milk farmers according to defense witnesses Hayes and Wolfgang. See also the very late United States Supreme Court decision, Burke et al. v. Ford et al., 389 U.S. 320, 88 S. Ct. 443, 19 L. Ed. 2d 554 (December 11, 1967).

Taking up the important element of pendent jurisdiction, it is uncontroverted that if the federal questions in this litigation are not plainly wanting in substance, the District Court had jurisdiction of the cause of action set out in the third count of the complaint. That alleged that "The deliberate, malicious and wanton acts of the defendants were intended to and in fact did tortiously and without privilege, induce retail stores in the Western Pennsylvania area to discontinue their long standing relationships with Otto, the existence of which was well known to the defendants." Defendants would eliminate this cause by their blanket statement that there is no substance at all to the Sherman Act claims. Under Count 1, the conspiracy count, defendants simply protest that they were a single entity. Under Section [27] 2 of the Act, the second count, defendants repeat they were all a legal entity and say there is no evidence that they monopolized the milk market in the southwestern Pennsylvania area. As to this latter defense, it might be well to point out that HN1[] the Act does not require actual monopoly of the territory sought and that what happened with respect to this third count claim was a deliberate, organized, determined maneuver to obtain a milk products monopoly in the particular territory. That was directly in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act. Maryland and Virginia Milk Producers Assn v. United States, 362 U.S. 458, 80 S. Ct. 847, 4 L. Ed. 2d 880 (1960); North Texas Producers Assn. v. Metzger Dairies, 348 F.2d 189 (5 Cir. 1965, rehearing denied 1965).

The trial judge found as a fact that "The purpose of defendants' activities was to induce the retail store operators to agree to stop handling Otto's products and, in many instances it was successful. The pickets not only wanted to tell their story, but they also wanted to stop customers from shopping at the stores [28] and, in turn, stop the stores from dealing with Otto. The activities of defendants interfered with, and if not enjoined would continue to interfere with, the advantageous business relationship between Otto and its customers." He held that "The activities of defendants constitute a tortious interference with plaintiff's advantageous business relationship between Otto and its customers." He correctly concluded that conduct to be contrary to the pertinent Pennsylvania law. Glazer v. Chandler, 414 Pa. 304, 200 A.2d 416 (1964); Bruce Lincoln-Mercury, Inc. v. Universal C.I.T. Credit Corp., 325 F.2d 2, 13-14 (3 Cir. 1963). See also Hurn v. Oursler, 289 U.S. 238, 53 S. Ct. 586, 77 L. Ed. 1148 (1933); United Mine Workers of America v. Gibbs, 383 U.S. 715, 86 S. Ct. 1130, 16 L. Ed. 2d 218 (1966); Taussig v. Wellington Fund, Inc., 313 F.2d 472 (3 Cir. 1963). We must agree completely with the said factual findings and the conclusion of the District Judge.

Finally, appellants assert that their actions can be justified "as an exercise of freedom of speech." The district court found on substantial evidence that the defendants [29] had violated the Sherman antitrust law by forcing the innocent storekeepers to boycott Otto's milk products and by intending as they did, after finishing with Otto, to continue in like fashion with the other processors and thus force its competitor distributor (DCSA) out of the Western Pennsylvania market. Giboney v. Empire Storage & Ice Co., 336 U.S. 490, 69 S. Ct. 684, 93 L. Ed. 834 (1949) gives us a totally comparable guide on this. There dealing with a violation [*799] of Missouri law for just such threats to retailers as confront us in the defendants' offenses against the Federal Antitrust Law the Court said, pp. 497-498, 69 S. Ct. p. 688:

> "It is contended that the injunction against picketing adjacent to Empire's place of business is an unconstitutional abridgment of free speech because the picketers were attempting peacefully to publicize truthful facts about a labor dispute. See Thornhill v. [State of] Alabama, 310 U.S. 88, 102 [60 S. Ct. 736, 744, 84 L. Ed. 1093,] and Allen Bradley Co. v. [Local] Union, 325 U.S. 797, 807, 89 L. Ed. 1939, 65 S. Ct. 1533, note 12, [325 U.S. 797, 65 S. Ct. 1533, 89 L. Ed. 1939]. [30] But the record here does not permit this publicizing to be treated in isolation. For according to the pleadings, the evidence, the findings, and the argument of the appellants, the sole immediate object of the publicizing adjacent to the premises of Empire, as well as the other activities of the appellants and their allies, was to compel Empire to agree to stop selling ice to nonunion peddlers. Thus all of appellants' activities -- their powerful transportation combination, their patrolling, their formation of a picket line warning union men not to cross at peril of their union membership, their publicizing -- constituted a single and integrated course of conduct, which was in violation of Missouri's valid law. In this situation, the injunction did no more than enjoin an offense against Missouri law, a felony.
>
> "It rarely has been suggested that HN2[] the constitutional freedom for speech and press extends its immunity to speech or writing used as an integral part of conduct in violation of a valid criminal statute. We reject the contention now. Nothing that was said or decided in any of the cases [31] relied on by appellants calls for a different holding."

Appellants under the guise of peaceful picketing have been found to have been transgressing Sections 1 and 2 of the Federal Antitrust law. The Court below determined that constitutional protection does not reach Sherman Act offenders. The contrary is not here urged. We find no merit in the last point of appellants.

At the time the plaintiff's motion for preliminary injunction was heard, the plaintiff agreed to waive its claim for damages and counsel fees in consideration of the defendants agreeing that the hearing and the record thereof be considered as the final hearing and record on the permanent injunction sought.

The judgment of the District Court will be affirmed.

End of Document

Vornado, Inc. v. Corning Glass Works

United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit

January 19, 1968, Filed

No. 16282

Reporter
388 F.2d 117 *; 1968 U.S. App. LEXIS 8342 ; 1968 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,344

Vornado, Inc. v. Corning Glass Works, Isaac Lehrhoff t/a I. Lehrhoff & Co., and H. Schultz & Sons

Core Terms

fair trade, stamp, exemption, trading stamp, retailers, consumer, redemption, merchandise, prices, retail store, fair trader, centers, dealers, abandoned, antitrust, products, sales

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > Public Enforcement > State Civil Actions

HN1[] Public Enforcement, State Civil Actions

The policy of the New Jersey Fair Trade Act, like that of other fair trade acts, is to prevent a destruction of the producer's good will, which is often established at great cost, it appearing that this good will and integrity of the product is best preserved in the eyes of the public by regulating the price at which the public can buy the product. The act introduced into the law the concept that the owner of a trade-marked article retained an interest in his commodity after he parted with ownership and that he was therefore entitled to protect his good will by preventing the resale of his product below a fixed minimum price.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Public Enforcement > State Civil Actions

HN2[] Public Enforcement, State Civil Actions

The New Jersey courts have held that a company maintaining a fair trade program may establish exemptions to those programs, provided that such exemptions are reasonable and have a certain or well-defined meaning. There must be an accommodation of the interests of the public, those of the businessmen subject to the fair trade enforcement, and the interests of the fair trader himself.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Public Enforcement > State Civil Actions

Civil Procedure > ... > Pretrial Judgments > Nonsuits > Voluntary Nonsuits

HN3[] Public Enforcement, State Civil Actions

A fair trader who uses his own fair traded products either alone or with non-fair traded items in promotional combination packages, abandons his right to fix prices . The New Jersey courts have held that under such circumstances the fair trader has indicated abandonment of his claim to protect the integrity of such fair trade items because of potential injury to retailers.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Public Enforcement > State Civil Actions

HN4[] Public Enforcement, State Civil Actions

New Jersey courts have held it to be no defense in a fair trade enforcement suit that the fair trader does not sell to all persons in the same class.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Public Enforcement > State Civil Actions

HN5[] Public Enforcement, State Civil Actions

New Jersey permits a fair trader to exempt some dealers from a price maintenance program if such exemption is consistent with the policy of the fair trade statute and not inequitable to those who become subject to the program.

Judges: [1] Biggs, Freedman and Seitz, Circuit Judges.

Opinion by: BIGGS

Opinion

[*119] Opinion of the Court

BIGGS, Circuit Judge:

The plaintiff-appellant, Vornado, Inc., has appealed from a judgment dismissing a complaint which alleged in substance that a resale price maintenance agreement entered into by the defendant-appellee, Corning Glass Works, with the defendant-appellees, the Lehroffs and with H. Schultz & Sons to enforce Corning's fair trade program constitutes a violation of the antitrust laws of the United States. An appeal also has been taken by Vornado from a judgment entered upon Corning's counterclaim restraining Vornado from violating the fair trade agreement referred to, made, as we have said, by Corning with Vornado. Jurisdiction is based on 15 U.S.C. § 15.

The prime issues presented are whether Corning forfeited its right to enforce its fair trade program against Vornado because of exemptions Corning has given to trading stamp companies, and further if Corning's exemptions to trading stamp companies be permitted, whether Vornado's own trading stamp program, referred to more particularly hereinafter, must also be deemed to be exempt.

The facts [2] were stipulated and are disclosed by Judge Wortendyke in his exhaustive opinion, 255 F. Supp. 216 (D.N.J. 1966). We state here only the facts which we deem necessary to decide the issues referred to. Corning is the manufacturer of a prestige line of ovenware and cookware. These items bear Corning's trademark and, as indicated, are subject to fair trade contracts that have been entered into by Corning in every State where such contracts are permitted by law. Corning has over 3,000 such contracts in New Jersey. Corning publishes its fair trade prices and employs personnel whose duty it is to enforce Corning's fair trade policies through shopping excursions and the warning of price cutters. During the period November 1957 to June 1965, Corning obtained 18 permanent injunctions in (New Jersey against violators of its fair trade prices.

Corning sells its products to wholesale-distributors such as Schultz and Lehroff who have agreed to resell those products at the fair trade prices established in wholesale fair trade contracts and to sell only to retailers who are franchised Corning dealers; i.e., to those retailers who have signed fair trade agreements with Corning. [3] Such agreements are lawful in New Jersey. N.J.S.A. 56:4-5. Vornado signed such an agreement with Corning and proceeded to purchase Corning Ware from Schultz and Lehroff.

Corning Ware is also sold by Corning to trading stamp companies. Corning's total sales to New Jersey dealers in 1964 were $1,874,000. Of these the sales to trading stamp companies totalled $185,000. These trading stamp companies have redemption centers throughout New Jersey, some in the vicinity of Vornado's retail stores known as "Two Guys from Harrison". The trading stamp companies sell their stamps to retail merchants who customarily give one stamp for each 10 cents of the price of the article purchased. Between $120 and $150's worth of merchandise is required to fill one stamp book, the difference being dependent on which trading company's stamps are employed. At times the retail stores will offer bonus stamps with the purchase of a particular item. Merchandise at a redemption center may only be obtained by presenting completed books for the desired item. Aside from monies used for the collection of taxes, the redemption centers will not accept cash to supplement a deficiency in the number of books [4] [*120] needed. A Corning Ware percolator for example requires 2 4/5 books of one stamp company or over $400 worth of purchases from the retail store issuing the stamps of that stamp company. Corning does not require the trading stamp companies to sign fair trade agreements, albeit Corning suggests values to be put on the stamps used to acquire Corning Ware but the trading stamp companies have not been required to, nor do they, abide by Corning's suggested valuations.

Vornado operates a program whereby its trading stamps are issued on food sales and also are redeemable in merchandise on sale at its retail stores. Unlike other trading stamp companies, Vornado advertises that a completed book containing its stamps is worth $2.25. [1]

[5] In respect to its own trading stamp books, in October of 1962, Vornado commenced a merchandising program for the sale of Corning products which resulted in sales at less than the fair trade prices of the merchandise. Vornado's advertisements stated, to employ an example, that "Your books [are] worth up to $14.50 on these Corning Ware One Book Specials." Below this legend there would be shown a "Corning Ware Homemaker Set", list price $29.95 available at "Two Guys" for $15.75 plus one book. [2] On such sales Vornado often made little or no profit and even took losses, the articles sold being used as "loss leaders". It is stipulated that trading stamp companies never assign such fluctuating values to their stamp books. As noted, the trading stamp companies never permit a combination cash-stamp book purchase.

Corning, upon learning of Vornado's merchandising campaign, sent a telegram to Vornado demanding that it stop such merchandising [6] campaigns. There were some negotiations but no agreement was reached. Corning then terminated Vornado's franchise and so informed its wholesalers-distributors who in turn ceased deliveries to Vornado. Vornado brought the suit at bar alleging, as we have said, violations of the antitrust laws, claiming treble damages and seeking injunctive relief. Corning and the other named defendants answered denying any antitrust law violations. Corning pleaded its fair trade agreement with Vornado and sought damages for breach of contract and injunctive relief.

The trial judge stated: "The provisions of the Fair Trade Agreements, between Corning and Vornado on the one hand, and Corning and each of its distributors on the other, were in all respects in conformity with the provisions of N.J.S.A. 56:4-5(1) and, therefore, within the exemptive proviso set forth in 15 U.S.C. § 1." 255 F. Supp. at 224. This

---

[1] The value assigned to books issued by the trading stamp companies is considered a trade secret. Because of this it is unlikely that one could determine a valuation for the stamps consistent with fair trade prices set by Corning. Such difficulty seems to be inherent in the nature of trading stamp operations.

[2] See Exhibit J 12, Appendix of Respondent Corning Glass Works reproduced.

finding by the court below is clearly correct. Thus, as hereinbefore stated the only issues before us are, first, whether Corning Glass, by exempting trading stamp dealers from its fair trade program, forfeited its right to maintain that program and thereby [7] abandoned its right to resort to judicial process to enforce its fair trade agreements; and, second, if that exemption be permitted, whether Corning must apply that exemption to Vornado's own stamp program. [3]

Because we do not find the exemption of the trading stamp companies [*121] by Corning to be outside the policy of the exception to the antitrust laws granted for State Fair Trade Acts provided by the Miller-Tydings Amendment to the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, we need address ourselves only to the scope of permissible exemption under New Jersey law.

HN1[] The policy of the New Jersey Fair Trade Act, like that of other fair trade acts, [8] is "to prevent a destruction of the producer's good will, which is often established at great cost. . .", it appearing that this good will and "integrity of the product is best preserved in the eyes of the public by regulating the price at which the public can buy the product." Menley & James Labs., Ltd. v. Vornado, Inc., 90 N.J. Super. 404, 411, 217 A. 2d 889, 893 (1966). "The act introduced into the law the concept that the owner of a trade-marked article retained an interest in his commodity after he parted with ownership and that he was therefore entitled to protect his good will be preventing the resale of his product below a fixed minimum price." Frank Fischer Corp. v. Ritz Drug Co., 129 N.J. Eq. 105, 107, 19 A. 2d 454, 456 (1941).

HN2[] The New Jersey courts have held that a company maintaining a fair trade program may establish exemptions to those programs, Burroughs Wellcome & Co. v. Weissbard, 129 N.J. Eq. 563, 20 A. 2d 445 (Chan. 1941), aff'd, 130 N.J. Eq. 605, 23 A. 2d 396 (E. & A. 1942), provided that such exemptions are reasonable and have a "certain or well-defined meaning". Texas Co. v. DiGaetano, 39 N.J. 120, 131, 187 A. 2d 721, 727 (1963). [9] There must be an accommodation of the interests of the public, those of the businessmen subject to the fair trade enforcement and the interests of the fair trader himself. For example in the Texas Co. case, supra, the Supreme Court of New Jersey refused to enforce a fair trade program where the exemption granted was too ambiguous for retailers to know who was included in the exemption thereby leaving retailers to sell below fair trade prices at their peril, nearly complete discretion seemingly resting in the fair trader as to the selling prices. The Court considered that under such circumstances "Upholding the fair trade agreement with its stated exemption would not serve to advance the protection of the good will symbolized by the producer's brand or trademark, nor would it afford an appropriate measure of protection to the retailers and the public." 39 N.J. at 132, 187 A. 2d at 727. See also Champion Spark Plug Co. v. T.G. Stores, Inc., 356 F.2d 462 (4 Cir. 1966).

The New Jersey courts also have concluded that HN3[] the fair trader has abandoned his right to fix prices by using his own fair traded products either alone or with non-fair traded items in promotional [10] combination packages. The New Jersey courts have held that under such circumstances the fair trader has indicated abandonment of his claim to protect the integrity of such fair trade items because of potential injury to retailers. Gillette Co. v. Two Guys from Harrison, Inc., 36 N.J. 342, 177 A. 2d 555 (1962).

In another line of decisions HN4[] New Jersey courts have held it to be no defense in a fair trade enforcement suit that the fair trader does not sell to all persons in the same class. For example, in Revlon Nail Enamel Corp. v. Charmley Drug Shop, 123 N.J. Eq. 301, 197 Atl. 661 (1938), the Court held that a fair trader could sell his items only to beauty shops and retail department stores and nontheless compel a drug store which had obtained such items in an undisclosed fashion not to sell below fair trade prices. The New Jersey Court held it to be no defense to an enforcement action that the fair trader refused to sell to drug retailers while selling to department stores.

We think that the essence of a fair trade program rests in large part on a somewhat elusive factor, viz., the status and integrity of the product in the mind of the consumer. In [11] order to determine the validity of Corning's exemption of trading stamp companies and its failure [*122] to exempt Vornado's program we must attempt to divine the effect of the exemption. We therefore turn again to the peculiar circumstances presented by the case at bar.

[3] Because we hold that Corning could properly exempt trading stamp companies from enforcement of its fair trade program and enforce its program against Vornado, we do not reach and voice no opinion on the question of whether Corning would be liable to Vornado under the Sherman Act if the trading stamp companies could not properly be exempted.

It seems clear that HN5[] New Jersey permits a fair trader to exempt some dealers from a price maintenance program if such exemption be consistent with the policy of the fair trade statute and not inequitable to those who become subject to the program.

We conclude that it cannot be fairly said that Corning's exemption to trading stamp companies is inconsistent with the policy of fair trade. A consumer obtaining a Corning Ware item at a stamp redemption center is unlikely to consider such an acquisition a denigration of the product acquired. As stated above such a consumer has to purchase between $120 and $150 worth of merchandise at the retail store to obtain one book of stamps. It is likely that a family will have to wait three to six months before being able to obtain, for example, a Corning Ware percolator. Moreover, the consumer has little means of comparing the value of the stamps redeemed with the established [12] fair trade value of Corning Ware. As we have said actual valuations are considered to be a trade secret by the stamp companies. Also, if the retailer offers bonus stamps with the purchase of a particular item the consumer may well attribute his good fortune to the item purchased at the retail store and not to the Corning Ware acquired by him perhaps some six months later. [4] We conclude that Corning's exemption of trading stamp companies is a reasonable classification and within the spirit of the New Jersey Fair Trade Act.

Since we have found that Corning has not abandoned the integrity of its items by the trading stamp company exemptions, we now must decide [13] whether such an exemption is inequitable to other persons subject to the program. Vornado contends that consumers who are able to obtain Corning products at stamp redemption centers will not buy the same product at retail dealers subject to Corning's fair trade program. We think Vornado's reliance on this argument is misplaced. Vornado surely may not complain that Corning supplies retail dealers other than "Two Guys" with Corning Ware for distribution to ultimate customers. It is not enough to show that some consumers will go to stamp redemption centers and not to "Two Guys". Vornado must also demonstrate that potential customers of "Two Guys" think they can obtain Corning Ware below fair trade prices by going to stamp redemption centers. As we have stated we think that the consumer does not draw such a conclusion simply because he has saved stamps issued by the traditional trading stamp companies and employs them to purchase Corning Ware. The consumer collects his stamps and must make a choice as to what product he desires and where he will acquire it. The consumer has great difficulty in accurately judging whether he achieves a better bargain by obtaining Corning Ware rather [14] than some other article at a stamp redemption center in comparison with purchasing those articles at a retail store. We must conclude that Vornado suffers no inequity by the exemption granted trading stamp companies by Corning and thus cannot succeed in claiming that Corning has forfeited its fair trade program.

Finally, Vornado contends that it is discriminatory for Corning to distinguish between stamps issued by "Two Guys" and stamps issued, for example, by Sperry & Hutchinson, a trading stamp company. In essence Vornado's contention is that although trading [*123] stamp exemptions may be proper and equitable they are applied discriminatorily since its own trading stamps do not receive the benefit of the exemption. There is no merit in this argument. Clearly, Vornado's stamp redemption program is unlike those developed by conventional trading stamp companies exempted by Corning. In fact, it is likely that an exemption to trading stamp programs such as Vornado's would result in an abandonment by Corning of its fair trade protection. Cf. Gillette Co. v. Two Guys from Harrison, supra. [5] Vornado allows mixed cash and stamp purchases. Consequently the separation [15] of the retail product by which one obtains the stamps and the redemption of the stamps for the fair traded item which normally preserves the integrity of that item is largely nullified. Moreover, the merchandising campaign developed by Vornado emphasizes the fair trade product whereas the bonus stamp system of the other retail stores emphasizes the retail product with which the consumer obtains the stamps and seems unconnected with the integrity of the fair trade item. It can hardly be doubted that a consumer replying to one of Vornado's advertisements is of the opinion that he is getting a lower price on Corning Ware. This goes to the heart of the fair trade protection granted manufacturers by the State of New Jersey. On the other hand, as stated before, a consumer obtaining an item at a conventional stamp redemption center is not likely to be so affected. Moreover, it is likely that in the minds of the consumers the availability of Corning Ware at the stamp redemption centers increases the value of the stamps, rather than decreases the value of Corning Ware.

---

[4] Corning includes as part of its fair trade agreements with retailers the requirement that stamps issued in connection with a sale of a Corning product shall not exceed 3% of the fair trade price of the product. This protects Corning items from being demeaned by the retailer offering large stamp bonuses in connection with a purchase of Corning Ware.

[5] We think that the result suggested, i.e., abandonment by Corning of its fair trade policy would almost necessarily result. Corning could not make an exception to Vornado's failure to preserve Corning's fair trade program and not give similar concessions to all retailers selling its products. Vornado's trading stamp program as operated by it seems to us obviously a price cutting ploy.

[16] From the evidence presented on the present record we must conclude that Corning has a valid fair trade program, has given a valid exemption to trading stamp companies and may enforce that program against Vornado.

Accordingly, the judgment of the court below will be affirmed in all respects.

United States v. Provident Nat'l Bank

United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania

February 12, 1968

Civil Action No. 40032

Reporter

280 F. Supp. 1 *; 1968 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12599 ; 1968 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,366

United States, Plaintiff v. Provident National Bank and Central-Penn National Bank of Philadelphia, Defendants and William B. Camp, Comptroller of the Currency (Intervenor)

Core Terms

banks, merger, four-county, convenience, anticompetitive, savings, commercial bank, concentration, deposits, effects, merge, wholesale, loans, retail, largest, proposed merger, customer, compete, ratio, financial institution, national bank, dollar, loan association, total deposit, commerce, geographic, mutual, competitors, realistic, resultant

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > Bank Mergers

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > Banking Interests

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > Clayton Act

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Merger Guidelines

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

HN1[] Financial Institutions, Bank Mergers

Under the Bank Merger Act of 1966, 12 U.S.C.S. § 1828(c)(5)(B), if the anticompetitive effects of a proposed merger are clearly outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served, the merger is saved.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Market Definition

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > Clayton Act

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Merger Guidelines

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

HN2[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

There is no requirement that courts, or the Department of Justice, has to decide upon an appropriate geographic market as a preliminary step in discovering whether a merger is anticompetitive. The government need prove only that there has been a merger between two corporations engaged in commerce, and that the merger may have a substantial anticompetitive effect somewhere in the United States. It (the Department of Justice) is no longer forced to prove what constitutes the relevant economic or geographic market.

Banking Law > Bank Activities > General Overview

HN3[] Banking Law, Bank Activities

Wholesale banking is that which deals with a number of large accounts, primarily with large corporations, governmental bodies, financial institutions, and wealthy individuals, while retail banking caters to the mass needs of the general public and small business.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > Clayton Act

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Merger Guidelines

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > Banking Interests

HN4[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

For antitrust purposes, determination of the local market shares of constituent banks is not a simple matter of subtracting what has been determined to be the percentage of their deposits and loans which are allocable to the national market from their total deposits and loans. Manifestly, the true local market is the total deposits and loans of all the banks located in the metropolitan area, less the aggregate of their deposits and loans which originate in the national market.

Banking Law > ... > Banking & Finance > Commercial Banks > Mergers & Consolidations

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Market Definition

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > Clayton Act

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Merger Guidelines

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > Banking Interests

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Regulated Industry Mergers

HN5[] Commercial Banks, Mergers & Consolidations

For antitrust purposes in banking that the relevant geographical market is a function of each separate customer's economic scale means simply that a workable compromise must be found: some fair intermediate delineation which avoids the indefensible extremes of drawing the market either so expansively as to make the effect of the merger upon competition seem insignificant, because only the very largest bank customers are taken into account in defining the market, or so narrowly as to place appellees in different markets, because only the smallest customers are considered.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > General Overview

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > Bank Creations & Reorganizations

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > Clayton Act

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Merger Guidelines

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > General Overview

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > Banking Interests

Banking Law > ... > Banking & Finance > Commercial Banks > Mergers & Consolidations

HN6[] Regulated Industries, Financial Institutions

For purposes of antitrust analysis for a proposed bank merger, the deposit base examined must be expanded to take into account saving and loan associations and mutual savings banks. Unlike the competition for wholesale accounts, all commercial banks, plus saving and loan associations and mutual savings banks, compete for the savings dollar, and residential mortgages.

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Standards of Review > De Novo Review > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > Clayton Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > Bank Mergers

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Merger Guidelines

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > Bank Creations & Reorganizations

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > Banking Interests

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Regulated Industry Mergers

HN7[] Standards of Review, De Novo Review

One purpose of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 18, is to arrest the trends toward concentration or monopoly, before the consumer's alternatives disappear by mergers. Potential competition must also be preserved. Therefore, it is not sufficient to prove only that the banks involved in a proposed merger do not actually compete. It must also be proven that they probably will never compete or have the potential to compete.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > Clayton Act

Banking Law > ... > Banking & Finance > Commercial Banks > Mergers & Consolidations

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > Bank Mergers

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Merger Guidelines

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > General Overview

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > Bank Creations & Reorganizations

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > Banking Interests

HN8[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

In regard to antitrust analysis involving a proposed bank merger, the purpose of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 18, and the courts in enforcing the statute, is to preserve competition between the successful and unsuccessful providers of these banking services. The choice to bank where the customer pleases must be preserved and the gradual elimination of potential or actual competitors takes away competitive options which the customer should have.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Scope

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > Clayton Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > Bank Mergers

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Merger Guidelines

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Regulated Industry Mergers

HN9[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

Taken as a whole, the legislative history of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 18, illuminates congressional concern with the protection of competition, not competitors, and its desire to restrain mergers only to the extent that such combinations may tend to lessen competition.

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > Clayton Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Merger Guidelines

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Regulated Industry Mergers

HN10[] Antitrust Statutes, Clayton Act

Under the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 18, if a market can be characterized as oligopolistic, any merger that strengthens the oligopolistic structure must be struck down.

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > Clayton Act

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Merger Guidelines

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Market Definition

HN11[] Antitrust Statutes, Clayton Act

Any merger producing a firm controlling twenty-five percent of the relevant market is presumptively bad.

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > Clayton Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Merger Guidelines

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

HN12[] Antitrust Statutes, Clayton Act

One purpose of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 18, is to arrest a trend toward concentration or a tendency toward monopoly, before the consumers' alternatives disappear through mergers. Thus, the court must not focus only on the effect of a proposed merger in the present, but must scan the horizon to see what lies ahead.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > Clayton Act

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Merger Guidelines

HN13[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

The basic purpose of federal antitrust law, including the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 18, is to prevent economic concentration in the American economy by keeping a large number of small competitors in business. The only exceptions to this rule are where one of the companies is about to fail, or where two companies have to merge to save themselves from destruction by some larger and more powerful competitors.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > Bank Mergers

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > Banking Interests

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Regulated Industry Mergers

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > Clayton Act

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Merger Guidelines

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

HN14[] Financial Institutions, Bank Mergers

The Bank Merger Act of 1966, 12 U.S.C.S. § 1828(c)(7)(B), carves out a new exception or defense to anticompetitive mergers in the form of the convenience and needs test. This defense or justification is available to merging banks once it has been determined that the proposed merger would be anticompetitive as judged by normal antitrust standards.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > Bank Mergers

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > Banking Interests

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Regulated Industry Mergers

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > Clayton Act

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Merger Guidelines

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

HN15[] Financial Institutions, Bank Mergers

Under the convenience and needs test of the Bank Merger Act of 1966, 12 U.S.C.S. § 1828(c)(7)(B), anticompetitive mergers should be approved only in those few instances where the anticompetitive effects are overwhelmed by the more compelling needs of the community.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > Bank Mergers

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > Banking Interests

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > Clayton Act

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Merger Guidelines

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > General Overview

HN16[] Financial Institutions, Bank Mergers

The most common application of the convenience and needs test under the Bank Merger Act of 1966, 12 U.S.C.S. § 1828(c)(7)(B), and the one primarily intended by Congress, is the floundering or stagnating bank.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > Bank Mergers

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > Banking Interests

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > Clayton Act

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Merger Guidelines

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > General Overview

HN17[] Financial Institutions, Bank Mergers

The convenience and needs test under the Bank Merger Act of 1966, 12 U.S.C.S. § 1828(c)(7)(B), must be read restrictively. It is not a mandate for mergers between banks across the board. It merely allows bank mergers in those cases where the needs and convenience of the community are so compelling that competition will be enhanced rather than decreased by the merger. This will occur in only a very few instances.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > Bank Mergers

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > Banking Interests

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > Clayton Act

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Merger Guidelines

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > General Overview

HN18[] Financial Institutions, Bank Mergers

The Bank Merger Act of 1966, 12 U.S.C.S. § 1828(c)(5)(B), requires that the anticompetitive effects of the proposed transaction must be clearly outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served.

Judges: [1] Clary, Chief Judge

Opinion by: CLARY

Opinion

[*3] CLARY, Chief Judge:

This case involves a proposed merger between the Provident National Bank and the Central-Penn National Bank, both of the City of Philadelphia, Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. It is being challenged by the Department of Justice as being in violation of the antitrust laws of the United States. The case was tried to the Court without a jury. In making a decision in this case, the Court is faced with the dilemma so ably stated by that noted legal scholar, John H. Wigmore, the late Professor and Dean of Northwestern University School of Law, and author of "Wigmore on Evidence", that "law and justice are from time to time inevitably in conflict." [1]

---

[1] This quotation is taken from an article by Professor Wigmore in the April, 1929, issue of The Journal of The American Judicature Society, reading in part as follows: "Law and justice are from time to time inevitably in conflict. That is because law is a general rule (even the stated exceptions to the rules are general exceptions); while justice is the fairness of this precise case

[2] [*4] The dilemma confronting the Court is that the Court firmly believes that a jury would have no difficulty in finding qualitatively that the proposed merger would be a good merger; good for the banks in that they would complement each other in both location and services; good for the community in that it would create another billion dollar bank in Philadelphia with its attendant advantages, particularly in the field of international finance; put real depth into the management of the surviving bank; generate more intense competition in the oligopolistic banking structure of Philadelphia, and might well make some improvement in the economic status of business in the Philadelphia area generally, and specifically its port facilities and operation. However, because of the quantitative (mechanical rules) approach to the question of antitrust violations declared as a policy [2] by the Supreme Court and its decisions supporting that policy, this Court is constrained, albeit reluctantly, to declare that this merger may not be consummated.

[3] The Facts

On December 6, 1965, Provident National Bank (hereinafter Provident) and Central-Penn National Bank (hereinafter Central-Penn) filed with the Comptroller of the Currency an application to merge. Pursuant to Title 12 U.S.C. § 1828(c)(4), the Comptroller requested advisory reports from the other Government agencies, Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (hereinafter F.D.I.C.) and Federal Reserve Board (hereinafter F.R.B.), and the Department of Justice (hereinafter Justice). The F.D.I.C. filed no report, but both F.R.B. and Justice reported that the merger's effect on competition would be significantly adverse and therefore should not be approved.

Prior to the Comptroller's decision on this merger, the Bank Merger Act of 1960 (hereinafter B.M.A. 1960) was amended by Congress on February 21, 1966. HN1[] The amended Act (hereinafter B.M.A. 1966) created a new defense for anticompetitive mergers in that if the anticompetitive effects of the proposed merger are clearly outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served, the merger is saved. Title 12 U.S.C. § 1828(c)(5)(B). The amended [4] Act also deleted the words "line of commerce" which were present in B.M.A. 1960, thus leaving open the question whether commercial banking is still to be considered as the area of effective competition. See United States v. First City National Bank of Houston, 386 U.S. 361, 369, f.n. 1, 18 L. Ed. 2d 151, 87 S. Ct. 1088 (1967).

On March 4, 1966, soon after B.M.A. 1966 was enacted into law, the Comptroller approved the proposed merger between Provident and Central-Penn. A formal decision containing the reasons for such approval followed on March 31, 1966.

Justice, on April 1, 1966, then instituted suit under Section 7 of the Clayton Act (15 U.S.C. § 18), alleging that the proposed merger was anticompetitive under traditional Section 7 standards and therefore should be proscribed. The Comptroller was allowed to intervene in this suit by virtue of Title 12 U.S.C. § 1828(c)(7)(D).

The suit was dismissed by this Court on December 29, 1966 on the basis that Justice chose to rely solely on Section 7 of the Clayton Act without regard to the new standards enunciated by B.M.A. 1966. United States v. Provident National Bank, et al., 262 F. Supp. 397 (E.D. Pa. 1966).

[*5] The Supreme [5] Court reversed this decision in United States v. First City National Bank of Houston, supra. The Court ruled that the Government's failure to rely on B.M.A. 1966 was not a fatal defect in its pleadings since anticompetitive effects of such mergers were still to be assessed by traditional antitrust criteria. The only under all its circumstances. . . . Law-the rule-MUST be enforced-the exact terms of the rule, justice or no justice. . . . Now this is where the jury comes in. The jury, in the privacy of its retirement, adjusts the general rule of law to the justice of the particular case. Thus the odium of inflexible rules of law is avoided, and popular satisfaction is preserved. . . . That is what jury trial does. It supplies that flexibility of legal rules which is essential to justice and popular contentment. And that flexibility could never be given by judge trial. The judge . . . must write out his opinion, declaring the law and the findings of fact. He cannot in this public record deviate one jot from those requirements. The jury, and the secrecy of the jury room, are the indispensable elements in popular justice."

---

[2] See Professor Handler's scholarly article "The Supreme Court and the Antitrust Laws: A Critic's Viewpoint", 1 Georgia L. Rev., 339, 1967.

effect the amended Act had on these traditional criteria was that of creating a new defense or justification to a merger in the convenience and needs test previously mentioned. United States v. First City National Bank of Houston, supra, 386 U.S. at 363. It also ruled that the burden of proving this new defense was upon the proponents of the merger-the banks in this instance. The case was then remanded to this Court.

Before discussing the legal questions presented by this merger, it would be wise to have the respective positions and histories of the merging banks in view.

Provident is presently the fifth largest bank in the four-county area comprising Bucks, Montgomery, Delaware, and Philadelphia counties. As of June 30, 1965, Provident controlled approximately $683,000,000 or 9% of the total assets, $398,000,000 or 9% of the total loans, $475,000,000 or 9% of the [6] total IPC deposits, and 32 or 9% of the banking offices in the four-county area.

Since 1947, Provident has acquired seven banks in the four-county area. As of April 5, 1966, these acquired banks' assets constituted 58% of Provident's present asset position.

As of June 30, 1965, Central-Penn, the seventh largest commercial bank in the four-county area, controlled approximately $369,000,000 or 5% of the total assets, $210,000,000 or 5% of the total loans, $263,000,000 or 5% of the total IPC deposits, $170,000,000 or 5% of the total IPC demand deposits, and 24 or 6% of the banking offices.

Central-Penn has acquired six commercial banks in the four-county area since 1950. No less than 24% of its present asset position is attributable to these mergers and acquisitions.

These facts must be viewed in the over-all setting of commercial banking in the four-county area. In 1945, there were 115 commercial banks in the four-county area. In 1960, there were 45. In 1965, the number of commercial banks was reduced to 37.

On December 31, 1945, the five largest commercial banks held 51% of the total assets, 54% of the total loans, 52% of the total deposits, and had 15% of the total banking [7] offices. In 1965, the five largest banks controlled approximately 73% of the assets, 74% of the total loans, 71% of IPC deposits, and 57% of all banking offices. Thus, there has been a substantial reduction of independent commercial banks, most of which have disappeared through the merger route. The trend is continuing as evidenced by Girard Trust Bank's recent announcement of intent to merge with Doylestown National Bank, and Continental Bank's announcement of intent to merge with Sonsitaly Bank and Trust Company. Since these acquired banks represent only a small percentage of area assets, loans, and banking offices, it may be questioned whether these mergers will be challenged by Justice.

If this merger were approved, the resultant bank would become the fourth largest bank in the four-county area, controlling approximately 14% of the total assets, loans and deposits in the four-county area, and 15% of the commercial banking offices in the four-county area. The five bank concentration ratio previously mentioned will increase from 73.1% to 77.7% in terms of assets, 73.1% to 77.8% in terms of deposits, 73.9% to 78.6% in terms of loans, and from 57% to 63.3% in terms of total offices.

[8] With these facts in view, we shall now turn to our first level of inquiry, which is whether the proposed merger between Provident and Central-Penn is anticompetitive, when measured by traditional Clayton Section 7 standards.

Before assessing the competitive effects of this merger, however, it is necessary to delineate a geographic market [*6] within which to assess the impact of this merger.

The Relevant Geographic Market

The four-county area of Bucks, Montgomery, Delaware, and Philadelphia, has been proposed by the Government as the relevant "section of the country" for this case. The Government's contention is grounded on the following facts: The defendant banks may not establish branch offices in any other area. The convenience factor localizes the area of competition, at least for retail customers. The Government also introduced statistics showing that by number, 95% of Provident's total deposit accounts are within the four-county area, and 98% of Central-Penn's total deposit accounts are located within the same area. In terms of dollar volume, 82% of Provident's total deposits are within the four-county area, while Central-Penn has 88% of its dollar volume for total [9] deposits within the same area. So by number and by value, the four-county area appears to be a relevant section of the country. This evidence indicates to us that the four-county area is the most appropriate section of the country where the effect of the merger will be direct and immediate. United States v. Philadelphia National Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 357, 10 L. Ed. 2d 915, 83 S. Ct. 1715 (1963) (hereinafter PNB).

The defendant banks accede to the Government's geographic market since it is a permissible "section of the country" for purposes of B.M.A. 1966. In so acceding, the banks feel that the case of United States v. Pabst Brewing Co., 384 U.S. 546, 16 L. Ed. 2d 765, 86 S. Ct. 1665 (1966) controls. This is undoubtedly correct. HN2[] In Pabst, the Supreme Court did away with the requirement that Courts, or the Department of Justice, had to decide upon an appropriate geographic market as a preliminary step in discovering whether a merger was anticompetitive. The Government need prove only that there has been a merger between two corporations engaged in commerce, and that the merger may have a substantial anticompetitive effect somewhere in the United States. United States [10] v. Pabst Brewing Co., supra, at 549. It (the Department of Justice) is no longer forced to prove what constitutes the relevant economic or geographic market.

The Comptroller of the Currency disagrees with the assertion that the four-county area is a relevant geographic market. He contends that the Standard Metropolitan Statistical Area (SMSA), which comprises the three New Jersey counties of Gloucester, Camden, and Burlington, and the five Pennsylvania counties of Philadelphia, Delaware, Montgomery, Bucks, and Chester, is more relevant. The Comptroller states that he is not bound by the Supreme Court's ruling in PNB, supra, as to what constitutes the relevant geographic market on the basis that in this case, a different factual record has been developed. This is true, but the Comptroller has neglected to point to any compelling facts which would necessitate a change from the PNB standard. One of the mainstays of the Comptroller's argument is the Bureau of the Budget's definition of a metropolitan area as "an integrated economic and social unit with a recognized large population nucleus." (N.T. 3119). Yet, Frank A. Cisar, of the Bureau of the Budget, and Chairman of [11] the Committee on Area Definitions, admitted upon cross-examination that the SMSA in itself cannot be equated with a marketing area, since no two market areas are the same. (N.T. 3127).

While it is true that many persons from the excluded counties of Chester, Burlington, Camden, and Gloucester, work and shop in the four-county area, the statistics introduced by the Comptroller proved only that the banking done in the four-county area is minimal. [3]

[*7] Therefore, we find that the four-county area is the appropriate section of the country for the purposes of this case. The only caveat to our finding that the four-county area is the appropriate geographic market [12] is that within this geographic market, there must be a distinction made between wholesale accounts, which, in some cases, should be relegated to the national market, and retail accounts which essentially are relegated to the local community. This awareness of the so-called national market is not a new concept. The Supreme Court referred to such a market in PNB when it scaled down the Department of Justice's concentration figures by approximately 16% because of accounts which should have been allocated to the national, rather than the four-county market. PNB, supra, 374 U.S. at 364.

This problem was also in the forefront when the House was considering the amended B.M.A. In the Report which accompanied the House Bill to the Senate, the concept of a national market was placed in clear view. Under the heading "The relevant market", the House Report stated:

> "A recurrent bone of contention in the development of general antitrust law is the problem of defining the relevant market. Sometimes this is easy, as in the case of automobile manufacturers whose market is clearly > national, or laundries whose market is clearly local. It is not so easy in the case of the larger banks, [13] which serve a local market of individuals and small businesses, but which are also competing in the regional or national financial markets for the opportunity to place large loans with major corporations which are shopping the country for funds." 112 Cong.Rec. 2440 (Feb. 8, 1966).

[3] A canvas of Philadelphia Saving Fund Society's accounts revealed that 2.84% by number came from the excluded counties. The reason Philadelphia Saving Fund Society was used as a sampling device was that it was the only financial institution in the four-county area which broke down its accounts on a county basis. (Intervenor's brief p. 30).

Therefore, in finding the four-county area as the appropriate geographic market, we do so with an awareness that not all accounts found and assessed in this market are allocable to it. Some adjustment must and will be made when we discuss the effect of this dichotomy (i.e., national and local markets) under our "Anticompetitive Effects" heading.

The Relevant Product Market

Our next level of inquiry before delving into the competitive aspects of this merger is the ascertainment of the appropriate line of commerce within which this merger is to be viewed.

Justice maintains that commercial banking is still the appropriate product market in which to assess this merger's competitive effects. In essence, it relies on the Supreme Court's ruling in PNB where the unique cluster of products and services offered by commercial banks was held sufficiently distinctive to constitute a relevant product market. [14] However, since the PNB decision, as stated above, B.M.A. 1960 has been amended and the phrase "line of commerce" has been deleted. The Supreme Court, in United States v. First City National Bank of Houston, supra, at 369, f.n. 1, expressly left open the question whether this omission was significant.

Two lower Courts have split on the significance of this omission. In United States v. Third National Bank of Nashville, 260 F. Supp. 869, 878, n. 5 (M.D. Tenn. 1966), prob. juris. noted, 388 U.S. 905, 87 S. Ct. 2111, 18 L. Ed. 2d 1345 (1967), the lower Court noted that such an important change in established antitrust law cannot be presumed to have been made by a mere omission, and also cites the lack of any significant legislative history in support thereof. It held that commercial banking was still the appropriate "line of commerce".

Judge Zirpoli, in United States v. Crocker-Anglo National Bank, F. Supp., filed October 30, 1967, took the opposite view and ruled that a [*8] broader test was intended by Congress in amending B.M.A. 1960. Relying on the canons of statutory construction, and a statement by Senator Robertson in the legislative history as to the effect of the [15] omission in the statutory language, the District Court in California construed a broader line of commerce which comprises all institutions competing either for the savings or investment dollar or for the extension of credit.

This Court is persuaded by Judge Zirpoli's lucid analysis of this vexing problem presently before this Court. We are convinced that Congress did intend a change to be effected by the omission. A thorough examination of the legislative history and the House Committee Report reveals that the effect of this omission was not discussed in the House, but Senator Robertson dealt with this omission on several occasions during the Senate debates.

> "The text of paragraph (B) of the new bill follows the terms of section 1 of the Sherman Act and section 7 of the Clayton Act, with the exception that the reference to 'any line of commerce' in the Clayton Act is not carried over into the new bill. In this respect the new bill resembles the Bank Merger Act of 1960, and calls for an appraisal of the overall effects of the merger on competition, weighing increases of competition in one field against decreases in competition in another field. The banking agencies and the [16] courts, in other words, are not intended and are not permitted to select some single, perhaps minor aspect of the banks' business and to say that, because there is some lessening of competition in this element of the business, the overall effects of the merger-the increase of competition in the entire field of banking and in the broader field of financial institutions which may result from other aspects of the merger-are irrelevant and may not be considered." See Statements of Senator Robertson, 112 Cong. Rec., 2541, 2549-50, (Feb. 9, 1966).

In so broadening the line of commerce, this Court is very much aware of the uniqueness of commercial banks in that they are the only financial institutions permitted by law which can accept demand deposits and service them. It is clear from this unique function that certain other financial services necessarily follow, such as payroll and lock box services to the corporation customer. It is also evident that commercial banks are insulated for the most part from direct competition in the area of trust services, corporate pension funds, etc. However, the inter-relationship of all these services is not so tightly bound or localized to preclude [17] meaningful and direct competition from other financial institutions within or without the four-county area.

It was admitted by Doctor Donald R. Hodgman, one of plaintiff's expert witnesses, upon cross-examination, that in the area of mortgages, loans and savings, there are other alternative, and sometimes better, sources than commercial banks, such as mutual savings banks and saving and loan associations. (N.T. 48-49).

It was also pointed out by several witnesses that the competition for the savings dollar has intensified among commercial banks, mutual savings banks and saving and loan associations in the four-county area, and the nation as a whole. This competition was evidenced particularly by the Certificate of Deposit see-saw which took place in the four-county area during the latter part of 1965 and 1966. This competition for the savings dollar is of particular significance since the deposit base of commercial banks has undergone a drastic change in recent years. In 1960, the proportion between demand and time deposits nationally was 70:30. Today, it is 50:50. Thus, one-half of a bank's deposits are subject to competition, not only from other commercial banks, but [18] mutuals and saving and loan associations as well.

Since there is a reasonable interchangeability and meaningful competition for the savings dollar and mortgage loans, such competition from other financial [*9] institutions must be considered in order to get a true competitive picture. The factor of convenience, which predominates the retail banking business, does not alter this conclusion, since the offices of these other financial institutions are as widespread and convenient as the commercial banking offices.

In extending the line of commerce only to these financial institutions (mutuals and saving and loan associations) because they alone offer direct and meaningful competition to commercial banks, our reasoning for so doing is buttressed by the Supreme Court's ruling in United States v. Continental Can Co. et al., 378 U.S. 441, 12 L. Ed. 2d 953, 84 S. Ct. 1738 (1964). In that case, the nation's second largest producer of cans desired to merge with the third largest producer of glass containers. There the Court found that Section 7 is not limited to identical products and lumped together the glass and container industries into one product market. It did so realizing [19] the only actual competition between these two industries was primarily in the beer market, although potentially, they were competitors in broader markets. The Court emphasized cross-elasticity of demand and interchangeability of use as its reason for doing so. United States v. Continental Can Co. et al., supra, at 453. This reason exists, to a pronounced degree, in the situation at hand, only the competition is more direct and meaningful. If such interchangeability can be used negatively in antitrust jurisprudence, surely the same concept can be used positively. The underlying question remains the same in each instance, i.e., to construct reasonable product markets in which to measure probable competitive effects realistically.

Therefore, since it is no longer true that commercial banks enjoy a "settled consumer preference" for the savings dollar, PNB, supra, 374 U.S. at 357, the line of commerce must be broadened in this respect. Competition from life insurance companies, finance companies, lawyers for trust services, etc., should not be considered since the competition is not direct, [4] and such a consideration would extend the product market to an unrealistic range.

[20] Furthermore, this Court has heard no compelling evidence and has observed no noted changes from the PNB situation during the trial of this case in competition from these other sources to extend the product market any further.

The Anticompetitive Effects of This Merger

---

[4] A case in point is finance companies which allegedly compete with commercial banks in the consumer loan field. However, the rates of interest at a finance company are substantially higher (N.T. 50) and the majority of a finance company's source of funds is derived from commercial banks. Thus, finance companies cannot be said to be in direct competition with commercial banks, since they derive most of their lendable funds from commercial banks and assume loan risks which commercial banks would be unwilling to take.

We can now turn to the crucial question in this case, which is whether the proposed merger between Provident and Central-Penn is anticompetitive.

Various approaches have been suggested and used in judging whether a proposed merger is anticompetitive. The approach adopted by Justice in this case and accepted by the Courts traditionally is what is termed the "structural approach" to antitrust analysis. Given a certain industry structure, the structuralists contend that one can reasonably predict a kind of ultimate economic performance the industry is likely to turn in. This prediction is more valid when the composition of the industry remains static and new firms are not entering at a fast rate. Adopting this structural position, some legal commentators have tried to discern at which concentration [*10] level a merger should be outlawed. [5]

[21] The exact purpose of Section 7 is hard to pin down since the word "competition", under the statute, has been given various shades of meaning by the Courts and the Governmental agencies. The predominant view was that Congress, in enacting Section 7, was concerned with maintaining the "little guy" in business on the premise that the dispersion of economic power in the hands of many is salutary.

However, recent Supreme Court decisions in the merger area indicate that a pronounced shift in emphasis has occurred. Although Congress is still concerned with protecting small businesses from the overreaching grasps of corporate giants, it has extended its concern to the consumer. Thus, mergers are no longer considered solely as some kind of wrong against the small businessman, but also as a welfare loss to the consumer. United States v. El Paso Natural Gas Co., 376 U.S. 651, 12 L. Ed. 2d 12, 84 S. Ct. 1044 (1964); see also Dixon, supra, generally.

In contending that the proposed merger between Provident and Central-Penn is anticompetitive, Justice adopts a structural position pointing to the rising tide of concentration among commercial banks which is taking place in the four-county [22] area. Basically, the approach of the Supreme Court and Justice has been one focusing on the structure of the respective markets. If the structure of the market examined is highly concentrated, Justice contends inferentially in positing the structure that the incentive for independent decisions and competitive behavior is destroyed. The advantages of such an approach are apparent. It lends itself to easy application since positing a certain market share or concentration ratio, anticompetitive effects can be affirmed or denied. It is clear to us that the antitrust standards utilized in merger cases have not been changed by BMA 1966 [6] and that therefore the [5] Derek Bok, after examining the various structural approaches, felt that Courts or agencies, in assessing mergers, should look to the change that has taken place in the aggregate share possessed by the largest firms in the market. The number of firms selected for this purpose should be large enough to include the acquiring firm. The merger should then be disallowed if the aggregate share of the market following the acquisition substantially exceeds (by 7%-8% or more) the aggregate share of the market controlled by the same number of firms at any time during a period reasonably prior to the acquisition, e.g., (5-10 years). This rule should be subject to an exception where the share of the acquiring firm following the merger is no larger than it was in the base period. Bok, supra.

---

George Stigler, in his article "Mergers and Preventive Antitrust Policy", 104 U. of Pa. L. Rev. 176 (1955), also dealt with concentration ratios and the question of at what point should mergers be deemed violative of Section 7. The center of controversy, according to Stigler, arises somewhere in between what can be characterized as a competitive industry where the largest firm controls 10% or less of output and the non-competitive industries where 2-5 firms control 75% or more of output. Every merger which produces a firm controlling 20% of the industry's output should be presumed violative under the statute. In other mergers below this proscriptive percentage, several factors must be examined: (1) ease of entry into the market, (2) rate of industry growth, and (3) closeness of substitute products made by other industries.

[6] Congressman Patman stated in 112 Cong.Rec. 2334 (Feb. 8, 1966) that "It should be made very clear that there is no intent on the part of the (House) Committee to change the application of the antitrust laws as they apply to bank mergers. If the Committee had wanted to do this, it would simply have exempted bank mergers from the application of antitrust laws . . . . This bill is intended to have the effect of making the bank supervisory agencies give substantially more emphasis to the antitrust standards in determining the competitive effects of a merger than they did under the 1960 law . . .."

The only effect this amended Act has upon traditional antitrust law is that for bank mergers, the anticompetitive standard is no longer to be the sole criterion for adjudging the merits of the merger. Courts must also consider convenience and needs. (Senator Robertson, p. 2538).

structural [*11] analysis posited by Justice in this case is valid. But it doesn't necessarily follow that the structure to be examined by this standard must remain the same.

[23] Our disagreement with Justice's analysis lies not with its initial approach, but on the data and statistics it has poured into this accepted structural analysis. We admit under current antitrust standards enunciated by the Supreme Court that if certain market shares are proved and are realistic, anticompetitive effects can be deduced from such shares. [7] [24] It has been stated by Justice that the merged bank would control 14% of the appropriate market, a share which must be proscribed. Additionally, it has been pointed out that the concentration ratio among the five largest banks in the four-county area will be increased from 73% to 78%. This factor, coupled with the entry barriers to commercial banking, especially in the Philadelphia market, [8] will produce a highly oligopolistic banking structure, which will stifle competition and lead to a further reduction of individual competitors in the commercial banking market.

However, the Clayton Act and the Bank Merger Act are concerned with arresting mergers with anticompetitive effects. In so construing these Acts, this Court cannot close its eyes to competition from other sources or other areas which operate in the four-county area.

In shying away from the simplistic approach applied in PNB and other merger cases, we feel the need to do so is compelled by the uniqueness of commercial banking as an industry. A brief illustration might make this point more clearly.

Unlike two individual steel producers from different counties or states, two individual commercial banks from the same counties do not always compete for the same retail or wholesale customer. This is so because of the convenience factor on the retail level and the differences in services offered by large and small commercial banks on the wholesale level. Thus, concentration ratios for non-banking industries are more realistic in [25] that competition is usually more even and equal and all firms dealing in that one or several products are justifiably lumped together. This is not true with commercial banks. A case in point are the saving and loan associations and mutual savings banks, which offer the same product as a commercial bank in time and savings accounts, yet are excluded from Justice's market structure.

In order to get a true picture of the competition for the dollar in the four-county area, it is useful to break down commercial banking into two sub-products-wholesale and retail banking. HN3[] Wholesale banking is that which deals with a number of large accounts, primarily with large corporations, governmental bodies, financial institutions, and wealthy individuals, while retail banking caters "to the mass needs of the general public and small business." United States v. Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co., 240 F. Supp. 867, 896 (S.D.N.Y. 1965).

With this breakdown of commercial banking, it becomes clear why the Government's concentration ratios and market shares are invalid. We are sure the Government would not contend that the Bank of King of Prussia competes with First Pennsylvania Banking and Trust Company [26] or Philadelphia National Bank for international or large corporate accounts. Yet, all of these figures and accounts are lumped together in one hodge-podge of percentages from which we are to deduce anticompetitive effects.

[*12] This breakdown of commercial banking into subproducts does produce some analytical problems. The question invariably arises as to what accounts within the two banks before us fall into the wholesale market level and secondly, whether such wholesale accounts are subject to competition from without the four-county area.

We do not think it can be questioned that some accounts of a large commercial city bank should be placed in a national market. Put another way, it is clear that the corporations and individuals presently maintaining large [7] United States v. Philadelphia National Bank, supra; United States v. First National Bank & Trust Co. of Lexington, 376 U.S. 665, 12 L. Ed. 2d 1, 84 S. Ct. 1033 (1964); United States v. Continental Can Co. et al., supra.

[8] Since World War II, only three new commercial banks have been established in the four-county area. Another new commercial bank will be opened this year.

accounts in both Provident and Central-Penn have alternative and convenient sources for deposits or loans outside the four-county area.

The defendant banks, in support of this national market for wholesale accounts, point us to a Federal Reserve System report which refers to the composition of the national credit market. While agreeing that not all corporate accounts are national in nature, the banks contend [27] that a bulk of a corporation's large loans and related deposit balances can be relegated to this market. Also, some bank services are so specialized, i.e., international business and pension trust services, that they can be obtained only from large sophisticated banks in the national market. Such specialized or large accounts are sought eagerly by banks across the nation as evidenced by advertisements published by leading banks in periodicals of national circulation. (See defendants' Exhibit 49). Aside from this fact, we also heard direct testimony from corporate officials in the Philadelphia area that they bank in New York City, Boston, or elsewhere, to obtain unusually large loans or sophisticated and expert advice and are solicited by banks across the country for their banking business. [9]

Upon arriving at a national market for certain accounts, the problem which then confronts us is just what [28] accounts should be placed in the national market. Defendants assert that the following accounts should be included:

"(a) Demand deposits over $100,000;
(b) All time open accounts and corporate certificates of deposit;
(c) Savings accounts and certificates over $10,000;
(d) Time deposits of municipalities and correspondent banks over $100,000;
(e) Real estate loans over $100,000;
(f) All securities loans and loans to financial institutions;
(g) Commercial and industrial loans over $100,000;
(h) Consumer loans purchased from large dealers;
(i) Single payment loans over $25,000; and
(j) Other loans over $100,000."

Admittedly, the above accounts are substantially those adopted in United States v. Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co., supra, at 921. However, the same problem which existed in that case exists here to a greater degree. The defendant banks have given us the national market shares of Provident and Central-Penn, but they have not carried their analysis further to include the national market shares of the other large commercial banks in the four-county area.

> "Determination HN4[] of the local market shares of the constituent banks, however, is not a simple matter [29] of subtracting what we have determined to be the percentage of their deposits and loans which are allocable to the national market from their total deposits and loans. Manifestly the true local market is the total deposits and loans of all the banks located in the metropolitan area, less the aggregate of their deposits and loans which originate in the national market. We cannot deduct all national business [*13] from the area's total deposits and loans, however, without knowing the percentage of business which each local bank originates in the national market. Except for the constituent banks, there is no evidence before us on that subject." United States v. Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co., supra, at 924.

So even if we totally accept defendants' national market allocation with its resulting percentages of national business, we still find ourselves back in the position from which we started-a search for realistic market shares or concentration ratios.

Faced with this insurmountable task of formulating realistic concentration ratios, and cognizant of the fact that many of these so-called national accounts are tied to the Philadelphia market by virtue of convenience, loyalty, [30] etc., this Court finds that the most practicable solution to this problem is to adopt the "shading procedure" used by the Supreme Court in PNB.

---

[9] See Kerslake, N.T. 2591; Bradshaw, N.T. 2769; Myers, N.T. 3158-59; see also defendants' Exhibits 105, 106.

Any other type of analysis would fall within the Supreme Court's proscription in PNB, supra, 374 U.S. at 360-1:

> "Large borrowers and large depositors the record shows, may find it practical to do a large part of their banking business outside their home community; very small borrowers and depositors may, as a practical matter, be confined to bank offices in their immediate neighborhood; and customers of intermediate size, it would appear, deal with banks within an area intermediate between these extremes . . . HN5[] But that in banking the relevant geographical market is a function of each separate customer's economic scale means simply that a workable compromise must be found: some fair intermediate delineation which avoids the indefensible extremes of drawing the market either so expansively as to make the effect of the merger upon competition seem insignificant, because only the very largest bank customers are taken into account in defining the market, or so narrowly as to place appellees in different markets, because only the smallest [31] customers are considered."

Thus, in PNB the Supreme Court scaled down the aggregate share of the market held by PNB and Girard as a merged bank from 36-30%, or by approximately 16%. If we apply the same reduction formula between Provident and Central-Penn, we reduce their market share from 14% to 11.7%.

This reduction might seem somewhat arbitrary and non-realistic, but it is the fairest market analysis of which this Court can conceive. The defendants have asked us to include only the following statistics in our four-county analysis, based upon their breakdown of what accounts are national or local in scope. Of total deposits for Provident, approximately $245,000,000 out of $635,000,000 are attributed to the four-county area on the basis of the MacMahon breakdown adopted by the banks. Of total loans for Provident, approximately $86,000,000 of $427,000,000 are attributable to the four-county area. (See defendants' Exhibits 64 and 64A). On the Central-Penn side of the ledger, the banks ask this Court to include only approximately $152,000,000 of some $332,000,000 in deposits as emanating from the four-county area. They also state that only $79,000,000 of Central-Penn's [32] $227,000,000 in total loans should be included in our four-county analysis, based again on the MacMahon criteria. (See defendants' Exhibits 46 and 46A).

For reasons stated before, a total acceptance of these proposed figures would be as unrealistic as the ones offered by Justice. Rather than becoming involved in a morass of detail and statistics, or involving ourselves in a construction of concentration ratios, which would be based on somewhat inadequate statistics and evidence, we believe the "shading procedure" adopted is the fairest and most realistic approach under the circumstances.

HN6[] On the retail level, the deposit base examined must be expanded to take into [*14] account saving and loan associations and mutual savings banks. Competition for the savings dollar is intense and emanates from these non-commercial bank sources, as well as from the commercial banks themselves. The retail business of the banks in question can be restricted to the four-county area realistically because such business is restricted by the factor of convenience. The product offered tends to be "relatively standardized in form, quality and cost." Since the two banks in question can only [33] branch by law into the four-county area, there is no question that substantially all of its retail business takes place within these four counties. Unlike the competition for wholesale accounts, all commercial banks, plus saving and loan associations and mutual savings banks, compete for the savings dollar, and residential mortgages. [10]

By branching, the large commercial banks in the city compete with the small individual suburban banks for the savings dollar and the demand deposit accounts. Specialized personnel, large lending limits, or reserve city bank status, are not essentials for this retail business. Thus, on the retail level, the figures offered by the Government are appropriate and realistic with the one exception that they should have included saving and loan associations and mutual savings banks.

The defendant banks, during the trial of this case and in their briefs, have attempted to prove that since [34] retail accounts are sufficiently localized by the factor of convenience, there is not much competitive interplay between them. More specifically, they presented in evidence detailed maps illustrating the branch locations of both

[10] See Weiler, N.T. 2871, 2882; McGinley, N.T. 2885; Wood, N.T. 2924; Moyer, N.T. 3080.

Provident and Central-Penn showing that retail customers are concentrated in proximity to the branches. While agreeing that a Central-Penn branch in Bucks County does not compete with a Provident branch in Montgomery County, they at least have the potentiality of competing in that area by de novo branching. The Supreme Court's rulings on this subject are clear. HN7[] One purpose of Section 7 is to arrest the trends toward concentration or monopoly, before the consumer's alternatives disappear by mergers. United States v. Philadelphia National Bank, supra, 374 U.S. at 367; United States v. El Paso Natural Gas Co., 376 U.S. 651, 659, 12 L. Ed. 2d 12, 84 S. Ct. 1044 (1963). Potential competition must also be preserved. It is not sufficient to prove only that the banks do not actually compete. It must also be proven that they probably will never compete or have the potential to compete.

The banks' proposed plotting techniques fall short on a second ground. [35] Such a market characterization is a perfect illustration of what the Supreme Court condemned as an "indefensible extreme" in PNB. Here, the proposed market is drawn so narrowly as to place (the merging banks) in different markets, because only the smallest customers are considered. PNB, supra, 374 U.S. at 361. If we were to adopt the banks' plotting techniques, no banks or financial institutions would be in competition for the retail customers since such customers would be clustered around the financial institution of their choice. The mere fact that a customer chooses this one bank has nothing to do with competition, HN8[] since the purpose of Section 7 and the Courts in enforcing this statute, is to preserve competition between the successful and unsuccessful providers of these banking services. United States v. El Paso Natural Gas Co., supra, 376 U.S. at 661. The choice to bank where the customer pleases must be preserved and the gradual elimination of potential or actual competitors takes away competitive options which the customer should have. These competitive banking options, if preserved, will also require the banks or financial institutions to maintain competitive [36] [*15] services and interest rates which are all to the benefit of the customer. The desire to innovate new services to attract the retail customer is also present where there are many competitive options.

Therefore, we reject the defendants' proposed localized markets for the above reasons and shall consider the retail aspects of this merger within the four-county area. We shall, however, include competition from saving and loan associations and mutual savings banks where relevant.

The inclusion of saving and loan associations and mutual savings banks broadens the structural base to be examined even further. As already noted, we have reduced the market share of the merging banks from 14% to 11.7% because of accounts which are more properly allocable to the national market. But the problems which faced us there in arriving at realistic market shares reoccur in this instance. The statistics offered are incomplete and again would require the Court to delve into statistical problems which it is not fully competent to solve. The inclusion of these other institutions noticeably affects the examined deposit base. In recent years, commercial banks have become increasingly interested [37] in securing time deposits, and as a result of this interest, the ratio between time and demand deposits is fast reaching an equal parity.

In 1961, the ratio of demand to time deposits in relation to total deposits was 74.6%-25.4% in the four-county area. In 1966, demand deposits increased only 14.4%, while time deposits increased 112.2%. This increase in time deposits changed the ratio to 61.2%-38.8%. Thus, time deposits now comprise approximately 40% of the total deposits held by commercial banks in the four-county area. (See defendants' Exhibit 19). Among the four-county commercial banks, Provident controls 8.3% of the IPC (Individuals, Partnerships and Corporations) time and savings deposits, while Central-Penn controls 4.6%. The resultant bank would control 12.9% of IPC time and savings deposits in the four-county area. (See plaintiff's Exhibit 15). The five largest commercial banks, as of December 31, 1965, controlled 73.2% of the total time and savings deposits held by commercial banks in the four-county area. The merger would increase this percentage to 77.8%.

When we consider competition from saving and loan associations and mutual savings banks, these above figures [38] are considerably reduced. As of December 31, 1965, commercial banks held only 19.49% of the total savings dollar in the four-county area. Mutual savings banks held 45.73%, saving and loan associations 32.95%, and credit unions 1.88%. Provident and Central-Penn held 1.63% and 1.11%, respectively. (See defendants' Exhibit 20).

The resultant bank would control 2.74% of the total savings dollar in the four-county area. Since savings constitute some 40% of the total deposit base, some further adjustment must be made.

After shading down Justice's concentration figures from 14% to 11.7% because of accounts allocable to the national market, we shall further shade this 11.7% figure by including competition from the saving and loan associations. Since 2.74% represents the resultant bank's share of all time and savings deposits in the four-county area, we arrive at a final aggregate share of 9.74%. [11]

[39] We realize these figures are not totally accurate, and that our method in arriving at them is mathematically crude. However, this figure of 9.74% is more realistic in that it represents as nearly as possible competition for only those [*16] accounts for which financial institutions compete in the four-county area. [12]

After arriving at a more realistic concentration ratio, we can now consider whether a merger, which produces a firm controlling [40] some 9.8% of the relevant market, is anticompetitive. Here, there has been no merger which involves shares of the market so large that it approaches monopolistic proportions. See Brown Shoe Co., Inc. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510, 82 S. Ct. 1502 (1962); PNB, supra. Nor does it involve a merger which forecloses only a de minimis share of the market, since Central-Penn does not fall within that category. This merger lies somewhere in the middle of these two extremes and therefore an examination of the various economic and historical factors is necessary. Brown Shoe Co., Inc. v. United States, supra, at 329. Such an analysis must involve a prognosis of the probable future effect of the merger and not merely its immediate effect.

There is a distinct difference between competition and the number of competitors, especially in commercial banking. [13] When Philadelphia had many more commercial banks than it does today, the banks then were not, in any sense, full service banks. The larger banks usually concentrated on a wholesale business with little or no regard to retail business, such as savings or trust accounts. More specifically, national banks were concerned [41] with commercial lending, trust companies with trusts, and State banks concentrated on the retail accounts. By the merger process, the large commercial banks extended their reach into the retail area until they became what they are today, full service banks.

The banks, in their brief, contend that if this merger is not approved, the leading banks in the Philadelphia area will become insulated from competition. They cite this merger as a case where two small firms are proposing to merge in order to compete more successfully with the leading firm in that market. To support this contention, the banks point out that this merger [42] will not produce the largest bank in the Philadelphia area, as was the case in PNB, supra, but will merely place the resultant bank on an even parity with the other four large reserve city banks in Philadelphia. To reach this parity, the merger is necessary to increase the lending limits of the respective banks to a competitive $10,000,000 level. [14] It will also allow Provident and Central-Penn to solicit more correspondent banking business of which First Pennsylvania Banking and Trust Company and Philadelphia National Bank have

---

[11] Since the ratio of time to demand deposits is 40-60 in the four-county area, we took the resultant bank's share of 2.74% in the time and savings account category and added this figure to 60% of 11.7%, which is 7%, giving us a total of 9.74%.

[12] Competition from other financial institutions for mortgage loans was not computed since the ratio of these mortgages to total loans was not known. However, we do know that commercial banks held 12.52% of the total mortgage loans in the four-county area with the remainder being held by mutual savings banks and saving and loan associations about equally. The resultant bank would control.95% or less than 1% of the total mortgage loans in the four-county area. Thus, the proposed merger would not be anticompetitive in this specific market. (Defendants' Exhibit 20).

[13] This distinction was recognized by the Supreme Court in Brown Shoe Co., Inc. v. United States, supra, 370 U.S. at 320: "Taken HN9[] as a whole, the legislative history (of Section 7) illuminates congressional concern with the protection of competition, not competitors, and its desire to restrain mergers only to the extent that such combinations may tend to lessen competition."

[14] The resultant bank would have the third largest lending limit among the four-county commercial banks. Presently, Provident has a lending limit of 8.4 million, while Central-Penn's is 3.2 million. First Pennsylvania Banking and Trust Company's legal lending limit is 12 million and Philadelphia National Bank's is approximately 15.8 million. (Defendants' Exhibit 7).

the lion's share. In the area of computer-based services, neither Provident nor Central-Penn presently have the resources to make substantial computer-based innovations. The merged bank will be able to function as a "provider" of these computer services, rather than a purchaser. Another benefit [*17] of the merger is that the respective banks can increase their share of international business in which the bank's size plays a determining role. It would be able to attract corporate funds by competing for corporate Certificates of Deposit.

[43] In summary, the banks contend that the merger between the fifth and seventh largest banks in the four-county area will produce a bank better able to compete with the four leading commercial banks on a qualitative basis, since it will have more resources to be innovators in commercial banking, rather than mere takers or followers.

Similarly, Provident and Central-Penn maintain that this merger will also be pro-competitive in the retail market since the improvement of services resulting therefrom should intensify the competition with other banks and financial institutions. There is no question that a larger bank will be better equipped to serve retail customers, but it doesn't necessarily follow that improvements in quality of service will produce more competition.

However, the banks go one step further in their analysis. In retail banking, it is undisputed that convenience is a major factor in the location and competition for these accounts. Thus, as long as the number of independent banking offices in the community have remained the same, the competitive options for the retail customer will remain the same. Despite the substantial reduction of independent commercial banks in [44] the four-county area, the competitive options for the retail customer have increased, and the services offered have increased quantitatively and qualitatively. For example, in thirty-five of the forty communities in the four-county area analyzed by the banks, there has been an increase in the number of bank and other financial institution offices. In seven, the number has remained the same, and in only two have the number of bank offices declined. (See defendants' Exhibits 89, 92). This fact is not so startling when one goes to the source of the increase. The large reserve city banks have branched into these areas, giving the retail customers the benefit of a large city bank with its concomitant services at minimal inconvenience. In doing so, more often than not, the large commercial banks have often merged with a smaller independent bank, but these mergers never affected competition per se on the retail level, since the number of banks in that community has remained the same.

This distinction between competition and the number of competitors is also true on the wholesale level of commercial banking. A large number of independent banks in the four-county area does not necessarily [45] guarantee that competition for wholesale accounts will be meaningful or intense. Most of the present thirty-seven commercial banks in the four-county area are limited severely by their size, location and staff, and thus cannot compete seriously for wholesale accounts. Wholesale transactions usually require large lending limits, reserve city status, and a large and expert staff in diversified areas. Most small independent banks do not fit into this category.

The merger in question will increase the quality of competition among commercial banks for the wholesale customer. Testimony adduced at trial attests to this fact. Central-Penn is not at present a major competitive factor in the wholesale market because of its low lending limit (3.2 million) and its relatively small staff. The merger would produce another bank on par with the other leading wholesale banks in the city, thus giving a wholesale customer in the Philadelphia market a broader range from which to choose.

Our observation that competition on a qualitative basis will increase or remain the same on the wholesale and retail level is not determinative of our Section 7 analysis. We have determined generally that the [46] immediate effect of this merger will not decrease competition in the four-county area. However, before a merger can be approved, this [*18] Court must not look only to its immediate effect, but also the probable effect this merger will have in the future.

As stated before, the number of independent commercial banks in the four-county area has been substantially reduced. At present, the number stands at thirty-seven, with at least four mergers pending. [15] Approval of this merger might well encourage more mergers which would reduce the present number substantially. Defendants counter this assertion by maintaining that the proposed merger involves unique considerations which will not be duplicated in the future. These unique considerations are that the two merging banks are the two smallest reserve city banks in Philadelphia and the resultant bank will be on parity only with the other reserve city banks. Any other merger within this group of reserve city banks would resemble the PNB-Girard merger, since it would inevitably create the largest bank in the city. Secondly, since Provident and Central-Penn have complementary branch systems, the effect on competition in the retail [47] area will be minimal. Lastly, they argue, that the merger of Provident and Central-Penn is the culmination of the evolution of full service reserve city banks in Philadelphia.

---

[15] Girard-Doylestown National Continental-Sonsitaly, Fidelity-Doylestown Trust, and this merger.

These considerations are not compelling ones, however, since both banks, by their own admission, are healthy and progressive and presently are meaningful competitors in the four-county area. Although the two branching areas of the respective banks are somewhat complementary, both banks have the potential to branch into other areas. As a result, the retail customers of the outlying counties will be losing a potential entrant into their market if we allow the merger. In all respects, Provident is a full service bank, a status it has attained by the merger route. Central-Penn also is a full service bank, but admittedly, it is not on par with the other leading banks in the city. However, it is developing and strengthening its weaknesses, [48] such as its trust and international departments, and always will be able to find some place in community banking.

But even assuming that this merger would not trigger more of the same, this merger is anticompetitive when viewed in light of the Supreme Court's pronouncements in interpreting Section 7 of the Clayton Act. The proposed merger is desired in a market which is becoming rapidly concentrated. Barriers to entry in this market are severe. These barriers are borne out by the fact that only three independent banks have been formed in the four-county area since World War II. (See defendant's Exhibit 54). Faced with this rigid market structure, even slight increases in concentration must be viewed with askance. United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 377 U.S. 271, 84 S. Ct. 1283, 12 L. Ed. 2d 314 (1964).

The aggregate share of total deposits which the resultant bank will hold in the four-county area is approximately 10%. Although this is relatively a small concentration ratio, the merger still runs counter to the Supreme Court's precept that competition will be most vital when there are many sellers, none of which has any significant market share. United States v. Aluminum [49] Co. of America, supra; United States v. Von's Grocery, 384 U.S. 270, 16 L. Ed. 2d 555, 86 S. Ct. 1478 (1966). It becomes clear that HN10[] if a market can be characterized as oligopolistic, any merger which strengthens this oligopolistic structure must be struck down. This is the dilemma which confronts this Court. Philadelphia concededly has an oligopolistic banking structure. The purpose of Section 7 is to preserve and maintain competition, but in so preserving, it is also possible for the oligopolistic structure to be strengthened. Barring significant new entries into commercial banking in the four-county area, and the prospect of divestiture of the large banking institutions seemingly remote, it seems the [*19] necessary result of such a policy will only strengthen the present leaders while the lesser banking institutions are correspondingly weakened. Justice and the Supreme Court have offered solutions to this dilemma and in essence, these solutions amount to an absolute bar of all horizontal mergers which would increase the concentration ratio of the merging firms in question, especially in a market which is already highly concentrated.

The merging banks' percentage share [50] of the market (10%) certainly is not as foreboding as the large percentage of the market which PNB and Girard would have controlled had that merger been approved. Since that time, the Supreme Court has indicated that HN11[] any merger producing a firm controlling 25% of the relevant market, is presumptively bad. United States v. Continental Can Co. et al., 378 U.S. 441, 12 L. Ed. 2d 953, 84 S. Ct. 1738 (1964).

We do not find that this merger which would produce a bank controlling approximately 10% of the relevant market is presumptively anticompetitive. This percentage figure is not undue in relation to the composition of the market as a whole. The resultant bank certainly will not have market power which would enable it to persistently behave over substantial periods of time in a non-competitive fashion. (Dirlam, N.T. 414-15). The converse is true. The defendant banks desire this market power so that they can behave competitively.

Yet, Congress and the Supreme Court, in carrying out the mandate of Section 7, have stated that HN12[] one purpose of Section 7 is to arrest a trend toward concentration or a tendency toward monopoly, before the consumers' alternatives disappeared through mergers. [51] United States v. El Paso Natural Gas Co., supra. Thus, we must not focus only on the effect of this merger in the present, but must scan the horizon to see what lies ahead. The thrust of the El Paso decision, supra, extends to the fact situation presently before us. Provident and Central-Penn are presently competing for the retail and wholesale dollar. This competition (between these two banks) is not as keen as it could be, but potentially this competition can become more intense. In the retail area, de novo branching can bring these two banks into the private domain of each other. In the wholesale area, both banks presently offer sufficient alternatives for the commercial customer. This Court accepts the fact that both Provident and Central-Penn would become a better and more competitive bank after the merger, but this fact does not offset the loss of Central-Penn which is a growing and healthy bank in an oligopolistic market.

The case which we feel controls the merger before us is United States v. Von's Grocery, supra, which involved a merger between the third largest and the sixth largest retail supermarkets in the Los Angeles area. The resultant company would [52] control only 7.5% of the total value of retail groceries sold in the Los Angeles market each year. The Los Angeles food market was characterized as one where there was a long and continuous trend toward fewer owner-competitors. In an eleven year span, the number of chain stores (two or more) increased from 96 to 150, while the number of single owner-operated stores was reduced from 5,365 to 3,818. On these facts alone, the merger was condemned without a functional inquiry into the nature and quality of the competition. HN13[] The basic purpose of the Sherman and Clayton Acts (as construed by Justice Black) was to prevent economic concentration in the American economy by keeping a large number of small competitors in business. The only exceptions to this rule are where one of the companies is about to fail, or where two companies had to merge to save themselves from destruction by some larger and more powerful competitors. This view, which shifts the emphasis of Section 7 from protecting competition to protecting competitors (see Justices Stewart's and Harlan's dissent in Von's), was reiterated in United States v. Pabst Brewing Co., supra.

[*20] The facts in this case are parallel [53] to those in Von's. Here, the merger involves the fifth and the seventh largest banks in the four-county area. The resultant bank would control approximately 10% of the relevant market, thus exceeding the percentage figure in Von's by approximately 2%. The Philadelphia banking market unqualifiedly can be characterized as one where there has been a long and continuous trend toward concentration.

Therefore, even if we did find that competition would be improved by this merger, as it probably was in Von's, the inescapable fact is that the number of competitors in the four-county area has been steadily decreasing over the years, and necessarily increasing the concentration ratios among the leading banks. Since this merger falls within this trend toward merger and toward more concentration, it must be ruled anticompetitive under existing antitrust laws. This bank merger clearly does not fall within the two exceptions referred to in Von's. Central-Penn is not a failing bank. Nor is this an attempt by two banks to save themselves from oppressive competition. These banks are not being preyed on by the larger banks, nor are they losing appreciable ground in the struggle [54] for market power. They are merely asking this Court to put them in a position where they can fight on equal terms and we cannot put them there because it is not absolutely necessary.

The Convenience and Needs of the Community

Our disposition of this case does not end with the conclusion that this merger is anticompetitive under current Section 7 standards. HN14[] B.M.A. 1966 has carved out a new exception or defense to such anticompetitive mergers in the form of the convenience and needs test. 12 U.S.C. § 1828(c)(7)(B). This defense or justification is available to the banks once it has been determined that the proposed merger would be anticompetitive as judged by normal antitrust standards. United States v. First City National Bank of Houston, supra, 386 U.S. at 366.

Again, the lower Courts have taken opposite views on the meaning of this new test. The District Court, in United States v. Crocker-Anglo National Bank, supra, felt that the merger between Crocker and Citizens met the convenience and needs test because (a) it caused an immediate increase in the number of statewide banks competing within the State; (b) produced a bank having increased ability to mobilize financial resources [55] in a capital deficit area; (c) created a bank which is better equipped and therefore more likely to engage in credit gap financing; (d) created another substantial competitor in the underwriting of municipal bonds, and (e) enhanced the merged bank's ability to compete more vigorously in international banking. A quick appraisal of these reasons reveals that the Crocker Court adopted a broad public interest approach rather than a restricted narrow exception test in analyzing the scope of this new exception.

The District Court, in United States v. Third National Bank of Nashville, supra, 260 F. Supp. at 877, did not reach the question of convenience and needs directly since it found that the merger between Third National Bank and the Trust Company was not anticompetitive. However, the Court referred to the Supreme Court's characterization of the convenience and needs test. In the "somewhat larger contours of the failing company doctrine", the District Court placed the problem of the "floundering" or "stagnating" bank. Such a bank is one which has reached a point of deterioration or stagnation, but has not reached the status of a failing bank which is an admitted exception in [56] all merger cases. These floundering or stagnating banks do fall within the convenience and needs exception because they are no longer able to serve the public on a competitive basis with other banks [*21] in the market area. United States v. Third National Bank of Nashville, supra, at 884. The Tennessee Court's reference to the convenience and needs test is at best a restricted one, but it places in view the two conflicting interpretations of this new exception which has been debated in Congress and is now being argued in the Courts.

The banks, in their brief, state that the merger between Provident and Central-Penn will serve the convenience and needs test in the following ways: (1) The merged bank will be more comparable in resources, services and prestige to the larger banks in other cities. As such, it will help the City of Philadelphia in its competition with those cities to attract and retain job-creating enterprises. It will also aid the Port of Philadelphia in its competition with other ports and help to attract and retain foreign commerce; (2) the merged bank will provide more competition for the larger banks in Philadelphia; (3) the merged bank will provide better [57] service to individuals and small businesses in the communities served by its branches.

Before attempting any in-depth analysis of the defendant banks' contentions as to what the convenience and needs test embraces, this Court finds, at the outset, that it is necessary to make some general observations concerning the new exception. Since the community's primary need is for a competitive banking market, an anticompetitive merger, if approved, eliminates one aspect of the community's need for banking services. Thus, HN15[] anticompetitive mergers should be approved only in those few instances where these anticompetitive effects are overwhelmed by the more compelling needs of the community. [16]

In United States v. First City National Bank of Houston, supra, 386 U.S. at 369, the Supreme Court alluded to the convenience and needs test exception as one "related although . . . remotely, [58] to the failing-company doctrine." This language does not mean that the defense of convenience and needs must be equated with the failing bank doctrine because this concept was already firmly engrained into our antitrust jurisprudence. Congress, in amending the Bank Merger Act of 1960, intended a wider embrace under the new exception. Just what this embrace involves is the problem before this Court.

In construing the meaning of the convenience and needs test, this Court has turned for guidance to the legislative history of the amended Bank Merger Act. Before doing so, we are reminded at the outset by Congressman Reuss' remarks that the words "convenience and needs of the community" are capable of some meaning, but they will require some Court interpretation.

Realizing that we must interpret this new defense, we must of necessity seek enlightenment from the legislative history. In examining the convenience and needs of the community, the question arises as to what community should be examined. Is the test limited to the appropriate geographic market utilized in determining anticompetitive effects, or can our analysis extend beyond this territorial limitation? The legislative [59] history on this subject reveals that the sponsors of the House Bill intended that "conditions in the regional market or national market are relevant only insofar as they affect the convenience and needs of the community to be served." With this statement, we agree. In particular cases, a community might need a larger bank which can handle larger loans and provide more sophisticated services. A merger, albeit anticompetitive, might be allowed in this instance if the community's need and convenience for a larger bank clearly outweigh the anticompetitive effects. [*22] Another instance for allowing a merger on the basis of convenience and needs, by considering the national or regional market, is where an entire region might be without a large commercial bank. A merger creating such a large bank to meet the convenience and needs of this community, whether it be local or regional, might be allowed.

---

[16] See Via, Jr., "Antitrust and the Amended Bank Merger and Holding Company Acts: The Search for Standards", 53 Va. L. Rev., 1115 (1967).

Beyond these general observations, perhaps HN16[] the most common application of the convenience and needs test, and the one primarily intended by Congress, is the "floundering" or "stagnating" bank. Congress was intensely concerned that under the rigid test propounded in PNB, such [60] floundering banks could never be saved by merging with a stronger and healthy bank. The concern was not without justification since the only announced exception to the strict anticompetitive standard enunciated in PNB was the failing company doctrine.

The House Report which accompanied the House Bill to the Senate dealt with the floundering bank situation quite specifically under the heading, "The floundering bank":

> "Under general antitrust law criteria, particularly as they have been developed over the past few years, the banking agencies find it difficult to deal as they would like with the floundering bank problem in medium to smaller sized communities. The problem arises where there is a relatively small number of banks, and one or more of these banks appear to be stagnating. It may be because it is below the economic minimum size to attract capable and vigorous management personnel, it may be because it is closely held by owners who insist on unrealistically conservative policies, or it may be for any other reasons which are discernible only by an examination of that particular bank as an individual institution. The banking agencies, with some differences in degree among [61] themselves, have contended that they should be able to consider a merger application on the basis of such an individual examination, and to approve it if they believe that the result would be a more vigorously competing institution, furnishing better overall service to the community, even though the reduction in the number of competing units, or the concentration in the share of the market in one or more lines of commerce, might result under general antitrust law criteria in a substantial lessening of competition." H.R. Rep. No. 1221, 89th Cong., 2d Sess. 3 (1966).

Congressman Todd, in the legislative debate, clarified this concept of the floundering bank even further:

> "The floundering bank case arises when it is not absolutely certain that a bank is failing, but when it may be in a position of stagnation, which might lead, at a later date, to a closing of its doors." 112 Cong. Rec., 2352 (Feb. 8, 1966); see also Congressman Widnall's remarks at 2335.

Senator Robertson, in explaining the effect of the House amendment on convenience and needs to the Senate stated:

> "There are times, when there are two banks in a community and one is about to fail because of poor loans [62] or bad management, and the banking agencies say, 'It would be bad to have a bank failure; will you see if you can arrange to merge?' Everybody will agree that such a merger would be in the public interest. But unfortunately, Section 7 of the Clayton Act is so harsh that if two banks seek to merge into one, any judge could say, 'You have ipso facto lessened competition. If you have lessened competition, you are illegal and we will destroy you.'" 112 Cong. Rec., 2545 (Feb. 9, 1966).

Under the amended Act, a compromise was effected. The anticompetitive standard was made stronger since it was no longer to be diluted by the other banking factors. It was to be considered singly. The other important change was the new convenience and needs exception which takes into account the banking factors that were previously enmeshed with the competitive factor under the old standard. [*23] However, the competitive factor does remain pre-eminent and any exceptions to this standard would indeed be rare.

The legislative history confirms our belief that HN17[] the convenience and needs test must be read restrictively. It is not a mandate for mergers between banks across the board. It merely [63] allows bank mergers in those cases where the needs and convenience of the community are so compelling that competition will be enhanced rather than decreased by the merger. This will occur in only a very few instances. [17]

With these observations in view, we shall now turn to the defendant banks' contentions that they have met their burden of proof as to the convenience and needs test. The banks contend that the primary issue in this case is the convenience and needs of the community to be served. With this, we disagree, since the convenience and needs test has already been characterized by the Supreme Court as a defense or an exception to the primary issue of anticompetitive effects. United States v. First City National Bank of Houston, supra.

Generally, [64] the banks state that the proposed merger would create a more efficient bank offering a broader range of services. This broader based bank will be able to attract and retain job-creating enterprises. It will also be able to compete with the large Philadelphia and New York banks. Lastly, the merger will provide better services to industries and small businesses.

More specifically, the banks maintain that we are on the threshold of a "checkless society" whereby computer and other automated services will be of prime use. This increased cost and specialization will require large capital outlays for personnel and equipment which can only be met by the larger banks. It is true that the resultant bank would be better able to provide these services because it would simply have more funds at its disposal. However, the fact that improved service to the wholesale and retail customer will result from this merger is not controlling. The question in this area is-does the Philadelphia banking community need another billion dollar institution aside from the four which it already has? The reasons proffered by the banks for such a need or convenience are not compelling since improved services [65] will almost invariably result from every merger. Something more direct or unique in the way of convenience and needs is required by the Act.

The banks also argue that the merger will assist Philadelphia in its efforts to solve its economic problems. They point to the fact that Philadelphia's employment growth has lagged behind the national average, citing the loss of textile companies which employed many unskilled workers. In recruiting science-based industries to fill this employment gap, adequate financing and specialized personnel familiar with the technology of the industry are required. They also state that the merger will improve the Philadelphia Port situation. New York City currently finances 70% of all foreign commerce in the United States at a decided disadvantage to the Philadelphia Port.

Again, it is true that the proposed merger may help the above situation, but there are too many other causes and reasons involved in these economic problems, which were testified to during the trial of this case, to convince the Court of the legal validity of the banks' assertions. At most, these assertions are tenuous. It was admitted that the textile companies did not leave [66] Philadelphia because of inadequate or poor financial support, but because the South offered a better deal, tax-wise and employment-wise. Also, the Philadelphia Port does [*24] not suffer from inadequate financing, but loses most of its general cargo trade to New York because that city is the hub of commercial activity in the East, with the largest population. The loss of corporate headquarters in the Philadelphia area cannot be attributed to the Philadelphia banks either, since in most cases, the industry or company itself remains, with merely the headquarters shifting. Testimony at trial revealed that corporate headquarters have been moved from Philadelphia to elsewhere for a plethora of reasons, but nowhere, in no case, were the banks blamed. In any event, the fact that Philadelphia presently has four billion dollar banks indicates that the desired expertise or capital can be furnished in a particular situation by these four larger banks.

If specific facts were shown that Philadelphia was losing accounts, corporations, or was suffering in any way from the lack of an additional billion dollar bank, this Court would be of a different disposition. However, there has been [67] no showing or proof of a linkage between such an additional billion dollar bank and Philadelphia's problems. The mere supposition that a larger bank might assist Philadelphia and its economic problems just is not enough under the convenience and needs test which we feel is a narrow and restricted exception.

---

[17] Congressman Reuss, in 112 Cong. Rec., 2337 (Feb. 8, 1966) put it this way: (The convenience and needs exception) "intentionally creates a heavy burden for the proponents of a merger, and I anticipate very few cases in which this burden can be sustained."

The banks also have alleged that the proposed merger will be pro-competitive and, in this sense, also meets the convenience and needs of the community. They justify the Provident and Central-Penn merger as a case where two small firms in a market propose to merge in order to be able to compete more successfully with the leading firms in that market. This merger, unlike the PNB-Girard merger, would not produce a bank which is the largest in the four-county area, but one which merely challenges the leaders. If the merger is not allowed to go through, the banks contend that the leading banks will become insulated from competition because of their head start on lending limits, branches, correspondent business, and computer-based services. Only by this merger can the five largest reserve city banks be on an even parity. More or less, this type of analysis goes more to the convenience [68] and needs of the respective banks themselves, rather than to the community. Perhaps the merger would increase competition for the wholesale accounts, but it would decrease one substantial option for some wholesale accounts and definitely for retail accounts. The pro-competitive effects of the merger are definitely offset by the anticompetitive effects which were dealt with under our previous discussion of the anticompetitive effects of this merger.

The banks have declined to justify this merger as one which would join a healthy and prosperous bank with one which is floundering. Central-Penn does have some capitalization and officer replacement problems, but they are not serious. Central-Penn recently declared an extra dividend at Christmas time which does not reflect a bank with capitalization difficulties. Its position in Philadelphia is relatively secure. Perhaps it never will be able to challenge the largest banks in Philadelphia on equal terms, but it will be able to challenge the medium-sized and smaller banks on more than equal terms.

The burden of proof upon the banks to prove that this merger meets the convenience and needs of the community is indeed a heavy one. BMA [69] 1966 requires that the convenience and needs of the community must clearly outweigh any anticompetitive effects before a merger can be approved. This burden has not been met in the instant case. At best, it has resulted in a tie. Justice has shown anticompetitive effects and the banks have pointed to convenience and needs. However, in a tie situation, the banks necessarily lose. [18] As stated before, [*25] Congress intended that exceptions to anticompetitive mergers should be rare. In those few instances, the convenience and needs of the community must be so compelling that the merger's anticompetitive effects become only a sidelight to the overall good of the community.

[70] In the case before us, the banks have proved the convenience and needs of the Philadelphia community in a persuasive, but not compelling fashion. Although we are persuaded that this merger would be good for Philadelphia and its banking community, this Court has seen no compelling evidence which would except this merger from our antitrust laws.

In short, the banks have failed to meet their burden of proving that this merger would have the probable effect of meeting the convenience and needs of the community. At best, they have convinced us that this is a possibility. They have failed to establish "that HN18[] the anticompetitive effects of the proposed transaction are clearly outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served." Title 12 U.S.C. § 1828(c)(5)(B).

The Comptroller of the Currency presented a very appealing jury case. His witnesses, outstanding bankers and businessmen, established by a fair preponderance of the evidence (a) that they were convinced that the merger was a good thing for Philadelphia, as well as the banks; (b) that instead of the fears voiced by the economists [71] for Justice that competition would be lessened, there would be strengthened competition both at the retail and wholesale level; (c) that not entirely as a measure of civic pride, another bank of the size contemplated would redound to the economic benefit of Philadelphia. It is not necessary to delineate in detail the testimony adduced. It was extremely persuasive and most interesting, but where the Judge must declare the law and the findings of fact, he cannot deviate one jot from those requirements. The present posture of the antitrust laws, as declared by the Congress and the Opinions of the Supreme Court, require the result reached. Comptroller Saxon's remarks about the necessity of financing urban renewal, redevelopment of the ghettos, etc., are in this day and age peculiarly appropriate. However, since the Court must adhere to a quantitative, rather than a qualitative theory, the result is inevitable.

[18] On December 6, 1967, Frederic L. Ballard, Esquire, counsel for the banks, during the final argument of this case, characterized the banks' burden of proof in the following manner: "And I think that 'clearly' is something that has to go within your Honor's judgment, and I think that it is probably of no more significance than the baseball rule that a tie favors the runner. I'm afraid that I would have to say here that a tie favors the Department of Justice." (N.T. 89).

It might also be pertinent to comment at this point on the effect of the Government's rebuttal testimony after the banks' and the Comptroller's showing of convenience and needs. The witnesses, a small banker, a city official, and small businessmen, were apparently produced [72] for the purpose of showing that where the larger urban bank moved into suburban territory, it was not a good thing for the community. The banker, a very estimable gentleman, who lives on the perimeter but within the four-county area, clearly indicated that he knew nothing about the problems confronting the Philadelphia banks and could throw no light on whether the merger was good or bad for the community. The other witnesses definitely proved and established beyond peradventure of doubt that the coming of the branches of the urban bank into the suburban community created banking competition where none had been in existence before and definitely added to the well-being generally and economy of the entire community. Instead of proving that branch banking into small towns was harmful, Justice definitely proved the contrary.

The foregoing will constitute the general Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law of the trial Judge. Each party, Justice, the banks, and the intervenor, have submitted, in different forms, Requests for Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law. The rulings thereon will be filed as an appendix [not reproduced] to this [*26] Opinion. In any instance where [73] there may be any lack of clarity in approved Requests for Findings of Fact or Conclusions of Law, the language of the Opinion will govern.

Order

And Now, to wit, this 12th day of February, 1968, for the reasons set forth above, it is Ordered, Adjudged and Decreed as follows:

That the Agreement of Merger dated November 10, 1965 between the defendants, Provident National Bank and Central-Penn National Bank of Philadelphia, be and it is hereby Adjudged and Decreed to be unlawful, in violation of B.M.A. 1966 (80 Stat. 7);

Further that defendants, Provident National Bank and Central-Penn National Bank of Philadelphia, and all persons acting on their behalf, be enjoined from carrying out the Agreement of Merger or any similar plan or agreement, the effect of which would be to merge or consolidate said defendants.

United States v. Third Nat'l Bank

Supreme Court of the United States

December 11, 1967, Argued ; March 4, 1968, Decided

No. 86

Reporter

390 U.S. 171 *; 88 S. Ct. 882 ; 19 L. Ed. 2d 1015 ; 1968 U.S. LEXIS 2904 *; 1968 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,372

UNITED STATES v. THIRD NATIONAL BANK IN NASHVILLE ET AL.

Prior History: [1] APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE MIDDLE DISTRICT OF TENNESSEE.

Disposition: 260 F.Supp. 869, reversed and remanded.

Core Terms

merger, district court, banks, convenience, public interest, bank merger, antitrust, Clayton Act, merging, anticompetitive, factors, largest, lessen competition, outweighed, benefits, consummated, managerial, weighing, courts, loans, Sherman Act, recruiting, appraised, deposits, effects, judging, lending

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > General Overview

HN1[] Regulated Industries, Financial Institutions

See 12 U.S.C.S. § 1828(c).

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > Bank Mergers

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Regulated Industry Mergers

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Defenses

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Defenses

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > General Overview

Banking Law > ... > Banking & Finance > Commercial Banks > Mergers & Consolidations

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

HN2[] Financial Institutions, Bank Mergers

The Bank Merger Act, 12 U.S.C.S. § 1828(c), provides for continued scrutiny of bank mergers under the Sherman Act and the Clayton Act, but creates a new defense, with the merging banks having the burden of proving that defense.

Banking Law > Regulators > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > Bank Mergers

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > General Overview

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > General Overview

Banking Law > ... > Banking & Finance > Commercial Banks > Mergers & Consolidations

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Regulated Industry Mergers

HN3[] Banking Law, Regulators

The task of the district courts, in scrutinizing a bank merger under the Bank Merger Act, 12 U.S.C.S. § 1828(c), is to inquire de novo into the validity of a bank merger approved by the relevant bank regulatory agency to determine, first, whether the merger offended the antitrust laws and, second, if it did, whether the banks had established that the merger was nonetheless justified by the convenience and needs of the community to be served.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > Bank Mergers

Banking Law > ... > Banking & Finance > Commercial Banks > Mergers & Consolidations

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Regulated Industry Mergers

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > General Overview

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

HN4[] Financial Institutions, Bank Mergers

Congress intended bank mergers under the Bank Merger Act, 12 U.S.C.S. § 1828(c), first to be subject to the usual antitrust analysis; if a merger fails that scrutiny, it is to be permissible only if the merging banks can establish that the merger's benefits to the community would outweigh its anticompetitive disadvantages.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > Bank Mergers

Banking Law > ... > Banking & Finance > Commercial Banks > Mergers & Consolidations

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Market Definition

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > General Overview

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

HN5[] Financial Institutions, Bank Mergers

The purpose of the Bank Merger Act, 12 U.S.C.S. § 1828, is to permit certain bank mergers even though they tend to lessen competition in the relevant market.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

HN6[] Regulated Industries, Financial Institutions

If a merger poses a choice between preserving competition and satisfying the requirements of convenience and need, the injury and benefit are to be weighed and decision is to rest on which alternative better serves the public interest.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > Bank Mergers

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > General Overview

HN7[] Financial Institutions, Bank Mergers

Under the Bank Merger Act, 12 U.S.C.S. § 1828, a much smaller risk of failure than that required by the failing company doctrine is sufficient to justify the rather radical preventive step of an anticompetitive merger.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > General Overview

HN8[] Regulated Industries, Financial Institutions

Securing better banking service for the community is a proper element for consideration in weighing convenience and need against the loss of competition.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > General Overview

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > General Overview

HN9[] Regulated Industries, Financial Institutions

The Bank Merger Act, 12 U.S.C.S. § 1828, directs the agencies and the courts to consider managerial as well as financial resources in weighing a proposed merger.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > General Overview

Banking Law > Commercial Banks > Bank Expansions > General Overview

HN10[] Regulated Industries, Financial Institutions

The Bank Merger Act, 12 U.S.C.S. § 1828, requires that the "future prospects of the existing and proposed institutions" be appraised. Part of such appraisal, where managerial deficiencies exist, is determining whether the merging bank is capable of obtaining its own improved management.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > General Overview

HN11[] Regulated Industries, Financial Institutions

Before a merger injurious to the public interest is approved, a showing must be made that the gain expected from the merger cannot reasonably be expected through other means.

Lawyers' Edition Display

Summary

Under the Bank Merger Act of 1966, which authorizes approval of a merger having anticompetitive effects if it is determined that such effects are clearly outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served, the Comptroller of the Currency approved a merger between the second and fourth largest banks of Nashville, Tennessee. Thereafter, the United States instituted an action in the United States District Court for the Middle District of Tennessee, challenging the merger under 7 of the Clayton Act. The District Court upheld the merger on the basis that the merger would not tend substantially to lessen competition and also that any anticompetitive effect would be outweighed by the convenience and needs of the community, finding, inter alia, that the smaller bank had a high percentage of unsound loans, that its rating had been changed from "satisfactory" to "fair," and that its problems resulting from unsatisfactory and backward management would be solved by the merger. (260 F Supp 869.)

On direct appeal, the Supreme Court of the United States reversed and remanded the case for further proceedings. In an opinion by White, J., expressing the view of five members of the court, it was held that (1) the lower court erred in concluding that the merger did not offend antitrust standards, since it was established that the merged bank had 40 percent of the city's banking business and that the smaller bank, which had been operating profitably and was not shown to be a failing company, had previously been an important competitive element in certain facets of city banking, (2) the District Court had misunderstood the weight to be given the relevant factors under the convenience-and-need provision of the Bank Merger Act of 1966, and had erred in holding that the anti-competitive effects of the merger were outweighed by the benefits to the community, since there were no findings of the unavailability of alternative solutions other than merger for solving the problems of the smaller bank, and (3) the case should be remanded for reconsideration of the application of the Bank Merger Act to the facts, particularly since the District Court had erroneously concluded that the merger would not tend to lessen competition and a proper conclusion as to the merger's anticompetitive effect was necessary to weigh adequately such effect against the asserted benefits to the community.

Harlan, J., joined by Stewart, J., concurred in part and dissented in part, agreeing that a violation of the Clayton Act by the merger was established, and that the case should be remanded for a new application of the balancing process under the Bank Merger Act, but concluding that the District Court had made adequate findings that the benefits to the community from the merger could not reasonably have been achieved in other ways, and that the only question for the District Court on remand should be whether the antitrust violation should yield to other factors bearing on public convenience and needs.

Fortas and Marshall, JJ., took no part in the consideration or decision of the case.

Headnotes

BANKS §3.5 > mergers -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[1][] [1]

The Bank Merger Act of 1966 (12 USC 1828(c)) was passed to make substantial changes in the law applicable to bank mergers, the statute being more clear, however, in prescribing new procedures for testing mergers than in expounding the new standard by which they should be judged.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §93 > bank merger -- scope of review -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[2A][] [2A]LEdHN[2B][] [2B]

In an action by the government challenging under 7 of the Clayton Act (15 USC 18) a merger of two banks that had been approved by the Comptroller of the Currency under the Bank Merger Act of 1966 (12 USC 1828(c)), which provides that a bank merger having anticompetitive effects shall not be approved unless it is determined that such effects are clearly outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served, the District Court must review the issues in the case de novo, rather than by a determination of whether the Comptroller's findings are supported by substantial evidence.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §20 > RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §34.5 > bank mergers -- antitrust standard -- relevant market -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[3A][] [3A]LEdHN[3B][] [3B]

Under the Bank Merger Act of 1966 (12 USC 1828(c)), which provides that a bank merger having anticompetitive effects shall not be approved unless it is determined that such effects are clearly outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served, there is no intention to adopt a different "antitrust standard" for bank cases than that used generally in the law, and no intention to alter the traditional methods of defining relevant markets in which to appraise the anticompetitive effect of a merger; Congress intended bank mergers first to be subject to the usual antitrust analysis, and if a merger fails that scrutiny, it is permissible only if the merging banks can establish that the merger's benefits to the community will outweigh its anticompetitive disadvantages.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §34.5 > bank merger -- relevant market -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[4A][] [4A]LEdHN[4B][] [4B]

In an action by the government challenging under 7 of the Clayton Act (15 USC 18) a merger of two banks that had been approved by the Comptroller of the Currency under the Bank Merger Act of 1966 (12 USC 1828(c)), which provides that a bank merger having anticompetitive effects shall not be approved unless it is determined that such effects are clearly outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served, commercial banking in the county where the banks are located is the relevant market for appraising the anticompetitive effect of the merger.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §34.5 > bank merger -- anticompetitive effect -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[5][] [5]

In an action by the government challenging under 7 of the Clayton Act (15 USC 18) a merger of two banks that had been approved by the Comptroller of the Currency under the Bank Merger Act of 1966 (12 USC 1828(c)), which provides that a bank merger having anticompetitive effects shall not be approved unless it is determined that such effects are clearly outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served, the District Court errs in concluding that the merger does not offend antitrust standards, and the tendency of the merger substantially to lessen competition is established, where (1) the city's only middle-sized bank was absorbed by the second largest of the city's three big banks, giving the merged bank 40 percent of the city's banking business and increasing the market share of the three largest banks from 93 to 98 percent, (2) the middle-sized bank had been an important competitive element in certain, though not in all, facets of city banking, having offered somewhat different services at somewhat different rates, and (3) during a period of approximately 8 years before the merger, the middle-sized bank had been operated profitably, the absolute size of its business increasing steadily, and there being nothing to permit a conclusion that it was in any way a "failing" company.

APPEAL §1692.2 > APPEAL §1699 > RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR, TRADE PRACTICES §34.5 > bank merger -- benefit to community -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[6A][] [6A]LEdHN[6B][] [6B]

In an action by the government challenging under 7 of the Clayton Act (15 USC 18) a merger of two banks that had been approved by the Comptroller of the Currency under the Bank Merger Act of 1966 (12 USC 1828(c)), which provides that a bank merger having anticompetitive effects shall not be approved unless it is determined that such effects are clearly outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served, the District Court misapplies the convenience-and-need provision of the Act, misunderstands the weight to be given the relevant factors, and errs in holding that any anticompetitive effects of the merger were sufficiently outweighed by the benefits to the community from the merger, where (1) the finding that the combined bank would have a greater lending capacity is entitled to very little weight, absent findings showing the beneficial consequences for the community, (2) although the District Court found that the smaller bank involved in the merger had a high percentage of unsound loans and that its rating had been changed from "satisfactory" to "fair," there were no findings as to the feasibility of curative measures short of merger or as to whether there was any danger of failure of the bank in the foreseeable future, the court's general finding that the merger was "a business necessity" not establishing the possibility of eventual failure, and (3) although the smaller bank had significant problems resulting from unsatisfactory and backward management, which problems would probably be ended by the merger, it was incumbent upon those seeking to merge to demonstrate that they had made reasonable efforts to solve the management problems by steps short of merger or that such efforts would have been unlikely to succeed, and the findings did not establish the unavailability of alternative solutions; the case must be remanded so that the District Court may consider again the application of the Bank Merger Act to the facts of the merger, particularly where the court had erroneously concluded that the merger would not tend to lessen competition, a proper conclusion as to the merger's anticompetitive effect being necessary to weigh adequately such effect against the asserted benefits to the community from the merger.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §34.5 > Bank Merger Act of 1966 -- purpose -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[7][] [7]

The purpose of the Bank Merger Act of 1966 (12 USC 1828(c)), which provides that a bank merger having anticompetitive effects shall not be approved unless it is determined that such effects are clearly outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served, is to permit certain bank mergers even though they tend to lessen competition in the relevant market, the public interest being the ultimate test imposed.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §34.5 > bank merger -- better service for community -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[8][] [8]

In an action challenging the validity of a merger of banks under 7 of the Clayton Act (15 USC 18), securing better banking service for the community is a proper element for consideration in weighing convenience and need against the loss of competition under the Bank Merger Act of 1966 (12 USC 1828(c)), which provides that a bank merger having anticompetitive effects shall not be approved unless it is determined that such effects are clearly outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served; if the gains in better service outweigh the anticompetitive detriment and the merger is essential to secure such net gain to the public interest, the merger should be approved, but if the injury to the public interest flowing from the loss of competition can be avoided and the convenience and needs of the community benefited in ways short of merger but within the competence of reasonably able businessmen, the merger should not be approved.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §34.5 > bank merger -- managerial deficiencies -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[9][] [9]

In an action by the government challenging under 7 of the Clayton Act (15 USC 18) a merger of two banks that had been approved by the Comptroller of the Currency under the Bank Merger Act of 1966 (12 USC 1828(c)), which provides that a bank merger having anticompetitive effects shall not be approved unless it is determined that such effects are clearly outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served, taking into consideration the financial and managerial resources and future prospects of the existing and proposed institutions, appraisal of the factor that managerial deficiencies of the merging bank will be cured by the merger includes determining whether the merging bank is capable of obtaining its own improved management, and before a merger is approved, a showing must be made that the gain expected from the merger cannot reasonably be expected through other means.

EVIDENCE §343.5 > EVIDENCE §979 > antitrust action -- bank merger -- burden and sufficiency of proof -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[10][] [10]

In an action by the government challenging under 7 of the Clayton Act (15 USC 18) a merger of two banks that had been approved by the Comptroller of the Currency under the Bank Merger Act of 1966 (12 USC 1828(c)), which provides that a bank merger having anticompetitive effects shall not be approved unless it is determined that such effects are clearly outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served, the burden of showing that the anticompetitive merger would be in the public interest because of the benefits it would bring to the convenience and needs of the community to be served rests on the merging banks, and a showing that one bank needed more efficient management, absent a showing that the alternative means for securing such management without a merger would present unusually severe difficulties, does not satisfy such burden.

Syllabus

Third National Bank in Nashville and Nashville Bank and Trust Co., the second and fourth largest banks in Davidson County, Tennessee, merged on August 18, 1964. After the merger the three largest banks had 97.9% of the total bank assets in the county, and the two largest banks had 76.7%. The Government's suit challenging the merger had not come to trial when the Bank Merger Act of 1966 took effect, on February 21, 1966. The Act did not provide antitrust immunity for the merger but did state that courts "shall apply the substantive rule of law set forth" in the Act to pending cases. Section 5 of the Act prohibits approval of a merger whose effect "may be substantially to lessen competition" unless the anticompetitive effects "are clearly outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served." The District Court asserted that the Act altered [*2] the standards used in determining whether a merger violated § 7 of the Clayton Act and § 1 of the Sherman Act and mandated a return to United States v. Columbia Steel Co., 334 U.S. 495 (1948). The court found that Nashville Bank and Trust was a "stagnant and floundering bank," suffering from lack of young and aggressive officers. It held that the merger would not tend substantially to lessen competition and also that any anticompetitive effect would be outweighed by benefits to the "convenience and needs of the community." Held:

1. The Bank Merger Act of 1966 requires de novo inquiry by the district courts into the validity of bank mergers to determine whether the merger offends the antitrust laws, and, if it does, whether the banks have established that the merger is justified by benefits to the "convenience and needs of the community." United States v. First City National Bank of Houston, 386 U.S. 361 (1967). P. 178.

2. The Act, which adopted the language of § 7 of the Clayton Act, "substantially to lessen competition," did not provide a different antitrust standard for bank cases, and therefore the District Court applied [*3] an erroneous Clayton Act standard to the merger. Pp. 181-182.

3. On the facts of this case, the merger did tend substantially to lessen competition in the Nashville commercial banking market. P. 183.

4. The lower court misapprehended the meaning of the phrase "convenience and needs of the community," and misunderstood the weight to be given the relevant factors in determining whether the anticompetitive effects are "clearly outweighed in the public interest" by the effects on the convenience and needs of the community. Pp. 184-192.

(a) While the District Court noted the increased loan capacity of the merged bank, it was not specific in describing the beneficial consequences thereof to the Nashville community, or in defining the value of such increase, especially as compared with less desirable results of the merger. P. 186.

(b) The District Court's analysis did not explore possible ways of satisfying the community's convenience and needs without merger. It was incumbent on the banks to demonstrate that they made reasonable efforts to solve Nashville Bank and Trust's management dilemma short of merger with a major competitor. P. 189.

(c) The findings of the District Court do [*4] not sufficiently establish the unavailability of alternative solutions to Nashville Bank and Trust's problems. Pp. 190-192.

5. The case is remanded so that the lower court can consider again the Act's application to the facts of this merger; and since the District Court heard this case before Houston Bank, supra, was decided, it may wish to consider reopening the record to permit the presentation of new evidence in light of the intervening interpretations of the Act. P. 192.

Counsel: Daniel M. Friedman argued the cause for the United States. On the brief were Solicitor General Griswold, Assistant Attorney General Turner, Richard A. Posner and Barry Grossman.

E. William Henry argued the cause for appellees Third National Bank in Nashville et al. With him on the brief were Paul A. Porter, Dennis G. Lyons, Frank M. Farris, Jr., Edwin F. Hunt and John J. Hooker, Jr. Joseph J. O'Malley argued the cause for appellee Camp, Comptroller of the Currency. With him on the brief were Robert Bloom and Charles H. McEnerney, Jr.

Judges: Warren, Black, Douglas, Harlan, Brennan, Stewart, White; Fortas and Marshall took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

Opinion by: WHITE

Opinion

[5] [*173] [1019] [885] MR. JUSTICE WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

In this case the United States appeals from a District Court decision [1] upholding the merger of Third National Bank in Nashville and Nashville Bank and Trust Company against challenge under § 7 of the Clayton Act. The court below concluded that the merger, which joined the second largest and the [1020] fourth largest banks in Davidson County, Tennessee, into a bank which immediately after the merger was the county's largest bank but since has become the second largest, would not tend substantially to lessen competition and also that any anticompetitive effect would be outweighed by the "convenience and needs of the community to be served." We disagree with the District Court on both issues. We hold that the United States established that this merger would tend to lessen competition, and also that the District Court did not point to community benefits in terms of "convenience and needs" sufficient to outweigh the anticompetitive impact.

[6] I.

Like other urban centers in the Southeast, Nashville has grown steadily since World War II in both population and economic activity. Commercial banks, as "the intermediaries in most financial transactions," [2] grew [*174] along with their city. From 1955 to 1964, for example, total assets of all banks located in Davidson County increased from $ 548,300,000 to $ 1,053,700,000, an increase of 92.2%. The number of banks hardly changed. Indeed, since 1927 there has been only one new bank in the county, Capital City Bank, and at the time of this merger it had achieved only .9% of the county's bank assets. The other banks at the time of the merger, and their percentage of total bank assets in Davidson County, were First American National, 38.3%; Third National, 33.6%; Commerce Union, 21.2%; Nashville Bank, 4.8%; and three small banks, two of them located in Davidson County towns outside Nashville, .6%, .3%, and .3%. [3] The merger before us thus joined one of the three very large banks in Nashville and the one middle-sized bank. Its result was to increase from 93.1% to 97.9% the percentage of total assets held by the three largest banks and from 71.9% to 76.7% the percentage [*7] held by the two largest institutions.

The two merging banks played significantly different roles in Nashville banking. Third National was characterized by the Comptroller of the Currency as one of the strongest and best managed banks in the Nation and by the District Court as "strong, dynamic and aggressive." [4] [886] It had "a history of innovating services or promptly providing new services," [5] a recruitment program at local universities, a continuous audit program, and a legal lending limit of $ 2,000,000. It had 14 branches at the [*175] time of the merger and served [*8] as correspondent for smaller banks located throughout the central south.

Nashville Bank and Trust approached the merger with a more checkered history and a less dynamic present. Until 1956 it was largely a trust institution. In that year, under the direction of W. S. Hackworth, it changed its name from Nashville Trust Company and embarked on a drive to become a full-service commercial bank. This program enjoyed considerable success. [1021] Between 1955 and 1964, Nashville Bank's deposits grew from $ 20,800,000 to $ 45,500,000, and its loans and discounts from $ 8,100,000 to $ 22,800,000. In both categories it grew faster than the county average and faster than Third National. This growth, however, occurred at a substantially faster rate before 1960 than after that year. Before 1960 it was growing more rapidly than the other banks in the county, and after that year more slowly. Its share of total Nashville banking business thus [*9] declined from a high of 5.72% on June 30, 1960, to 4.83% on June 30, 1964.

---

[1] The opinion of the District Court is reported at 260 F.Supp. 869 (D. C. M. D. Tenn. 1966). Its findings of fact and conclusions of law are unreported. Probable jurisdiction was noted at 388 U.S. 905 (1967).

[2] United States v. Philadelphia National Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 326 (1963).

[3] We cite percentages of total assets for convenience, not because they are alone a valid indication of a bank's market share. The percentages of total deposits and of total loans held by the eight Davidson County banks varied insignificantly from the percentages of total assets. See the District Court's Finding of Fact No. 66.

[4] 260 F.Supp., at 881.

[5] Finding of Fact No. 91.

The District Court made elaborate findings as to why Nashville Bank and Trust "reached a plateau on which it remained until the date of the merger" and why in this period "it was a stagnant and floundering bank." [6] From those findings, and from the broad picture of Nashville Bank's history and operations which emerges from the testimony and exhibits in this case, it appears that the principal reason was that key members of its management, the men who had been responsible for the bank's progress in the late 1950's, had advanced in age and either retired or slowed their activities. The bank's officials nonetheless made but scant efforts to recruit and advance young talent. Nashville Bank paid substantially [*176] lower salaries than the other Nashville banks, had no funded pension plan, and conducted no systematic recruiting program. On January 1, 1964, the bank's board of directors had 13 members, of whom four were 75 or over, nine were 65 or older, and 11 were 63 or older. Of the six department heads four were 65 or older and the other two were 59. The average age of the 15 officers working outside [*10] the trust department was over 60. The District Court painted in somber hues the banking policies and the economic results which seemed to flow from the failure to hire young talent. Essentially, Nashville Bank was not aggressive or efficient, and it had stopped growing, so that it could not open branches (it had only one) or embark on a correspondent banking program. It was nevertheless an institution of substantial size, with assets of $ 50,900,000 and deposits of $ 45,500,000. It was profitable, and it offered somewhat different services, occasionally at somewhat lower rates, than its competitors.

In January 1964, the individuals who had owned controlling shares of Nashville Bank and Trust decided to sell 10,845 shares, a controlling interest, to a group of prominent Nashville citizens headed by William Weaver. The price was $ 350 per share. In February 1964, the Weaver group opened negotiations looking to a merger with Commerce Union Bank, Nashville's third largest. The negotiations [*11] were unsuccessful, however, because Weaver demanded $ 460 per share while Commerce Union offered only $ 360. Weaver then negotiated the sale to Third [887] National, at a price of about $ 420 per share. The merger was approved by the boards of directors of both banks on March 12, 1964, and, after approval by the Comptroller of the Currency, was consummated on August 18, 1964.

[*177] II.

LEdHN[1][] [1]The legislative history of the Bank Merger Act of 1966 [7] [*13] leaves no [1022] doubt that the Act was passed to make substantial changes in the law applicable to bank mergers. Congress was evidently dissatisfied with the 1960 Bank Merger Act as that Act was interpreted in United States v. Philadelphia National

---

[6] Finding of Fact No. 134.

[7] 80 Stat. 7, 12 U. S. C. § 1828 (c) (1964 ed., Supp. II). The Act provides, in relevant part:

HN1[] "(5) The responsible agency shall not approve --

"(A) any proposed merger transaction which would result in a monopoly, or which would be in furtherance of any combination or conspiracy to monopolize or to attempt to monopolize the business of banking in any part of the United States, or

"(B) any other proposed merger transaction whose effect in any section of the country may be substantially to lessen competition, or to tend to create a monopoly, or which in any other manner would be in restraint of trade, unless it finds that the anticompetitive effects of the proposed transaction are clearly outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served.

"In every case, the responsible agency shall take into consideration the financial and managerial resources and future prospects of the existing and proposed institutions, and the convenience and needs of the community to be served.

. . . .

"(7) . . . .

"(B) In any judicial proceeding attacking a merger transaction approved under paragraph (5) on the ground that the merger transaction alone and of itself constituted a violation of any antitrust laws other than [§ 2 of the Sherman Act], the standards applied by the court shall be identical with those that the banking agencies are directed to apply under paragraph (5)."

Bank, 374 U.S. 321 (1963), and in United States v. First National Bank & Trust Co. of Lexington, 376 U.S. 665 (1964), and wished to alter both the procedures by which the Justice Department challenges bank mergers and the legal standard which courts apply in judging [*12] those mergers. The resulting [*178] statute, however, as some members of Congress recognized, [8] was more clear and more specific in prescribing new procedures for testing mergers than in expounding the new standard by which they should be judged.

Last Term, in United States v. First City National Bank of Houston, 386 U.S. 361 (1967), this Court interpreted the procedural provisions of the 1966 Act, holding that HN2[] the Bank Merger Act provided for continued scrutiny of bank mergers under the Sherman Act and the Clayton Act, but had created a new defense, with the merging banks having the burden of proving that defense. HN3[] The task of the district courts was to inquire de novo into the validity of a bank merger approved by the relevant bank regulatory agency to determine, first, whether the merger offended the antitrust laws and, second, if it did, whether the banks had established that the merger was nonetheless justified by "the convenience and needs of the community to be served." Houston Bank reserved "all questions" concerning the substantive meaning of the [*14] "convenience and needs" defense. See 386 U.S., at 369, n. 1.

III.

The proceedings that have occurred until now regarding validity of the merger here before us have been scrambled and confused, largely because the relevant statute, the 1966 Bank Merger Act, became law just prior to the trial and did not receive its first interpretation [888] by this Court, in Houston Bank, until the decision below had been rendered.

The two banks agreed to merge on March 12, 1964. On April 27, 1964, they applied to the Comptroller [1023] of the Currency for approval, as the 1960 Bank Merger Act required. Pursuant to that Act, the Federal Reserve [*179] Board, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, and the Department of Justice reported to the Comptroller of the Currency on "the competitive factors involved." The Federal Reserve Board reported that the merger "would have clearly adverse effects on competition" by "eliminat[ing] direct competition which exists between participants and . . . increas[ing] significantly . . . already heavy concentration . . . ." The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation reported that "the effect of the proposed merger on competition [*15] would be unfavorable." The Department of Justice reported that the merger "would have severe anticompetitive effects upon banking competition in Metropolitan Nashville." The Comptroller of the Currency, however, concluded that the merger would not lessen competition and would "improve the charter bank's ability to serve the convenience and needs of the Nashville public." On August 4, 1964, he approved the merger.

On August 10, 1964, the United States, as this Court's decision in Philadelphia Bank authorized, sued in federal district court charging that the proposed merger was in violation of § 7 of the Clayton Act [9] and § 1 of the Sherman Act. [10] On August 18, 1964, the District Court refused the Government's request for a preliminary injunction staying consummation, and on that day the two banks merged.

[16] The antitrust suit against the merger had not come to trial when, on February 21, 1966, the Bank Merger Act of 1966 took effect. Congress had devoted much attention to the impact of that Act on bank mergers still in the process of litigation. In § 2 of the Act, 80 [*180] Stat. 10, Congress excluded from all antitrust liability [11] [*17] mergers which had been consummated before June 17, 1963, the date of this Court's Philadelphia Bank decision, and those consummated between June 17, 1963, and February 21, 1966, as to which the Attorney General had not

---

[8] See, e. g., 112 Cong. Rec. 2447 (remarks of Congressman Fino).

[9] 38 Stat. 731, as amended, 64 Stat. 1125, 15 U. S. C. § 18.

[10] 26 Stat. 209, 15 U. S. C. § 1. The United States appealed to this Court only from the dismissal of the § 7 Clayton Act charge. The § 1 Sherman Act count is therefore not before us.

[11] Liability for monopolization under § 2 of the Sherman Act was not excluded.

begun litigation on February 21, 1966. However, although Congress considered amendments which would have provided antitrust immunity also for those bank mergers [12] consummated after June 17, 1963, and already the subject of litigation, a decision was made to leave those mergers subject to liability, apparently [13] because the merging parties had known, from Philadelphia Bank, that their consummation was with the risk of an eventual order to dissolve. Congress did provide, in § 2 (c) of the Act, that courts hearing such cases "shall apply the substantive rule of law set forth" in the Act.

LEdHN[2A][] [2A]Since the trial had been held after the 1966 Act took effect, and since the Comptroller of the Currency and other witnesses, directed by counsel, had addressed themselves to the statutory language [1024] contained in that Act, the District Court saw no need to remand to the Comptroller for a new opinion in [889] light of the Act, as was ordered in United States v. Crocker-Anglo National Bank, 263 F.Supp. 125 (D. C. N. D. Cal. 1966). Proceeding to decide the case, the District Judge held that under the new Act, violation of antitrust standards was "primarily [*181] a legal issue . . . [on which courts should make] an [*18] independent determination," while "convenience and needs of the community is, in the language of the Crocker-Anglo opinion, 'plainly and unquestionably a legislative or administrative determination' . . . [on which] the Comptroller's findings should not be disturbed unless they are unsupported by substantial evidence." [14] The court concluded that the merger did not offend antitrust standards and that the Comptroller's conclusion that it would benefit the community was supported by substantial evidence. The relief sought by the Justice Department was denied.

LEdHN[2B][] [2B]

[19] IV.

LEdHN[3A][] [3A]LEdHN[4A][] [4A]The District Court asserted that one effect of the Bank Merger Act of 1966 was to alter the standards used in determining whether a merger is in violation of § 7 of the Clayton Act and § 1 of the Sherman Act. Essentially, the District Court mandated a return to United States v. Columbia Steel Co., 334 U.S. 495 (1948), which this Court has held to be "confined to its special facts." Lexington Bank, 376 U.S., at 672. In later cases, especially Philadelphia Bank, supra; Lexington Bank, supra; United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 377 U.S. 271 (1964); and United States v. Continental Can Co., 378 U.S. 441 (1964), this Court has rejected the Columbia Steel approach to determining whether a merger will tend "substantially to lessen competition." We find in the 1966 Act, which adopted precisely that § 7 Clayton Act phrase, as well as the "restraint of trade" [*182] language of Sherman Act § 1, no [*20] intention to adopt an "antitrust standard" for bank cases different from that used generally in the law. [15] Only one conclusion can be drawn from the exhaustive legislative deliberations that preceded passage of the Act: HN4[] Congress intended bank mergers first to be subject to the usual antitrust analysis; if a merger failed that scrutiny, it was to be permissible only if the merging banks could

---

[12] Three mergers are in this category: the Nashville merger at issue here; a California merger, see United States v. Crocker-Anglo National Bank, 263 F.Supp. 125 (D. C. N. D. Cal. 1966); and a St. Louis merger. See H. R. Rep. No. 1221, 89th Cong., 2d Sess., 4.

[13] See, e. g., 112 Cong. Rec. 2465 (remarks of Congressman Ashley).

[14] 260 F.Supp., at 874. If the District Court failed to review the issues in the case de novo, as this quotation suggests, it committed error. Houston Bank, supra. Other statements in the opinion and findings below suggest that a de novo judgment may also have been reached by the District Court. Our disposition of the case makes it unnecessary to decide whether undue deference was paid to the Comptroller's judgment.

[15] We also find in the Act on intention to alter the traditional methods of defining relevant markets in which to appraise the anticompetitive effect of a merger, and so agree with the District Court that commercial banking in Davidson County was the relevant market for appraising this merger.

establish that the merger's benefits to the community would outweigh its anticompetitive disadvantages. See Houston Bank, supra. Congressman Minish spoke in tune with the language of the Act and the statements of his colleagues when he said:

"It should also be clear from the language of paragraph (5)(b) of this bill, which establishes this single [1025] standard, that the competitive factor to be used is drawn directly from Clayton Act section 7 and Sherman Act section 1. Thus, all of the principles developed over the last 75 years in regard to these statutes, such as the definition of relevant market and the failing company doctrine are [890] carried forward unchanged by this proposed [*21] legislation." [16]

LEdHN[3B][] [3B] LEdHN[4B][] [4B]

LEdHN[5][] [5]We therefore hold that the District Court employed an erroneous standard in applying § 7 of the Clayton Act to the merger. In addition we hold that, appraised by the test enunciated in recent Clayton Act [*22] cases, the [*183] tendency of the merger substantially to lessen competition is apparent. Nashville had three large banks and one of middle size. In this merger the bank of middle size was absorbed by the second largest of the big banks. By the merger the market share of the three largest banks rose from 93% to 98%; the merged bank alone had almost 40% of the Nashville banking business. In addition, the record is replete with evidence that Nashville Bank and Trust was in fact an important competitive element in certain, though not in all, facets of Nashville banking. It offered somewhat different services, at somewhat different rates, from those offered by other banks, and some customers found those services desirable. Although Nashville Bank failed to increase its percentage share of the Nashville banking market after 1960, the absolute size of its business increased steadily from 1956, when it entered seriously into the commercial banking market, to the date of the merger. Throughout this period it was profitable. The record permits no conclusion that Nashville Bank was in any way a "failing" company. See International Shoe Co. v. FTC, 280 U.S. 291 (1930). [*23] On these facts, the conclusion is inescapable that the merger of Third National Bank in Nashville with Nashville Bank and Trust Co. tended to lessen competition in the Nashville commercial banking market. Philadelphia Bank, supra.

V.

LEdHN[6A][] [6A]Because the District Court erroneously concluded that the merger would not tend to lessen competition, its conclusion upon weighing the competitive effect against the asserted benefits to the community is suspect. To weigh adequately one of these factors against the other requires a proper conclusion as to each. Having decided that the court below erred in assessing competitive impact, we should remand, so that the District Court [*184] can perform again the balancing process mandated by the Act. [17]

[24] There is, however, an additional reason to remand. In our view, the [1026] District Court misapprehended the meaning of the phrase "convenience and needs of the community"; it misunderstood the weight to be given the relevant factors when seeking to determine whether the anticompetitive effects of a merger are "clearly outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served."

LEdHN[7][] [7]HN5[] The purpose of the Bank Merger Act was to permit certain bank mergers even though they tended to lessen competition in the relevant market. Congress felt that the role of banks in a community's economic life was such that the public interest would sometimes be served by a bank merger even though [891]

---

[16] 112 Cong. Rec. 2451. See also 112 Cong. Rec. 2441-2442 (remarks of Congressman Patman); 112 Cong. Rec. 2455 (remarks of Congressman Annunzio); 112 Cong. Rec. 2452 (remarks of Congressman Reuss); 112 Cong. Rec. 2655 (statement of Senator Robertson).

[17] Although the District Court erroneously determined the antitrust impact of the merger, its judgment that the merger was not unlawful under the Act may nevertheless have resulted from a sufficient weighing of the evidence before it. Some of the findings below suggest the view that the merger would tend to lessen competition but that this anticompetitive effect would be outweighed by benefits to the community. The argument need not be pursued, however, since we hold that the District Court also misapplied the Act's convenience-and-needs provision.

the merger lessened competition. The public interest was the ultimate test imposed. This is clear not only from the language of the Act but from the statements of those who supported it while the Act was under consideration:

"Mr. ASHLEY. [*25] . . . In other words, the merger must be shown to be sufficiently beneficial in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served that, on balance, it may properly be regarded as in the public interest.

. . . .

[*185] "Mr. MULTER. . . . I believe it was the intention of the Congress originally in 1960 when we enacted the Bank Merger Act that the public interest should be paramount in making any determination with reference to a merger. The words 'in the public interest' are again written into this bill now and will remain in the law so that there will be no question but that the courts and the agencies must take the public interest into account.

. . . .

"Mr. ASHLEY. Is the gentleman saying, as I believe he is, that it is the consensus of the committee, in drafting this bill, that the public interest is to be considered as combining the consideration both of the anticompetitive factors of a particular merger on the one hand, and, on the other, the needs and convenience of the community that may derive from that merger, which, as I say, may result in a diminution of competition; in other words, that the public interest has got to involve a consideration of both [*26] of these rather considerable factors?

"Mr. STEPHENS. That is correct . . . ." 112 Cong. Rec. 2446, 2449, 2450.

It is plain that Congress considered both competition in commercial banking and satisfaction of "the convenience and needs of the community" to be in the public interest. It concluded that a merger should be judged in terms of its overall effect upon the public interest. HN6[] If a merger posed a choice between preserving competition and satisfying the requirements of convenience and need, the injury and benefit were to be weighed and decision was to rest on which alternative better served the public interest.

The necessity of choosing is most clearly posed where the proposed merger would create an institution with [*186] capabilities for serving the public interest not possessed by either of the two merging institutions alone and where the potential could be realized only through merger. Thus, it might be claimed, as it is in this case, that a combined bank would have a greater [1027] lending capacity and hence be better equipped to serve the financial needs of the community. [*27] In Philadelphia Bank, 374 U.S., at 370-371, this Court, acting under the 1960 Bank Merger Act, rejected the relevance of the combined bank's ability to serve Philadelphia by making large loans that could otherwise only be obtained in New York. The Court found no statutory authorization for considering such a benefit in appraising the legality of a merger. Expressions in Congress during consideration of the 1966 Act suggest that one purpose of that Act was to give this factor, not previously relevant in appraising bank mergers, suitable weight in judging their validity. [18] In the case before us the District Court's findings of fact suggest that the new bank, with a 20% greater lending limit than Third National Bank previously had, was able to make larger loans, for which Nashville area companies had previously to go to Chicago or New York. The District Court also stated that because Third National Bank operated with a higher loans-to-deposits ratio than Nashville Bank and Trust, combining their deposits [892] and applying the Third National Bank ratio to the total increased available lending capacity in Nashville by about $ 2,800,000. But the District Court [*28] was not specific in describing the beneficial consequences of such results for the Nashville community, or in defining the value of these additions, especially as compared with the other, and less desirable, results of the merger. Absent such findings, the increased lending capacity of the new bank weighs very little in the balance.

[*187] Congress was also concerned about banks in danger of collapse -- banks not so deeply in trouble as to call forth the traditional "failing company" defense, but nonetheless in danger of becoming before long financially unsound institutions. [19] [*30] Congress seems to have felt that a bank failure is a much greater community catastrophe than the failure of an industrial or retail enterprise, and that HN7[] a much smaller risk of failure than that required by the failing company doctrine should be sufficient to justify the [*29] rather radical preventive step of an anticompetitive merger. The Findings of Fact of the District Court included the information that Nashville Bank and Trust Company had a higher than usual percentage of unsound loans, the result of unsatisfactory procedures for investigating and judging credit risks, and that its "rating" had been changed in 1962 from "satisfactory" to "fair." The District Court drew no conclusion about the extent of the danger these conditions posed for Nashville Bank and Trust's future, about the feasibility of curative measures short of merger, or about whether other healthy aspects of the bank's condition -- for instance its steady profitability, including after-tax earnings of $ 368,000 in 1963 [20] -- removed [1028] any danger of failure in the foreseeable future. Absent findings and conclusions of this nature, [21] [*188] the District Court seemed to be holding that the merger should be approved simply because Nashville Bank and Trust Company could be a better bank and could render better banking services.

---

[18] See, e. g., 112 Cong. Rec. 2663 (remarks of Senator Robertson).

The District Court, it appears, considered the merger beneficial to the community because Nashville Bank and Trust had only one branch, because it had no program of correspondent banking, because its operations were not computerized, because it emphasized real estate loans rather than commercial loans, because its management was old and unable [*31] to render sound business advice to borrowers, because it was not recruiting new talent, and because its salary scale was low. Hence a merger was justified because it would solve these problems and produce an institution which, in the words of the House Report, would be capable of "furnishing better overall service to the community, even though the reduction in the number of competing units, or the concentration in the share of the market in one or more lines of commerce, might result under general antitrust law criteria in a substantial lessening of competition." H. R. Rep. No. 1221, 89th Cong., 2d Sess., 3. (Emphasis in original.)

[893] LEdHN[8][] [8]Undeniably, Nashville Bank and Trust had significant problems of the kind outlined in the findings of the District Court, problems which were primarily rooted in unsatisfactory and backward management. Just as surely, HN8[] securing better banking service for the community is a proper element for consideration in weighing convenience and need against the loss [*32] of competition. Nor is there any doubt on this record that merger with Third National would very probably end the managerial problems of Nashville Bank and Trust and secure the better [*189] use of its assets in the public interest. Thus if the gains in better service outweighed the anticompetitive detriment and the merger was essential to secure this net gain to the public interest, the merger should be approved.

But this analysis puts aside possible ways of satisfying the requirement of convenience and need without resort to merger. If the injury to the public interest flowing from the loss of competition could be avoided and the convenience and needs of the community benefited in ways short of merger but within the competence of reasonably able businessmen, the situation is radically different. In such circumstances, we seriously doubt that Congress intended a merger to be authorized by either the banking agencies or the courts. If, for example, just prior to this merger, an experienced banker with competent associates had offered to take over the active management of the bank or another competent businessman with a willingness to tackle the management problems of the bank [*33] had offered to buy out the Weaver interests at an acceptable price, it seems obvious that the Weaver group, which seeks to justify the merger in terms of producing an institution rendering better banking service, should not be permitted to merge and to ignore an available alternative. Otherwise, the benefits of [1029] competition, [19] See, e. g., 112 Cong. Rec. 2459-2460 (remarks of Congressman Multer).

---

[20] In Finding of Fact No. 181 the District Court concluded that the bank's "apparently good earnings record" would have been diminished, absent a merger, by "the expenditures which needed to be made for the proper maintenance of the bank." Among these expenditures were increased salaries, automation, and establishment of additional branch offices. There is no reason to think that such investment of accrued profits would not have been rewarded with a fair return in the form of increased future profits.

[21] The District Court did conclude, in Finding of Fact No. 184, that the merger was "a business necessity" for Nashville Bank and Trust Co. This general conclusion, without supporting findings, hardly establishes the possibility of eventual failure.

acknowledged by Congress, would be sacrificed needlessly. For the same reasons, we think it was incumbent upon those seeking to merge in this case to demonstrate that they made reasonable efforts to solve the management dilemma of Nashville Bank short of merger with a major competitor but failed in these attempts, or that any such efforts would have been unlikely to succeed.

LEdHN[9][] [9]This seems to us the most rational reading of the Act, which was a compromise and satisfied none of the protagonists [*190] in this extended controversy. HN9[] The Act directs the agencies and the courts to consider managerial as well as financial resources in weighing a proposed merger. However, [*34] HN10[] the Act requires as well that the "future prospects of the existing and proposed institutions" be appraised. Part of such appraisal, where managerial deficiencies exist as they do in this case, is determining whether the merging bank is capable of obtaining its own improved management. This test does not demand the impossible or the unreasonable. It merely insists that HN11[] before a merger injurious to the public interest is approved, a showing be made that the gain expected from the merger cannot reasonably be expected through other means.

The question we therefore face is whether the findings of the District Court sufficiently or reliably establish the unavailability of alternative solutions to the woes of Nashville Bank and Trust Company. In our view, they do not. The District Court described the nature and extent of the bank's managerial shortcomings. It noted that the Weaver group had discussed these matters extensively with a number of persons, including bankers, and had learned that recruiting new management would be "extremely [*35] difficult" at the salaries paid by Nashville Bank. And it concluded that management procurement was difficult for banks in general and an "almost insoluble" problem for Nashville Bank and Trust.

Just how insoluble was not made clear. The District Court did not ask [894] whether the Weaver group had made concrete efforts to recruit new management, especially a chief executive officer, who was needed most. The record seems clear that they made no proposals to any individual prospects in or outside of Nashville, save one rather casual letter to a banking acquaintance in New York, and that they neither sought nor cared to seek the help of firms specializing in finding or [*191] furnishing new management. [22] The court made no reference to the possibility that the new owners themselves might have taken active charge of the bank. None of them was a banker, but their successful predecessor Hackworth had not been one before becoming president of Nashville Bank. [23] [*37] Nor did the [1030] court assess the possibility of a sale to others who might have been willing to face up to the management difficulties over a more extended period. We find nothing in the findings indicating [*36] that a bank with assets of $ 50,000,000 was simply too small to attract competent management [24] [*192] or that the Weaver group, the new owners, were intransigently insisting on unreasonably conservative managerial policies. Indeed, the Weaver group included competent and experienced men who realized the [22] An official of a company specializing in recruitment of executives did testify for the banks at the trial. In his opinion, recruiting executives for Nashville Bank and Trust would have been extremely difficult.

---

[23] The record contains the revealing statement by William C. Weaver, Jr., the leading member of the group which owned the bank at the time of the merger:

"We finally concluded before we agreed to the merger agreement with the Third National Bank that, if one of us, one of our group, was unable to go down there to the Trust Company and devote full time to its affairs -- I would like to say right here that none of us in the group had any commercial banking experience, and that was a serious problem.

"But we concluded that if we were unable to devote our full time to the affairs of the bank, it would be in the best interests of the customers of the bank, the employees of the bank, the stockholders of the bank, and the Nashville community, for us to merge with the Third National Bank."

Mr. Weaver seems to have felt that one or more members of the new ownership group would have been able to furnish satisfactory executive leadership for the bank.

[24] Capital City Bank, founded in 1960 and but one-fourth the size of Nashville Bank and Trust Co., was apparently flourishing.

In this regard, a recent study concluded that "the small bank can compete successfully with the large bank -- if it has the will to do so." Kohn, Competitive Capabilities of Small Banks, 60 Banking, January 1968, at 64, reporting on the New York State Banking Department's research study, The Future of Small Banks.

desirability of improving an unsatisfactory situation. Rather than making serious efforts to do so themselves or to sell to others who would, they preferred to merge with a competing bank -- a step which produced a profit of $ 750,000 on a two-month investment of $ 3,800,000.

LEdHN[10][] [10]The burden of showing that an anticompetitive bank merger would be in the public interest because of the benefits it would bring to the convenience and needs of the community to be served rests on the merging banks. Houston Bank, supra. A showing that one bank needed more lively and efficient management, absent a showing that the alternative means for securing such management without a merger would present unusually severe difficulties, cannot be considered to satisfy that burden.

We therefore conclude that the District Court was in error in holding that the factors [*38] it cited as ways in which this merger benefited the Nashville community were sufficient

LEdHN[6B][] [6B] to outweigh the anticompetitive effects of the merger. The case must be remanded so that the District Court can consider again the application of the Bank Merger Act to the facts of this merger. Because the [895] District Court heard this case before Houston Bank was decided, it may wish to consider reopening the record, so that the parties will have an opportunity to present new evidence in light of the intervening interpretations of the Act. The judgment below is reversed and the case is remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

MR. JUSTICE FORTAS and MR. JUSTICE MARSHALL took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

Concur by: HARLAN (In Part)

Dissent by: HARLAN (In Part)

Dissent

[*193] MR. JUSTICE HARLAN, whom MR. JUSTICE STEWART joins, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

My understanding of the procedural structure of the Bank Merger Act of 1966, [1] based on our decision last Term in United States v. First [1031] City National Bank of Houston, 386 U.S. 361, 364, [*39] is that the Act requires the District Court to engage in a two-step process. First, the District Court must decide whether the merger, considered solely from an antitrust viewpoint, would violate the Clayton Act standard embodied in the Bank Merger Act. If it would not, the inquiry is over. If there would be a violation, then the District Court must go on to decide whether "the anticompetitive effects of the proposed transaction are clearly outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served." [2] In making the latter decision, the District Court must again evaluate the antitrust factor, this time in a less polar way. For a comparatively minor violation of the Clayton Act, like that in this case, obviously may be more readily outweighed by factors relating to "convenience and needs" than may a relatively serious infraction.

[40] Turning to the application of the Act to this case, the first question is whether the merger, as an antitrust matter, would violate the Clayton Act. I continue to disagree, particularly in the banking field, with the "numbers game" test for determining Clayton Act violations which was adopted by this Court in United States v. Philadelphia National Bank, 374 U.S. 321. However, I consider myself bound by that decision, and under its dictates I concur in the Court's finding that this merger would violate the Act.

---

[1] 80 Stat. 7, 12 U. S. C. § 1828 (c) (1964 ed., Supp. II).

[2] Bank Merger Act of 1966, amending § 18 (c)(5)(B) of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act, 12 U. S. C. § 1828 (c)(5)(B) (1964 ed., Supp. II).

[*194] I also concur in the Court's decision that this case must be remanded so that there may be a new application of the second-step balancing process. In this case, which was decided before our decision in Houston Bank, supra, the District Court either omitted the first of the two indicated procedural steps or concluded, incorrectly, that the merger would not violate the Clayton Act. [3] In either event, the error may have caused the District Court to misconceive the antitrust "threshold" at which the second-step balancing process was intended to come into play. This, in turn, may have led the court to give the "anticompetitive effect" of [*41] the merger a different weight in the balance than was intended by the framers of the Bank Merger Act. Hence, the case must be remanded to the District Court so that it may reweigh the competing factors in light of the correct antitrust threshold.

With regard to the "convenience and needs" side of the balance, I am in accord with the Court's ruling that a merger should not be approved under the 1966 Act unless the District Court finds that [896] the benefits conferred upon the community by the merger could not reasonably have been achieved in other ways. Unlike the Court, however, I conclude from the record that the District Court did make adequate findings on this issue. The record reveals that many witnesses testified that Nashville Bank had problems of real magnitude, the greatest being to find replacements for key executives. Mr. Weaver, the leader of the [*42] group which purchased control of the bank not long before the merger, testified that initially his group had intended to operate the [1032] bank themselves, but that talks with many bankers had convinced him that his group could not solve the bank's problems. The head of an executive-placement firm [*195] testified that he did not believe that he could have found new executives for Nashville Bank, in light of its overall situation. [4] Although there was testimony in rebuttal, including that of another recruiter of executives, to the effect that the problems were not unsolvable, I cannot conclude that the District Court committed error when it held that "While there is some conflict, the preponderance of the evidence is that it would have been practically impossible within any reasonable period of time to obtain adequate managerial replacements either from within the bank or from the outside, a product of the bank's failure . . . to provide itself with the facilities, procedures and equipment required to maintain a competitive posture." 260 F.Supp. 869, 881.

[43] In sum, what I would consider to be the scope of the proceedings on remand is this. In light of our holding that a Clayton Act violation has been made out, further consideration of the first-step antitrust issue by the District Court is foreclosed. Believing, as I do but contrary to the Court, that the findings already made by the District Court as to the alternatives to merger are adequate, in my view the only question for the District Court to consider respecting the second step is whether, because of its character in light of the antitrust standard now set forth, the antitrust violation should yield to other factors bearing on public "convenience and needs."

References

Am Jur, Monopolies, Combinations, and Restraints of Trade (1st ed 95, 147-154)

US Digest Anno, Restraints of Trade and Monopolies 34.5

ALR Digests, Restraints of Trade and Monopolies 17.5

L ed Index to Anno, Banks; Restraints of Trade and Monopolies

ALR Quick Index, Banks and Banking; Restraints of Trade and Monopolies

Annotation References:

---

[3] The District Court's opinion is unclear as to whether the court considered it necessary to make a discrete finding under the Clayton Act.

[4] An account of Nashville Bank's overall situation appears in the Court's opinion, ante, at 175-176.

Construction, by Supreme Court of the United States, of 7 of [*44] the Clayton Act (15 USC 18), dealing with acquisition by one corporation of stock of another. 14 L ed 2d 784.

Application to banks and banking institutions of antimonopoly or antitrust laws. 83 ALR2d 374.

End of Document

State v. McBride Transp., Inc.

Supreme Court of New York, Special Term, New York County

March 5, 1968

No Number in Original

Reporter
56 Misc. 2d 90 *; 288 N.Y.S.2d 170 ; 1968 N.Y. Misc. LEXIS 1676 ; 1968 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,382

State of New York, Plaintiff, v. McBride Transportation, Inc., et al., Defendants Disposition: [1] The motion is in all respects denied.

Core Terms

carriers, transportation, conspiracy, anti-trust, protest, milk, rates, commission's approval, primary jurisdiction, proposed agreement, milk product, Donnelly Act, defendants', practices, immunity, tariffs, prices

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Transportation Law > Carrier Duties & Liabilities > Rates & Tariffs

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Transportation > General Overview

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Transportation Law > Interstate Commerce > Restraints of Trade

HN1[] Regulated Practices, Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade

N.Y. Pub. Serv. Law § 63-cc(7) provides: Parties to any agreement approved by the Public Service Commission under § 63-cc and other persons are, if the approval of such agreement is not prohibited by paragraph three or four, hereby relieved from the operation of the N.Y. Gen. Bus. Law § 340 with respect to the making of such agreement, and with respect to the carrying out of such agreement.

Administrative Law > Judicial Review > Administrative Record > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Antitrust Issues > General Overview

Administrative Law > Judicial Review > General Overview

Administrative Law > Judicial Review > Standards of Review > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Actual Monopolization > Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Administrative Proceedings > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > ... > Public Utility Commissions > Hearings & Orders > Judicial Review

HN2[] Judicial Review, Administrative Record

A court is limited upon judicial review of an ex parte administrative record before the Public Service Commission (PSC) of an approval or disapproval of an application or by-laws to examine only that question which the applicable statute, N.Y. Pub. Serv. Law § 63-cc, has specified for determination, i.e., approval of an agreement only if in furtherance of State transportation policy. Judicial review of the PSC's determination of the ex parte application is not a substitute for judicial enforcement under the Donnelly Act of anti-competitive practices.

Governments > State & Territorial Governments > Claims By & Against

HN3[] State & Territorial Governments, Claims By & Against

The State cannot be estopped on any equitable grounds from exercising its sovereign power with respect to claimed unlawful conspiracy and continuing activities.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Transportation Law > Interstate Commerce > Restraints of Trade

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Transportation > General Overview

HN4[] Regulated Practices, Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade

Even though Public Service Commission approval would serve to render certain of the conduct charged immune from challenge such activities may nevertheless be challenged as components of a conspiracy to achieve an unlawful end. The practices immunized, if such practices are part of a conspiracy to achieve an unlawful end, would, by the loss of that immunity be rendered unlawful.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Utility Companies > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Transportation > General Overview

HN5[] Regulated Practices, Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade

Donnelly Act violation may not be used as immunity or shield to achieve the regulation of commerce, envisioned by agreement under the Public Service Law, and thus unlawfully to restrain commerce and competition and to dilute the standards adopted in the public interest. The Public Service Commission cannot give relief under the Donnelly Act.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Remedies > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > Jurisdiction Over Actions > General Overview

Administrative Law > Separation of Powers > Jurisdiction

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Jurisdiction > Jurisdictional Sources > Statutory Sources

HN6[] Sherman Act, Remedies

The court will not abdicate its responsibility nor surrender its jurisdiction to an administrative agency where the regulatory statute does not provide for adequate or similar relief under the Sherman Act.

Headnotes/Summary

Headnotes

Monopolies -- action by Attorney-General -- motion to dismiss complaint by Attorney-General charging milk transportation companies with violation of antitrust law including use of force and other unlawful means is denied -- Public Service Commission does not have exclusive jurisdiction of matter because defendants filed agreement as permitted by section 63-cc of Public Service Law seeking Commission approval; acts alleged in complaint cannot be sanctioned by approval of agreement -- by protesting to Commission, State has not conferred exclusive jurisdiction on Commission.

1. Defendants' motion to dismiss the complaint in an action commenced by the Attorney-General pursuant to the Donnelly Antitrust Act (General Business Law, § 340) upon an agreement in restraint of competition and free exercise of activity in the conduct of business in the transportation of milk and milk products, including the use of force or other unlawful means to achieve price stability, is denied.

2. Subdivision 7 of section 63-cc of the Public Service Law provides that parties to any agreement approved by the Public Service Commission are relieved from the [2] operation of section 340 of the General Business Law with respect to the making and carrying out of such agreement. Defendants alleged that they filed an agreement with the Public Service Commission and are awaiting a decision thereon, that plaintiff filed objections to approval, that plaintiff has failed to exhaust its remedy before the Commission, and that the Commission has primary jurisdiction of the matter. Should the Commission act, upon judicial review of such action, the court would be able to review only the question whether the agreement was in furtherance of the State's transportation policy and therefore would not be able to dispose of the issues presented here including the acts alleged in the complaint to be harmful to the People and involving activities not to be sanctioned by the agreement or its approval. The Commission's jurisdiction does not exclude that of the court. Commission approval does not approve the machinery used to carry out the purposes of the agreement. The Commission cannot deal with activities in excess of those it is empowered to approve and cannot give relief under the Donnelly Act. The issue of antitrust violation must be determined in this [3] action.

3. By lodging a protest before the Commission, the State has not conferred exclusive jurisdiction on the Commission.

Counsel: Zelby & Burstein for defendants.

Louis J. Lefkowitz, Attorney-General (Louis Smigel, Samuel A. Hirshowitz and George C. Mantzoros of counsel), for plaintiff.

Judges: Samuel A. Spiegel, J.

Opinion by: SPIEGEL

Opinion

[*90] [172] Defendants move for dismissal of the complaint, or, in the alternative, for a stay of proceedings upon the ground that the court does not have jurisdiction of the subject matter.

Defendants contend that this matter is in the exclusive primary jurisdiction of the Public Service Commission (hereinafter referred to as Commission or PSC), that the plaintiff has failed to exhaust its remedy before the Commission, and, alternatively, that the regulation of milk-handling is reserved exclusively [*91] to the Secretary of Agriculture, in pursuance of the Agricultural Adjustment Act (U. S. Code, tit. 7, § 601 et seq.), pre-empting the entire field of regulation.

It is alleged in the complaint that this action is instituted by the Attorney-General, pursuant to the Donnelly Antitrust Act (General Business Law, [4] § 340), upon an agreement in restraint of competition and free exercise of activity in the conduct of business in the transportation of milk and milk products.

Defendant Tank Carriers Conference, Inc. (hereinafter called "Conference") is a membership corporation whose purpose, among other things, is to "provide a medium thereof which its members may engage in publication and filing of rates and tariffs with State and Federal regulatory agencies." The Conference certificate of incorporation further provides that nothing therein contained "shall authorize or empower the corporation to perform or engage in any acts or practices prohibited by Article 22 of the General Business Law or other antimonopoly statutes of this State."

The Attorney-General charges that for many years the defendants and others arranged and combined to restrain competition and free exercise of activity in the business of the transportation of milk and milk products in violation of section 340 of the General Business Law.

In furtherance of such arrangement and combination, it is charged that the defendants and others did solicit, induce and persuade, urge and coerce other carriers to participate in the Conference's [5] price-fixing procedures and to adopt the prices as thus fixed, and to increase their [173] transportation prices. The Conference filed protests and complaints before a regulatory agency against noncomplying carriers which were charging lower prices. It is further charged that it negotiated with carriers against whom such protests and complaints had been filed, to join the Conference, and to increase their prices. Thereafter, said Conference withdrew protests and complaints upon increase of their rates by such carriers. It was also represented in the "purpose" clause of the Conference's certificate of incorporation that it was formed to publish and file tariffs of member carriers, but, it is alleged, the Conference's contemplated purpose to establish procedures for the joint consideration and determination of rates was omitted and concealed.

It is alleged that the effect of such arrangement and combination and of the actions taken in pursuance thereof is to raise the transportation and hauling price, to maintain and stabilize noncompetitive transportation rates and tariffs, to prevent and interfere with the freedom of carriers to establish their own [*92] transportation [6] prices, to reduce, suppress, and eliminate competition in the transportation of milk and milk products, thus depriving consumers and bottlers and processors of fluid milk and the users of other dairy products in bulk of the benefits of competition.

Defendants McBride Transportation, Inc. and C & E Trucking Corporation are common carriers authorized by the Public Service Commission to transport milk and milk products between points within the State of New York. They are members of the defendant Conference, a membership corporation whose members are authorized carriers. Said Conference filed an application with the Commission on November 28, 1966, for approval of an agreement which, defendants assert, purports to permit members of the Conference to jointly consider, negotiate, and establish transportation rates within the State of New York. The application for approval of the agreement states:

"In order to provide reliable and regular service required it is necessary for these carriers to have a forum available for the discussion of rate matters in order that said carriers may be enabled to maintain their ability to provide the necessary standards of service to the public. Further [7] the applicant Conference makes possible compliance with the Commission's rules and regulations at a minimum cost and expense to the member carriers. For the reasons afore-mentioned applicant respectfully states that approval of this application will be in harmony with the transportation policy of this state and in furtherance of the public interest. * * *

"Filed herewith as Exhibit 1 is a copy of the Conference's By-Laws which together with Exhibit 2, its membership application, constitutes the agreement between and among the members of the Conference for which approval is sought. [174] " Listed as constituting the members of the Conference are the two codefendants.

HN1[] Subdivision 7 of section 63-cc of the Public Service Law provides: "Parties to any agreement approved by the commission under this section and other persons are, if the approval of such agreement is not prohibited by paragraph three or four, hereby relieved from the operation of the general business law section three hundred forty, with respect to the making of such agreement, and with respect to the carrying out of such agreement". If the application is approved, the Conference and its members will be free to [8] engage in joint consideration and the establishment of rates.

Defendants urge that plaintiff is endeavoring here to prevent by judical adjudication that which the Commission is designed [*93] to permit on approval of the application before it and that until the Commission has acted, this suit is premature. Of course, this is true if the grievances tendered by the complaint pertain solely to activities to be lawfully engendered by approval of the pending application before the Commission in implementation of the proposed agreement.

Before considering the merit of the contentions of the parties as to the power of the court to entertain the action or, in the alternative, the propriety of a stay pending a resolution of the matter before the Commission, it is in order to note that while there is a lifting of the application of the Donnelly Act to activities in the effectuation of the agreement, if it is approved, said immunity does not attach until there is such approval. This may well be the key to the basic question whether the matters now before this court are the same matters before the Commission on the Conference application and plaintiff's protest thereto. Nor can it be [9] contested that relief from the operation of the Donnelly Act cannot go to acts beyond orderly and lawful activity in carrying out the proposed agreement upon approval thereof for joint consensual action.

In short, the question is whether there remains overriding State interest in the prevention of unlawful activity.

Milk is the most precious food for babies. Along with bread, it is the staff of life for practically everyone. The best interests of the public are served by free competition and by preventing the price of milk and milk products from being fixed directly or indirectly by a conspiracy or by coercion. To that end this action to prevent unlawful activity was appropriately instituted.

This is akin to that area of State power in labor relations to enjoin and to enforce claims and rights in respect of alleged tortious conduct, which at the same time may include actions protected by Federal act, and constituting unfair labor practice, even while a charge of unfair labor practice may be pending before the National Labor Relations Board.

[175] Thus, as defendants argue, the Commission does indeed have primary jurisdiction over the matters which are the subject of the [10] application before it. Does that primary jurisdiction, however, before or after approval of application, furnish an umbrella under which defendants may with impunity engage in the additional activities of which the plaintiff complains? We do not believe so. Is this court action premature? Again, we do not believe so. Does the primary jurisdiction of the PSC mean sole jurisdiction to the exclusion of the court. The answer is no.

[*94] Judicial review upon an ex parte administrative record before the PSC of an approval or disapproval of the defendant Conference's application or by-laws, on the limited issue of furtherance of the State's transportation policy, would be insufficient to a disposition of the issues presented in the case at bar. (Matter of Reynolds v. Triborough Bridge & Tunnel Auth., 276 App. Div. 388.) HN2[] This court, therefore, would be limited upon judicial review, to examine only that question which the applicable statute (Public Service Law, § 63-cc) has specified for determination, i.e., approval of an agreement only if in furtherance of State transportation policy. (Staten Is. Edison Corp. v. Maltbie, 296 N. Y. 374.)

Judicial review of [11] the PSC's determination of the defendant Conference's ex parte application is not a substitute for judicial enforcement under the Donnelly Act of the anti-competitive practices alleged in the case at bar.

If defendants' view is adopted this court, under CPLR 7803 (subd. 3), would then be limited in determining only whether the administrative determination was "arbitrary and capricious or an abuse of discretion." This court could never pass upon the defendants' predatory acts and practices set forth in the complaint, which are harmful to the people of the State of New York. (Matter of Wager v. State Liq. Auth., 151 N. Y. S. 2d 274, affd. 3 A D 2d 934; Matter of Mouakad v. Ross, 274 App. Div. 74.) Judicial review would be after approval of the application by the Commission. Such approval neither determines the validity or culpability of acts previously engaged in nor predetermines the validity and culpability of actions taken in the future in claimed implementation of the approved agreement.

Thus, defendants argue that the Commission has sole jurisdiction over rate-making and that price-fixing is permitted if an agreement therefor is approved. To that extent, certainly, [12] price-fixing is indeed involved, both here, of which plaintiff complains, and before the Commission, for which defendants seek approval. Stated in that manner, the issue appears to be confined, circumscribed and limited to the same in each instance. On examination, however, it is not so. Commission approval does not sanction or approve the machinery used [176] to carry out the purposes of the agreement. Such Commission approval is not to be construed as a license to use force or other unlawful means to achieve price stability, and standards of service to the public not in harmony with the State transportation policy and not consonant with the furtherance of the best interests of the public.

[*95] The purpose of the State transportation policy and of Commission approval is certainly not for the elimination of competition by unlawful means.

HN3[] The State cannot be estopped on any equitable grounds from exercising its sovereign power with respect to claimed unlawful conspiracy and continuing activities. (State of New York v. New York Movers Tariff Bur., 48 Misc 2d 225.) This is so particularly where the acts of which complaint is made appear to involve activities [13] not to be sanctioned by the proposed agreement and its approval.

In Movers Tariff Bur. (supra, pp. 233-234) the essence of the complaint as it was summarized by the court there was: "and the essence of the complaint is the existence of agreements between and among carriers, such alleged agreements being of the nature set forth in subdivision 1 of section 63-cc of the Public Service Law. It would appear, therefore, that the Legislature has given the Public Service Commission express jurisdiction to consider the alleged activities and transactions set forth in the complaint." Despite recognition of the mandate of the Legislature, the court there permitted the plaintiff to maintain the action.

Here, the essence of the complaint, as it relates to alleged conspiracy, is not directed alone to a conspiracy by joint consideration of rate-making, but also to activities to coerce others, including nonmembers, to comply with Conference agreements and thereby to eliminate competition by unlawful and unsanctioned means.

In this litigation, the Attorney-General, while protesting in the administrative proceeding, is not seeking similar relief here collaterally.

The Attorney-General's [14] protest to the Public Service Commission, as distinguished from this broader litigation, on the narrowly defined issues presented before said Public Service Commission, pursuant to the defendants' prior application, for a section 63-cc exemption, cannot be characterized as an administrative remedy which should be "exhausted" and "cognizable in the first instance by an administrative agency". (See United States v. Western Pacific R. R. Co., 352 U.S. 59, 63, 64.)

Before us is not a question solely of the merit of the Conference's application for approval of agreement. It is not the fact, as defendants urge, that the Attorney-General fails to advise the court of the Commission's competence and primacy in that matter, or that section 63-cc authorizes [177] a party to the agreement to take independent action. The fact is that [*96] the matter of the independence of carriers, to which it is said the Attorney-General does not allude, is not considered until it is alleged that the acts of the carriers are not independent. It is precisely the absence of any such independence, and the presence of coercive action, of which the plaintiff complains. The question is whether [15] actions of the members and nonmembers are truly independent or actually coerced. In the latter event, an overriding State interest prevails.

The answer may well be inherent in defendants' statement that they "cannot coerce or compel carriers to adopt a particular rate." If thereby they mean that the law does not sanction it, the court agrees. If they mean that in fact it cannot be done, then that remains to be ascertained. However, for the purposes of this motion the allegations of the complaint must be deemed to be true.

In Movers Tariff Bur. (supra, p. 246) the court not only sustained the complaint while an application was pending before the Commission, but stated, in addition: "Further, HN4[] even though commission approval would serve to render certain of the conduct herein charged immune from challenge such activities might nevertheless be challenged as components of a conspiracy to achieve an unlawful end, and the instant action is based on alleged conspiracy. As I see it, the practices immunized, if such practices are part of a conspiracy to achieve an unlawful end, would, by the loss of that immunity be rendered unlawful".

In considering the complaint, the court must [16] look to the entirety of the alleged unlawful scheme to discover whether there are elements going beyond the permissible limits of the proposed agreement, as the allegations show they do. Nor are the activities in excess of those permissible within the power of the Commission to deal with and to redress. Thus, HN5[] Donnelly Act violation may not be used as immunity or shield to achieve the regulation of commerce, envisioned by agreement under the Public Service Law, and thus unlawfully to restrain commerce and competition and to dilute the standards adopted in the public interest. (Continental Co. v. Union Carbide, 370 U.S. 690; Georgia v. Pennsylvania R. R. Co., 324 U.S. 439.) The Commission cannot give relief under the Donnelly Act (Slick Airways v. American Airlines, 107 F. Supp. 199, app. dsmd. 204 F. 2d 230, cert. den. 346 U.S. 806). There the District Court stated (p. 207):

"Further I cannot accept the thesis that since the CAB has the power to approve agreements or combinations which [*97] might otherwise violate the anti-trust laws, it would be necessary first to prove before the CAB a conspiracy to restrain trade and then [178] have the Board [17] disapprove the conspiracy before a litigant could seek redress for damages in the courts. Such a conspiracy being inherently secretive and furtive in nature is not the type of subject matter which would be dealt with by an order made under §§ 488, 489 or 492 so as to be relieved from the operation of the anti-trust laws. * * *

"The Cunard case does not stand for the proposition that an administrative body has remedial jurisdiction to determine the existence of the conspiracy under the anti-trust laws. It stands for the proposition that to the extent a complaint alleging a conspiracy under the anti-trust laws also sets forth a violation of another regulatory act under which an enforcing administrative body is established and where a complete remedy has been provided in said act, then the administrative body established thereunder has exclusive primary jurisdiction over such a matter, even though the facts alleged may state a conspiracy under the anti-trust laws, and to that degree the anti-trust laws are thus superseded." (p. 211).

In the circumstances here and the allegation of the existence of a conspiracy, dealing with antitrust violation, stay of action and answer is not [18] warranted. The issue of antitrust violation must be determined here (Lesron Jr., Inc. v. Feinberg, 13 A D 2d 90; Slick Airways v. American Airlines, supra). The conduct, of which plaintiff complains, goes beyond the conduct of which defendants seek Commission approval in consonance with the proposed agreement.

The fact that the Attorney-General has filed a protest in a separate and independent proceeding before the Public Service Commission to oppose an application by the Conference for an exemption from the State antitrust laws cannot be deemed to confer exclusive jurisdiction on that administrative body.

HN6[] This court will not abdicate its responsibility nor surrender its jurisdiction to an administrative agency where the regulatory statute does not provide for adequate or similar relief under the Sherman Act. (Slick Airways v. American Airlines, supra.)

Under the circumstances herein the court has the inherent and mandated authority and obligation, to grant the relief requested, particularly since the best interests of the public are involved in this issue which affects the entire State.

The Legislature did not grant the Public Service Commission the machinery [19] to enforce antitrust laws or to remedy the [*98] evils created by the defendants' systematic pattern of antitrust violations set forth in [179] the complaint. Accordingly, the defendants may not now attribute or otherwise impute this added jurisdiction to the Public Service Commission.

The motion is in all respects denied.

Iowa v. Union Asphalt & Roadoils, Inc.

United States District Court for the Southern District of Iowa, Central Division

March 14, 1968

Civil No. 7-1932-C-2

Reporter

281 F. Supp. 391 *; 1968 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12545 ; 12 Fed. R. Serv. 2d (Callaghan) 493; 1968 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,473

State Of Iowa, Iowa State Highway Commission, and every other Political Subdivision of the State of Iowa, Plaintiffs, v. Union Asphalt & Roadoils, Inc., et al., Defendants suppression, seized, cases, member of the class, attorney's fees, class action, documents, notice, search and seizure, products, asphalt, withdrawal, exclusionary rule, court order, parties, records, political subdivision, representative party, illegally seized, criminal case, civil case, proceedings, circumstances, substitution, defendants', questions, grounds, gained, prices, ancillary jurisdiction

Core Terms

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Civil Procedure > ... > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > Jurisdiction Over Actions > Limited Jurisdiction

Constitutional Law > The Judiciary > Jurisdiction > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Jurisdiction > Jurisdictional Sources > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Jurisdiction > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > Jurisdiction Over Actions > General Overview

Constitutional Law > Congressional Duties & Powers > General Overview

Constitutional Law > Congressional Duties & Powers > Lower Federal Courts

HN1[] Jurisdiction Over Actions, Limited Jurisdiction

Federal courts are courts of limited jurisdiction. They have only that jurisdiction which Congress, acting within the limits of the Constitution, confers upon them. A state legislature cannot expand the jurisdiction of the federal courts. A state legislature cannot confer jurisdiction which is not authorized by Congress upon a federal court.

Civil Procedure > ... > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > Supplemental Jurisdiction > Ancillary Jurisdiction

Civil Procedure > ... > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > Supplemental Jurisdiction > General Overview

HN2[] Supplemental Jurisdiction, Ancillary Jurisdiction

Under the doctrine of federal ancillary jurisdiction, once federal jurisdiction properly attaches to a primary case, the court also has jurisdiction over certain subsidiary or subordinate disputes even though it might not independently be able to proceed to adjudicate them.

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Costs & Attorney Fees > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > Supplemental Jurisdiction > General Overview

HN3[] Remedies, Costs & Attorney Fees

Upon substitution of attorneys in litigation, a client may be required to either pay the attorney or to post security for reasonable fees as ancillary to the court's jurisdiction of the main case.

Admiralty & Maritime Law > Practice & Procedure > Jurisdiction

Civil Procedure > ... > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > Supplemental Jurisdiction > Ancillary Jurisdiction

Civil Procedure > ... > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > Supplemental Jurisdiction > General Overview

HN4[] Practice & Procedure, Jurisdiction

The precepts of the ancillary jurisdiction doctrine dictate that the federal courts should extend their jurisdiction to encompass orbital disputes subordinate to the principal action so that complete justice may be done. Considerations of judicial economy and fairness to all parties underlie the ancillary jurisdiction theory. And once jurisdiction has attached, it will generally continue until it has been fully exhausted.

Civil Procedure > Pleading & Practice > Pleadings > General Overview

HN5[] Pleading & Practice, Pleadings

A proper application for removal or substitution of counsel does not have to be made where the authority of the new attorney is recognized and he has been permitted to appear without objection. An attorney himself may make such a motion where he has been notified of his discharge by the client but he has not promptly made the motion.

Civil Procedure > ... > Grounds for Relief from Final Judgment, Order or Proceeding > Excusable Mistakes & Neglect > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Grounds for Relief from Final Judgment, Order or Proceeding > Excusable Mistakes & Neglect > Excusable Neglect

Civil Procedure > ... > Grounds for Relief from Final Judgment, Order or Proceeding > Excusable Mistakes & Neglect > Inadvertence

Civil Procedure > ... > Grounds for Relief from Final Judgment, Order or Proceeding > Excusable Mistakes & Neglect > Mistake

Civil Procedure > ... > Grounds for Relief from Final Judgment, Order or Proceeding > Excusable Mistakes & Neglect > Surprise

HN6[] Grounds for Relief from Final Judgment, Order or Proceeding, Excusable Mistakes & Neglect

Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 60(b), a court has the power to relieve a party from a final judgment, order or proceeding due to (1) mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect; or (6) any other reason justifying relief from the operation of the judgment. The rule is to be liberally construed to accord justice. Such a motion may be made within a reasonable time.

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Costs & Attorney Fees > General Overview

HN7[] Remedies, Costs & Attorney Fees

A court may condition its order of substitution upon a grant of attorney fees.

Civil Procedure > ... > Costs & Attorney Fees > Attorney Fees & Expenses > Reasonable Fees

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Costs & Attorney Fees > General Overview

HN8[] Attorney Fees & Expenses, Reasonable Fees

Where an attorney is employed upon a contingent fee and the clients desire to terminate the relations, the proper practice is to set a motion for substitution down for a hearing, notify the attorney of record of the motion, ascertain all that is due and owing him by reason of his services and expenses, and provide for payment of his compensation as a condition precedent to the allowance of the order of substitution.

Civil Procedure > ... > Costs & Attorney Fees > Attorney Fees & Expenses > Reasonable Fees

HN9[] Attorney Fees & Expenses, Reasonable Fees

The material criteria guiding compensation of attorneys on a quantum meruit measure are generally: the nature, extent, and difficulty of the services; the time devoted to the litigation; the loss of opportunity for other employment; the skill and standing of the lawyer; the value of interests involved and the responsibility assumed; the results secured; and, the customary charges for similar services.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

HN10[] Class Actions, Prerequisites for Class Action

See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a).

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

HN11[] Class Actions, Prerequisites for Class Action

For purposes of the third requirement of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a) in a proposed class action alleging violation of federal antitrust law plaintiffs must demonstrate: (1) that there was a conspiracy to fix prices in violation of the antitrust laws; (2) that prices were fixed pursuant thereto; and (3) that plaintiffs purchased products at prices which, as a result of the conspiracy, were higher than they should have been.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

HN12[] Class Actions, Prerequisites for Class Action

See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(d).

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

HN13[] Class Actions, Prerequisites for Class Action

See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3).

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

HN14[] Class Actions, Prerequisites for Class Action

Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(c)(2) provides for class inclusion of all members who do not request exclusion.

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Rights > Search & Seizure > Scope of Protection

Criminal Law & Procedure > Search & Seizure > General Overview

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Rights > Search & Seizure > General Overview

HN15[] Search & Seizure, Scope of Protection

In general, the test to be applied in determining whether searches and seizures are unreasonable is whether the thing done, or attempted to be done, in sum of its form, scope, nature, incidents and effect, impresses as being fundamentally unfair or unreasonable in the specific situation when the immediate end sought is considered. The test is the same under both Iowa Const. art. I, § 8 and U.S. Const. amend. IV.

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Rights > Search & Seizure > Scope of Protection

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Warrantless Searches > Consent to Search > General Overview

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Rights > Search & Seizure > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > Search & Seizure > General Overview

HN16[] Search & Seizure, Scope of Protection

Only in a carefully defined class of cases is a search without proper consent reasonable.

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Rights > Search & Seizure > Exclusionary Rule

Criminal Law & Procedure > Sentencing > Forfeitures > General Overview

Evidence > Relevance > Preservation of Relevant Evidence > Exclusion & Preservation by Prosecutors

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Forfeitures > General Overview

HN17[] Search & Seizure, Exclusionary Rule

A forfeiture proceeding is quasi-criminal in character. Its object, like a criminal proceeding, is to penalize for the commission of an offense against the law. It would be anomalous indeed to hold that in the criminal proceeding the illegally seized evidence is excludable, while in the forfeiture proceeding, requiring the determination that the criminal law has been violated, the same evidence would be admissible.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Remedies > General Overview

HN18[] Private Actions, Remedies

An action for treble damages under the antitrust laws is quasi-criminal.

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Rights > Search & Seizure > Exclusionary Rule

Criminal Law & Procedure > Preliminary Proceedings > Pretrial Motions & Procedures > Suppression of Evidence

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Rights > Search & Seizure > Scope of Protection

HN19[] Search & Seizure, Exclusionary Rule

Suppression of illegally seized evidence is a proper procedure in a civil case.

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Rights > Search & Seizure > Exclusionary Rule

Criminal Law & Procedure > Search & Seizure > Search Warrants > General Overview

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Rights > Search & Seizure > Scope of Protection

Criminal Law & Procedure > Search & Seizure > Exclusionary Rule > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > Search & Seizure > Expectation of Privacy

HN20[] Search & Seizure, Exclusionary Rule

Decisions holding that search warrants must be obtained to inspect homes and business premises may be taken to indicate that the right to be free from unconsented searches is the foremost concern of the Fourth Amendment (U.S. Const. amend. IV) and that the use of illegally seized evidence in a criminal prosecution is merely a common incident of the search which is proscribed. The cases extending the exclusionary rule to civil proceedings are based on the conclusion that it is the right of privacy that is protected and that there exists no valid distinction for varying the exclusionary rule in a civil case.

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Rights > Search & Seizure > Exclusionary Rule

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Rights > Search & Seizure > Scope of Protection

HN21[] Search & Seizure, Exclusionary Rule

For purposes of the Fourth Amendment (U.S. Const. amend. IV) and the exclusionary rule, no distinction can be made based on the fact that commercial premises were illegally searched as opposed to residential premises.

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Rights > Search & Seizure > Exclusionary Rule

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Rights > Search & Seizure > Scope of Protection

HN22[] Search & Seizure, Exclusionary Rule

The essence of a provision forbidding the acquisition of evidence in a certain way is that not merely evidence so acquired shall not be used before the court but that it shall not be used at all.

Civil Procedure > ... > Discovery > Methods of Discovery > Inspection & Production Requests

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Rights > Search & Seizure > Exclusionary Rule

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Rights > Search & Seizure > Scope of Protection

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Exclusionary Rule > Exceptions to Exclusionary Rule > Independent Source Doctrine

HN23[] Methods of Discovery, Inspection & Production Requests

Information illegally obtained can be used if it is later gained from an independent source.

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Rights > Search & Seizure > Exclusionary Rule

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Exclusionary Rule > Exceptions to Exclusionary Rule > Independent Source Doctrine

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Rights > Search & Seizure > Scope of Protection

HN24[] Search & Seizure, Exclusionary Rule

When knowledge of documents is gained independent of an illegal search and seizure the documents can be obtained by legal means.

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Rights > Search & Seizure > Exclusionary Rule

Criminal Law & Procedure > Search & Seizure > Exclusionary Rule > General Overview

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Rights > Search & Seizure > Scope of Protection

HN25[] Search & Seizure, Exclusionary Rule

It is clear that illegally seized evidence may not be used against codefendants in a criminal case but the rule is limited to a situation of joint trial. Evidence wrongfully seized from one person may be used against his alleged partner in crime if the two are tried separately.

Judges: [1] Hanson, District Judge.

Opinion by: HANSON

Opinion

[*394] Memorandum and Order

Hanson, District Judge.

This ruling is predicated upon an application by attorneys Verne Lawyer and Lex Hawkins for attorney fees and upon their motion to amend an Order of the Court filed on January 10, 1967, permitting their withdrawal. It is only fair to note that there is complete agreement by all that counsel are entitled to fees in some amount. The only question is under what process this can ultimately be consummated.

On January 10, 1967, Lex Hawkins and Verne Lawyer made an application to withdraw as attorneys for the State of Iowa in the above entitled litigation. [*395] The Application related that on September 30, 1966, they had been employed to prosecute the action by the then Attorney General of the State of Iowa, Lawrence F. Scalise. On January 5, 1967, the present Attorney General of the State of Iowa, Richard Turner, requested Verne Lawyer to resign and to take no further legal action in the case and on January 6, 1967, made the same request and direction to Lex Hawkins. He further instructed Lex Hawkins to relinquish the files of the cause on January 9, 1967. The applicants [2] complied with the latter demand on January 9 by delivering them to the Attorney General's Office. Due primarily to these events, the applicants made a motion for the Court to permit them to withdraw their appearance and to be relieved of any further responsibility in the case. On January 10, 1967, the Court issued an Order which granted the Application "for good cause shown."

The next day, the Attorney General and Roger H. Ivie, Assistant Attorney General, made a motion for the Court to authorize them to appear in behalf of the State and for "an order withdrawing the names of Lawrence F. Scalise and Nolden Gentry as attorneys of record." The State did not include the Applicants' names in its motion and apparently did not notify them of the motion. The Court granted that motion on the same day.

On August 16, 1967, Mr. Lawyer and Mr. Hawkins presented an application for attorney fees. By an Act of the Sixty-Second General Assembly, their employment was "legalized, validated and confirmed." In addition, Exhibit 1 reads as follows:

> "Sec. 2. Awards to such attorneys for services rendered and expenses incurred as a result of such legal representation shall be set and determined [3] by a judge of a court having jurisdiction over the subject matter thereof, after holding a hearing thereon.
>
> "Sec. 3. Any such award of judgment rendered by such court shall be a judgment in favor of Lex Hawkins and Verne Lawyer against the state of Iowa and shall be paid in the same manner as a judgment or award against the state of Iowa is paid pursuant to section twenty-five A point eleven (25A.11) of the Code."

The Application alleges that this Court is authorized "pursuant to the authority granted by said Act" to set the amount of attorneys' fees and expenses and render judgment for such amounts. A hearing was held on the Application on September 7, 1967.

A motion was filed by applicants on November 6, 1967, and the motion is grounded on Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 60(b). The applicants urge that the Court should amend its Order of January 10, 1967, upon the grounds of mistake, inadvertence and surprise and permit their withdrawal as counsel only upon condition that they be paid reasonable attorney fees.

The Application can be construed as alleging that the Iowa legislature has bestowed jurisdiction upon this Court. HN1[] Federal Courts are courts of limited jurisdiction. [4] They have only that jurisdiction which Congress, acting within the limits of the Constitution, confers upon them. See Giancana v. Johnson, 335 F.2d 366 (7 Cir.), cert. den. 379 U.S. 1001, 13 L. Ed. 2d 702, 85 S. Ct. 718 (1964); Badger v. Reich Bros. Const. Co., 161 F.2d 289 (5th Cir.); aff'd 333 U.S. 163, 92 L. Ed. 614, 68 S. Ct. 587 (1947), rehear. den. 333 U.S. 878, 68 S. Ct. 900, 92 L. Ed. 1153; Fisch v. General Motors Corp., 169 F.2d 266 (6th Cir.), cert. den. 335 U.S. 902, 93 L. Ed. 436, 69 S. Ct. 405 (1949). A state legislature cannot expand the jurisdiction of the federal courts. Chicago R.I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Stude, 346 U.S. 574, 98 L. Ed. 317, 74 S. Ct. 290, rehear. den. 347 U.S. 924, 74 S. Ct. 512, 98 L. Ed. 1078; Burford v. Sun Oil Co., 319 U.S. 315, 87 L. Ed. 1424, 63 S. Ct. 1098 (1943); Davis v. Ensign-Bickford Co., 139 F.2d 624 (8th Cir.). A state legislature cannot confer jurisdiction which is not authorized by Congress upon a federal court. *In re Borough [396] of Fort Lee, 230 F.2d 200 (3rd Cir.); Chicago R.I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Ten (10) Parcels of Real Estate Located in Madison County, Iowa, 159 F. Supp. 140 (D. Iowa); Range Oil Supply Co. v. Chicago R.I. & P. [5] Ry. Co., 140 F. Supp. 283 (D. Minn.). Moreover, the legislature could not control or supervise this Court by directing a hearing to be held upon this matter. Stephenson v. Grand Trunk Western Ry. Co., 110 F.2d 401 (7th Cir.), cert. granted 310 U.S. 623, cert. dism'd 311 U.S. 720, 60 S. Ct. 1107, 85 L. Ed. 469. However, the Court must determine whether it has jurisdiction under the federal Constitution, federal laws, or principles of federal jurisdiction.

The Court will first give its attention to whether the Application for attorney fees should be granted, apart from the question of whether the motion to amend the Court's Order of January 10, 1967, will be granted. The resolution of two issues will be dispositive of the first question: (1) whether the determination of attorney fees is within the boundaries of the traditional realm of federal jurisdiction; and, (2) whether consideration of the Application is now precluded because of the Order of January 10. The Court will then discuss the question of whether that Order must be amended to condition withdrawal upon the remittance of reasonable attorney fees. If the Court decides to amend its Order, the application for attorney fees [6] will automatically be granted.

The applicants urge that jurisdiction of the matter of attorney fees may be sustained by the HN2[] doctrine of federal ancillary jurisdiction. The ancillary jurisdiction theory is relatively simple - once federal jurisdiction properly attaches to a primary case, the court also has jurisdiction over certain subsidiary or subordinate disputes even though it might not independently be able to proceed to adjudicate them. See, e.g., Murphy v. Kodz, 351 F.2d 163 (9 Cir.); Lee v. Terminal Transport Co., 282 F.2d 805 (7 Cir.), cert. den. 365 U.S. 828, 5 L. Ed. 2d 705, 81 S. Ct. 713 (1960); Aetna Ins. Co. v. Chicago, R.I. & P.R. Co., 229 F.2d 584 (10 Cir.); Glens Falls Indem. Co. v. United States, 229 F.2d 370 (9 Cir.). It is well-settled that HN3[] upon substitution of attorneys in litigation, a client may be required to either pay the attorney or to post security for reasonable fees as ancillary to the Court's jurisdiction of the main case. See e.g., National Equipment Rental, Ltd. v. Mercury Typesetting Co., 323 F.2d 784 (2 Cir.); Maddox v. Jinkens, 66 App. D.C. 362, 88 F.2d 744 (1936); Woodbury v. Andrew Jergens Co., 69 F.2d 49 (2 Cir.). In the situation at hand, [7] the Court's jurisdiction to fix attorney fees is generated by its auxiliary relation to the antitrust action by the State. It may be true that the practice of injecting a condition of departure into an Order of removal is proper, but the Court cannot agree that it must be done in every case. HN4[] The precepts of the ancillary jurisdiction doctrine dictate that the federal courts should extend their jurisdiction to encompass orbital disputes subordinate to the principal action so that complete justice may be done. See Walmac Co. v. Isaacs, 220 F.2d 108 (1 Cir.); Cooperative Transit Co. v. West Penn Elec. Co., 132 F.2d 720 (4 Cir.); Ancillary Jurisdiction of the Federal Courts, 48 Iowa L.Rev. 383 (1963). Considerations of judicial economy and fairness to all parties underlie the ancillary jurisdiction theory. Consolo v. Federal Maritime Comm., 383 U.S. 607, 16 L. Ed. 2d 131, 86 S. Ct. 1018 (1966). And once jurisdiction has attached, it will generally continue until it has been fully exhausted. Rhodes v. Houston, 202 F. Supp. 624 (D. Neb. 1962), aff'd 309 F.2d 959 (8 Cir.), cert. den. 383 U.S. 971, 16 L. Ed. 2d 311, 86 S. Ct. 1282 (1965). It would appear that the sound policies behind [8] the doctrine and its elasticity would command the Court to retain jurisdiction over the auxiliary matter of attorney fees even though it entered a previous Order allowing the counsel to withdraw without such a condition. Cf. *United Mine Workers of [397] America v. Gibbs, 383 U.S. 715, 727, 16 L. Ed. 2d 218, 86 S. Ct. 1130 (1965).

Taking the position that before there can be a fee determination there must be an application for removal by a party adverse to counsel seeking fees in which there is no allegation of misconduct or there is an allegation of misconduct that is not substantiated, or taking the position that where applicants voluntarily applied for and were granted withdrawal, the Court has no jurisdiction, is untenable and without merit. HN5[] A proper application does not have to be made where the authority of the new attorney is recognized and he has been permitted to appear without objection. See, e.g., In re Goldstein, 43 F.2d 698 (2 Cir.), cert. den., Goldstein v. Klages, 282 U.S. 879, 75 L. Ed. 776, 51 S. Ct. 83; In re Morgan's Estate, 94 Cal.App. 617, 271 P. 762; Doerle v. Doerle, 159 N.Y.S. 637, 96 Misc. 72. An attorney himself may make such a motion where he has [9] been notified of his discharge by the client but he has not promptly made the motion. See United States v. McMurtry, 24 F.2d 145 (D.N.Y.). The motion does not have to be in any rigid form. This would seem to be particularly true here as Local Rule E of the Local Rules of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Iowa requires that an attorney obtain leave of court before withdrawing.

In the case at hand, the applicants stated that the Attorney General made a motion for continuance on January 6, 1967, which was prior to the withdrawal of applicants. The Court signed an Order of continuance of discovery upon his oral application. The applicants further stated that Verne Lawyer was requested to resign by the Attorney General on January 5, 1967, and Lex Hawkins was asked to resign on January 6. They resigned on January 9 when they conveyed the files of the case to his office. There has been no allegation contrary to these statements by the State. The Court does not feel the State promptly presented a motion for substitution on their discharge. Further, an application on behalf of the State was not necessary to protect the State against misconduct by the applicants. [10] There has never been any question that attorney fees were due and owing them. The Act of the Sixty-Second General Assembly destroyed any possible contention in that regard by legalizing the employment of the applicants and providing that awards for their services and expenses "shall be set." Thus, there is no necessity of determining the validity of any non-existent allegation of misconduct.

However, assuming that the process is irregular, the State has acquiesced in the retention of jurisdiction by this Court over the determination of fees. It is manifest that both the State and the applicants anticipated no difficulties in relation to the presentation of an application to this Court for the determination of reasonable attorney fees and securing an adjudication thereof. There was no attack upon the propriety of a fee determination by the Court at the time it granted the withdrawal of the applicants even though the State was obviously conscious of that process. The State made no allegation of misconduct then or the next day when it presented its own motion for substitution. The legislature apparently had no reservations about the applicants being entitled to fees for the services [11] they had rendered for the State and that this Court would be the appropriate judicial body to set them because they were to be fixed "by a judge having jurisdiction over the subject matter thereof." In fact, the State and the applicants were operating under the supposition that the procedure taken was without defect until the hearing upon the application on September 7, 1967. The Court was the first to raise the possibility of a legal deficiency in the process when it questioned the jurisdictional basis of the determination at the hearing. But, most importantly, even at that stage, and with knowledge of the Court's remarks in that regard, the State elected to move forward [*398] with the offer of evidence as to the amount of fees and to defer examination of the Court's jurisdictional power with the objective of sustaining its jurisdiction. By that act, the State acquiesced in the procedure instituted for fee determination and the adjudication itself.

But in any event, the Court is compelled to grant the motion of applicants under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 60(b) and the Court will amend its Order of January 10, 1967, to condition the withdrawal of applicants upon the [12] payment of reasonable attorney fees. HN6[] Under that Rule, a court has the power to relieve a party from "a final judgment, order or proceeding" due to "(1) mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect; . . . or (6) any other reason justifying relief from the operation of the judgment." The rule is to be liberally construed to accord justice. See, e.g., In re Casco Chemical Co., 335 F.2d 645 (5 Cir.); United States v. Gould, 301 F.2d 353 (5 Cir.); Radack v. Norwegian American Line Agency, Inc., 318 F.2d 538 (2 Cir.); Patapoff v. Vollstedt's, Inc., 267 F.2d 863 (9 Cir.); 3 Barron and Holtzoff, Federal Practice and Procedure, Section 1322 (1958 ed.). Such a motion may be made within a reasonable time.

It has authoritatively been prescribed HN7[] that the Court may condition its order of substitution upon a grant of attorney fees. First Iowa Hydro Elec. Co-op. v. Iowa-Illinois Gas & E. Co., 245 F.2d 613 (8 Cir.). See also National Equipment Rental, Ltd. v. Mercury Typesetting Co., supra; Doggett v. Deauville Corp., 148 F.2d 881 (5 Cir.); Woodbury v. Andrew Jergens Co., supra; The Flush, 277 Fed. 25 (2 Cir.); Kotsifakis v. A. Lusi, Ltd., 138 F. Supp. 945 (D. Va.). In John Griffiths [13] & Son Co. v. United States, 72 F.2d 466, 468 (7 Cir.), the court declared:

> " . . . HN8[] where an attorney is employed upon a contingent fee and the clients desire to terminate the relations, the proper practice is to set a motion for substitution down for a hearing, notify the attorney of record of the motion, ascertain all that is due and owing him by reason of his services and expenses, and provide for payment of his compensation as a condition precedent to the allowance of the order of substitution."

It will be recalled that both parties and the legislature maintained the belief that the procedure undertaken to attain fee determination by this Court was proper and the Court has taken evidence upon the amounts to be granted. Similarly, the Court has previously dealt with the proposition that the procedure is not amenable to a fee determination here. The equities of the integrated factual picture strongly militate in favor of granting applicants' motion. Further, out of judicial courtesy to the legislative branch of government of the State of Iowa, the Court should not lightly abdicate its responsibility in this regard even though its authority is not necessary to pursue [14] this matter.

It appears that a very analogous situation confronted the Court in the John Griffiths & Son Co. case, supra. In that case, an order of substitution was granted apparently without a condition of payment of attorney fees. The former counsel made a motion to set aside the order and to ascertain the amount due him before passing upon substitution. The Court permitted the order to remain intact but retained jurisdiction of the matter of attorney fees. The Court of Appeals held that: "In this procedure there was no reversible error."

Moreover, in addition to Rule 60, the Court deems it desirable to utilize its inherent power to correct what it feels to be a faulty order. See Wallace v. United States, 50 F. Supp. 178 (W.D.N.Y. 1943), reversed on other grounds, 142 F.2d 240 (7 Cir.), cert. den. 323 U.S. 712, 89 L. Ed. 573, 65 S. Ct. 37 (1944); Bucy v. Nevada Const. Co., 125 F.2d 213 (9 Cir.); Myers v. Westland Oil Co., 96 F. Supp. 667 (D.N.D.).

Thus, as a matter of law the Court has power to adjudicate the matter of attorney [*399] fees for applicants under federal ancillary jurisdiction, by amendment of its Order under Rule 60(b), and under its inherent power to correct [15] orders.

It will be ordered that the application for reasonable attorney fees by Lex Hawkins and Verne Lawyer will be granted in the amounts to be fixed by the Court.

It remains for the Court to adjudge the amounts of attorney fees which shall be paid to the applicants. After a thorough consideration of all evidence adduced at the hearing held upon the subject, and in accordance with established quantum meruit principles, the Court must conclude that each should receive the sum of $50.00 an hour for the time consumed in relation to the case. The Court will not engage in a long, prolix discourse upon the basis for this calculation but will outline some of the more salient reasons behind it.

HN9[] The material criteria guiding compensation of attorneys on a quantum meruit measure are generally: the nature, extent, and difficulty of the services; the time devoted to the litigation; the loss of opportunity for other employment; the skill and standing of the lawyer; the value of interests involved and the responsibility assumed; the results secured; and, the customary charges for similar services. See Annot. 56 A.L.R.2d 13; ABA Canons of Professional Ethics 12(4); 7 Am. Jur.2d Attorneys [16] at Law, Sections 232, et seq.

The case at bar is one of a species of highly complex litigation. The preparation of an antitrust suit involves a myriad of details and the organizational problems are great. See, e.g., Cape Cod Food Products, Inc. v. National Cranberry Ass'n, 119 F. Supp. 242 (D. Mass). The intricate economic problems presented in a case of this sort demand seasoned trial lawyers with some expertise in the area. The applicants were a primary stimulus in the prosecution of the case against the defendants who are represented by a formidable army of capable attorneys. Should the State prevail, the monetary fruits to the public could be great. Also, if the allegations made by the State are found to have substance, an intangible vindication of a public wrong would be accomplished.

The resumes of Lex Hawkins and Verne Lawyer, and the Court's experience with their legal work, convince the Court that they are men belonging to the highest echelon of the legal ranks. No challenge has been made to the integrity and ethical orientation of these lawyers. They are experienced trial lawyers who were both employed by the State of Alaska last year as Special Attorney Generals [17] for the prosecution of antitrust actions.

The time expended in preparation of the State's case has not been minimal. Mr. Lawyer spent 167 3/4 hours in furtherance of the cause and Mr. Hawkins worked 238 1/2 hours on the case. Mr. Lawyer had an additional 31 hours of time through an employed lawyer, Mr. M. R. Dunn. It is unquestionably true that the applicants were forced to pass up other lucrative employment due to their involvement in this demanding piece of litigation. The applicants submitted detailed time reconstruction sheets as to the utilization of their time. The Court has no question that the time was exhausted as set out in the summaries. The State has not in any manner made any serious or realistic attack upon the validity of the reconstruction in the documents.

Mr. Hawkins and Mr. Lawyer generally receive remuneration in excess of $50.00 an hour for their legal activities, but it appears that the State paid a maximum of $50.00 an hour for outside assistance in protracted litigation about the period in which they were employed. The present Attorney General was aware of at least one attorney who received $50.00 an hour during the previous Attorney General's tenure [18] in office. Neither the Attorney General nor Mr. Ivie had any opinion as to the value of applicants' [*400] services when questioned in that regard.

The Court is of the opinion that the quantum meruit factor of benefits secured is not an appropriate consideration in this case as the applicants' employment was terminated prior to the ultimate disposition of the suit. The Court is fully cognizant that only a percentage of the research and investigation conducted by attorneys blossom into valuable weapons for use in the arena of legal battle and that the extent of this work can never be ascertained with certainty, even at the conclusion of a case. But even though the outcome of the litigation is not subject to prognosis, and the Court can make no intimation in that regard, it is clear that the State has received substantial benefits from their efforts at this stage of the proceedings. The State's case has been bolstered by virtue of materials contained in the attorneys' files delivered to the State, the Complaint drawn by applicants, correspondence by the applicants to the Attorney General's Office, the conversations between the applicants and Mr. Ivie on the case, and a meeting [19] held before the Executive Council of the State of Iowa on September 7, 1967, in which certain facts were disclosed to the State by the applicants. Finally, the Executive Council concurs with the Court in that they felt that the applicants had fully and completely discharged their responsibilities in providing all the useful information that they could upon the case.

Therefore, it will be ordered that Verne Lawyer receive compensation of $8,387.50 for his services. He will receive the further sum of $775.00 for the 31 hours of Mr. Dunn at a rate of $25.00 an hour. He will also be reimbursed for $1,053.99 out-of-pocket expenses.

It will further be ordered that Lex Hawkins be paid $11,925.00 for his services and will receive remuneration of $1,989.15 for expenses.

Memorandum and Order

HANSON, D.J.:

This ruling is predicated upon the defendants' motions to dismiss the class action or to strike paragraphs 7, 8, and 9 of the Complaint or, in the alternative, for an Order limiting the class of plaintiffs.

This is an action to recover treble damages for injuries allegedly resulting from violations by the defendants of the Sherman and Clayton Acts. The defendants are business entities [20] which have engaged in the business of distributing and selling liquid asphalt and allied materials in the State of Iowa. The plaintiffs are parties which have purchased these products from the defendants. The Complaint alleges that the defendants owned or controlled substantially all of the sources of liquid asphalt products reasonably available to supply the needs of the State of Iowa, the Iowa State Highway Commission, and the political subdivisions of the State. It further alleges that the defendants combined and conspired to restrain interstate commerce by fixing prices charged for asphalt products.

Fifteen of the defendants have objected to the maintenance of this suit as a class action. They contend that the requirements of Rule 23 have not been met and that the Attorney General of the State of Iowa does not have authority to represent the political subdivisions of the State of Iowa.

The defendants present several reasons why it is thought that a class action is not appropriate. Stated briefly, the defendants contend that the four pre-requisites to a class action set out in Rule 23(a) have not been met and that the two prerequisites of Rule 23(b)(3) are also not fulfilled. [21] These will now be considered in order.

HN10[] Rule 23(a) permits a class action only if:

> "(1) the class is so numerous that joinder of all members is impracticable, (2) there are questions of law or fact common to the class, (3) the claims or defenses of the representative parties are typical of the claims or defenses of the class, and (4) the representative parties will fairly and adequately [*401] protect the interests of the class."

There is no contention that the first of these requirements is not met. Without considering at this point which political subdivisions would be included in the class, it is clear that taking only the counties, cities, and towns, the potential number of members is so large as to make joinder of all impractical. It may be that notice to all potential members of the class would bring about sufficient exclusions to allow joinder, but there may be no speculation as to that possibility.

Nor is there any difficulty with the second requirement of Rule 23(a). Undoubtedly there would be questions of law and fact common to the class. Whether they predominate over individual interests will be taken up shortly.

The third requirement is the subject [22] of dispute between the parties. It is argued that the claims of the representative parties are not typical of the claims of the members of the class, that the relief sought is not typical, and that the defenses to the claims of the representatives are not typical. Numerous disparate facts are set out in the defendants' brief which are said to indicate the unavailability of a class action. Many have to do with the manner in which the members of the alleged class have purchased asphalt products from the defendants. Some members purchased directly from the defendants while others negotiate with contractors who agree to supply asphalt products. Variations in the kind of asphalt product purchased, differences in prices due to transportation charges and quantity of purchase, normal variations in price due to market conditions, and other factors are described in detail in the briefs and affidavits.

The difficulties presented by a disparity of facts such as these were satisfactorily resolved recently in a similar price-fixing suit. See HN11[] Philadelphia Electric Company, et al. v. Anaconda American Brass Company, 43 F.R.D. 452 (E.D. Pa. 1968). There it was concluded that the overriding considerations [23] typifying each claim were the need to prove:

> "(1) that there was a conspiracy to fix prices in violation of the antitrust laws; (2) that prices were fixed pursuant thereto; and (3) that plaintiffs purchased products at prices which, as a result of the conspiracy, were higher than they should have been."

The import of varied circumstances surrounding purchase transactions giving rise to a claim was persuasively stated in these terms:

> "The defendants point out that the products mentioned in the complaint include 'at least twelve separate groups of products which are separately priced and have distinct end uses;' that plaintiffs may have purchased like products from other manufacturers, at prices not shown to have been affected by the alleged conspiracy; that during the period covered by the alleged conspiracy there were dozens of price changes in each product-line; and that there were wide variations in methods of purchase and in prices actually paid. But these circumstances, it seems to me, demonstrate merely (1) the possible desirability of establishing sub-classes as the facts develop; (2) the likelihood that plaintiffs may be unable to prove all they claim; [24] and (3) the fact that many of the issues relating to damages are individual rather than common to the class. Cf. Siegel v. Chicken Delight, Inc., 271 F. Supp. 722 (N.D. Cal. 1967); Kronenberg v. Hotel Governor Clinton, Inc., 41 F.R.D. 42 (S.D.N.Y. 1966); Fischer v. Kletz, 41 F.R.D. 377 (S.D.N.Y. 1966)."

This Court adopts the reasoning of the above quoted opinion in finding that the third requirement of Rule 23(a) is met.

The defendants raise two questions in regard to the fourth requirement of Rule 23(a). First, it is urged that the Attorney General does not have the authority under Iowa law to represent the alleged members of the [*402] class. This Court regards this contention as being without merit. In representing the class in a suit such as this, the representative parties act principally in furtherance of their own claim. An underlying assumption of a class suit is that substantial similarity of claims allows all members to benefit from the efforts of the representative parties. If the prerequisites to a class action are present in this suit, the Court will not consider the question of formal authorization under Iowa law. The right to be represented here [25] is established by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Limitations on the authority of the Attorney General would more properly be raised when and if he departs from the areas of unquestioned authority to pursue the individual claims of members of the class. This preliminary determination of the existence of a class action does not attempt to dispose of all questions that may arise. The common need to prove conspiracy and price-fixing sufficiently indicates that the Attorney General is a proper representative under Rule 23.

The defendants have also argued the dissimilar factors in each claim require the representative parties to act in their own interests. The preceding discussion of overriding considerations of commonality meets this objection. Furthermore, members of the class would be required to assume the responsibility of proving some matters such as the amount of damages. Also in answer to the question of adequate and proper representation, it is important not to overlook the power of the Court under HN12[] Rule 23(d) to make appropriate orders,

> " . . . (2), requiring, for the protection of the members of the class or otherwise for the fair conduct of the action, that [26] notice be given in such manner as the court may direct to some or all of the members of any step in the action, or the proposed extent of the judgment, or of the opportunity of members to signify whether they consider the representation fair and adequate, to intervene and present claims or defenses, or otherwise to come into the action; (3) imposing conditions on the representative parties or on intervenors; (4) requiring that the pleadings be amended to eliminate therefrom allegations as to representation of absent persons, and that the action proceed accordingly; (5) dealing with similar procedural matters."

In addition to the requirements of Rule 23(a), the requirements of HN13[] 23(b)(3) which must be met if this suit is to be maintained as a class action are that

> "(3) the court finds that the questions of law or fact common to the members of the class predominate over any questions affecting only individual members, and that a class action is superior to other available methods for the fair and efficient adjudication of the controversy. The matters pertinent to the findings include: (A) the > interest of members of the class in individually controlling the prosecution or defense [27] of separate actions; (B) the extent and nature of any litigation concerning the controversy already commenced by or against members of the class; (C) the desirability or undesirability of concentrating the litigation of the claims in the particular forum; (D) the difficulties likely to be encountered in the management of a class action."

What has been said earlier concerning the typicalness of the representative claims is also the Court's basis for concluding that common questions of law and fact predominate over questions affecting individual members. There certainly will be individual questions in regard to damages but these are not the dominant problems in this suit.

The Court is convinced that a class action is superior to other methods of settling the controversy. The factors set out in the Rule as pertinent considerations clearly support this conclusion. There is no other litigation concerning this controversy already commenced by members of the class and no interest of [*403] members in individually controlling the prosecution. This particular forum is the natural and desirable place for combining the claims since all members of the class are legal entities of [28] this State. Although it is impossible to estimate with any degree of certainty the number of parties who wish to be represented in this suit, it does not appear that difficulties of management will be so great as to prevent its maintenance. Difficulties in devising adequate notice procedure are relevant to the question of manageability but here they are not controlling.

It has been assumed throughout the foregoing that the class would be as inclusive as the representatives have proposed. By means of that assumption the Court has been able to make the preliminary determination without regard to the possibility that the class would later be expanded. It is now incumbent upon the Court to specify the members of the class. In this there is no need to look further than the list of prospective members submitted by the representative parties. These legal entities are:

1. All ninety-nine (99) counties
2. Nine hundred forty-seven (947) cities and towns
3. Four hundred seventy-four (474) school districts
4. County boards of education
5. Park boards
6. Drainage districts or water districts
7. County conservation boards
8. County boards of health
9. Local boards [29] of health
10. County boards of social welfare
11. Area vocational schools and community colleges
12. County public hospitals
13. Sanitary districts
14. County library districts
15. Townships

At this time, in reliance on the statements of the Assistant Attorney General, Nos. 8, 9, and 14 will be excluded on the ground that they have not purchased asphalt products. The remaining twelve political subdivisions shall be included within the class. It has been noted that the defendants suggest prospective members of the class not named by the Attorney General which may have equal right to inclusion. To provide for that contingency, the Court again emphasizes that this is a preliminary determination. Joinder of additional parties will be allowed if circumstances require.

The defendants' alternate motion sets forth a procedure for determining which political subdivisions actually will participate in the suit. HN14[] Rule 23(c)(2) provides for inclusion of all members who do not request exclusion. The proposed procedure would preserve the right to elect not to be bound by the judgment in this case, but would require all political subdivisions desiring to participate to affirmatively [30] state that intention in writing. The requested procedure would make an early determination of which parties intend to offer proof of damages, a matter which would require some notice to the Court and the defendants in any event. Rule 23(c)(2) does not prohibit the suggested procedure since the rule does not limit the matters that may be included within the notice. The authority to employ the requested procedure is implied in Rule 23(d). In Philadelphia Electric Company, et al. v. Anaconda

American Brass Company, et al., supra, the Court ordered that the first notice to the members should include a notice that members of the class not electing to file proofs of claim on or before a specified date would be forever barred. In Harris v. Jones, 41 F.R.D. 70 (D. Utah 1966), the Court provided for a second notice to accomplish this objective, stating:

> "Within a reasonable time after a determination of exclusion from the class as a result of the foregoing notices, and with appropriate relationship to the prospective date of trial and the necessities of discovery, there will be a further notice directed to members of the class requiring them to file [*404] simple statements [31] of their claims upon furnished forms, particularly with reference to the types and sources of representation, if any, upon which they relied in purchasing their securities and the time they first learned any representations were false. An order will be made, and notice given, that if such statements without good cause are not filed within the time specified the action may be dismissed with prejudice as to defaulting members for failure diligently to prosecute. When the latter stage has been completed the court should be in a position better to determine the adequacy of the existing representation, more effectively to define the class or to establish practical guides for the trial of the cases and, it is hoped, the submission of the issues for meaningful determination by a jury."

The effect on members of the class of the two-notice procedure is the same as the requested procedure in that failure to act affirmatively would bar recovery. The Court believes that in the interests of expediency and fairness to the defendants, the notice of maintainence of a class action should include a provision requiring members to indicate in writing their intent to submit claims.

Accordingly, [32] it is hereby ordered that all the motions by the defendants to dismiss the class action or to strike paragraphs 7, 8, and 9 of the Complaint are denied.

It is further hereby ordered that the alternate motion for an Order limiting the class of plaintiffs is sustained except as it relates to the time allowed for filing a written statement.

The Liaison Committee heretofore appointed by this Court are directed to submit to the Court within ten (10) days from receipt of this Order a proposed form of notice which will meet the requirements of Rule 23(c)(2) and this Order. The form of notice shall allow sixty (60) days for members of the class to file a written statement.

Motions to Suppress Evidence

These rulings are predicated upon motions to suppress evidence.

The circumstances which gave rise to these motions are as follows: On December 5, 1966, representatives of the Iowa Attorney General entered the Des Moines offices of Bitucote Products Co., Bituminous Material & Supply Co., Pioneer Asphalt Co., and Central States Oil & Asphalt Co., Inc. for the purpose of searching through and impounding certain business records. These actions were purportedly authorized by Court Orders signed [33] by an Iowa District Court Judge. The applications for the Court Orders request "an Order authorizing applicant to impound, take custody and remove from the premises all records, books, correspondence, documents, and accounts of [each of the above-named defendants] and keep them in his possession until the completion of the proceedings pursuant to Chapter 438, Acts of the 61st General Assembly." The applications were signed by an Assistant Attorney General. All of the offices were entered by groups of men which included Assistant Attorneys General and law enforcement officers. The men proceeded to search throughout the offices, in one instance gaining access to the documents by employing a locksmith, and eventually hauled away file cabinets and desk drawers containing substantially all of the business records contained in the offices. On the following day, the Complaint in this case was filed against the four companies whose records had been seized and numerous other defendants.

It appears that at no time prior to or after the searches and seizures herein described were any legal actions instituted against the defendants pursuant to Chapter 438, Acts of the 61st General Assembly. [34] (Iowa Code Section 713.24 (1966)). Moreover, the defendants contend that such actions were never seriously considered by the plaintiffs and that the sole purpose of the seizures was to obtain information to be used in this case. The defendants urge the Court [*405] to find that the Attorney General's representatives violated state and federal constitutional guarantees against unreasonable searches and seizures in that their acts were not authorized by a valid court order and were carried out in an unreasonable and oppressive manner. The remedy sought is an order suppressing all evidence obtained in the search, preventing use of any information derived from the search, and requiring the return of all documents and all copies of documents seized by the State of Iowa.

Pioneer Asphalt Co. and Central States Oil & Asphalt Co., Inc., joined in one motion to suppress, setting out grounds for suppression and supporting the motion with exhibits and affidavits, while Bitucote Products Co. and Bituminous Material & Supply Co. each filed such motions of their own. The motion by each of these defendants has been joined in and adopted by substantially all of the other defendants in this [35] case. Thus, the Court is requested to prevent use of allegedly tainted evidence not only against the parties whose records were seized but also against the other defendants.

The plaintiffs in this case are the State of Iowa, the Iowa State Highway Commission, and every other political subdivision of the State of Iowa. Inclusion of the political subdivisions has been disputed by the defendants by motions to dismiss the class action or to strike. Since those motions have now been overruled, any suppression Order resulting from the actions of the Assistant Attorneys General will apply to all members of the class. If it is found that the searches and seizures were illegally carried out to aid in preparation of this case, the consequences must be borne by all because the Assistant Attorneys General were preparing this case in behalf of all plaintiffs.

HN15[] In general, the test to be applied in determining whether searches and seizures are unreasonable is "whether the thing done, or attempted to be done, in sum of its form, scope, nature, incidents and effect, impresses as being fundamentally unfair or unreasonable in the specific situation when the immediate end sought is considered." [36] Schwimmer v. United States, 232 F.2d 855 (8th Cir.), cert. den. 352 U.S. 833, 1 L. Ed. 2d 52, 77 S. Ct. 48 (1956); State v. Hagen, 258 Iowa 196, 137 N.W.2d 895 (1965). The test is the same under both Article I, Section 8 of the Iowa Constitution and the Fourth Amendment. In applying the test to the facts of this case, the first matter to be considered is the validity of the Court Orders purporting to authorize the searches and seizures. The Orders are subject to attack on two grounds: that no actions were to be commenced under Section 713.24 of the Iowa Code, and that, even if such actions were contemplated, the statute does not authorize searches and seizures of the kind accomplished. The statute in question deals with consumer frauds in the advertising and sale of merchandise. The portions of the statute relied on by the State of Iowa in seeking the Court Orders provide that the Attorney General may:

> "Examine any merchandise or sample thereof, record, book, document, account or paper as he may deem necessary." (Section 713.24(3)(c))
>
> "Pursuant to an order of district court impound any record, book, document, account, paper or sample of merchandise that is produced in accordance [37] with this section, and retain the same in his possession until the completion of all proceedings in connection with which the same are produced." Section 713.24(3)(d).

The possibility cannot be precluded that an action under this statute could have been started against the four companies in December of 1966 or some time thereafter. There is virtually no evidence, however, to show that the State of Iowa ever intended to take any action under the statute except to seize the records. Former Attorney General Scalise testified that nothing more was done, but also stated: "I assume the matter is still open, however, in the event the new Attorney General wishes to pursue [*406] it." (Defendants' Exhibit 2, p. 63). On the other hand, former Assistant Attorney General Nolden I. Gentry testified that the purpose in seeking the Orders for the impounding of the documents was to inspect them for use in this case. (Defendants' Exhibit 2, p. 330). Statements made by one of the attorneys who originated the applications for the Orders clearly indicate this purpose. (Defendants' Exhibit 1, pp. 34, 43, 45). The exhibits also show that the seized documents were examined and copied for use [38] in this case. In addition, the fact that more than a year has passed since the records were seized without any further action under the state statute is strong evidence in favor of the defendants' contention. Anyone familiar with the facts could hardly arrive at any conclusion but that the plaintiffs used the statute for a purpose not intended by the Legislature. The proof of this is more than a preponderance; it is clear and convincing.

There is little room for doubt that the statute itself does not authorize such extensive searches and seizures under any circumstances. As the defendants point out in their brief, the statute provides for notice and hearing and the issuance of subpoenas in order to accomplish its objectives. The subsection providing for a court order to impound refers to materials "produced in accordance with this section." While the investigative powers conferred upon the Attorney General by the statute are considerably broader in scope than those available to him in a criminal prosecution, the statute cannot be construed to authorize the sweeping searches and seizures made in this case. The Court has no doubt that the Order would not have been issued if [39] the motives of the applicants had been disclosed.

It is on two separate grounds that this Court finds the Court Orders invalid. There is no need to go further in finding the searches and seizures unreasonable and violative of Article I, Section 8 of the Iowa Constitution and of the Fourth Amendment. HN16[] Only in a carefully defined class of cases is a search without proper consent reasonable. See See v. City of Seattle, 387 U.S. 541, 18 L. Ed. 2d 943, 87 S. Ct. 1737 (1967); Aguilar v. State of Texas, 378 U.S. 108, 12 L. Ed. 2d 723, 84 S. Ct. 1509 (1964); Nathanson v. United States, 290 U.S. 41, 78 L. Ed. 159, 54 S. Ct. 11 (1933). There is more than lack of consent, however, which makes the illegal conduct unreasonable in this instance. The courts have found the Constitution to have been breached where the harm resulting from an illegal search appears slight in comparison. In this instance, not only were the searches and seizures carried out without regard to the interference in the business activities of the defendants, but they constituted an abuse of government power that is clearly offensive to a sense of justice. The grievous consequences of the government becoming a lawbreaker [40] are sufficiently stated in Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643, 6 L. Ed. 2d 1081, 81 S. Ct. 1684 (1961) and Elkins v. United States, 364 U.S. 206, 4 L. Ed. 2d 1669, 80 S. Ct. 1437 (1960). The abuse of power is especially reprehensible where, as here, the government enlists the aid of statutes and deceives a court to carry out its illegal objective.

Concluding as it does, that the constitutional guarantees against unreasonable search and seizure have been breached, the Court must now determine whether the remedy of suppression is available in a civil case such as this. It is said that this is a question upon which the Supreme Court has not passed and the Courts of Appeals are divided. The Courts which have extended the remedy to civil cases have placed considerable reliance on cases involving forfeiture of property used in the commission of a crime. It is made clear in this type of case that illegally seized evidence cannot be used to prove the violation causing the forfeiture, but the proceeding against the property itself is not a criminal case and some dispute existed as to the use of a suppression order in a civil action. The matter has been settled by the decision in One 1958 Plymouth [41] Sedan v. [*407] Pennsylvania, 380 U.S. 693, 14 L. Ed. 2d 170, 85 S. Ct. 1246 (1965), wherein it is stated:

> " . . . HN17[] a forfeiture proceeding is quasi-criminal in character. Its object, like a criminal proceeding, is to penalize for the commission of an offense against the law. . . . It would be anomalous indeed, under these circumstances, to hold that in the criminal proceeding the illegally seized evidence is excludable, while in the forfeiture proceeding, requiring the determination that the criminal law has been violated, the same evidence would be admissible. That the forfeiture is clearly a penalty for the criminal offense and can result in even greater punishment than the criminal prosecution has in fact been recognized by the Pennsylvania courts."

The Court in Plymouth Sedan emphasized the quasi-criminal nature of the proceedings. The principle set out in the quotation above applies with equal force to the present case. HN18[] An action for treble damages under the antitrust laws is also quasi-criminal. See, e.g., United States v. Borden Co., 347 U.S. 514, 98 L. Ed. 903, 74 S. Ct. 703 (1954); Kinnear-Weed Corp. v. Humble Oil & Ref. Co., 214 F.2d 891 (5th Cir. [42] 1954), cert. den., 348 U.S. 912, 99 L. Ed. 715, 75 S. Ct. 292 (1955); United States v. Standard Ultramarine & Color Co., 137 F. Supp. 167 (S.D.N.Y. 1955). The matters which must be proved by the plaintiffs are the same matters which must be proved in a criminal proceeding against the defendants. There is a possibility that criminal proceedings may be commenced. If the defendants were found guilty, the penalty imposed could be considerably less than the amount of damages requested in the present case.

It may be argued that a distinction exists between a forfeiture proceeding and a private antitrust suit in that the former always involves enforcement of laws by government officials. The remedy of suppression seems more necessary to curb excesses of government officials who have the ability to coerce and the opportunity to conduct illegal seizures. While it is true that the Government in this case is in the position of a private party bringing suit under the Sherman and Clayton Acts, the uncertainty over the applicability of the exclusionary rule in cases not involving government officials is not pertinent here. In bringing the suit, the Attorney General was fulfilling the duties [43] of his office and his representatives acted in furtherance of ends within the scope of their duties. By improperly availing themselves of statutory powers granted only to the Attorney General in his official capacity, the plaintiffs have subjected themselves to the impact of the exclusionary rule as a remedy against arbitrary acts of governments insofar as the rule applies to civil cases.

The conclusion that HN19[] suppression of illegally seized evidence is a proper procedure in a civil case is supported by the following decisions: Rogers v. United States, 97 F.2d 691 (1st Cir. 1938); United States v. Blank, 261 F. Supp. 180 (N.D. Ohio 1966); Lassoff v. Gray, 207 F. Supp. 843 (W.D. Ky. 1962); Carlisle v. State Ex rel. Trammell, 276 Ala. 436, 163 So.2d 596 (1964); Carson v. State Ex rel. Price, 221 Ga. 299, 144 S.E.2d 384 (1965); Del Presto v. Del Presto, 92 N.J. Super. 305, 223 A.2d 217 (Super.Ct. 1966); Williams v. Williams, 8 Ohio Misc. 156, 221 N.E.2d 622 (Com. Pleas 1966). In United States v. Blank, supra, a civil action for assessment of taxes, the Court ordered suppression of illegally seized evidence stating that, "Our decision today follows necessarily from the reasoning explicitly [44] expressed by the Supreme Court in One 1958 Plymouth Sedan v. Com. of Pennsylvania." Similarly, the decisions in the three state cases above relied on the Plymouth Sedan case.

Support for this conclusion may also be found in statements of the Supreme Court such as that in Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383, 58 L. Ed. 652, 34 S. Ct. 341 (1914): "This protection reaches all alike, whether accused of [*408] crime or not . . . ." Also, in Abel v. United States, 362 U.S. 217, 4 L. Ed. 2d 668, 80 S. Ct. 683 (1959), Mr. Justice Brennan dissented from the majority's finding that a search had not been unconstitutional and made the following statement:

> "We are told that the governmental power to make a warrantless search might be greater where the object of the search is not related to crime but to some other 'civil' proceeding - such as matter bearing on the issue whether a man should forcibly be sent from the country. The distinction is rather hollow here, where the proofs that turn up are in fact given in evidence in a criminal prosecution. And the distinction, again, invites a trial of the officers' purposes. But in any event, I think it perverts the Amendment to make this [45] distinction. The Amendment states its own purpose, the protection of the privacy of the individual and of his property against the incursions of officials: the 'right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects.' See Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616, 627, 29 L. Ed. 746, 6 S. Ct. 524. Like most of the Bill of Rights it was not designed to be a shelter for criminals, but a basic protection for everyone; to be sure, it must be upheld when asserted by criminals, in order that it may be at all effective, but it 'reaches all alike, whether accused of crime or not.' Weeks v. United States, supra, 232 U.S. at 392. It is the individual's interest in privacy which the Amendment protects, and that would not appear to fluctuate with the 'intent' of the invading officers. It is true that the greatest and most effective preventive against unlawful searches that has been devised is the exclusion of their fruits from criminal evidence, see Weeks v. United States, supra; Boyd v. United States, supra; but it is strange reasoning to infer from this that the central thrust of the guarantee is to protect against a search for such evidence. The argument that it is seems [46] no more convincing to me now than when it was made by the Court in Frank v. Maryland, 359 U.S. 360, 3 L. Ed. 2d 877, 79 S. Ct. 804. To be sure, the Court in Boyd v. United States, supra, and in subsequent cases has commented upon the intimate relationship between the privilege against unlawful searches and seizures and that against self-incrimination. This has been said to be erroneous history; if it was, it was even less than a harmless error; it was part of the process through which the Fourth Amendment, by means of the exclusionary rule, has become more than a dead letter in the federal courts. Certainly this putative relationship between the guarantees is not to be used as a basis of a stinting construction of either - it was the Boyd case itself which set what might have been hoped to be the spirit of later construction of these Amendments by declaring that the start of abuse can 'only be obviated by adhering to the rule that constitutional provisions for the security of person and property should be liberally construed.' 116 U.S., at 635."

The HN20[] decisions in Camara v. Municipal Court of the City and County of San Francisco, 387 U.S. 523, 18 L. Ed. 2d 930, 87 S. Ct. 1727 (1967), [47] and See v. City of Seattle, supra, holding that search warrants must be obtained to inspect homes and business premises, may be taken to indicate that the right to be free from unconsented searches is the foremost concern of the Fourth Amendment and that the use of illegally seized evidence in a criminal prosecution is merely a common incident of the search which is proscribed. The cases extending the exclusionary rule to civil proceedings are based on the conclusion that it is the right of privacy that is protected and that there exists no valid distinction for varying the exclusionary rule in a civil case. In Hinchcliff v. Clarke, 230 F. Supp. 91 (N.D. Ohio 1963), rev'd on other grounds, *371 F.2d 697 (6th Cir. [409] 1967), the District Court pointed out that society's interest in proof obtained by illegal means is less in a civil case than in criminal cases in which the evidence is suppressed. This Court is persuaded that the evidence seized from the four defendants must be suppressed.

HN21[] No distinction can be made based on the fact that commercial premises were illegally searched as opposed to residential premises. See See v. City of Seattle, supra; Go-Bart Importing Co. [48] v. United States, 282 U.S. 344, 75 L. Ed. 374, 51 S. Ct. 153 (1931); Amos v. United States, 255 U.S. 313, 65 L. Ed. 654, 41 S. Ct. 266 (1921); Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States, 251 U.S. 385, 64 L. Ed. 319, 40 S. Ct. 182 (1920).

The defendants rely on Hinchcliff v. Clarke, supra, in urging that the illegally seized evidence be suppressed completely and the plaintiffs barred from reacquiring it by any means. Putting aside for the moment the question of reacquisition, the Court has no doubt that the plaintiffs are barred from profiting in any way by the illegal search and seizure. This is the unmistakable teaching of Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States, supra, wherein it is stated:

> "The HN22[] essence of a provision forbidding the acquisition of evidence in a certain way is that not merely evidence so acquired shall not be used before the Court but that it shall not be used at all."

There is no dispute among the cases that the government cannot use the information obtained illegally either directly or indirectly to discover other evidence. To hold that the only prohibition should be against introduction of the evidence at trial would be an empty remedy and an [49] inducement to the violation of constitutional rights. While the Silverthorne case and the other cases establishing this principle were criminal proceedings, there is no rational basis for varying the rule in a civil case.

The question of reacquisition of the evidence has not been decisively settled by the cases in point. Part of the answer is supplied by Mr. Justice Holmes' statements in the Silverthorne case:

> "Of course this does not mean that facts thus obtained become sacred and inaccessible. If knowledge of them is gained from an independent source they may be proved like many others, but the knowledge gained by the Government's own wrong cannot be used by it in the way proposed."

This principle has not been altered by subsequent cases and must be applied to the present case. It is clear then that HN23[] information illegally obtained can be used if it is later gained from an independent source. It seems likely that most of the relevant documents and information obtained illegally in this case would in normal circumstances be discoverable under the rules of discovery applicable in civil cases. Have the plaintiffs forfeited the right to make use of discovery procedures [50] to regain the previously seized documents or the information contained in them? The statement of Mr. Justice Holmes does not resolve this issue. Subsequent legal means of acquiring the documents could well be considered "independent" of previous illegal means.

In Hinchcliff v. Clarke, supra, the Court ruled unequivocally that illegally obtained evidence could not be reacquired by any means. The Court in Hinchcliff reasoned that to hold otherwise would reduce the suppression Order to a futile gesture and added that the scope of its Order was discretionary, saying that,

> "This Court, being a court of equity as well as a court of law, has the power to fashion an appropriate order which will achieve the ends of justice."

Were this Court to view the matter as discretionary only, it could base its decision on the equities of the case without further consideration of whether complete suppression is constitutionally compelled. There are cases contrary to Hinchcliff which, by a preponderance of numbers as well as by greater persuasiveness, [*410] lead this Court to deny complete and permanent suppression.

In Lord v. Kelley, 223 F. Supp. 684 (D. Mass.), appeal dismissed, [51] 334 F.2d 742 (1st Cir. 1964), the Court refused to prohibit reacquisition by an appropriate summons to produce on the ground that the complainants should not be better off than before the unlawful seizures. The Court stated:

> "If it be argued that the Internal Revenue Service should be taught a lesson and penalized for Flattery's misconduct, there are many answers, of which the best is that exclusionary rules of evidence are designed not as punishment but to prevent the public prosecutor from using 'dirty hands' to achieve a conviction."
>
> " . . . while the complainants may be disappointed that they have not won immunity, they have vindicated the right of an independent accountant's clients not to have their papers seized by arbitrary, high-handed methods of tax enforcement."

The Appellate Court in Lord v. Kelley characterized the ruling in Hinchcliff as a penalty, indicating that the reasons for the ruling were that the wrongful seizure had put the taxpayers to great expense, that the fact that the taxpayers wanted the documents back might of itself cause the government to believe that they were not innocent, that to rule otherwise would give the taxpayers but a [52] "hollow victory" and finally, that the U.S. Attorney there showed no contrition.

Other cases have also approved the principle that HN24[] when knowledge of documents is gained independent of an illegal search and seizure the documents can be obtained by legal means. See McGarry's, Inc. v. Rose, 344 F.2d 416 (1st Cir. 1965); Wagman v. Arnold, 257 F.2d 272 (2d Cir. 1958); United States v. Sheba Bracelets, 248 F.2d 134 (2d Cir. 1957), cert. den. 355 U.S. 904, 2 L. Ed. 2d 259, 78 S. Ct. 330 (1957); United States v. Mahler, 254 F. Supp. 581 (S.D.N.Y. 1966); Cf. Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471, 9 L. Ed. 2d 441, 83 S. Ct. 407 (1962); Nardone v. United States, 308 U.S. 338, 84 L. Ed. 307, 60 S. Ct. 266 (1939). While in some of these cases the government knew of the documents before they were seized, this is not a significant distinction where, as in this case, the plaintiffs could have used the civil rules of discovery to learn of the existence of relevant documents.

Looking to the factors considered in Lord v. Kelley, as weighing in favor of a limited suppression order, it is well to point out here that the government has tacitly admitted wrongdoing, that the illegal method of gaining [53] access to the corporate records was unique and will not soon occur again, and that the defendants have vindicated the right to be free from misuse of statutes as a means of violating constitutional rights. A limited suppression order is far short of immunity but it is not a futile gesture. The relief to be granted in this case complies with the exclusionary rules as they now stand. In some cases a limited suppression order is of great benefit to the complainant while in others the impact is less. It is not the duty or the inclination of this Court to ensure the greatest effect. The defendants will be restored to their earlier position but will not gain immunity. In ruling on any discovery motions by the plaintiffs, the Court will take care to prevent, insofar as possible, the use of illegally obtained information.

Another significant issue raised by the motions to suppress is the question of standing. It must be determined whether the right to move for suppression belongs only to the four defendants whose records were seized or whether it extends to their codefendants as well. Implicit in this choice is the certainty that if the right belongs only to the four corporations, [54] each has standing only to move for suppression of the evidence seized from it. In resolving this matter, reliance must again be placed on exclusionary rule as it has been developed in criminal cases.

[*411] HN25[] It is clear that illegally seized evidence may not be used against codefendants in a criminal case but the rule is limited to a situation of joint trial. See McDonald v. United States, 335 U.S. 451, 93 L. Ed. 153, 69 S. Ct. 191 (1948); Gillespie v. United States, 368 F.2d 1 (8th Cir. 1966); Schoeneman v. United States, 115 U.S. App. D.C. 110, 317 F.2d 173 (1963); Hair v. United States, 110 U.S. App. D.C. 153, 289 F.2d 894 (1961). Heretofore in this ruling where criminal cases have been relied upon in applying the exclusionary rule to civil proceedings, the purpose has been to derive from them that which is an integral part of constitutional rights. The Court believes, however, that the rule of exclusion applied in the cases just cited is compulsive only in criminal cases. It is apparent from Rule of Criminal Procedure 41(e) that the government may in certain situations use illegally seized evidence against persons who were not personally subjected to an illegal search [55] and seizure. Evidence wrongfully seized from one person may be used against his alleged partner in crime if the two are tried separately. See United States v. Beigel, 370 F.2d 751 (2d Cir. 1967); United States v. Granello, 365 F.2d 990 (2d Cir. 1966); United States v. Konigsberg, 336 F.2d 844 (3d Cir. 1964); Cf. United States v. Chieppa, 241 F.2d 635 (2d Cir. 1957). The protections given to codefendants in criminal cases by the McDonald case can be attributed to the need for more stringent safeguarding of the rights of persons accused of crime. The prohibitions against self-incrimination, deprivation of legal counsel, cruel and unusual punishment and the right to confrontation of witnesses and a jury trial are likewise examples of protection having less applicability to defendants in civil proceedings. The McDonald case and the cases following it have established an exception to the requirement of standing to object but is an exception peculiarly applicable to criminal cases.

Accordingly, it is hereby ordered that the motions to suppress made by Pioneer Asphalt Co., Central States Oil & Asphalt Co., Inc., Bitucote Products Co. and Bituminous Material & Supply Co. are granted insofar [56] as each of these parties has moved to suppress evidence seized from it. The plaintiffs are ordered to return all items seized from these defendants together with all copies made from the seized items. It is further ordered that the plaintiffs may not in any manner use the seized items or any knowledge gained by the illegal searches against the party from whom the knowledge was gained or the items seized, except that the plaintiffs may make use of all evidence and knowledge if it is gained from an independent source.

It is further ordered that all other motions to suppress are denied.

American Safety Equip. Corp. v. J. P. Maguire & Co.

United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit

March 20, 1968, Decided

Nos. 31658, 31709

Reporter

391 F.2d 821 *; 1968 U.S. App. LEXIS 7623 ; 1968 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,387; 3 A.L.R. Fed. 901

American Safety Equipment Corp. v. J. P. Maguire & Co., Inc. American Safety Equipment Corp. v. Hickok Mfg. Co., Inc.

Core Terms

arbitration, License, district court, declaratory judgment action, antitrust, royalties, arbitration clause, courts, antitrust violation, decisions, equitable, parties, cases, agreement to arbitrate, antitrust claim, proceedings, trademark, orders

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Civil Procedure > ... > Entry of Judgments > Stays of Judgments > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Counterclaims > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Appellate Jurisdiction > Interlocutory Orders

HN1[] Entry of Judgments, Stays of Judgments

An order staying or refusing to stay proceedings in the district court is appealable under 28 U.S.C.S. § 1292(a)(1) only if (A) the action in which the order is made is an action which, before the fusion of law and equity, is by its nature an action at law; and (B) the stay is sought to permit the prior determination of some equitable defense or counterclaim.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Pretrial Matters > Alternative Dispute Resolution > Validity of ADR Methods

Civil Procedure > ... > Alternative Dispute Resolution > Arbitration > General Overview

Governments > Legislation > Statutory Remedies & Rights

HN2[] Alternative Dispute Resolution, Validity of ADR Methods

The remedy a statute provides for violation of the statutory right it creates may be sought not only in any court of competent jurisdiction but also in any other competent tribunal, such as arbitration, unless the right itself is of a character inappropriate for enforcement by arbitration.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN3[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

A claim under the antitrust laws is not merely a private matter. The Sherman Act is designed to promote the national interest in a competitive economy; thus, the plaintiff asserting his rights under the Act has been likened to a private attorney-general who protects the public's interest.

Judges: [1] Lumbard, Chief Judge, Kaufman and Feinberg, Circuit Judges.

Opinion by: FEINBERG

Opinion

[*822] FEINBERG, Circuit Judge:

These two appeals by American Safety Equipment Corp. (ASE) are from orders of the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, Constance B. Motley, J., which stayed, pending arbitration, two declaratory judgment actions by ASE, one against Hickok Manufacturing Co., Inc., and the other against J. P. Maguire & Co., Inc. The merits of these actions are not now directly in question, but the propriety of directing arbitration is. We conclude that the court should have decided itself at least some of the issues it referred to the arbitrators. Accordingly, we remand for further proceedings.

In August 1963, ASE and Hickok entered into a License Agreement under which Hickok granted to ASE an exclusive license to use the "Hickok" trademarks in connection with "safety protective devices" and "accessories." [1] The former were principally seat belts; the latter were defined as anything intended for use in a vehicle provided it was not a safety protective device or a regular body or motor part. Several substantive elements of the License Agreement, [2] which had a fifteen year term, [2] are relevant here. Paragraph 3 provided for royalties based on ASE's total annual sales of safety protective devices (whether or not the Hickok trademarks were used) and of accessories (if sold under trademark). Paragraph 27 allowed ASE to grant sublicenses for territories outside the United States, subject to approval by Hickok, if certain conditions were met; the most important of these was that the sublicensee could not be "a competitor of Hickok or of any of its licensees with respect to any products sold or dealt with by said proposed sublicensee." Among Hickok's products are trouser belts, suspenders, a variety of [*823] gift items for men, and several types of men's wearing apparel. Paragraph 28 limited each company to its own field of activity; Hickok would neither sell nor market safety protective devices or accessories, and ASE would "not directly or indirectly engage in the business of manufacturing, selling or dealing with any items or types of items of wearing apparel, apparel accessories and gift sets, other than sets related to transportation." Three other provisions of the License Agreement are also relevant: One allowed assignment [3] only with the consent of the other party; another contained a standard severability clause, and the third provided:

---

[1] There was also a contemporaneous Manufacturing Agreement under which Hickok agreed to manufacture seat belts for ASE. Various claims under the Manufacturing Agreement between the two parties and Maguire, as purported assignee of Hickok's royalty rights, had, at the time of the district court proceedings, been submitted to arbitration. None of the parties has raised any question in this proceeding concerning either that agreement or that arbitration.

[2] This was later changed to sixteen years.

> All controversies, disputes and claims of whatsoever nature and description arising out of, or relating to, this Agreement and the performance or breach thereof, shall be settled by arbitration . . . .

The 1963 License and Manufacturing Agreements [3] extended a business relationship which had started in 1959. Under the agreements, operations apparently continued on a mutually satisfactory [4] basis for several more years, during which time ASE and Hickok did many millions of dollars worth of business together. But, as so frequently occurs, there was a falling out. On October 21, 1966, ASE filed a complaint against Hickok in the district court seeking a declaratory judgment that the License Agreement was illegal and void ab initio and that no royalty obligations had or would accrue under it. The complaint alleged that paragraphs 3, 27 and 28 of the agreement violated the Sherman Act because they unlawfully extended Hickok's trademark monopoly and unreasonably restricted ASE's business. [4] Twelve days later, J. P. Maguire & Co., Inc., claiming to be the assignee of Hickok's royalty rights, invoked the arbitration clause quoted above and demanded arbitration of a claim to $321,000.25 for royalties due under the License Agreement. In response, ASE filed another declaratory judgment action, this time against Maguire. This complaint repeated the claim for relief already made against Hickok; in addition, it sought an injunction against the arbitration proceeding commenced by Maguire. The grounds urged were: (1) that the License Agreement was illegal because of antitrust [5] violations, and that the district court had exclusive jurisdiction to determine that illegality; and (2) that Maguire had no right to demand arbitration under the License Agreement because the purported assignment by Hickok was invalid. Subsequently, ASE sought a preliminary injunction; Maguire, in turn, moved under the United States Arbitration Act, 9 U.S.C. §§ 2-4, 6, to stay the declaratory judgment action against it, pending arbitration of all issues. A similar procedural position was reached in ASE's action against Hickok. In December, Hickok formally abandoned all rights to enforce the challenged provisions of paragraph 28 of the License Agreement. A month later, Hickok demanded that ASE arbitrate all issues relating to the License Agreement, and moved to stay ASE's declaratory judgment action pending that arbitration; ASE countered with a motion for a preliminary injunction against that arbitration also.

[6] The two sets of motions growing out of this procedural morass were heard in February 1967. Thereafter, Judge Motley denied ASE's motions to enjoin arbitration and granted the motions of Maguire and Hickok. The judge held that the arbitration clause was broad enough to encompass the claims of antitrust violations and found no public policy against referring them to arbitration; the validity of the assignment would also be resolved in that forum. Accordingly, the judge stayed ASE's two declaratory judgment actions pending arbitration, and directed arbitration with respect to "all claims, disputes and controversies between the parties relating to the License [*824] Agreement, including the issue as to the validity thereof."

The basic question we must resolve is whether the district court erred in staying ASE's actions and ordering arbitration of ASE's antitrust allegations. [5] Before reaching it, however, we must determine whether these orders are properly before us at all, i.e., whether they are appealable. That issue was not initially noticed by the parties; we brought it to their attention, however, and they subsequently submitted briefs on the matter. A very recent case [7] in this circuit, Standard Chlorine, Inc. v. Leonard, 384 F.2d 304 (2d Cir. 1967), is dispositive of the law to be applied. As we stated there, adopting the Fifth Circuit's formulation, id. at 308:

> HN1[] An order staying or refusing to stay proceedings in the District Court is appealable under § 1292(a) (1) only if (A) the action in which the order was made is an action which, before the fusion of law and equity, was by its nature an action at law; and (B) the stay was sought to permit the prior determination of some equitable defense or counterclaim.

[3] See note 1 supra.

[4] A fourth allegation, that the term of the License Agreement was unreasonably long, has apparently been withdrawn.

[5] The arbitrability of the validity of the assignment to Maguire is also before us, and is discussed below.

The second requirement has clearly been met here; setting up the arbitration agreement is itself an equitable defense. Id.; see Shanferoke Coal & Supply Corp. v. Westchester Service Corp., 293 U.S. 449, 452, 79 L. Ed. 583, 55 S. Ct. 313 (1935).

[8] Whether the first requirement has been fulfilled is more complicated. A declaratory judgment action is a statutory creation, and by its nature is neither fish nor fowl, neither legal nor equitable. Where, as here, such an action has required classification, the courts have looked to the basic nature of the suit in which the issues involved would have arisen if Congress had not created the Declaratory Judgment Act, 28 U.S.C. §§ 2201-02. E.g., Simler v. Conner, 372 U.S. 221, 9 L. Ed. 2d 691, 83 S. Ct. 609 (1963); Beacon Theatres, Inc. v. Westover, 359 U.S. 500, 504, 515, 3 L. Ed. 2d 988, 79 S. Ct. 948 (1959); see Wright, Federal Courts § 100, at 392-93 (1963). Were it not for the availability of declaratory relief, the dispute between ASE and Hickok would normally arise in one of two ways. ASE could bring an action for treble damages based upon the alleged antitrust violations. On the other hand, ASE could wait until Hickok attempted to collect outstanding royalties, and then assert the illegality of the agreement as a defense. In either instance, the action would be legal, not equitable. See Beacon Theatres, Inc. v. Westover, supra; [9] Ring v. Spina, 166 F.2d 546 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 335 U.S. 813, 93 L. Ed. 368, 69 S. Ct. 30 (1948). Since the basic nature of ASE's declaratory judgment action against Hickok is thus legal, the conditions set forth in Standard Chlorine are met, and the appeal will lie. [6]

As to Maguire, it asserts that ASE's demand for an injunction in its declaratory judgment complaint shows [10] that the basic nature of the proceeding is equitable. This argument might be persuasive if the action against Maguire were analyzed in isolation; a suit to enjoin pending arbitration proceedings, coupled with a claim for declaratory relief, has a pronounced equitable cast. See Greenstein v. National Skirt & Sportswear Ass'n, 274 F.2d 430 (2d Cir. 1960); Wilson Bros. v. Textile Workers Union, 224 F.2d 176 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 350 U.S. 834, 100 L. Ed. 745, 76 S. Ct. 70 (1955). However, the action against Maguire is not in a vacuum; it is, instead, an integral [*825] part of the dispute between ASE and Hickok, including ASE's declaratory judgment action against Hickok. ASE sought to enjoin the arbitration that Maguire had already commenced merely as an adjunct to ASE's second declaratory judgment action, which stated the basic issues of the controversy between all three parties. Thus, we conclude that the Maguire order is also appealable. We are not gratified that this exercise in following convoluted case law is necessary, but we are heartened that the result reached is desired by both ASE and Hickok, the original major principals.

[11] We now come to the merits of the district court orders, which stayed the declaratory judgment actions and required ASE to proceed to arbitration on all disputes with Hickok and Maguire, including the validity of the License Agreement. The basic issue was aptly phrased by this court fifteen years ago in Wilko v. Swan, 201 F.2d 439, 444 (2d Cir. 1953):

> We think that HN2[] the remedy a statute provides for violation of the statutory right it creates may be sought not only in any "court of competent jurisdiction" but also in any other competent tribunal, such as arbitration, unless the right itself is of a character inappropriate for enforcement by arbitration . . . .

The question before us is whether the statutory right ASE seeks to enforce is "of a character inappropriate for enforcement by arbitration." This is a difficult issue, not often litigated. Wilko v. Swan, supra, was reversed by the Supreme Court in the leading decision on this subject. 346 U.S. 427, 74 S. Ct. 182, 98 L. Ed. 168 (1953). In that case, a purchaser of securities brought an [12] action under the Securities Act of 1933; he had signed a margin agreement which provided for arbitration of any controversy between the customer and the brokerage firm. The question was whether plaintiff was required to submit his claim to arbitration. This court held (2-1) that he was. The Supreme Court reversed (7-2), construing the non-waiver provision in the Securities Act [7] to forbid bargaining away any rights under the Act, including choice of forum.

---

[6] To support appealability, ASE also points out that if it had not filed a declaratory action, Hickok might have brought an action under 9 U.S.C. § 4 to compel ASE to arbitrate with it. If the district court had ordered arbitration over ASE's objections, as it has, ASE would have had a right to appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 1291. E.g., Rochester Tel. Corp. v. Communication Workers of America, 340 F.2d 237 (2d Cir. 1965) (per curiam); Farr & Co. v. Cia. Intercontinental de Navegacion de Cuba, S.A., 243 F.2d 342, 344-45 (2d Cir. 1957).

We have recently considered a similar problem in Fallick v. Kehr, 369 F.2d 899 (2d Cir. 1966). In that case, one partner, invoking the arbitration clause in a partnership agreement, charged another partner with misappropriation of partnership funds. A key issue was whether the latter's discharge in bankruptcy barred this claim. The district court, in the exercise of its discretion, allowed this issue, along with the others in the dispute, to be submitted to arbitration. We held (2-1) that [13] this was not an abuse of discretion. But see I. O. Koven & Brother Inc. v. Local Union No. 5767, United Steelworkers of America, 381 F.2d 196, 200-05 (3rd Cir. 1967).

None of these decisions involved the arbitrability of an antitrust claim; a few cases, however, do consider the question. In Silvercup Bakers, Inc. v. Fink Baking Corp., 273 F. Supp. 159, 162-63 (S.D.N.Y. 1967), the court in dictum characterized as "persuasive" the view that courts should not be displaced by labor arbitrators in deciding antitrust suits. A similar view was expressed in the context of a commercial dispute in Fanchon & Marco, Inc. v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., 107 F. Supp. 532, 548 (S.D.N.Y. 1952) (dictum), rev'd on other grounds, 202 F.2d 731 (2d Cir. 1953). See also Standardbred Owners Ass'n v. Yonkers Raceway, Inc., 31 Misc. 2d 474, 220 N.Y.S. 2d 649 (1961); cf. American President Lines, Ltd. v. S. Woolman, Inc., 239 F. Supp. 833, 836 (S.D.N.Y. 1964). However, in Greenstein v. National Skirt & Sportswear Ass'n, 178 F. Supp. 681 (S.D.N.Y. 1959), appeal dismissed, 274 F.2d 430 (2d Cir. 1960), [14] the court refused to stay an arbitration under a collective bargaining agreement even though plaintiff manufacturers, among other things, claimed that the agreement violated the [*826] Sherman Act. [8] [15] There are other decisions at the periphery of the precise issue before us. Thus, Kingswood Management Corp. v. Salzman, 272 A.D. 328, 70 N.Y.S. 2d 692 (1947), held treble damage claims for rent overcharges under the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942 non-arbitrable. But in United States of America for the Use and Benefit of Capolino Sons Inc. v. Electronic & Missile Facilities, Inc., 364 F.2d 705 (2d Cir.), dismissed under Rule 60, 385 U.S. 924, 87 S. Ct. 239, 17 L. Ed. 2d 148 (1966), arbitration was ordered on a Miller Act claim. Cf. Moseley v. Electronic & Missile Facilities, Inc., 374 U.S. 167, 10 L. Ed. 2d 818, 83 S. Ct. 1815 (1963). And Evans v. Hudson Coal Co., 165 F.2d 970 (3d Cir. 1948), approved arbitration of a claim under the Fair Labor Standards Act. These and other analogous opinions are cited in the decisions at various judicial levels in Wilko v. Swan and Fallick v. Kehr. [9]

Although these cases are relevant, they are not determinative. Nor are the two decisions relied on by the court below: Prima Paint Corp. v. Flood & Conklin Mfg. Co., 388 U.S. 395, 18 L. Ed. 2d 1270, 87 S. Ct. 1801 (1967), and Robert Lawrence Co. v. Devonshire Fabrics, Inc., 271 F.2d 402 (2d Cir. 1959), cert. granted, 362 U.S. 909, 80 S. Ct. 682, 4 L. Ed. 2d 618, dismissed under Rule 60, 364 U.S. 801, 81 S. Ct. 27, 5 L. Ed. 2d 37 (1960). It is true that in Prima Paint the Court said (388 U.S. at 404):

> in passing upon a 9 U.S.C. § 3 application for a stay while the parties arbitrate, a federal court may consider only issues relating to the making and performance of the agreement to arbitrate.

But we do not read that as foreclosing the inquiry in which we are engaged any more than it did the [16] Supreme Court in Wilko v. Swan, 346 U.S. 427, 98 L. Ed. 168, 74 S. Ct. 182 (1953). The claim in both Prima Paint and [7] § 14, 15 U.S.C. § 77n.

---

[8] The defendants had stipulated, however, that if arbitration resulted in an award against plaintiffs, the award could be attacked "upon any application for its confirmation on the ground of illegality of the contract provisions." 178 F. Supp. at 690.

[9] Wilko v. Swan, 201 F.2d at 443-45, and 346 U.S. at 435 nn. 20, 21; Fallick v. Kehr, 369 F.2d at 904 and n. 11, and at 906 (Friendly, J., dissenting).

Robert Lawrence was that a contract containing an arbitration clause was void because the contract as a whole was induced by fraud. In each case it was held that fraud in the inception was a question which could be decided by arbitrators, unless the claim of fraud went specifically to the arbitration clause. On the other hand, the claim here is that the contract is void because of a federal statute. In other words, there was not present in Prima Paint and Robert Lawrence that clash of competing fundamental policies which we find in this case and in most of those referred to above: the conflict between federal statutory protection of a large segment of the public, frequently in an inferior bargaining position, and encouragement of arbitration as a "prompt, economical and adequate solution of controversies." See Wilko v. Swan, 346 U.S. at 438. In that case, the Supreme Court frankly recognized a similar collision of public policies and faced up to it; we must do no less here.

HN3[] A claim under the antitrust laws is not merely [17] a private matter. The Sherman Act is designed to promote the national interest in a competitive economy; thus, the plaintiff asserting his rights under the Act has been likened to a private attorney-general who protects the public's interest. See Waldron v. Cities Service Co., 361 F.2d 671, 673 (2d Cir. 1966), cert. granted, 385 U.S. 1024, 87 S. Ct. 743, 17 L. Ed. 2d 672 (1967). Antitrust violations can affect hundreds of thousands -- perhaps millions -- of people and inflict staggering economic damage. Thus, in the recent "electrical equipment" cases, there were over 1,900 actions, including over 25,000 separate damage claims, commenced by purchasers of equipment allegedly illegally overpriced. [*827] [10] The purchasers in turn sold electricity to millions of consumers at rates presumably increased by the excessive costs. [11] We do not believe that Congress intended such claims to be resolved elsewhere than in the courts. We do not suggest that all antitrust litigations attain these swollen proportions; the courts, no less than the public, are thankful that they do not. But in fashioning a rule to govern the arbitrability of antitrust claims, [18] we must consider the rule's potential effect. For the same reason, it is also proper to ask whether contracts of adhesion between alleged monopolists and their customers should determine the forum for trying antitrust violations. Here again, we think that Congress would hardly have intended that. It is true that in Fallick v. Kehr, 369 F.2d at 905, when a similar argument was made to us, we said that we would deal with such a case when we had it. But in that situation Congress had clearly allowed the issue of dischargeability to be determined outside of the bankruptcy court, the Supreme Court had instructed bankruptcy courts to enjoin a claim against a discharged bankrupt only if there were "unusual circumstances," the agreement to arbitrate was part of a contract that was the opposite of a contract of adhesion, the crucial issue to be arbitrated was a relatively simple one, and the partnership agreement was perfectly proper when made.

[19] On the other hand, the claim here is that the agreement itself was an instrument of illegality; in addition, the issues in antitrust cases are prone to be complicated, and the evidence extensive and diverse, far better suited to judicial than to arbitration procedures. Moreover, it is the business community generally that is regulated by the antitrust laws. Since commercial arbitrators are frequently men drawn for their business expertise, it hardly seems proper for them to determine these issues of great public interest. As Judge Clark said concerning the analogous situation in Wilko v. Swan, 201 F.2d at 445 (dissenting opinion):

> Adjudication by such arbitrators may, indeed, provide a business solution of the problem if that is the real desire; but it is surely not a way of assuring the customer that objective and sympathetic consideration of his claim which is envisaged by the Securities Act.

Appellee Hickok seems to argue that all these considerations are irrelevant because ASE does not seek damages, apparently conceding that a treble damage claim would not be arbitrable. We do not regard this distinction as significant if it is meant to persuade [20] us that arbitrators rather than courts should declare whether contract provisions violate the Sherman Act. On the other hand, if Hickok is merely emphasizing that ASE's antitrust claims are actually being asserted as a defense to an action for royalties, we agree that questions of separability are present here, and we refer to them below. However, the problem of which forum should determine those questions remains; we believe it is governed by the same considerations discussed above.

---

[10] Reports of the Proceedings of the Judicial Conference of the United States (Washington, D.C., March 10-11, 1966) 25 (1966).

[11] See generally Atlantic City Elec. Co. v. General Elec. Co., 226 F. Supp. 59 (S.D.N.Y. 1964); Ohio Valley Elec. Corp. v. General Elec. Co., 244 F. Supp. 914, 949-51 (S.D.N.Y. 1965).

We express no general distrust of arbitrators or arbitration; our decisions reflect exactly the contrary point of view. See, e.g., South E. Atl. Shipping Ltd. v. Garnac Grain Co., 356 F.2d 189, 192-93 (2d Cir. 1966) (appellant penalized for making frivolous attempt to overturn arbitration award); Kulukundis Shipping Co., S/A v. Amtorg Trading Corp., 126 F.2d 978, 985 (2d Cir. 1942) ("it is our obligation to shake off the old judicial hostility to arbitration"). Moreover, we do not deal here with an agreement to arbitrate made after a controversy has already arisen. Cf. Wilko v. Swan, 346 U.S. at 438. We conclude only that the pervasive public [*828] [21] interest in enforcement of the antitrust laws, and the nature of the claims that arise in such cases, combine to make the outcome here clear. In some situations Congress has allowed parties to obtain the advantages of arbitration if they "are willing to accept less certainty of legally correct adjustment," see id., but we do not think that this is one of them. In short, we conclude that the antitrust claims raised here are inappropriate for arbitration.

This does not mean that we rule out arbitration of all aspects of this dispute. It does mean that the district court erred in submitting to the arbitrators "the issue as to the validity" of the License Agreement insofar as that empowered the arbitrators to decide issues of antitrust law. A plethora of those were raised by the able briefs and argument. Appellant contends that each of three separate sections of the License Agreement violates the Sherman Act. Appellees deny this, and make the following additional arguments, among others: Even if invalid, two of the sections are severable and therefore do not vitiate the rest of the agreement; at least one of the alleged claims of illegality is moot because Hickok has irrevocably [22] disclaimed any intention of enforcing the section; and, finally, appellant is estopped from challenging the validity of the agreement, having retained certain patents and other benefits from it. We do not, of course, express any view on the merits of these arguments. But we do note that ASE's claims are not frivolous, and that some of the opposing contentions raise difficult and fundamental questions; e.g., can the antitrust violations be a defense to a claim for royalties already due on goods sold by ASE under the Hickok trademark? Cf. Kelly v. Kosuga, 358 U.S. 516, 3 L. Ed. 2d 475, 79 S. Ct. 429 (1959); American Mfrs. Mut. Ins. Co. v. American Broadcasting-Paramount Theatres, Inc., 17 L. Ed. 2d 37, 87 S. Ct. 1 (1966) (granting stay); Comment, 27 U. Chi. L. Rev. 758 (1960). [12] If such violations are not a defense, the arbitration might promptly proceed within defined limits, leaving it to the arbitrators to decide what goods were so sold. However, the district court, rather than ruling on these several contentions, held that they should all be decided by arbitrators. In that it erred; the antitrust claims pressed by appellant may not [23] be submitted to arbitration. The district court should, in the first instance and with appropriate expedition, see Fed. R. Civ. P. 57, determine so much of this case as may be necessary in order that in the arbitration, if there is one, of the claims under the License Agreement, the arbitrators will not be called upon to determine antitrust issues. Cf. Ring v. Spina, 148 F.2d 647 (2d Cir. 1945).

The district court also left for arbitration the question whether Maguire had the right to invoke the arbitration clause against ASE. ASE asserts that it made no agreement to arbitrate with Maguire and therefore [24] cannot be compelled to do so. It argues that the License Agreement itself invalidates the purported assignment from Hickok to Maguire, [13] and that even if the assignment is valid, it transfers only the right to receive royalties, not the right to demand arbitration. Maguire replies that the License Agreement prohibits assignments (without ASE's consent) only of the whole contract, that even if this assignment falls within the prohibition of the agreement, the clause is only a personal covenant between [*829] ASE and Hickok, and does not affect Maguire's claims, that an assignment of [12] This question is made more difficult by the fact that in Kelly, allowing the defense would have permitted the buyers to retain goods without paying for them, while under the License Agreement involved here, only the less tangible benefits of using Hickok's trademarks have been received by ASE. It is for the district court to decide whether that is a distinction without a difference.

---

[13] Section 26(a) of the License Agreement provides:

> This Agreement and the license granted thereunder may not be assigned, transferred or encumbered by either party without the consent or approval of the other . . . .

royalties does carry with it the right to demand arbitration, and, finally, that ASE is foreclosed from relying on the anti-assignment clause because of laches, waiver and estoppel. Whether Maguire can compel ASE to arbitrate is an issue to be decided in the courts. See John Wiley & Sons v. Livingston, 376 U.S. 543, 11 L. Ed. 2d 898, 84 S. Ct. 909 (1964); Import Export Steel Corp. v. Mississippi Valley Barge Line Co., 351 F.2d 503 (2d Cir. 1965); Nederlandse Erts-Tankersmaatschappij, N.V. v. Isbrandtsen Co., 339 F.2d 440 (2d Cir. 1964); cf. Orion Shipping & Trading Co. v. Eastern States Petroleum Corp. of Panama, S.A., 312 F.2d 299 [25] (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 373 U.S. 949, 10 L. Ed. 2d 705, 83 S. Ct. 1679 (1963).

This case is quite different from those involving fraud in the inducement, e.g., Prima Paint Corp. v. Flood & Conklin Mfg. Co., 388 U.S. 395, 18 L. Ed. 2d 1270, 87 S. Ct. 1801 (1967); Robert Lawrence Co. v. Devonshire Fabrics, Inc., 271 F.2d 402 (2d Cir. 1959), cert. granted, 362 U.S. 909, 80 S. Ct. 682, 4 L. Ed. 2d 618, dismissed under Rule 60, 364 U.S. 801, 81 S. Ct. 27, 5 L. Ed. 2d 37 (1960). In those cases, an agreement to arbitrate was reached by the parties; the fraud alleged went not to the agreement to arbitrate but to the substance of the contract. The arbitration clauses were held separable, and the issue of fraud in the inducement [26] was sent to arbitration. That approach is not available here; it accomplishes nothing to treat the arbitration clause separately if Maguire is not a party to it. Therefore, before ordering ASE to arbitration, the district court should have first determined whether there was an agreement to arbitrate between ASE and Maguire. We express no opinion on the merits of that issue.

Finally, we note that nothing said in the course of this opinion is meant to preclude the district court, after deciding the questions now before it, from exercising its discretion in overseeing further development of these proceedings. See the three decisions of this court in Nederlandse Erts-Tankersmaatschappij, N.V. v. Isbrandtsen Co., 339 F.2d 440 (2d Cir. 1964), 362 F.2d 205 (2d Cir. 1966), and 387 F.2d 954 (2d Cir. 1968).

Remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Checker Motors Corp. v. Chrysler Corp.

United States District Court for the Southern District of New York

March 29, 1968

No. 64 Civ. 866

Reporter

283 F. Supp. 876 *; 1968 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12548 ; 1968 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,392

Checker Motors Corp. , Plaintiff, v. Chrysler Corp., Chrysler Motors Corp., and Checker Taxi Co., Inc., et al. (Additional Defendant on Counterclaim)

Core Terms

taxicabs, Rebate, purchasers, dealers, sales, passenger car, manufacturer, prices, customer, taxi, indirect, summary judgment, Sherman Act, franchise, grade, appears, retail, medallions, legality, injunctive relief, Robinson-Patman Act, competitor's, advertising, seller, price discrimination, price fixing, retail price, distributors, defendants', equipped

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

HN1[] Summary Judgment, Entitlement as Matter of Law

Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(a) authorizes a claimant to move for summary judgment in his favor upon all "or any party" thereof.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Oil & Petroleum Products > Gasoline Fuels > Gasoline Dealers & Distributors

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > Price Fixing

HN2[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Cartels & Horizontal Restraints

Regardless of the absence of agreement as to a specific or uniform price, a wide variety of horizontal and vertical arrangements have been classified as price-fixing agreements under 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, and therefore condemned as unlawful per se. However, an essential element is the competitor's surrender, express or implied, of some measure of pricing discretion. The evil of price-fixing agreements is that they cripple the freedom of traders and thereby restrain their ability to sell in accordance with their own judgment.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN3[] Regulated Practices, Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade

Conduct or agreements that do not restrict a competitor's pricing independence fall short of illegal price fixing under 15 U.S.C.S. § 1.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > General Overview

HN4[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Vertical Restraints

The true test of legality of a vertical price agreement under 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 is whether the restraint imposed is such as merely regulates and perhaps thereby promotes competition or whether it is such as may suppress or even destroy competition. To determine that question, the court must ordinarily consider the facts peculiar to the business to which the restraint is applied; its condition before and after the restraint was imposed; the nature of the restraint and its effect, actual or probable. The history of the restraint, the evil believed to exist, the reason for adopting the particular remedy, the purpose or end sought to be attained, are all relevant facts. This is not because a good intention will save an otherwise objectionable regulation or the reverse; but because knowledge of intent may help the court to interpret facts and to predict consequences.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Robinson-Patman Act > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Discrimination > General Overview

HN5[] Robinson-Patman Act, Claims

While a rebate may be violative of the 15 U.S.C.S. § 13(a), some proof indicating that it may result in discriminatory prices must be adduced.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Competitive Injuries > General Overview

HN6[] Price Discrimination, Competitive Injuries

Under antitrust law, the application of the "indirect purchaser" doctrine in a case of price discrimination under 15 U.S.C.S. § 13(a) depends upon showing that the manufacturer deals directly with the alleged "purchaser" and controls the terms upon which he buys.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Competitive Injuries > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Robinson-Patman Act > General Overview

HN7[] Price Discrimination, Competitive Injuries

The "customer" or "purchaser" requirement marks one of the outer limits of the seller's responsibility not to discriminate in a claim of price discrimination under 15 U.S.C.S. § 13(a). As long as he exercises control over the terms of a transaction he is held to this duty. If there is no control the duty naturally ends, for the manufacturer has no power to protect the buyer's competitors.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Competitive Injuries > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Robinson-Patman Act > General Overview

HN8[] Price Discrimination, Competitive Injuries

Under antitrust law, where the defendant has engaged in direct sales to the favored purchaser the direct dealing and control requirements need not be shown with respect to the disfavored "indirect purchaser" to prove a claim of price discrimination under 15 U.S.C.S. § 13(a). However, these requirements must still be proven when a supplier in effect supplants his intermediate distributors in dealings with those to whom the distributors resell and favors some of the intermediate distributors' accounts over others.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Competitive Injuries > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Robinson-Patman Act > General Overview

HN9[] Price Discrimination, Competitive Injuries

Cross-elasticity of demand, substitutability, physical appearance, and identity of performance are factors to be considered in determining whether goods are of "like grade and quality" for purposes of analyzing a claim of price discrimination under 15 U.S.C.S. § 13(a).

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Defenses > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Discrimination > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Competitive Injuries > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Competitive Injuries > Primary Line Injuries

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Competitive Injuries > Secondary & Tertiary Line Injuries

Antitrust & Trade Law > Robinson-Patman Act > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > Robinson-Patman Act > Coverage > General Overview

HN10[] Price Discrimination, Defenses

The provisions of 15 U.S.C.S. § 13(a) protect sellers competing against the grantor of a discriminatory price. The mere fact that the favored and disfavored purchasers are not in competition inter se does not preclude a Robinson-Patman violation in a primary line price discrimination case. Moreover, in a secondary line price discrimination case, a seller may not discriminate between prices charged by it for nationally advertised and private brands where the goods contained in each are of "like grade and quality." This implicitly assumes that the mere fact that one class of purchasers are more aware of market conditions and more knowledgeable of the product's qualities does not justify a price discrimination against a class that is without this information.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Robinson-Patman Act > Defenses

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Defenses

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Discrimination > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Defenses > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Defenses > Meeting Competition Defense

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Defenses

HN11[] Robinson-Patman Act, Defenses

One of the requirements of the "good faith meeting competition" defense under 15 U.S.C.S § 13(a), prohibiting price discrimination, is that the seller demonstrate that his reduced price was to meet a competitor's equally low price.

Judges: [1] Mansfield, D.J.

Opinion by: MANSFIELD

Opinion

[*878] MANSFIELD, D.J..

In this private antitrust suit for treble damages and injunctive relief pursuant to §§ 4 and 16 of the Clayton Act (15 U.S.C. §§ 15 and 26), plaintiff, Checker Motors Corporation (Checker), moves for partial summary judgment against defendants Chrysler Corporation and Chrysler Motors Corporation (collectively referred to as "Chrysler" [1]), or, in the alternative, for preliminary injunctive relief. For the reasons set out in the decision, the motion is denied in all respects.

Since 1922 Checker, a New Jersey corporation with its principal place of business in Kalamazoo, Michigan, has been engaged, among other activities, in the production and sale of "purpose-built" taxicabs, i.e., automobiles designed and engineered for use as taxicabs. In producing [*879] such vehicles it [2] has incorporated into chassis and bodies of its own manufacture engines, axles, transmissions and other parts purchased from independent suppliers. [2] Checker sells its taxicabs through sales offices in various cities of the United States, [1] Chrysler Corporation manufactures automobiles that are sold by it to Chrysler Motors, which in turn sells the cars to authorized dealers throughout the country.

---

[2] Defendants' contention that Checker is an "assembler," rather than a primary "manufacturer," of automobiles, does not appear to have any legal significance in the disposition of the present motion, it being undisputed that the parties compete for ultimate sale of their respective products to taxicab operators. Furthermore, it appears that all automobile manufacturers purchase some components from independent suppliers.

principally New York, Boston, Chicago and Detroit. Prior to 1963 New York City provided one of its major markets. [3]

[3] Incorporated in Delaware, Chrysler is engaged in the business of manufacturing and selling automobiles, automobile accessories and parts. As one of the three major automobile colossi, Chrysler, in 1966, reported $5.6 billion in gross sales and had net earnings in the amount of $189.2 million. Chrysler's vehicles are sold in various markets, including the passenger car and taxicab markets.

Chrysler-made taxis and passenger cars are essentially the same, with a series of differences designed to satisfy, in the case of the taxicabs, the operator's need for continuous heavy duty, short-trip, stop-and-go, low fuel usage, and, in the case of the passenger car, the purchaser's desire for more comfortable riding, aesthetic appearance, quick get-away, and convenience. For example, the Chrysler 1965 Dodge Coronet model taxicab has a replaceable oil filter element, stiffer shock absorbers, springs and suspension system, special brake lining, wider wheel rims, heavier capacity battery, special lights, and special carburetor, which are features not found on the passenger car. In addition, the paint and seat-cover material of the passenger car are more stylish than those of the taxi counterpart, [4] and the passenger car usually contains more chrome. The fundamental elements of both cars, however, including the frame and engine, are essentially the same.

Chrysler distributes its vehicles to the public via a nationwide system of independent franchised dealers. In promoting the sale of its taxis and passenger cars to the consuming public, Chrysler, like other large automobile manufacturers, engages in extensive advertising campaigns. Although Chrysler suggests a retail price for its vehicles each dealer, upon purchasing automobiles from it, assumes the risk of loss, and independently determines the retail price of automobiles purchased by it from Chrysler for resale.

In 1962, in order to promote the sale of its taxicabs, Chrysler instituted the "Commercial Fleet Value Program" ("Rebate Plan" herein), under which, throughout the United States, purchasers of two or more taxicabs from Chrysler-authorized qualified dealers could, upon completing a form and returning it to Chrysler, receive a rebate of up to $200 per taxicab from the manufacturer. In 1966 and 1967, the plan was altered to include purchasers of a single taxicab and the rebate was set at $183 per vehicle. Chrysler [5] dealers have advertised the program, although the accounting and payments have been handled by Chrysler.

The present treble damage action was commenced in 1964. Checker's complaint alleges a combination and conspiracy between Chrysler, its subsidiaries, dealers and others, beginning in 1960, to restrain trade in the manufacture and sale of taxicabs by eliminating Checker as a competitor, excluding it from the New York City and other markets, and otherwise injure its business, and to monopolize such trade and commerce. More specifically it is alleged that Chrysler, after [*880] being advised that Checker proposed to increase its production and sales from 7,000 to 24,000 vehicles per annum, undertook to supply Checker's requirements of components for use in Checker taxicabs, private passenger automobiles and other vehicles, and to sell Checker duplicate tools, discs and fixtures at an agreed-upon low price arrangement, inducing Checker, in reliance upon such commitments, to commence re-engineering its automobile chassis and bodies for adaptation to products manufactured by Chrysler, and to construct a large number of prototype vehicles which were subjected to extensive experimental [6] testing; that in the meantime, Chrysler in bad faith delayed preparation of a formal agreement, postponed performance of its undertakings, and proceeded to solicit Checker's taxicab clientele and to disseminate reports that Checker proposed to utilize Chrysler's motor in the manufacture of Checker taxis, thereby giving Chrysler an unfair competitive advantage and causing a substantial loss of momentum in Checker's sales and a prolonged disruption of its production.

---

[3] Markin Aff., April 12, 1967; Def's Ex. B to Ehrenbard Aff., Oct. 24, 1967, pp. 14-15, indicating location of sales office and taxi subsidiary in New York; United States v. Yellow Cab Co., 80 F. Supp. 936, 940 (N.D. Ill. 1948), affd., 338 U.S. 338, 94 L. Ed. 150, 70 S. Ct. 177 (1949); Def's Ex. J; Plf's Reply Memo, p. 8.

The complaint further alleges that Chrysler sold private automobiles equipped as "taxicabs" at "unlawful, low and discriminatory prices" financed out of profits from private passenger sales, and increased its taxicab sales through the Rebate Plan

> "pursuant to which [Chrysler] and [its] co-conspirators unlawfully discriminated in prices between purchasers of defendants' passenger automobiles equipped with the so-called 'taxicab package' and purchasers of said automobiles not so equipped." (Complaint Par. 14(f)(i))

It was alleged that even in the absence of the Rebate Plan

> "the suggested retail list prices of defendants' passenger automobiles sold for use as taxicabs were and are generally lower [7] than the suggested retail list prices of automobiles of the identical make and model sold to the general public for use as private passenger cars, notwithstanding the fact that the automobiles sold as taxicabs include more costly extra items known as the 'taxicab package '." (Complaint Par. 14(f)(ii))

The rebate accorded to purchasers of Chrysler's automobiles sold for use as taxicabs, it is alleged, was not supported by any cost justification, the program allegedly being motivated by

> "defendants' recognition that the greatest volume of taxicab sales usually takes place in New York City, and that domination by defendants of the New York City taxicab market, in addition to eliminating plaintiff as a substantial competitor, would be a valuable lever and selling point by which defendants could increase their share of the passenger automobile market throughout the United States. The importance attached by defendants to dominating the New York City taxicab market as a means of furthering the sales of various of its passenger automobiles is shown by the extensive national advertising campaign defendants have constructed around its New York City taxicab sales. Said advertising [8] campaign falsely and fraudulently represents to the public at large that many of defendants' passenger cars sold for use as taxicabs are 'taxi-labs,' whose performance can be meaningfully compared to defendants' private passenger car performance. Such advertising misleadingly omits any mention of the special, heavy duty 'taxicab package' installed in the passenger cars equipped for use as taxicabs, which completely invalidates the comparison defendants purpose [propose] to make between their passenger cars equipped for use as taxicabs and those not so equipped." (Complaint Par. 14(f)(vii))

Chrysler's conduct is claimed to have substantially lessened competition in the line of commerce consisting of the manufacture and sale in interstate commerce of automobiles, including taxicabs. As a result of Chrysler's activities, Checker seeks $45 million in damages and an injunction permanently enjoining Chrysler, [*881] its servants, agents, employees and others in privity with them, from conspiring to destroy plaintiff's business by unlawful means.

On the present motion, only the legality of the Rebate Plan is in issue. Checker asserts that the arrangement as employed in New [9] York City amounts to (1) a per se unlawful price fixing contract, combination, or conspiracy between Chrysler and its dealers in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 1; and (2) a discriminatory pricing arrangement in violation of § 2(a) of the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 13(a). As an alternative to partial summary judgment, Checker seeks a preliminary injunction against Chrysler's continuing the Rebate Plan during the pendency of this litigation.

Chrysler first contends that the motion should be denied because it is predicated on claims different from those alleged in the complaint. Although the complaint's emphasis is almost entirely on Chrysler's alleged discrimination in pricing, Paragraph 14(e) does allege that its taxicab sales have been made at "unlawful, low and discriminatory prices," which is probably sufficient to support a Sherman Act attack upon the Rebate Plan in this age of "notice" pleading. However, in view of this Court's denial of plaintiff's motion for substantive reasons, it becomes unnecessary to rest the decision on such a technical ground. With respect to the Robinson-Patman claim, there is no merit in defendants' contention. [10] The complaint sets forth a § 2(a) price discrimination primary line injury claim with sufficient particularity to put Chrysler on notice that Checker is allegedly aggrieved by reason of the rebate given to taxi purchasers. See Complaint Par. 14(f)(i), (vii).

Equally meritless is Chrysler's contention that since the complaint was filed in 1964 it cannot be used to attack Chrysler's Rebate Plan in effect in subsequent years. Checker's complaint alleges a continuing course of illegal conduct on Chrysler's part, against which injunctive relief is sought. Complaint Pars. 16, 17.

Defendants next assert that Rule 56, F.R.C.P., does not authorize a motion for partial summary judgment of the kind before the Court, because plaintiff is not entitled to split up the various wrongs asserted in a single count, and move with respect to one and not with respect to the others, i.e., the alleged unlawful activity in causing plaintiff to alter its production methods. However, HN1[] Rule 56(a) authorizes a claimant to move for summary judgment in his favor upon all "or any party" thereof. In White Motor Co. v. United States, 372 U.S. 253, 264, 9 L. Ed. 2d 738, 83 S. Ct. 696 (1963), the Supreme [11] Court allowed such fragmentation by granting summary judgment with respect to the price fixing claim, and denying the motion with respect to the legality of territorial and customer limitations contained in White's franchise contracts. At least in a complex case involving a series of separate transactions, as distinguished from one involving part of a single transaction or a portion of damages claimed, plaintiff's motion for partial summary judgment ought not be dismissed on the hyper-technical basis urged by Chrysler, since plaintiff's motion is not only designed to reach a quick judgment that is in the interest of the parties, but also undertakes to prevent the needless waste of judicial resources where it appears that the particular claim under judicial scrutiny involves no genuine issue of material fact. And this is the very intent of Rule 56.

The § 1, Sherman Act, Claim

Having disposed of the preliminary sparring, the legality of the Rebate Plan under § 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 1, [4] comes into focus. Plaintiff asserts that the plan is a per se price fixing agreement between Chrysler and its [*882] dealers and therefore conclusively unreasonable, [12] irrespective of purpose, reasonableness or competitive effect. United States v. Sealy, Inc., 388 U.S. 350, 355, 18 L. Ed. 2d 1238, 87 S. Ct. 1847 (1967); United States v. General Motors, 384 U.S. 127, 147, 16 L. Ed. 2d 415, 86 S. Ct. 1321 (1966); United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U.S. 150, 220-23, 84 L. Ed. 1129, 60 S. Ct. 811 (1940); United States v. Trenton Potteries Co., 273 U.S. 392, 71 L. Ed. 700, 47 S. Ct. 377 (1927).

HN2[] Regardless of the absence of agreement as to a specific or uniform price, a wide variety of horizontal and vertical arrangements have been classified as price-fixing agreements and therefore condemned as unlawful per se, e.g., Kiefer-Stewart Co. v. Joseph E. Seagram & Sons, Inc., 340 U.S. 211, 95 L. Ed. 219, 71 S. Ct. 259 (1951) (agreement on maximum resale prices); United States [13] v. United Liquors Corp., 149 F. Supp. 609 (W.D. Tenn. 1956), affd. per curiam, 352 U.S. 991, 77 S. Ct. 557, 1 L. Ed. 2d 540 (1957) (agreement on elimination of quantity discounts); Plymouth Dealers Assn. v. United States, 279 F.2d 128 (9th Cir. 1960) (agreements on starting price for bargaining and trade-in allowances); United States v. Gasoline Retailers Assn., 285 F.2d 688 (7th Cir. 1961) (agreement not to give trading stamps); United States v. McKesson & Robbins, Inc., 351 U.S. 305, 100 L. Ed. 1209, 76 S. Ct. 937 (1956) (manufacturer's requirement that wholesaler maintain resale price levels determined by manufacturer). However, an essential element is the competitor's surrender, express or implied, of some measure of pricing discretion. The evil of price-fixing agreements is that they

> "cripple the freedom of traders and thereby restrain their ability to sell in accordance with their own judgment." (HN3[] Kiefer-Stewart Co. v. Joseph E. Seagram & Sons, Inc., 340 U.S. 211, 213, 95 L. Ed. 219, 71 S. Ct. 259 (1951))

Conduct or agreements not restricting a competitor's pricing independence, on the other hand, falls short of illegal price fixing. See Turner, The Definition of [14] Agreement Under the Sherman Act: Conscious Parallelism and Refusals to Deal, 75 Harv.L.Rev. 655, 687 (1962). For instance, in Susser v. Carvel Corp., 332 F.2d 505 (2d Cir.), cert. granted, 379 U.S. 885, 85 S. Ct. 162, 13 L. Ed. 2d 91 (1964), cert. dismissed as improvidently granted, 381 U.S. 125, 85 S. Ct. 1364, 14 L. Ed. 2d 284 (1965), an ice cream manufacturer and its franchised dealers were held not to have engaged in an unlawful price fixing scheme where the manufacturer had merely recommended a retail price to the dealers, in the absence of the manufacturer's endeavoring to enforce the price structure at the retail level. In affirming the legality of the arrangement, Chief Judge Lumbard emphasized that "the franchise provisions explicitly reserved to the individual dealer the right to set whatever price he desired." 332 F.2d at 510.

---

[4] "Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal: . . . ."

On its face Chrysler's Rebate Plan does not curtail the dealer's pricing discretion. Each dealer is free (1) to raise retail taxicab prices, thus nullifying the effect of the rebate; (2) to keep his prices constant, and thus render Chrysler taxicab price competitive vis a vis General Motors, Ford, Checker and other automobile makers who grant similar [15] rebates; or (3) to lower his prices still further in competition against both Chrysler and non-Chrysler dealers alike. No evidence has been offered to the effect that the $183 rebate has even the slightest tendency to restrict in any way the dealer's independent decision and determination as to the retail sales price quoted by him to customers for Chrysler taxicabs. The most that appears from the record before us is that the plan manifests to the taxicab purchaser a desire on Chrysler's part to promote competitive sale of its taxis, at least to the extent of giving the appearance of a price advantage to the customer in the form of a $183 rebate. Possibly the practice acts as a psychological inducement to the customer that cannot be realized through a direct price reduction to the dealer in the identical amount [*883] which would, as a practical matter, enable the dealer in his discretion to reduce his price accordingly. Certainly the marketplace is full of similar manufacturer-originated promotional sales "gimmicks," such as "free goods" in the grocery and drug trades, coupons entitling the holder to cash or discounts, and the like, which do not run afoul of the Sherman Act [16] in the absence of a showing of impropriety. The plan does not give as much practical pricing flexibility to the Chrysler dealer as would a direct $183 price reduction in the wholesale price, since the customer, rather than the dealer, is automatically entitled to the rebate upon purchase of a Chrysler taxicab, whereas if Chrysler reduced the price to its dealers by $183, bargaining between each dealer and his customer might ensue to determine how much of the reduction, if any, would be passed along to the retail customer. However, this is an illusory distinction, since the dealer has the freedom to increase his retail price to offset the $183 rebate.

Thus there is a failure to show any provision of the plan, or any facts, indicating that the plan would tend to affect the exercise of competitive pricing discretion, or to affect or tamper with the range, level, scale, or amount of the price paid for Chrysler taxicabs, such as appears in price-fixing or distribution agreements that have been struck down as unreasonable without more. United States v. McKesson & Robbins, Inc., 351 U.S. 305, 100 L. Ed. 1209, 76 S. Ct. 937 (1956); United States v. Univis Lens Co., 316 U.S. 241, 86 L. [17] Ed. 1408, 62 S. Ct. 1088 (1941); United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U.S. 150, 84 L. Ed. 1129, 60 S. Ct. 811 (1940). In the absence of proof that the Rebate Plan has a tendency to restrict the dealer's pricing independence, or has some pricing effect, it amounts to nothing more than a promotional device which cannot be labelled illegal per se.

Having determined that it is inappropriate to condemn the plan as a per se unlawful price fixing arrangement on this motion for summary judgment, the question remains whether the Rebate Plan poses such a pernicious effect on competition that it must be condemned as violating the rule of reason. White Motor Co. v. United States, 372 U.S. 253, 263, 9 L. Ed. 2d 738, 83 S. Ct. 696 (1963); Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U.S. 1, 55 L. Ed. 619, 31 S. Ct. 502 (1911). Compare, Areeda, Antitrust Analysis P347, 348 (1967). The legality of a vertical rebate plan under § 1 of the Sherman Act, like that of the territorial and customer restrictions in the franchise agreement before the Supreme Court in White Motor Co., supra, can be determined only after an inquiry into facts peculiar to the taxicab business for the purpose of [18] determining what effect, if any, the program has had, or is likely to have, upon competition and dealer price conduct, and whether under all the circumstances it must be condemned as unreasonable. As the Supreme Court stated in HN4[] Chicago Board of Trade v. United States, 246 U.S. 231, 238, 62 L. Ed. 683, 38 S. Ct. 242 (1918):

> "The true test of legality is whether the restraint imposed is such as merely regulates and perhaps thereby promotes competition or whether it is such as may suppress or even destroy competition. To determine that question the court must ordinarily consider the facts peculiar to the business to which the restraint is applied; its condition before and after the restraint was imposed; the nature of the restraint and its effect, actual or probable. The history of the restraint, the evil believed to exist, the reason for adopting the particular remedy, the purpose or end sought to be attained, are all relevant facts. This is not because a good intention will save an otherwise objectionable regulation or the reverse; but because knowledge of intent may help the court to interpret facts and to predict consequences."

Here the moving papers fail to offer [19] any proof to the effect that the Rebate Plan has had, or is likely to have, an adverse effect on competition in the sale of taxicabs.

[*884] Checker's claim that it has lost taxicab sales in New York City to Chrysler as a result of the latter's Rebate Plan appears to be supported by the following schedule of taxicab registrations:

NEW YORK CITY

TAXICAB REGISTRATIONS

Date	Checker	Ford	(Chrysler) Dodge	Chevrolet	Studebaker	(Chrysler Plymouth	Misc.	Total
Dec. 1961	3,603	4,176	1,813	729	791	495	116	11,723
June 1962	3,872	3,400	2,026	914	1,080	343	95	11,730
Dec. 1962	4,056	2,938	2,376	953	1,092	315	71	11,737
June 1963	3,795	2,831	2,921	965	981	203	51	11,747
Dec. 1963	3,405	3,093	3,634	865	546	161	45	11,749
June 1964	2,301	3,186	4,834	864	424	106	37	11,752
Dec. 1964	1,776	3,192	5,587	840	246	78	34	11,753
April 1965	1,607	3,089	5,957	821	178	69	32	11,753
Dec. 1965	1,046	3,046	6,867	691	30	48	25	11,753
Aug. 1966	885	2,937	7,261	587	20	53	28	11,771

[*885] Registration figures may be a misleading indicator of sales, however, [20] for the reason that they include both new and used taxicabs in service at any given time. A more accurate source would probably be the actual sales of taxicabs during the relevant period. Sales figures made available to the Court for New York City for the period 1964-1967 are as follows:

New York City Taxicab Sales

	1964 Model		1965 Model		1966 Model		1967 Model
	Unit	Share	Unit	Share	Unit	Share	Unit	Share
Checker	415	6.6%	200	3.1%	268	4.7%	269	4.7%
Chrysler	3,467	55.2%	4,221	66.4%	3,357	60.1%	2,648	46.6%
Ford	1,831	29.2%	1,459	23.0%	1,958	34.8%	1,646	28.9%
General Motors	375	6.0%	478	7.5%	20	0.4%	1,124	19.8%

The above figures, however, fail to reflect a sharp drop in 1964 sales of Checker cabs into New York City as compared with earlier years, allegedly as a result of Chrysler's introduction of its Rebate Plan in 1962. Notwithstanding Checker's sharply declining share of the New York registrations, however, according to its own figures its nationwide sales have not declined quite as noticeably during the relevant period:

CHECKER MOTORS CORPORATION

Annual Taxicab Sales

	United States	New York City
1960	5,943	1,385
1961	4,219	1,667
1962	5,603	1,666
1963	4,969	1,221
1964	3,967	247

CHECKER MOTORS CORPORATION

Annual Taxicab Sales

	United States	New York City
1965	4,050	240

[21] Although Checker claims that the Rebate Plan has been a cause in the decline in Checker's sales, Chrysler sets out other reasons for its difficulty. First, in New York City a taxicab owner is required to have a medallion to operate a taxi vehicle. Prior to 1953 National Transportation Co. (National), a Checker subsidiary, controlled in excess of 1,600 of the total of approximately 11,000 taxicab medallions, or franchises, authorized by the City of New York. Chrysler contends that beginning in that year, under pressure from Government antitrust litigation, National began to systematically sell its medallions to various New York City taxicab fleet operators. However, as a condition to the sale of its medallions, Checker would require the medallion purchaser to replace its entire fleet for the year with its taxicabs. By 1964, Checker had parted with the last of its 1,600 medallions with a resulting loss of this weapon for maintenance of its sales of taxicabs in New York. Moreover, Chrysler points to facts indicating that Checker's president, Morris Markin, has contributed to the company's loss of New York City sales by antagonizing that city's taxicab fleet owners over the years [22] through public statements in favor of higher wages for taxi drivers and against increases in cab fares.

Even if it is assumed that the plan resulted in Chrysler dealers taking away sales from Checker, it is doubtful whether this is a permissible consideration, in the absence of a showing of predatory tactics, such as sales below cost or a scheme to squeeze Checker out of the market in order to destroy its competition and have it to themselves, since the purpose of the Sherman Act is to protect competition, not competitors. Ben Hur Coal Co. v. Wells, 242 F.2d 481, 486 [*886] (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 354 U.S. 910, 1 L. Ed. 2d 1427, 77 S. Ct. 1296 (1957). See United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U.S. 150, 220-21, 84 L. Ed. 1129, 60 S. Ct. 811 (1940). The inevitable result of lawful price competition, particularly in an inelastic market with a fixed ceiling on the number of units that can be sold (such as New York City, which limits taxicabs to approximately 12,000), is that some sellers are going to take away business from others, unless all sell the identical product at the same price. Thus, if Chrysler were to have reduced its wholesale prices by $183, a move the legality [23] of which would probably not be successfully challengeable, the effect on plaintiffs' share of the market might well be substantially the same.

Even if we assume proof of Checker's market loss to be relevant as some evidence of injury to competition in a market where few sellers are involved, genuine issues are raised by opposing affidavits to the effect that Checker's losses are due not to Chrysler's conduct but to inferior design and workmanship in Checker cabs, purchasers' difficulties in obtaining proper service, higher operational costs to taxicab owners, the expiration of restrictions requiring purchasers of medallions (from National Transportation) to buy Checker cabs, and Markins' alleged antagonizing of New York taxicab buyers by his sponsorship of a law increasing the total number of New York City medallions and his opposition to fare increases.

Chrysler further contends that its Rebate Plan has had the effect of promoting competition among competing taxicab manufacturers rather than inhibiting such competition, and states that Ford and General Motors have put into effect subsidies, rebates, other cash inducements and depreciation plans to retail taxi purchasers that are [24] the equivalent of Chrysler's plan. Against this contention is the possibility (neither suggested by Checker nor supported by any proof) that the rebate may foreclose price negotiations and haggling between Chrysler dealers and taxicab purchasers with respect to the deduction from Chrysler's suggested list price that would be made if Chrysler had granted a straight $183 price reduction to its dealer instead of an automatic rebate directly to the purchaser. While such negotiations could result in the buyer's paying a higher net price than he would with an automatic $183 rebate in those instances where dealers chose not to pass the entire reduction along to their customers, this hardly indicates that competition is adversely affected by the Rebate Plan, the effect of which appears to be to increase interbrand competition among taxicab manufacturers, including Ford and General Motors, to a greater degree than would have been the case had Chrysler simply reduced its prices to dealers.

In view of the apparent benefit to competition from the Rebate Plan, and the speculative nature of any possible detriments, Checker's motion, insofar as it attacks the Rebate Plan under § 1 of the Sherman [25] Act, must be denied, and a determination as to the plan's legality should await trial.

The § 2(a), Robinson-Patman Act, Claim

Checker next seeks summary judgment on the ground that the Rebate Plan was part of an unlawful primary line price discrimination between the sale of taxicabs and passenger automobiles which may substantially lessen competition in the sale of taxicabs, in violation of § 2(a) of the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 13(a). [5] Its theory is that Chrysler's [*887] taxicabs are in every respect either equal or superior in quality to its passenger cars, and that therefore, in the context of a price discrimination in favor of taxicabs, the two vehicles should be regarded as possessing "like grade and quality."

[26] In response to Checker's contention that the Rebate Plan caused an unlawful "price discrimination," i.e., a price difference, FTC v. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 363 U.S. 536, 549, 4 L. Ed. 2d 1385, 80 S. Ct. 1267 (1960), between taxicab purchasers and passenger car buyers, Chrysler argues that since Checker has not come forward with any evidence as to the retail prices at which the two vehicles are sold, price discrimination in violation of § 2(a) has not been shown. HN5[] While a rebate may be violative of the Robinson-Patman Act, it is elementary that some proof indicating that it may result in discriminatory prices must be adduced. American News Co. v. FTC, 300 F.2d 104 (2d Cir. 1962) (Clark, J.), cert. denied, 371 U.S. 824, 9 L. Ed. 2d 64, 83 S. Ct. 44 (1962); Moog Industries, Inc. v. FTC, 238 F.2d 43 (8th Cir. 1956), affd., 355 U.S. 411, 2 L. Ed. 2d 370, 78 S. Ct. 377 (1958). In the absence of any evidence as to retail prices of taxicabs and passenger cars, the Court cannot assume on this motion that except for the $183 rebate to taxicab buyers, the prices of taxicabs and passenger cars would be identical. Unlikely as it may be, it is possible that the $183 rebate results in identity [27] of price to the two customer categories. Accordingly, resolution of the question must await trial, at which the prices of the two categories may be introduced.

Chrysler next contends that it could not in any event have violated the prohibitions of the Robinson-Patman Act, because the alleged price discrimination was not between different purchasers from the manufacturer, but only between purchasers from Chrysler's independently franchised dealers after the latter had purchased, paid for, and acquired ownership of the vehicles. Thus, Chrysler argues, it is not a person who discriminates in price "between different purchasers" as required by § 2(a). In reply, Checker invokes the "indirect purchaser" doctrine, American News Co. v. FTC, 300 F.2d 104, 109 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 371 U.S. 824, 9 L. Ed. 2d 64, 83 S. Ct. 44 (1962), as the basis for urging that retail purchasers of taxicabs and passenger vehicles from Chrysler's franchised dealers are "purchasers" from Chrysler, within the meaning of § 2(a).

HN6[] The application of the "indirect purchaser" doctrine to a particular case depends upon showing that the manufacturer deals directly with the alleged "purchaser" and "controls the [28] terms upon which he buys." American News Co. v. FTC, 300 F.2d at 109; K.S. Corp. v. Chemstrand Corp., 198 F. Supp. 310, 312-13 (S.D.N.Y.1961); Purolator Prods., Inc. v. FTC, 352 F.2d 874 (7th Cir. 1965), cert. denied, HN7[] 389 U.S. 1045, 88 S. Ct. 758, 19 L. Ed. 2d 837 (1968).

> "The 'customer' or 'purchaser' requirement marks one of the outer limits of the seller's responsibility not to discriminate. As long as he exercises control over the terms of a transaction he is held to this duty; otherwise

[5] "It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality, where either or any of the purchases involved in such discrimination are in commerce, where such commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, and where the effect of such discrimination may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce, or to injure, destroy, or prevent competition with any person who either grants or knowingly receives the benefit of such discrimination, or with customers of either of them."

> the requirement of the statute could be easily avoided by the use of a 'dummy' wholesaler. If there is no control the duty naturally ends, for the manufacturer has no power to protect the buyer's competitors." (HN8[] American News Co. v. FTC, 300 F.2d at 109-10)

The Supreme Court has recently given added vitality to the doctrine by eliminating the direct dealing and control requirements with respect to the disfavored "indirect purchaser" where the defendant has engaged in direct sales to the favored purchaser. FTC v. Fred Meyer, [*888] Inc., 36 U.S. Law Week 4233, (1968). However, the Meyer Court did not question the American News test as applied to the situation in which [29] "a supplier in effect supplants his intermediate distributors in dealings with those to whom the distributors resell and favors some the intermediate distributors' accounts over others." 36 U.S. Law Week at 4237,

In the present case Chrysler suggests the resale price at which its dealers resell taxicabs and passenger cars, and engages in advertising campaigns to promote the sale of its vehicles to the public. With respect to the rebate, Chrysler not only sets the amount of the rebate, but also unilaterally controls the terms and conditions under which it is granted, receives the completed form, and pays the rebate directly to the taxi purchaser. However, the dealer is free to negotiate the ultimate price with his customer, offsetting the $183 rebate if he desires, and in fact appears to deviate from the manufacturer's resale price in making his sales. Further, with the exception of the rebate, Chrysler has no direct personal relationship with the taxi purchaser. In American News, as distinguished from the situation before us, the seller not only gave rebates to the favored indirect purchaser but also fixed the prices, terms, and conditions of sale. In Purolator Prods., Inc. [30] v. FTC, 352 F.2d 874 (7th Cir. 1965), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 1045, 88 S. Ct. 758, 19 L. Ed. 2d 837 (1968), the Court, accepting and applying the test of manufacturer control of the terms of resale, upheld a finding of an "indirect purchaser" relationship based on evidence that the manufacturer (1) had at one time had the legal right to control independent warehouse distributor sales; (2) had supplied warehouse distributors with their sales agreements and suggested resale price lists; (3) had solicited the indirect purchasers (the jobbers) and urged them to maintain prices which for the most part they had done; and (4) had directly negotiated franchise agreements and changes in price with the indirect purchasers. See Joseph A. Kaplan & Sons, Inc. v. FTC, 121 U.S. App. D.C. 1, 347 F.2d 785 (1965).

In this case the papers reveal a sharp issue as to whether Chrysler exercised sufficient control over the terms and conditions of its dealers' resales of passenger cars and taxicabs to warrant a determination that the dealers' customers were Chrysler's "indirect purchasers." Since the resolution of that issue hinges upon the number and quality of contacts between the manufacturer and the [31] alleged indirect purchaser, it must await trial. K.S. Corp. v. Chemstrand Corp., 198 F. Supp. 310, 313 (S.D.N.Y. 1961). On the other hand, Chrysler's contention that the "indirect purchaser" doctrine does not apply to a case where the indirect purchasers are consumers rather than retailers must be rejected as frivolous, being unsupported by the underlying purposes of the doctrine.

Chrysler next challenges the proposition that its taxicabs and its passenger cars are of "like grade and quality." In Atlanta Trading Corp. v. FTC, 258 F.2d 365 (2d Cir. 1958), the Second Circuit held that Canadian bacon, ham and pork shoulders were not of "like grade and quality" reasoning as follows:

> "The test of products of like grade and quality was evolved to prevent emasculation of the section by a supplier's making artificial distinctions in his product but this does not mean that all distinctions are to be disregarded. Such a holding would lead to the conclusion that all articles of food are competitive, each with the other - an obvious absurdity. Merely because various articles of food are derived from a common source (in this case, the pig), should not force the vendor of a broad line of [32] such products to market or promote all simultaneously and in an identical fashion. The dietetic habits of the consuming public are not to be controlled by judicial fiat." HN9[] (258 F.2d at 371)

However, cross-elasticity of demand, substitutability, physical appearance, and identity of performance, are factors to [*889] be considered in determining whether goods are of "like grade and quality." From the moving papers, a number of differences between Chrysler's passenger cars and taxicabs appear. The former contains more chrome; more attractive paint; seat covers that are aesthetically more desirable to purchasers of passenger cars; and various mechanical differences related to the type of driving normally undertaken by taxi drivers and passenger car drivers. Although it seems clear that denominating one vehicle a "taxicab" and an identical one a "passenger car" will not preclude a finding of "like grade and quality," FTC v. Borden Co., 383 U.S. 637, 16 L. Ed. 2d 153, 86 S. Ct. 1092 (1966), if there are substantial physical differences in products affecting consumer use, preference or marketability, such products are not of "like grade and quality," regardless of manufacturing [33] costs. Quaker Oats Co., 1963-65 FTC Complaints, Orders, Stipulations P17,134 (1964). See generally, Comment, Like Grade and Quality: Emergence of the Commercial Standard, 26 Ohio State L.J. 294 (1965). The existence of some physical differences between Chrysler taxicabs and passenger cars, coupled with conflicting contentions as to their effect upon cross-elasticity of use, precludes application of the principle that mere differences between "standard" and "premium" brands are insufficient to render them different in grade and quality. E.g., E. B. Muller & Co. v. FTC, 142 F.2d 511 (6th Cir. 1944). Whether the differences between Chrysler's taxicabs and passenger cars are minor and unsubstantial (as claimed by Checker) or substantial enough to affect consumer use, preference or marketability, presents a genuine issue of fact which cannot properly be resolved upon this motion for summary judgment. United States v. Diebold, Inc., 369 U.S. 654, 8 L. Ed. 2d 176, 82 S. Ct. 993 (1962); Gordon v. Vincent Youmans, Inc., 358 F.2d 261 (2d Cir. 1965).

Chrysler challenges the proposition that buyers of taxicab and passenger cars are "purchasers" entitled to equal treatment within the meaning [34] of § 2(a). Its theory is that the Robinson-Patman Act was never intended to place the users of passenger cars for pleasure purposes on a par with those who use their automobiles to earn their livelihood, e.g., taxicab owners. However, even if it were agreed that all passenger car owners use their vehicles solely for pleasure, this contention erroneously assumes that § 2(a) was designed to protect only competing HN10[] purchasers. That section also protects sellers competing against the grantor of the discriminatory price. The mere fact that the favored and disfavored purchasers are not in competition inter se does not preclude a Robinson-Patman violation in a primary line case. See Utah Pie Co. v. Continental Baking Co., 386 U.S. 685, 18 L. Ed. 2d 406, 87 S. Ct. 1326 (1967); FTC v. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 363 U.S. 536, 4 L. Ed. 2d 1385, 80 S. Ct. 1267 (1960). Moreover, a secondary line case, FTC v. Borden Co., 383 U.S. 637, 16 L. Ed. 2d 153, 86 S. Ct. 1092 (1966), holds that a seller cannot discriminate between prices charged by it for nationally advertised and private brands where the goods contained in each are of "like grade and quality." Borden implicitly assumes that the [35] mere fact that one class of purchasers are more aware of market conditions and more knowledgeable of the product's qualities does not justify a price discrimination against a class that is without this information. Therefore, the contention made by Chrysler must be rejected.

Chrysler alleges that its Rebate Plan falls within § 2(b)'s "good faith meeting competition" defense, 15 U.S.C. § 13(b), [6] because Ford and General [*890] Motors offer rebates equal to or in excess of $183 in the sale of their taxicabs. HN11[] However, one of the requirements of this defense is that the seller demonstrate that his reduced price was to meet a competitor's equally low price. See FTC v. Sun Oil Co., 371 U.S. 505, 514-15, 9 L. Ed. 2d 466, 83 S. Ct. 358 (1963). Chrysler's plan was begun in 1962. Its affidavits and exhibits tend to show that Ford and General Motors did not commence their rebate arrangements until sometime during or after 1964. Since Chrysler, which has the burden on this issue, FTC v. Sun Oil Co., 371 U.S. at 514, has not demonstrated that its Rebate Plan was introduced in response to a rival's rebate scheme, it cannot assert the § 2(b) defense as a basis for summary judgment [36] in its favor.

Chrysler next asserts that because its Rebate Plan was carried out on a nationwide basis and Checker is a manufacturer selling taxicabs to customers in several other cities, the entire United States, rather than New York, is the relevant market in which to appraise the injury to competition involved in this case. Without attempting to bind the trial court to a market definition that inevitably necessitates a detailed probative analysis of the underlying economic data, FTC v. Sun Oil Co., 371 U.S. 505, 527, 9 L. Ed. 2d 466, 83 S. Ct. 358 (1963); Reines Distributors, Inc. v. Admiral Corp., 5 CCH TRADE REGULATION REPORTS, p. 84,145 (S.D.N.Y.1967); see [37] Tampa Elec.

---

[6] "Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall prevent a seller rebutting the prima-facie case thus made by showing that his lower price or the furnishing of services or facilities to any purchaser or purchasers was made in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor, or the services or facilities furnished by a competitor."

Co. v. Nashville Coal Co., 365 U.S. 320, 330-33, 5 L. Ed. 2d 580, 81 S. Ct. 623 (1961), the papers submitted indicate that New York City is a separate and distinct market.

With respect to the question of whether the effect of the alleged discrimination may have been "substantially to lessen competition," the Court has already alluded (supra pp. 884-85) to the parties' conflicting contentions as to the cause of Checker's loss of sales and taxicab registrations in New York City which cannot be resolved on this motion and must await trial. For the same reasons it is unnecessary at this stage to pass upon Chrysler's contention that the alleged discrimination was not made in the course of interstate commerce as required by § 2(a) and that the case involves only intrastate sales by franchise dealers to purchasers within the state. Walling v. Jacksonville Paper Co., 317 U.S. 564, 87 L. Ed. 460, 63 S. Ct. 332 (1943); Burke v. Ford, 377 F.2d 901 (10th Cir. 1967).

Preliminary Injunctive Relief

Since the factual issues raised with respect to both the Sherman Act and Robinson-Patman Act claims on this motion raise a serious doubt as to whether Checker will ultimately prevail, [38] preliminary injunctive relief must be denied. Clairol, Inc. v. Gillette Co., 389 F.2d 264 (2d Cir. 1968). Furthermore, a review of the hardships and equities does not disclose a balance favoring injunctive relief. Hamilton Watch Co. v. Benrus Watch Co., 206 F.2d 738, 743 (2d Cir. 1953); Blaich v. National Football League, 212 F. Supp. 319, 322-24 (S.D.N.Y.1962). In addition, the antitrust laws afford plaintiff treble damage relief for any loss sustained as a result of Chrysler's unlawful conduct. Since any drop in Checker taxicab sales caused by continuation of the Rebate Plan is capable of fairly precise measurement, it will not suffer irreparable harm from the denial of relief. See FMC v. Atlantic & Gulf/Panama Canal Zone, 241 F. Supp. 766, 780-81 (S.D.N.Y. 1965).

In the light of all of the above considerations, see Perry v. Perry, 88 U.S. App. D.C. 337, 190 F.2d 601, 602 (1951) (Bazelon, J.), Checker is not entitled to preliminary injunctive relief.

End of Document

Woods Exploration & Producing Co. v. Aluminum Co. of America

United States District Court for the Southern District of Texas, Houston Division

March 29, 1968

Civil Action No. 14669

Reporter

284 F. Supp. 582 *; 1968 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10169 ; 12 Fed. R. Serv. 2d (Callaghan) 1251; 1968 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,547; 29 Oil & Gas Rep. 470

Woods Exploration & Producing Co., Inc., et al. v. Aluminum Co. of America, et al.

Core Terms

Railroad, producers, damages, nominations, tracts, Sherman Act, conspiracy, regulation, plaintiffs', truckers, cases, forecasts, political activity, allegations, defendants', monopolize, drilled, discretionary power, court of appeals, district court, market demand, antitrust, formula, prorate, route, restraint of trade, anti trust law, conspired, purchases, campaign

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Civil Procedure > Judicial Officers > Judges > General Overview

Governments > Courts > Authority to Adjudicate

HN1[] Judicial Officers, Judges

Whether to go into the merits of a question previously decided in a case prior to final judgment is a matter within the considered discretion of the judge.

Civil Procedure > Judicial Officers > Judges > General Overview

Governments > Courts > Authority to Adjudicate

Governments > Courts > Judges

HN2[] Judicial Officers, Judges

A United States district judge is most reluctant to reverse or change a ruling or order of another district judge, sitting on the same case, in the same court, and will do so only for the most compelling reasons. However, the authority of a judge to overrule a previous decision of a prior judge, sitting on the same case in the same court is well established.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Governments > Federal Government > US Congress

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Parker State Action Doctrine > Scope

HN3[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

The rule of reason test is the test for determining the applicability of the antitrust laws to a given situation. Pursuant to this test, the Sherman Act does not apply to the actions of a state. There is nothing in the language of the Sherman Act or in its history that suggests that its purpose is to restrain a state or its officers or agents from activities directed by its legislature. In a dual system of government in which, under the Constitution, the states are sovereign, save only as Congress may constitutionally subtract from their authority, an unexpressed purpose to nullify a state's control over its officers and agents is not lightly to be attributed to Congress. The Sherman Act makes no mention of the state as such, and gives no hint that it was intended to restrain state action or official action directed by a state.

Governments > State & Territorial Governments > Legislatures

HN4[] State & Territorial Governments, Legislatures

The states are free to regulate industries within their boundaries by curtailing competition or eliminating it altogether, subject only to the limitations inherent in the commerce clause or any restrictions imposed by federal statutes.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN5[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

The Sherman Act does not prohibit two or more persons from associating together in an attempt to persuade the legislature or the executive to take particular action with respect to a law that would produce a restraint or a monopoly.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN6[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

Liability under the Sherman Act cannot be sustained by virtue of official action of a state agency, however inspired by the acts of an individual.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN7[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

The antitrust laws are directed against individual and not state action. When a state has a public policy against free competition in an industry important to it, the state may regulate that industry in order to control or, in a proper case, to eliminate competition therein. It may even permit persons subject to such control to participate in the regulation, provided independent state officials adequately supervise their activities.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN8[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

A private antitrust complaint is not the appropriate vehicle for state criminal laws whose enforcement is entrusted to state or local prosecutors.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Remedies > Damages

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Remedies > General Overview

HN9[] Remedies, Damages

The fact that damages are recoverable in a civil action based on state law does not mean perforce that damages are recoverable under the Sherman Act upon a similar showing. The Sherman Act does not purport to afford remedies for all torts committed by or against persons engaged in interstate commerce.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN10[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

Seeking lawful judicial action does not violate the antitrust laws, even if interstate commerce is involved and even if the purpose and effect is to curtail competition.

Judges: [1] Singleton, D.J.

Opinion by: SINGLETON

Opinion

[*584] Memorandum and Order

SINGLETON, D.J.

In December, 1962, plaintiffs, Woods Exploration & Producing Company, Stanley C. Woods, and Southeastern Pipe Line Company, filed the instant antitrust action against defendants, Aluminum Company of America, Crown Petroleum Corporation, and Lavaca Pipe Line Company, [1] seeking injunctive relief and treble damages for alleged violations of the Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1, 2, 15, 26 (1964). By their complaint, plaintiffs charged that defendants had restrained trade in the production and marketing of natural gas from the Appling Gas Field in Jackson and Calhoun Counties, Texas, and that defendants had monopolized and/or attempted to monopolize the production and marketing of gas from the field. Plaintiffs sought to recover as damages the loss of production from their wells in the field which had been occasioned by the entry of orders by the Texas Railroad

[1] Plaintiffs also named as defendants certain employees of the defendant corporations. By stipulation and through the filing of their Third Amended Complaint, however, plaintiffs have dropped these parties as defendants.

Commission setting production allowables for plaintiffs' wells at levels lower than plaintiffs thought they should have received. Plaintiffs sought to hold defendants liable for this loss on the ground that the Railroad [2] Commission orders had been based, at least in part, on false nomination forecasts and reports filed by defendants with the Commission.

Defendants responded with a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, and, in the alternative, a motion for summary judgment. Both motions were overruled by another judge of this district, Woods Exploration & Producing Co. v. Aluminum Company of America, 36 F.R.D. 107 (S.D. Tex. 1963), and in October, 1963, the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit denied with the following order defendants' attempted interlocutory appeal from the order overruling their motion to dismiss.

> "Since the order sought to be reviewed is merely the denial of a motion to dismiss the complaint, leave to take interlocutory appeal should be, and it is hereby Denied, but [3] without prejudice to an application in the future from any appropriate order made by the District Court after completion of pretrial discovery or other pretrial procedures revealing the factual basis for the respective claims and defenses as distinguished from mere pleadings."

[*585] In 1966, the case was transferred to this court as a docket equalization measure. Now, after the completion of extensive pretrial discovery, defendants have again moved for summary judgment. After reviewing thoroughly the numerous briefs filed by each side, as well as conducting an oral hearing on the motion, I feel compelled to disagree with the conclusion reached by my brother judge in his 1963 decision.

Before proceeding to the merits of the motion, however, I feel some comment is in order regarding plaintiffs' contention that this Court is without the power to entertain the motion - that the prior ruling by a different judge has become the law of the case. In view of the fact that I reach the merits, needless to say I disagree. The wording of the appellate court order seems to invite the current motion, and, moreover, the law does not require a judge who will ultimately handle [4] a case to decline to make an independent and objective determination of issues which are properly raised. Rather, HN1[] whether to go into the merits of a question previously decided in a case prior to final judgment is a matter within the considered discretion of the judge. See Beedy v. Washington Water Power Co., 238 F.2d 123, 127 (9th Cir. 1956). See also 3 Barron & Holtzoff, Federal Practice & Procedure § 1192 (Wright ed. Supp. 1966); 1B Moore, Federal Practice, Para. 0.404[4], at 452. As stated by the Court in Ward v. Louisiana Wildlife Comm'n, 224 F. Supp. 252 (E.D. La. 1963), > HN2[] "A United States district judge is most reluctant to reverse or change a ruling or order of another district judge, sitting on the same case, in the same court, and will do so only for the most compelling reasons. However, the authority of a judge to overrule a previous decision of a prior judge, sitting on the same case in the same court is well established . . . . The United States Supreme Court has rejected a doctrine of disability at self correction . . . ." Id. at 255.

By amended complaint, plaintiffs have now specified various other activities of the defendants taken pursuant to [5] the alleged conspiracy. In large part, these allegations relate to a course of litigation either initiated by defendants or which was brought about by defendants' successful efforts to influence the Railroad Commission in setting field orders which applied to the Appling Field. Since the same basic principles which apply to the allegations concerning the filing of false nominations apply alike to the latter allegations, they will also be considered.

After reviewing the numerous depositions and papers filed in the case, it is clear that there are disputed issues of fact on whether defendants actually conspired together and whether they deliberately filed the false nominations or brought about the litigation in question as part of a conspiracy. However, even if plaintiffs' allegations in these respects are true, plaintiffs would still not be entitled to recover damages for these activities. Thus for the purposes of this motion, I accept plaintiffs' basic allegations as true. Liberty Leasing Co., Inc. v. Hillsum Sales Corp., 380 F.2d 1013, 1014-15 (5th Cir. 1967).

Filing of False Nominations

A. The Factual Context.

Plaintiffs own, operate, or have an economic interest [6] in wells drilled on small tracts located within a fifty-nine acre area lying in the heart of the Appling Gas Field. Most of plaintiffs' wells have been drilled as exceptions to the general spacing rule which restricts the drilling of wells to one well every 320 acres. [2] [7] Defendants, on the other hand, [*586] own or have an interest in wells which have been drilled on large tracts subject to the general spacing rule. The allowable production which each well in the field is permitted to produce is set monthly by order of the Texas Railroad Commission. For the purpose of preventing waste, the Commission is charged with the task of limiting total production from the field to the reasonable market demand for gas made upon the field. Tex. Rev. Civ. Stat. Ann. art. 6008 § 3(h) (1964). Each producing well is entitled to its fair share of the total allowable field production, id. § 12, an amount which has been held to be roughly equivalent to the gas in place under the tract on which the well is drilled. [3]

In the Appling Field, after first determining the total allowable for the field, the allowable for each well is determined by application of a one-third - two-third proration formula. One third of the field allowable is divided equally among the wells, and two-thirds is divided among the wells in the [8] proportion to which the surface acreage on which the well is drilled bears to the combined surface acreage of all the wells in the field. The heavy weight given to the well factor by this formula has meant that producers with wells on small tracts have been permitted by the Commission to extract far more gas than that underlying their tracts, thereby draining gas from beneath the larger adjoining tracts. [4] [9] The inequitable effect of the formula has been compounded, moreover, by the fact that many wells on large tracts, although producing at full capacity, have been unable to produce even the allowable assigned [*587] to them under the formula. As a result the amount they have been unable to produce has been

---

[2] Statewide Rule 37, Tex. R.R. Comm'n Rules & Regs. 1, at 15, Oil & Gas Rep. 1320 (1962). See generally Hardwicke & Woodward, Fair Share and the Small Tract in Texas, 41 Texas L. Rev. 75 (1962); Hardwicke, Oil-Well Spacing Regulations and Protection of Property Rights in Texas, 31 Texas L. Rev. 99 (1952).

Most of plaintiffs' wells were drilled on extremely small tracts, some being located on tracts of less than 2/10 of an acre. Defendants' First Brief in Support of Summary Judgment, p. 3; Plaintiffs' First Opposition Brief, p. 2. See generally Railroad Comm'n v. Aluminum Company of America, 380 S.W.2d 599 (Tex. 1964), reversing 368 S.W.2d 818 (Tex. Civ. App.-Austin 1963).

[3] Where the lessee or owner of a small tract has been granted a permit to drill a well as a Rule 37 exception, this means that "it is the duty of the commission to adjust the allowable, based upon the potential production, so as to give the owner of such smaller tract only his just proportion of the oil and gas. By this method, each person will be entitled to recover a quantity of oil and gas substantially equivalent in amount to the recoverable oil and gas under his land." Brown v. Humble Oil & Ref. Co., 126 Tex. 296, 83 S.W.2d 935, 944 (1935). See also Manufacturers' Gas & Oil Co. v. Indiana Natural Gas & Oil Co., 155 Ind. 461, 57 N.E. 912 (1900). In some instances, and particularly in the Appling Field, this "ideal" allocation of gas has not been attained. See Notes 4 and 5 infra.

[4] The one-third - two-third formula was declared invalid by the Texas Supreme Court in Atlantic Ref. Co. v. Railroad Comm'n., 162 Tex. 274, 346 S.W.2d 801 (1962), on the ground that it allowed small-tract owners to produce more than their fair share and amounted to confiscation of gas underlying the large tracts. In Railroad Comm'n v. Aluminum Company of America, 380 S.W.2d 599 (Tex. 1964), however, the court upheld the formula insofar as it applied to the Appling Field on the ground that the large tract owners were guilty of laches in attacking it. Although the court recognized that small-tract owners had drained substantial quantities of gas from beneath the large tracts, and had recouped their costs and made a profit, and would during the life of the field drain several million dollars worth of gas from beneath tracts leased to Aluminum Company of America alone, id. at 604, it found other factors to be more persuasive.

> "There are many reasons why stability in respect to proration formulas is vital to the well being of the industry as a whole, to the property owners in the field and to the public at large. It is a matter of common knowledge that well owners are not alone concerned. Individuals and institutions have invested in royalties and other oil and gas interests. Loans have been made with these properties as security, and taxes have been levied by various municipal and school authorities. It is well known that the economy of the whole state rests to a large extent on the oil and gas business." Ibid.

allocated by the Commission to the small tract wells not already producing at full capacity. [5] It is in this context that the plaintiffs complained of defendants' filing false production forecasts which reduced the total field allowable.

B. The Nomination Procedure [10] .

As previously stated, the total allowable for a field is set at what the Railroad Commission determines to be the reasonable market demand for the field's gas. No statutory provision prescribes the procedure by which market demand is to be determined, and thus the matter falls under the rule-making power of the Commission. The usual procedure which the Commission follows is set out in Statewide Rule 31. Under its provisions, market demand is ordinarily determined primarily on the basis of Producer's Forecasts filed with the Commission by operators having wells in the field. These nominations state the volume of gas which each producer expects to be able to market from his wells the following month. The nominations are totaled and, if the Commission concludes that their total accurately reflects market demand, the total becomes the field allowable to which the 1/3 -- 2/3 formula is applied. If the Commission disagrees with the forecasts, however, it may consider other factors such as average production for the previous twelve months, or nominations filed by purchasers of gas. Railroad Comm'n v. Woods Exploration & Producing Co., 405 S.W.2d 313, 315 (Tex. 1966). In most instances [11] in the Appling Field the producer's forecasts are corrected by the difference between the total of the current nominations and total actual production which was allowed for the second preceding month. [6] [5] Railroad Comm'n v. Woods Exploration & Producing Co., 405 S.W.2d 313, 316 (Tex. 1966).

---

"An example will serve to illustrate the problem. One of the reservoirs in the Appling Field is designated as Segment 5, 7500' and 18 wells were completed therein. Seventeen of these wells were located on 7.132 acres, while the remaining well was situated on a 328 acre unit. . . . The total delivery capacity of all 18 wells was approximately 898,000 MCF per month, and the production forecasts resulted in the determination that reasonable market demand, and hence the reservoir allowable, for the month was approximately 880,000 MCF. Under the basic 1/3 - 2/3 allocation formula, the large tract well was entitled to an allowable of 591,000 MCF. . . . The productive capacity of the single large tract well was only about 34,000 MCF, and in accordance with the usual Commission procedures some 557,000 MCF were allocated to the [small tract] wells . . . in addition to their shares of the reservoir allowable as determined by application of the 1/3 - 2/3 formula." Ibid.

[6] Under this method of determining the field allowable, the following calculations would be involved.

(a) Total nominations for Second Preceding Month

110

Total allowable for non-prorated wells for Second Preceding Month

20

Total nominations for Prorated Wells for Second Preceding Month

90

Total Actual Production of Prorated Wells in Second Preceding Month

80

Difference

10

(b) Total Nominations for Current Month

110

Difference Between Total Nominations and Actual Production in Second Preceding Month

10

Total Field Allowable for Current Month for All Wells

[*588] [12] C. The Liability Issue.

Whether plaintiffs can recover for the loss of production they allegedly suffered as a result of the low allowables set by the Railroad Commission involves a now rather undeveloped area of federal antitrust law. As state regulation of the economy increases, however, and particularly in the area of conservation, it can easily be predicted that many questions will arise similar to those raised in the instant case. [7]

[13] The starting point in this and any other antitrust case not involving a matter of per se illegality is Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey v. United States, 221 U.S. 1, 51-52, 55 L. Ed. 619, 31 S. Ct. 502 (1911), in which the Supreme Court announced HN3[] the "rule of reason" as the test for determining the applicability of the antitrust laws to a given situation. Pursuant to this test, it has been held consistently that as a matter of statutory

---

100

Tex. R.R. Comm'n Rules & Regs. Appendix, at 39; see Parris & Edgerton, Non-Associated Gas Proration 4 (1961). See also Weymouth v. Colorado Interstate Gas Co., 367 F.2d 84, 98-99 (5th Cir. 1966).

[7] In some instances, Congress has recognized that there is a basic conflict between the competitive thrust of the antitrust laws and the anticompetitive thrust of state regulatory schemes. For instance, in the area of insurance, Congress has sought to eliminate friction which might result because of simultaneous application of both laws.

> "No Act of Congress shall be construed to invalidate, impair, or supersede any law enacted by any State for the purpose of regulating the business of insurance . . . unless such Act specifically relates to the business of insurance: Provided, That after June 30, 1948, the Act of July 2, 1890, as amended, known as the Sherman Act [15 U.S.C. §§ 1 et seq.] and the Act of October 15, 1914, as amended, known as the Clayton Act, and the Act of September 26, 1914, known as the Federal Trade Commission Act, as amended [15 U.S.C. §§ 41 et seq.], shall be applicable to the business of insurance to the extent that such business is not regulated by State law."

McCarran Ferguson Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1012(b) (1963); see Miley v. John Hancock Mut. Life Ins. Co., 148 F. Supp. 299 (D. Mass. 1957). A comparable forthright approach to resolving similar conflicts in the oil and gas area would not be inappropriate, for there are many parallels between state regulation of both industries, state regulation of both being equally comprehensive and detailed.

The federal courts have been careful to avoid applying the Sherman Act where its application might conflict with the Federal Power Commission's regulation of the natural gas industry. Interstate Nat. Gas Co. v. Southern California Gas Co., 102 F. Supp. 685, 103 F. Supp. 317 (S.D. Cal. 1952), aff'd, 209 F.2d 380 (9th Cir. 1953). Moreover, the activities made the subject matter of the instant suit involve Railroad Commission regulations concerning the production and gathering of natural gas from the Appling Field, and this subject Congress has chosen to exempt from federal supervision in favor of state regulation. Natural Gas Act, 15 U.S.C. § 717(b) (1963). Therefore, since these activities are subject to exclusive regulation by the Texas Railroad Commission, a like caution and deference should be shown when the alleged Sherman Act violation involves Railroad Commission regulations and matters subject to the Commission's exclusive jurisdiction.

interpretation the Sherman Act does not apply to the actions of a state. As stated by the court in Parker v. Brown, 317 U.S. 341, 87 L. Ed. 315, 63 S. Ct. 307 (1943):

> "[There is] nothing in the language of the Sherman Act or in its history which suggests that its purpose was to restrain a state or its officers or agents from activities directed by its legislature. In a dual system of government in which, under the Constitution, the states are sovereign, save only as Congress may constitutionally subtract from their authority, an unexpressed purpose to nullify a state's control over its officers and agents is not lightly to be attributed to Congress.
>
> "The Sherman Act makes no mention of the state as such, and gives no hint that it was [14] intended to restrain state action or official action directed by a state." Id. at 350-51.

Accordingly, HN4[] the states have been left free to regulate industries within their boundaries by curtailing competition or eliminating it altogether, Asheville Tobacco Board of Trade, Inc. v. FTC, 263 F.2d 502, 505 (4th Cir. 1959), subject only to the limitations inherent in the [*589] commerce clause or any restrictions imposed by federal statutes. However, when a private party as opposed to a state itself has been sought to be held liable for damages resulting from restraints imposed by a state, the cases reflect more than a little uncertainty on whether, and in what situations, the private party whose improper conduct is the reason the state has imposed a trade restraint is immune simply because the restraint was imposed by the state. [8]

[15] In Eastern Railroad Presidents Conf. v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 81 S. Ct. 523, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464 (1961), forty-one Pennsylvania truckers and their trade association brought suit against twenty-four railroads and an association composed of the presidents of each railroad. The truckers charged that the railroads had conspired to restrain trade in and monopolize the long-distance freight business in violation of the Sherman Act. The essence of the conspiracy was that the railroads had conducted a publicity campaign against the truckers designed to foster the adoption and retention of laws and law enforcement practices destructive of the trucking business. The campaign proved successful, for the railroads persuaded the governor of the state to veto a "Fair Truck Bill" which would have permitted the truckers to haul heavier loads over the state's highways. Moreover, the publicity campaign had the additional effect of destroying much of the truckers' good will. The district court found that the publicity campaign was fraudulent and malicious and that its sole purpose was to destroy the truckers as competitors even though no legislation was secured. For this reason, [16] it awarded substantial damages for the truckers' loss of good will. However, the district court was also of the view that restraints of trade and monopolizations resulting from valid governmental action are not actionable under the Sherman Act and thus refused to award damages for the loss of business caused by veto of the "Fair Truck Bill." Noerr Motor Freight, Inc. v. Eastern Railroad Presidents Conf., 166 F. Supp. 163, 172-73 (E.D. Pa. 1958). The Court of Appeals affirmed with one judge dissenting. Eastern Railroad Presidents Conf. v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 273 F.2d 218 (3rd Cir. 1959). Applying the "rule of reason", however, the Supreme Court reversed, holding that the truckers could as a matter of law recover no damages for injury sustained because of the efforts of the railroads to influence governmental action.

In reaching this result, the Court noted that there was an "essential dissimilarity" between the lobbying activities conducted by the railroads and the activities normally prohibited by the Act, and that to impose liability for this conduct would raise serious constitutional questions and political difficulties.

---

[8] For example, in Parker v. Brown, 317 U.S. 341, 87 L. Ed. 315, 63 S. Ct. 307 (1943), Eastern Railroad Presidents Conf. v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464, 81 S. Ct. 523 (1961), and United Mine Workers of America v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657, 14 L. Ed. 2d 626, 85 S. Ct. 1585 (1965), three cases which were finally decided in the Supreme Court, the lower courts were reversed for imposing liability. Also, there appears to be a conflict on whether joinder of the state official who uses his office to impose the restraint makes a difference on whether the private party can be held liable. Compare Harman v. Valley Nat'l Bank of Arizona, 339 F.2d 564 (9th Cir. 1964), with Miley v. John Hancock Mut. Life Ins. Co., 148 F. Supp. 299 (D. Mass. 1957). See also E. W. Wiggins Airways, Inc. v. Massachusetts Port Authority, 362 F.2d 52 (1st Cir. 1966). In the instant action, there is no issue concerning the liability of the Railroad Commission or any individual member thereof.

> "We think it . . . clear that HN5[] the Sherman [17] Act does not prohibit two or more persons from associating together in an attempt to persuade the legislature or the executive to take particular action with respect to a law that would produce a restraint or a monopoly. . . [The railroads' activities] bear very little if any resemblance [*590] to the combinations normally held violative of the Sherman Act, combinations ordinarily characterized by an express or implied agreement or understanding that the participants will jointly give up their trade freedom, or help one another to take away the trade freedom of others through the use of such devices as price-fixing agreements, boycotts, market-division agreements, and other similar arrangements. This essential dissimilarity between an agreement jointly to seek legislation or law enforcement and the agreements traditionally condemned by § 1 of the Act, even if not itself conclusive on the question of the applicability of the Act, does constitute a warning against treating the defendants' conduct as though it amounted to a common-law trade restraint. . . . "[Moreover, to impose liability] would substantially impair the power of government to take actions through its [18] legislature and executive that operate to restrain trade. . . To hold that the government retains the power to act in this representative capacity and yet hold . . . that the people cannot freely inform the government of their wishes would impute to the Sherman Act a purpose to regulate, not business activity, but political activity, a purpose which would have no basis whatever in the legislative history of that Act. Secondly, and of at least equal significance, such a construction of the Sherman Act would raise important constitutional questions. The right of petition is one of the freedoms protected by the Bill of Rights, and we cannot, of course, lightly impute to Congress an intent to invade these freedoms." Id. 365 U.S. at 136-38.

Plaintiffs seek to distinguish Noerr on the ground that it exempts only "political activity" from the scope of the Sherman Act and thus is not controlling for, they contend, the filing of false nominations is properly "business activity" and not "political activity" protected by Noerr. This proffered distinction, I think, places more emphasis than is warranted on the phrase "political activity" as used by the Court in Noerr. Plaintiffs [19] contend that protected "political activity" encompasses only lobbying activities or influence peddling and does not apply to a situation such as this where the defendants and all other producers are required by Commission regulations to submit nominations under oath. There is some doubt whether this line of reasoning is accurate. In Sterling Nelson & Sons, Inc. v. Rangen, Inc., 235 F. Supp. 393, 400 (D. Idaho 1964), for example, the Court held that there was no liability even though the defendant had bribed a state official to use his position to impose a trade restraint harmful to the plaintiff. In addition, it has been held in other cases that there is no liability although the conduct complained of violates a valid state penal statute [9] or even though the conduct gives rise to a civil cause of action under state law. [10] If activities of this character are not within the ambit of the antitrust laws, then it is difficult to perceive how the activities of the defendants here can be viewed differently. However, it is unnecessary to resolve the issue on a determination that the filing of false nominations is or is not political activity. The mere manipulation of labels does not [20] determine the outcome of this case, for as made clear by other cases, liability is precluded if the restraint complained of results from otherwise valid governmental [*591] action even though brought about by the improper conduct of a private party.

Plaintiffs' limited construction of Noerr ignores the fact that the Supreme Court did not disapprove the district court's holding [21] that the truckers could recover no damages for injury resulting from any valid action of the state. See 365 U.S. at 135-36. In Parker v. Brown, supra, and United States v. Rock Royal Cooperative, 307 U.S. 533, 83 L. Ed. 1446, 59 S. Ct. 993 (1938), the Supreme Court had previously upheld government regulatory schemes involving the production and marketing of milk and raisins even though the schemes permitted and required some participation by the producers affected. In both cases, the Court held that the regulation itself was not invalid because it constituted a restraint on trade and also that the producers who were benefitted by the regulation and who were instrumental in initiating it could not be held liable in damages.

---

[9] E.g., Apex Hosiery Co. v. Leader, 310 U.S. 469, 483, 84 L. Ed. 1311, 60 S. Ct. 982 (1940); Parmelee Transportation Co. v. Keeshin, 292 F.2d 794 (7th Cir. 1961); Schenley Industries, Inc. v. New Jersey Wine & Spirit Wholesalers Ass'n 272 F. Supp. 872 (D.N.J. 1967).

[10] E.g., Hunt v. Crumboch, 325 U.S. 821, 826, 89 L. Ed. 1954, 65 S. Ct. 1545 (1945); Apex Hosiery Co. v. Leader, supra note 9, 310 U.S. at 483; Norville v. Globe Oil & Ref. Co., 303 F.2d 281 (1962); Parmelee Transportation Co. v. Keeshin, supra note 9 292 F.2d at 804; Sterling Nelson & Sons, Inc. v. Rangen, Inc., supra, 235 F. Supp. at 400.

In United Mine Workers v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657, 14 L. Ed. 2d 626, 85 S. Ct. 1585 (1965), decided four years after Noerr, the Mineworkers' Union and several large coal producers conspired to drive smaller coal producers out of business. In furtherance of the conspiracy, they persuaded the Secretary of Labor to set a higher minimum wage for the employees of coal producers selling to the TVA and induced the officials of the TVA itself to reduce the number [22] of the TVA's "spot market" purchases - many of which were exempt from the minimum wage requirements of the Walsh-Healey Act. The district court awarded substantial damages, and the court of appeals affirmed, distinguishing Noerr on the ground that although the conduct complained of might be lawful when standing alone, it became unlawful when shown to be a constituent part of a larger, unlawful conspiracy. Pennington v. United Mine Workers, 325 F.2d 804 (6th Cir. 1963). The Supreme Court reversed, but in doing so chose not to rest its decision alone on the ground that the activity was protected "political activity" within the meaning of Noerr. Rather, the Court went further and interpreted Noerr more broadly:

> "There is another reason for remanding this case for further proceedings in the lower courts. It is clear under Noerr that Phillips could not collect any damages under the Sherman Act for any injury which it suffered from the action of the Secretary of Labor. The conduct of the union and the operators did not violate the Act, the action taken to set a minimum wage for government purchases of coal was the act of a public official who is not claimed to [23] be a co-conspirator, and the jury should have been instructed, as UMW requested, to exclude any damages which Phillips may have suffered as a result of the Secretary's Walsh-Healey determinations." Id. 381 U.S. at 671. See also United States v. Johns-Manville Corp., 259 F. Supp. 440 (E.D. Pa. 1966).

Perhaps of even more significance than this statement in the opinion is the fact that the Court cited with approval the decision of the court of appeals in Okefenokee Rural Elec. Membership Corp. v. Florida Power & Light Co., 214 F.2d 413 (5th Cir. 1954), a case which is closely in point with the instant action. In Okefenokee, the plaintiff brought suit against Florida Light & Power Company and the City of Jacksonville, Florida, alleging that these defendants had "engaged in an unlawful combination and conspiracy to monopolize and exercise exclusive control over the territory" into which plaintiff was seeking to extend electric power lines. The only feasible route from an engineering and economic standpoint along which a new power line could be built lay along Federal Highway 17. On January 25, 1952, plaintiff staked a proposed line along the highway, and on February 26, [24] 1952 it applied to the Florida State Road Department for permission to construct a line along the route. During this period, however, the defendants constructed a "spite line" [*592] along the same route for the sole purpose of defeating plaintiff's application for a permit. Only two persons could be served by the defendants' spite line, and indeed the only wire placed on the line by the City was a "neutral strand." In pursuance of the conspiracy, the City made a false argument before the Road Department that a line had already been constructed and that no new line should be built. As a result of these two actions, the Road Department denied plaintiff's application. Moreover, the defendants conducted a smear campaign against plaintiff, thereby causing the County Commissioners of Duval County to pass discriminatory regulations applicable only to plaintiff and designed to prohibit plaintiff from operating in Duval County. The district court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a claim. The court of appeals affirmed, reasoning that since the plaintiff had no right to use the highway route without a permit from the state nor any route along the county roads without permission [25] of the Board of County Commissioners, the plaintiff had suffered no "legal injury."

I think the principle announced in Pennington and Okefenokee is controlling as to the damages plaintiffs allegedly suffered because of the allowables set by the Railroad Commission. Plaintiffs, however, have advanced two contentions as a basis for taking their action outside the scope of these precedents. First, they seek to distinguish Okefenokee on its facts, but this they have not successfully done. Plaintiffs contend that Okefenokee is distinguishable because they have been granted a permit to drill and produce gas whereas the plaintiff in Okefenokee was injured because of the state's refusal to grant a permit. This distinction is tenuous at best, for its thrust is to limit Okefenokee's application to cases involving the denial of permits by state agencies, a limitation which is inconsistent with the Court's reasoning. As stated by Judge Biggs, "implicit in this ruling is the legal conclusion that HN6[] liability under the Sherman Act cannot be sustained by virtue of official action of a State agency, however inspired by the acts of an individual." Noerr Motor Freight, [26] Inc. v. Eastern Railroad Presidents Conf., 273 F.2d 218, 226 (3d Cir. 1959) (dissenting opinion). Moreover, there are two crucial similarities between the two cases. In both, the injury complained of resulted directly from specific action taken by a state administrative agency on the basis of false information provided by private parties. Secondly, just as certainly as the plaintiff in Okefenokee had no legal right to use a particular route for the construction of a power line without the consent of the State of Florida, the plaintiffs here have no legal right to produce an amount of gas in excess of the specific allowable assigned to them by the State of Texas acting through the Railroad Commission. See Tex. Rev. Civ. Stat. Ann. art. 6008 § 16 (1964).

Plaintiffs' second contention is that, since each producer is required by the Railroad Commission to submit production forecasts under oath so as to provide information on the basis of which the Commission sets allowables, the producers are in effect possessed of broad discretionary powers by which they set the allowables themselves and thus the case is controlled by Continental Ore Co. v. Union Carbide & Carbon Corp., 370 [27] U.S. 690, 8 L. Ed. 2d 777, 82 S. Ct. 1404 (1962).

In Continental Ore, the plaintiff brought suit against several American corporate defendants alleging that they had conspired to restrain trade and commerce in the production and selling of vanadium and that they had conspired to monopolize the vanadium market. Among other elements of damages, plaintiff sought to recover damages which it had suffered by being eliminated from competition in the Canadian market. After Canada's entry into World War II, the Canadian Government had taken measures to assure the maximum availability of strategic metals to private Canadian industries engaged in the war effort. The Office of Metals Controller was established and given broad powers [*593] to regulate the procurement of materials and to allocate them to industrial uses. The Metals Controller delegated to a Canadian corporation, a wholly owned subsidiary of one of the defendants, the discretionary power to purchase vanadium and to allocate it to Canadian industry. In pursuance of the conspiracy, the parent corporation directed its subsidiary in making vanadium purchases so that the plaintiff lost all its customers and was eliminated [28] from the Canadian market. The district court refused to award damages for this injury, and the court of appeals affirmed. Continental Ore Co. v. Union Carbide & Carbon Corp., 289 F.2d 86 (9th Cir. 1961). The Supreme Court, however, reversed, and with a unanimous opinion held that the parent's use of the subsidiary's discretionary power as the agent of a foreign state in order to drive a competitor out of business was actionable under the antitrust laws.

In speaking to the defendants' contention that they could not be held liable because the injury was inflicted by an agent of a foreign state, the Court stated:

> "What the petitioners here contend is that the respondents are liable for actions which they themselves jointly took, as part of their unlawful conspiracy, to influence or to direct the elimination of Continental from the Canadian market. . . From the evidence which petitioners offered it appears that Continental complained to the Canadian Metals Controller that Continental had lost its Canadian business. . . But there is no indication that the Controller or any other official within the structure of the Canadian Government approved or would have approved of joint [29] efforts to monopolize the production and sale of vanadium or directed that purchases from Continental be stopped. The exclusion Continental claims, resulted from the action of Electro Met of Canada [the subsidiary], taken within the area of its discretionary powers granted by the Metals Controller and in concert with or under direction of the respondents." Id. 370 U.S. at page 706.

Unlike Continental Ore, however, the defendants here have been delegated no discretionary power to set gas production allowables in the Appling Field. The Texas Supreme Court made clear in Railroad Comm'n v. Woods Exploration & Producing Co., 405 S.W.2d 313 (Tex. 1966), that the Commission alone has the power and the duty to set allowables. The procedure followed by the Commission of requiring the producers to submit forecasts before the allowables are set is no more than a mere "administrative device." Id. at 319. The figures submitted by the individual producers are not binding on the Commission, and it does not have to set allowables based on their mathematical total. Thus any injury which any producer claims to have suffered because of the allowable assigned to him is an injury [30] directly inflicted by the Railroad Commission and not an injury inflicted by his fellow producers directly or through the exercise of any discretionary power conferred upon them by the State.

The injury which plaintiffs complain to have suffered here because of the allowables assigned by the Railroad Commission falls under the definition of state action set forth in Parker v. Brown, supra, and thus does not constitute a recoverable element of damages in a federal antitrust action.

> "It is the state which has created the machinery for establishing the prorate program. Although the organization of a prorate zone is proposed by producers, and a prorate program, approved by the Commission, must also be approved by a referendum of producers, it is the state, acting through the Commission, which adopts the program and which enforces it with penal sanctions, in the execution of a governmental policy. The prerequisite approval of the program upon referendum by a prescribed number of producers is not the imposition by them of their will upon the minority by [*594] force of agreement or combination which the Sherman Act prohibits. The state itself exercises its [31] . . . authority in making the regulation and in prescribing the conditions of its application." Id. 317 U.S. at 352.

As noted by the court of appeals for the Fourth Circuit:

> "The teaching of Parker v. Brown is that HN7[] the antitrust laws are directed against individual and not state action. When a state has a public policy against free competition in an industry important to it, the state may regulate that industry in order to control or, in a proper case, to eliminate competition therein. It may even permit persons subject to such control to participate in the regulation, provided their activities are adequately supervised by independent state officials." Asheville Tobacco Board of Trade, Inc. v. FTC, 263 F.2d 502, 509 (4th Cir. 1959).

The scheme for setting allowables is adequately controlled by the Railroad Commission, and under state law the plaintiffs have effective remedies to protect them against any adverse effects which might flow from the filing of false nominations. The filing of false nominations itself is a violation of state penal law. [11] Tex. Rev. Civ. Stat. Ann. art. 6036c (Supp. 1966). Additionally, the filing of false nominations will apparently [32] support a cause of action under the state's statutory [12] and common law. [13] Simply by veiling their grievance under the penumbra of a conspiracy charge, however, plaintiffs cannot convert what are in essence only violations of state law and what is primarily a matter of state concern into a federal antitrust violation. Norville v. Globe Oil & Ref. Co., 303 F.2d 281 (7th Cir. 1962); see Natural Gas Act, 15 U.S.C. § 717(c) (1963). See also note 7 supra.

[33] The Litigation

The remaining allegations of plaintiffs' complaint which are involved in the present motion relate to efforts by defendants taken before the Railroad Commission to bring about a change in Commission rules and regulations and to litigation instituted or defended by defendants involving the validity of certain Commission rules and

---

[11] However, HN8[] a "private antitrust complaint is not the appropriate vehicle for state criminal laws whose enforcement is entrusted to state or local prosecutors." Schenley Industries, Inc. v. New Jersey Wine & Spirit Wholesale Ass'n, 272 F. Supp. 872, 885 (D.N.J. 1967). See also cases cited in note 10 supra.

[12] Tex. Rev. Civ. Stat. Ann. art. 6049d § 13 (1964); see Woods Exploration & Producing Co. v. Aluminum Company of America, 382 S.W.2d 343 (Tex. Civ. App. - Corpus Christi 1964, writ ref'd n.r.e.).

[13] See Pan American Petroleum Corp. v. Hardy, 370 S.W.2d 904 (Tex. Civ. App. - Waco 1964, writ ref'd n.r.e.); cf. Lone Star Gas Co. v. Murchison, 353 S.W.2d 870 (Tex. Civ. App. - Dallas 1962, writ ref'd n.r.e.). HN9[] The fact that damages are recoverable in a civil action based on state law does not mean perforce that damages are recoverable under the Sherman Act upon a similar showing. As stated by the Supreme Court:

> "[The Sherman Act] does not purport to afford remedies for all torts committed by or against persons engaged in interstate commerce. . . . Whether the respondent's conduct amounts to an actionable wrong subjecting them to liability for damages under [state law] is not our concern." Hunt v. Crumboch, 325 U.S. 821, 826 (1945).

regulations. As to any efforts taken by defendants before the Commission to influence the Commission to alter old rules or promulgate new ones, it is clear that Noerr, Pennington, and Okefenokee preclude liability. Compare Ramsey v. United Mine Workers, 265 F. Supp. 388, 422 (E.D. Tenn. 1967). Moreover, if the doctrines set forth by these cases are to have any meaning, plaintiffs are likewise precluded from recovering as damages any legal or court costs which they incurred in setting the rules aside. If defendants cannot be held liable in the first instance for persuading the Railroad Commission to enter a new field [*595] rule which later becomes the subject matter of litigation, then it necessarily follows that via the back door they cannot be held liable for any loss they incurred while an order was in effect or any costs [34] which they incurred in setting it aside. Cf. Fiumara v. Texaco, Inc., 204 F. Supp. 544 (E.D. Pa. 1962). This conclusion controls as to any damages which plaintiffs seek to recover because of the litigation in Railroad Comm'n v. Woods Exploration & Producing Co., supra, in which the Texas Supreme Court by a six to three decision struck down a Commission order setting allowables for the field at a level lower than reasonable market demand.

The remaining litigation identified by the parties in their briefs was instituted by defendants in an attempt to stop the drainage of gas from beneath their tracts because of rules prescribed by the Commission. At least one court has held that Noerr applies to such joint efforts taken in the courts by holding that HN10[] "seeking lawful . . . judicial action does not violate the anti-trust laws, even if interstate commerce is involved and even if the purpose and effect is to curtail competition." Bracken's Shopping Center, Inc. v. Ruwe, 273 F. Supp. 606 (S.D. Ill. 1967). But even if Noerr does not extend this far, the litigation of which plaintiffs complain cannot afford a recoverable element of damages, for it is clear that the suits were [35] initiated with probable cause.

In Benz-Stoddard v. Aluminum Company of America, 368 S.W.2d 94 (Tex. 1963), suit was brought challenging the validity of a Railroad Commission order, which, by treating vertically-separated reservoirs separately for proration purposes, allowed small-tract owners multiple completions from a single well. There, under the challenged Commission order, a small-tract owner with a well located on a.115 acre tract had already produced more than seven times the amount of gas in place under her tract, and, if the order continued in effect, would, along with other small-tract owners, be allowed to further drain gas from beneath the larger, adjoining tracts. In the second suit, Railroad Comm'n v. Aluminum Company of America, 380 S.W.2d 599 (Tex. 1964), suit was brought challenging the validity of the one-third -- two-thirds proration formula as it applied to the Appling Field. The purpose of this latter suit was also to stop or at least curtail the huge drainage of gas from beneath the larger tracts of defendants. See note 5 supra. Both these cases raised points of first impression for the Texas courts. In the first case, the defendants were successful [36] in advancing their contentions in the court of civil appeals. See Aluminum Company of America v. Benz-Stoddard, 357 S.W.2d 809 (Tex. Civ. App. - Austin). In the latter case, the defendants were successful in both the trial court and the court of civil appeals. Railroad Comm'n v. Aluminum Company of America, 368 S.W.2d 818 (Tex. Civ. App. - Austin). The ultimate reversal in both cases by the Texas Supreme Court does not detract from the conclusion that defendants had probable cause to file the suits in question. It is not the final disposition of a case which determines whether probable cause existed at the outset. The judgments of the court of civil appeals show conclusively that defendants had probable cause to believe that the challenged Commission orders were invalid. Compare Citizen's Wholesale Supply Co. v. Snyder, 201 Fed. 907 (3rd Cir. 1913); Bracken's Shopping Center, Inc. v. Ruwe, supra.

Therefore, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiffs in this cause are not entitled to recover as damages any loss they might have suffered because of false production forecasts filed by defendants with the Texas Railroad Commission or any loss or expense which [37] they might have suffered as a result of any litigation identified in this opinion concerning the validity of Railroad Commission rules, regulations, or orders. However, since there are other allegations in plaintiffs' complaint which, if true, would entitle them to a favorable judgment, summary judgment in favor [*596] of defendants is limited to the elements of damage specified above. As to these:

This is a final judgment.

Counsel for defendants will draft and submit an appropriate order after first obtaining approval from counsel for plaintiffs.

End of Document

Alabama Power Co. v. Alabama Elec. Coop.

United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit

April 2, 1968

No. 23016

Reporter

394 F.2d 672 *; 1968 U.S. App. LEXIS 7480 ; 1968 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,398

Alabama Power Co., Appellant v. Alabama Electric Cooperative, Inc., et al., Appellees

Disposition: [1] Affirmed.

Core Terms

anti trust law, immunity, contracts, power company, cooperatives, electric, district court, Supplier, Distributor, exemption, outer, loans, Sherman Act, borrower, energy, conspiracy, antitrust, rural, private citizen, perimeter, private utility, competitors, central station, electric power, injunction, dealings, government official, government action, Clayton Act, Agriculture

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Energy & Utilities Law > Administrative Proceedings > Judicial Review > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Electric Power Industry > Federal Power Act > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Financing > Raising Capital > Rural Electrification Loans

HN1[] Administrative Proceedings, Judicial Review

Congress has never enacted or intended that loans by the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Act should be reviewable in the courts. The Rural Electrification Act itself makes no provision for judicial loan review.

Energy & Utilities Law > Administrative Proceedings > Judicial Review > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Financing > Raising Capital > Rural Electrification Loans

HN2[] Administrative Proceedings, Judicial Review

Congress has steadfastly refused to provide judicial review under 7 U.S.C.S. § 901 of the Rural Electrification Act (Act). This silence could be premised on the concern that the private supplier could otherwise interfere with Act loans in each instance where the Administrator finds the public suppliers proposal unreasonable.

Administrative Law > Judicial Review > Remedies > Injunctions

Environmental Law > Administrative Proceedings & Litigation > Judicial Review

Governments > Legislation > Interpretation

Administrative Law > Judicial Review > General Overview

Administrative Law > Judicial Review > Reviewability > Preclusion

Administrative Law > Judicial Review > Reviewability > Standing

Energy & Utilities Law > Administrative Proceedings > Judicial Review > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Financing > Raising Capital > Rural Electrification Loans

HN3[] Remedies, Injunctions

Review under the Administrative Procedure Act of 1946, 5 U.S.C.S. § 1009, is precluded by that statute's initial exception to the right of review: Except as (1) statutes preclude judicial review or (2) agency action is by law committed to agency discretion. The Rural Electrification Act, 7 U.S.C.S. § 904, commits to the discretion of the Administrator the making of loans for rural electrification, including the adequacy of the security for such loans. The statute not only fails to provide for judicial review, but when construed in the light of its purpose and of legislative history, the statute retains oversight of the Administrator's actions in the hands of Congress itself and precludes judicial review.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

HN4[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

It is settled that neither the Sherman Act nor the Clayton Act was intended to authorize restraint of governmental action.

Governments > Federal Government > Claims By & Against

HN5[] Federal Government, Claims By & Against

It has been thought important that officials of government should be free to exercise their duties unembarrassed by the fear of damage suits in respect to acts done in the course of those duties, suits which would consume time and energies which would otherwise be devoted to governmental service and the threat of which might appreciably inhibit the fearless, vigorous, and effective administration of policies of government.

Energy & Utilities Law > Antitrust Issues > General Overview

HN6[] Energy & Utilities Law, Antitrust Issues

In cases where the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Act is immune from suit under the antitrust laws, the borrower is likewise immune.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Monopolies & Monopolization > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Electric Power Industry > Federal Power Act > General Overview

HN7[] Regulated Practices, Monopolies & Monopolization

Where a restraint upon trade or monopolization is the result of valid governmental action, as opposed to private action, no violation of the Rural Electrification Act can be made out.

Judges: Rives, Gewin and Godbold, Circuit Judges. Godbold, Circuit Judge, dissenting.

Opinion by: RIVES

Opinion

[*673] RIVES, Circuit Judge:

Alabama Power Company (hereafter Power Company) filed its complaint against Rural Electrification Administration (REA), Alabama Electric Cooperative, Inc. (AEC), Norman M. Clapp, the Administrator of REA, the Department of Agriculture and the Secretary of Agriculture. The complaint prayed for a preliminary and permanent injunction restraining the consummation or use of a $20,350,000.00 loan from REA to AEC for the purpose of financing the construction and operation of a generating plant and high voltage electric transmission and distribution lines. It prayed separately for a judgment avoiding certain 35-year all-requirements electric power contracts between AEC and fourteen electric distribution cooperatives as violative of the antitrust laws, and sought to recover from AEC treble damages, costs and attorneys' fees.

The defendants moved to dismiss and alternatively, for summary judgment. Affidavits were filed in support of and in opposition to the plaintiff's motion for preliminary injunction and the defendants' motions for [2] summary judgment. The district court, in an opinion reported in 249 F. Supp. at 855, denied plaintiff's motion for preliminary injunction and granted the several motions of the defendants to dismiss the action. The district court held that the Power Company had no standing to enjoin the consummation of the REA loan. The 35-year all-requirements electric power contracts the district court held were the result of valid governmental action and, hence, not violative of the antitrust laws. Since we are in agreement with the district court, what was said in its able opinion need not be repeated and our opinion can be brief.

Power Company argues that it has standing to seek judicial review of the REA loan either as made in violation of the "central station service" limitation contained in Section 4 of the REA [*674] Act, [1] or as being conditioned upon a violation of the antitrust laws. [2] As to the claim of standing under the REA Act, it has been repeatedly held that increased competition which may result to a private power company does not give it sufficient standing to enjoin the making of a loan by a federal agency. [3] The answer to the claim of standing under [3] the antitrust laws was

---

[1] 7 U.S.C.A. § 904.

[2] Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act and Section 3 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.A. §§ 1, 2 and 14.

[3] Alabama Power Company v. Ickes, 1938, 302 U.S. 464, 82 L. Ed. 374, 58 S. Ct. 300; Duke Power Company v. Greenwood Co., 1938, 302 U.S. 485, 82 L. Ed. 381, 58 S. Ct. 306; Tennessee Electric Power Co. v. TVA, 1939, 306 U.S. 118, 83 L. Ed. 543,

indicated in Kansas City Power & Light Co. v. McKay, supra note 3, and was clearly furnished in the Fifth Circuit case decided some months after the district court's decision in the instant case, Rural Electrification Administration v. Central Louisiana Electric Co., supra note 3. There, this Court said:

> "From the entire history of the Rural Electrification Act and its administration we are totally convinced that HN1[] Congress has never enacted or intended that loans by this Agency should be reviewable in the courts. The Act itself makes no provision for judicial loan review. By the allegations of the Complaints we are informed of the thorough manner in which Congress has ridden herd on the REA. Congressional Committees caused the promulgation of REA Bulletin 111-3, which appellees now say has been violated. Certainly, the demands of Congressional Committees do not have the force of law. Congress has seen fit not to enact these particular demands into law, evidently being most content to rely on the deadly sword constantly in its own hands, that is, the sole control of the purse out of which the loans are made. Regardless of how outrageous [4] or unfair the making of this loan may seem, the remedy is not in the courts but in the Congress." 354 F.2d at 865.

The same [5] thought had been earlier expressed by the D.C. Circuit in the Kansas City Power & Light Co. case, supra. See 225 F.2d at 930, 931. As later said by the Eighth Circuit in Rural Electrification Administration v. Northern States Power Co., 1967, 373 F.2d 686, 700:

> "HN2[] Congress has steadfastly refused to provide judicial review under 7 USC § 901 of the REA Act. [26] This silence could be premised on the concern that the private supplier could otherwise interfere with REA loans in each instance where the Administrator finds the public suppliers proposal unreasonable.

[6] [*675] In brief, HN3[] review under the Administrative Procedure Act of 1946, 5 USCA § 1009, is precluded by that statute's initial exception to the right of review: "Except as (1) statutes preclude judicial review or (2) agency action is by law committed to agency discretion * * *." The REA Act, 7 USCA § 904, commits to the discretion of the Administrator the making of loans for rural electrification, including the adequacy of the security for such loans. The statute not only fails to provide for judicial review, but when construed in the light of its purpose and of legislative history, the statute retains oversight of the Administrator's actions in the hands of Congress itself and precludes judicial review.

The same rationale would deny the plaintiff Power Company standing to enjoin the consummation of the loan or its claimed invalid provision for security directly under the antitrust laws. Further, HN4[] it is settled that neither the Sherman Act nor the Clayton Act was intended to authorize restraint of governmental action. [4] A different question

---

59 S. Ct. 366; Kansas City Power & Light Co. v. McKay, D.C. Cir. 1955, 96 U.S. App. D.C. 273, 225 F.2d 924, cert. den., 350 U.S. 884, 100 L. Ed. 780, 76 S. Ct. 137; Rural Electrification Administration v. Central Louisiana Electric Co., 5 Cir. 1966, 354 F.2d 859. See also Hardin v. Kentucky Utilities Co., 390 U.S. 1, 88 S. Ct. 651, 19 L. Ed. 2d 787 (1968).

[26] "See, e.g., Schilling v. Rogers, 363 U.S. 666, at 674. 80 S. Ct. 1288, at 1294, 4 L. Ed. 2d 1478, where Justice Harlan said:

"'The point is that in this Act [Trading with the Enemy Act] Congress was advertent to the role of courts, and an absence in any specific area of any kind of provision for judicial participation strongly indicates a legislative purpose that there be no such participation * * * [citing Work v. United States, ex rel. Rives, 267 U.S. 175, 182, 45 S. Ct. 252, 69 L. Ed. 561].'

In 1962 and 1963 attempts were made to introduce bills into Congress amending the Rural Electrification Act to provide for public hearings and judicial review of orders approving loans. These bills were not reported out of committee. See Hearings on Food and Agriculture Act of 1962 before House Committee on Agriculture, 87th Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 680-681. See also H.R. 6852 and H.R. 7213, 88th Cong., 1st Sess.; Hearings before House Appropriations Committee on Department of Agriculture Appropriations for 1964, 88th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 374. " might be presented if the Administrator went beyond the outer perimeter of the authority [7] vested in him by the statute, [5] or as expressed in Hardin v. Kentucky Utilities Co., cited supra note 3, "* * * outside the range of permissible choices contemplated by the statute." The Administrator's affidavit discloses that that condition does not arise under the circumstances of this case.

[4] United Mine Workers of America v. Pennington, 1965, 381 U.S. 657, 671-672, 14 L. Ed. 2d 626, 85 S. Ct. 1585; Eastern R.R. Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 1961, 365 U.S. 127, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464, 81 S. Ct. 523; Parker v. Brown, 1943, 317 U.S. 341, 87 L. Ed. 315, 63 S. Ct. 307; United States v. Rock Royal Co-op, 1939, 307 U.S. 533, 559-560, 59 S. Ct. 993, 83

> "My policy reasons for approving the aforesaid loan were: (1) it would result in significant savings in the cost of power to AEC and the Members as compared with the cost of power purchased by AEC and the Members from the plaintiff and Gulf Power Company; and (2) the loan was necessary to protect the effectiveness and security of AEC and the Members since the plaintiff had through its activities demonstrated its intent to deprive AEC and the Members of existing and potential consumers in their service areas, and since continuance of dependence by AEC and the Members upon plaintiff as a wholesale supplier would inevitably assist and facilitate such activities on the part of the plaintiff.
>
> "As authorized by section 4 of the RE Act (7 U.S.C. 904), the loan to AEC is to be repaid over a period of thirty-five (35) years. It has been the practice for many years of REA [8] Administrators, including the affiant, to require as a condition of making generating and transmission loans pursuant to section 4 to cooperatives such as AEC, that the borrower shall obtain 35 year contracts with its members (hereinafter called 'thirty-five year, all-requirements contracts') obligating them to purchase all of their electric requirements to the extent that the borrower shall have power and energy available. The purpose of this requirement is to assure that the borrower will have a market for the power generated and transmitted by the REA-financed facilities and thus be able to repay the loan. Such a requirement is established customarily, and was imposed on AEC in this case, in the exercise of the REA administrator's power and obligation under section 4 to obtain reasonably adequate security for the loan and [*676] to assure its repayment within the time agreed upon between REA and AEC. As further assurance, following long-established REA practice, I also required the execution of the supplemental agreement included in Exhibit B attached to the plaintiff's complaint. As shown in paragraph 7 below, the facilities for which the loan in question was made will [9] not be placed into operation before 1968 at the earliest. Based on load forecasts made before the loan was approved, AEC will have power and energy available for the total electric requirements of its members for a period of no more than 2 years thereafter. Based on the same forecasts, AEC's available power and energy in 1974 will represent no more than 83% of its members' electric requirements in that year, and such percentage will significantly decline each year thereafter. Under their contracts with AEC, the Members will be free to purchase from plaintiff and others their electric requirements in excess of the power and energy available from AEC.
>
> "AEC is owned and controlled by its members and is merely the means by which they generate and transmit electric power for themselves rather than purchasing power and transmission service from another source. Instead of having one organization performing the generating, transmitting and distributing function, AEC engages in the first two operations on behalf of its members and the latter perform the distributing operation. Because of this separation of the operations required to serve consumers the 35-year, all requirements contracts [10] between AEC and the Members were necessary to meet the requirements of section 4 of the RE Act (7 U.S.C. 904)."

[11] Thus in requiring AEC to obtain 35-year all-requirement contracts with its electric distribution cooperatives, the Administrator was doing nothing unusual, but was simply following customary and long-established REA practice, clearly not beyond the "outer perimeter" of his statutory authority [6] to determine the security for the loan. Anything less might well mean the acceptance of inadequate security. Under these circumstances, to require or permit the "outer perimeter" boundaries to be determined by another fact-finding body would defeat the reasons for

---

L. Ed. 1446; E.M. Wiggins Airways, Inc. v. Massachusetts Port Authority, 1 Cir. 1966, 362 F.2d 52; Stroud v. Benson, D.C.N.C. 1957, 155 F. Supp. 482; Miley v. John Hancock Mut. Life Ins. Co., D.C. Mass 1957, 148 F. Supp. 299.

[5] See S & S Logging Co. v. Barker, 9 Cir. 1966, 366 F.2d 617; Norton v. McShane, 5 Cir. 1964, 332 F.2d 855, 859; compare Pierson v. Ray, 1967, 386 U.S. 547, 18 L. Ed. 2d 288, 87 S. Ct. 1213.

[6] 7 U.S.C.A. § 904.

the recognition of the absolute privilege. What was said by Mr. Justice Harlan in Barr v. Matteo, 1958, 360 U.S. 564, 571, 3 L. Ed. 2d 1434, 79 S. Ct. 1335, is illuminating:

> "HN5[] It has been thought important that officials of government should be free to exercise their duties unembarrassed by the fear of damage suits in respect to acts done in the course of those duties -- suits which would consume time and energies which would otherwise be devoted to governmental service and the threat of which might appreciably inhibit the fearless, vigorous, and effective administration of policies of government." [7]

[12]

Finally, a unique question presented by the Power Company must be answered. This is the first of the attacks by private companies on federal loans to competitors in which there has been a separate attack on the borrower and those alleged to be in conspiracy with it for claimed violation of the antitrust laws. It is argued that there is nothing in the Act or in its legislative history which authorizes the Administration to grant immunity to the borrower, AEC, [8] and that at the very least [*677] the plaintiff has a right to pursue its antitrust suit against AEC. That position, we think is based upon too narrow a conception of the program authorized by Congress. The making of loans by the Administrator necessarily includes the existence and ability [13] of borrowers to whom such loans can be made. If the security which the Administrator requires can be undercut and the borrower mulcted in treble damages for complying with the condition imposed by the Administrator for making the loan, then the functioning of the Act will be crippled, if not defeated. To avoid frustrating the intent of Congress, it must follow that HN6[] in cases where the Administrator is immune from suit under the antitrust laws, the borrower is likewise immune. [9]

[14] The Supreme Court has repeatedly held that,

> "* * * HN7[] where a restraint upon trade or monopolization is the result of valid governmental action, as opposed to private action, no violation of the Act can be made out. [15]

The Power Company would treat REA simply as a rival public utility. We agree with the recent decision of the Federal Power Commission in Dairyland Power Cooperative, 37 F.P.C. 12, 35 L.W. 2385, that rural electric cooperatives are something more than public utilities; they are instrumentalities of the United States. "They were chosen by Congress for the purpose of bringing abundant, low cost electric energy to rural America." See also, Salt River Project Agricultural & Power District v. FPC, 129 U.S. App. D.C. 117, 391 F.2d 470, 36 L.W. 2524 (1968).

The judgment is therefore Affirmed.

---

[7] See also Mr. Justice Harlan's long quotation from Judge Learned Hand's opinion in Gregoire v. Biddle, 2 Cir. 1949, 177 F.2d 579, 581, appearing at 360 U.S. at 571-572.

[8] Or, we might add, to its member distributing cooperatives, though they have not been joined as parties defendant.

[9] In so holding, we fully appreciate that immunity from the antitrust laws is not to be lightly implied. California v. Federal Power Commission, 1962, 369 U.S. 482, 485, 8 L. Ed. 2d 54, 82 S. Ct. 901; United States v. Philadelphia National Bank, 1963, 374 U.S. 321, 350, 10 L. Ed. 2d 915, 83 S. Ct. 1715; Carnation Company v. Pacific Westbound Conference, 1966, 383 U.S. 213, 218, 15 L. Ed. 2d 709, 86 S. Ct. 781; United States v. First City National Bank, 1967, 386 U.S. 361, 368, 18 L. Ed. 2d 151, 87 S. Ct. 1088.

[15] " United States v. Rock Royal Co-op, 307 U.S. 533, 59 S. Ct. 993, 83 L. Ed. 533; Parker v. Brown, 317 U.S. 341, 87 L. Ed. 315, 63 S. Ct. 307."

Eastern R. Conf. v. Noerr Motor, 1961, 365 U.S. 127, 136, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464, 81 S. Ct. 523."

Dissent by: GODBOLD

Dissent

GODBOLD, Circuit Judge, dissenting:

[15] I must disagree with my associates.

This case presents in bold and clear form issues not heretofore judicially determined of the interplay between, on the one hand, the antitrust laws and the national policy which they represent and, on the other hand, the Rural Electrification Act [1] and national policies of aid to rural citizens without electric service. In addition there are vital factual issues which have been neither determined nor reached, since the decision below was a dismissal for lack of standing to sue.

Three issues must be discussed. Discussion of each overlaps the others, and the relationship between them has been hazy at times in the previous case history:

(1) Standing to sue under the antitrust laws of the United States. In my opinion the Power Company has standing.

(2) Implied governmental immunity from the antitrust laws of the REA Administrator, of private citizens who deal with him, and of private citizens who deal between themselves [16] as incident to or in consequence of dealings with the Administrator. In my view the Administrator has no such implied immunity as a governmental officer whether acting within or without the "outer periphery of his authority." If he possesses such implied immunity he cannot pass it on to private citizens to immunize them in their dealings with him [*678] or to private citizens to immunize them in their dealings with each other.

(3) If the Administrator does enjoy an implied immunity the existence of which depends upon whether he was acting within the outer limits of his authority, there is a material issue of fact, not yet adjudicated, as to whether he was within such limits.

I. The 35-year exclusive dealing contracts

The provisions of the contracts which the Administrator, as a condition of approval of the loan to AEC, required be executed by AEC and the distributor cooperatives, are central to the case. The majority describe the contracts, without amplification, as "certain 35-year all-requirement-electric contracts between AEC and fourteen electric distribution cooperatives." [2]

[17] The contracts require the distributing cooperative (Distributor) to purchase all of its electric power needs from AEC (Supplier):

> Supplier shall sell and deliver to Distributor and Distributor shall purchase and receive from Supplier all electric power and energy which Distributor shall require to the extent that Supplier shall have such power and energy available, provided, however, that Distributor shall have the right to continue to purchase electric power and energy from a source other than Supplier for all or a separable part of its system until Supplier shall be in position to supply Distributor's requirements for its system or such part thereof.

The contracts require the distributing cooperative, at such time as it may legally do so, to terminate its contracts with other power suppliers upon request of AEC made with the approval, or at the direction, of the Administrator. If

---

[1] 7 U.S.C.A. § 901 et seq.

[2] The distribution cooperatives are not parties to the suit. The Administrator claims he is not a party to the contracts. But see footnote 3, infra.

the Distributor fails to terminate an existent contract either the Supplier or the Administrator may bring suit to enforce the termination provisions.

> Distributor shall terminate, if the Supplier with the approval of the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration shall [18] so request, any existing contract or contracts with a source other than Supplier at such time as it may legally do so, provided Supplier shall have sufficient electric power and energy available for Distributor.
>
> * * *
>
> The Supplier, the Distributor and the Administrator agree that if the Distributor, upon being requested to do so by the Supplier with the approval or at the direction of the Administrator, shall fail to terminate any contract with a power supplier other than the Supplier, as provided by Section 1 of the Power Contract, the Supplier or the Administrator, if he shall so select, shall have the right to enforce the obligations of the Distributor under the provisions of said Section 1 of the Contract by instituting all necessary actions at law or suits in equity, including, without limitation, suits for specific performance. [3]

[19] The Distributor purchases its power requirement under a rate schedule, which must be reviewed at least annually by it and AEC, and revisions may be agreed upon but are ineffective unless approved by the Administrator.

Contracts are required by the Administrator to be obtained from 13 distribution cooperatives located in Alabama, which the Power Company alleges endeavor to serve approximately 50% of the geographical area of the state, and three located in Florida. The Power [*679] Company alleges the 35-year contracts will foreclose it from supplying nine of these cooperatives, six of whom presently receive all their power, and three that receive part of their power, from the Power Company, and as a consequence it will be foreclosed from serving at least one-third of the rural areas of Alabama. The extent of the private utility's loss of market is a disputed issue of fact, but even under the assertions of the appellees the share of the relevant market involved is, in my opinion, as a matter of law substantial. [4]

[20] Totally without relevance is the contention of AEC that REA has made it previous loans and in connection with each has required similar 35-year contracts, but the Power Company has not before claimed them to be violations of the antitrust laws. There is no right by prescription to violate the antitrust laws. This theory that governmental action can bootstrap itself to a state of validity is expressly adopted by the majority, who conclude that in making the contracts the Administrator was not beyond the outer perimeter of his authority because he was "doing nothing unusual, but was simply following customary and long-established REA practice."

Neither the district court nor the majority in this court reach the issue of whether the contracts are proscribed by the antitrust laws. They simply decline to scrutinize them. The complaint -- and at this stage we take its allegations as true -- sets out a classic case of an exclusive supply contract which violates Section 3 of the Clayton Act because it

---

[3] This paragraph is part of a "Supplemental Agreement," to which the Administrator is to be a signatory, to the 35-year contracts. It creates a question of fact and law of whether the Administrator himself becomes a party to the transactions between AEC and the distributors.

[4] AEC states the loss will be of two all-requirements customers and three partial-requirements customers. In its brief AEC concedes the Power Company will lose, at least temporarily, approximately 16% of its total wholesale sales to cooperatives and municipal systems.

Several arguments of appellees may have relevance to a factual determination of impact on the relevant market, if that not be established as a matter of law, or of the extent of restraints on commerce, but have no relevance at this juncture -- i.e., that AEC serves a smaller area and has smaller capital investment and operating revenue than Alabama Power; that based on AEC projections it will not generate enough power to serve all needs of the distributor cooperatives, and the private companies will have a chance to meet the need for the excess.

Certainly it cuts no figure at this stage, and maybe never, that REA argues the termination provisions of the contracts will not be exercised until expiration of existing wholesale contracts between distributors and Alabama Power, and if existing contracts are breached the power company will have an adequate remedy in damages.

forecloses in the relevant market a substantial share of the line of commerce affected. Pennsylvania Water & Power Co. v. Consolidated Gas, Elec. Light & Power Co., 184 F.2d 552 [21] (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 340 U.S. 906, 71 S. Ct. 282, 95 L. Ed. 655 (1950); Consolidated Gas, Elec. Light & Power Co. v. Pennsylvania Water & Power Co., 194 F.2d 89 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 343 U.S. 963, 72 S. Ct. 1056, 96 L. Ed. 1360 (1952). See also Tampa Elec. Co. v. Nashville Coal Co., 365 U.S. 320, 81 S. Ct. 623, 5 L. Ed. 2d 580 (1961); Standard Oil Co. of California v. United States, 337 U.S. 293, 69 S. Ct. 1051, 93 L. Ed. 1371 (1949); International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U.S. 392, 68 S. Ct. 12, 92 L. Ed. 20 (1947). While I view the violation as otherwise unquestionable, if there be any question the 35-year duration lays it to rest. It is an exclusive dealing arrangement that can foreclose the Power Company for the rest of the twentieth century. United States v. American Can Co., 87 F. Supp. 18 (N.D. Cal. 1949). [5] [22] Nor do I have any doubt [*680] that the contracts, and the effects alleged, constitute restraints violating the Sherman Act. Consolidated Gas, supra. [6]

Standing alone the contracts violate the antitrust laws. As part of a wider course of dealings they violate the antitrust laws and so characterize that broader spectrum as to make it a violation. The violation by the contracts is so clear that I do not pursue the allegations that the Administrator coerced the distribution cooperatives into signing them, a factual issue.

II. Immunity

The majority conclude the Administrator enjoys a governmental immunity from the Sherman and Clayton Acts for acts done within the outer periphery of his authority. Examination of this premise is inextricably entwined with consideration of the two implications drawn therefrom, that the Administrator's immunity extends to private citizens (the AEC) who deal with him and to private citizens who deal between themselves (the AEC and the distribution cooperatives) as an incident to [23] or in consequence of their dealings with the Administrator.

None of the immunities can be found in the REA Act.

The majority opinion tips its hat to the principle that "immunity from the antitrust laws is not lightly implied." California v. Federal Power Comm'n., 369 U.S. 482, 485, 82 S. Ct. 901, 8 L. Ed. 2d 54, 57 (1962). In fact, "this canon of construction . . . reflects the felt indispensable role of antitrust policy in the maintenance of a free economy." United States v. Philadelphia Nat'l Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 348, 83 S. Ct. 1715, 10 L. Ed. 2d 915, 936 (1963).

Congress can, and in numerous instances by express legislation has, subordinated the national policies reflected in the antitrust laws so as to authorize government officials to perform acts or pursue policies without regard to the antitrust laws. The exemptions or immunities thus conferred are in some instances to conduct between the official and the citizen, in others to dealings between private citizens which the official is authorized to review and if approved have limited these expressly conferred immunities to the scope defined in each instance by Congress so as to avoid pro tanto repeal [24] of the antitrust laws.

Under the Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act the Secretary of Agriculture may become a party to marketing agreements with private citizens for the handling of agricultural commodities which are exempt from the antitrust laws. 7 U.S.C.A. § 608b. In United States v. Borden Co., 308 U.S. 188, 60 S. Ct. 182, 84 L. Ed. 181 (1939), the Supreme Court declined to broaden this specific exemption into a general exemption from § 1 of the Sherman Act of the marketing of agricultural commodities so as to immunize marketing agreements between private parties. [7] "If

---

[5] See also United States v. Pullman Co., 50 F. Supp. 123, 129 (E.D. Pa. 1943):

> "As a competition killer the long term contract is an effective weapon. One could hardly have a more favored service contract than an agreement for exclusive dealing . . . and a quarter century of time to elapse before one need to be concerned with new terms. Even a patentee is not so secure against the passage of time."

[6] The contract in Consolidated included price fixing, a per se violation of the Sherman Act. Also it foreclosed competitors from a substantial market and divided territory between competitors., 184 F.2d at 558, 559.

Congress had desired to grant any further immunity Congress doubtless would have said so." 308 U.S. at 201, 84 L. Ed. at 192. In the case before us the majority find an implied governmental exemption and the blanket thereof is then stretched to immunize exclusive dealing contracts between [*681] private parties, AEC and the distribution cooperatives.

[25] "The typical method adopted by Congress when it has lifted the ban of the Sherman Act is the scrutiny and approval of designated public representatives," (giving examples of the code machinery and presidential approval under the National Industrial Recovery Act, the ICC in transportation, the SEC over associations of brokers and dealers, the Bituminous Coal Commission over price fixing in the coal industry). United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U.S. 150, 228 n. 60, 60 S. Ct. 811, 84 L. Ed. 1129, 1170 n. 60 (1940). The REA Act does not lift the ban. Nor does it confer upon the Administrator authority to create or approve, or to state applicable standards to govern the creation or approval, of situations or relations in derogation of the antitrust laws.

Compare the transportation industry. The original authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission [8] exemplified an implicit public policy that competition in the transportation field was desirable, a policy subsequently expressed for a broader field in the Sherman Act of 1890. [9] Subsequently, and repeatedly, Congress has amended the Interstate Commerce Act to grant authority to the ICC, in the context of [26] a pervasive regulatory scheme, to approve and permit consolidations, mergers, controls, combinations, and agreements to fix rates, all outside the usual operation of the antitrust laws. [10] The history reveals carefully-held Congressional reins over the interplay of antitrust policy and governmental action in derogation thereof. The Congressional action to create exemptions has not made the antitrust laws wholly inapplicable to the transportation industry; Congress has not authorized the ICC to ignore antitrust policies, for the Commission is under a duty, as an administrative matter, to consider effect on competitors and on the general competitive situation in the light of national transportation policy. McLean Trucking Co. v. United States, 321 U.S. 67, 84 nn. 20 & 21, 64 S. Ct. 370, 88 L. Ed. 544, 555 nn. 20 & 21 (1944).

[27] With respect to many regulated industries the courts have rejected the theory that governmental grant -- federal or state -- of monopolistic privileges accompanied by regulation, sometimes all-pervasive, by government bodies carries an implied exemption from the antitrust laws or deprives the courts of jurisdiction to enforce them. See Georgia v. Pennsylvania R.R., 324 U.S. 439, 65 S. Ct. 716, 89 L. Ed. 1051 (1945), sustaining the right of an injured party, the State of Georgia, to enjoin a conspiracy of railroads to fix rates in violation of the antitrust laws, although the rates had been approved by the ICC:

> But it is elementary that repeals by implication are not favored. Only a clear repugnancy between the old law and the new results in the former giving way and then only pro tanto to the extent of the repugnancy.
>
> * * *
>
> It is sufficient here to note that we find no warrant in the Interstate Commerce Act and the Sherman Act for saying that the authority to fix joint through rates clothes with legality a conspiracy to discriminate against a State or a region, to use coercion in the fixing of rates, or to put in the hands of a combination of carriers a veto [28] power over rates proposed by a single carrier. The type of regulation which Congress chose did not eliminate the emphasis on competition and individual freedom of action in rate making.

---

[7] In like manner the Secretary of Agriculture may make marketing agreements with manufacturers and handlers of anti-hog-cholera serum and hog-cholera virus, 7 U.S.C.A. § 851 et seq., and the agreements are specifically exempted from antitrust laws, 7 U.S.C.A. § 852. The exemption extends no further than to the agreement itself. American Co-op Serum Ass'n v. Anchor Serum Co., 153 F.2d 907 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 329 U.S. 721, 67 S. Ct. 57, 91 L. Ed. 625 (1946).

[8] Interstate Commerce Act of 1887, 49 U.S.C.A. § 1 et seq.

[9] 15 U.S.C.A. §§ 1-7.

[10] See the discussion of the history in United States v. Marshall Transport Co., 322 U.S. 31, 64 S. Ct. 899, 88 L. Ed. 1110 (1944).

324 U.S. at 456-57, 458-59, 65 S. Ct. at 726, 89 L. Ed. at 1062, 1063. See also, as to railroads, United States v. Terminal R.R. Ass'n, 224 U.S. 383, 32 S. Ct. 507, 56 L. Ed. 810 (1912); the shipping industry, [*682] Carnation Co. v. Pacific Westbound Conference, 383 U.S. 213, 86 S. Ct. 781, 15 L. Ed. 2d 709 (1966); banking, United States v. Philadelphia Nat'l Bank, supra; insurance, United States v. South Eastern Underwriters Ass'n, 322 U.S. 533, 64 S. Ct. 1162, 88 L. Ed. 1440 (1944); telephone, United States Tel. Co. v. Central Union Tel. Co., 202 F. 66 (6th Cir. 1913); gas and electric energy, In re American Fuel & Power Co., 122 F.2d 223 (6th Cir. 1941); Pennsylvania Water & Power Co. v. Consolidated Gas, Elec. Light & Power Co., supra; radio and television, United States v. Radio Corp. of America, 358 U.S. 334, 79 S. Ct. 457, 3 L. Ed. 2d 354 (1958); natural [29] gas, California v. Federal Power Com., 369 U.S. 482, 82 S. Ct. 901, 8 L. Ed. 2d 54 (1962); export trade associations, United States Alkali Export Ass'n v. United States, 325 U.S. 196, 65 S. Ct. 1120, 89 L. Ed. 1554 (1945).

The Capper-Volstead Act [11] authorized agricultural producers to unite in preparing for market, and marketing, their products, and to make contracts necessary for that collaboration. The antitrust exemption thereby granted is much broader than the general provision of § 6 of the Clayton Act which excepts agricultural and horticultural cooperatives from the Sherman Act. But Borden held that the Capper-Volstead Act does not cover the entire field of the Sherman Act and does not authorize a combination or conspiracy with persons other than producers. See also, Maryland & Virginia Milk Producers Ass'n v. United States, 362 U.S. 458, 80 S. Ct. 847, 4 L. Ed. 2d 880 (1960).

Case- Swayne Co. v. Sunkist Growers, Inc., 389 U.S. 384, 88 S. Ct. 528, 19 L. Ed. 2d 621, 36 U.S.L. Week 407 (1967), [30] holds that the antitrust exemption granted by Congress to producer cooperatives under Capper-Volstead does not extend to give antitrust immunity to an association which has non-producer interests in its participating membership, even though the participation of the nonproducers is relatively small.

The Fishermen's Collective Marketing Act [12] authorizes fishermen to market collectively, and the Secretary of the Interior has power to issue cease and desist orders if such organizations restrain trade to the extent of unduly enhancing prices. Neither Congressional authorization of the cooperative marketing association nor the power of the Secretary exempts fishermen and their association or union from the antitrust laws. Hinton v. Columbia River Packers Ass'n, 131 F.2d 88 (9th Cir. 1942).

There are various specific exemptions from antitrust laws in the labor field. Section 20 of the Clayton Act [13] [32] withdrew from the general prohibitions of the [31] Sherman Act specifically enumerated practices of labor unions by prohibiting injunctions. Norris-LaGuardia [14] further narrowed the jurisdiction of federal equity power in labor disputes. Thereafter in determining if trade union conduct is a violation of Sherman one must read and harmonize Sherman, § 20 of Clayton, and Norris-LaGuardia. United States v. Hutcheson, 312 U.S. 219, 61 S. Ct. 463, 85 L. Ed. 788 (1941); Apex Hosiery Co. v. Leader, 310 U.S. 469, 60 S. Ct. 982, 84 L. Ed 1311 (1940). But Congress in granting immunity to labor organizations did not give immunity to combinations of labor with non-labor groups. Allen Bradley Co. v. Local No. 3, IBEW, 325 U.S. 797, 65 S. Ct. 1533, 89 L. Ed. 1939 (1945). The Supreme Court, in Allen Bradley, found nothing in the Congressional history to indicate that it was ever suggested, considered or legislatively determined that unions, while free to engage themselves in conduct which restrains trade, were to be

---

[11] 7 U.S.C.A. §§ 291-92.

[12] 15 U.S.C.A. §§ 521-22.

[13] 29 U.S.C.A. § 52.

[14] 29 U.S.C.A. § 101 et seq.

granted immunity for aiding and abetting manufacturers and traders in violating the [*683] Sherman Act, the availability of such an exemption being solely for Congress. [15]

[33] The distribution cooperatives have no special status under the antitrust laws by reason of their being cooperatives. "It is significant that when Congress has desired to permit cooperatives to interfere with the competitive system of business, it has done so expressly by legislation." Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1, 14, 65 S. Ct. 1416, 89 L. Ed 2013 (1945).

The judicially-created immunities of this case are rested on § 4 of the REA Act, 7 U.S.C.A. § 904. The Administrator squarely puts his requirement of the 35-year contracts on his power and obligation under § 4 to obtain reasonable security for the loan, that "loans shall be on such terms and conditions relating to the expenditure of the moneys loaned and the security therefor as the Administrator shall determine." It boggles the imagination to suggest that the myriad of government agencies having the power to lend (each based on Congressional determination that the particular lending power authorized is in the national interest) are, by reason of routine administrative control over sufficiency of collateral, vested with implied power to carve out of the national economy exempt [34] enclaves in which borrowers may deal free of the antitrust laws.

The REA Act, and its Congressional history, reveal no purpose of granting any power to the Administrator to operate free of national antitrust policy. [16]

It is beyond question that the purpose of the central station service provision of § 904 was to give private utilities some measure of protection from competition created as a result of REA loans. [17] Protection from lawful competition of REA-financed borrowers has been held not a constitutional entitlement and a matter for relief solely in Congress. But it flies in the teeth of the Congressional intent expressed in § 904 -- protection of private utilities from a described area of competition [*684] -- to distill the same § 904 into an authorization [35] to the Administrator to require, with impunity and immunity, action that freezes out the private utility as a competitor. By some unrevealed process of alchemy the partial shield given the private utility against the REA borrower by § 904 is converted into a sword in the borrower's hands.

---

[15] "It must be remembered that the exemptions granted the unions were special exceptions to a general legislative plan. The primary objective of all the Anti-trust legislation has been to preserve business competition and to proscribe business monopoly. It would be a surprising thing if Congress, in order to prevent a misapplication of that legislation to labor unions, had bestowed upon such unions complete and unreviewable authority to aid business groups to frustrate its primary objective. For if business groups, by combining with labor unions, can fix prices and divide up markets, it was little more than a futile gesture for Congress to prohibit price fixing by business groups themselves. Seldom, if ever, has it been claimed before, that by permitting labor unions to carry on their own activities, Congress intended completely to abdicate its constitutional power to regulate interstate commerce and to empower interested business groups to shift our society from a competitive to a monopolistic economy. "

. . . .

"There is, however, one line which we can draw with assurance that we follow the congressional purpose. We know that Congress feared the concentrated power of business organizations to dominate markets and prices. It intended to outlaw business monopolies. A business monopoly is no less such because a union participates, and such participation is a violation of the Act." 325 U.S. at 809-10, 811, 89 L. Ed. at 1948-49.

[16] If he had any implied power there would be an additional question of the scope of it -- i.e., can he exclude a private utility as a competitor; can he require a private citizen to make an exclusive dealing contract as a condition of a loan?

[17] See Hearings on S. 3483 Before the House Comm. on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, 74th Cong., 2d Sess. 30, 56-57, 72-73 (1936). See also the floor debates in both the House, 80 Cong. Rec. 5295, 5307, 5308 (1936), and the Senate, 80 Cong. Rec. 3305-06 (1936). Mr. Rayburn summarized the purpose of the bill during the House debate:

> "May I say to the gentleman that we are not, in this bill, intending to go out and compete with anybody. By this bill we hope to bring electrification to people who do not now have it. This bill was not written on the theory that we were going to punish somebody or parallel their lines or enter into competition with them. . . ."

80 Cong. Rec. 5283 (1936).

The authorities relied [36] on by the majority for a general principle of governmental exemption from the antitrust laws do not support so broad a pronouncement.

Parker v. Brown, 317 U.S. 341, 63 S. Ct. 307, 87 L. Ed. 315 (1943), was concerned with action by the State of California in setting up a raisin marketing program. The state command vel non was held the act of the sovereign, not forbidden by the Sherman Act. [18] [37] E. W. Wiggins Airways, Inc. v. Massachusetts Port Authority, [19] and Miley v. John Hancock Mut. Life Ins. Co. [20] are concerned with sovereign immunity of the state and follow Parker v. Brown.

Eastern R.R. Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 81 S. Ct. 523, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464 (1961), held that a violation of the Sherman Act cannot be predicated upon attempts to influence the passage or enforcement of laws. The Court distinguished between an agreement jointly to seek legislation or law enforcement and agreements traditionally condemned by the Sherman Act, and it warned against treating defendants' conduct as though it were a common-law trade restraint. Presumably the majority refer to the first sentence of the following part of the opinion:

> Accordingly, it has been held that where a restraint upon trade or monopolization is the result of valid governmental action, as opposed to private action, no violation of the Act can be made out. These decisions [38] rest upon the fact that under our form of government the question whether a law of that kind should pass, or if passed be enforced, is the responsibility of the appropriate legislative or executive branch of government so long as the law itself does not violate some provision of the Constitution.

The limiting language of the second sentence makes quite plain that the governmental action referred to is of the particular kind before the Court. Primarily the Court was concerned with protecting the legislative process. It speaks (365 U.S. at 136-37, 5 L. Ed. 2d at 470-71) of associations seeking to persuade the legislative or executive to take particular action with regard to passage or enforcement of laws, of the significance in a representative democracy of the people making their wishes known to their representatives, and the constitutional issue of the right to petition.

United Mine Workers of America v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657, 85 S. Ct. 1585, 14 L. Ed. 2d 626 (1965), was concerned with joint efforts of private citizens to influence public officials, approaches to the Secretary of Labor by union and large companies to establish a minimum [39] wage under the Walsh-Healey Act [21] which would make it impossible for [*685] smaller companies to compete. The plaintiff was held, under Noerr, not entitled to damages arising from the Secretary's Walsh-Healey determinations, not because of any governmental immunity but [18] The court pointed out, "we have no question of the state or its municipality becoming a participant in a private agreement or combination by others for restraint of trade," (317 U.S. 351-52, 87 L. Ed. at 326) and, "the state in adopting and enforcing the pro rate program made no contract or agreement and entered into no conspiracy in restraint of trade or to establish monopoly but, as sovereign, imposed the restraint as an act of government which the Sherman Act did not undertake to prohibit." (317 U.S. at 352, 87 L. Ed. at 327).

[19] 362 F.2d 52 (1st Cir. 1966). There is an over-broad dictum in Wiggins of a general governmental immunity. There was no conspiracy in the case, only a "simple agreement or arrangement."

[20] 148 F. Supp. 299 (D. Mass.), aff'd, 242 F.2d 758 (1st Cir. 1957).

[21] 41 U.S.C.A. § 35 et seq.

because his action was "the act of a public official who is not claimed to be a co-conspirator." (381 U.S. at 671, 14 L. Ed. 2d at 637). The REA Administrator is claimed to be a conspirator. [22]

[40] Stroud v. Benson, 155 F. Supp. 482 (E.D.N.C. 1957), refers to sovereign immunity to the antitrust laws, quoting the Parker v. Brown language concerning state action (which was not involved). There was no allegation of conspiracy, only of the validity of an order of the Secretary of Agriculture, and there was no restraint of trade.

The cases do not support a proposition of general governmental immunity. If there is such a principle Congress has been proceeding for a long time under a misapprehension in providing for government officers, and those with whom they deal, exemptions which are specific in nature and varying in scope.

III. The material issues of fact

The majority acknowledge a possible application of the antitrust laws if the Administrator went beyond the outer perimeter of the authority granted him by statute.

The motions to dismiss were submitted to the district court, along with the motions for summary judgment and motion for preliminary injunction, on the pleadings, affidavits, exhibits, and briefs and argument. The district court and the majority in this court have drawn freely on the affidavits and exhibits to support their conclusions. The [41] Complaint and answer alone, but in sharpened form when aided by the other pleadings and the supporting affidavits and exhibits, squarely raise a factual issue of whether the Administrator is acting within or without his outer limits. That question of fact was not determined by the district court.

In this court the majority say that to require or permit a fact-finding body to determine the outer perimeter boundaries, or "the range of permissible choices contemplated by the statute, " would defeat the reasons for recognition of the privilege of government officials against suit, relying upon Barr v. Matteo, 360 U.S. 564, 79 S. Ct. 1335, 3 L. Ed. 2d 1434 (1958). I do not understand this statement. Barr itself, as have numerous other cases, determined outer perimeter boundaries:

> The fact that the action here taken was within the outer perimeter of petitioner's line of duty is enough to render the privilege applicable, despite the allegations of malice in the complaint . . . .

360 U.S. at 575. See also Norton v. McShane, 332 F.2d 855, [*686] 862 (5th Cir. 1964). To couple a privilege for acts done within the perimeter [42] with immunity from judicial investigation of where the perimeter lies, or where the "permissible choices" end, would expand the privilege into immunity for any act done.

---

[22] The first holding of Pennington was that a concerted effort to influence public officials is regardless of intent not within the Sherman Act. There is no such question in the present case, but the holding is a recognition that Noerr is about a particular kind of governmental action.

Additional judicial recognition that Noerr does not establish a carte blanche governmental immunity is Harman v. Valley Nat'l Bank, 339 F.2d 564 (9th Cir. 1964):

> "Nonetheless, Noerr does not necessarily bar relief under the present complaint. The complaint can be read as alleging that appellees' joint effort to influence the Attorney General was but one element in a larger, long-continued scheme to restrain and monopolize 'commercial banking in particular and the financial industry in general within the State of Arizona.' Moreover, the complaint alleges that the acts of the Attorney General were those of a participating conspirator. In Parker v. Brown, 317 U.S. 341, 351, 63 S. Ct. 307, 314, 87 L. Ed. 315 (1943), the Court specifically reserved the question of the applicability of the Sherman Act to the case of 'a state or its municipality becoming a participant in a private agreement or combination by others for restraint of trade,' and Noerr does not hold that the Act would be inapplicable in such a situation."

339 F.2d at 566.

The privilege originated with judicial officers, but has been extended to some executive officers. It has its greatest vitality in the field of defamation, but by implication has been extended to civil torts generally. Norton v. McShane, supra footnote 2, 332 F.2d at 858. The privilege seems to me to have the least force, if any force at all, in the case where the executive officer's authority -- his "permissible choices" -- and the wrong against which privilege is asserted both are created by Congressional enactment. The privilege of the officer and the Congressional authority to grant or withhold immunity from the statutory wrong then pull in opposite directions. To give effect to privilege in that situation is to grant by indirection an immunity to a statutory offense which Congress, in creating the offense, saw fit to withhold. The government officer may not thus insulate himself from Congressional intent.

While disclaiming the propriety of any fact finder's doing so the majority [43] make a finding that the Administrator did not go beyond his outer perimeter or exceed his "permissible choices," basing it on customary REA practice and his affidavit reciting his "policy reasons" for approving the loan. That finding now made by the district court, is inappropriately made by an appellate court. It is not sustained by the record, which shows that whether the Administrator was within the outer limits of his authority is a serious, disputed and material issue of fact.

The complaint alleges repeatedly that the proposed loan, and the proposed use of the loan funds, violate the central station service requirement of § 904. [23] The position of the defendants on these allegations is far from clear. The loan commitment letter of REA to AEC contains several conditions but none limiting use of the funds to the statutory purpose. As part of a petition to secure the state consent required by the third proviso of § 904 there were filed with the Department of Finance of the State of Alabama resolutions of the Board of Trustees of AEC. They call for construction and operation of "generating facilities and additional electric transmission, distribution and service lines, together [44] with all necessary appurtenances, in rural areas in describing the areas, and along such routes as shall be approved by the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration for the purpose of furnishing electric energy to consumers not receiving central station electric service." [24] Whether routes approved by the Administrator may be in non-rural areas, and whether "consumers not receiving central electric station service" may be in non-rural areas, depend on construction of the resolutions.

[45] A feasibility study was made for AEC by a consulting engineering firm, which on January 8, 1962 reported to AEC. [25] It makes no mention of the statutory [*687] standard of § 904. It does not state who the "additional members" are and where located.

The Power Company asserted before the Department of Finance of Alabama its contention that § 904 was being violated. The Department made no finding thereon, saying tersely that AEC's proposal "serves some public need and [46] is in the public interest." On limited review of the Department's action by certiorari the state circuit court quashed the order of the Finance Department as not supported by sufficient competent evidence. It found the § 904 purpose was not complied with. [26] On appeal the Alabama Supreme Court reversed and rendered because the

---

[23] "The Administrator is authorized and empowered . . . to make loans for rural electrification . . . for the purpose of financing the construction and operation of generating plants, electric transmission and distribution lines or systems for the furnishing of electric energy to persons in rural areas who are not receiving central station service."

[24] This petition also says that AEC furnishes electricity to named electric cooperatives and industrial plants and that it indirectly serves electric needs of over 25,000 farm families, 9,900 residential consumers, and in excess of 7,600 industrial and other users.

[25] The report says:

"Expansion of the power supply and transmission facilities of your Cooperative is required to meet the following objectives: (a) To serve increasing electric demands of member systems. (b) To provide improved service to additional members. (c) To reduce power costs. (d) To transmit power from Southeastern Power Administration (SEPA) to member cooperatives as preference customers. As a result of engineering studies which have been made, a plan of expansion is developed which will achieve the above objectives."

[26] "It is also undisputed that this multi-million dollar expenditure of Federal funds by AEC is not designed to deliver central station electric service to persons in rural areas who are not already receiving central station service or have it available on application." Alabama Power Co. v. Alabama Elec. Co-op., Inc., No. 3519 (Ala. Cir. Ct., July 9, 1963.)

circuit court had applied the wrong standard of review. Alabama Elec. Co-op., Inc. v. Alabama Power Co., 278 Ala. 123, 176 So.2d 483 (1964). It declined to pass on the central station service issue, pointing out, inter alia, that in the Kansas City case there had been a decision on the merits in the district court that the contract in question did not violate the central station provisions.

[47] When the case now before us reached the district court defendants filed the affidavit of Administrator Clapp. Pertinent extracts referring to the purposes of the loan are set out in the margin. [27] This is the same affidavit from which the [*688] statement of "policy reasons" quoted by the majority is taken.

[48] Possibly the affidavit is an effort to assert facts within the construction of "central station service" reached by the district court in the Kansas City case, Kansas City Power & Light Co. v. McKay, 115 F. Supp. 402 (D. Ct. D.C. 1953), that loan agreements were within the § 904 requirement when providing for a successive loan (to a cooperative originally financed by REA) to meet increasing power requirements of members presently being served and to supply the demand for service from new consumers in surrounding areas denied such service except for the assistance of REA. The difficulty is that some of the Administrator's statements of fact are controverted by the complaint and by affidavits filed in the district court by the Power Company, setting out that consumers of some of the member cooperatives said by Clapp to have been supplied with electric energy for the first time through electric facilities financed by REA in fact had been in the past, and are at present, supplied with central station service by the Power Company. A Power Company affidavit says: "As a matter of fact, the major portion of the proposed expanded project of Alabama Electric Cooperative [49] is to furnish electric service to persons who have been, were at the time the loan was approved and are now being supplied by central-station electric power generated in central stations of Alabama Power Company and Gulf Power Company."

---

[27] "Such facilities to be constructed with the proceeds were intended to be used to supply electric power needs of describing cooperatives . . . to enable them to furnish electric energy to their member-consumers who, being persons in rural areas not receiving central station service, were supplied with electric energy for the first time through electric facilities financed by REA, pursuant to 7 U.S.C. 901 et seq. . . ."

"In addition to the use of the facilities to supply the cooperatives described in the preceding paragraph concerning which plaintiff complains, such facilities were also intended to be used to serve the electric power needs of certain other Alabama and Florida electric distribution cooperatives, and of AEC, to enable them similarly to (1) furnish electric energy to their member-consumers who, being persons in rural areas not receiving central station service, were supplied with electric energy for the first time through electric facilities financed by REA pursuant to the RE Act; or (2) enable them to continue to furnish electric service to those of their consumers who are supplied electric energy through electric facilities acquired by AEC or a member thereof with the proceeds of loans made by REA, pursuant to the RE Act, as a necessary and incidental means of extending service to unserved persons in rural areas, and as a means of providing generating and transmission facilities to supply the needs of the consumers served by AEC and its members. All of the electric distribution cooperatives referred to above are members of AEC and are hereinafter collectively called 'Members'."

* * *

Elsewhere in his affidavit the Administrator states he approved the loan because it would effectuate the policies and purposes of the REA Act in these respects:

"(a) The loan will result in power cost savings to AEC and the Members, thus assisting them in rendering electric service to their consumers at the lowest cost consistent with sound economy and prudent management of their enterprises:

"(b) The loan will help protect the Members in their ability to make the most effective use of their REA-financed systems through continued service to all their existing member-consumers and extension of service on an area coverage basis to new retail electric loads which will arise in the service areas which the Members have developed through construction and acquisition of said systems and the extension of service therefrom;

"(c) By helping the Members make the most effective use of their REA-financed systems, the loan will enable them to further the achievement of the purposes and policies of the RE Act in Alabama by providing service to their approximately 81,000 member-consumers, and others in their service areas, who may be without central station service, under conditions which will make available the full benefits of electric service for the member-consumers and the service areas of the Members."

The district court in Kansas City made its findings after a three-weeks trial, expert case before us the district court made no findings. [28] From this record it is impossible to determine with any degree of assurance whether the proposed loans are within the Congressional authority granted by § 904. It is impossible to tell whether the Administrator has correctly acted in accord with the statutory purpose, or has gone beyond his outer periphery, or is in an intermediate zone in which he had made an administrative decision which though erroneous is not beyond his outer limits. [29]

[50] The factual issues drawn are not answered by case law that when the Administrator is acting within the periphery of his authority the national policy of aid to rural electrification prevents judicial review of his action.

Disposition of the case without hearing and findings of fact makes impossible another pertinent inquiry. The character and quality of acts done by the Administrator and their impact as restraints on trade and competition are relevant on several issues -- relating to immunity and standing -- whether there was Congressional intent to exempt acts of this general character and of this specific nature, and the weight to be given to the acts done in the balancing of rural electrification and antitrust policies. Valid determinations cannot be reached in this case without factual data that definitively presents just what it is that the Administrator and the private citizens have required, agreed upon and done, and the impact thereof on the relevant market. The issues cannot be resolved [*689] in a vacuum nor on the basis that the facts are undisputed, for they are not.

IV. Standing

On its antitrust theory the Power Company claims standing under Sections 4 [51] and 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.A. §§ 15 & 26, and asserts substantive violations of Section 3 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 14, and Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.A. §§ 1 & 2.

In concluding that there is no standing under the antitrust laws the majority, as did the district court, treat this case as one more in the line of Ickes, [30] [52] TVA, [31] Kansas City [32] and Central Louisiana. [33] Those cases do not reach the issue before us. They represent a succession of efforts by private utilities to establish standing by combining a charge that the government officer was making an unauthorized loan (or otherwise acting outside his authority) with a charge that the purpose or effect was to create competition for the plaintiff, this combination being then characterized as "unlawful competition" or "conspiracy." These efforts were rebuffed, because review of loans is for Congress and not the courts, and the private utilities have no legally protectible right to freedom from competition.

Those established principles have no application to a complaint by the private utility of actions which in themselves are monopolistic in nature and violate the antitrust laws. The actions here charged draw their characteristics of invalidity from their own nature and impact, not from efforts to create a synthesized legality. The Power Company

---

[28] The state circuit court, the only body yet to make a finding on the issue of central station service (other than the one-sentence finding by this court) was reversed but on other grounds. See note 26 supra and accompanying text.

[29] The Power Company contends that one of the reasons for requiring the exclusive dealing contracts arises from the fact that the central station provisions are being violated, i.e., that the contracts are the means adopted by the Administrator to eliminate the competition which will ensue between the distributing cooperatives and the existent suppliers. Like other factual issues, this cannot be resolved on motion to dismiss.

[30] Alabama Power Co. v. Ickes, 302 U.S. 464, 58 S. Ct. 300, 82 L. Ed. 374 (1938).

[31] Tennessee Elec. Power Co. v. TVA, 306 U.S. 118, 59 S. Ct. 366, 83 L. Ed. 543 (1939).

[32] Kansas City Power & Light Co. v. McKay, 96 U.S. App. D.C. 273, 225 F.2d 924 (D.C. Cir. 1955), reversing 115 F. Supp. 402 (D.D.C. 1953), cert. denied, 350 U.S. 884, 76 S. Ct. 137, 100 L. Ed. 780 (1955).

[33] Rural Electrification Administration v. Central Louisiana Elec. Co., 354 F.2d 859 (5th Cir. 1966), reversing 236 F. Supp. 271 (W.D. La. 1964), cert. denied, 385 U.S. 815, 87 S. Ct. 34, 17 L. Ed. 2d 54 (196).

does not complain of the "mere competition" of Central Louisiana or the lawful competition of TVA and Kansas City but of unlawful competition, [53] exclusive dealing contracts and coercion. There is no national policy to create monopoly, or unlawful competition, or engage in coercion, in the name of competition. "Competition" is not a magic word which when uttered dispenses with consideration of what as a matter of fact is being done and what as a matter of law and national policy are the consequences.

Ickes was a suit for general equitable relief not under the antitrust laws. The Supreme Court declined to enjoin agreements and grants for municipal electric systems "on the sole and detached ground that the Administrator lacks constitutional and statutory authority to make them, and that the resulting moneys, which the municipalities have clear authority to take, will be used by the municipalities in lawful, albeit destructive, competition with petitioner." The Court referred to the finding of the district court that the contracts did not require the municipalities to eliminate competition or designate the source from which they must purchase power. The Court referred numerous times to the competition as lawful, noted that there was no conspiracy and made the oft-repeated dictum, "If conspiracy or fraud or malice or coercion [54] were involved a different case would be presented." [34]

TVA also was not filed under the procedural provisions of the antitrust laws but was for general equitable relief, and on the theory public power competition was illegal because it injured property rights represented by the private franchises. [*690] The Supreme Court pointed out that possession of the franchises did not render competition illegal and conferred no contractual or property right to be free of competition. There had been specific findings by the district court that the Tennessee Valley Authority had not conspired or coerced. [35] [55] The Court made clear the distinction between unlawful conspiracy and lawful cooperation by government officials leading to lawful competition. [36]

Kansas City is inapplicable for two reasons. First, no cause of action was asserted under the antitrust laws (see 225 F.2d at 936). The suit was for declaratory judgment based on the Rural Electrification Act [37] and the Flood Control Act of 1944, [38] neither of which is a statutory provision designed to protect competition. [39] Second, the nature and quality of the acts charged were such that as a matter of law there was no "conspiracy." Kansas City, as had Ickes, teaches that the spectrum [56] of dealings between private citizens and government officials is not made a "conspiracy" by the fact alone that the official exceeds his authority. In neither case was there action which carried within itself the seeds of restraint or monopoly. [40]

---

[34] In Duke Power Co. v. Greenwood County, 302 U.S. 485, 58 S. Ct. 306, 82 L. Ed. 381 (1938), decided the same day, the proposed competition had been held by the district court to be lawful, and there was no finding of conspiracy.

[35] "The District Court finds that the Authority has not indulged in coercion, duress, fraud, or misrepresentation in procuring contracts with municipalities, cooperatives or other purchasers of power; has not acted with any malicious or malevolent motive; and has not conspired with municipalities or other purchasers of power. The record justifies these findings." 306 U.S. at 145, 83 L. Ed. at 553.

[36] "Cooperation by two federal officials, one acting under a statute whereby funds are provided for the erection of municipal plants, and the other under a statute authorizing the production of electricity and its sale to such plants, in competition with the appellants, does not spell conspiracy to injure their business. As the court below held, such cooperation does not involve unlawful concert, plan, or design, or cooperation to commit an unlawful act or to commit acts otherwise lawful with the intent to violate a statute." 306 U.S. at 146-47, 83 L. Ed. at 554.

[37] 7 U.S.C.A. § 901 et seq.

[38] 33 U.S.C.A. § 7011 et seq.; 16 U.S.C.A. § 825S et seq.

[39] See the discussion of Hardin v. Kentucky Utilities Co., 390 U.S. 1, 88 S. Ct. 651, 19 L. Ed. 2d 787 (1968), infra.

[40] This is the point which Judge Washington in Kansas City seeks to make in his reference to Ickes. It is the same point made by Judge Coleman in Central Louisiana, that lawful competition plus excess of statutory authority do not constitute the kind of "conspiracy" the Court had in mind in Ickes. 354 F.2d at 866.

Central Louisiana was a suit for temporary injunction to prevent the REA from consummating a loan. It did not involve [57] standing under Sections 4 and 16 of the Clayton Act. In the district court Judge Dawkins held plaintiff had made out a prima facie case of illegal competition and coercion and granted the temporary injunction. On appeal this court reversed, holding that there was not raised anything more than "mere economic competition made possible by governmental action." It reinforced this conclusion by the further statement that "their appellees only standing for this this that the loan was illegally made and would cause illegal consequences is their natural opposition to having territory invaded which heretofore has been de facto their sole domain but in which they have no exclusive right." 354 F.2d at 865.

Central Louisiana dealt with invasion of the private utility's territory by a "mere competitor." We deal in this case with ouster of the private utility from a market by a borrower under a monopolistic contract. Whether exclusive dealing contracts standing alone violated the antitrust laws, and whether as a part of the overall dealings they violated the antitrust laws and thereby caused the overall dealings to be in violation, were matters not decided in Central Louisiana [58] . There are references to 35-year requirement contracts (see 354 F.2d at 863) but no such contracts had been executed (although [*691] it was recognized the Administrator would require them) and neither AEC nor the distributor cooperatives were parties to the suit. [41]

[59] Rural Electrification Administration v. Northern States Power Co., 373 F.2d 686 (8th Cir. 1967), considers standing under the Administrative Procedure Act and under the REA Act itself. It does not reach the antitrust issue.

This brings us to the latest chapter. In Kentucky Utilities Co. v. TVA, 375 F.2d 403 (6th Cir. 1966), rev'd sub nom. on other grounds, Hardin v. Kentucky Utilities Co., 390 U.S. 1, 88 S. Ct. 651, 19 L. Ed. 2d 787, (1968), the private power company sought an injunction restraining TVA, its distributor (an electric cooperative), and mayors of cities concerned, who were charged with a conspiracy by which the cooperative would take over the supply of electric power to the cities in violation of 16 U.S.C.A. § 831 n - 4(a) forbidding TVA from making new contracts to supply power outside the area for which it or its distributors were the primary source of power on July 1, 1957. The district court found against the private power company on the merits but held it had standing to sue. 237 F. Supp. 502 (E.D. Tenn. 1964). The Court of Appeals affirmed on standing to sue, pointing out that [60] the court did not ask a decree protecting it from all competition but from violation of the statute, which had been enacted to protect established utilities from intrusion by TVA into areas where such utilities already were established. Of significance on the matter of standing to sue under the antitrust laws, the court distinguished Ickes, TVA and Kansas City:

> All of them involve efforts by private utilities to get court relief from the competition of publicly owned or supported power facilities which were creatures of the Federal Government's entry into the power business. The right to sue and the asserted ground for relief in each case were bottomed upon broad claims of unconstitutionality of the federal power program, illegality in the means whereby competitors of private utilities had or would obtain the funds to set up their operations and other charges of illegality in the establishment of the plaintiffs' competitors. Such plaintiffs were held to be without standing to sue. Their surface analogy is immediately dissipated by the fact that in none of them was the plaintiff's suit planted on a federal statute enacted specifically for the protection of the involved [61] plaintiff. The plaintiff utilities did not have exclusive franchises, and the cases hold that where there is no constitutional or common law right to be free of [41] About as close as the court came to considering the contracts is the statement (354 F.2d at 864):

---

> "The appellees have been and are now doing business with cooperatives established and financed under the REA Act. The record shows no intention or attempt to abrogate existing contracts between the parties. Appellees do not have a Constitutionally guaranteed, unrestricted privilege to engage in business free of competition."

If this means that exclusive dealing contracts violate the anti trust laws only if they abrogate existing contracts between one of the parties thereto and others, then it is wrong and the quicker corrected the better. The right of the private utility is that it not be foreclosed from the market, which may or may not involve breach of an existent contract.

> competition and where the hurting competition is valid as competition, the courts will not restrain it because of some antecedent illegality in its creation or in its obtaining of funds.

The Supreme Court affirmed on standing to sue, distinguishing "lawful competition" cases (including TVA), in which "competitive injury provided no basis for standing . . . . simply because the statutory and constitutional requirements that the plaintiff sought to enforce were in no way concerned with protecting against competitive injury," [*692] from the contrasting cases in which "the particular statutory provision invoked does reflect a legislative purpose to protect a competitive interest, the injured competitor has standing to require compliance with that provision." The power company had standing because it "is thus in the class which § 15d is designed to protect." Kansas City was characterized as holding that an injured competitor cannot sue to enforce statutory requirements not designed to protect competitors in [62] that case not the antitrust laws but the REA Act and the Flood Control Act of 1944.

It seems to me beyond rational question that the antitrust laws were designed to include competitors as among those protected. As much is conceded by REA in its latest brief:

> We stress, however, that, if Alabama Power Co. could not bring suit, it would be solely because of an absence of a legally cognizable injury to it and not because it was the Alabama Power Co. In short, contrary to appellant's implication, we have never suggested that the principles governing its standing to sue are any different than those applicable to other parties.

Specifically, § 16 of the Clayton Act provides for the right of the private party to sue for injunctive relief against threatened loss or damage by violation of the antitrust laws.

Insofar as the antitrust laws are concerned, this court need not pause on the inquiry -- over which the parties do mighty battle in their briefs -- of attack on the loan v. attack on the requirement contracts as an incident of the loan. The Power Company has standing to attack the contracts standing alone, whether or not the Administrator is a formal party thereto, [63] and to attack the broader range of activities of which the contracts are a part and in which the parties defendant are charged as participants.

I agree with my brothers that REA is an instrument chosen by Congress to bring abundant and low cost power to our rural citizens and is not just another utility. But that characterization does not answer whether it is to be given an implied immunity to deal free of antitrust law and national antitrust policy.

United States v. Olympia Provision & Baking Co.

United States District Court for the Southern District of New York

April 5, 1968

No. 62 Civil 2031

Reporter

282 F. Supp. 819 *; 1968 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12510 ; 68 L.R.R.M. 2024; 57 Lab. Cas. (CCH) P12,674; 1968 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,400

United States of America, Plaintiff v. Olympia Provision & Baking Company, Inc. et al., Defendants distributors, manufacturers, frankfurters, customers, antitrust, employees, defendant-union, discounts, exemption, drivers, independent contractor, distributor-members, distributed, salesmen, Sherman Act, conspired, prices, routes, local member, merchandise, conditions, membership, boycott, organizations, conspiracy, increases, products, billed, trucks

Core Terms

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN1[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

The first and second sections of the Sherman Act embrace every conceivable act which could possibly come within the spirit or purpose of the prohibitions of the law, without regard to the garb in which such acts were clothed. From this broadbased coverage, Congress has carved exceptions.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Labor > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN2[] Exemptions & Immunities, Labor

See 15 U.S.C.S. § 17.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Scope > Exemptions

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Labor > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Labor > Statutory Exemptions

HN3[] Scope, Exemptions

15 U.S.C.S. § 17 of the antitrust law gives labor no grant of a blanket exemption from the Sherman Act. Labor organizations can not escape antitrust prohibitions where unions depart from normal and legitimate objects. A labor union is exempt from the operation of the federal antitrust laws provided that it acts unilaterally, in the pursuit of its own self-interests rather than in combination or conspiracy with non-labor groups and provided further that its activities be in furtherance of a subject matter of immediate and legitimate union concern, such as wages, hours and working conditions, and not in furtherance of matters which are only of indirect concern to the union, such as prices and other marketing factors.

Labor & Employment Law > Employment Relationships > At Will Employment > Definition of Employees

Torts > Vicarious Liability > Independent Contractors > General Overview

Labor & Employment Law > Employment Relationships > At Will Employment > Definition of Employers

Labor & Employment Law > Employment Relationships > Independent Contractors

Torts > Vicarious Liability > Independent Contractors

HN4[] At Will Employment, Definition of Employees

To distinguish independent contractors from employees, the usual test is found in the nature and the amount of control reserved by the person for whom the work is done. Furthermore, even complete control over desired results may be insufficient to transform independent contractors into employees. An employer has a right to exercise such control over an independent contractor as is necessary to secure the performance of the contract according to its terms, in order to accomplish the results contemplated by the parties in making the contract, without thereby creating such contractor an employee. The question of whether control exists sufficient to characterize contractors as employees must be decided upon the particular facts of each case and no one fact is determinative; the totality of the circumstances must be considered.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Labor > General Overview

Labor & Employment Law > Collective Bargaining & Labor Relations > Strikes & Work Stoppages

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Unfair Labor Practices > Employer Violations > Interference With Protected Activities

HN5[] Exemptions & Immunities, Labor

Only where union-imposed restraints upon the labor market directly yield immediate benefits to the legitimate interests of labor organizations, and where the relative impact upon the product market is indirect and consequential, have such activities been protected. In these cases, an implicit balancing of interests has permitted the effectuation of labor policies without doing violence to antitrust considerations. On the other hand, where union activities have been aimed directly at commercial competition (such as price fixing or boycotts) antitrust considerations have prevailed despite the labor interests sought to be protected or advanced thereby. Furthermore, agreements between unions and a non-labor organization for anti-competitive purposes need not be explicit but may be inferred from activities and surrounding circumstances when there is clear proof of union participation or authorization.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN6[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

It is elementary that price-fixing is illegal per se. Effect, rather than form, is the determining element. It also is elementary that boycotts and attempted boycotts are illegal.

Administrative Law > Separation of Powers > Legislative Controls > Implicit Delegation of Authority

Business & Corporate Law > Agency Relationships > Authority to Act > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Acts & Mental States > Mens Rea > Knowledge

HN7[] Legislative Controls, Implicit Delegation of Authority

Explicit authority to a union's agents and officials need not be granted; such agency may be implied.

Judges: [1] Levet, D.J.

Opinion by: LEVET

Opinion

[*820] LEVET, D.J.:

This civil antitrust action originally named two other defendants, to wit, Sabrett Food Products Corp., and Superior Frankfurter, Inc. However, the action as against said defendants was severed by order made orally in open court on [*821] November 8, 1967. Subsequently, a consent decree as to each of said defendants was signed and entered on December 18, 1967. Olympia Provision & Baking Co., Inc. ("Olympia") defaulted upon call of the case for trial; said default was duly ordered on November 8, 1967 and at that time said defendant waived any further notice under Rule 55, F.R. Civ. P. (4, 5; [1] Court's Ex. 1) The case then proceeded to trial against said defaulting defendant Olympia and against the above-mentioned union (hereinafter designated as "Local 627").

The general nature of this action is described by plaintiff as follows: [2]

> "The Complaint, filed June 7, 1962, alleges that the defendants entered into a combination and conspiracy to restrain and monopolize interstate trade and commerce in violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. The substantial terms of said combination and conspiracy were that, since at least 1949, the defendants and co-conspirators combined and conspired to fix and maintain prices, terms, and conditions of sale of frankfurters, to allocate customers and to boycott distributors not members of Local 627."

The case was tried before the court without a jury.

[1] Unless otherwise designated, numbers in parentheses refer to pages in the stenographer's minutes of the trial.

After hearing the testimony of the parties, examining the exhibits, the pleadings and the proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law submitted by counsel, this court makes the following Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law:

Findings of Fact

1. Local 627 is a voluntary association with its principal office located at 27 Union Square, New York, N. Y. From 1949 to approximately 1960 it maintained offices at 799 Broadway, New York, N. Y. It is a labor organization duly chartered by Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen of North America, AFL-CIO.

2. The membership of Local 627 is composed, in part, [3] of persons known as distributors, who are also known as agent-distributors and agent drivers. From 1956 through 1962, Local 627 had approximately 2,000 members. Membership included approximately 300 persons employed as drivers, approximately 1,300 persons employed as salesmen-drivers or salesmen-distributors, and approximately 350 distributors, of whom less than 30 bought and resold the products of Sabrett Food Products Corp., Olympia Provision & Baking Co., Inc. and Superior Frankfurter, Inc. (1470, 1475-1476; Pl. Ex. 243, p. 47)

3. The following distributors have been members of Local 627 during all or part of the period from 1949 to 1962: Charles Alfano, Gus Avezidas, Joe Banner, M. Berger, Jordan Feinberg, Seymour Feinstein, Benjamin Goodman, Franklin B. Goodman, Ben Grupper, George Harris, Louis Kantrowitz, Charles Katcher, Ed Kaufman, John Lexis, Frank Masset, Fred Miller, Louis Pagliuca, Rocco Pagnotta, James Papalexis, Gus Pappas, John Passas, James Rinbis, William Schlesinger. (30-31; Pl. Ex. 242)

4. Morris Horn has served as Business Manager of Local 627 continuously from 1940 to 1962, having been elected to this office by the membership of Local 627 every three years; [4] in 1962, when the title of this office was changed to Secretary-Treasurer, he was elected as Secretary-Treasurer and has served as such since. (Pl. Ex. 243, p. 5; 561-566) Horn, from 1940, has served as the chief executive officer of Local 627. (565-566) Rudolph Block, from 1949 to 1957, Milton Hyman, from 1949 to approximately 1962, and Isidore Jaffe, from 1949 to approximately 1962, were officers, agents or employees of Local 627. Estelle Gilman was employed by Local 627 as Office Manager from 1948 through 1962. (637-638)

5. Local 627 has, since at least 1949, operated, through trustees appointed by [*822] it, a separate trust fund for welfare benefits for its members, known as the Provision Salesmen & Distributors Union, Local 627, Welfare Trust Fund ("Welfare Fund"). The Board of Trustees consists of nine members, almost all of whom are members of Local 627's Executive Board. (29, 641-643, 649-651)

6. By agreement with Local 627, Sabrett, Olympia and Superior made regular and continuous payments to this Welfare Fund until at least 1962. (29-30, 36, 609, 629-630, 632-645, 878, 880-881, 928-931, 1034-1035, 1057, 1061-1062; Pl. Ex. 243, pp. 42-43; Pl. Exs. 10, 11, 12)

[5] 7. Sabrett is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of New Jersey and has its principal place of business in Jersey City, New Jersey. Sabrett, since 1949, has manufactured frankfurters in Jersey City, New Jersey, and also since 1949 has sold and distributed frankfurters in the State of New York, including the Southern District of New York.

8. Ferdinand Frankel was Vice-President of Sabrett from 1948 until approximately 1957. Julius Frankel has been an officer of Sabrett since approximately 1956. Gori L. Cafora was employed by Sabrett as Sales Manager from approximately 1944 to approximately 1964.

9. Superior is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of New York and it had its principal place of business in the Bronx, New York. Superior, commencing at least in 1949, manufactured, sold and distributed frankfurters in the State of New York, including the Southern District of New York. Superior ceased to do business in about 1964, the corporation has been dissolved; its plant was demolished. (1094, 1095)

10. Harry Gilman was President of Superior since approximately 1949. Harry Staub was Secretary-Treasurer of Superior [6] from 1947 until 1962.

11. Olympia is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of New York, and, during the period from 1949 to approximately 1962, it had its principal place of business in the Bronx, New York. From 1949 to approximately 1962, Olympia manufactured, sold and distributed frankfurters and transacted business in the State of New York, including the Southern District of New York. Olympia is no longer under operation; it sold its plant to a division of Zion Foods about 1961 or 1962 and apparently has not since manufactured or sold frankfurters. (942-943)

12. Christ Papalexis was President of Olympia from 1946 to 1957. Gregory Papalexis was General Manager of Olympia from 1946 to 1957.

13. From 1949 to 1962, Sabrett, Olympia and Superior manufactured, sold and distributed frankfurters to house account customers which consisted primarily of refreshment stands, luncheonettes and street vendors and to distributors who resold such frankfurters to the same types of customers. (35, 44, 105-107, 180-181, 424, 426-427, 433, 541, 553, 555-556, 654-655, 659, 714, 717, 719, 793, 820-821, 853-857, 994-996, 1029-1031, 1038-1039, 1159-1161, 1168, 1206, [7] 1210, 1213, 1216-1218, 1348-1358, 1384-1389; Pl. Ex. 261, pp. 6-14)

14. Sabrett, Olympia and Superior from 1949 until at least 1962 were engaged in interstate and foreign commerce in the manufacture, sale and distribution of frankfurters, and the amount of such commerce was substantial. (34, 82, 488, 543-544, 717-719, 739, 798, 847-850, 1026-1030, 1153, 1168, 1205-1219, 1348-1349)

15. Part of the frankfurters manufactured by Sabrett, Superior and Olympia were delivered in the metropolitan New York area by salesmen, also known as "house drivers." (853-857, 1032, 1212, 1213)

16. The Sabrett, Olympia and Superior salesmen delivered frankfurters by truck to customers or "stops" on their route - such customers being billed by their respective employer and known as "house accounts." The salesmen received as compensation a base salary [*823] and a percentage commission based on the gross selling price of the products delivered by them. (856-857, 980-981, 1032, 1191-1193)

17. Sabrett salesmen were charged out for the frankfurters they picked up daily at the Sabrett plant and were responsible for either the return of the merchandise or the moneys received from customers. Salesmen [8] were not responsible for bad debts of the customers unless they had extended credit in disregard of specific instructions of their employer. (1160-1163, 1174-1175, 1181, 1188, 1368-1376)

18. During the years 1956 to 1962, Sabrett salesmen operated only in the State of New York, and they are members of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters. In New Jersey, frankfurters manufactured by Sabrett were distributed exclusively by non-union distributors. (1218-1222)

19. The Olympia and Superior salesmen were members of Local 802, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, and the terms and conditions of their employment were set forth in written collective bargaining agreements between Local 802 and their respective employer. (852-853, 1032, 1081)

20. With the exception of those non-union Sabrett distributors which operated in New Jersey, distributors for Sabrett, Olympia and Superior were members of Local 627. (922, 1031-1032, 1280-1281)

21. The distributors picked up frankfurters daily at the manufacturers' plants and, using their own or rented trucks, they delivered the frankfurters to customers on their routes. Frankfurters distributed in this manner were charged out daily, [9] and the distributors were billed weekly by the manufacturers. (231-234, 707, 709, 718, 748-749, 937-938, 1033)

22. Originally, when distributors of Sabrett, Superior and Olympia frankfurters began operations as such, all drove their own trucks and performed all the labor necessary (50, 342-343); most of the operators continued to operate without employees or helpers. (18, 706-708, 740-741, 749, 1398; DU Ex. 116, p. 31)

23. In the 1950's, a few distributors initiated or acquired additional routes and, in some instances, formed partnerships or corporations which employed drivers. These distributors entered into collective bargaining contracts with Local 627 which covered their employees. (50, 57, 74-79, 367, 413-414, 422, 429, 431-432, 489-491, 518, 992-994, 1385-1386; DU Ex. 115)

24. Occasionally, distributors delivered frankfurters to certain house accounts of the manufacturers. Such distributors received as compensation a credit or commission computed on the basis of the poundage delivered; and, in the case of Sabrett, some house accounts were serviced by distributors for a flat weekly compensation. (47, 48, 69, 343, 364-366, 751, 938, 1035-1036, 1076, 1219, 1318-1319, [10] 1403-1404)

25. Sabrett, Superior and Olympia accepted telephone orders from distributors' customers, communicated such orders to distributors without charge. (371, 756, 1036-1037, 1403; DU Ex. 116, pp. 32-33)

26. If a distributor was out delivering frankfurters and a customer called in with an order to be filled that day, the manufacturer, as an accommodation, would have delivery made to the customer by a house driver. The distributor was charged only for the actual merchandise, not for any cost of delivery. (1079-1080)

27. Certain Sabrett, Superior and Olympia distributors billed on company letterheads and received checks made out to the company which they gave the company in payment for merchandise distributed by them. Sabrett house drivers also had stops which they billed and for the collection of which they were responsible. (659-661, 667-668, 740, 757, 761, 1396-1397; DU Ex. 116, p. 33)

28. When a distributor was ill or incapacitated, the supplier would usually have his route serviced by a house driver as an accommodation, without cost to [*824] the distributor. Lists of distributors' customers were kept for this purpose. (756, 1037, 1317)

29. In at least [11] one instance, Sabrett furnished a distributor with free uniforms and cleaning service. (770-771)

30. In at least one instance, Sabrett refused to deal with a distributor who owed the company money for merchandise billed to him. (837-841)

31. The distributors operated as individuals, partnerships or corporations. (51, 74-75, 175, 180, 422-423, 427, 664-665, 739, 1384)

32. The distributors purchased frankfurters from the manufacturers for resale to the distributors' own customers and for the distributors' own account and profit. (36, 44-46, 55, 59-60, 67-71, 105, 179, 182, 187-188, 206, 426-427, 429-430, 433, 659-663, 668-671, 699, 709, 716-717, 719, 740, 794-795, 1033, 1251, 1321, 1392-1393, 1395-1398, 1416-1417, 1548; Pl. Ex. 261, pp. 8-9)

33. The distributors purchased products, such as mustard and condiments from sources other than the frankfurter manufacturers for resale to their own customers for their own account and profit. (72, 181, 230, 433-434, 717)

34. The distributors declared income from the conduct of their businesses and paid federal, state and local taxes thereon as self-employed individuals or as partnerships or corporations. (52, 64, 189, 547-548, 663, [12] 671-672, 739; Pl. Exs. 244, 245)

35. The distributors did not receive a wage or salary from the manufacturers with whom they dealt nor were any taxes withheld by the manufacturers on their behalf. (35-36, 1164-1166)

36. The distributors purchased frankfurters from more than one manufacturer and occasionally changed manufacturers. (164, 180-181, 376-377, 880, 1018-1019, 1323-1324, 1352-1358, 1390, 1396; Pl. Ex. 261, pp. 12-13)

37. The distributors owned or leased the trucks used in the conduct of their businesses and paid all expenses in connection with the maintenance and operation thereof. (44, 56, 70, 76, 106, 180-181, 188, 428-429, 659, 672, 713, 794, 1034, 1410)

38. The distributors established their own prices with their own customers. (68-70, 208-209, 231, 236-237, 518-519, 1321-1323) They also established the terms and conditions of sale with their own customers and suffered almost all bad-debt losses incurred in such sales to their own customers. (49-50, 68, 183, 695, 708, 742, 796, 1416)

39. The distributors determined their own hours and days of work, consistent with the needs and demands of their own customers. (37, 58-59, 80-81, 187, 235-236, 518, 695, 741, [13] 797, 1033-1034, 1399)

40. The distributors purchased and sold their customer routes, which included substantial goodwill. (50-51, 79, 106, 177-178, 186, 657-658, 713, 716, 1386, 1409-1410, 1412)

41. As an accommodation to the distributors, the suppliers allowed return of defective or unsold frankfurters for credit. In practice, however, much unsold merchandise was retained by the distributors in their refrigerated trucks for future sales. (371, 708-709, 768, 1078, 1380-1381, 1395-1396, 1417-1420; DU Ex. 116, p. 34)

42. Except for the fact that Sabrett reserved for itself, as a matter of policy, the right to observe the operations of a distributor and approve the qualifications of a distributor who might succeed to the route of an existing distributor, the distributors were not under the dominion, direction or control of their suppliers in the conduct of their business operations. (36, 58-59, 80-81, 105, 189, 421, 695, 702-703, 709, 741, 755-756, 797, 821, 1033-1034, 1307-1308, 1314, 1323-1324, 1333-1334, 1347, 1377-1379)

43. The distributors are not employees of the frankfurter manufacturers. They are independent businessmen who contracted with their customer accounts [14] to supply goods.

44. In or about 1946, membership in Local 627 was sought by the distributors, [*825] whose primary goal was to attain larger profits. The distributors were not solicited by the union (574-578), and at that time there were no other frankfurter distributors in Local 627. (583-584)

45. During the period between 1940 and 1946, the union leadership had no information whatever that any operation of the frankfurter distributors was affecting the welfare of the other members of Local 627. (584)

46. The frankfurter manufacturers' use of distributors, during the period immediately preceding the time the distributors joined Local 627, had no adverse effect upon the wages and working conditions of their employee-drivers, or in any way represented an attempt to evade the union wage scales of such employees.

47. Some degree of competition for customer accounts existed between distributors who purchased frankfurters primarily from one manufacturer and those who purchased from other manufacturers. In addition, the distributors occasionally gained and lost customer accounts to and from manufacturers, other than their own, who serviced customers through salaried house [15] drivers. (190-194, 199, 202-211, 236-238, 302-306, 317, 385-390, 409, 538-543, 553-556, 750, 772-778, 1399)

48. At times, for convenience and efficiency, the manufacturers turned over routes and customer accounts to distributors (43, 334-337, 355-356, 361, 750, 793-794, 820-821, 1256-1257, 1315-1316, 1350-1352, 1387-1394); and occasionally, customers of the distributors were turned over to the manufacturers for servicing as house accounts. (767, 1308-1314)

49. The frankfurter manufacturers never attempted to set their employee-drivers and distributors against one another for the purpose of affecting the wages or working conditions of either group at any time during the period in question.

50. Wages of the house drivers employed by frankfurter manufacturers were periodically increased during the period between 1946 and 1962 (415, 1036-1037, 1082, 1222; DU Ex. 115); but such wage increases were not related in any manner whatever to the activities of Local 627 on behalf of the distributors.

51. The proof is clear that there was no legitimate labor objective served through the membership of the distributors in Local 627.

52. Commencing in 1949, when the distributors sought [16] and received admission to membership in Local 627, the distributors conspired among themselves and with Morris Horn of the union to secure from the manufacturers increases in the discounts allowed. Between 1949 and 1956 the minimum discount to the Sabrett, Superior and Olympia distributors was increased, in many instances, to at least 5 cents per pound. (38, 134, 165, 251-259, 260-262, 274, 461, 510-513, 560, 808, 819-820, 874, 881-882, 1040-1042, 1046, 1129-1132, 1143-1144, 1445-1449; Pl. Ex. 243, pp. 62-63; Pl. Ex. 261, pp. 47-48)

53. In or about August 1956, the distributors together with Morris Horn conspired and successfully obtained a further minimum discount from the manufacturers, which raised the minimum discount for all distributors to 8 cents per pound. (37-38, 165-167, 174, 262-268, 271-277, 394-395, 452-456, 459-463, 466, 477-479, 486, 493, 551-552, 614-625, 724-730, 732-735, 737, 798-803, 803-809, 819-820, 843-844, 881-911, 959-963, 1067, 1101, 1506-1508; Pl. Exs. 3, 4, 16, 17, 189, 190, 192, 193, 220; Pl. Ex. 243, pp. 33-34, 53-57)

54. In connection with the increased discount concession which was extracted in 1956, Local 627, represented by Horn, conspired with [17] Sabrett, Superior and Olympia, whereby it was agreed that each manufacturer would increase its list selling price by 5 cents per pound. Subsequently, in furtherance of this conspiracy, the list selling prices of such manufacturers were so increased. (277-279, 719-736, 808-809, 819-820, 890-911, 961-962; Pl. Exs. 4, 16, 17, 24; Pl. Ex. 261, pp. 48-60)

[*826] 55. During the period from 1949 to 1962, Local 627 and its distributor-members doing business with Sabrett, Olympia and Superior conspired and attempted to obtain an agreement with such manufacturers pursuant to which the manufacturers would boycott and refuse to deal with non-union distributors. Their efforts in this endeavor were largely successful. (30-31, 36-38, 95, 108-109, 425, 606-607, 672-680, 719, 720, 795, 855-856, 868, 871, 874, 922-928, 948-949, 1002-1008, 1011-1012, 1029-1032, 1159-1160, 1210-1211, 1280-283, 1476, 1496-1497, 1546-1547; Pl. Exs. 10, 11, 12, 242; Pl. Ex. 243, pp. 47-48, 62; Pl. Ex. 261, pp. 11-13, 18-19)

56. At all relevant times Local 627 had knowledge of and acquiesced in the acts of its members and agents, and participated in the conspiracy herein. (134, 138-141, 149-152, 165-167, 169-172, [18] 174, 252-259, 262-265, 275-277, 290-294, 296-298, 300-302, 318-324, 388, 407-409, 448, 452-456, 464, 467-471, 477-479, 481-482, 510-513, 535-538, 561-567, 624, 639-643, 723-730, 732, 798-802, 808-815, 825, 843-844, 862-871, 873-876, 878, 880-911, 922-931, 935-936, 946-947, 955-956, 959-963, 970-973, 1002-1008, 1018-1022, 1049-1062, 1132-1133, 1137, 1143-1144, 1278-1280, 1282, 1337-1341, 1367, 1383, 1414-1416, 1445-1459, 1461, 1463, 1465, 1474-1476, 1492-1496, 1502-1504, 1506-1508; Pl. Ex. 243, pp. 3-5, 21-30, 33-34, 42-44, 49-54, 56-57, 62, 71-73; Pl. Ex. 261, pp. 19-21, 34-35, 38-44, 48-54, 60-63, 165, 175, 177, 179-180; Pl. Exs. 3, 5, 10, 11, 12)

57. Plaintiff has not shown by a fair preponderance of the credible evidence that any agreement among the various distributors or among the distributors, Local 627 and the manufacturers existed to the effect that customers could be allocated among the various parties in return for promises not to compete.

Discussion

A. The Labor Exemption

In general, HN1[] the first and second sections of the Sherman Act embrace "* * * every conceivable act which could possibly come within the spirit or purpose of the prohibitions of the law, without regard [19] to the garb in which such acts were clothed." United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U.S. 106, 181, 55 L. Ed. 663, 31 S. Ct. 632 (1911). From this broadbased coverage, Congress has carved exceptions. 15 USC § 17 states, in substance:

> HN2[] "The labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce. Nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor * * * organizations, * * * or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof * * *."

As early as 1921, however, it was recognized that HN3[] this section of the antitrust law gave labor no grant of a blanket exemption from the Sherman Act. In Duplex Printing Press v. Deering, 254 U.S. 443, 65 L. Ed. 349, 41 S. Ct. 172 (1921), the Supreme Court ruled that labor organizations could not escape antitrust prohibitions "* * * where [unions] depart from * * * normal and legitimate objects * * *." 254 U.S. at 469. See also United Mine Workers v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657, 14 L. Ed. 2d 626, 85 S. Ct. 1585 (1965). Recently, in an extensive and scholarly opinion, which takes into account the manifold developments [20] affecting the nature and extent of labor's antitrust exemption since its inception, Judge Wilson summarized that:

> "* * * a labor union is exempt from the operation of the federal antitrust laws provided that it acts unilaterally, in the pursuit of its own self-interests rather than in combination or conspiracy with non-labor groups and provided further that its activities be in furtherance of a subject matter of immediate and legitimate union concern, such as wages, hours and working conditions, and not in furtherance of matters which are only [*827] of indirect concern to the union, such as prices and other marketing factors." Ramsey v. United Mine Workers of America, 265 F. Supp. 388, 398 (E.D. Tenn. 1967).

Thus, at the outset, the applicability of labor's antitrust exemption to Local 627's activities on behalf of its distributor members is at issue, and, based upon the clear proof adduced, I conclude that the defendant's acts are not exempt.

The distributors represented by Local 627 are independent businessmen who contracted both with their own customers and with the manufacturers to purchase and supply merchandise. The distributors are not employees of the manufacturers.

[21] HN4[] To distinguish independent contractors from employees, the "usual test * * * is found in the nature and the amount of control reserved by the person for whom the work is done." Taylor v. Local No. 7, International Union of Journeymen Horseshoers, 353 F.2d 593, 596 (4th Cir. 1965), cert. denied, 384 U.S. 969, 16 L. Ed. 2d 681, 86 S. Ct. 1859 (1966); see also Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Rahn, 132 U.S. 518, 33 L. Ed. 440, 10 S. Ct. 175 (1889). Furthermore, even complete control over desired results may be insufficient to transform independent contractors into employees.

> "* * * an employer has a right to exercise such control over an independent contractor as is necessary to secure the performance of the contract according to its terms, in order to accomplish the results contemplated by the parties in making the contract, without thereby creating such contractor an employee." NLRB v. Steinberg, 182 F.2d 850, 856-857 (5th Cir. 1950).

The question of whether control exists sufficient to characterize contractors as employees must be decided upon the particular facts of each case and no one fact is determinative; "the totality of the circumstances must be considered. " Taylor [22] v. Local No. 7, supra at 596; NLRB v. A. S. Abell Co., 327 F.2d 1, 5 (4th Cir. 1964).

By reason of the facts appearing in Findings 21 through 43, the proof is clear that the distributor-members of Local 627 are properly characterized as independent contractors rather than employees of the manufacturers. Those instances in which the manufacturers may have given some aid to the distributors or exerted some control over distributors' actions do not overcome the effect of the overwhelming evidence which illustrates the distributors' independent status.

That the distributor-members of Local 627 were independent contractors rather than employees does not, standing alone, remove the actions of the defendant-union from the protective shield of labor's antitrust exemption. See, e.g., Milk Wagon Drivers' Union, Local No. 753 v. Lake Valley Farm Products, Inc., 311 U.S. 91, 85 L. Ed. 63, 61 S. Ct. 122 (1940). However, since a fundamental conflict exists between the policies which underlie labor and antitrust legislation, the activities of labor organizations on behalf of those of their members who have the status of independent contractors must be closely scrutinized before antitrust exemption [23] may properly be allowed.

HN5[] Only where union-imposed restraints upon the labor market directly yield immediate benefits to the legitimate interests of labor organizations, and where the relative impact upon the product market is indirect and consequential, have such activities been protected. In these cases, an implicit balancing of interests has permitted the effectuation of labor policies without doing violence to antitrust considerations. See Pevely Dairy Co. v. Milk Wagon Drivers, 174 F. Supp. 229 (E.D. Mo. 1959), appeal dismissed, 283 F.2d 519 (8th Cir. 1960); Local 24, Intl. Bhd. of Teamsters v. Oliver, 358 U.S. 283, 3 L. Ed. 2d 312, 79 S. Ct. 297 (1959); Milk Wagon Drivers' Union v. Lake Valley Farm Products, Inc., supra; cf. *Local 189 v. Jewel [828] Tea Co., Inc., 381 U.S. 676, 14 L. Ed. 2d 640, 85 S. Ct. 1596 (1965).

On the other hand, where union activities have been aimed directly at commercial competition (such as price fixing or boycotts) antitrust considerations have prevailed despite the labor interests sought to be protected or advanced thereby. See Los Angeles Meat Drivers v. U.S., 371 U.S. 94, 9 L. Ed. 2d 150, 83 S. Ct. 162 (1962); Columbia River Packers v. [24] Hinton, 315 U.S. 143, 86 L. Ed. 750, 62 S. Ct. 520 (1942); cf. United Mine Workers v. Pennington, supra.

Furthermore, agreements between unions and a non-labor organization for anti-competitive purposes need not be explicit but may be inferred from activities and surrounding circumstances when there is clear proof of union participation or authorization. United States v. Fish Smokers Trade Council, Inc., 183 F. Supp. 227 (S.D.N.Y. 1960); United States v. Milk Drivers Union, 153 F. Supp. 803 (D. Minn. 1957).

In the present case, defendant-union's activities on behalf of its distributor-members were not in furtherance of any legitimate labor interests or objectives. The distributors, acting as independent contractors, sought admission to Local 627 for their own purposes, and the sole interest served by the union was that of this group of independent businessmen. (Findings of Fact 44 through 51) Absent the justification of a legitimate labor objective, defendant-union's activities which were aimed directly at commercial competition are not immune from antitrust liability.

B. Antitrust Violations

HN6[↑] It is elementary that price-fixing is illegal per se, United States v. General Motors [25] Corp., 384 U.S. 127, 16 L. Ed. 2d 415, 86 S. Ct. 1321 (1966); United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., Inc., 310 U.S. 150, 84 L. Ed. 1129, 60 S. Ct. 811 (1940); United States v. Trenton Potteries Co., 273 U.S. 392, 71 L. Ed. 700, 47 S. Ct. 377 (1927). Effect, rather than form, is the determining element. United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., Inc., supra; Plymouth Dealers' Ass'n v. United States, 279 F.2d 128 (9th Cir. 1960).

The uniform minimum discounts and the increases of same which defendant union secured for its distributor-members (Findings of Fact 52, 53) constituted illegal price fixing under the circumstances herein. Such discounts fixed the price paid the manufacturers by the distributors and this, in turn, bore directly upon the ultimate prices paid by consumers. Indeed, the increases in distributor discounts were followed quickly by increased retail prices. (Finding of Fact 54) Further, the evidence is clear that Horn, acting as an agent of defendant-union, conspired with the manufacturers and participated in a scheme whereby it was agreed that retail prices would be uniformly increased to compensate for increases negotiated for the distributors' discounts. (Finding [26] of Fact 54)

It also is elementary that boycotts and attempted boycotts are illegal. United States v. General Motors Corp., supra; Klor's Inc. v. Broadway-Hale Stores, Inc., 359 U.S. 207, 3 L. Ed. 2d 741, 79 S. Ct. 705 (1959); Fashion Originators Guild of America v. F.T.C., 312 U.S. 457, 85 L. Ed. 949, 61 S. Ct. 703 (1941). Thus, defendant-union's largely successful attempts to enforce agreements with the manufacturers to the effect that only members in good standing of Local 627 should be allowed to distribute frankfurters are illegal under the circumstances herein. (See Finding of Fact 55)

Defendant-union had knowledge of, acquiesced and participated in all illegal acts of its members, employees and agents. (Finding of Fact 56) HN7[↑] Explicit authority to the union's agents and officials need not be granted; such agency [*829] may be implied. 2 C.J.S. Agency § 23, pp. 1045-1050.

In conclusion, the proof is clear that antitrust liability must attach to defendant-union for the reasons stated.

Conclusions of Law

1. The court has jurisdiction of this cause and of the defendants herein under the provisions of the Act of July 2, 1890, commonly known as the Sherman Act (15 USC [27] §§ 1, 2).

2. The distributors herein are independent contractors.

3. The activities of defendant-union on behalf of its distributor-members served no legitimate labor objective.

4. The activities of defendant-union on behalf of its distributor-members are not exempt from the antitrust prohibitions of the Sherman Act (15 USC §§ 1 and 2).

5. Beginning at least as early as 1949 and continuing thereafter until at least 1962, Sabrett, Olympia, Superior, Local 627 and the distributor-members thereof who dealt with Sabrett, Olympia and Superior combined and conspired to restrain and monopolize the manufacture, sale and distribution of frankfurters by means of price fixing and boycott agreements in violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act.

6. Local 627 had knowledge of and acquiesced in all of the aforementioned acts of its officers, agents, employees and members and participated in the agreements and understandings entered into herein.

7. Plaintiff is entitled to equitable relief enjoining defendant Local 627 and the defaulting defendant Olympia from violations of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act and such additional relief as may be appropriate in accord with the determination [28] herein, together with costs.

Settle judgment on notice.

United States v. Tidewater Marine Service, Inc.

United States District Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana, New Orleans Division

April 12, 1968

Civil Action No. 68-97, Section B

Reporter

284 F. Supp. 324 *; 1968 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10187 ; 1968 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,447

United States of America v. Tidewater Marine Service, Inc., Twenty Grand Marine Service, Inc., Tidex, Inc., and Pan Marine Service, Inc.

Core Terms

boats, charter, merger, offshore, firms, Coast, transportation, crew, vessels, marine, market share, defendants', cargo, customers, oil company, relevant market, offshore oil, competitors, commerce, drilling, waters, personnel, craft, oil, transportation industry, anticompetitive, geographical, coastal, figures, substantially lessen

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Horizontal Mergers

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

HN1[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Attempts to Monopolize

See 15 U.S.C.S. § 18.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Oil & Petroleum Products > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Market Definition

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

HN2[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

In a suit under Clayton Act § 7, 15 U.S.C.S. § 18, it is essential that the government establish the line of commerce or relevant product market.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Market Definition

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

HN3[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

Courts should consider a number of practical indicia in determining whether a particular submarket exists within the outer boundaries of a broad product market. The boundaries of a submarket may be determined by examining such practical indicia as industry or public recognition of the submarket as a separate economic entity, the product's peculiar characteristics and uses, unique production facilities, distinct customers, distinct prices, sensitivity to price changes, and specialized vendors.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Market Definition

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

HN4[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

Any definition of line of commerce that ignores the buyers and focuses on what the sellers do, or theoretically can do, is not meaningful.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Market Definition

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

HN5[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

To ignore a vital functional distinction in determining the relevant line of commerce is to ignore the single, most important, practical factor in the business.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Market Definition

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

HN6[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

There will always be a certain amount of market overlap or limited functional substitution; a slight overlap case is clearly within tolerable limits consistent with the existence of an economically significant submarket.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Market Definition

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > Relevant Market

HN7[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

Competition is the key to determining the relevant market. The relevant market will include those products or services which may be in competition and will exclude those which do not compete.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Market Definition

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

HN8[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

Crew boats simply do not, for financial reasons, and cannot, for physical reasons, compete to any significant degree for cargo transportation with supply and utility boats. Nor can the chartering of offshore service craft be deemed a cluster of services.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > Clayton Act

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Market Definition

HN9[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

Under Clayton Act § 7, 15 U.S.C.S. § 18, it is sufficient if the merger may substantially lessen competition "in any section of the country." Proof of the section of the country where the anticompetitive effect exists is entirely subsidiary to the crucial question in every Clayton Act § 7 case, which is whether a merger may substantially lessen competition anywhere in the United States.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Market Definition

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Market Definition > Relevant Market > Geographic Market Definition

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > Relevant Market

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

HN10[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

In determining a relevant geographic market, there must be an "economically significant" area. The focus is on competition; the question being "Where?" and not "What?" The relevant geographical market is that area where the effect of the merger on competition will be direct and immediate. This depends upon the geographic structure of supplier-customer relations. Therefore, the area of effective competition in the known line of commerce must be charted by careful selection of the market area in which the seller operates, and to which the purchaser can practicably turn for supplies.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Evidence > Types of Evidence > Documentary Evidence > Summaries

HN11[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

The very hurried nature of an investigation in haphazard fashion does in and of itself somewhat belie the reliability of a government survey.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Financial Institutions > Bank Mergers

Banking Law > ... > Banking & Finance > Commercial Banks > Mergers & Consolidations

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Horizontal Mergers

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Market Definition

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Remedies

HN12[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Attempts to Monopolize

A merger which produces a firm controlling an undue percentage share of the relevant market, and results in a significant increase in the concentration of firms in that market, is so inherently likely to lessen competition substantially that it must be enjoined in the absence of evidence clearly showing that the merger is not likely to have such anticompetitive effects.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Horizontal Mergers

HN13[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Attempts to Monopolize

In measuring the anticompetitive effect of a merger, the court must examine its effect on the competitors as well as the customers of the merged companies.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Horizontal Mergers

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

HN14[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Attempts to Monopolize

The core question of a merger's probable effect on competition must be examined in light of all the pertinent economic factors of the particular market.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > Clayton Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Horizontal Mergers

HN15[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Attempts to Monopolize

The mere existence of a valid business purpose for a merger, with possible limited exceptions, will not rescue the merger from Clayton Act § 7, 15 U.S.C.S. § 18, if it has a probable anticompetitive effect. However, where the court finds no anticompetitive effects, the existence of a valid business purpose for the merger allays the inherent suspicion cast upon mergers by the Clayton Act.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > Clayton Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Horizontal Mergers

HN16[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Cartels & Horizontal Restraints

A horizontal merger is not per se a violation of Clayton Act § 7, 15 U.S.C.S. § 18.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > Relevant Market

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Horizontal Mergers

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Market Definition

HN17[] Market Definition, Relevant Market

In determining whether the elimination of competition between the merged firms violates Clayton Act § 7, 15 U.S.C.S. § 18, the court does not operate in a vacuum. The court must determine whether the elimination of competition between the merged firms will substantially lessen competition in the relevant market. The court is guided in this determination by its examination of the pertinent economic factors of that market.

Judges: [1] Heebe, District Judge.

Opinion by: HEEBE

Opinion

[*326] HEEBE, District Judge:

This cause came on for hearing on January 26, 1968, on the plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction. We denied the motion on February 9, 1968, for reasons fully explained herein.

Reasons

The United States instituted this suit to enjoin a proposed merger between Tidewater Marine Service, Inc. (Tidewater) and Twenty Grand Marine Service, Inc. (Twenty Grand) under an agreement entered into between these companies on August 25, 1967, on the grounds that the proposed merger may substantially lessen competition or tend [*327] to create a monopoly in violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18. The same relief is sought for the same reason against the proposed acquisition by Tidex, Inc. (Tidex) of all the outstanding shares of stock of Pan Marine Service, Inc. (Pan Marine), affiliated corporations of Tidewater and Twenty Grand respectively, which plan to effectuate the proposed stock acquisition when the Tidewater-Twenty Grand merger is consummated.

Tidewater is primarily engaged in the business of providing supply and utility boats, crew boats, tugboats, and other marine equipment [2] to oil companies, drilling contractors, and others engaged in the offshore exploration, recovery and production of petroleum products, and to companies engaged in oceanographic research. The vessels chartered by Tidewater include large supply boats used to carry drill pipe, drilling mud, diesel fuel, drilling water, and miscellaneous equipment from shore to offshore drilling rigs which are located up to 100 miles off the Gulf Coast; launches for transporting personnel and food to offshore platforms; tugboats used to tow barges and drilling platforms; and barges for transporting oil and other products. Approximately 75% of Tidewater's boats are service craft used to carry personnel and supplies; tugboats and barges constitute the bulk of the remaining 25%. Tidewater operates off both the Gulf Coast and West Coast of the United States (including Alaska) as well as in and around Canada, Mexico, Nigeria, Trinidad, Venezuela, Africa, the Persian Gulf, the Gulf of Suez and the North Sea. Approximately 68% of its revenues are derived from its operations in the coastal waters of the United States.

While the bulk of Tidewater's business consists of chartering offshore service craft to [3] transport personnel and supplies, Twenty Grand secures only approximately 30% of its revenues from the chartering business and only slightly less than 30% of its vessels are engaged in this activity. The remainder of Twenty Grand's revenues are acquired from offshore towing (about 40%) and inland operations (about 30%). Twenty Grand operates its charter business principally in the coastal waters of the United States, but like Tidewater, although not nearly as extensively, also conducts some business in foreign waters.

Practically all of the boats chartered or leased by Tidewater and Twenty Grand for operation in the coastal waters of the United States are chartered under bareboat charter. This is a charter whereby the chartering firm leases the vessel without crew or supplies to a customer, and the customer mans, maintains and operates the vessel either directly or through an operator for the duration of the charter. In almost all cases Tidewater's customers enter into a contract with Tidex or one of its subsidiaries whereby Tidex or the subsidiary mans, operates and maintains the vessel for the chartering party. [1] Similarly, Pan Marine is usually the operating company for boats [4] chartered by Twenty Grand.

The government alleges that the proposed merger between Tidewater and Twenty Grand and the acquisition of Pan Marine's stock by Tidex may substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in the chartering and operation of offshore tugboats as well as supply and utility boats used to transport cargo and equipment in connection with petroleum operations offshore the United [5] States, offshore the Gulf Coast of the United States and offshore the Pacific Coast of the United States in violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act in that it [*328] will (1) eliminate actual and potential competition between Tidewater and Twenty Grand and between Tidex and Pan Marine, and (2) further increase industry-wide concentration. On this basis the government seeks to enjoin the proposed merger and stock acquisition.

I. Relevant Product Market

Section 7 of the Clayton Act provides in pertinent part:

---

[1] The reason for this, as stated by the government, is that when the owner of an offshore vessel operates it for another person, the owner is deemed to be engaged in the business of carrying passengers or freight for hire and is thereby subjected to certain Coast Guard regulations which increase the cost of operating the vessels. The applicability of the regulations may be avoided by the use of the bareboat charter and a manning company, thus decreasing costs. However, this assertion was never developed by the government, and we have no reason to believe that it would affect the outcome of this case.

> HN1[] "No corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital and no corporation subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission shall acquire the whole or any part of the assets of another corporation engaged also in commerce, where in any line of commerce in any section of the country, the effect of such acquisition may be substantially to lessen competition, or to tend to create a monopoly." HN2[] 15 U.S.C. § 18.

It is essential that the government establish the "line of commerce" or "relevant product market." United States v. E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 353 U.S. 586, 593, [6] 1 L. Ed. 2d 1057, 77 S. Ct. 872 (1957). We are presently concerned only with the phase of defendants' operations which involves chartering service craft to transport men and supplies to the offshore oil industry. [2] The government contends that the relevant line of commerce consists of furnishing offshore supply and utility vessels used to transport cargo and equipment. The defendants, on the other hand, maintain that it consists of supplying offshore service craft to carry both personnel and cargo. Inasmuch as the government contends that the transportation of cargo is the relevant product market, the optimum approach would have been to determine the amount of cargo that was transported to offshore facilities and the competitive position of defendants relative to that total. However, for obvious reasons this was impractical, and the government sought instead to measure the alleged line of commerce by the number of supply and utility boats engaged in the business. The approach of counsel for all parties herein was thus directed to the boats themselves rather than transportation per se as the line of commerce. We will also adopt this approach because it affirmatively appears [7] from the evidence herein that the transportation of cargo via boats other than supply and utility boats is so slight as to be relatively insignificant when compared to the amount of cargo transported by supply and utility boats. Thus, supply and utility boats are not merely a unit of measurement but may themselves be considered, for practical purposes, as the line of commerce as the following factors indicate.

[8] There are three basic types of service craft used to provide offshore transportation - supply boats, utility boats, and crew boats. While the three basic types are recognized throughout the marine transportation and offshore oil industries, they may be referred to by different names; for example, supply boats may be called cargo boats, utility boats may be called standby boats or production boats or work boats or supply-personnel boats, and crew boats may be called personnel carriers or launches. [3]

Each type of boat is intended to perform a different function, and thus there [*329] are significant differences in their design and construction, the most striking differences being between supply boats and crew boats. Crew boats are designed to carry a large number of passengers at high speeds. Considering that as many as fifty men may be transported at any one time, there is considerable cost involved in transporting personnel, especially for an operation which is some distance [9] offshore, because the companies operating offshore oil facilities have to pay the workers, who work in shifts of so many days, while they are traveling to and from shore. Thus, speed is essential. In addition to transporting crew shifts, crew boats are continuously used to transport miscellaneous personnel in emergency and other situations where speed is also at a premium. Consequently, crew boats are generally high-powered vessels with planing hulls constructed of lightweight aluminum for maximum speed approaching 30 m.p.h. They are also constructed with passenger comfort in mind; for example, the seats are often the reclining type. Crew boats are also capable of carrying small amounts of cargo, such as groceries and small tools, varying in weight but seldom exceeding five tons.

Supply boats, on the other hand, are designed for transporting large quantities of cargo ranging up to 600 tons in weight. Thus, they are generally steel hulled vessels built for maximum stability under all conditions. They are usually capable of making only 10-12 knots. Supply boats sometimes carry passengers when it would be more

---

[2] The government's complaint, alleging that Twenty Grand owns "16 large offshore, ocean-going tugboats" and that Tidewater owns "29 tugs," claims that the merger of the defendants' towing operations would also violate § 7. However, the government has failed to offer any evidence whatsoever regarding this claim. In its brief at footnote 2 on pages 8-9, the government, candidly admitting that it was unable to go forward on this claim, virtually abandoned it. Likewise, the government has completely failed to offer any evidence relevant to its broad allegations concerning the agreement between Tidex and Pan Marine. Consequently, we may exclude all of these allegations from our present consideration of this case.

[3] See footnote 7, infra.

convenient to do so or when inclement conditions prohibit a crew boat [10] from making the journey. Utility boats are designed with facilities to accommodate as many as 40 passengers, although the number is usually smaller. But because utility boats are also designed to carry large amounts of cargo, generally slightly less than one-half as much as supply boats, they are also displacement hull vessels, and thus, like supply boats, are slow.

The boats servicing the offshore oil industry range in length from 40 to 165 feet; the farther offshore a boat must range, the larger it must be. Smaller inland craft are incapable for both safety and practical reasons from venturing very far offshore. Supply boats are generally longer than crew boats, with utility boats a medium length, although in any one given instance a crew boat may exceed a supply boat in length. Naturally, the cargo or passenger carrying capacity of a vessel will be determined by its size.

Supply boats cost more to construct than crew boats. The cost of supply boats generally ranges from $200,000 to over $700,000, depending on the length, quality, equipment, cost of labor, etc. The cost of crew boats generally ranges from $75,000 to over $300,000, depending on the same factors. However, [11] if a crew boat and a supply boat are the same length, it usually costs more to construct the crew boat. Further, while the life expectancies of the vessels vary, it appears that crew boats last only about one-half as long as supply boats. Because of these factors, it costs more to charter crew boats than to charter supply boats. Crew boats, however, generally require only a two- or three-man crew whereas supply boats require a four- to six-man crew.

Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510, 82 S. Ct. 1502 (1962), authoritatively delineated HN3[] a number of practical indicia to be considered in determining whether a particular submarket exists within the outer boundaries of a broad product market. [4]

> "The boundaries of such a submarket may be determined by examining such practical indicia as industry or public recognition of the submarket as a separate economic entity, the product's peculiar characteristics and uses, unique production facilities, distinct [*330] customers, distinct prices, sensitivity to price changes, and specialized vendors." At 325.

It is generally agreed by those in the industry that the overall business of providing boats [12] for the offshore oil industry is the same and requires the same skills and know-how whether the boats be used to transport men or materials. Thus, one who charters crew boats is just as capable of chartering supply and utility boats, and vice versa. This is repeatedly emphasized by the defendants. However, to attach significance to this would be to ignore the very terms of the Act itself which refers to any line of commerce, as well as the resulting admonition in Brown Shoe that the focus must be on "economic entity." As stated in United States v. Bethlehem Steel Corp., 168 F. Supp. 576 (S.D.N.Y. 1958) at 592: HN4[] "Any definition of line of commerce which ignores the buyers and focuses on what the sellers do, or theoretically can do, is not meaningful."

In this case the peculiar [13] use or function of the boats, which is recognized throughout the industries involved, is the crucial factor, and it highlights the existence of separate economic entities. HN5[] To ignore the vital functional distinction herein "in determining the relevant line of commerce is to ignore the single, most important, practical factor in the business." United States v. ALCOA, 377 U.S. 271, 276, 84 S. Ct. 1283, 12 L. Ed. 2d 314 (1964). Cf. Erie Sand & Gravel Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 291 F.2d 279 (3rd Cir. 1961). Crew boats are designed for high speed transportation of personnel and are constructed accordingly. The rapid movement of men is their task first and foremost, and it is only incidentally that they move cargo, and then only in comparatively negligible amounts. Supply and utility boats, on the other hand, are geared for the dependable movement of huge quantities of cargo, and transport men only when the circumstances necessitate. To adopt an analogy first drawn by William E. Bright, former President of Tidex and now Vice President of Tidewater, crew boats may be considered as taxicabs, utility boats as pick up trucks or carryalls, and supply boats as heavy duty trucks. When [14] a customer wants to transport men, he will not seek bids on supply or utility boats - he wants crew boats. Likewise, when the customer wants to transport cargo, he will seek bids on supply or utility boats and not crew boats. These facts, coupled with the fact that crew boats cost considerably more to charter than supply or utility boats, demonstrate the lack of sensitivity to the price of crew boats vis-a-vis the price of supply or utility boats. The customer will acquire the type of boat needed to meet his transportation requirements with little regard to the price or availability of the other types of boats.

---

[4] The practical indicia clearly enunciated in Brown Shoe were based upon criteria well established by lower courts. See Bock, Mergers and Markets (3rd ed. 1964) pp. 96-111, (2nd ed. 1962) pp. 56-68, and cases cited therein.

The fact that, to a certain extent, one type of boat may perform the function of another type of boat does not alter our view of this case because this interchangeability is very limited. HN6[] There will always be a certain amount of market overlap or limited functional substitution; but the slight overlap in this case is clearly within tolerable limits consistent with the existence of an economically significant submarket. See United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778, 86 S. Ct. 1698 (1966); United States v. ALCOA, supra; United States v. Philadelphia [15] Nat'l Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 10 L. Ed. 2d 915, 83 S. Ct. 1715 (1963); United States v. E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., supra; United States v. Kimberly-Clark Corp., 264 F. Supp. 439 (N.D. Cal. 1967); United States v. Pennzoil Co., 252 F. Supp. 962 (W.D. Pa. 1965). As noted above, crew boats are generally incapable of carrying over five tons of cargo, and they rarely carry even that much. Such cargo transportation is certainly de minimis when compared to the several hundred tons of cargo carried by the supply and utility boats. Likewise, even though supply boats and, to a greater extent, utility boats are capable of carrying personnel, they seldom do because they are so slow and the wage meter is ticking all the way out to the rig. Thus, supply [*331] and utility boats do not compete with crew boats for the transportation of personnel even though they may be physically capable of personnel transportation. However, even if they did compete for personnel transportation, this fact would be irrelevant in this case inasmuch as the line of commerce urged by the government is the transportation of supplies and equipment. Thus, we must look to the type of boats capable of transporting [16] supplies and equipment. It matters not that such boats may also perform other functions. See United States v. Grinnell Corp., supra; United States v. Pennzoil Co., supra.

This places the spotlight on the crucial and singular issue here which is whether crew boats compete with supply and utility boats. It is clear that HN7[] competition is the key to determining the relevant market. United States v. Grinnell Corp., supra; United States v. Continental Can Co., 378 U.S. 441, 12 L. Ed. 2d 953, 84 S. Ct. 1738 (1964); United States v. Philadelphia Nat'l Bank, supra; Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, supra; United States v. Pennzoil Co., supra; United States v. Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co., 240 F. Supp. 867 (S.D.N.Y. 1965). The relevant market will include those products or services which may be in competition and will exclude those which do not compete. Here the fact is inescapable that HN8[] crew boats simply do not, for financial reasons, and cannot, for physical reasons, compete to any significant degree for cargo transportation with supply and utility boats.

Nor can the chartering of offshore service craft be deemed a "cluster of services." Cf. United States v. Philadelphia Nat'l Bank, [17] supra; United States v. Grinnell Corp., supra, an analogous case. In Philadelphia Nat'l Bank the court found that "commercial banking is a market 'sufficiently inclusive to be meaningful in terms of trade realities' ", 374 U.S. at 357, 83 S. Ct. 1715, 10 L. Ed. 2d 915, because the banking services provided by commercial banks were free or insulated from effective competition with the products and services of other financial institutions. Similarly, the accredited central station property protection service in Grinnell was found to be a "single basic service" because there could be no effective competition with the substitutes as they were unacceptable or unrealistic alternatives. In both of these cases, therefore, the Supreme Court found that the broad product market, composed of various component services, was such an integrated whole or total package, so to speak, that it was free from effective competition with businesses which furnished less than the total of component services.

In our case, however, many firms, for one reason or another, and often merely because of personal wishes, engage in the business of chartering supply and utility boats to the exclusion of crew [18] boats and vice versa. Yet it is clear that Tidewater and Twenty Grand are in active competition with such firms particularly in view of the fact that the offshore oil companies generally acquire vessels on a boat-by-boat basis according to their needs and without regard to any total package service. Obviously, then, in this case there is no "single basic service."

For these reasons we think it is commercially realistic to consider the transportation of supplies and equipment as a separate economic entity, and we accept the government's delineation of the relevant product market as supply and utility boats.

II. Relevant Geographical Market

Offshore oil operations are conducted in the coastal waters of the United States only off the Gulf Coast and the West Coast (including Alaska). Consequently, the marine transportation industry is limited to these two areas. It is apparently unprofitable to shuttle boats back and forth between the West Coast and the Gulf Coast, and for this reason a boat which commences operation in one of these two areas almost always stays in that area.

[*332] The government claims that the anticompetitive effect of the proposed merger must be tested [19] in three geographical areas - offshore the United States as a whole, offshore the West Coast, and offshore the Gulf Coast. The defendants claim that our consideration is limited to the Gulf Coast.

Without belaboring the point, HN9[] it is sufficient if the merger may substantially lessen competition "in any section of the country." "Proof of the section of the country where the anticompetitive effect exists is entirely subsidiary to the crucial question in . . . every § 7 case which is whether a merger may substantially lessen competition anywhere in the United States." United States v. Pabst Brewing Co., 384 U.S. 546, 549-550, 16 L. Ed. 2d 765, 86 S. Ct. 1665 (1966).

However, HN10[] there must be an "economically significant" area. Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, supra. Again, the focus is on competition; this time the question being "Where?" and not "What?" The relevant geographical market is that area "where . . . the effect of the merger on competition will be direct and immediate." United States v. Philadelphia National Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 357, 10 L. Ed. 2d 915, 83 S. Ct. 1715 (1963). "This depends upon 'the geographic structure of supplier-customer relations. '" Ibid. "Therefore . [20] . . the 'area of effective competition in the known line of commerce must be charted by careful selection of the market area in which the seller operates, and to which the purchaser can practicably turn for supplies'. . ." Id. at 359. While we have no doubt whatsoever that both the Gulf Coast and West Coast areas are proper geographical markets in which to test the effect of the proposed merger, we are unable to accept the government's assertion that the coastal water of the entire nation is a proper geographical market, the reason being simply that the boats in one area are not available for operation or competition in the other. Under Philadelphia National Bank this bare practical factor precludes considering the national market as a relevant market. We do not feel that the sweeping language in Pabst scuttled the guidelines set out in Philadelphia National Bank. Consequently, commercial realities limit the relevant geographical markets to offshore the Gulf Coast and offshore the West Coast.

In so holding, we reject the defendants' contention that the West Coast is not a relevant geographical market, which contention is based on the fact that Twenty Grand operates [21] its West Coast chartering business through Twenty Grand Pacific, a corporation 50% owned by Twenty Grand and 50% owned by an individual named Kenneth Elmes. The very terms of § 7 defeat this argument since the Act proscribes the acquisition "directly or indirectly [of] the whole or any part of the stock" of another corporation if the effect may substantially lessen competition in any section of the country. Thus, the fact that Twenty Grand Pacific is only 50% owned by Twenty Grand is irrelevant inasmuch as Tidewater will acquire 50% ownership of Twenty Grand Pacific through the acquisition of Twenty Grand's stock. [5] This being so, the West Coast is a proper geographical market in which to measure the anticompetitive effect of this merger.

[22] As we note in Part III below, the government has failed to offer statistical data relating to the Gulf Coast and West Coast; the only statistics which are [*333] supported by evidence are directed to the total of both markets without any breakdown between the two. However, this does not preclude our consideration of this evidence because if the government's allegations as to the national totals are correct - that the combined market share of Tidewater and Twenty Grand is 31% - it follows that the market share in both component markets is 31%, or that the market share is greater than 31% in one market and less in the other.

---

[5] The fact that Elmes and Twenty Grand have engaged in some negotiations designed to effect the purchase by Elmes of Twenty Grand's ownership in Twenty Grand Pacific is also irrelevant and does not preclude our consideration of the West Coast as a relevant market. There is no certainty or even probability that Elmes will buy out Twenty Grand. Such negotiations directed to possible future developments do not alter the present effect of the Tidewater-Twenty Grand merger upon competition.

We now turn to the crucial question of whether the merger may substantially lessen competition.

III. Effect on Competition

The complaint alleges that Tidewater is the largest company in the country engaged in the business of furnishing marine transportation to the offshore petroleum industry and that Twenty Grand is the second largest. The government also alleges that approximately 400 supply and utility boats are available for charter in the United States coastal waters and that Tidewater owns approximately 19% (76, including two under construction) and [23] Twenty Grand 12% (47) of all such vessels, and that together they own approximately 31% of the national total. The complaint further states that in 1967 approximately 350 supply and utility boats were chartered for operation off the United States coasts and that Tidewater accounted for about 16% (55) of all such vessels and that Twenty Grand accounted for approximately 10% (34). It is further alleged that of the 350 supply and utility boats allegedly chartered for operation in the United States coastal waters in 1967, about 300 were operated in the Gulf of Mexico. Tidewater allegedly accounted for approximately 13% (41) of the supply and utility boats operated in the Gulf of Mexico in 1967 and Twenty Grand accounted for approximately 9% (27) of all such vessels. Of the approximately 41 supply and utility boats allegedly chartered for operation offshore the United States Pacific Coast in 1967, the government claims that Tidewater accounted for about 35% (14) of all such vessels and Twenty Grand approximately 15% (7) of these vessels. The government claims that the merger of these alleged market shares constitutes a prima facie violation of § 7, and hence that it need not prove [24] any particular anticompetitive effects at this stage.

The figures and percentages proffered by the United States were obtained as a result of a survey conducted by the government attorneys, which survey was necessitated by the lack of complete data on the offshore marine transportation industry. The government acquired a list of firms believed to be engaged in the offshore marine transportation industry from the defendants which the defendants later supplemented with additional names. The government also acquired a list of insured boats and barges from the Chevron Oil Company, as well as a list of companies from the "Oil and Gas and Marine Guide," an industry publication. When the firms on these various lists were contacted by the Antitrust Division staff, they were asked to supply the names of other firms which might be in competition with the defendants. These latter firms, when contacted, were requested to do the same thing, and so on in chain letter fashion.

In this manner the names of 429 companies were obtained, 29 of which were subsidiaries or affiliates of others, and thus stricken. Of the remaining 400, 48 companies could not be located, 5 could not be contacted, 6 [25] had gone out of business, and 1 declined to respond. The government asserts that only 86 of the other 340 firms are in competition with Tidewater and Twenty Grand because 254 either own no offshore supply or utility boats or do not charter their vessels for hire.

The interviews were conducted almost exclusively by telephone. In each case, the person interviewed was either the owner or a knowledgeable executive officer. Basically, the government inquired simply as to how many boats the company owned, and the size and type (supply, [*334] utility, crew, tug, barge, etc.) of each. The data acquired by this telephone interview was partially confirmed by letter. The government mailed 333 confirmation letters to the above 400 firms, and received 242 responses. Of the 242 replies, 4 companies indicated that they owned a total of 7 supply and utility boats less than the government had attributed to them. This was somewhat offset, however, by the response of three other firms stating that they owned a total of 3 more supply boats than the telephone survey had indicated.

The results of the government survey were tabulated, prior to the receipt of the confirmation letters, in rough [26] fashion and filed as exhibits in the record. One such tabulation (Exhibit 2B) seems to indicate the total number of supply and utility boats available for charter from American firms in 1967, including those vessels actually operating in foreign waters but which are registered in the United States, and thus not prohibited by law from operating in United States coastal waters. See 46 U.S.C. § 883. Exhibit 2B indicates that the number of such boats totals 396, and that Tidewater owns 76 and Twenty Grand owns 47. It also ranks the companies, purportedly numbering 13, owning five or more such vessels in order of size, indicating the number of boats each owns which ranges from 19 to 5 excluding Tidewater and Twenty Grand together with each company's percentage of the total, which ranges from 4 3/4% to 1 1/4%. The percentages owned by Tidewater and Twenty Grand per Exhibit 2B are 19% and 11 3/4%, respectively. The other tabulation (Exhibit 2C) simply seems to assert the estimated number of supply and utility boast actually chartered for operation in United States coastal waters by Tidewater and Twenty Grand in 1967 compared to the total for all other companies combined. It reflects [27] Tidewater and Twenty Grand as having chartered 87 vessels which is actually 25.6% (not 22% as indicated on the exhibit) of the purported total of 340. The only data offered by the government to support these tabulations were a copy of the interview form, a listing of the 429 firms contacted with the number and type of boats owned by each, and the 242 confirmation responses. [6]

[28] The defendants do not dispute the number of supply and utility vessels attributed to their ownership in Exhibit 2B. A severe difference of opinion does exist, however, respecting the total number of supply and utility boats available for charter in United States coastal waters as reflected in Exhibit 2B. Before turning to consider the defendants' contentions, we pause to consider the government's evidence which we set forth in detail above. The government has [*335] offered no evidence to support its allegations as to the breakdown of the national totals into the component Gulf Coast and West Coast areas which are the only relevant markets. While the list of the 429 firms contacted by the government yields the address of those companies, it does not indicate where the boats are operated, nor by our own calculation does the number of boats owned by firms with West Coast addresses correspond to the figures attributed to the West Coast in the government's allegations. The interview form does not indicate that this material was gathered in the interview. Likewise, the tabulations themselves fail to designate the total number of supply and utility boats chartered or available [29] for charter in either of the relevant markets in 1967. Thus, there is a lack of evidence supporting the government's allegations as to the defendants' market shares of the Gulf Coast and the West Coast. The government's evidence reflects industry-wide data for only the entire nation which is not a relevant geographical market. The government, in fact, apparently realizes this because, while it argued the case as a prima facie violation of the statute primarily in reliance upon the alleged market shares, it concentrated on the alleged 31% of the national total and merely glossed over the alleged 50% of the West Coast market with only an occasional reference to the 22% share claimed in the Gulf of Mexico. Inasmuch as the government relied on the alleged market shares to establish a prima facie violation, it would be most illogical to virtually ignore the alleged West Coast market share unless that claim did, indeed, lack evidentiary support.

While we certainly do not in any way wish to criticize government counsel, whose motives are clearly above reproach, we are unable to accept as completely reliable the figures asserted by the government. Despite the diligent efforts [30] of government counsel to conduct a thorough and unbiased survey, HN11[] the very hurried nature of the investigation in haphazard fashion does in and of itself somewhat belie the reliability of the government survey. Cf. United States v. National Steel Corp., 251 F. Supp. 693 (S.D. Tex. 1965). Our finding in this respect is strengthened by the fact that most of the government's statistical allegations were unsupported by any evidence whatsoever and the fact that only the scantiest evidence supported the other statistical allegations. [7] [32] In an attempt to bolster the reliability of its figures, the government offered the affidavit of Commander John

---

[6] This underlying evidence offers support, albeit scanty, only for the government's allegations as to the boats available for charter off the United States coasts which includes boats of United States Registry operating in foreign waters. It offers no support whatsoever for the tabulated allegations as to the total number of boats which actually operate in United States coastal waters. The former is directed to potential competition while the latter is directed to actual competition. The government did not draw any distinction between the two nor did it offer any evidence as to the likelihood or feasibility of vessels operating in foreign waters returning to domestic competition. Without such a showing the only proper yardstick with which to measure competition is the number of boats which actually operate offshore the United States. See, e.g., United States v. Crocker-Anglo Nat'l Bank, 277 F. Supp. 133 (N.D. Cal. 1967). It does seem highly unlikely that the government would be able to show that there is a reasonable probability of such potential competition becoming real in view of the fact, noted above, that boats on the West Coast do not compete with boats on the Gulf Coast due to the prohibitive expense of commuting back and forth which would appear even more prohibitive for boats operating in foreign waters. However, we need not further burden this already lengthy opinion by additional discussion of this point, other than to point it out, especially since it loses its otherwise important significance when we assume, infra, the facts as to market shares to be as favorable as possible to the government.

[7] An additional reason causing us to suspect the reliability of the government's figures is the fact that, although, as noted above, we agree with the government's concept of the relevant product market as we there defined the boats constituting that market,

F. O'Connell, whose duties as a marine inspector in the Coast Guard in New Orleans occasioned him to make a survey of the offshore marine transportation industry. Our calculations indicate that he would conclude that there are about 227 supply and utility boats operating offshore in the New Orleans area. [8] However, we refuse [*336] to attribute any probative value to the figures asserted by Commander O'Connell because the primary concern of his investigation was apparently to ascertain the number of marine casualties and, by his own admission, [31] many of his figures were based solely on his guesswork, and for the further reason that his figures represent the number of boats inspected in New Orleans and operating in New Orleans area only. At least five other Coast Guard stations on the Gulf Coast were required to make the same survey for their own respective areas, and the government has failed to produce the results of these surveys. Thus, O'Connell's survey would indicate, if anything, that there are substantially more supply and utility boats operating in the Gulf of Mexico than the government admits. Finally, the evidence offered by the defendants confirms our suspicions with regard to the market shares claimed by the government.

While the defendants critically attacked the intrinsic value of the government survey, their most poignant argument, amply supported by evidence, is that the government's figures inaccurately portray the universe, or total number, of supply and utility boats.

The defendants offered the results of a survey conducted by Frank John Deutschmann, Vice President of Tidewater, which was limited to boats actually operating off the Gulf Coast. Although Deutschmann was requested by Tidewater counsel to make the survey, he did not know what figures would aid Tidewater's counsel, and the procedures to be followed were left entirely to his choice. He rejected the method employed by the government because he felt through his experience in the industry that there were no reasonably accurate or complete lists of boat owners. He chose instead [33] to conduct the survey based on the records required to be kept by the Customs Houses in the Gulf Coast area. From these records he compiled a list of vessels which were documented in oil exploitation and geophysical operations, or known to be so engaged. Boats determined from other independent means not to be engaged in oil exploitation offshore the Gulf Coast were later deleted from this list; and the list was subsequently supplemented by a number of newly documented vessels as determined from an authoritative government publication. From this survey the defendants concluded that approximately 1,253 vessels were engaged in service to the offshore oil and gas industry in the Gulf of Mexico. Defendants seek to bolster the accuracy of their figures by reference to a recent report of the Department of Transportation concerning Continental Shelf Safety which indicated that about 1,500 vessels connected with the offshore oil industry were operating in the Gulf of Mexico. We are unable to ascribe any probative value to the Department of Transportation report, however, because the report failed to disclose what type of boats constituted the 1,500 total which may have included barges, [34] tugboats and the like.

The 1,253 boats indicated by the defendants' survey included crew boats as well as supply and utility boats. However, Deutschmann testified that of the total 1,253, 493 were determined to be supply or utility boats. While the defendants failed to show the percentage of supply and utility boats owned by Tidewater and Twenty Grand, which may have been due to their misconception of the relevant market as including crew boats as well as supply and which was largely based on the "Bright Lecture," it appears from the evidence herein that a borderline area exists between crew boats and utility boats in which it is difficult to distinguish one from the other. This indicates that there is a lack of universal agreement in the industry as to what constitutes a crew boat and what constitutes a utility boat. This area where the greatest difference of opinion exists apparently involves large high-powered boats with planing hulls. It is uncertain from the government's evidence whether the information obtained as a result of the telephone survey was based on the definition of supply and utility boats which the government advanced and which we adopted. It is imperative that the persons responding to the survey correctly understood what the government meant by its terms. Yet, it may well be that many of those persons contacted by the government stated that they owned "utility" boats which, by definition, were "crew" boats.

---

[8] Pursuant to the information contained in O'Connell's affidavit, we took 7% of the figures in 2(a) and 2(c) of the exhibit attached to his affidavit and added to that figure the number indicated in 2(d) and 2(f). In making this calculation, we obviously excluded 2(e).

utility boats, they did offer evidence indicating that Tidewater and Twenty Grand owned a combined total of only 7.8% of the total 1,253 supply, utility and crew boats which they claim actually operate in the Gulf of Mexico. [9]

[35] [*337] In further support of its claim that the government used an improper universe, the defendants listed, over and above the 86 firms which the government claims compete with Tidewater and Twenty Grand, 90 persons or firms (Exhibit A) who are engaged in the chartering business and who have a total of 107 additional supply and utility boats available for charter off the Gulf Coast. This information was obtained by contacting some of the persons or firms on the government's list of 429 names which the government was unable to locate or contact, as well as some of those firms which the government stated did not own any supply or utility boats. [10]

[36] In addition, the defendants' evidence revealed that there are a significantly larger number of supply and utility boats available for charter from the firms on the list of 429 which the government stated did have supply and utility boats. [11]

In summary, [37] then, the only claims of each side respecting market shares which have any evidentiary support at all are the government's claim that 396 supply and utility boats were available for charter in the United States during 1967 and that the combined total owned by Tidewater and Twenty Grand is 31% as well as the government's claim, weakly supported by only Exhibit 2C, that the supply and utility boats actually chartered for operation in United States coastal waters during 1967 numbered 340, of which Tidewater and Twenty Grand accounted for 87, or 25.6%, and the defendants' claim that there are a total of 1,253 supply, utility and crew boats actually operating off the Gulf Coast alone and that the combined ownership of these vessels by Tidewater and Twenty Grand is 7.8%, and that of the total 1,253 vessels, 493 are supply and utility boats. We simply have no way of resolving this factual dispute in light of the evidence which is unconvincing on either side, and can only state that the correct combined ownership by Tidewater and Twenty Grand of supply and utility vessels lies somewhere between 31% and 10% in both the United States as a [*338] whole, which is not a relevant market, and [38] the Gulf Coast, which is a relevant market. We are completely in the dark as to the defendants' market share of the West Coast. However, in light of additional evidence introduced by the defendants, it is unnecessary for us to resolve this case solely on the basis that the government has failed to meet its burden of proof in establishing the defendants' market shares.

---

[9] However, by no means does this give rise to an inference that Tidewater and Twenty Grand own only 7.8% of the supply and utility boats actually chartered in the Gulf of Mexico. Nor have the defendants advanced this argument. In fact, by Tidewater's own admission, it alone has 48 supply and utility boats operating in the Gulf of Mexico, which is over 9.7% of the total 493 claimed by the defendants for the Gulf of Mexico.

[10] The government's attempt to soften the damaging effect of this evidence failed. The government pointed out, through the testimony of Deutschmann, that defendants' Exhibit A contains the names of persons and firms who actually own the boats and that only about 10% of these owners are actually engaged in chartering the boats. The remainder of the owners do not charter their own boats but provide their boats to firms which do charter them. The government then declared that its Exhibit 2B is based on the number of boats a firm has available for charter rather than the number the firm actually owns because this more accurately reveals the true competitive situation. Thus, the government concluded, the additional 90 owners and 107 boats advanced by the defendants are irrelevant since these owners and boats are already encompassed in the government's tabulation (except for the 10% who do charter boats for themselves). However, the defendants proved that the government's tabulation failed to accurately reflect the number of boats which firms do have available for charter (see footnote 11 and accompanying text), and thus we can only conclude that the government's tabulation must have been based largely on ownership. This conclusion is fortified by an examination of the interview form and the confirmation letter used in the government survey, both of which refer to "ownership." Thus, the defendants' Exhibit A possesses considerable significance.

[11] The defendants' evidence in this respect was produced by notarized affidavits of the owners or officers of some of the firms. The affidavits are not in conflict with the confirmation letters received by the government from these persons because the government's letters referred to "ownership" by the particular corporation, whereas the defendants focused on boats available to the particular corporation and thus included boats owned by subsidiary and affiliated corporations. However, even if they were contradictory, we would accept as true the information contained in the affidavits which, unlike the confirmation letters, was filed under oath. These affidavits clearly show that the government's Exhibit 2B is misleading as to the true competitive situation.

As noted above, the government's efforts in this case were directed solely to establishing the defendants' market shares. Relying mainly on Philadelphia National Bank, it claims that the combined market share of Tidewater and Twenty Grand and the elimination of competition between them constitute a prima facie violation of § 7. In that case the Court stated:

> "Specifically, we think that HN12[] a merger which produces a firm controlling an undue percentage share of the relevant market, and results in a significant increase in the concentration of firms in that market, is so inherently likely to lessen competition substantially that it must be enjoined in the absence of evidence clearly showing that the merger is not likely to have such anticompetitive effects. . . . The merger of appellees will result [39] in a single bank's controlling at least 30% of the commercial banking business . . . . Without attempting to specify the smallest market share which would still be considered to threaten undue concentration, we are clear that 30% presents that threat." 374 U.S. at 363-364.

Even if we take the present case in the light most favorable to the government and were to assume that Tidewater and Twenty Grand together own 31% of the relevant market, we would be faced with the same market share as in Philadelphia National Bank, yet we would be unable to draw the conclusion the Court there did because the defendants herein have introduced, in the language of the Supreme Court, "evidence clearly showing that the merger is not likely to have [any] anticompetitive effects."

HN13[] In measuring the anticompetitive effect of a merger, we must examine its effect on the competitors as well as the customers of the merged companies. United States v. Bethlehem Steel Corp., 168 F. Supp. at 588, cited with approval in United States v. Philadelphia Nat'l Bank, 374 U.S. at 367, n. 43. We examine first the defendants' competitors in the offshore marine transportation industry.

The offshore marine [40] transportation industry is predominantly composed of small firms. Over one hundred, and possibly several hundred, small firms exist which have less than five supply and utility boats available for charter. In addition to this vast number of small competitors, a number of larger chartering firms engage in competition with Tidewater and Twenty Grand. Based on the government's Exhibit 2B, as supplemented by the defendants' Exhibit A and other evidence introduced by the defendants, we find that at least 14 firms, excluding Tidewater and Twenty Grand, have between at least 23 and 5 supply and utility boats available for charter. The market shares of these firms, based on the government's figures as to the national universe, ranges from over 1% to over 5%. In addition to the stiff competition from these chartering firms, large and small, Tidewater and Twenty Grand also face competition with drilling contractors and mud companies for the offshore transportation of supplies and equipment. Drilling contractors generally operate the offshore oil rig for the oil companies. Many drilling contractors have expanded into a total offshore service and now provide the craft, including supply [41] and utility boats, needed to service these facilities. However, even though they operate the offshore oil rig, they still must bid for the charter contract against the offshore chartering firms such as Tidewater and Twenty Grand. These drilling contractors, who own a substantial number of supply and utility boats, have revenues ranging up [*339] to 340 million dollars and are financially much larger than Tidewater and Twenty Grand who had revenues of 23 and 10 million dollars respectively last year. Also, a number of mud companies provide boats for the transportation of "mud" to the offshore drilling operations. They are thus competing with the chartering firms who attempt to acquire mud transportation contracts. Furthermore, the mud companies charter their supply boats, when they are idle, for transporting other supplies and material.

The competition among all these firms in securing charter contracts for the transportation of supplies and equipment is extremely vigorous. The offshore oil companies generally charter boats on a boat-by-boat basis. The bidding is open to all businesses with boats for hire. The charter contract, which varies in length from weeks to years, [42] is simply awarded to the lowest bidder. When the oil companies endeavor to charter a boat, they are not concerned with how many boats a particular firm may have; nor are they impressed by a charterer's "name"; they are only interested in the best price and the best service. In fact, the oil companies appear to take deliberate steps to avoid a marriage with any one firm, preferring instead to spread their contracts among many firms. The evidence further indicates that the size of a company has no significant bearing on the price at which it is able to offer its boats. This is probably attributable to the fact that a significant portion of the costs involved would seem to be variable costs, plus the fact that the savings in financing costs which accrues to larger firms would appear to be offset by their heavier fixed costs in administrative expenses and the like.

Perhaps the most salient economic factor herein is the ease of entry into the offshore marine transportation industry. There are virtually no barriers whatsoever to entry. Financing is readily available, and anyone with a knowledge of boats or the oil industry, which knowledge abounds in this area, can enter the business [43] with a capital investment as low as $5,000.00. Most firms which are now of considerable size started in just this fashion with only one boat. Tidewater, for example, commenced operations with a $30,000.00 investment in one boat in 1955 before financing in this industry was easily available, and has achieved its present size solely through internal growth. A further example of the ease of entry is the fact that many persons enter the business by acquiring a charter contract to commence several months in the future before they even have a boat. They are then able to finance the construction of a boat on the strength of the charter contract.

These factors, uncontested by the government, more than amply demonstrate that this merger will have no adverse effect on the defendants' competitors. In terms of sheer numbers, the small firms are overwhelming. At present they manage to breed, survive, and prosper. The older firms are growing and new ones are constantly entering the business, swelling the ranks of competition. If Tidewater, which now allegedly owns 76 supply and utility boats, has been unable to stem this rising tide of competition, we fail to see how the merged firm with [44] a total of 123 boats could have a damaging effect. To the one-boat firm, a 123-boat firm could be no more oppressive than a 76-boat firm. The reason for this is evident from the unique nature of the market itself which places all competitors, from the very large to the very small, on an equal basis, suffering no handicap. There are no underdogs. It is clear that the competitive climate is extremely healthy.

Our conclusion in this respect is further substantiated by a number of affidavits from small firms which definitively state that the merger will have no adverse effect on their business or ability to compete. [12] This sentiment is very [*340] impressive, prevailing as it does among the small competitors who have the most interest at stake in preventing the merger. It becomes even more impressive in view of the fact that one of the questions on the interview form used for the survey conducted by the government was whether the merger would affect the business of the firm interviewed; yet the government was unable to introduce even one statement from a competitor indicating that the merger would have an adverse effect on his business. [13] In fact, a number of small competitors [45] stated that the small firm has a competitive advantage in this business in that they are able to give their customers more personalized service. Thus, it is clear from the very nature of this market with its rugged, individualistic competitors that the merger of Tidewater and Twenty Grand will not adversely affect the defendants' competitors, large or small.

[46] Likewise, an examination of the defendants' customers reveals that there will be no adverse effect upon them. The customers of the offshore marine transportation industry mainly consist of the huge oil companies such as Standard Oil of New Jersey, Shell Oil Company, Texaco, Gulf Oil Corporation, Mobil Oil Corporation, Continental Oil Company, Sinclair Oil Corporation, Tenneco, etc. These corporate giants, with their vast financial empires, number among the largest corporations in the United States; many rank among the biggest in the world. Their annual sales are measured in the billions of dollars. Even the "small" oil companies far outstrip Tidewater and Twenty Grand in size. Each offshore rig requires an investment by an oil company of millions of dollars, and daily operating expenses total several thousand dollars. Thus, another startling fact in this case is that the "seller" here is virtually microscopic compared to the "buyer." The simple truth is that the oil companies wield all the economic power in the offshore world. Regardless of how big Tidewater and Twenty Grand may foreseeably become, they

---

[12] These affidavits are distinguishable from the competitors' testimony in Philadelphia Nat'l Bank, 374 U.S. at 366, 367, n. 43, which was largely discarded by the Supreme Court. The testimony in that case concerned the competitors' opinions as to the vigor of future competition after the merger. The affidavits here, however, are directed to the effect of the merger on the affiants' own businesses. Here, unlike Philadelphia Nat'l Bank, the competitors are speaking on that which they are most qualified to speak. Further, also unlike Philadelphia Nat'l Bank, the competitors here gave concrete reasons to support their statements.

[13] The government apparently sensed the futility of such questioning for it candidly admitted on page 4, footnote 1, of the Sheppard affidavit that it quit asking this question as the survey progressed.

must remain subservient to the wishes of their customers. In fact, the [47] oil companies are quite capable of operating their own supply and utility boats. When offshore exploration for oil originated in the late 1940's, the oil companies supplied all the service craft. However, as the offshore marine transportation industry developed in the 1950's, they preferred to charter rather than invest in the boats, thus freeing more capital for the more lucrative investment in oil operations. But they continue to acquire and operate a number of their own supply and utility boats and have indicated that they would supply all of their own boats if they became dissatisfied with either the price or the service of the boats they charter. Clearly then, the combination of Tidewater and Twenty Grand will not enable the merged firm to act detrimentally to the welfare of their customers. [14]

[48] [*341] The government appears to recognize these salient economic factors for, in the last analysis, it simply contends that there are certain economies of size and that these economies should be enjoyed by more than just one firm. We have already pointed out, however, that there are a number of other sizeable firms in this industry. These firms enjoy and will continue to enjoy the economies which accrue to larger business concerns. In fact, the drilling contractors in competition with the defendants are several times the size of the defendants, and thus in a better position to effect economies of size than Tidewater and Twenty Grand. The only specific economies of scale relied upon by the government are better financing arrangements and research and development projects. [15] As far as cheaper financing is concerned, the government's basic premise is correct - a large, established, financially sound firm can obtain financing at a lower cost. As we have already noted, however, this advantage would appear to be offset by their larger administrative expenses. Further, this advantage is already enjoyed, not only by Tidewater and Twenty Grand, but by a number of other larger [49] firms as well, and we fail to see how a further increase in size will further increase the financing benefits already experienced by the defendants. The merger with respect to offering additional research and development possibilities appears beneficial rather than detrimental in that it would inure to the benefit of the industry as a whole. Additionally, the drilling contractors have a far greater financial capacity for engaging in research and development than the defendants. Thus, when stripped to the bone, the twin underpinnings of the government's contention as to the economies of size fail to sustain its position. But even more basically, we do not feel that economies of size alone can be any basis for invoking the antitrust laws. Quite the contrary, for the business quest for economy and efficiency is a mainstay of competition. It is when this quest is eliminated and stagnation sets in that competition suffers. Economies of size, acquired through a merger, will justify the application of the antitrust laws only when it offers the merged firm significant competitive advantages so that a probability of a substantial lessening of competition ensues. To hold otherwise would [50] espouse a warped view of the fundamental policy of antitrust law; mergers should not be condemned because they are beneficial to the merging parties, but because they are harmful to customers and competitors, or to competition as a whole. In this case, even if the merger were to afford economies of size to the defendants to the exclusion of other firms, the anticompetitive result is clearly absent.

---

[14] If we assume, arguendo, that Tidewater and Twenty Grand did not have to fear being supplanted by their numerous competitors and could engage in oppressive practices forcing the oil companies to construct their own boats rather than charter, then it may be that this fact, that is, forcing the customers to invest in boats when it is more profitable for them to charter, would be a serious anticompetitive effect. Such a suggestion, however, answers itself for the defendants' own economic interest will prevent them from doing that which would destroy their own business.

[15] Parenthetically, we might note that advertising, which flourishes with size, is not a "major competitive weapon" in this industry as it was in Federal Trade Comm'n v. Procter & Gamble Co., 386 U.S. 568, 18 L. Ed. 2d 303, 87 S. Ct. 1224 (1967). We should also note, though, that a few government affidavits obtained from competitors of Tidewater and Twenty Grand stated that size does benefit a chartering firm in one respect in that it enables the large firm to replace a vessel which becomes disabled with another one. However, we do not know how often boats break down on the job and are unable to assess the significance, if any, of this factor. Further, it would not seem feasible to take a boat off of one job to replace a disabled boat on another job, nor would it appear profitable to maintain an idle fleet of boats in order to replace those which do break down. Finally, this factor, if true, appears without significance from the fact that the larger firms are already endowed with this "advantage," yet it has not dampened the flourishing competition from the small firms. Since this factor has not noticeably influenced the customers' choice in this market, the "advantage" it affords, if any, lacks any anticompetitive effect.

[51] Bigness alone is not the evil. The Clayton Act's purpose is to thwart mergers which tend to stifle competition. For these reasons market shares, while undeniably important, do not tell the whole story. The law is geared to economics, not mathematics. HN14[] The core question [*342] of the merger's probable effect on competition must be examined in light of all the pertinent economic factors of the particular market. United States v. Continental Can Co., 378 U.S. 441, 458, 12 L. Ed. 2d 953, 84 S. Ct. 1738 (1964); Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 322, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510, 82 S. Ct. 1502, n. 38 (1962). The examination of the economic structure of the market involved here completely demolishes any presumption of a prima facie violation of § 7 which may arise from the defendants' market share which we assumed to be 31% merely for the purposes of this opinion. From that examination of the defendants' competitors and customers, it is clear that the merger of Tidewater and Twenty Grand will not adversely affect either group. Nor have we been able to discern any public interest differing from the interests of these two groups which would be adversely affected. Due to the [52] nature of the market, the merged firm will lack the oligopolistic power to set the pricing policy for the industry or engage in other anticompetitive practices. The government's argument that the merger will prevent pressure for lower prices, higher quality service, and innovations to improve efficiency is without merit. The oil companies award the charter contract on the basis of price and service. They certainly have the economic wherewithal to maintain the pressure for lower prices and better service. Nor is it as if they stood this vigil unaided, for an untold number of individualistic competitors, unimpressed by the defendants' size, stand by ready to pick up the defendants' contracts should they step out of line. The ease with which a boat may be financed and the speed with which it may be constructed insures this probability. These facts also serve to illustrate the lack of merit to the contention that the merger will block innovations to improve efficiency. In short, we are convinced, from the evidence before us, that the merger of Tidewater and Twenty Grand will not substantially lessen present competition in the furnishing of supply and utility boats. It would, of [53] course, be utterly foolish to contend that the merger would tend to create a monopoly.

Our conclusion is the same when we turn, as we must, to its probable effect on future competition. There is absolutely nothing to indicate a contrary result. All the evidence as to the future is prophetic of significant increases in offshore oil exploration and production, which is beckoning even greater numbers of entrants into the marine transportation industry. The construction of new service craft is continuing at a furious pace. In fact, Tidewater's share of the total number of service craft has recently declined slightly, indicating that the industry as a whole is expanding faster than Tidewater. This has probably been the trend ever since the initiation of the industry as Tidewater appears to have been the pioneer firm in the industry. In view of these facts, we are simply unable to foresee any probability that future competition will be substantially lessened.

The reason for the merger certainly does not detract from our conclusion in any way. The avowed purpose of this merger is to enable Tidewater to crack the international towing market. Tidewater has no ocean-going tugboats. [54] It does, however, have considerable experience with foreign countries in furnishing service craft for oil rigs located in foreign waters. Twenty Grand, on the other hand, has large tugboats capable of ocean towing. It, however, lacks Tidewater's significant international experience. Thus, the defendants feel that the combination of Tidewater's international experience with Twenty Grand's ocean towing capacity will enable them to overcome the existing barriers to entry into the apparently burgeoning business of ocean towing of rigs - a market which is completely dominated by foreign firms with no real American competition. We realize, of course, that HN15[] the mere existence of a valid business purpose for the merger, with possible limited exceptions inapplicable here, will not rescue the [*343] merger from the Clayton Act if it has a probable anticompetitive effect. United States v. Pennzoil Co., 252 F. Supp. 962 (W.D. Pa. 1965); United States v. Ingersoll-Rand Co., 218 F. Supp. 530 (W.D. Pa. 1963), aff'd, 320 F.2d 509 (3rd Cir.). However, we do feel that where, as here, we find no anticompetitive effects, then the existence of a valid business purpose for the merger allays the [55] inherent suspicion cast upon mergers by the Clayton Act.

One final consideration remains. The government has contended that the mere elimination of competition between Tidewater and Twenty Grand will substantially lessen competition in the relevant market. We do not agree. HN16[] A horizontal merger such as this is not per se a violation of § 7. Lunkenheimer Co. v. Condec Corp., 268 F. Supp. 667 (S.D.N.Y. 1967). If it were, no such merger would be allowed. In Brown Shoe the Court stated:

> "Where the arrangement effects a horizontal merger between companies occupying the same product and geographic market, whatever competition previously may have existed in that market between the parties to the merger is eliminated. Section 7 of the Clayton Act, prior to its amendment, focused upon this aspect of horizontal combinations by proscribing acquisitions which might result in a lessening of competition between the acquiring and the acquired companies. The 1950 amendments made plain Congress' intent that the validity of such combinations was to be gauged on a broader scale: their effect on competition generally in an economically significant market." 370 U.S. at 335.

[56]

Consequently, HN17[] in determining whether the elimination of competition between the merged firms violates § 7, we do not operate in a vacuum. We must determine whether it will substantially lessen competition in the relevant market. We are guided in this determination by our examination of the pertinent economic factors of that market. [16] From our examination [*344] above, it is clear that this market lacks the characteristics of those markets in which the elimination of competition between the merged firms has been found to be fatal. There is no history of prior mergers in this market or by these defendants. This is not an oligopolistic market in which a few firms set the industry standards in pricing and other practices. It is not an overly concentrated market. It does not appear probable that this merger will lead to other mergers, resulting in an unduly concentrated market. The reason for this is due to the esoteric purpose for this merger and the fact that size offers no significant advantages in the marine transportation industry. In light of these factors, the mere elimination of competition between Tidewater and Twenty Grand does not violate § 7. The market [57] structure prohibits a contrary conclusion.

[58] In summary, then, the government simply did not establish a basis for the issuance of a preliminary injunction. The government failed to carry its burden regarding the defendants' market shares, due to defects in the government's own proof as well as the rebuttal evidence introduced by the defendants. Further, if we assume the market shares to be as the government contends, the uncontroverted evidence produced by the defendants as to the economic factors of this market convinces us that even if the defendants do control 31% of a relevant market, there is no probability that the merger will substantially lessen competition. For these reasons, the government failed to show a reasonable probability of success upon the merits, and we therefore denied the motion for a preliminary injunction.

---

[16] One court, however, apparently takes a different view. United States v. Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co., 240 F. Supp. 867, 955 (S.D.N.Y. 1965). Relying on United States v. First Nat'l Bank & Trust Co. of Lexington, 376 U.S. 665, 12 L. Ed. 2d 1, 84 S. Ct. 1033 (1964), the court there held that the elimination of substantial competition between the merged banks did in and of itself, and without regard to the pertinent economic factors of the relevant market, constitute a violation of § 7 of the Clayton Act. We do not agree with that view. The Lexington case involved the Sherman Act, and we are unwilling to extend that holding to the Clayton Act, especially when four of the justices in that case refused to ascribe to the majority holding. In addition, the Lexington case, as with all antitrust cases, turned on its own particular facts. See Winn Ave. Warehouse, Inc. v. Winchester Tobacco Ware. Co., 341 F.2d 287 (6th Cir. 1965). In that case it was clear from the market structure that the consolidation would seriously impede the ability of the remaining banks to compete. We feel justified in our opinion in view of the number of decisions applying § 7 of the Clayton Act subsequent to the Lexington case in none of which did the Supreme Court even mention the Lexington case. These decisions, the benefit of many of which was unavailable to the court in Manufacturers Hanover, leave undisturbed the principle quoted in Brown Shoe, supra, and, in fact, reaffirm that decision. Those decisions are: Federal Trade Comm'n v. Procter & Gamble Co., 386 U.S. 568, 18 L. Ed. 2d 303, 87 S. Ct. 1224 (1967); United States v. First City Nat'l Bank of Houston, 386 U.S. 361, 18 L. Ed. 2d 151, 87 S. Ct. 1088 (1967) (this case did cite the Lexington case at 367 but for a totally unrelated principle); United States v. Pabst Brewing Co., 384 U.S. 546, 16 L. Ed. 2d 765, 86 S. Ct. 1665 (1966); United States v. Von's Grocery, 384 U.S. 270, 16 L. Ed. 2d 555, 86 S. Ct. 1478 (1966); Federal Trade Comm'n v. Consolidated Foods Corp., 380 U.S. 592, 14 L. Ed. 2d 95, 85 S. Ct. 1220 (1965); United States v. Penn-Olin Chemical Co., 378 U.S. 158, 12 L. Ed. 2d 775, 84 S. Ct. 1710 (1964); United States v. Continental Can Co., 378 U.S. 441, 12 L. Ed. 2d 953, 84 S. Ct. 1738 (1964); United States v. ALCOA, 377 U.S. 271, 84 S. Ct. 1283, 12 L. Ed. 2d 314 (1964).

Aimcee Wholesale Corp. v. Tomar Products, Inc.

Court of Appeals of New York

January 17, 1968, Argued ; April 18, 1968, Decided

No Number in Original

Reporter

21 N.Y.2d 621 *; 237 N.E.2d 223 ; 289 N.Y.S.2d 968 ; 1968 N.Y. LEXIS 1418 *; 1968 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,428

In the Matter of the Arbitration between Aimcee Wholesale Corporation, Appellant, and Tomar Products, Inc., Respondent

Prior History: [*1] Matter of Aimcee Wholesale Corp. (Tomar Prods.), 26 A D 2d 915.

Appeal, by permission of the Court of Appeals, from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in the First Judicial Department, entered November 3, 1966, which unanimously affirmed an order of the Supreme Court at Special Term (Joseph A. Brust, J.), entered in New York County, denying a motion for a stay of arbitration.

Disposition: Order reversed, with costs, and matter remitted to Special Term for further proceedings in accordance with the opinion herein.

Core Terms

arbitration, antitrust, Donnelly Act, antitrust claim, anti trust law, violations, courts, commercial arbitration, public policy, parties, arbitration clause, common-law

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > Public Enforcement > State Civil Actions

Torts > Business Torts > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > State Regulation

HN1[] Public Enforcement, State Civil Actions

By terms, the Donnelly Act, N.Y. Gen. Bus. Law § 340, declares every contract, agreement or conspiracy whereby a monopoly is or may be established or which in any way enervates free competition to be against public policy, illegal and void. Penal sanctions are provided in N.Y. Gen. Bus. Law § 341. Because of the importance of the policy and the clandestine nature of the violations, the attorney general is empowered to investigate alleged violations and to seek injunctive relief. In addition, civil actions to recover damages by injured parties are authorized.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > General Overview

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Pretrial Matters > Alternative Dispute Resolution > Validity of ADR Methods

HN2[] Regulated Practices, Private Actions

The enforcement of New York's antitrust policy should not be left within the purview of commercial arbitration.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Pretrial Matters > Alternative Dispute Resolution > Judicial Review

Governments > Courts > Authority to Adjudicate

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Pretrial Matters > Alternative Dispute Resolution > Validity of ADR Methods

HN3[] Alternative Dispute Resolution, Judicial Review

Arbitrators are not bound by rules of law and their decisions are essentially final. Certainly the awards may not be set aside for misapplication of the law. But, even if the court reviews the merits of the arbitrators' decision in antitrust cases, errors may not even appear in the record, which need not be kept. More important, arbitrators are not obliged to give reasons for their rulings or awards. Thus the court may be called upon to enforce arbitration awards which are directly at variance with statutory law and judicial decision interpreting that law.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Public Enforcement > State Civil Actions

HN4[] Public Enforcement, State Civil Actions

It is evident that a judicially controlled system of awarding civil damages for violations of the Donnelly Act, N.Y. Gen. Bus. Law § 340, is a necessary and vital part of the statutory scheme.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Contracts Law > Contract Conditions & Provisions > Arbitration Clauses

Insurance Law > Claim, Contract & Practice Issues > Arbitration

Labor & Employment Law > Collective Bargaining & Labor Relations > Labor Arbitration > Enforcement

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Pretrial Matters > Alternative Dispute Resolution > Judicial Review

Governments > Courts > Authority to Adjudicate

HN5[] Contract Conditions & Provisions, Arbitration Clauses

The broadest of arbitration agreements cannot oust the courts from their role in the enforcement of major state policies, especially those embodied in statutory form.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Alternative Dispute Resolution > Arbitration > General Overview

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Pretrial Matters > Alternative Dispute Resolution > Validity of ADR Methods

HN6[] Regulated Practices, Private Actions

Where antitrust considerations are imbedded in the issues in dispute, they ought not to be resolved by privately appointed arbitrators, and New York courts cannot abdicate their control over antitrust policy. By removing antitrust claims from the scope of arbitration, the court does not intend to demean the arbitration process. If anything, its proper role in settling the practical business problems of the everyday business world will be enhanced.

Headnotes/Summary

Headnotes

Arbitration -- matters arbitrable -- alleged violation of Donnelly Act (General Business Law, § 340, subd. 1) may not be subject of arbitration.

Appellant bought merchandise from respondent, the contract containing an arbitration clause to the effect that "Any controversy or claim arising out of or relating to this contract or the breach thereof" would be submitted to arbitration. Appellant sought arbitration of a claim based upon allegations that merchandise shipped was defective and that certain advertising allowances had not been paid. Respondent agreed to arbitration and served an answer in which it set up a counterclaim asserting [*2] that appellant had unlawfully exacted a discriminatory price reduction in violation of the Robinson-Patman Act (U.S. Code, tit. 15, § 13) and of the Donnelly Act (General Business Law, § 340, subd. 1). Thereafter, appellant moved for an order staying arbitration of this counterclaim. Respondent consented to the stay with respect to the alleged violation of Federal law, but resisted the stay as to the Donnelly Act claim. The motion for a stay should have been granted. The enforcement of our State's antitrust policy cannot be left to commercial arbitration. Arbitration is not a fit instrument for the determination of antitrust controversies which are of such extreme importance to all of the people of this State.

Counsel: Marshall C. Berger, Ira M. Millstein and Irving Scher for appellant. I. The effect of the decisions below is to abdicate court control over State statutory public policy. (Matter of Colletti [Mesh], 23 A D 2d 245, 17 N Y 2d 460; Matter of Bay Iron Works [Eisenstein], 17 A D 2d 804; Durst v. Abrash, 22 A D 2d 39, 17 N Y 2d 445; Wilko v. Swan, 346 U.S. 427; Matter of Knickerbocker Agency [Holz], 4 N Y 2d 245; [*3] Matter of Kingswood Mgt. Corp. [Salzman], 272 App. Div. 328; Matter of Exercycle Corp. [Maratta], 9 N Y 2d 329; Matter of Standardbred Owners Assn. [Yonkers Raceway], 31 Misc 2d 474.) II. The lower courts' decisions conflict with the purposes and enforcement policy of the Donnelly Act. (Manhattan Stor. & Warehouse Co. v. Movers & Warehousemen's Assn. of Greater N. Y., 289 N. Y. 82; Kalmanash v. Smith, 291 N. Y. 142; Consumer-Farmer Milk Coop. v. Milk Drivers & Dairy Employees Local No. 584, 13 Misc 2d 590.) III. Antitrust affirmative defenses and counterclaims in contract actions have traditionally been looked upon with disfavor by the courts and are contrary to the principal purpose for arbitration. (Kelly v. Kosuga, 358 U.S. 516; Loew's Inc. v. Radio Hawaii, 20 Misc 2d 587; Fleischmann Distilling Corp. v. Frontier Liq. Corp., 18 Misc 2d 903; Matter of Mole [Queen Ins. Co. of America], 14 A D 2d 1; Sporn v. Hudson Tr. Lines, 265 App. Div. 360.) IV. Tomar's Donnelly Act claim, in effect, is an assertion that the entire agreement between the parties is void. (Automatic Canteen Co. [*4] of America v. Federal Trade Comm., 346 U.S. 61; Matter of Kramer & Uchitelle [Eddington Fabrics Corp.], 288 N. Y. 467.)

Daniel F. Fitzgerald, Jr., for respondent. I. Having affirmed the arbitration agreement by initiating arbitration proceedings, petitioner-appellant may not now raise issues of illegality. (Matter of Exercycle Corp. [Maratta], 9 N Y 2d 329; Cole v. Mostel, 27 A D 2d 721; Matter of Wrap-Vertiser Corp. [Plotnick], 3 N Y 2d 17; Matter of National Cash Register Co. [Wilson], 8 N Y 2d 377; Matter of De Laurentiis [Cinematografica], 9 N Y 2d 503; Wilko v. Swan, 346 U.S. 427; Moran v. Paine, Webber, Jackson & Curtis, 422 Pa. 66; Reader v. Hirsch & Co., 197 F. Supp. 111; Matter of Staklinski [Pyramid Elec. Co.], 6 A D 2d 565, 6 N Y 2d 159.) II. Arbitration of a Donnelly Act claim offends no announced public policy of this State. (Matter of Standardbred Owners Assn. [Yonkers Raceway], 31 Misc 2d 474; Brooklyn Distilling Co. v. Standard Distilling & Distr. Co., 120 App. Div. 237, 193 N. Y. 551; Cummings v. Union Blue Stone Co., 164 N. Y. 401; [*5] Matter of Exercycle Corp. [Maratta], 9 N Y 2d 329; Manhattan Stor. & Warehouse Co. v. Movers & Warehousemen's Assn. of Greater N. Y., 289 N. Y. 82; Saucy Susan Prods. v. Allied Old English, 200 F. Supp. 724; Matter of Ruppert [Egelhofer], 3 N Y 2d 576; Matter of Health Arms [Kemler], 207 Misc. 849; Matter of Grayson-Robinson Stores [Iris Constr. Corp.], 8 N Y 2d 133; Alexander's Dept. Stores v. Orbach's, 266 App. Div. 535.) III. The Donnelly Act claim is not asserted as a defense to, or avoidance of, contractual liability, but as a proper and related affirmative claim. (Kelly v. Kosuga, 358 U.S. 516; Refrigeration Sales Co. v. York Corp., 32 Misc 2d 231, 18 A D 2d 1140; Sporn v. Hudson Tr. Lines, 265 App. Div. 360; Renault, Inc. v. Auto Imports, 15 A D 2d 905.)

Judges: Chief Judge Fuld and Judges Burke, Scileppi, Bergan and Jasen concur with Judge Keating; Judge Breitel taking no part.

Opinion by: KEATING

Opinion

[*623] [223] [969] In February of 1964, appellant, Aimcee Wholesale Corporation, bought some $ 100,000 in merchandise from respondent, Tomar Products, Inc. The contract, [*6] a form purchase order, contained a broad arbitration clause to the effect that "Any controversy or claim arising out of or relating to this [*624] contract or the breach thereof" would be submitted to arbitration.

In August of 1965, Aimcee sought arbitration of a claim for $ 26,870.61 based upon allegations that the merchandise shipped was defective and that certain advertising allowances had not been paid. At about that time, Aimcee had been sued by Tomar in the Supreme Court, Monroe County, based upon an alleged breach of the same agreement. Aimcee also demanded that this claim be submitted to arbitration.

Tomar agreed to arbitration and served an answer in which it set up as a first counterclaim the cause of action then pending in the courts.

A second counterclaim, however, was also interposed asserting that Aimcee had unlawfully [224] exacted a discriminatory price reduction in violation of the Robinson-Patman Act (U. S. Code, tit. 15, § 13) and of the Donnelly Act (General Business Law, § 340, subd. 1). Tomar asked $ 15,000 in treble damages. [*]

[7] Thereafter, Aimcee moved for an order staying arbitration of this second counterclaim. Tomer consented to the stay with respect to the alleged violation of Federal law, but resisted the stay as to the Donnelly Act claim.

Special Term denied Aimcee's application, contending that the antitrust claim was related to the contract and was, therefore, arbitrable.

The Appellate Division unanimously affirmed (26 A D 2d 915) but went off on a different ground. It agreed that Tomar or Aimcee could resist arbitration on the ground that the contract including the arbitration clause was infected with illegality but, the court said, since Aimcee did not deny that there was a valid agreement to arbitrate, it could not object to any particular claim arising out of the parties' contractual dealings (supra, p. 916).

Leave to appeal was granted by this court. We conclude that there should be a reversal here and that the motion for a stay should have been granted. The enforcement of our State's antitrust policy cannot be left to commercial arbitration, which serves a vital and constructive role in the business world, but is not a fit instrument for the determination of antitrust controversies [*8] which are of such extreme importance to all of the people of this State.

[*] New York law has no provision for treble damages in antitrust claims.

[*625] [*970] It will be assumed that the broad language of the arbitration clause embraces even antitrust claims although it is nothing less than a fiction to assume that the parties contemplated or even conceived of the possibility that the form arbitration clause on Aimcee's purchase order constituted an authorization for an arbitrator to decide whether or not Aimcee had violated the antitrust law of the State of New York (General Business Law, art. 22).

The Appellate Division's analysis that a party desiring arbitration cannot at the same time seek to limit the scope of an arbitration is unsatisfactory. The opinion concedes that if Tomar had resisted Aimcee's demand for arbitration, alleging that the agreement was so tainted by illegality that the agreement to arbitrate was nullified, Tomar could have had a trial before the court on that issue (Durst v. Abrash, 22 A D 2d 39, affd. 17 N Y 2d 445). We do not view the problem here so narrowly. The fundamental issue here is the appropriateness of arbitration for the consideration of antitrust problems. This question persists no matter in [*9] what procedural context the issue arises in arbitration. Our decision cannot properly turn on the happenstance of who initiates the litigation or arbitration.

New York's antitrust law represents a public policy of the first magnitude. HN1[] By its very terms, subdivision 1 of section 340 of the General Business Law declares every contract, agreement or conspiracy whereby a monopoly is or may be established or which in any way enervates free competition to be "against public policy, illegal and void." Penal sanctions are provided for in section 341 of the General Business Law. Both because of the importance of the policy and the clandestine nature of the violations, the Attorney-General is empowered to investigate alleged violations and to seek injunctive relief (General Business Law, § 342). In addition, civil actions to recover damages by injured parties are authorized (General Business Law, § 340, subd. 5). There is thus a complete panoply of sanctions and civil relief.

It is also significant that, because of the public interest involved in Donnelly Act [225] suits, in 1959 a statutory requirement was added that the Attorney-General be given notice of all civil actions brought [*10] by private parties under article 22 (General Business Law, § 340, subd. 5; L. 1959, ch. 226).

[*626] The importance of our State's antitrust policy is reflected in our decision in Manhattan Stor. & Warehouse Co. v. Movers Assn. (289 N. Y. 82 [1942]). We there held that our courts would not adjudicate on a stipulated set of facts whether a particular agreement violated the State's antitrust law since to do so [971] might result in a decision on a question of law of widespread significance on the basis of erroneous facts and without the participation of the representatives of the public interest. The sensitivity of the court to the possibility of feigned controversies on an issue of such pervasive importance was but a reflection of the strength of the public policy codified in the Donnelly Act.

The importance of antitrust laws in our nation's economic system was stated most forcefully by the Supreme Court in Northern Pac. Ry. Co. v. United States (356 U.S. 1, 4-5): "The Sherman Act was designed to be a comprehensive charter of economic liberty aimed at preserving free and unfettered competition as the rule of trade. It rests on the premise that the [*11] unrestrained interaction of competitive forces will yield the best allocation of our economic resources, the lowest prices, the highest quality and the greatest material progress, while at the same time providing an environment conducive to the preservation of our democratic political and social institutions. But even were that premise open to question, the policy unequivocally laid down by the Act is competition. And to this end it prohibits 'Every contract, combination * * * or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States.'"

Section 340 of our General Business Law, the language of which is almost a copy of section 1 of the Sherman Act, represents an equally strong public policy in favor of free competition for New York.

We come then to our principal conclusion here, which is that HN2[] the enforcement of our State's antitrust policy should not be left within the purview of commercial arbitration.

HN3[] Arbitrators are not bound by rules of law and their decisions are essentially final. Certainly the awards may not be set aside for misapplication of the law (CPLR 7511). Even if our courts were to review the merits of the arbitrators' decision in antitrust cases, [*12] errors may not even appear in the record which need not be kept in any case. More important, arbitrators are not obliged to give reasons for their rulings or awards. Thus our [*627] courts may be called upon to enforce arbitration awards which are directly at variance with statutory law and judicial decision interpreting that law. Furthermore, there is no way to assure consistency of interpretation or application. The same conduct could be condemned or condoned by different arbitrators.

If the arbitrators here should decide wrongly that the goods were or were not defective, the injustice done is essentially only to the parties concerned. If, however, they should proceed to decide erroneously that there was or was not a violation of the Donnelly Act, the injury extends to the people of the State as a whole. To illustrate, if Tomar is correct [972] in its claim that the rebate here violates the Donnelly Act, and the arbitration panel should deny the claim, then in effect the arbitrators have permitted Aimcee to receive an unjustifiable price reduction which weakens the position of Aimcee's competitors. Conversely, if Tomar is incorrect in its contention, but the arbitrators [*13] should rule in its favor, then the award may be passed on to the consumer in the form of higher prices.

Thus the issue which the arbitrators will be called upon to decide transcends the [226] private interests of the parties. It is not simply that arbitrators can impose unnecessarily restrictive or lenient standards. The evil is that, if the enforcement of antitrust policies is left in the hands of arbitrators, erroneous decisions will have adverse consequences for the public in general, and the guardians of the public interest, the courts, will have no say in the results reached. To paraphrase the court's language in the Manhattan Stor. & Warehouse case, the parties will obtain a decision here on a matter of moment to the public at large, although the State is not a party to the proceedings, and no party to the proceedings is authorized to defend the interests of the public (289 N. Y. 82, 89).

In this connection, it is pertinent to ponder what application will be given to the statutory requirement that notice of all Donnelly Act claims shall be given to the Attorney-General if these claims are permitted to go to arbitration. There is no reason to assume that the Attorney-General [*14] will be less interested in any alleged violations that are submitted for arbitration. Yet, it is inconceivable that the Attorney-General would seek to vindicate the public interest before a private arbitration panel.

[*628] HN4[] It is, therefore, evident that a judicially controlled system of awarding civil damages for violations of the Donnelly Act is a necessary and vital part of the statutory scheme.

Thus, the decision below is not in accord with the fundamental assumptions of Matter of Exercycle Corp. (Maratta) (9 N Y 2d 329 [1961]) which the Appellate Division cited in support of its position. Underpinning Matter of Exercycle is the thought that the ordinary rules of common-law illegality involve defenses to which parties to a business agreement should not be bound. "No statute or public policy, as reflected in a legislative act, is here involved * * * and, absent one or the other, it has long been firmly established that arbitrators may disregard the strict and traditional rules of law" (supra, p. 335).

Antitrust claims cannot be co-opted into the category of common-law rules voiding contracts for lack of consideration or mutuality and [973] treated [*15] in a similar manner. When one contrasts the provisions of article 22 of the General Business Law with the lack of any powerful statutory scheme for voiding contracts which violate common-law rules of illegality, the inappropriateness of arbitration for antitrust claims becomes apparent. For example, the common-law requirement of consideration has been weakened by statutory modification because we now consider the traditional rules harsh. (See General Obligations Law, § 5-1109.) On the other hand, the common-law rule against restraints of trade has been reinforced by statute, bringing within the orbit of proscribed conduct acts which in an earlier day would have been thought perfectly proper and acceptable.

The realities of the commercial arbitration process bolster the conclusion that commercial arbitration is not a proper mechanism for a determination as to whether the price rebate here was discriminatory and violated the Donnelly Act. Arbitrators are often businessmen chosen usually for their familiarity with the practices of a particular industry or for their expertise with the real issues in dispute, which are almost always unrelated to antitrust claims. This problem is [*16] aggravated by the fact that the enforcement of the State's antitrust policy has often been a by-product of Federal enforcement. Thus, even if we were to assume that we have knowledgeable arbitrators, who would willingly and earnestly seek to follow judicial precedent, we cannot ignore the fact that many of the most important [*629] issues in antitrust law, including specifically those in this case, have never been resolved definitively under New York law. This is shown by the fact that it has never been determined whether price [227] discrimination would violate the Donnelly Act.

Moreover, we cannot overlook the fact that many undeserving litigants are awarded damages in antitrust cases. Arbitrators are more likely to give more consideration to equitable notions such as waiver, estoppel and in pari delicto. Every time this is done, however, the deterrent effect of the law on antitrust violations is severely diminished.

The comment of the late Judge Clark in his dissenting opinion in Wilko v. Swan (201 F. 2d 439, 445 [2d Cir.]), whose position was ultimately sustained by the Supreme Court (346 U. S. 427), pointing out the dangers of permitting commercial [*17] arbitration to extend its reach into areas of grave public policy, is most relevant here: "Commercial arbitration has been highly successful in bringing a businessman's adjudication to business questions. But it would be vastly unfortunate if it became usable as a device to blunt or break social legislation."

Thus, it must be recognized that through the use of economic power and contracts of adhesion, containing broad arbitration clauses, antitrust [974] violators may be able to insulate their transgressions of the antitrust law from judicial scrutiny. The opportunity for abuse is apparent. Under various guises, an industry, while nominally assuring obedience to the State's antitrust law, may in reality be establishing and enforcing entirely unacceptable practices.

We have often held that HN5[] the broadest of arbitration agreements cannot oust our courts from their role in the enforcement of major State policies, especially those embodied in statutory form (Durst v. Abrash, 22 A D 2d 39, affd. 17 N Y 2d 445, supra [usury laws]; Matter of Knickerbocker Agency [Holz], 4 N Y 2d 245 [liquidation of defunct insurance companies]; Matter of Kingswood Mgt. [*18] Corp. [Salzman], 272 App. Div. 328 [claim under Federal Emergency Price Control Act of 1942]; see, also, Wilko v. Swan, 346 U.S. 427, supra [claim under Securities Act of 1933]; Koven & Brother v. Local Union No. 5767, United Steelworkers of America, 381 F. 2d 196 [3d Cir.] [scope of discharge in bankruptcy]; contra, Fallick v. Kehr, 369 F. 2d 899 [2d Cir.] [scope of discharge in bankruptcy]; [*630] 8 Weinstein-Korn-Miller, N. Y. Civ. Prac., pars. 7501.15-7501.19). Recently, the Second Circuit in American Safety Equip. Corp. v. Maguire Co. (391 F. 2d 821) came to a conclusion similar to ours involving arbitration of a Federal antitrust claim (see, also, Silvercup Bakers v. Fink Baking Corp., 273 F. Supp. 159, 162-163 [S. D. N. Y.] [dictum]).

All these reasons compel us to determine that HN6[] where antitrust considerations are imbedded in the issues in dispute, they ought not to be resolved by privately appointed arbitrators, and our courts cannot abdicate their control over antitrust policy. By removing antitrust claims from the scope of arbitration, we do not intend to demean the arbitration process. If anything, [*19] its proper role in settling the practical business problems of the everyday business world will be enhanced.

The order of the Appellate Division should be reversed and the appellant's application for a stay of arbitration of respondent's claim under article 22 of the General Business Law should be granted, with costs.

Order reversed, with costs, and matter remitted to Special Term for further proceedings in accordance with the opinion herein.

LexisNexis®

Original Tractor Cab Co. v. United States

United States District Court for the Southern District of Indiana, Indianapolis Division

April 26, 1968

No. IP 67-C-307

Reporter

286 F. Supp. 281 *; 1968 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12406 ; 68-1 U.S. Tax Cas. (CCH) P9374; 21 A.F.T.R.2d (RIA) 1340

Original Tractor Cab Co., Inc., Plaintiff v. United States of America, Defendant

Core Terms

attorney's fees, damages, trebled, patent infringement, anti trust law, Clayton Act, antitrust violation

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Costs & Attorney Fees > Clayton Act

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Costs & Attorney Fees > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Costs & Attorney Fees > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > Prioritizing Resources & Organization for Intellectual Property Act

HN1[] Costs & Attorney Fees, Clayton Act

Section 4 of the Clayton Act provides that: Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue therefor and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained, and the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Tax Law > ... > Tax Accounting > Accrual Method > General Overview

HN2[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

I.R.C. § 1306 (1954) provides: If an amount representing damages is received or accrued during a taxable year as a result of an award in, or settlement of, a civil action brought under § 4 of the Clayton Act, for injuries sustained by the taxpayer in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws, then the tax attributable to the inclusion of such amount in gross income for the taxable year shall not be greater than the aggregate of the increases in taxes which would have resulted if such amount had been included in gross income in equal installments for each month during the period in which such injuries were sustained by the taxpayer.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Costs & Attorney Fees > Clayton Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Remedies > Damages

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Costs & Attorney Fees > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Costs & Attorney Fees > State Regulation

Tax Law > ... > Tax Accounting > Accrual Method > General Overview

HN3[] Costs & Attorney Fees, Clayton Act

Treas. Reg. § 1.1306a-1(b)(1) provides: For purposes of I.R.C. § 1306, the term "damages" means an amount awarded pursuant to a judgment as the result of a civil action instituted under § 4 of the Clayton Act for injuries sustained by the taxpayer in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws. The term "damages" includes treble damages awarded under § 4 of the Act, but it does not include attorneys' fees, interest, or costs.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Costs & Attorney Fees > Clayton Act

Patent Law > ... > Defenses > Inequitable Conduct > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Defenses

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Remedies > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Remedies > Damages

Patent Law > Infringement Actions > General Overview

Patent Law > Remedies > General Overview

Patent Law > ... > Damages > Collateral Assessments > General Overview

Patent Law > ... > Damages > Collateral Assessments > Attorney Fees

Patent Law > Remedies > Damages > Increased Damages

Patent Law > Remedies > Damages > Patentholder Losses

Tax Law > ... > Tax Accounting > Accrual Method > General Overview

HN4[] Costs & Attorney Fees, Clayton Act

The exclusion of attorneys' fees in Treas. Reg. § 1.1306-1(b)(1) refers to non-trebled "reasonable attorney's fees" recoverable under § 4 of the Clayton Act, but not to attorneys' fees incurred in the defense of a patent infringement action which are trebled as an element of "compensatory damages." The latter type of attorneys' fees are in the same class as damages for loss of business such as finance expenses, advertising costs, and loss of potential sales, and were, therefore, trebled. The regulation clearly provides that the term "damages" includes treble damages awarded under § 4 of the Act. The court must conclude that the statement in the regulation that the term "damages" does not include attorneys' fees," therefore, refers to the non-trebled attorney's fee incurred in the prosecution of the antitrust action under § 4 of the Act.

Judges: [1] Holder, District Judge.

Opinion by: HOLDER

Opinion

[*281] Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law

HOLDER, District Judge:

The captioned case was tried under the issues of the complaint filed July 19, 1967, as amended December 4, 1967, and the answer thereto filed on September 25, 1967, as amended on December 4, 1967. Opening arguments, trial, final arguments, and arguments on briefs having been waived, the matter was submitted to the Court on the stipulation of the parties and the post-trial briefs, and the admissions contained in said pleadings, stipulations, and/or briefs. The Court being advised in the matter does now submit its:

Findings of Fact

1. On April 14, 1950, Clyde E. Clapper brought suit in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Indiana, Civil Number 2255, against the Original Tractor Cab Co., Inc. (hereinafter called "Original") for an alleged patent infringement. Original counterclaimed for misuse of patents and violations of the antitrust laws. Original also filed cross-claims against the licensees of Clapper. 2. In December, 1954, Original and the licensees entered into an agreement whereby Original received $110,000.00 as settlement of [2] its claims against the licensees. 3. In January, 1958, the United States District Court for the Southern District of Indiana, Indianapolis Division, found that the Clapper patent was invalid and that Clapper had violated the antitrust laws. The Court determined that Original was damaged in the amount of $27,611.35. This sum was [*282] trebled under Section 4 of the Clayton Act to $82,834.05. The Court credited the $82,834.05 against the $110,000.00 that Original had received on the prior settlement. The Court also awarded $28,244.31 to Original as its attorneys' fees in the patent infringement cause of action. Clapper v. Original Tractor Cab Co., Inc., 165 F. Supp. 565 (S.D. Ind., 1958). 4. On appeal, the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit affirmed the decision of the District Court except that it found that the attorneys' fees in the patent infringement litigation should have been included as an element of damages in the antitrust cause of action and thereby trebled under the Clayton Act. Clapper v. Original Tractor Cab Co., Inc., 270 F.2d 616 (7th Cir., 1959), cert. denied 361 U.S. 967, 4 L. Ed. 2d 547, 80 S. Ct. 588 (1960). Thus, the judgment awarded [3] to Original included $27,611.35 (damages from loss of business) X 3 plus $28,244.31 (attorneys' fees in the patent infringement cause of action) X 3 for a total of $167,566.98. Original was then required to subtract the $110,000.00 it received from the licensees from this sum for a difference of $57,566.98.

5. Original received said $57,566.98 in 1960. In its 1960 Corporate Income Tax Return, Original allocated said $57,566.98 to the years in which the antitrust violations occurred. 6. On October 29, 1965, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue assessed a deficiency against Original in the amount of $14,132.84 tax and $3,919.05 interest. 7. On November 3, 1965, Original paid the total deficiency plus interest in the amount of $18,051.89. 8. Original filed a claim for refund on or about November 19, 1965, with the District Director of Internal Revenue at Indianapolis, Indiana, in the amount of $14,132.84 plus statutory interest. 9. On July 11, 1966, Original executed a waiver of statutory notice of disallowance and filed a suit for refund on July 19, 1967, in this Court to recover $18,051.89 plus interest.

10. The issue in this case is whether the plaintiff: (1) should include [4] said sum of $57,566.98 in its income for 1960 when said sum was received; or (2) should allocate said sum of $57,566.98 to the years in which the antitrust violations occurred pursuant to the provisions of Section 1306 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954. 11. The plaintiff argues that said $57,566.98 should be allocated to the years in which the antitrust violations occurred because the $57,566.98 represents damages received as a result of an award in a civil action brought under Section 4 of the Clayton Act within the meaning of Section 1306 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954. 12. The defendant argues that said $57,566.98 is included in the plaintiff's income for 1960 because said sum represents attorneys' fees or amounts received directly from an award of attorneys' fees and the allocation provisions of Section 1306 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 do not apply to amounts received for attorneys' fees or to amounts received directly from an award of attorneys' fees.

Conclusions of Law

1. The Court has jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject matter of this action. 2. The plaintiff has proved by preponderance of the evidence all of the essential elements and facts [5] of the amended complaint. 3. The plaintiff was awarded compensatory damages by this Court under its Amended Order dated June 10, 1960, as the result of a direction by the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit under date of September 30, 1959, which compensatory damages were trebled in accordance with Section 4 of the Clayton Act. Against this threefold amount a credit of $110,000.00 was credited as an amount previously paid by the co-conspirators. The net amount received, viz. $57,566.98, represents an award for violation of the antitrust law under Section 4 of the Clayton Act and, as such, may be reallocated pro rata over the period of violation pursuant to Section 1306 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954. HN1[] Section 4 of the Clayton Act provides that "Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue therefor * * * and shall recover threefold the [*283] damages by him sustained, and the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee.". Original Tractor Cab Co., Inc. recovered $25,000.00 as reasonable attorneys' fees for the prosecution of its counterclaim for antitrust violations [6] under this section. Plaintiff did not reallocate this amount, but properly included it in its income for the year 1960. The part of the award which plaintiff argues can be allocated under Section 1306 of the Internal Revenue Code is the $28,244.31 expense for attorneys' fees incurred in the defense of the patent infringement action brought against it by Clyde E. Clapper. The Seventh Circuit (Clapper v. Original Tractor Cab Company, 270 F.2d 616 (1959)) held that this amount "should be included in the compensatory damages sustained by Defendants as a result of the antitrust violation". This amount was, therefore, trebled along with damages for loss of business "as an element of damages in the antitrust action".

HN2[] Section 1306 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, as it was in force in 1960, provided:

> "If an amount representing damages is received or accrued during a taxable year as a result of an award in, or settlement of, a civil action brought under section 4 of the Act * * *, for injuries sustained by the taxpayer in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws, then the tax attributable to the inclusion of such amount in gross income for [7] the taxable year shall not be greater than the aggregate of the increases in taxes which would have resulted if such amount had been included in gross income in equal installments for each month during the period in which such injuries were sustained by the taxpayer."

HN3[] Section 1.1306a-1(b)(1) of the Treasury Regulations (Title 26 C.F.R. Section 1.1306a-1) provides:

> "For purposes of section 1306 and this section the term 'damages' means an amount awarded pursuant to a judgment * * * as the result of a civil action instituted under section 4 of the Act * * * for injuries sustained by the taxpayer in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws. The term 'damages' includes treble damages awarded under section 4 of the Act but it does not include attorneys' fees, interest, or costs."

It appears to the Court that HN4[] the exclusion of attorneys' fees in the regulation refers to non-trebled "reasonable attorney's fees" recoverable under Section 4 of the Clayton Act, but not to attorneys' fees incurred in the defense of a patent infringement action which are trebled as an element of "compensatory damages". The latter type of attorneys' fees were regarded [8] by the Court to be in the same class as damages for loss of business such as finance expenses, advertising costs, and loss of potential sales, and were, therefore, trebled. The regulation clearly provides that "the term 'damages' includes treble damages awarded under Section 4 of the Act". The Court must conclude that the statement in the regulation that "the term 'damages' * * * does not include attorneys' fees", therefore, refers to the non-trebled attorney's fee incurred in the prosecution of the antitrust action under Section 4 of the Act. 4. The law is with the plaintiff and against the defendant in all of the issues of the essential elements and facts of the pleadings based upon the facts as found by this Court in its Findings of Facts. 5. The Clerk is directed to enter judgment in accordance with these findings and conclusions; that the Federal Income Tax for the year 1960 be recalculated upon the basis of these findings and conclusions; that the plaintiff's recovery of defendant is refund of such taxes with the interest which they have over-paid, together with interest thereon at the rate of 6% per annum until repaid in accordance with the law; and that the costs of this [9] action be assessed against the defendant.

End of Document

National Dairy Products Corp. v. Federal Trade Com.

United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit

May 14, 1968

No. 15896

Reporter

395 F.2d 517 *; 1968 U.S. App. LEXIS 6956 ; 1968 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,445

National Dairy Products Corp. v. Federal Trade Commission

Subsequent History: [1] Cert. Denied, 393 U.S. 977, 89 S. Ct. 444, 21 L. Ed. 2d 438 (1968).

Core Terms

discount, customers, milk, chain, purchasers, prices, averaging, certiorari denied, competitors, list price, Foods, meeting competition, ice cream, dairies, selling, cost saving, Clayton Act, aggregating, wholesale, retail, price discrimination, discriminatory, allowance, condemned, delivery, products, seller, volume, competitive injury, dairy product

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > Robinson-Patman Act > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Competitive Injuries > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Competitive Injuries > Primary Line Injuries

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Competitive Injuries > Secondary & Tertiary Line Injuries

HN1[] Robinson-Patman Act, Claims

The competitive effects clause of § 2(a) of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 13(a), does not require showing that injury has actually occurred, but merely that the effect of the discrimination may be substantially to lessen competition. Any substantial, sustained differential between competing resellers is prima facie injurious. "Mini-injury" is the test.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Competitive Injuries > General Overview

HN2[] Price Discrimination, Competitive Injuries

Injury from discriminatory pricing may be inferred even if the favored customer did not undersell his rivals, for a substantial price advantage can enlarge the favored buyer's profit margin or enable him to offer attractive services to his customers.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Competitive Injuries > General Overview

HN3[] Price Discrimination, Competitive Injuries

Unless minuscule, the portion of the market that might be affected by the charging of discriminatory prices is immaterial.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Competitive Injuries > General Overview

HN4[] Price Discrimination, Competitive Injuries

Competitive injury is not negated by the pricing policies of a company's competitors.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Robinson-Patman Act > Defenses

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Defenses

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Defenses > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Defenses > Meeting Competition Defense

HN5[] Robinson-Patman Act, Defenses

Even though a business' discounts violate § 2(a) of the Clayton Act, the business has a good defense by showing that its lower price was made in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Defenses > Cost Justification Defense

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Defenses > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Defenses > Meeting Competition Defense

HN6[] Defenses, Cost Justification Defense

Section 2(b) of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 13(b), may be satisfied unless the seller is meeting prices that he knows to be illegal or that are of such a nature as are inherently illegal.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Defenses > General Overview

HN7[] Price Discrimination, Defenses

The requirement that a seller must show it had reason to believe that it was meeting lawful lower prices has been abandoned by the Federal Trade Commission.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Robinson-Patman Act > Defenses

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Defenses

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Discrimination > Buyer Liability

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Defenses > General Overview

HN8[] Robinson-Patman Act, Defenses

The cost savings proviso permits differentials making only due allowance for differences in the cost of manufacture, sale, or delivery resulting from the delivery methods or quantities in which commodities are sold or delivered to purchasers.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Defenses > General Overview

Business & Corporate Law > Unincorporated Associations

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

HN9[] Price Discrimination, Defenses

A balance is struck by the use of classes for cost justification which are composed of members of such selfsameness as to make the averaging of the cost of dealing with the group a valid and reasonable indicium of the cost of dealing with any specific group member. High on the list of musts in the use of the average cost of customer groupings under the proviso of § 2(a) of the Clayton Act is a close resemblance of the individual members of each group on the essential point or points which determine the costs considered.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Defenses > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

HN10[] Price Discrimination, Defenses

When a store, by virtue of being averaged with a larger store, receives a discount it has not earned, it gains an unfair competitive advantage of the sort which the amended Clayton Act was designed to prevent. An averaging system, when it permits some stores to receive a significantly larger discount than they could earn individually, has an anticompetitive effect comparable to that of practices long condemned by the Clayton Act. Thus, a territorial price discrimination violates the Clayton Act because a seller's high prices in one area subsidize its low prices in another.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Competitive Injuries > General Overview

HN11[] Price Discrimination, Competitive Injuries

A basing point system in which the seller absorbs freight charges to some customers and adds "phantom" freight charges to others constitutes discriminatory pricing because they are related to factors other than actual costs of production or delivery.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

HN12[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

The retail stores of an association can be classified as purchasers from the manufacturer even if they technically purchase from the association where such a classification would further the purposes of the Clayton Act, as amended.

Judges: Hastings, Chief Judge, Major, Senior Circuit Judge, and Cummings, Circuit Judge.

Opinion by: CUMMINGS

Opinion

[*520] CUMMINGS, Circuit Judge:

This case arises on the petition of National Dairy Products Corporation ("National") to set aside an order of the Federal Trade Commission applicable to its Sealtest Foods Division.

National is a Delaware corporation with its principal office and place of business in New York City. It is engaged in the business of purchasing, manufacturing, processing, distributing and selling dairy and other products throughout the United States. It is the nation's largest dairy product distributor. Its Sealtest Division has general supervision over National's food, milk and ice cream divisions and subsidiaries. The Sealtest divisions sell a diversified line of food products, including milk and ice cream. In 1956, National's net sales were approximately $1,352,878,000, increasing to $1,790,834,000 in 1961.

At the close of 1957, the Federal Trade Commission issued a complaint charging that National had violated Sections 2(a) and (d) of the Clayton Act, [2] as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act (15 U.S.C. §§ 13(a) and 13(d)), in the course of sales of milk and other dairy products through its Sealtest Foods Division. In July 1963, a hearing examiner held that National had violated both statutory provisions and accordingly recommended a [*521] cease and desist order after rejecting National's defenses of cost justification and good-faith meeting of competition.

National appealed to the Commission from the Section 2(a) portion of the examiner's order. The Commission granted the appeal in part in a 2-1 decision culminating in the following order:

> " IT IS ORDERED that respondent National Dairy Products Corporation, a corporation, and its officers, employees, agents and representatives, directly or through any corporate or other device in or in connection with the offering for sale, sale or distribution of any of the items in the product line of its Sealtest Foods Division, including but not limited to fluid milk, dairy products, ice cream and other food products, in commerce, as 'commerce' is defined in the Clayton Act, do forthwith cease and desist from:

> "1. Discriminating, directly or indirectly, [3] in the price of such products of like grade and quality by selling to any purchaser at net prices higher than the net prices charged any other purchaser who competes with the purchaser paying the higher price." [1]

In addition to arguing that the Commission's findings and conclusions are unsupported by substantial evidence, National asserts that the Commission majority misinterpreted the clauses in Sections 2(a) and (b) of the Clayton Act dealing with cost justification, good-faith meeting of competition and competitive effects. Commissioner Elman's dissent, [4] on which National relies, deals only with the standards to be applied to the defense of meeting competition under Section 2(b) of the Act. The Commission's order was based on National's discriminatory pricing in the following areas: (1) Jackson-Lansing-Battle Creek, Michigan; (2) Toledo, Ohio -- Monroe, Michigan; (3) Memphis, and (4) New Orleans. As to the first area, the Commission held that the evidence was insufficient to find that National's sales were in interstate commerce, so that only the other three areas are presently involved. In this opinion, each area and the legal issues pertaining thereto will be covered separately.

Toledo-Monroe Area

Here in 1958 National granted 13 customers a fluid milk discount of 12%, 8 customers 10%, and one customer 7%. These 22 discounts were in excess of those received by National's other retail store customers. One hundred fifty-eight of them received no discounts and 112 received discounts ranging from 2% to 6%.

Although rejecting the examiner's finding of primary line injury, the Commission sustained his finding of potential secondary line injury to retail grocers selling Sealtest milk. [5] HN1[] The competitive effects clause of the statute of course does not require showing that injury has actually occurred, but merely that the effect of the discrimination "may be substantially to lessen competition" (15 U.S.C. § 13(a)). As here, any substantial, sustained differential between competing resellers is prima facie injurious. "Mini-injury" is the test. Rowe, "Section 2(a) of the Robinson-Patman Act New Dimensions in the Competitive Injury Concept," 37 ABA Antitrust Law Journal 14, 16 (1968).

Only six independent grocery stores received more than a 6% discount from National, whereas most of its chain and group store customers were receiving a 12% discount. These high discounts enabled them to sell Sealtest milk at a price lower than the price paid to National for such milk by all but six of its [*522] independent store customers. The evidence clearly shows that National's discounts resulted "in price differentials between competing purchasers sufficient in amount to influence their resale prices" of milk. Under Federal Trade Commission v. Morton Salt Company, 334 U.S. 37, 47, 92 L. Ed. 1196, 68 S. Ct. 822, [6] this showing is adequate to support the Commission's finding that the effect of National's price discriminations might be substantially to injure competition among retail stores in the Toledo-Monroe area.

In E. Edelmann & Company v. Federal Trade Commission, 239 F.2d 152, 154 (7th Cir. 1956), certiorari denied, 355 U.S. 941, 2 L. Ed. 2d 422, 78 S. Ct. 426, we held the competitive effects clause of Section 2(a) of the Clayton Act satisfied in the following circumstances:

> "We therefore turn to the record which shows substantial discriminations in price; that the purchasers of petitioner's products sold in a market where competition was keen; that these purchasers operated on small profit margins; that many of the purchasers found it expedient to enter into group buying arrangements for the purpose of aggregating their purchases and thereby obtaining higher discounts than they would otherwise receive as ordinary jobbers in contrast to the warehouse distributor."

---

[1] A second portion of the order concerned National's violation of Section 2(d). National did not appeal to the Commission from that portion of the order, but in this Court, National objected to the entire order on the ground that it was supported by only two of the Commission's five members. In view of Federal Trade Commission v. Flotill Products, 389 U.S. 179, 19 L. Ed. 2d 398, 88 S. Ct. 401, this point has been abandoned.

Since all these factors were present here, the Commission's finding of probable competitive injury must stand. This is true even if there had been direct testimony by non favored [7] customers that the price discriminations had not injured their businesses. Foremost Dairies, Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission, 348 F.2d 674, 680 (5th Cir. 1965), certiorari denied, 382 U.S. 959, 15 L. Ed. 2d 362, 86 S. Ct. 435. As there pointed out, HN2[] injury may be inferred even if the favored customer did not undersell his rivals, for a substantial price advantage can enlarge the favored buyer's profit margin or enable him to offer attractive services to his customers.

As in United Biscuit Company of America v. Federal Trade Commission, 350 F.2d 615, 621 (7th Cir. 1965), certiorari denied, 383 U.S. 926, 15 L. Ed. 2d 845, 86 S. Ct. 930, the Commission did not apply a per se test in finding that the competitive effect of National's pricing practices would be substantial. Instead, it relied on the following factors and testimony of independent store owners (TRADE REGULATION REPORTS (1965-1967 Transfer Binder) para. 17,656, pp. 22,917-22,918) (1966)):

> "They received either no discount or a discount of 2 or 3 percent on their [8] purchases of Sealtest milk. Their retail prices to the public generally were from 41 cents to 43 cents a half gallon. The generally prevailing retail price of Sealtest milk at the chain stores was 37 cents. At regular intervals, either on weekends or each month, the chains offered Sealtest milk at three half gallons for one dollar.
>
> "The independent store owners named chain stores selling Sealtest milk as their competitors. All of them stated that they had lost business as a result of the chain stores' prices, one of them characterizing the effect of such pricing as 'devastating' on his sales volume. Other owners testified that their customers were not willing to pay the price their stores charged for milk and would drive a substantial distance to take advantage of low milk prices. One Toledo grocer, in answer to a question as to whether his store was in competition with other stores selling Sealtest milk stated: 'We can't be in competition with them [at] the price we pay for it. We do try to run a special occasionally at a loss to ourselves to try to be competitive.' A Kroger store, receiving a 12 per cent discount, is located four blocks from his store."

This evidence [9] satisfies the Morton Salt and United Biscuit tests. HN3[] Furthermore, unless minuscule, the portion [*523] of the market that might be affected by the charging of these discriminatory prices is immaterial. Whitaker Cable Corp. v. Federal Trade Commission, 239 F.2d 253, 255-256 (7th Cir. 1956), certiorari denied, 353 U.S. 938, 1 L. Ed. 2d 761, 77 S. Ct. 813. HN4[] Nor is competitive injury negated by the pricing policies of National's competitors. Federal Trade Commission v. A. E. Staley Manufacturing Co., 324 U.S. 746, 751, 753-754, 65 S. Ct. 971, 89 L. Ed. 1338; Whitaker Cable Corp. v. Federal Trade Commission, ibid, at pp. 254-256; Foremost Dairies, Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission, 348 F.2d 674, 679 (5th Cir. 1965), certiorari denied, 382 U.S. 959, 15 L. Ed. 2d 362, 86 S. Ct. 435. We also cannot accept National's argument that the disfavored independents should have joined voluntary or cooperative groups and thus obtained higher [10] discounts. The Robinson-Patman Act does not force them to sacrifice their independence. One of the reasons for its enactment was to protect the independents from the chains and other large buying groups. Federal Trade Commission v. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 363 U.S. 536, 543-544, 4 L. Ed. 2d 1385, 80 S. Ct. 1267; Rowe, Price Discrimination Under the Robinson-Patman Act (1962), pp. 11-23.

HN5[] Even though National's discounts violated Section 2(a) of the Act, National would have a good defense by showing that its lower price "was made in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor" (15 U.S.C. § 13(b)). As to its 22 customers receiving more than the customary discounts, National asserts that discounts to 19 were granted in good faith to meet offers of competitors. The principal reason given by the Commission for rejecting the good-faith meeting of competition defense was as follows (op. cit. p. 22,922):

> "Respondent has failed to demonstrate any reason to believe that the wholesale list prices of competitors whose prices it claims to have met [11] were the same as its own. Not only has respondent failed to make this showing, but the evidence clearly and convincingly discloses that the wholesale list prices of certain of these competitors were higher than respondent's."

The Commission apparently considered that National had not made the requisite showing because National did not prove that its competitors' list prices were the same or lower, but that requirement is inconsistent with Federal Trade Commission v. A.E. Staley Manufacturing Co., 324 U.S. 746, 65 S. Ct. 971, 89 L. Ed. 1338; Callaway Mills Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 362 F.2d 435, 443-444 (5th Cir. 1966), and Forster Manufacturing Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 335 F.2d 47, 55-56 (1st Cir. 1964), certiorari denied, 380 U.S. 906, 85 S. Ct. 887, 13 L. Ed. 2d 794. We agree with Commissioner Elman's dissenting view that such a burden of proof is too strict and unreasonable and is not imposed by Section 2(b); but even if there were such a burden, National has met it.

Actually the evidence showed that Page's list price for half gallons was 2 cents below National's; Driggs' half gallon prices were [12] the same; Meadowgold's, Trilby Farm's and Cherry Grove's prices were the same or less; while Wilson Dairy, Independent Dairies and United Dairies had lower Monroe prices than National. The only relevant list price missing from the record is Babcock's, and the majority opinion concluded that Babcock's list was higher than National's. The majority speculated that Babcock must have had a higher list price than Sealtest because Babcock's discount schedule had lower point requirements. If this were true, Babcock would not be competitive with Page, Driggs, or the lower-priced small dairies. The Commission assumed that Babcock's list prices must be higher than National's because National "could not sell milk in this market at net prices which were consistently one or two cents above its competitors'" (op. cit. p. 22,923 (1966)). This theory is contradicted by the facts, for the record shows that various National competitors had the same list prices and better discounts than National. Being a well-known national brand, Sealtest could sell [*524] at a higher price than local brands. The record shows that Country Store priced Sealtest 2 cents above Driggs, and Sealtest was selling from [13] 2 to 4 cents above Page in Clark's Market. The record also shows that National had 253 independent store customers in the 0 to 4% discount brackets, accounting for more than 10% of National's sales, even though Page's list price was 2 cents less than Sealtest's. Thus Page, without granting any discount, could undercut National in this group by as much as 2 cents. We conclude that no substantial evidence supports the Commission's finding that Babcock's list prices were higher than National's.

The Commission rejected the good-faith meeting of competition defense with respect to National's discounts to the Associated Grocers and Saveway group purchasers, on the ground that those concerns were already planning to replace Meadowgold as their milk supplier. National's representatives were seasoned dairy men and were familiar with the competitive situation, so that they should have been aware of AG and Saveway dissatisfaction with Meadowgold. It was, we believe, permissible for the Commission to conclude that National did not in good faith believe it was necessary to compete with Meadowgold's prices in order to recapture AG and Saveway as customers.

National has not endeavored to [14] support its discounts to Joseph's, National Food or Wrigley's corporate chains by the defense of meeting competition. Joseph's and National Food were both large customers, and even Wrigley's purchased $4300 worth of milk per month from National. National's failure to support the meeting competition defense to these customers and AG and Saveway justified the Commission's view that National's discounts in this area might substantially injure competition.

Another reason advanced by the Commission majority for rejecting the defense of meeting competition was that National was meeting unlawful discounts with respect to the AG and Saveway accounts. However, as held in Standard Oil Co. v. Brown, 238 F.2d 54, 58 (5th Cir. 1956), HN6[] Section 2(b) may be satisfied unless the seller is meeting prices "that he knows to be illegal or that are of such a nature as are inherently illegal." That standards are met here, for Meadowgold's prices to AG and Saveway were not plainly illegal. Meadowgold's discounts may have been cost justified [2] or made to meet another competitor's discounts. [3] [15] Moreover, as Commissioner Elman observed, HN7[] the Commission previously abandoned any requirement that a seller must show it had

[2] Averaging the cost of serving chain stores was not condemned by the Supreme Court until 1962. United States v. Borden Co., 370 U.S. 460, 8 L. Ed. 2d 627, 82 S. Ct. 1309.

[3] Under Sunshine Biscuits, Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission, 306 F.2d 48 (7th Cir. 1962), Meadowgold could obtain new customers by meeting competitive prices selectively.

reason to believe that it was meeting lawful lower prices. See Continental Baking Co. (TRADE REGULATION REPORTS (1963-1965 Transfer Binder) § 16,720 (1963)), Ponca Wholesale Mercantile Co. (TRADE REGULATION REPORTS (1963-1965 Transfer Binder) § 16,814 (1964)), and Beatrice Foods Co. (TRADE REGULATION REPORTS (1965-1967 Transfer Binder) para. 17,311 (1965)).

Since the Commission's opinion does not discuss the meeting competition defense with respect to 17 other [16] Toledo-Monroe customers of National, this opinion need not consider those off-scale discounts.

Next, National relies on the cost savings defense with respect to 8 of its 22 customers receiving discriminatory discounts. The milk deliveries were to the individual stores and not to any central warehouse. Time studies showed that it took National's drivers less time per case to deliver to a large volume store, so that National's per case distribution costs would be less in serving such stores. HN8[] The cost savings proviso permits differentials making "only due allowance for differences in the cost of manufacture, sale, or delivery resulting from the delivery [*525] methods or quantities" in which commodities are sold or delivered to purchasers (15 U.S.C. § 13(a)). National endeavored to establish this defense both on a "per [chain or group] purchaser" and on a store-by-store basis.

Under the former method, National totaled the distribution cost to each unit and divided it by the total dollar purchases of rebatable products of all units in the chain or group to obtain [17] the cost per dollar of serving the purchaser. This averaging method would warrant the same discounts to all stores whose volume qualifies for the particular discount in question, assuming the discount brackets are fairly drawn. Therefore, averaging would be permissible for National with respect to six of its corporate chain customers. [4] [19] However, in the case of the Red & White Stores and the Saveway Stores, the averaging method would not be justified in granting a 12% discount to each member store because various of them individually purchased enough milk only to qualify for a much smaller percentage discount, such as received by most of National's independent store customers. United States v. Borden, Company, 370 U.S. 460, 8 L. Ed. 2d 627, 82 S. Ct. 1309, condemns cost justification that would create such artificial disparities. There the Court disapproved of discounts permitting an independent store to receive a lower discount than a chain store of the same size. The following cost savings guidelines were established in Borden (370 U.S. at p. 469):

> HN9[] [18]
>
> "A balance is struck by the use of classes for cost justification which are composed of members of such selfsameness as to make the averaging of the cost of dealing with the group a valid and reasonable indicium of the cost of dealing with any specific group member. High on the list of 'musts' in the use of the average cost of customer groupings under the proviso of § 2(a) is a close resemblance of the individual members of each group on the essential point or points which determine the costs considered."

National's "per customer" cost savings defense fails because there is no "close resemblance of the individual members" of these two voluntary groups, so that the cost of serving them may not be computed by using the averaging method. [5] Otherwise, as Justice Clark picturesquely put it, one would be "averaging one horse and one rabbit" (at p. 470), with an entirely different cost of serving each.

---

[4] One Kroger store took only 7,864 points a month and was cost justified up to an 11.47% bracket. Being only 1 of Kroger's 22 stores and almost qualifying for the 12% discount, this store should be permitted within the averaging. One Seaway Foodtown store took only 5,891 monthly points and was cost justified only up to 9.18%. As to such a borderline store, any injurious effect of the discount would seem so remote that this store could also be considered as sufficiently homogeneous for averaging.

[5] American Motors Corp. v. Federal Trade Commission, 384 F.2d 247 (6th Cir. 1967), certiorari denied, 390 U.S. 1012, 88 S. Ct. 1260, 20 L. Ed. 2d 164, 36 U.S. Law Week 3390, does not support National's use of the average cost of serving the members of the chain and voluntary groups. As the court there observed, American Motors' cost report "Did not average the volume of National argues that "purchaser" as used in the cost proviso means all the stores in a chain or group taken as a unit. This may be true, but it does not help National. The crucial question is not whether a chain is a purchaser, but whether the discount is "due allowance" for cost differences. The Commission observed that HN10[] when a store, by virtue of being averaged with a larger store, receives a discount [20] it has not earned, it gains an unfair competitive advantage of the sort which the amended Clayton Act was designed to prevent. An averaging system, when it permits some stores to receive a significantly larger discount than they could earn individually, has an antiicompetitive effect comparable to that [*526] of practices long condemned by the Act. Thus a territorial price discrimination violates the Act because a seller's high prices in one area subsidize its low prices in another. Moore v. Mead's Fine Bread Co., 348 U.S. 115, 119, 99 L. Ed. 145, 75 S. Ct. 148. HN11[] Likewise, the Supreme Court has condemned a basing point system in which the seller absorbs freight charges to some customers and adds "phantom" freight charges to others. Corn Products Refining Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 324 U.S. 726, 65 S. Ct. 961, 89 L. Ed. 1320. In that case, the Court noted that the prices were discriminatory because they were related "to factors other than actual costs of production or delivery" (324 U.S. at p. 732;). The same is true here. In the [21] automotive parts industry, discount sales to buying groups have repeatedly been condemned where the group buying does not create cost savings for the seller. Mid-South Distributors v. Federal Trade Commission, 287 F.2d 512, 517 (5th Cir. 1961), certiorari denied, 368 U.S. 838, 7 L. Ed. 2d 39, 82 S. Ct. 36; American Motor Specialties Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 278 F.2d 225, 228 (2d Cir. 1960), certiorari denied, 364 U.S. 884, 5 L. Ed. 2d 105, 81 S. Ct. 169; Standard Motor Products, Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission, 265 F.2d 674, 675-6 (2d Cir. 1959), certiorari denied, 361 U.S. 826, 4 L. Ed. 2d 69, 80 S. Ct. 73. Because milk is not centrally warehoused, the usual economies of scale associated with chain and co-op buying are absent here. The cost of selling a given volume of milk to one store is the same whether that store is part of a group or chain or an independent. Therefore, when the group or chain receives a greater discount than the independent, the seller is bowing to the size of the buyer and not making "due allowance" for cost savings. In Federal Trade Commission v. Standard Motor Products, Inc., 371 F.2d 613 (2d Cir. 1967), [22] enforcement of a Commission order condemning an annual rebate system was denied in part because the Commission "should have analyzed the competitive injury resulting from Standard's purchaser classification." 371 F.2d at p. 621, n. 12. National here asks the Court to fault the Commission for making just such an analysis.

National also argues that abandonment of the averaging system will put it at a competitive disadvantage vis-a-vis intrastate dairies who will continue to grant average discounts to chains. If this happens, the net prices of the competing dairies will either be lower than National's or they will not. If they are lower, the meeting competition defense may be available to protect National; if they are not lower, National will not really be at a competitive disadvantage.

Finally, National relies on a number of cases dealing with the adequacy of cost studies. [6] These are inapplicable because the Commission, reversing the examiner, approved the methodology and results of National's cost study. It is true that if a time-study man has to ride every milk truck on every delivery, the cost justification defense will become a nullity. The Commission has [23] not imposed such an unreasonable requirement here. In fact, it has treated National's one-week study as a reliable barometer of market conditions. In rejecting the averaging system, the Commission has not impugned any of the data obtained by the study; rather, it has interpreted that data in the light of the purpose of the amended Clayton Act to protect independent merchants and in accord with United States v. Borden, Company, 370 U.S. 460, 8 L. Ed. 2d 627, 82 S. Ct. 1309.

Borden does permit the grouping together of reasonably homogenous units. For example, if a National cost study showed that a store using 3,000 units [*527] justified a certain [24] discount on a cost basis, under Borden National could award such a discount to all other stores similarly situated without doing a time study for each store.

---

sales or the lesser cost of selling to the respective merchandising distributors" (384 F.2d at p. 256). It was chiefly on this basis that American Motors distinguished Borden.

[6] E.g., American Can Co. v. Russellville Canning Co., 191 F.2d 38 (8th Cir. 1951); Reid v. Harper & Bros., 235 F.2d 420 (2d Cir. 1956), certiorari denied, 352 U.S. 952, 1 L. Ed. 2d 242, 77 S. Ct. 326; Federal Trade Commission v. Standard Motor Products, Inc., 371 F.2d 613 (2d Cir. 1967).

The Commission found that prior to the adoption of the averaging schedule in 1960, National had a discount system in which the purchases of all the stores in the chain or group were aggregated. Under such a system, a group of stores, none of which was individually entitled to any discount, could obtain the maximum discount by aggregating their purchases. An aggregating system bears less resemblance to the realities of cost savings than does an averaging system. National does not seriously dispute this. Rather, it argues that it did not in fact employ an aggregating system but granted the large discounts to meet competition (except as to Joseph's, National Food and Wrigley). Because the evidence is in conflict on this question, we may not disturb the Commission's finding that the prior discount system to chain and group purchasers was based on impermissible aggregating. National did not attempt to cost justify the aggregating practice.

National asserts that it has cost justified its discounts to 6 corporate chains [25] (Big Bear, Joseph's, National Foods, Kroger, Wrigley's, and Seaway Foodtown (except for one store)) even on the store-by-store basis demanded by the Commission. [7] The Commission's brief does not dispute this and our study of the record supports National's portrayal. Nevertheless, National's remaining unjustified discounts in this area adequately support the Commission's competitive injury conclusions.

Memphis Area

In Memphis, 200 independent stores, representing 50% of National's ice cream customers, received no discount. At the same time, National had the following discount schedule in effect for independent stores:

Gallons	Discounts/Gallon
0 -- 49	0
50 -- 79	2 cents
80 -- 109	3 cents
110 -- 139	4 cents
140 and over	5 cents

Under this schedule most independents received no discount. Chain and group stores were [26] accorded a 7 cents per gallon off schedule discount.

The sale of ice cream in this area was highly competitive, and the independent stores receiving no discount were located near many of the chain and group members receiving the 7 cents per gallon discount, thus enabling them to sell ice cream at lower prices than the independents. Numerous chain and group member stores handled smaller ice cream volume than numerous independents and yet received the 7 cents discount solely due to their affiliation. Concomitantly, many independents received no discount while equally small affiliated stores received the 7 cents per gallon discount. We agree with the Commission that these facts show that National's discounts had the probable effect of lessening competition at the secondary level. See Federal Trade Commission v. Morton Salt Co., 334 U.S. 37, 50-51, 92 L. Ed. 1196, 68 S. Ct. 822; United Biscuit Company of America v. Federal Trade Commission, 350 F.2d 615, 621 (7th Cir. 1965), certiorari denied, 383 U.S. 926, 15 L. Ed. 2d 845, 86 S. Ct. 930; Whitaker Cable Corporation v. Federal Trade Commission, 239 F.2d 253, 255 (7th Cir. 1956), [27] certiorari denied, 353 U.S. 938, 1 L. Ed. 2d 761, 77 S. Ct. 813. As with the Toledo-Monroe market, such a conclusion is not foreclosed by the availability of these discounts to National's independent customers deciding to join a voluntary or cooperative group.

As in the Toledo-Monroe area, the Commission concluded that National's [*528] discount schedule was cost justified. However, to cost justify the 7 cents per gallon discount to chain and group stores, National used an averaging method even though the chain and group stores varied in size. Under United States v. Borden, Company, 370 U.S. 460, 8 L. Ed. 2d 627, 82 S. Ct. 1309, such a cost justification defense was properly rejected.

---

[7] The Commission did hold that National's regular discount schedule of 0% to 6% to independent stores was cost justified on a store-by-store basis.

National also contends that its 7 cents per gallon discount granted to Malone & Hyde, Inc., a wholesale grocer sponsoring a voluntary chain of stores, was a legitimate functional discount. On the other hand, the Commission found that National sold to the M & H member stores rather than to M & H. The invoices stated that the ice cream was "sold to" the particular stores, not to M & H. In addition to the 7 cents per gallon discount, National granted M & H a 2% allowance [28] for assuming the credit risk of the member stores. As the Commission noted, this allowance is consistent with the member stores themselves being the purchasers, for if M & H were the purchaser, National would have no risk as to the credit of the stores. The Commission permitted this 2% allowance as a payment for services performed by M & H for National. It was not included in the price discrimination that the Commission found National gave to the M & H stores.

The Commission explained its conclusion that the M & H stores were the purchasers from National as follows (op. cit. p. 22,925):

> "The circumstances are such that there is very little difference between the manner in which a Malone & Hyde member store is serviced by respondent as compared to a non-member retail customer. In both cases, respondent receives orders directly from the store, delivers the ice cream directly to the store and services the cabinets. Whereas an independent store owner may pay the deliveryman, the Malone & Hyde store is furnished with a copy of the invoice and the original is sent to Malone & Hyde headquarters. Once a week, respondent bills Malone & Hyde for all stores and receives a check drawn [29] on the Malone & Hyde account."

In our view, M & H is sufficiently unlike the ordinary wholesaler to support the Commission's decision that the member stores were the actual purchasers. However, under Federal Trade Commission v. Fred Meyer, Inc., 390 U.S. 341, 88 S. Ct. 904, 19 L. Ed. 2d 1222, 36 U.S. Law Week 4233, HN12[] the M & H retail stores could be classified as purchasers from National even if they technically purchase from M & H where, as here, such a classification would further the purposes of the Clayton Act, as amended. Cf. Federal Trade Commission v. Sun Oil Co., 371 U.S. 505, 512-523, 9 L. Ed. 2d 466, 83 S. Ct. 358.

New Orleans Area, and Scope of Order

Here National sold a private label milk, "Velva," to H.G. Hill Stores, Inc., a chain (and its successor, Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc.) at a net price of about 10 cents per gallon less than to many of National's store customers receiving no discount. Besides the 20% discount to Hill, National sold milk to 5 other wholesale customers at 5-10% off its wholesale list price. The Commission sustained [30] the defense of meeting competition with respect to all customers receiving discriminatory discounts except the Hill Stores.

To sustain the defense of meeting competition with respect to Hill in 1951, National relied on competitors' bids to public institutions. However, the bids to such institutions were not subject to the Act and involved different delivery costs and therefore would not show what the competitors' bids were to Hill.

To sustain the defense of meeting competition with respect to Hill in 1954, National asserts that Hill's representative told National of a low offer from the Franklinton, Louisiana, Co-operative. The Commission disregarded the Franklinton offer because National had not verified it [8] and because the cooperative's [*529] offer was suspect by virtue of National's own cost study. Also, according to the Commission's interpretation of the testimony of National official Lewis Robinson, National did not learn of the cooperative's offer until after making its bid. The Commission found that National's 1954 price to Hill was based on its own cost study. This conclusion was permissible from the evidence adduced.

---

[8] Efforts to verify were present in Forster Manufacturing Co. v. Federal Trade Commission 335 F.2d 47, 54 (1st Cir. 1964), certiorari denied, 380 U.S. 906, 85 S. Ct. 887, 13 L. Ed. 2d 794; Beatrice Foods Co., TRADE REGULATION REPORTS (1965-1967 Transfer Binder) para. 17,311, at p. 22,470 (1965), and Continental Baking Co., TRADE REGULATION REPORTS (1963-1965 Transfer Binder) para. 16,720, at p. 21,648 (1963), on which National relies.

[31] National contends that it ceased selling milk to Hill's successor in 1960 and that a 1958 Louisiana statute bans discounts on milk, so that the requisite competitive effects no longer exist under Section 2(a). But such a longtime discriminatory practice, if followed elsewhere by National, could similarly injure competition with customers receiving no equivalent discounts, so that the Commission was entitled to consider this evidence in framing its order. Federal Trade Commission v. Ruberoid Co., 343 U.S. 470, 96 L. Ed. 1081, 72 S. Ct. 800; Foremost Dairies, Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission, 348 F.2d 674, 681-682 (5th Cir. 1965), certiorari denied, 382 U.S. 959, 15 L. Ed. 2d 362, 86 S. Ct. 435. Even though National has stopped granting unjustified discounts to Winn-Dixie in New Orleans, its similar practices in Toledo-Monroe and Memphis, as well as its former practice in New Orleans, justified the nation-wide order entered. In contrast to Dean Milk Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 395 F.2d 696 (7th Cir. 1968), there are no considerations present here that impel a limitation of the Commission's order to the specific areas where [32] the price discriminations were proved. National operates in 35 states and it is concededly typical for Sealtest to have volume discount schedules in effect at its various operations. The practices condemned by the Commission occurred in wide-spread areas over a long period of years. Consequently we cannot say that this order was so broad as to constitute an abuse of discretion. See Federal Trade Commission v. National Lead Co., 352 U.S. 419, 428, 431, 1 L. Ed. 2d 438, 77 S. Ct. 502; Swift & Company v. United States, 393 F.2d 247 (7th Cir. 1968), and Lloyd A. Fry Roofing Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 371 F.2d 277, 284, 286 (7th Cir. 1966).

We have considered other points raised by the parties but they merit no discussion.

The order is affirmed and will be enforced.

Minnesota v. United States Steel Corp.

United States District Court for the District of Minnesota, Third Division

May 17, 1968

Nos. 4-68 Civ. 37, 4-68 Civ. 36, 4-68 Civ. 38, 4-68 Civ. 41, 3-68 Civ. 34, 3-68 Civ. 36, 3-68 Civ. 37, 3-68 Civ. 39, 4-68 Civ. 37

Reporter
44 F.R.D. 559 *; 1968 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12589 ; 12 Fed. R. Serv. 2d (Callaghan) 498; 1968 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,469

STATE OF MINNESOTA, State of North Dakota, State of South Dakota, et al., State of Wisconsin, City of St. Paul, the Housing and Redevelopment Authority in and for the City of Minneapolis, Minnesota, Independent School District # 625 of the City of St. Paul, Minnesota, Housing and Redevelopment Authority of the City of St. Paul, Minnesota, v. UNITED STATES STEEL CORP., Paper, Calmenson & Co., St. Paul Foundry & Manufacturing Co., (now the Maxson Corp.), St. Paul Structural Steel Co., Crown Iron Works Co., and the Hustad Co.

Core Terms

class action, conspiracy, cases, notice, absentee, suits, class member, predominate, plaintiffs', questions, tolling, consolidated, member of the class, statute of limitations, antitrust, discovery, damages, government entity, indictment, steel, defendants', parties, grand jury, proceedings, complaints, joinder, prices, depositions, limitations, pleadings

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Governments > Legislation > Statute of Limitations > General Overview

HN1[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

See 15 U.S.C.S. § 16(b).

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Parties > Joinder of Parties > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Numerosity

HN2[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(1), the first prerequisite for maintaining a class action is that the class be sufficiently numerous so that joinder of all members is impracticable.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

HN3[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(3), the claims of the representatives of the class must be co-extensive with the claims of the members of the class.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

HN4[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

While a disparity of damages may be argued to go to the question of "predominance," such disparate proof fails to make a class representative's claims atypical. Since the representative parties need prove a conspiracy, its effectuation, and damages therefrom--precisely what the absentees must prove to recover--the representative claims can hardly be considered atypical.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

HN5[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3) requires liberal interpretation to avoid frustrating its purpose of encouraging the prosecution of claims too small to permit of otherwise ordinary independent vindication.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

HN6[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

In the normal antitrust case, where a conspiracy to fix prices is at issue, but damages differ widely among the several plaintiffs, the predominant questions are common to the class.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Statute of Limitations > Tolling of Statute of Limitations > Class Actions

Governments > Legislation > Statute of Limitations > Time Limitations

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

Governments > Legislation > Statute of Limitations > General Overview

HN7[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

Commencement of a Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3) class action tolls the four-year statute of limitations provided by Clayton Act § 5(b), 15 U.S.C.S. § 16(b).

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

Governments > Legislation > Statute of Limitations > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Amendment of Pleadings > Relation Back

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Notice of Class Action

HN8[] Class Actions, Prerequisites for Class Action

Affirmative class action determinations relate back to the time of the institution of the lawsuits.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Governments > Legislation > Statute of Limitations > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

HN9[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23, "one-way intervention" is not possible, for the class determination is to be made as soon as possible after institution of suit. Absentees thus are compelled when in receipt of notice under Rule 23(c)(2) to make a binding decision within a short time of commencement of the suit, and never after a decision on the merits.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Superiority

Governments > Legislation > Statute of Limitations > Time Limitations

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Class Members > Absent Members

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Notice of Class Action

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

Governments > Legislation > Statute of Limitations > General Overview

HN10[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

The "superiority" criterion of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3) explicitly permits the court to look at the existence of other lawsuits when deciding whether a class action should be maintained.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

HN11[] Class Actions, Prerequisites for Class Action

See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Sanctions > Misconduct & Unethical Behavior > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

HN12[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

A lawyer, having once held public office or having been in the public employ, should not after his retirement accept employment in connection with any matter which he has investigated or passed upon while in such office or employ.

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Grand Juries > Secrecy > General Overview

HN13[] Grand Juries, Secrecy

See Fed. R. Crim. P. 6(e).

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Standards > Particularized Need Standard > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Grand Juries > Secrecy > General Overview

HN14[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

While courts have vigilantly recognized the policy of secrecy in conjunction with grand jury proceedings, exception is made when the movants for disclosure show "particularized need."

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Grand Juries > Secrecy > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

HN15[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

Witnesses' names are matters before the grand jury and so are entitled to secrecy.

Civil Procedure > Trials > Consolidation of Actions

HN16[] Trials, Consolidation of Actions

See Fed. R. Civ. P. 42(a).

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Entry of Judgments > Consent Decrees

Governments > Legislation > Statute of Limitations > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Statute of Limitations > Tolling of Statute of Limitations > Fraud

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Entry of Pleas > Types of Pleas > No Contest Pleas

HN17[] Entry of Judgments, Consent Decrees

Nolo contendere pleas do not establish a prima facie case under the Clayton Act, because under Clayton Act § 5(a), 15 U.S.C.S. § 16(a), they are the equivalent of consent judgments.

Judges: [1] Neville, District Judge.

Opinion by: NEVILLE

Opinion

[*562] NEVILLE, District Judge.

Before the court are eight separate civil treble damage suits bottomed on the antitrust laws, brought by eight different governmental entities against six steel companies. The City of St. Paul, Minnesota, commenced its action on February 1, 1968, by filing a complaint in the Third Division of the District of Minnesota. Thereafter, the Housing and Redevelopment Authority for the City of Minneapolis, Independent School District # 625 of the City of St. Paul and the Housing and Redevelopment Authority of the City of St. Paul, filed separate independent complaints, the first two on February 6 and the latter on February 8, 1968. These four suits were brought in the Third Division of this district and will be referred to as "Third Division cases." Common counsel represent these several plaintiffs.

Four other plaintiffs, the State of Minnesota, the State of North Dakota, the State of South Dakota and the State of Wisconsin commenced separate actions in the Fourth Division of this court, the first three on February 8, 1968, and the State of Wisconsin on February 9, 1968. These four "Fourth Division cases" [2] were transferred to the Third Division pursuant to an order of this court to the end that all eight cases might be considered together to expedite and economize as to pretrial measures.

All eight actions name the same six structural steel fabricating companies above as defendants. [1] Plaintiffs seek treble damages from the defendants under the Sherman and Clayton Acts allegedly for conspiring in restraint of interstate trade and commerce affecting the structural steel fabricating industry. The defendants are claimed to have conspired to fix prices, unduly inflating the same and rendering them non-competitive, and further are claimed to have allocated contracts and business among themselves.

These private civil suits follow in the wake of a previous investigation by the United States Department of [3] Justice of the structural steel fabricating industry and the institution by the government of criminal action under the antitrust laws. On February 10, 1964, these same six defendants were indicted by the grand jury for the District of Minnesota. The criminal action was terminated on [*563] September 16, 1964, by entry of judgments of conviction of each of the defendants following nolo contendere pleas. The private plaintiffs allege violations of the antitrust laws substantially identical to those charged in the indictment.

At the institution of each of the above actions, the court entered a separate preliminary order in the form contained in the Recommended Procedures for Protracted Cases (adopted by the Judicial Conference 1960), fixing a joint preliminary informal pretrial conference for March 15, 1968 and temporarily enjoining discovery and other proceedings. At that pretrial conference, a number of questions were raised and at the court's suggestion briefs were requested and argument set for a continued date of April 15, 1968. The court is satisfied that the eight cases portend protracted litigation and, at least until some clear showing to the contrary is made, [4] should be treated jointly as such under the aforesaid Recommended Procedures.

The court now has before it nine different motions brought by the various parties:

I. To determine whether or not the several actions are entitled to treatment as class actions under Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

II. To disqualify one of plaintiffs' counsel and, since he is admitted to the bar elsewhere and not in Minnesota, to refuse his admittance to this court for the purpose of presenting and participating in these law suits; and requiring answers of witnesses to certain questions in deposition proceedings related to this question.

III. To permit intervention as a party plaintiff by the Metropolitan Airports Commission.

IV. To permit plaintiffs access to the list of grand jury witnesses and subpoenas.

V. To vacate a previous order by a judge of this court dated July 16, 1964, sealing or withholding from the public record certain documents in the criminal antitrust proceedings.

VI. To consolidate the Third Division cases.

VII. To lift the present order placing restraint on discovery proceedings so as to permit the serving of interrogatories and prescribing a schedule for [5] discovery proceedings.

VIII. To permit defendants an extension of time to answer plaintiffs' complaints.

---

[1] Although the original complaints named St. Paul Foundry & Manufacturing Company as a defendant, its name has recently been changed and by stipulation the name The Maxson Corporation has been substituted therefor.

IX. To strike certain allegations from plaintiffs' complaints which refer to the previous criminal proceedings.

These motions will be considered seriatim, the first being perhaps both the most important and the most complicated.

I.

Treatment as Class Actions Under Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

Each plaintiff seeks to maintain its suit as a class action and has moved this court for an order under Rule 23 [2] [6] of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure declaring it to be the representative of a large group of absentee plaintiffs. Each State plaintiff in the Fourth Division cases seeks to represent the governmental entities and units within such State. [3] [7] The Third Division plaintiffs [*564] also each purport to represent classes composed of governmental agencies and entities. [4] Thus, the present parties' classes substantially overlap and conflict in that they presume to represent many of the same governmental entities.

Defendants have cross-motioned, contending that none of these plaintiffs can maintain its suit as a class action under Rule 23. Defendants concede that the four State plaintiffs would adequately represent the lesser governmental entities within the classes, but submit that other Rule 23 criteria [8] are unfulfilled; namely, that the State of Minnesota suit does not meet the requirements of 23(a)(3) and (b)(3), and the suits of the States of North Dakota, South Dakota and Wisconsin are not within 23(a)(1), (a)(3), and (b)(3). [5] The latter objections are also raised with respect to the Third Division plaintiffs, and, additionally, it is submitted that the Third Division plaintiffs would not adequately represent the purported class or classes as required by 23(a)(4).

---

[2] Rule 23 of the Fed. R. Civ. P. was amended effective July 1, 1966 and as so amended is applicable to this case. It is lengthy and quotation in full seems unnecessary.

[3] The State of Minnesota seeks to represent itself and:

> "the class consisting of all cities, counties, school districts, municipal and public corporations, political subdivisions, educational institutions, and all other public agencies and entities within the State of Minnesota, supported in whole or in part by state or local government funds, which have, in the course of their operations, purchased structural steel products from one or more of the defendants or co-conspirators during the period covered by this complaint."

The State of Wisconsin seeks to represent itself and:

> "the class of all cities, counties, school districts, municipal and public corporations, political subdivisions and public agencies of Wisconsin . . . ."

The State of North Dakota seeks to represent itself and the same class of entities alleged by the State of Minnesota, differing only in that the class is within the State of North Dakota.

The State of South Dakota seeks to represent: (1) itself; (2) all counties individually enumerated as parties plaintiff; (3) a class consisting of school districts, Boards of Education and political subdivisions which support school districts; and (4) tax-supported municipalities.

[4] The Third Division plaintiffs seek to represent the class or classes consisting of the following:

> "(a) all state, county, municipal and other governments and other political or governmental subdivisions or districts, and all governmental or public corporations, agencies, departments, boards, institutions, and other bodies . . . which are located or which operated within the Complaint Area;
>
> (b) all governmental purchasers which are located or which operated within the State of Minnesota; or
>
> (c) all governmental purchasers which are located or which operated within the Complaint Area, other than those state agencies represented in related actions filed against defendants by the respective Attorneys General of the States of Minnesota, Wisconsin, South Dakota and North Dakota . . . ."

[5] Rule 23 requires that the terms of (b)(3) be fulfilled in addition to the elements of (a)(1)-(4) if suits of this nature are to be maintained as class actions.

Finally, the defendants earnestly urge the court to find that none of these suits is properly a class action since the absentee members of the classes are barred by the statute of limitations provided by Section 5(b) of the Clayton Act. [6] [10] Inasmuch [*565] as these suits were filed far more than one year after termination of the government's criminal proceedings, the four-year clause [9] clearly provides the pertinent standard. [7] Defendants' argument is that any possible fraudulent concealment was eliminated and revealed as a matter of law on February 10, 1964, by the return of the grand jury indictment, [8] and that only the present eight plaintiffs filed their claims within four years of the known accrual of the claims and hence within the period of the applicable four year statute of limitations. Thus, defendants argue that all absentee class members are barred from the action (assuming no violative acts were committed after the return of the indictment) and that notice under Rule 23 need not issue. Plaintiffs oppose this suggestion, contending that the filing of their claims as class actions tolls the running of the statute of limitations as to absentee members of the classes with the same force and effect as though each member of the class, on or before February 10, 1968, had instituted and filed its own lawsuit.

[11] The court holds and orders that all of these suits may be maintained as class actions and that the filing of these actions tolls the statute of limitations as to absentee plaintiffs, or, put another way, those eligible entities who chose to join the class in the manner hereinafter prescribed may date themselves back for purposes of the statute of limitations to the date of the filing of the class action which they join.

The Prospective Members of the Classes are Sufficiently Numerous to Make Joinder Impracticable--Rule 23(a)(1).

HN2[] Under Rule 23(a)(1) the first prerequisite for maintaining a class action is that the class be sufficiently numerous so that joinder of all members is impracticable. Defendants admit that the State of Minnesota alleges a class sufficiently numerous to satisfy 23(a)(1). [9] Defendants urge the court to defer ruling on whether joinder is impracticable with the States of North Dakota, South Dakota and Wisconsin. The court is of a contrary view, however, and is satisfied that 23(a)(1) is fulfilled at this point in the case with respect to these latter State plaintiffs,

---

[6] HN1[] The Clayton Act provides in § 5(b):

"Whenever any civil or criminal proceeding is instituted by the United States to prevent, restrain, or punish violations of any of the antitrust laws, but not including an action under section 15a of this title, the running of the statute of limitations in respect of every private right of action arising under said laws and based in whole or in part on any matter complained of in said proceeding shall be suspended during the pendency thereof and for one year thereafter: Provided, however, That whenever the running of the statute of limitations in respect of a cause of action arising under section 15 of this title is suspended hereunder, any action to enforce such cause of action shall be forever barred unless commenced either within the period of suspension or within four years after the cause of action accrued."

Section 5(b), 38 Stat. 731, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 16(b) (1964 ed.).

[7] See Union Carbide & Carbon Corp. v. Nisley, 300 F.2d 561, 571 (10th Cir. 1961), petition for cert. dismissed, Wade et al, v. Union Carbide & Carbon Corp., et al., 371 U.S. 801, 9 L. Ed. 2d 46, 83 S. Ct. 13 (1962); United Shoe Mach. Corp. v. International Shoe Mach. Co., 275 F.2d 459 (1st Cir. 1960); Herman Schwabe, Inc. v. United Shoe Mach. Corp., 274 F.2d 608 (2d Cir. 1960).

[8] By resolving the question whether the limitation period is tolled by commencement of a class action under 23(b)(3) against the defendants' position, the court need not answer the disputed question of whether as a matter of law the return of the indictment ended any fraudulent concealment. Since, by virtue of the tolling effect, all class members are within the statutory time period unless individual knowledge prior to the indictment date is shown, no absentee plaintiff is prejudiced by the assumption arguendo that the indictment eliminated fraudulent concealment. See State of Michigan v. Morton Salt Co., 259 F. Supp. 35, 45 (D. Minn. 1966), aff'd sub nom. Hardy Salt Co. v. State of Illinois, 377 F.2d 768 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 912, 19 L. Ed. 2d 260, 88 S. Ct. 238 (1967).

[9] By affidavit, Minnesota states that it represents approximately 852 municipalities, 87 counties, 500 school districts and a number of other educational institutions and special governmental districts and entities.

which have alleged by affidavit sufficiently numerous absentee class members [10] [12] to make [*566] joinder impracticable. If, at a later date, the posture of these actions becomes such that joinder or another alternative is practicable, the court may well then invoke its management discretion reserved by 23(c)(1), (c)(4), and 23(d). Whether the class action status continues somewhat depends upon the response to notice given pursuant to this order. Furthermore (without resolving the "overlap" problem for the moment), the Third Division cases also meet the requirements of 23(a)(1). In all of these eight cases, problems of management and administration would be rendered extremely cumbersome and difficult by joinder of all absentee members, service of separate pleadings, entry of a separate order as to each joinder, etc. Joinder would tend to result in great multiplicity, one of the major evils Rule 23 procedures seek to prevent.

[13] There are Questions of Law and Fact Common to the Classes--Rule 23(a)(2)

Defendants concede that plaintiffs' actions involve questions common to the classes or members of the classes. Certainly it is clear that the existence or non-existence of a conspiracy, the territorial effect thereof and the impact on prices, pricing policies and competitive practices and perhaps other questions, are common to all members of the class. If there be no proof of a conspiracy, no one recovers in the eight different cases under the theory of the various pleadings. The establishment of a conspiracy and its effect is thus common to all claims of all members of the classes.

The Claims of the Eight Representative Parties Plaintiff are Typical of the Claims of the Classes--Rule 23(a)(3).

While the defendants concede that the plaintiffs' actions involve questions of law and fact common to the classes, they nevertheless controvert the allegations that such claims are "typical" of the claims of the absentee members as required by 23(a)(3). The court finds, however, that the present representatives press claims typical of those held by the members of the classes. While there may be [14] some doubt regarding the precise meaning of 23(a)(3), [11] the courts looking at this question generally have required that HN3[] the claims of the representatives of the class be co-extensive with the claims of the members of the class. See Eisen v. Carlisle & Jacquelin, 391 F.2d 555 (2d Cir. 1968), rev'g, 41 F.R.D. 147 (S.D.N.Y. 1966); State of Iowa v. Union Asphalt & Roadoils, Inc., 281 F. Supp. 391 (S.D. Iowa 1968); Philadelphia Elec. Co. v. Anaconda Am. Brass Co., 43 F.R.D. 452 (E.D. Pa. 1968); Siegel v. Chicken Delight, Inc., 271 F. Supp. 722 (N.D. Cal. 1967).

Defendants argue that the plaintiffs' claims are neither typical nor co-extensive in that all plaintiffs have sustained substantially different damages requiring extensive proof because of diverse methods of procuring and purchasing fabricated steel products. But all claims in the classes herein will require proof of a conspiracy, plus a showing of price [15] fixing, allocation of business or other non-competitive activity, as well as evidence of purchases at allegedly inflated prices. [12] [*567] Although each plaintiff will have to prove a precise purchase or purchases to [10] By affidavit, it appears that the State of North Dakota represents approximately 149 municipalities, 52 counties, 498 school districts and 5 special governmental districts.

---

By affidavit, South Dakota represents approximately 600 municipalities, 67 counties, 500 school districts and several special governmental districts.

By affidavit, Wisconsin represents 72 counties, 184 cities, 383 villages, approximately 572 school districts of several types, 1,124 towns and 755 special districts, such as metropolitan sewerage and drainage districts.

[11] See 2 W. Barron & A. Holtzoff, Federal Practice and Procedure § 562 n. 3 (Wright ed., Supp. 1966).

[12] Each plaintiff, absentee and present, will probably also be required to prove fraudulent concealment virtually up to the time of the indictment. Such requires proof of two elements: (1) Use of fraudulent means by party raising the ban of the statute and (2) Successful concealment. Kansas City, Missouri v. Federal Pac. Elec. Co., 310 F.2d 271 (8th Cir. 1962), cert. denied, 371 U.S. 912, 83 S. Ct. 256, 9 L. Ed. 2d 171. Certainly proof of the first element, if not also the second, is typical of the claims of the various members of the classes.

show damages, the former two elements of proof will redound to the benefit of the entire class of claimants, and the court therefore is disposed to reject the defendants' theory. HN4[] While a disparity of damages may be argued to go to the question of "predominance", see School District of Philadelphia v. Harper & Row Publishers, Inc., 267 F. Supp. 1001 (E.D. Pa. 1967), such disparate proof fails to make the representatives' claims atypical, especially in light of the positions taken by the above cited decisions. Since the representative parties need prove a conspiracy, its effectuation, and damages therefrom--precisely what the absentees must prove to recover--the representative claims can hardly be considered atypical. Moreover, if the "typical" requirement of 23(a)(3) is thought to mean only a lack of adversity between the representatives and the absentee plaintiffs, there is no showing of adverse interests in these actions which would militate against class action [16] treatment.

The Representative Parties Will Fairly and Adequately Protect and Represent the Interests of the Classes--Rule 23(a)(4).

Defendants concede that the State plaintiffs fairly and adequately represent their classes of lesser governmental entities, but submit that the four Third Division plaintiffs fail adequately to represent their classes. The Third Division plaintiffs, on the other hand, already acting through common counsel, have sought to consolidate [17] their respective actions, [13] and also ask that leave be granted to the Metropolitan Airport Commission to intervene as an additional party plaintiff in the consolidated suit. [14]

Irrespective of consolidation, [18] 23(a)(4) is satisfied by the Third Division plaintiffs. In Eisen v. Carlisle & Jacquelin, supra, the only circuit court decision passing upon amended Rule 23 in this context, the court reversed the district court, holding inter alia that a plaintiff having merely $70 at stake in the litigation can fairly and adequately represent a class of all "odd-lot" traders on the New York Stock Exchange, whose total number approached 3,750,000 during the period of inquiry. Other courts under both the old and new rules have reached similar results although admittedly upon facts less exaggerated than Eisen. [15]

[19] In view of the court's decision on the "overlap" problem hereinafter, further discussion is of no value on this question. It is to be noted though that chief counsel for the Third Division plaintiffs is an experienced antitrust lawyer, having only recently left the Antitrust Division of the [*568] Department of Justice. He represents the second largest city in Minnesota, a large school district, two significant housing authorities, and now the Metropolitan Airport Commission. It is apparent that his representation will be fair, adequate and prosecuted with vigor.

Defendants further argue that the Third Division plaintiffs cannot represent any class because as required by local law they have not been authorized to do so. The court rejects this theory and agrees with the court in Union Asphalt, supra, which held that Rule 23 controls the determination of whether representation is adequate. Since Rule 23 does not look to state law, state law is irrelevant in making a Rule 23 determination. Although some courts

---

[13] The Third Division plaintiffs' motions to consolidate the pretrial aspects of this litigation is granted as hereinbelow and a like ruling is tentatively made on the trial aspects pursuant to Rule 42 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Defendants have alleged no prejudice and this order should result in greatly decreased multiplicity of pretrial problems, administration and management difficulties.

[14] The Metropolitan Airport Commission's motion for leave to intervene in the Third Division case as consolidated is granted under Rule 24(b)(2) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure as hereinbelow set forth. The statute of limitations provides no bar in light of the disposition with regard thereto, plus the intervenor's membership in any event in the class alleged by the Third Division complaint.

[15] See, e.g., Philadelphia Elec. Co. v. Anaconda Am. Brass Co., 43 F.R.D. 452 (E.D. Pa. 1968) (ten plaintiffs representing large class of governmental entities); Siegel v. Chicken Delight, Inc., 271 F. Supp. 722 (N.D. Cal. 1967) (five franchisees on behalf of 650 others nationwide); City of Chicago v. Allen Bradley Co., 32 F.R.D. 448 (N.D. Ill. 1963) (one city representing injured municipalities nationwide).

have made an excursion into state law under similar facts, [16] this court believes the result depends only upon the criteria specified by Rule 23. Thus, since [20] that criteria is otherwise satisfied by the Third Division suit herein, the suit may be maintained under Rule 23 and fulfills the scope and purport of 23(a)(4). As a practical matter, the court hereinafter in connection with the notice provision of 23(c)(2) is requiring that each member who wishes to join the class must furnish a certified resolution of authorization at that time. [17]

[21] Rule 23(b)(1) and (2).

Plaintiffs by their pleadings do not purport to fall within, and thus no substantial objection to the class action has been made on the basis of, Rule 23(b)(1)(A) and (B), nor 23(b)(2). Rule 23(b)(1)(A) if it has any significance in this case clearly advances a reason for declaring a class action here, for if multiple suits were tried before different juries, "inconsistent or varying adjudications" might well result. Plaintiffs do claim, however, to fall under Rule 23(b)(3).

Rule 23(b)(3).

Common Questions of Law and Fact Predominate and Class Action Treatment is Superior to Other Available Methods for a Fair and Efficient Adjudication of the Controversy.

While extremely numerous absentees comprise the classes [18] in this case, and thus ultimately proof of many separate purchase transactions will be required to establish the damages (if any there be) of each class member, the larger issue undoubtedly will involve the alleged conspiratorial conduct between the six defendants and conceivably other co-conspirators. Defendants contend that a "meeting" type conspiracy in what they claim to be a non-oligopolistic industry which results in [22] price fixing and business allocation as alleged by plaintiffs requires relatively little quantum of proof, and that the numerous damage elements "raise a myriad of particularized and complex questions of law amidst highly individualized factual settings." (Brief of defendants, p. 30.) Moreover, since fraudulent concealment is in issue with respect to each governmental entity, absent and present, the individual questions it is said cumulatively will far overshadow [*569] any common questions of law and fact. [19] Plaintiffs, on the other hand, argue that the conspiracy proof, as the crux of the case, clearly will predominate over the lesser questions of damages and concealment. Ironically plaintiffs argue that the case presents difficult and lengthy problems regarding proof of conspiracy, while defendants submit that proof of the conspiracy aspect is minimal in relation to other aspects. In partial disregard of the arguments of each, the court finds in favor of the maintenance of the class action.

[23] In determining "predominance," defendants attempt to establish as a test the total amount of time which will be spent on proof of the common issue of conspiracy in a class action compared to time spent on individual damage and fraudulent concealment proof in the trial of the same class action. They thus argue that the question of

---

[16] See, e.g., State of Illinois v. Brunswick Corp., 32 F.R.D. 453 (N.D. Ill. 1963).

[17] As rather a collateral matter, defendants have noted that in the South Dakota action, the various counties are joined and named as parties plaintiff. Defendants question whether the Attorney General has authority to represent the counties, absent a showing of direct authority by resolution of the various county boards or some other appropriate type of direct authorization. The court deems this question immaterial and holds that if there is any merit to this objection at all, it is obviated by the fact that clearly the counties will qualify as members of the class represented in the South Dakota action. If counsel desires to propose an amendment to the South Dakota pleading to cure his wording in this regard, such may be noticed and brought on for hearing at the next pretrial conference in this case.

[18] See notes 9 and 10, supra.

[19] In fact, since fraudulent concealment proof will in large part probably consist of the same evidence of attempts to conceal, secrete and otherwise hide the fact of the conspiracy (if such there was), the common questions here will likely predominate on this phase of the doctrine of fraudulent concealment over the individual questions of when each plaintiff learned of the conspiracy.

conspiracy does not predominate. If this be the correct approach to the question, arguably it is true that as a class action more time in toto will be spent in proof of individual damage claims in any of the class actions than will be spent in proof of conspiracy. Following defendants' line of reasoning, it would seem, however, that the situation should be considered and compared to that which would exist were no class action to be allowed. So for instance, if there were to be but a single case for trial, the court would expect that the great bulk of the time of that trial would be consumed with proof or the attempted proof of the existence and effect of a conspiracy and that the fraudulent concealment and damage issues would be far less predominant in the sense of time consumed at the trial. Were there to be 500 separate suits, this same pattern undoubtedly [24] would prevail as to each. It seems specious and begging the question to say that if these 500 law suits were brought into a class so that proof on the issues of conspiracy need be adduced only once and the result then becomes binding on all 500, that thereby the common issue of conspiracy no longer predominates because from a total time standpoint, cumulatively individual damage proof will take longer. Of course, if defendants are upheld in their current posture of denying any conspiracy, then this is clearly the only issue that ever will be tried and certainly it cannot then be gainsaid but that such is the predominant question.

Under amended Rule 23, courts apparently were not required to make a finding that the common questions of law and fact predominated over purely individual questions. [20] Moreover, the Rules Advisory Committee shed little light on this problem in its Note to amended Rule 23, when it said such issues "may or may not" predominate in antitrust litigation. [21] Thus, there is little authority regarding the concept of predominance under 23(b)(3). Such authority as there is, however, indicates that the common questions of law and fact in the matter at bar sufficiently [25] predominate, permitting maintenance of class actions.

In Eisen v. Carlisle & Jacquelin, 391 F.2d 555 (2d Cir. 1968), plaintiff brought suit against the two largest "odd-lot" dealers of the New York Stock Exchange, alleging a conspiracy to monopolize odd-lot trading and charge excessive brokerage fees in [*570] violation of the Sherman Act. Plaintiff sought to represent all odd-lot traders (approximately 3,750,000) under 23(b)(3), contending that these traders had been injured by an illegal "odd-lot differential" charged for odd-lot transactions on the Exchange. The district court had held that Rule 23(b)(3) treatment was improper, for, among other reasons, the questions of law and fact common to the class (i.e., the conspiracy) would not predominate [26] as required by 23(b)(3). On appeal, the court reversed, holding that 23(b)(3) was fulfilled. The court found that the conspiracy question common to all traders would predominate, even though the damage issue as to each absentee member would require separate proof and calculation. In noting that the absentee and representative plaintiffs would mutually share proof of a conspiracy, the court stressed that HN5[] 23(b)(3) requires liberal interpretation to avoid frustrating its purpose of encouraging the prosecution of claims too small to permit of otherwise ordinary independent vindication. The rationale regarding predominance was framed in the following language:

> "We realize that members of the proposed class might have had different motives when they entered into the odd-lot market. We are also mindful of the fact that there may be a wide variety of orders some of which may require special handling by the odd-lot dealer. Nevertheless, the alleged underlying conspiracy does contain a so-called 'common nucleus of operative facts.' Siegel v. Chicken Delight, Inc., 271 F. Supp. 722 (N.D. Cal. 1967). All of these differences among the class members bear only on the computation of damages, [27] a factor which, by itself, does not justify dismissal of the class action. Kronenberg v. Hotel Governor Clinton, Inc., 41 F.R.D. 42 (S.D.N.Y. 1966); City of Philadelphia v. Morton Salt Co., 248 F. Supp. 506 (E.D. Pa. 1965). Potential rivalry between class members after an initial finding of liability can be adequately handled since the rule gives a court the power to divide the class into appropriate sub-classes or to require the members to bring individual suits for damages. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(c)(4); Advisory Committee's Note at 106. Even if individual questions arise during the course of litigation, which render the action 'unmanageable,' the court still has the > power at that time to dismiss the class action and permit the plaintiff to proceed only on behalf of himself. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(c)(1). Therefore, at this early stage of the proceedings, we find there has been an adequate demonstration that common questions of law or fact predominate over individual questions. See Kronenberg v. Hotel Governor Clinton, Inc., 41 F.R.D. 42 (S.D.N.Y. 1966)."

---

[20] Old Rule 23(a)(3) providing for the spurious class action merely required "a common question of law or fact affecting the several rights" of the class members.

[21] Advisory Committee's Notes, Proposed Rules of Civil Procedure, 39 F.R.D. 69, 103 (1966).

It appears nearly a certainty that the individual issues that might arise in the present case nowhere approach the number [28] nor the burden likely to arise in the Eisen case.

Lower federal district courts have reached the same result in antitrust treble damage suits over defendants' contentions of lack of predominance similar to those raised here. In State of Iowa v. Union Asphalt & Roadoils, Inc., 281 F. Supp. 391 (S.D. Iowa 1968), the court held that a price-fixing conspiracy suit brought by the State of Iowa on behalf of all purchasing governmental entities in the state contained common questions of law and fact predominating over non-common questions. There defendants attempted to show that the entirely diverse damages questions would predominate over common questions. The court rejected the position, after stating the defendants' contention as follows:

> " . . . Numerous disparate facts are set out in the defendants' brief which are said to indicate the unavailability of a class action. Many have to do with the manner in which the members of the alleged class have purchased asphalt products from the defendants. [*571] Some members purchased directly from the defendants while others negotiate with contractors who agree to supply asphalt products. Variations in the kind of asphalt [29] product purchased, differences in prices due to transportation charges and quantity of purchase, normal variations in price due to market conditions, and other factors are described in detail in the briefs and affidavits."

The Iowa court relied upon and adopted the reasoning of the court in Philadelphia Elec. Co. v. Anaconda Am. Brass Co., supra, where similar arguments against Rule 23 treatment were raised by defendants. There it was stated that:

> "The defendants point out that the products mentioned in the complaint include 'at least twelve separate groups of products which are separately priced and have distinct end uses'; that plaintiffs may have purchased like products from other manufacturers, at prices not shown to have been affected by the alleged conspiracy; that during the period covered by the alleged conspiracy there were dozens of price changes in each product-line; and that there were wide variations in methods of purchase and in prices actually paid. But these circumstances, it seems to me, demonstrate merely (1) the possible desirability of establishing sub-classes as the facts develop; (2) the likelihood that plaintiffs may be unable to prove all they [30] claim; and (3) the fact that many of the issues relating to damages are individual rather than common to the class. Cf. Siegel v. Chicken Delight, Inc., 271 F. Supp. 722 (N.D. Cal. 1967); Kronenberg v. Hotel Governor Clinton, Inc., 41 F.R.D. 42 (S.D.N.Y. 1966); Fischer v. Kletz, 41 F.R.D. 377 (S.D.N.Y. 1966)."

Both courts appeared convinced that HN6[] in the normal antitrust case, where a conspiracy to fix prices is at issue, but damages differ widely among the several plaintiffs, the predominant questions are common to the class.

Defendants argue that the above two decisions reached improper results under Rule 23(b)(3). School Dist. of Philadelphia v. Harper & Row Publishers, Inc., 267 F. Supp. 1001 (E.D. Pa. 1967), is said to present a better analysis. There the price-fixing alleged dealt with library editions of children's books. The conspiracy was alleged to be a national conspiracy, and originally (though later modified) the class was claimed to comprise "all public libraries and schools and school systems maintaining libraries . . . and other educational institutions . . . situated throughout the United States, . . . aggregate 60,000 in number." The court noted that the [31] commodity involved was "commercially unique" in deciding that the case did not qualify under 23(b)(3). The court found that there were many small, intricate transactions, where prices varied according to the "demand, the publisher, the cost of the reading content, the illustrations and the binding." The court envisioned difficulties of management of such a nationwide suit as a class action.

Also furnished the court by defendants is the case of City of New York v. International Pipe & Ceramics Co., 44 F.R.D. 584 (S.D.N.Y. 1968), dealing with an alleged conspiracy in the concrete pipe industry. The refusal to countenance that case as a class action is based on far different grounds than exist in the case at bar. The City purported originally to represent all governmental agencies "in the United States"; later those east of the Rocky Mountains. The court pointed out that already there were some 66 similar cases pending throughout the United States. Defendants were not sellers beyond 150 to 200 miles from their plants or places of business; apparently the conspiracies were local in nature. The court stated:

> "Only a very small number of the total end user purchasers whom plaintiff [32] would represent as class members did in fact purchase from the handful [*572] of manufacturers named as defendants in this action."

Philadelphia Electric and Union Asphalt better exemplify the normal claimed antitrust price-fixing situation such as alleged to be present in the matter at hand, while School District of Philadelphia illustrates the unusual suit not limited in territory and dealing with "commercially unique" products. The issues must not be "pre-tried" by the court at this stage of the litigation, Siegel v. Chicken Delight, Inc., 271 F. Supp. 722 (N.D. Cal. 1967), though it seems in any event that the suits at bar do not contain horrendous damage questions. Somewhat diverse modes of acquisition are presented in nearly all antitrust litigation. While doubtlessly some of the difficulties of damage proofs paraded by the defendants will occur, most claimants should have little trouble and raise relatively simple questions. Steel is not a unique product, but rather is sold in transactions similar to other industrial products. Moreover, the number of claimants here is far less profuse than in Eisen. In sum, here as in the normal antitrust case, [33] proof of the conspiracy will present the predominant questions of both law and fact. Cf. M. Frankel, Some Preliminary Observations Concerning Civil Rule 23, 43 F.R.D. 39, 43 (1967); Advisory Committee's Notes, 39 F.R.D. 69, 103 (1966).

The court also finds that class actions will be superior to other available methods of resolving the disputes. When the parties are as numerous as they are here, joinder is an extremely large burden on the court and its facilities. An additional consideration is that similar claims might well go unprosecuted by any other alternative. Eisen v. Carlisle & Jacquelin, 391 F.2d 555 (2d Cir. 1968). While claims held by steel purchasers would undoubtedly normally be larger than those brought in the Eisen case, nevertheless, it is extremely difficult to bring an antitrust action against six major steel fabricators without the financial aid made possible by the class action device. Few are the individual claimants with a sufficient interest at stake or resources to bring a suit requiring proof of a conspiracy among business corporations. Discovery expense alone normally would be prohibitive. The court therefore deems the class action device to be [34] superior to any other alternative such as Rule 20 joinder or Rule 24 intervention. Since avoidance of multiplicity of litigation is greatly to be favored, the class action device as invoked in this instance well serves such purpose.

The court in finding as above has considered and employed the criteria set forth in 23(b)(3)(A)(B) and (C) and as to (D) envisions that the difficulty in management of the class actions is within reason and is not insurmountable. The court has not permitted itself to be persuaded either way by the statute of limitations questions. To quote from Philadelphia Electric:

> " . . . Plaintiffs should not be rewarded for delay in filing suit by a lowering of the standards for class action approval. On the other hand, however, the suggestion that the standards for class action approval should be more stringent for actions commenced near the expiration of the period of limitations, is equally unacceptable."

Statute of Limitations--§ 5(b) of the Clayton Act.

For the reasons stated in the foregoing portion of this memorandum, the four State actions and the consolidated Third Division actions may be maintained under Rule 23(b)(3). The question [35] remains whether the applicable statute of limitations provides reason for not giving notice to absentee class members pursuant to 23(c)(2) because they are barred. Section 5(b) of the Clayton Act controls the limitation period since these private suits involve almost precisely the questions and situations alleged in the earlier government criminal proceedings. Plaintiffs have failed to commence their [*573] suits within the one year tolling period subsequent to termination of the government case, and so the four year provision of § 5(b) applies. Without acknowledging or conceding any issue regarding fraudulent concealment, defendants admit arguendo that the representatives filed these actions before expiration of the four year period provided by § 5(b), measured from the date the grand jury returned a criminal indictment against the six defendants. Likewise, a similar concession is made for the sake of argument with regard to the absentee plaintiffs; defendants admit that these absentees were not barred by the statute if so applied at the time the class actions were filed. Defendants, however, strenuously contend that the filing of these suits as class actions under [36] 23(b)(3) did not toll the statute of limitations as to absent class members who did not file their own independent actions before the statute of limitations ran against them. Thus, it is argued that even though the actions are otherwise proper 23(b)(3) suits, notice to absentees is not required and should not be given because such members are barred in any event. Notice therefore is said to be futile. Plaintiffs contend that not only the case law demands a different result and supports their position that the statutory period is tolled by commencement of a class action under 23(b)(3), but argue additionally that policy measures intrinsic to antitrust law compel a like result. The question is not free from difficulty.

HN7[] Commencement of a Rule 23(b)(3) class action tolls the four year statute of limitations provided by § 5(b) of the Clayton Act. The court reaches this conclusion and so finds based upon three considerations: (1) the only reported decision found to date under the new Rule 23 held the statutory period tolled under very similar circumstances; (2) the vast majority of pre-amendment Rule 23 cases established the propriety of tolling in "spurious" class actions; and (3) [37] policy considerations inherent in § 5(b), plus the changes wrought by new Rule 23(b)(3), demand that tolling be permitted.

After the July 1, 1966 effective date for new Rule 23, the only court which apparently has encountered the tolling problem is Philadelphia Elec. Co. v. Anaconda Am. Brass Co., 43 F.R.D. 452 (E.D. Pa. 1968). There several private treble damage actions under the antitrust laws were commenced as Rule 23(b)(3) class actions shortly before termination of the § 5(b) limitation period. In concluding that absentee class members were not barred and should be given notice pursuant to 23(c) the court stated the arguments and legal conclusions of the parties at length, rejected their premise that a negative ruling on class action maintenance would preclude the absentee members from bringing suit, and decided that HN8[] affirmative class action determinations relate back to the time of the institution of the lawsuits. Defendants in Philadelphia Electric raised the precise arguments raised at bar:

> " . . . The defendants argue . . . that to permit a class action under these circumstances would be to approve the resurrection of a lot of stale claims and the stirring-up [38] of unwarranted litigation which would not otherwise have occurred to anyone; that under the circumstances it is highly unlikely that silent class members could have been relying on the class action as the vehicle for vindicating their rights; and that, from the standpoint of court congestion, the total avoidance of a large number of lawsuits is obviously 'superior' to the class action here attempted."

Since these arguments were all rejected by the court, the case, which is nearly identical to the matter at bar, is persuasive authority for plaintiffs herein. The form of notice in that case was to be proposed by the parties. Because of the numerous class members involved, the court required that members of the class electing not to be excluded from the class [*574] be directed to file proofs of claim on or before a specified date with failure to comply tantamount to adjudication of no claim on the merits.

Under the pre-amendment case law, the majority of courts passing upon the tolling problem concluded that the institution of a spurious class action tolled the applicable statute of limitations for the benefit of absentee class members. See Escott v. Barchris Constr. [39] Corp., 340 F.2d 731 (2d Cir. 1965), cert. denied, Drexel & Co. v. Hall, 382 U.S. 816, 15 L. Ed. 2d 63, 86 S. Ct. 37 (1966) (Securities Act of 1933); Union Carbide & Carbon Corp. v. Nisley, 300 F.2d 561 (10th Cir. 1961), petition for cert. dismissed, Wade V. Union Carbide & Carbon Corp., 371 U.S. 801, 9 L. Ed. 2d 46, 83 S. Ct. 13 (1962) (Sherman Act); Culver v. Bell & Loffland, Inc., 146 F.2d 29 (9th Cir. 1944), (Fair Labor Standards Act); York v. Guaranty Trust Co., 143 F.2d 503 (2d Cir. 1944), rev'd on other grounds, 326 U.S. 99, 89 L. Ed. 2079, 65 S. Ct. 1464 (1945); Newberg v. American Dryer Corp., 195 F. Supp. 345 (E.D. Pa. 1961) (Securities Act of 1933); Kam Koon Wan v. E. E. Black, Ltd., 75 F. Supp. 553 (D. Hawaii 1948) (Fair Labor Standards Act); Mutation Mink Breeders' Ass'n v. Lou Nierenberg Corp., 23 F.R.D. 155 (S.D.N.Y. 1959) (Lanham Trade-Mark Act). Additionally, plaintiffs receive support from Professor Moore in 3A Moore, Federal Practice para. 23.12, at 3476 (2d ed. 1967).

Defendants rely principally upon three decisions. Athas v. Day, 161 F. Supp. 916 (D. Colo. 1958) and P. W. Husserl, Inc. v. Newman, 25 F.R.D. 264 (S.D.N.Y. 1960) are said to clearly support the defendants' [40] position, while Escott v. Barchris Constr. Corp., supra, cited by plaintiffs favorably, also is said to support the defendants. The court, rather than dwell at length in analysis of these conflicting cases, [22] notes that the weight of authority under pre-amended Rule 23 spurious class actions quite decisively points toward the plaintiffs' contentions herein. However, no Supreme Court case nor any decision of the Eighth Circuit supporting defendants' position has been brought to the court's attention. The issue is not free from doubt elsewhere as demonstrated by the above conflicting cases, but in the court's opinion policy considerations augur for the weight of authority of cases under old Rule 23 with even greater force under amended Rule 23(b)(3).

The policy [41] approach to the limitation question is stressed in most recent authority discussing the problem. See Escott v. Barchris Constr. Corp., supra; Advisory Committee's Notes, Proposed Rules of Civil Procedure, 39 F.R.D. 69, 99, 104 (1966); Kaplan, Continuing Work of the Civil Committee: 1966 Amendments of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 81 Harv.L.Rev. 356, 384 (1967); Note, Class Actions Under Rule 23 and Federal Statutes of Limitation: A Study of Conflicting Rationale, 13 Vill.L.Rev. 370 (1968). But see, 2 W. Barron & A. Holtzoff, Federal Practice & Procedure § 568 (Wright ed. Supp. 1968). Such a policy analysis looks to the statute of limitations in question as well as the possible consequence under Rule 23(b)(3).

New Rule 23(b)(3) removes most of the possible pernicious effects of tolling present under the unamended Rule 23 and the line of cases exemplified by Union Carbide & Carbon Corp. v. Nisley, supra. That decision reached a proper result in a § 5(b) context. New Rule 23 removes the problem of "one-way intervention" prevalent in the Union Carbide [*575] case. [23] There the absentee members of the spurious class were permitted to intervene even after judgment [42] for the class had been entered and the statute of limitations had run. Thus, such members were able to await the outcome of the action to decide whether to enter the class. If the plaintiffs lost, they would not intervene and consequently would not be bound by the judgment and (if still within the statute of limitations) could commence their own suit while if successful, the absentees could directly benefit. Naturally, this situation evoked much criticism from the authorities. HN9[] Under the new Rule 23 such "one-way intervention" is not possible, for the class determination is to be made as soon as possible after institution of suit. Absentees thus are compelled when in receipt of notice under 23(c)(2) to make a binding decision within a short time of commencement of the suit, and surely never after a decision on the merits. Much of the inequity of Union Carbide is dissipated in this fashion.

[43] Defendants quote extensively from the legislative history of § 5(b) [24] in an effort to show that the policy of that section is frustrated by permitting maintenance of a suit such as this as a class action. It is possible to argue that Congress has given liberal treatment to antitrust civil litigants already, and therefore class action tolling is superfluous and an unwarranted extension. [25] There is doubt that Congress ascertained a problem of tolling in this situation at all. [26]

---

[22] For an excellent analysis of the case law dealing with tolling problems under federal statutes of limitation, see Note, Class Actions Under New Rule 23 and Federal Statutes of Limitation: A Study of Conflicting Rationale, 13 Vill.L.Rev. 370 (1968).

[23] The Rules Advisory Committee spoke with particularity about the problem of one-way intervention:

> "Hitherto, in a few actions conducted as 'spurious' class actions and thus nominally designed to extend only to parties and others intervening before the determination of liability, courts have held or intimated that class members might be permitted to intervene after a decision on the merits favorable to their interests, in order to secure the benefits of the decision for themselves, although they would presumably be unaffected by an unfavorable decision. . . . Under proposed sub-division (c)(3), one-way intervention is excluded . . .."

[24] S. Rep. No. 619, 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 6 (1955); H.R. Rep. No. 422, 84th Cong., 1st Sess. 6, 9 (1955). These reports deal with the purposes sought to be furthered by § 5(b).

[25] See 13 Vill.L.Rev.. 370 (1966).

[44] Defendants further argue that the § 5(b) limitation policies must be discerned in light of Order of R. R. Telegraphers v. Railway Express Agency, Inc., 321 U.S. 342, 88 L. Ed. 788, 64 S. Ct. 582 (1944), where the court noted the policy underlying statutes of limitation:

> "Statutes of limitation, like the equitable doctrine of laches, in their conclusive effects are designed to promote justice by preventing surprises through the revival of claims that have been allowed to slumber until evidence has been lost, memories have faded, and witnesses have disappeared. The theory is that even if one has a just claim it is unjust not to put the adversary on notice to defend within the period of limitation and that the right to be free of stale claims in time comes to prevail over the right to prosecute them." Id. at 348-49.

The defendants conclude that a 23(b)(3) complaint does not sufficiently give notice to defendants so as to satisfy the Railway Express case, since it only tells of other absentee members and is not specific as to their identity nor as to whether they will or will not enter the action. Two observations are pertinent in this regard. First, notice is given [45] by the filing of the styled class action and defendants thus are forewarned of impending [*576] litigation. While it is true that the exact number of plaintiffs is unascertainable, the court believes that defendants are advised sufficiently to avoid surprise, preserve records relevant thereto (especially where only one conspiracy is alleged and the geographic limitations are quite well defined), and begin defense preparations. Second, under the new Rule 23, the class membership will be defined in the normal situation shortly or within a reasonable time after the statutory period expires. So, in the matter at hand, defendants have been unaware of the precise number of class members beyond the limitation period only for the short time between February 10, 1968, and the date required for response to the notice prescribed by the court herein.

While it is true that the reliance of class members upon the bringing of the class action and thus not bringing their own action may be de minimus in this case, the court does not believe that the "stirring up" of litigation argument is persuasive here. The consequences to potential class members should in fact be irrelevant, since the statute [46] of limitations is a defendant's shield. If the defendant receives the protection the statute guarantees, its policy is satisfied. That plaintiffs did not in fact rely is unimportant. Moreover, the State plaintiffs here allege that but for their own reliance upon prior case law tolling the statute, they would have forewarned the lesser state entities of the need for dispatch in bringing their own litigation. Since this is a different, clearer reliance than that in York v. Guaranty Trust Co., 143 F.2d 503 (2d Cir. 1944), rev'd on different grounds, 326 U.S. 99, 89 L. Ed. 2079, 65 S. Ct. 1464 (1945), which is now rejected by most authority, the reliance rationale is more appropriate here.

In sum, this action may be maintained as a class action under Rule 23(b)(3) and it is so ordered.

Overlapping Classes.

Four State Attorneys General have brought class suits representing all significant lesser governmental entities within their respective jurisdictions. These representatives are proper representatives of their classes and within the scope and purport of Rule 23(b)(3). The Third Division cases, however, which were filed prior to the four State cases seek to represent the [47] same governmental entities. No cases claim to represent any class comprised of private individuals. If all suits are given class action status, all lesser governmental entities are within one of the classes represented by the States, as well as the Third Division classes. This over-lap in the court's judgment is best resolved by permitting the maintenance of the Third Division suits as class suits only to the extent that absent class members may request entrance to the class if so desired, within the time hereinafter prescribed by the court without, however, there being any notice on behalf of these plaintiffs sent from this court or otherwise pursuant to Rule 23(c). The net effect, therefore, will be to give any such intervenors or absent class members the benefit of the Third Division filing date for purposes of the statute of limitations tolling and to this extent the Third Division actions will continue as class actions. HN10[] The "superiority" criteria of 23(b)(3) explicitly permits the court to look at the existence of other law suits when deciding whether a class action should be maintained.

---

[26] See generally, Minnesota Mining & Mfg. Co. v. New Jersey Wood Finishing Co., 381 U.S. 311, 14 L. Ed. 2d 405, 85 S. Ct. 1473 (1965); State of Michigan v. Morton Salt Co., 259 F. Supp. 35 (D. Minn. 1966), aff'd sub nom. Hardy Salt Co. v. State of Illinois, 377 F.2d 768 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 912, 19 L. Ed. 2d 260, 88 S. Ct. 238 (1967).

While the giving of notice pursuant to Rule 23(c) may always arguably create a problem [48] of solicitation by the very nature of the Rule, nevertheless such should be avoided whenever and to the extent possible. In this situation, the best resolution seems to be with permitting the Attorneys General to assume this task and to speak for and represent the class members in court; provided that any member of the class may be separately represented if it [*577] wishes and/or may elect to, and will be permitted as above stated and within the times hereinafter limited, join the Third Division cases. The Attorneys General act in parens patriae, as it were, and have a responsibility to the various lesser governmental entities which the City of St. Paul, for instance, does not have. Further it would be expected that Attorneys General will not charge the prospective class members a percentage of any recovery made as a fee for their representation.

The court realizes that possibly problems may exist and will have to be solved in the future as to "lead counsel" for plaintiffs, division of work, areas of responsibility, etc., although the court sincerely hopes plaintiffs' counsel will be able to work these matters out among themselves. If, however, plaintiffs ultimately prevail [49] and the court awards in addition to the recovery made, an attorney's fee as permitted by the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.§ 15, the court reserves the question as to the division thereof and does not purport now to establish the amount of, nor the right or rights in and to a legal fee upon completion of the law suits. The court will attempt to evaluate the contributions made by various plaintiffs counsel and establish fees accordingly.

Notice Under Rule 23(c).

HN11[] The Rule provides that "the court shall direct to the members of the class the best notice practicable . . . ." The court does not interpret this as requiring personal notice from the court itself but as permitting the court to direct one or some of the parties to give a notice in such form as the court may approve. Each of the Attorneys General in the Fourth Division cases has indicated it has adequate lists of, and facilities for mailing notice to, governmental entities within its borders. The court therefore directs that these offices fulfill this function of giving notice. The notices should contain the matter required by Rule 23(c)(2), and in addition should include something in the nature of a verified proof of claim [50] form to be filled out and returned so as to indicate name of the claimant, the appropriate or knowledgeable government official familiar with the details of the claim, the gross amount of purchases and dates thereof for which claim is made, the person or firm from or through whom bought or general contractor dealt with, type of building or structure into which the steel was incorporated or other end use made of the product and any other matters deemed appropriate. Attached to or accompanying the proof of claim form should be a certified resolution of the governing body authorizing the submission of the claim. Plaintiffs may desire from, or may wish to furnish to, class members other information. There is no prohibition by the court against such, provided that the notice or any information shall be informative and not urging action nor solicitations. The following time table is established:

> WITHIN 10 days from date of this order, Fourth Division plaintiffs shall submit to all defendants, the other plaintiffs, and to the court for its approval, a copy of the proposed notice and proof of claim forms.
>
> WITHIN 10 days thereafter, defendants and the other plaintiffs may send [51] to these plaintiffs and to the court suggestions or objections as to the form of notice and proof of claim forms for consideration by the court.
> WITHIN 15 days from the court's approval of the notice and proof of claim form, the same shall be transmitted to the prospective members of the class by the four Attorneys General.
>
> WITHIN 60 days from such latter date, Fourth Division plaintiffs shall file with the clerk of this court and makes copies available to each defendant the responses or proofs of claims received from the members of the class, and this, subject to further [*578] court order, shall then comprise the classes (together with any such filings in addition to present pleadings made by or in the cases represented by the Third Division plaintiffs) and all not so filing shall be barred and excluded from the classes. Each Attorney General also shall file and furnish a copy to the other parties proof of mailing, showing a list of those to whom mailed.

II.

Qualifications of Plaintiffs' Counsel

On March 15, 1968, at the opening of the informal pretrial conference, objection was made by defendants to the appearance for the Third Division plaintiffs of a member [52] of the District of Columbia Bar whose admission to this court had been moved for the purpose of participating with local counsel in this litigation. The objection was based on Canon 36 of the American Bar Association Canons of Ethics that, as a lawyer, he had been an employee of the Department of Justice, Antitrust Division in 1964 at the time of the investigation and ultimate criminal indictment of the six defendants in this case. He did not leave the Department of Justice until November, 1966. Canon 36 provides in pertinent part:

> HN12[] "A lawyer, having once held public office or having been in the public employ, should not after his retirement accept employment in connection with any matter which he has investigated or passed upon while in such office or employ."

The court heard oral evidence and satisfied itself that while with the Department of Justice, counsel did not handle nor was he assigned to the cases involving the steel industry at any time; that he never saw any grand jury minutes or documents, nor participated in such proceedings; that he never saw or examined any F.B.I. reports or any other governmental agent's reports; that he never examined the Department [53] of Justice files on the steel cases nor conferred with anyone within the Department of Justice about the cases. At the time of instituting these cases, as a former employee, he had, and now has, no greater rights or "in" with the Department of Justice than any other practicing attorney. In view of this showing, the court holds that plaintiffs' counsel is not in violation of Canon 36, in that he never "investigated or passed upon" any matters relating to the case at bar. The rationale and holding of Hilo Metals Co. v. Learner Co., 258 F. Supp. 23 (D. Hawaii 1966) is thus not applicable here; nor is the "appearance of evil" doctrine espoused by Judge Kaufman in United States v. Standard Oil Co., 136 F. Supp. 345 (S.D.N.Y. 1955) and in a subsequent article which he authored, The Former Government Attorney and the Canons of Professional Ethics, 70 Harv.L.Rev. 657 (1957). Allied Realty of St. Paul, Inc. v. Exchange Nat'l Bank, 283 F. Supp. 464 (D. Minn. 1968) is clearly distinguishable. That was a case where counsel had participated actively in a 13-week government criminal trial, had examined F.B.I. reports, grand jury transcripts, etc., all involving many of the same issues and facts [54] as later were involved in a private damage suit in which the former government counsel appeared for plaintiffs. There the attorney had "investigated and passed upon" and the "appearance of evil" could be said to exist.

Defendants further raised the possibility that counsel for plaintiffs may have solicited the retainer of his law firm to handle the Third Division cases in violation of Canon 28 of the Canons of Ethics. Defendants requested permission to take certain depositions to inquire into this field and the court permitted such to the extent of taking the depositions of two members of the City of St. Paul corporate counsel's office. These were available at the April 15, 1968 hearing. On the basis thereof, and the records as a whole, and assuming [*579] arguendo that defendants have standing to make this challenge, the court concludes and makes a finding that there is no showing or evidence of any solicitation on the part of plaintiffs' counsel; that the members of the City of St. Paul corporate counsel's office who were deposed are reputable and respected members of the Minnesota Bar and their testimony accords with that given by plaintiffs' counsel to the effect [55] that it was the City of St. Paul which approached the Washington, D.C. law firm (of which plaintiffs' counsel is a member) seeking advice on antitrust matters, including the possibility of instituting the action in the case at bar. Any further inquiry into this aspect could go far afield and the court declared at the hearing on April 15, 1968, that it was satisfied that there has been no violation of Canon 28. Plaintiffs' counsel is therefore admitted to this court for the purpose of participating in this litigation with local counsel, and defendants' motions to require further answers from deponents in the depositions and for leave to take further depositions are denied. It is so ordered.

III.

Motion for Intervention

Counsel for Third Division plaintiffs has moved, on behalf of and representing the Minneapolis-St. Paul Metropolitan Airports Commission, an agency of the State of Minnesota, to intervene as a party plaintiff in the City of St. Paul action (or the consolidated Third Division actions). Since this Commission would be, and is, one of the members of the class, and since it has chosen to be identified with the St. Paul action and to be represented by legal counsel [56] other than the Attorney General, and since at the last hearing there was no objection raised to this motion other than the general one by defendants as to the maintenance of class actions, this motion is granted and it is so ordered.

IV.

Motion to Disclose Grand Jury Witnesses and Subpoenas

The Third Division plaintiffs by written motion seek an order on behalf of themselves and the other plaintiffs authorizing their attorneys to inspect and copy all subpoenas issued to, and all lists of names of, witnesses appearing before the federal grand jury for the District of Minnesota in the investigation antedating the criminal indictment which was returned on February 10, 1964, charging the defendants herein with violations of the antitrust laws. Plaintiffs' grounds for the motions are three:

> (1) "The interests of justice require that such information, available to and in possession of defendants in this litigation, should be equally available to plaintiffs;"
>
> (2) "The importance of the testimony which witnesses gave during the course of the grand jury investigation and the likely importance in the connection with the pending litigation, demonstrates the immediate need for [57] the requested information prior to the initiation of discovery;" and
>
> (3) "The interests and even-handed application of justice requires prompt disclosure to plaintiffs of information which has been made available to defendants."

Defendants resist this motion principally upon the ground of traditional grand jury secrecy [27] which is said to encompass [*580] information including subpoenas and witnesses' names as well as the minutes. Furthermore, defendants contend that the reasons justifying disclosure to civil litigants are wholly absent in the matter at bar, and that U.S. Indus., Inc. v. United States Dist. Court, 345 F.2d 18 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 382 U.S. 814, 15 L. Ed. 2d 62, 86 S. Ct. 32 (1965), cited as dispositive by plaintiffs, is inapposite. The court finds in accordance with the defendants' position, and, accordingly, denies the motion for access to the list of grand jury witnesses and subpoenas.

[58] While the Supreme Court has vigilantly recognized the policy of secrecy in conjunction with grand jury proceedings, see, e.g., Dennis v. United States, 384 U.S. 855, 16 L. Ed. 2d 973, 86 S. Ct. 1840 (1966); Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. v. United States, 360 U.S. 395, 3 L. Ed. 2d 1323, 79 S. Ct. 1237 (1959); United States v. Procter & Gamble Co., 356 U.S. 677, 2 L. Ed. 2d 1077, 78 S. Ct. 983 (1958); Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 359, 100 L. Ed. 397, 76 S. Ct. 406 (1956); United States v. Johnson, 319 U.S. 503, 87 L. Ed. 1546, 63 S. Ct. 1233 (1943), nevertheless, exception is made under these cases when the movants for disclosure show "particularized need." Under the facts presented at bar, plaintiffs have not in the court's opinion shown sufficient "particularized need" to merit disclosure, at least at this time.

First, defendants represent to the court that they have neither had nor do they have access to the information sought. Some of what defendants know of the grand jury proceeding was gleaned from government summaries of

---

[27] HN13[] Fed. R. Crim. P. Rule 6(e):

"Secrecy of Proceedings and Disclosure. Disclosure of matters occurring before the grand jury other than its deliberations and the vote of any juror may be made to the attorneys for the government for use in the performance of their duties. Otherwise a juror, attorney, interpreter, stenographer, operator of a recording device, or any typist who transcribes recorded testimony may disclose matters occurring before the grand jury only when so directed by the court preliminarily to or in connection with a judicial proceeding or when permitted by the court at the request of a defendant upon a showing that grounds may exist for a motion to dismiss the indictment because of matters occurring before the grand jury. No obligation of secrecy may be imposed upon any person except in accordance with this rule."

HN14[] -

certain grand jury testimony with the witnesses' names deleted by the court. These summaries were made in conjunction with the government's motion for [59] sentencing in the criminal proceedings previously mentioned. The information plaintiffs seek to discover here is stated never to have been disclosed to defendants. [28] The major reason for secrecy of proceedings at this late stage is to prevent intimidation of future grand jury witnesses who might believe their names would be released if names were disclosed here, and hence be reluctant to testify. See Note, Release of Grand Jury Minutes in the National Deposition Program of the Electrical Equipment Cases, 112 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1133 (1964); [29] HN15[] U.S. Indus., Inc. v. United States Dist. Court, supra. Witnesses' names are matters before the grand jury and so are entitled to secrecy. Application of State of California, 195 F. Supp. 37, 40 (E.D. Pa. 1961). Plaintiffs have cited no decision going so far as to permit violation of grand jury secrecy merely for purposes of discovery by plaintiffs in a subsequent civil suit against the same defendants. In sum, plaintiffs have failed to bear their burden at this point in the litigation which is a prerequisite to [*581] revealing grand jury information. The normal routes of civil discovery will well give plaintiffs adequate opportunity to [60] prepare their case. Mere savings of monetary burden will not suffice to bring the court's discretion into play under Rule 6(e), Fed. R. Crim. P. United States v. Procter & Gamble Co., 356 U.S. 677, 682, 2 L. Ed. 2d 1077, 78 S. Ct. 983 (1958); Application of State of California, supra; City of Philadelphia v. Westinghouse Elec. Corp., 210 F. Supp. 486 (E.D. Pa. 1962). The time may come when the parties are well into or have completed their discovery that a "particularized need" will become apparent for disclosure of the information requested. If a proper showing subsequently is made, the court will be open to consider an appropriate motion in this regard.

[61] V.

Motion to Vacate Prior Order

Plaintiffs counsel has moved the court to vacate the order of the Honorable Edward J. Devitt, a judge of this court dated July 13, 1964, in which order the judge ordered that certain information "shall not become a part of the public records." This court indicated at the time of hearing that he would discuss this motion with Judge Devitt. He advises that the submissions were really briefs by the government and each of the defendants, dealing with sentencing, and done for the purpose of affording a guide to the court upon which to impose appropriate sentences. The government submitted a "statement of facts" and each of the defendants submitted a similar statement of facts. The court at the time indicated that the submissions would be confidential and the same were in fact not filed.

It has long been the policy of this court not to disclose presentence investigatory reports from the Probation Officer. It seems to this court, affirming the opinion held by Judge Devitt, that the submissions were in the nature of or in the same category as probation office reports and should be held confidential. Again, the time may come when the parties have completed [62] their discovery that the court will wish to reconsider this ruling, but a promise of confidentiality given and ordered by the court prior to any submissions should not be lightly removed and since at least at this time there is an absence of a showing of any real exigency, the court rules that the motion should be denied. The court is not unaware of U.S. Indus., Inc. v. United States Dist. Court, supra, wherein the court exercised his discretion and permitted a disclosure of a somewhat similar document. This court exercises its discretion to deny disclosure.

VI.

Consolidation

---

[28] Certain it is that defendants must have knowledge of at least some of the grand jury witnesses, for undoubtedly one or more of their own employees were called together with others in the industry who would be known to defendants. Appropriate interrogatories or other discovery proceedings undoubtedly can ascertain these names.

[29] Apparently disclosure of grand jury proceedings was permitted to some extent to plaintiffs in civil antitrust cases in what have been styled the Electrical cases (some unreported) for the purposes of impeachment and the refreshing of recollection. No such exigency appears here, at least at this stage of the case.

Counsel for Third Division plaintiffs has moved to consolidate the four Third Division cases. The court is quite clear as to the reasons for, and the advantages of, a consolidation, though does not find in plaintiffs' moving papers whether counsel wishes true consolidation so that the Third Division cases result in but one judgment and thus one right to appeal, or whether he wishes something less. [30] No opposition was voiced to the motion, though no similar motion was made by the Fourth Division plaintiffs.

[63] Rule 42(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provides:

> "Consolidation. When actions involving a common question of law or fact are pending before the court, it may order a joint hearing or trial of any or all the matters in issue in the actions; it may order all the actions consolidated; and it may make such [*582] orders concerning proceedings therein as may tend to avoid unnecessary costs or delay."

The court believes that all eight actions, plus the complaint in intervention of the Metropolitan Airports Commission as an intervenor in the Third Division cases, should be consolidated (or at least treated jointly) for purposes of all pretrial matters, all motions and discovery proceedings, and certainly for trial. Each of the eight plaintiffs may of course, and should, it would seem continue to be separately represented and participate separately in the trial. A consolidation as the court envisions and intends will result in but one trial which will bind all parties plaintiff and defendants, as well as all class members, and is indeed the purport of the Recommended Procedures for Protracted Litigation and is necessary to save time, money and multiplicity [64] of litigation. Separate judgments will be expected to result, however, and appellate rights should not be consolidated. The motion to consolidate is granted and ordered, as and to the extent above as to all cases, both Fourth and Third Division cases. The question of severing the trial and perhaps trying the conspiracy issue first and separately, and the damages and fraudulent concealment issues either thereafter or theretofore is reserved for later consideration by the court.

VII.

Discovery Proceedings

At the institution of these actions, the court entered orders temporarily restraining discovery. Plaintiffs have moved to lift the orders, at least to the extent that will permit plaintiffs to pose interrogatories to defendants concerning conspiracy. The court is of the view that the restraining order should continue for the time being and it is so ordered. Until the court's order determining the classes to be made after submission of proofs of claims and related documents as hereinabove provided, it is not feasible to make a specific schedule for any type of extensive discovery. The court would contemplate an additional pretrial conference within 30 days after such date [65] and would request that at that time the parties submit a schedule and plan, hopefully agreed upon in advance, for the taking of depositions, identification, deposit and inspection of documents, requests for admissions and any other discovery proceedings. The court would then attempt to fix a time table or schedule for discovery. [31]

The only discovery feasible at this time it would seem is the serving of interrogatories. Within 30 days from date hereof, plaintiffs may, if they wish, submit interrogatories to the defendants relating to questions germane to conspiracy; provided [66] that defendants may have 75 days within which to answer the same despite the 15 day limitation of Rule 33; provided further that any objections to the interrogatories or requests for protective orders shall be promptly noticed and submitted to the court after receipt by defendants of the interrogatories.

---

[30] For the various meanings and concepts of the term consolidation within the purview of Rule 42(a), see 2B W. Barron & A. Holtzoff, Federal Practice & Procedure § 941 et seq. (Wright ed. 1961).

HN16[] -

[31] The court's oral order from the bench made on the record March 15, 1968 will remain in full force and effect to the end that none of the parties shall destroy or remove from the court's jurisdiction any documents or evidence now in existence relating to this case, used in the prior grand jury proceedings or relating in general to the business of selling structural steel or relating to knowledge on the part of plaintiffs or class members.

Within 30 days of the filing of the proofs of claims following notice to members of the class, defendants may pose "transaction" interrogatories to plaintiffs and to all members of the class; provided 60 days shall be allowed for answers thereto.

[*583] VIII.

Extension of Time to Defendants to Answer

Defendants, at the first pretrial hearing and renewed at the second pretrial hearing on April 15, 1968, moved the court to extend the time to answer, move or otherwise plead to the plaintiffs' complaints. This motion was granted. The court no longer can see a valid reason why responsive motions, answers or other pleadings should not be interposed. Consequently the court orders that the time within which defendants may so answer, move or otherwise plead expires 30 days from the date of this order.

IX.

Motion to Strike Allegations of Complaints

Each of the eight complaints [67] makes specific references to, and pleads in some detail, the government investigation of the steel industry, the return of the criminal indictment by the grand jury and the nolo contendere pleas entered by all of the defendants. The claim of the defendants is that under Rule 12(f) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, these allegations are immaterial, impertinent and highly prejudicial.

The plaintiffs all concede that HN17[] nolo contendere pleas do not establish a prima facie case against defendants because under § 5(a) of the Clayton Act they are denominated the equivalent of consent judgments. However, plaintiffs argue that the government proceedings are material and relevant in establishing fraudulent concealment, which is clearly in issue at this stage of the cases, and become essential in establishing the tolling of the statute of limitations. Since rule 9(b), Fed. R. Civ. P., requires particularity in pleading fraud, plaintiffs submit that the government proceeding must be pled.

On the authority of State of Illinois v. Sperry Rand Corp., 237 F. Supp. 520 (N.D. Ill. 1965) and N.W. Elec. Power Cooperative v. General Elec. Co., 30 F.R.D. 557 (W.D. Mo. 1961), the court [68] disagrees with plaintiffs and accordingly grants the defendants' motions to strike all allegations in the original or amended complaints relating to the above discussed matters. Plaintiffs may continue to plead that the date of discovery was not until February 10, 1964, but no reference should be made otherwise to the criminal proceedings. Against the objection that the court is ruling now and in advance on the admissibility of evidence, suffice it to say that this matter is sufficiently prejudicial to defendants as to require this action now. Such striking of course will not limit discovery scope and is not intended to. Plaintiffs' counsel will furnish to the clerk and counsel amended pleadings, or substitute sheets to supplant those in the present pleadings within 30 days from the date of this order.

From the complaints in State of Minnesota, State of North Dakota and State of Wisconsin cases, the following is stricken:

1. From paragraph 18: " . . . the filing of the indictment by the United States referred to hereinafter . . ."
2. All of paragraph 22.
3. From paragraph 23: " . . . the institution of proceedings by the United States of America against the [69] defendants hereon . . ."

From the complaint in the case of State of South Dakota, the following is stricken:

From paragraph 11: " . . . when it had learned of the indictment filed against the defendants herein in the United States District Court for the District of Minnesota, Fourth Division . . ."

From the original complaints of all four Third Division plaintiffs the following is stricken:

1. From paragraph 16: " . . . after an indictment, hereinafter [*584] alleged in Paragraph 17 was brought by the United States against the defendants . . ."

2. All of Paragraph 17.

From the amended complaints of all Third Division plaintiffs and the complaint of intervenor Metropolitan Airports Commission, the following is stricken:

1. From paragraph 17: " . . . when an indictment changing a similar combination and conspiracy was brought by the United States against the defendants . . ."
and
" . . . when defendants were convicted on pleas of nolo contendere . . ."

2. All of paragraph 18.

Let this be filed as an order in all eight pending cases.

Perma Life Mufflers v. International Parts Corp.

Supreme Court of the United States

April 22-23, 1968, Argued ; June 10, 1968, Decided

No. 733

Reporter

392 U.S. 134 *; 88 S. Ct. 1981 ; 20 L. Ed. 2d 982 ; 1968 U.S. LEXIS 3168 *; 1968 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,486

PERMA LIFE MUFFLERS, INC., ET AL. v. INTERNATIONAL PARTS CORP. ET AL.

Prior History: [1] CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT.

Disposition: 376 F.2d 692, reversed and remanded.

Core Terms

pari delicto, antitrust, damages, provisions, dealers, anti trust law, mufflers, franchise, terms, manufacturer, participated, cases, illegal scheme, treble damages, resale price, conspiracy, violations, parties, fault, franchise agreement, Sherman Act, restrictions, franchisees, territorial, selling, prices, deter, source of a supply, public interest, anticompetitive

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Remedies > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Affirmative Defenses > General Overview

HN1[] Private Actions, Remedies

There is nothing in the language of the antitrust acts which indicates that Congress wanted to make the common-law in pari delicto doctrine a defense to treble-damage actions. Although in pari delicto literally means "of equal fault," the doctrine has been applied, correctly or incorrectly, in a wide variety of situations in which a plaintiff seeking damages or equitable relief is himself involved in some of the same sort of wrongdoing. The United States Supreme Court has often indicated the inappropriateness of invoking broad common-law barriers to relief where a private suit serves important public purposes. A plaintiff in an antitrust suit can not be barred from recovery by proof that he had engaged in an unrelated conspiracy to commit some other antitrust violation.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Remedies > General Overview

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Industry Practices > Federal Regulations > Antitrust Regulations

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > General Overview

HN2[] Private Actions, Remedies

The purposes of the antitrust laws are best served by insuring that the private action will be an ever-present threat to deter anyone contemplating business behavior in violation of the antitrust laws. The plaintiff who reaps the reward of treble damages may be no less morally reprehensible than the defendant, but the law encourages his suit to further the overriding public policy in favor of competition. A more fastidious regard for the relative moral worth of the parties would only result in seriously undermining the usefulness of the private action as a bulwark of anti-trust enforcement. And permitting the plaintiff to recover a windfall gain does not encourage continued violations by those in his position since they remain fully subject to civil and criminal penalties for their own illegal conduct.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > General Overview

HN3[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Vertical Restraints

The fact that a retailer can refuse to deal does not give the supplier immunity if the arrangement is one of those schemes condemned by the anti-trust laws.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Discrimination > Defenses > General Overview

HN4[] Price Discrimination, Defenses

The doctrine of in pari delicto, with its complex scope, contents, and effects, is not to be recognized as a defense to an antitrust action.

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Complaints > Requirements for Complaint

Civil Procedure > Pleading & Practice > Pleadings > Rule Application & Interpretation

HN5[] Complaints, Requirements for Complaint

Pleadings must be construed as to do substantial justice. Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(f).

Lawyers' Edition Display

Summary

In a private antitrust action instituted in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, to recover treble damages from the defendants, who manufactured automobile mufflers and exhaust system parts, the plaintiffs, who had entered into dealership sales contracts, alleged that the defendants had violated the Robinson-Patman Act by granting discriminations in prices and services to some of their other customers, and that the defendants had conspired to restrain competition in violation of the Sherman Act and the Clayton Act under certain provisions of the dealership agreements obligating the dealers to purchase all mufflers and parts from the defendants, requiring that the dealers sell at fixed resale prices, tying the sale of mufflers to the sale of other products in the defendants' line, and prohibiting the dealers from selling outside their designated exclusive sales territories. The District Court entered summary judgment for the defendants on the ground that the plaintiffs' claims were barred by the doctrine of in pari delicto. The Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit reversed the judgment with regard to the claim under the Robinson-Patman Act, but affirmed the ruling that the other claims were barred under the doctrine of in pari delicto (376 F2d 692).

On certiorari, the Supreme Court of the United States reversed the judgment of the Court of Appeals, with directions to reverse the District Court's judgment and to remand the case for trial. In an opinion by Black, J., expressing the view of five members of the court, it was held that (1) the doctrine of in pari delicto was not to be recognized as a defense to a private antitrust action, (2) the plaintiffs therefore were not barred from recovery on the ground that they had sought their franchises with knowledge of the terms and had enjoyed profits as dealers and sought to acquire additional franchises, since their participation was not voluntary in any meaningful sense in view of the agreement clauses, which were clearly detrimental to their interests and to which they allegedly had continually objected, (3) the possible beneficial byproducts of a restriction in the agreements from a plaintiff's point of view could be taken into consideration in computing damages, and (4) there was no merit in the defendants' contention that the plaintiffs were barred from recovery, wholly apart from the idea of pari delicto, on the ground that the plaintiffs actively supported the entire restrictive program as such, since the record refuted such contention and showed, to the contrary, that the illegal scheme had been thrust upon the plaintiffs by the defendants.

White, J., concurring, joined the opinion of the court with the observation that the in pari delicto defense in its historic formulation was not a useful concept for determining whether a plaintiff should be barred because of his own conduct, that the determination of whether a party to an illegal venture was entitled to damages from the other participants should be made by hewing closer to the aims and purposes of the Clayton Act, which gives treble damage recovery to a private plaintiff injured by conduct violating the antitrust laws, and that in general, recovery should be denied where the plaintiff and the defendant were substantially equally responsible for the injury resulting to one of them, whereas recovery should be permitted in favor of the one least responsible where one was more responsible than the other.

Fortas, J., concurred in the result, stating that the doctrine of in pari delicto had a significant yet limited role in private antitrust law, barring recovery if the fault of the parties was reasonably within the same scale, but that the plaintiffs in the case at bar were not barred under the doctrine, although they should not be allowed to recover damages based upon any clause in the franchise agreements if they were chargeable with responsibility for the particular clause, because it was in substance their own act.

Marshall, J., concurred in the result, expressing the view that a limited application of the basic principle behind the in pari delicto doctrine was both proper and desirable in the antitrust field, barring recovery where the plaintiff was substantially equally at fault, that summary judgment for the defendants in the instant case was not proper, since the record indicated that the plaintiffs had not sought out or supported all the anticompetitive restrictions in the franchises, that if the defendants showed that certain provisions were inserted in the franchise agreements at the behest and for the benefit of the plaintiffs and their fellow franchisees, the plaintiffs should be barred from contending that they were damaged by the existence and enforcement of such provisions, and that if it was established that the plaintiffs actually participated in the formulation of the entire agreement, trading off anticompetitive restraints on their own freedom of action for anticompetitive restraints intended for their benefit, the plaintiffs should be barred from seeking damages as to the agreement as a whole.

Harlan, J., joined by Stewart, J., concurred in part and dissented in part, stating that the defense of in pari delicto, properly applied, should be permitted in antitrust cases, that plaintiffs who were truly in pari delicto were those who had themselves violated the law in co-operation with the defendant, that the lower courts had erred in holding that the plaintiffs were in pari delicto merely because they had voluntarily entered into the franchise agreements and accepted benefits therefrom, and that the case should be remanded for consideration of the motion for summary judgment upon proper standards, requiring the determination of whether any agreement allegedly in restraint of trade was one for which the plaintiffs were substantially as much responsible, and as much legally liable, as the defendants.

Headnotes

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §36 > RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §41 > RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §42 > RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §50 > exclusive dealership agreements -- defense -- doctrine of in pari delicto -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[1A][] [1A]LEdHN[1B][] [1B]

In a private antitrust action to recover treble damages from the defendants, who manufactured automobile mufflers and exhaust system parts, wherein the plaintiffs, who had entered into dealership sales contracts, alleged that the defendants had violated the Robinson-Patman Act (15 USC 13) by granting discriminations in prices and services to some of their other customers, and that the defendants had conspired to restrain and lessen competition in violation of 1 of the Sherman Act (15 USC 1) and 3 of the Clayton Act (15 USC 14) under provisions of the dealership agreements obligating the dealers to purchase all mufflers and parts from the defendants, requiring that they sell at fixed resale prices, tying the sale of mufflers to the sale of other products in the defendants' line, and prohibiting dealers from selling outside their designated exclusive sales territories, the doctrine of in pari delicto is not available as a defense, and recovery is not barred on the ground that the plaintiffs had sought their franchises with knowledge of the terms of the agreements and had enjoyed profits as dealers and sought to acquire additional franchises, where their participation was not voluntary in any meaningful sense, since the plaintiffs had not sought each and every clause of the agreements, many of which were clearly detrimental to their interests and to which they allegedly had continually objected, and since the plaintiffs' acquiescence was necessary to obtain an otherwise attractive business opportunity.

PLEADING §48.5 > summary judgment -- private antitrust action -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[2][] [2]

In a private antitrust action to recover treble damages from the defendants, who manufactured automobile mufflers and exhaust system parts, wherein the plaintiffs, who had entered into dealership sales contracts, alleged that the defendants had violated the Robinson-Patman Act (15 USC 13) by granting discriminations in prices and services, and that the defendants had conspired to restrain and lessen competition in violation of 1 of the Sherman Act (15 USC 1) and 3 of the Clayton Act (15 USC 14) under provisions of the dealership agreements obligating the dealers to purchase all mufflers and parts from the defendants, requiring that they sell at fixed resale prices, tying the sale of mufflers to the sale of other goods in the defendants' line, and prohibiting the dealers from selling outside their designated exclusive sales territories, the defense that the restraints were permissible as reasonable means to protect the defendants' registered trade and service marks cannot be decided as a summary judgment question, but must be resolved along with all the other issues by a trial on the merits.

APPEAL §910.6 > grant of certiorari -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[3][] [3]

The Supreme Court of the United States will grant certiorari where the rulings by the Court of Appeals in a private antitrust action to recover treble damages seem to threaten the effectiveness of the private action as a vital means for enforcing the antitrust policy of the United States.

ACTIONS §18 > defenses -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[4][] [4]

Broad common-law barriers to relief should not be invoked where a private suit serves important public purposes.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §6 > private action -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[5][] [5]

The purposes of the antitrust laws are best served by insuring that a private action will be an ever-present threat to deter anyone contemplating business behavior in violation of the antitrust laws.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §14 > private antitrust action -- effect of violation by plaintiff -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[6][] [6]

Although the plaintiff who reaps the reward of treble damages in a private antitrust action may be no less morally reprehensible than the defendant, nevertheless the law encourages his suit to further the overriding public policy in favor of competition; permitting the plaintiff to recover a windfall gain does not encourage continued violations by those in his position, since they remain fully subject to civil and criminal penalties for their own illegal conduct.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §14 > private antitrust action -- plaintiffs' participation in illegal arrangement -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[7][] [7]

In private antitrust actions, the courts do not have power to undermine the antitrust acts by denying recovery to injured parties merely because they have participated to the extent of utilizing illegal arrangements formulated and carried out by others.

DAMAGES §159 > RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §36 > RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §41 > RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §42 > private antitrust action -- plaintiffs' participation in violation -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[8][] [8]

In a private antitrust action to recover treble damages from the defendants, who manufactured automobile mufflers and exhaust system parts, wherein the plaintiffs, who had entered into dealership sales contracts, alleged that the defendants had violated the Robinson-Patman Act (15 USC 13) by granting discriminations in prices and services to some of their other customers, and that the defendants had conspired to restrain and lessen competition in violation of 1 of the Sherman Act (15 USC 1) and 3 of the Clayton Act (15 USC 14) under provisions of the dealership agreements obligating the dealers to purchase all mufflers and parts from the defendants, requiring that the dealers sell at fixed resale prices, tying the sale of mufflers to the sale of other products in the defendants' line, and prohibiting the dealers from selling outside their designated exclusive sales territories, the possible beneficial byproducts of a restriction in the agreement from a plaintiff's point of view can be taken into consideration in computing damages, but once it is shown that the plaintiff did not aggressively support and further the monopolistic scheme as a necessary part and parcel of it, his understandable attempts to make the best of a bad situation by operating under the agreement are not a ground for completely denying him the right to recover which the antitrust acts give him.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §14 > private antitrust action -- defense -- doctrine of in pari delicto -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[9][] [9]

The doctrine of in pari delicto, with its complex scope, contents, and effect, is not to be recognized as a defense to a private antitrust action.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §36 > RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §41 > RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §42 > RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §50 > private antitrust action -- plaintiffs' participation in violation -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[10][] [10]

In a private antitrust action to recover treble damages from the defendants, who manufactured automobile mufflers and exhaust system parts, wherein the plaintiffs, who had entered into dealership sales contracts, alleged that the defendants had violated the Robinson-Patman Act (15 USC 13) by granting discriminations in prices and services to some of their other customers, and that the defendants had conspired to restrain and lessen competition in violation of 1 of the Sherman Act (15 USC 1) and 3 of the Clayton Act (15 USC 14) under provisions of the dealership agreements obligating the dealers to purchase all mufflers and parts from the defendants, requiring that the dealers sell at fixed resale prices, tying the sale of mufflers to the sale of other products in the defendants' line, and prohibiting the dealers from selling outside their designated exclusive sales territories, there is no merit in the defendants' contention that the plaintiffs are barred from recovery, wholly apart from the idea of pari delicto, on the ground that the plaintiffs actively supported the entire restrictive program as such, participating in its formulation and encouraging its continuation, where the record refuted such contention and showed, to the contrary, that the illegal scheme had been thrust upon the dealers by the defendants, neither of the most strenuously challenged provisions, requiring the dealers to purchase their supplies exclusively from the defendants and to carry the defendants' full line of parts, being in a dealer's self-interest, since they obligated the dealer to buy from the defendants regardless of whether more favorable prices could be obtained from other sources and regardless of whether the dealer needed certain parts at all, and it being shown that the defendants had repeatedly refused, with warnings and threats, numerous requests by the plaintiffs for permission to purchase from other sources of supply.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES AND TRADE PRACTICES §34 > private antitrust action -- common ownership of corporate defendants -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[11][] [11]

In a private antitrust action to recover treble damages from the defendants, who manufactured automobile mufflers and exhaust system parts, wherein the plaintiffs, who had entered into dealership sales contracts with one of the defendant corporations, alleged that the defendants had conspired to restrain competition in violation of the

Sherman Act under provisions of the dealership agreements which imposed restrictions upon the dealers, the fact of common ownership of the defendants, who were a parent corporation, three of its subsidiaries, and some of the officers and agents of the corporations, does not save the defendants from any of the obligations that the law imposes on separate entities, under the asserted theory that because the defendants were all part of a single business entity they were entitled to co-operate without creating an illegal conspiracy.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §31 > private antitrust action -- dealership franchise agreements -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[12][] [12]

In a private antitrust action to recover treble damages from the defendants, who were commonly owned corporations and some of their officers and agents, and who manufactured automobile mufflers and exhaust system parts, wherein the plaintiffs, who had entered into dealership franchise agreements with one of the defendant corporations, asserted a violation of the Sherman Act under provisions of the franchise agreements which imposed restrictions upon the dealers, each plaintiff can charge a combination between himself and the corporation with which the agreements were made, as of the day the plaintiff unwillingly complied with the restrictive franchise agreements, or between such corporation and other franchise dealers, whose acquiescence in the corporation's firmly enforced restraints was induced by the communicated danger of termination of the franchise.

PLEADING §176 > private antitrust action -- sufficiency of complaint -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[13][] [13]

In a private antitrust action to recover treble damages from the defendants, who were commonly owned corporations and some of their officers and agents, and who manufactured automobile mufflers and exhaust system parts, wherein the plaintiff, who had entered into dealership sales contracts with one of the defendant corporations, alleged that the defendants had conspired to restrain competition in violation of the Sherman Act under certain provisions of the dealership agreements which imposed restrictions upon the dealers and which the defendants had refused to eliminate, there is no merit in the defendants' contention that the complaint failed to allege with sufficient specificity certain alternative theories of conspiracy which were asserted by the plaintiffs and which were based on charges of combinations between each plaintiff and the corporation with which the agreements were made, and between such corporation and other franchise dealers, in view of the rules providing for trying cases to serve the ends of justice and particularly the requirement of Rule 8 (f) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure that pleadings be construed as to do substantial justice, the gist of the plaintiffs' cause of action having been clear from the outset, and the defendants not being prejudiced if the plaintiffs were permitted to rely on the alternative theories of conspiracy.

Syllabus

Petitioners, dealers who had operated "Midas Muffler Shops," brought this antitrust action for treble damages against respondent Midas, Inc., its parent corporation (International), two other subsidiaries, and corporate officers and agents, charging an illegal conspiracy in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act, and violations of § 3 of the Clayton Act and § 2 as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act. Petitioners attacked provisions of the sales agreements which they had made with Midas including those which barred petitioners from purchasing from other sources, prevented them from selling outside designated territories, tied muffler sales to other Midas-line products, and required petitioners to sell at fixed retail prices. The District Court entered summary judgment for respondents. The Court of Appeals reversed the judgment on the Robinson-Patman claim but affirmed the District Court's ruling that petitioners' other claims were barred [*2] by the doctrine of in pari delicto, noting that petitioners, with full knowledge of the restrictions, had enthusiastically sought and enormously profited from the Midas franchises and had sought additional franchises. The court also held that petitioners' Sherman Act claim was barred because Midas and International were part of a single business entity and therefore entitled to cooperate without creating an illegal conspiracy. Held:

1. There is nothing in the language of the antitrust laws indicating a congressional intent that the doctrine of in pari delicto should constitute a defense to a private antitrust action, and such application of the doctrine would undermine the important function performed by the private antitrust action in enforcing the antitrust laws. Pp. 138-140.

2. The record refutes respondents' argument that petitioners actively participated in formulating the restrictive plan and encouraged its continuation. Pp. 140-141.

3. Common ownership does not relieve separate corporate entities of the obligations which the antitrust laws impose; and in any event each petitioner can charge a combination between Midas and himself or other acquiescing franchisees. [*3] Pp. 141-142.

Counsel: Robert F. Rolnick argued the cause for petitioners. With him on the briefs were Raymond R. Dickey and Bernard Gordon.

Glenn W. McGee argued the cause for respondents. With him on the brief were John T. Chadwell, David J. Gibbons, John C. Berghoff, Jr., David Silbert, and Jay Erens.

Opinion by: BLACK

Opinion

[*135] [988] [1982] MR. JUSTICE BLACK delivered the opinion of the Court.

LEdHN[1A][] [1A] LEdHN[2][] [2] LEdHN[3][] [3]The principal question presented is whether the plaintiffs in this private antitrust action were barred from recovery by a doctrine known by the Latin phrase in pari delicto, which literally means "of equal fault." The plaintiffs, petitioners here, were all dealers who had operated "Midas Muffler Shops" under sales agreements granted by respondent [1983] Midas, Inc. Their complaint charged that Midas had entered into a conspiracy with the other named defendants -- its parent corporation International Parts Corp., two other subsidiaries, [*4] and six individual defendants who were officers or agents of the corporations -- to restrain and substantially lessen competition in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act [1] and § 3 of the Clayton Act. [2] They also charged that the defendants had violated § 2 (a) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, [3] by granting discriminations in prices and services to some of their customers without offering the same advantages to the plaintiffs. The District Court entered summary judgment for respondents with respect to all of petitioners' [*136] claims. On appeal the Court of Appeals reversed the judgment for respondents on the Robinson-Patman claim but, over Judge Cummings' dissent, affirmed the District Court's ruling that the other claims were barred by the doctrine of in pari delicto. The court also held that petitioners' Sherman Act claim was barred because Midas and International, while functioning as separate corporations, had a common ownership and therefore could cooperate without creating an illegal conspiracy. [4] 376 F.2d 692 (1967). Because these rulings by the Court of Appeals seemed to threaten the effectiveness of the private action [*5] as a vital means for enforcing the antitrust policy of the United States, we granted certiorari. 389 U.S. 1034 (1968). For reasons to be stated, we reverse.

[1] 26 Stat. 209, 15 U. S. C. § 1.

[2] 38 Stat. 731, 15 U. S. C. § 14.

[3] 49 Stat. 1526, 15 U. S. C. § 13.

[6] The economic arrangements that led to this lawsuit have a long history. Respondent International Parts has been in the business of [989] manufacturing automobile mufflers and other exhaust system parts since 1938. In 1955 the owners of International initiated a detailed plan for promoting the sale of mufflers by extensively advertising the "Midas" trade name and establishing a nation-wide chain of dealers who would specialize in selling exhaust system equipment. Each prospective dealer was offered a sales agreement prepared by Midas, Inc., a wholly owned subsidiary of International. The agreement [*137] obligated the dealer to purchase all his mufflers from Midas, to honor the Midas guarantee on mufflers sold by any dealer, and to sell the mufflers at resale prices fixed by Midas and at locations specified in the agreement. The dealers were also obligated to purchase all their exhaust system parts from Midas, to carry the complete line of Midas products, and in general to refrain from dealing with any of Midas' competitors. In return Midas promised to underwrite the cost of the muffler guarantee and gave the dealer permission to use the registered trademark "Midas" [*7] and the service mark "Midas Muffler Shops." The dealer was also granted the exclusive right to sell "Midas" products within his defined territory. He was not required to pay a franchise fee or to purchase or lease substantial capital equipment from Midas, and the agreement was cancelable by either party on 30 days' notice.

Petitioners' complaint challenged as illegal restraints of trade numerous provisions of the agreements, such as the terms barring them from purchasing [1984] from other sources of supply, preventing them from selling outside the designated territory, tying the sale of mufflers to the sale of other products in the Midas line, and requiring them to sell at fixed retail prices. Petitioners alleged that they had often requested Midas to eliminate these restrictions but that Midas had refused and had threatened to terminate their agreements if they failed to comply. Finally they alleged that one of the plaintiffs had had his agreement canceled by Midas for purchasing exhaust parts from a Midas competitor, and that the other plaintiff dealers had themselves canceled their agreements. All the plaintiffs claimed treble damages for the monetary loss they had suffered [*8] from having to abide by the restrictive provisions.

The Court of Appeals, agreeing with the District Court, held the suit barred because petitioners were in pari [*138] delicto. The court noted that each of the petitioners had enthusiastically sought to acquire a Midas franchise with full knowledge of these provisions and had "solemnly subscribed" to the agreement containing the restrictive terms. Petitioners had all made enormous profits as Midas dealers, had eagerly sought to acquire additional franchises, and had voluntarily entered into additional franchise agreements, all while fully aware of the restrictions they now challenge. Under these circumstances, the Court of Appeals concluded, "it would be difficult to visualize a case more appropriate for the application of the pari delicto doctrine." 376 F.2d, at 699.

LEdHN[4][] [4]LEdHN[5][] [5]LEdHN[6][] [6]We find ourselves in complete disagreement with the Court of Appeals. HN1[] There is nothing in the language of [*9] the antitrust acts which indicates that Congress wanted to make the common-law in pari delicto doctrine a defense to treble-damage actions, and the facts of this case suggest no basis for applying such a doctrine even if it did exist. Although [990] in pari delicto literally means "of equal fault," the doctrine has been applied, correctly or incorrectly, in a wide variety of situations in which a plaintiff seeking damages or equitable relief is himself involved in some of the same sort of wrongdoing. We have often indicated the inappropriateness of invoking broad common-law barriers to relief where a private suit serves important public purposes. It was for this reason that we held in Kiefer-Stewart Co. v. Seagram & Sons, 340 U.S.

---

[4] In their motion for summary judgment respondents also argued that the restraints were permissible as reasonable means to protect their registered trade and service marks, but because they had failed to answer interrogatories pertinent to this defense, the district judge ordered it stricken, without prejudice to renewal if respondents promptly answered the relevant interrogatories. Because of its disposition of the case, the Court of Appeals reached neither the merits of this defense nor the question whether respondents had ever properly renewed it. In the circumstances of this case, we think the merits of this defense cannot be decided as a summary judgment question but must be resolved, along with all the other issues, by a trial on the merits.

211 (1951), that a plaintiff in an antitrust suit could not be barred from recovery by proof that he had engaged in an unrelated conspiracy to commit some other antitrust violation. Similarly, in Simpson v. Union Oil Co., 377 U.S. 13 (1964), we held that a dealer whose consignment agreement was canceled for failure to adhere to a fixed resale price could bring suit under the antitrust laws [*10] even though by signing the agreement he had to that extent [*139] become a participant in the illegal, competition-destroying scheme. Both Simpson and Kiefer-Stewart were premised on a recognition that HN2[] the purposes of the antitrust laws are best served by insuring that the private action will be an ever-present threat to deter anyone contemplating business behavior in violation of the antitrust laws. The plaintiff who reaps the reward of treble damages may be no less morally reprehensible than the defendant, but the law encourages his suit to further the overriding public policy in favor of competition. A more fastidious regard for the relative moral worth of the parties would only result in seriously undermining the usefulness of the private action as a bulwark of anti-trust enforcement. And permitting the plaintiff to recover a windfall gain does not encourage continued violations by those in his position since they remain fully subject to civil and criminal penalties for their own illegal conduct. Kiefer-Stewart, supra.

LEdHN[1B][] [1B] LEdHN[7][] [7] [*11] LEdHN[8][] [8] LEdHN[9][] [9]In light of these considerations, we cannot accept the Court of Appeals' idea that courts have power to undermine [1985] the antitrust acts by denying recovery to injured parties merely because they have participated to the extent of utilizing illegal arrangements formulated and carried out by others. Although petitioners may be subject to some criticism for having taken any part in respondents' allegedly illegal scheme and for eagerly seeking more franchises and more profits, their participation was not voluntary in any meaningful sense. They sought the franchises enthusiastically but they did not actively seek each and every clause of the agreement. Rather, many of the clauses were quite clearly detrimental to their interests, and they alleged that they had continually objected to them. Petitioners apparently accepted many of these restraints solely because their acquiescence was necessary to obtain an otherwise attractive business opportunity. The argument that such [*140] conduct by petitioners defeats their right [*12] to sue is completely refuted by the following statement from Simpson: "HN3[] The fact that a retailer can refuse to deal does not give the supplier immunity if the arrangement is one of those schemes condemned by the anti-trust laws." 377 U.S., at 16. Moreover, even if petitioners actually favored and supported some of the other restrictions, they cannot be blamed for seeking to minimize the disadvantages of the agreement [991] once they had been forced to accept its more onerous terms as a condition of doing business. The possible beneficial byproducts of a restriction from a plaintiff's point of view can of course be taken into consideration in computing damages, but once it is shown that the plaintiff did not aggressively support and further the monopolistic scheme as a necessary part and parcel of it, his understandable attempts to make the best of a bad situation should not be a ground for completely denying him the right to recover which the antitrust acts give him. We therefore hold that [*13] HN4[] the doctrine of in pari delicto, with its complex scope, contents, and effects, is not to be recognized as a defense to an antitrust action.

LEdHN[10][] [10]Respondents, however, seek to support the judgment below on a considerably narrower ground. They picture petitioners as actively supporting the entire restrictive program as such, participating in its formulation and encouraging its continuation. We need not decide, however, whether such truly complete involvement and participation in a monopolistic scheme could ever be a basis, wholly apart from the idea of in pari delicto, for barring a plaintiff's cause of action, for in the present case the factual picture respondents attempt to paint is utterly refuted by the record. One of the restrictions which petitioners most strenuously challenge is the requirement that dealers purchase their supplies exclusively from Midas. Another is the requirement that dealers carry Midas' full line of parts. Neither of these provisions could be in a dealer's self-interest since they obligate [*141] him to buy from Midas regardless of whether more favorable prices [*14] can be obtained from other sources of supply and regardless of whether he needs certain parts at all. [5] In addition, the depositions refer to [5] Respondents suggest that these requirements were beneficial to a dealer because they helped him win customers who had confidence in the "Midas" brand, and some dealers evidently did try to reap some benefit from these requirements by advertising, "You get only nationally-advertised Midas products." It seems highly unlikely, however, that benefits of this kind could do more than mitigate very slightly the losses that a dealer would suffer when forced to buy higher-priced Midas products, particularly since dealers would have bought the higher-priced Midas products voluntarily if they thought customer preferences for the brand would be sufficiently strong to offset the higher price.

numerous instances in which petitioners asked Midas for permission to purchase from some other source of supply. The record shows that these requests were repeatedly refused by Midas representatives, [1986] who underscored the refusals by describing the very requests as "heresy" and by commenting that dealers who bought from outside sources of supply were "asking for trouble" or "were going to be punished." A Midas official warned petitioner Pierce, who had been buying some exhaust parts from other manufacturers, "Joe, this is just like cheating on your wife; it is grounds for divorce."

[15] These statements completely refute respondents' argument that petitioners were active participants and show, to the contrary, that the illegal scheme was thrust upon them by Midas.

LEdHN[11][] [11]LEdHN[12][] [12]LEdHN[13][] [13]There remains for consideration only the Court of Appeals' alternative holding that the Sherman Act claim should be dismissed because respondents were all part of a single business entity and [992] were therefore entitled to cooperate without creating an illegal conspiracy. But since respondents Midas and International availed themselves of the privilege of doing business through separate corporations, the fact of common ownership could not [*142] save them from any of the obligations that the law imposes on separate entities. See Timken Co. v. United States, 341 U.S. 593, 598 (1951); United States v. Yellow Cab Co., 332 U.S. 218, 227 (1947). In any event each petitioner can clearly charge a combination between [*16] Midas and himself, as of the day he unwillingly complied with the restrictive franchise agreements, Albrecht v. Herald Co., 390 U.S. 145, 150, n. 6 (1968); Simpson v. Union Oil Co., supra, or between Midas and other franchise dealers, whose acquiescence in Midas' firmly enforced restraints was induced by "the communicated danger of termination," United States v. Arnold, Schwinn & Co., 388 U.S. 365, 372 (1967); United States v. Parke, Davis & Co., 362 U.S. 29 (1960). Although respondents object that these particular theories of conspiracy now pressed by petitioners were not alleged with sufficient specificity in their complaint, this suggestion is completely without merit. Our modern rules provide for trying cases to serve the ends of justice and require that HN5[] pleadings "be so construed as to do substantial justice." Rule 8 (f), Fed. Rules Civ. Proc. The gist of petitioners' cause of action has been clear from the outset, and respondents will in no way be prejudiced if petitioners are permitted to rely [*17] on these alternative theories of conspiracy.

It follows that the judgment of the Court of Appeals must be reversed. The case is remanded to that court with directions to reverse in full the judgment of the District Court and to remand the case for trial.

It is so ordered.

Concur by: WHITE; FORTAS; MARSHALL; HARLAN (In Part)

Concur

MR. JUSTICE WHITE, concurring.

I join the opinion and judgment of the Court with the following observations.

As long ago as 1927, in Eastman Kodak Co. of N. Y. v. Southern Photo Materials Co., 273 U.S. 359, the Court [*143] recognized that participation in an unlawful course of conduct would not bar recovery where the defendant's superior bargaining power led to plaintiff's participation in the unlawful arrangement. In Kiefer-Stewart Co. v. Joseph E. Seagram & Sons, Inc., 340 U.S. 211 (1951), where plaintiff was said to have participated in an illegal scheme other than the one charged in his complaint, the Court made it clear that a plaintiff's own delinquency under the antitrust laws would not always bar his treble-damage suit. See also Bales v. Kansas City Star Co., 336 F.2d 439, 444 (C. A. 8th Cir. 1964); [*18] Jewel Tea Co. [1987] v. Local Unions, 274 F.2d 217, 223 (C. A. 7th Cir.), cert. denied, 362 U.S. 936 (1960). These cases are enough to warrant reversal in this case, once it is concluded that the illegal arrangement in which petitioners participated [993] was thrust on them by respondents. This is the conclusion reached by the Court and I agree with it.

I also agree that the in pari delicto defense in its historic formulation is not a useful concept for sorting out those situations in which the plaintiff might be barred because of his own conduct from those in which he may have been a party to an illegal venture but is still entitled to damages from other participants. Judgments like these would be better made by hewing closer to the aims and purposes of § 4 of the Clayton Act, 38 Stat. 731, 15 U. S. C. § 15, which gives treble-damage recovery to the private plaintiff injured by conduct which violates the antitrust laws.

Under § 4, plaintiff must show not only that the defendant violated the antitrust laws but that his conduct caused the damages alleged in the complaint. Normally, it would be enough [*19] with respect to causation if the defendant "materially contributed" to plaintiff's injury, Continental Ore Co. v. Union Carbide & Carbon Corp., 370 U.S. 690, 702 (1962); or "substantially [*144] contributed, notwithstanding other factors contributed also," Momand v. Universal Film Exchanges, Inc., 172 F.2d 37, 43 (C. A. 1st Cir. 1948), cert. denied, 336 U.S. 967 (1949). The plaintiff need not show that the illegality was a more substantial cause than any other. Haverhill Gazette Co. v. Union Leader Corp., 333 F.2d 798, 805-806 (C. A. 1st Cir.), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 931 (1964).

Under this rule, a third party proving an illegal undertaking between two defendants may recover for all damages caused by the combination. Those damages normally may be had from either or both defendants without regard to their relative responsibility for originating the combination or their different roles in effectuating its ends. This is because neither defendant, if he acted alone, could be charged with the violation; some degree of participation by both is essential to create a combination within the [*20] reach of § 1 of the Sherman Act. Either defendant is therefore deemed to have been a material cause of the damages, sufficient to permit a third party to recover.

This may be the result required under § 4 when conspirators are sued by an injured outsider. But what is the situation when one party to the combination sues the other? Assume three situations: first, A, a manufacturer, sells to B, a retailer. A, over B's objection, insists on B's adhering to specified resale prices. B agrees since A's product is an important part of his business and he can get it nowhere else. B suffers a decline in business because of an inability to match or better the price for competing products. B sues A. He is obviously in a position to prove that A was a substantial cause of his injury.

Second, suppose that when B maintains the suggested prices on A's product, he simply sells more of C's competing product, which he also handles. B is not hurt, but A is. A sues B.

[*145] Third, suppose that D and E, competitors, combine to fix higher prices. D's best customer sets up his own source of supply to D's great damage. D sues E, claiming that E was a substantial cause of his injury.

[21] It is arguable that in each supposed situation recovery should be [994] denied because the plaintiff was a party to the illegality and wrongdoers should be left where they are found. In terms of the deterrent aims of the statute permitting injured plaintiffs to recover treble damages, however, this undiscriminating approach [1988] makes little sense. When those with market power and leverage persuade, coerce, or influence others to cooperate in an illegal combination to their damage, allowing recovery to the latter is wholly consistent with the purpose of § 4, since it will deter those most likely to be responsible for organizing forbidden schemes. The principles of Eastman Kodak Co. of N. Y. v. Southern Photo Materials Co., supra, clearly permit recovery by the less responsible, but injured, party. In the first hypothetical case, therefore, B should recover from A in order to deter A and others like him from imposing resale price maintenance schemes on their customers.

In the second case, where manufacturer A, contrary to his expectations, was injured and retailer B was not, there is no reason, based on the deterrent purposes of § 4, to permit [*22] recovery from B, even though his cooperation was essential to the combination and even though had a third party been injured he could have recovered from either A or B, or from both. A, the moving force, should not be rewarded for his efforts to further an unlawful price arrangement and in effect to take from B the profits, trebled, that B made by selling the products of A's competitor. B was unwilling to enter the illegal scheme, was motivated principally by what he thought was economic necessity -- the need to avoid losing business by being unable to offer a major [*146] product line -- and would have been only marginally deterred by the prospect of antitrust liability.

In the third case, where D and E are competitors, if D simply proves the agreement and the resulting loss, should he recover from E, absent some believable showing that E was the more responsible for the illegal scheme? No doubt E was a substantial factor in the combination and hence in the injury; a judgment for damages might deter him and others from violating the law. But D is equally responsible for his own damages. To permit him a recovery may be a counterdeterrent. By assuring him illegal profits [*23] if the agreement in restraint of trade succeeds, and treble damages if it fails, it may encourage what the Act was designed to prevent. In this situation, it is doubtful that the ends of § 4 would be measurably served by permitting D's recovery. If judge or jury finds the parties equally responsible for the conduct which caused injury, D's recovery under § 4 should be denied for failure of proof that E was the more substantial cause of the injury.

No simple formula can encompass the infinite variety of possible situations. Generally speaking, however, I would deny recovery where plaintiff and defendant bear substantially equal responsibility for injury resulting to one of them but permit recovery in favor of the one less responsible where one is more responsible than the other. This rule would simply pose the issue of causation in particularized form. There will be little mystery as to what evidence would be relevant proof: facts as to the relative responsibility for originating, negotiating, and implementing the scheme; evidence as to who might reasonably have been expected to benefit from the [995] provision or conduct making the scheme illegal under § 1; proof of [*24] whether one party attempted to terminate the arrangement and encountered resistance or counter-measures from the other; facts showing [*147] who ultimately profited or suffered from the arrangement.

As I view the record in the case before us, the evidence is insufficient to show that petitioners were as responsible as respondents, or more so, for the admittedly illegal scheme. The evidence before us does not suggest that petitioners were equal partners with respondents with respect to the origin and implementation of this scheme for distributing respondents' mufflers, or in terms of benefits from the scheme. In such circumstances summary judgment for respondents was improper.

[1989] MR. JUSTICE FORTAS, concurring in the result.

I agree with the result in this case. Petitioners' right to recover in their own interest and as "private attorneys general" to enforce the antitrust laws cannot be denied on the basis of the doctrine of in pari delicto. Simpson v. Union Oil Co., 377 U.S. 13 (1964).

The doctrine has, however, a significant if limited role in private antitrust law. If the fault of the parties is reasonably within the same scale -- if the [*25] "delictum" is approximately "par" -- then the doctrine should bar recovery. This might be the case, for example, if a manufacturer of mufflers and a manufacturer of other parts had combined to formulate and operate a collusive scheme. One co-adventurer could not sue the other for discriminatory or restrictive practices which allegedly diminished its take from the enterprise.

But equality of position of this general nature is necessary before in pari delicto may apply to bar an antitrust remedy. Unless the doctrine is so limited, the private remedy provided by the antitrust laws is nullified to a significant extent. The owner of a gas station may enter into an arrangement with the distributor and may benefit from its restrictive provisions. But this less-than-equal participation in the crime must not bar him [*148] from recovering in his own and the public interest if he can show that he has suffered compensable harm. Our decision in Simpson indicates this quite clearly. The antitrust laws are intended to protect individuals "from combinations fashioned by others and offered to [them] . . . as the only feasible method by which [they] may do business. [*26] " Ring v. Spina, 148 F.2d 647, 653 (1945).

As the Court points out, it is possible that the franchisee may be proved to be a collaborator, or coadventurer, or a true particeps criminis with respect to a particular aspect of the plan -- for example, if he originated and insisted upon the inclusion of a territorial exclusivity clause which was not in the franchise as drafted by the franchisor. He could not recover damages based upon this, if, essentially, it is his own act.

Clearly, petitioners here are not co-adventurers or partners in the franchise arrangement as a whole, and they are not barred by in pari delicto. On remand, as the Court orders, if petitioners are chargeable with responsibility for a particular clause of the agreement or restrictive covenant because it is, in substance, their own act, they should not be allowed to recover for injury [996] they may have suffered because of it.

MR. JUSTICE MARSHALL, concurring in the result.

While I agree with the result and much of the reasoning in the opinion of the Court in this case, I find myself unable to accept what I take to be the holding that the doctrine of in pari delicto [*27] has no place in a treble-damage antitrust action. Not only is it unnecessary to pass on such a broad proposition on the facts of this case, as the Court's opinion reveals, but the holding itself is, in my opinion, incorrect.

I agree that the "complex scope, contents, and effects" of the doctrine as it has grown up in the common law should not be applied mechanically to private antitrust [*149] actions under the relevant federal statutes. On the other hand, I believe that a limited application of the basic principle behind the doctrine of in pari delicto is both proper and desirable in the antitrust field. As the Court notes, ante, at 138, the literal meaning of in pari delicto is of equal fault. I would hold that where a defendant in a private antitrust suit can show that the plaintiff actively participated in the formation and implementation of an illegal scheme, and is substantially equally at fault, the plaintiff should [1990] be barred from imposing liability on the defendant.

Such an approach would still require reversal of the decision of the Court of Appeals in this case. As this Court's opinion makes perfectly clear, the mere fact that a party enters [*28] into an agreement containing provisions that are violative of the antitrust laws with the intent to make money by operating under the agreement is not in itself sufficient to show that he is equally responsible for the existence of the illegal provisions. Simpson v. Union Oil Co., 377 U.S. 13 (1964). Furthermore, the Court is certainly correct in concluding that the record is replete with evidence, relating to the tying and exclusive-dealing provisions of the franchise agreement, which indicates, with sufficient probative force to withstand respondents' motion for summary judgment, that the petitioners did not actively seek out or support all the anticompetitive restraints embodied in the franchise.

However, the inquiry should not stop here. The franchise agreement also contains provisions requiring both resale price maintenance and the observance of territorial restrictions on sales by franchisees. Both of these sets of restrictions are ones which, at least on their face, would ordinarily be expected to benefit the franchisees more than Midas. Both restrict competition between franchisees, not between Midas and other suppliers competing to sell parts to [*29] Midas franchisees. If Midas can [*150] make an adequate showing that those provisions were inserted into the franchise agreement at the behest and for the benefit of petitioners and their fellow franchisees, petitioners should, in my opinion, be barred from contending that they were damaged by the existence and enforcement of the provisions.

I agree with the Court that petitioners should not be barred from recovering damages attributable to the enforcement of the tying and exclusive dealing provisions against them on the sole ground that they participated in the formulation of other anticompetitive provisions in the agreement. Cf. Moore v. Mead Service Co., 340 U.S. 944 [997] (1951), vacating 184 F.2d 338 (C. A. 10th Cir. 1950). However, if Midas could show, which it has quite clearly not done at this stage of the litigation, that petitioners actually participated in the formulation of the entire agreement, trading off anticompetitive restraints on their own freedom of action (such as the tying and exclusive dealing provisions) for anticompetitive restraints intended for their benefit (such as resale price maintenance or exclusive territories), [*30] petitioners should be barred from seeking damages as to the agreement as a whole.

It may be argued that the course I propose unduly complicates private antitrust litigation. A holding that a party who voluntarily enters into an agreement containing provisions that violate the antitrust laws is barred from any recovery on that agreement altogether (as the Court of Appeals has held here) or, at the other extreme, is absolutely free to recover any damages that he can show to stem from his operations under the agreement (as this Court's opinion seems to hold) would presumably be considerably easier to apply in most cases. It seems to me, however, that neither holding would represent a satisfactory resolution of the difficult problems concerning the administration of the antitrust laws raised by [*151] agreements such as the one involved in the present case.

The reasons for rejecting the approach taken by the Court of Appeals are, as I have said, persuasively set forth in the opinion of the Court. The reasons I see for rejecting the approach taken by this Court are, perhaps, less related to the public interest in eliminating all forms of anticompetitive business conduct and more [*31] related to the equities as between the parties. The principle that [1991] a wrongdoer shall not be permitted to profit through his own wrongdoing is fundamental in our juris-prudence. The traditional doctrine of in pari delicto is itself firmly based on this principle. I nevertheless agree, because of the strong public interest in eliminating restraints on competition, that many of the refinements of moral worth demanded of plaintiffs by such traditional legal and equitable doctrines as volenti non fit injuria, unclean hands, and many of the variations of in pari delicto should not be applicable in the antitrust field. However, I cannot agree that the public interest requires that a plaintiff who has actively sought to bring about illegal restraints on competition for his own benefit be permitted to demand redress -- in the form of treble damages -- from a partner who is no more responsible for the existence of the illegality than the plaintiff.

The possible added deterrence to violations of the antitrust laws that would be produced by the Court's holding may well be equaled, if not surpassed, by the new incentive it will create to commit such violations, for [*32] a potential violator will have less to lose if he can attempt to recover his losses from his partner should the scheme not work out to his benefit.

The Court's opinion appears to seek to minimize the consequences of doing away with the in pari delicto defense by suggesting that a defendant will be able to have the "beneficial byproducts of a restriction" (ante, at 140) to the plaintiff taken into account in the computation [*152] of damages. This, of course, is to some extent already true in any antitrust case. Illegal conduct does not per [998] se result in a money judgment for a plaintiff; injury must always be shown. However, a defendant might also be permitted to show that the plaintiff's financial rewards from some of the illegal provisions of an agreement outweighed the harm suffered from other illegal provisions, and accordingly on some sort of offset theory the plaintiff would recover nothing.

If such an offset approach on the issue of damages is envisioned by the Court, it hardly seems an adequate means of preventing unjust enrichment. First, that approach clearly permits damages to be awarded when injury is shown to outweigh benefit regardless [*33] of the nature of the plaintiff's participation in the scheme. Second, it adds an unnecessarily speculative element to the factual inquiry required in an antitrust case. While a trier of fact may have some difficulty in allocating responsibility between the parties to an agreement, the allocation can be made for the most part on the basis of hard evidence as to the facts surrounding the making of the agreement. The determination of damages in an antitrust suit, however, almost invariably requires a certain amount of speculation, no matter how informed. Cf. Bigelow v. RKO Pictures, Inc., 327 U.S. 251, 264-266 (1946). Such speculation is ordinarily unavoidable if damages are to be provable. Here there is no necessity for permitting additional speculation as to offsetting benefits in order to prevent unjust enrichment because the same goal can be achieved by a factual evaluation of the parties' respective fault.

For example, it is obviously much easier to determine in this case whether petitioners actively participated in the formulation and implementation of the various illegal provisions of the franchise agreement than it is to decide whether the monetary [*34] benefits that petitioners obtained [*153] through the resale price maintenance and exclusive territorial provisions surpassed the losses they suffered from the exclusive dealing and tying arrangements. Since I regard a respective-fault approach as superior to a damage-offset approach on principle, the complications inherent in the latter inquiry merely reinforce my conviction that the Court is being unwise in broadly rejecting the doctrine of in pari delicto.

Dissent by: HARLAN (In Part)

Dissent

[1992] MR. JUSTICE HARLAN, with whom MR. JUSTICE STEWART joins, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

The variety of views this case has engendered seems to me to stem from lack of agreement on a definition of the term "in pari delicto," as well as a disagreement, perhaps, on the standards that should govern the use of the defense to which that term is properly applied. I believe that the courts below misused the term, but that properly used it refers to a defense that should be permitted in antitrust cases. Consequently, I would remand this case not for immediate trial but for fresh consideration of the motion for summary judgment upon proper standards.

Plaintiffs who [*35] are truly in pari delicto are those who have themselves violated the law in cooperation with the defendant. [1] If the law is the [999] Sherman Act, both are, in principle, liable equally to criminal prosecution. For example, two manufacturers who agree on a price at which they will sell are "of equal fault," as are a manufacturer and a dealer who strike a bargain whereby each accepts an illegal restriction that benefits the other.

[*154] When a person suffers losses as a result [*36] of activities the law forbade him to engage in, I see no reason why the law should award him treble damages from his fellow offenders. It seems to me a bizarre way to "further the overriding public policy in favor of competition," ante, at 139, to pay violators three times their losses in doing what public policy seeks to deter them from doing. Even if the threat of intra-conspiracy treble damages had some deterrent effect, however, I should not think it a too "fastidious regard for the relative moral worth of the parties," ibid., to decline to sanction a kind of antitrust enforcement that rests upon a principle of well-compensated dishonor among thieves.

There are, however, three situations quite distinct from that to which I think the term in pari delicto is properly applied. The first is the "consent" situation in which the Latin maxim "volenti non fit injuria" is sometimes invoked. Where X and Y conspire to fix prices at which they will sell, they are in pari delicto. If Z, knowing of the conspiracy, nevertheless purchases from X, he is not in pari delicto. He has committed no offense: the most that can be said is that he knowingly allowed [*37] an offense to be committed against him. I would agree, for many of the reasons stated in the opinions of MR. JUSTICE BLACK, MR. JUSTICE FORTAS, and MR. JUSTICE MARSHALL, that there should be no defense in such a situation, where the plaintiff has done nothing the law told him not to do.

A second situation distinguishable from true in pari delicto is illustrated by Kiefer-Stewart Co. v. Seagram & Sons, 340 U.S. 211, relied on by the Court. It was there alleged in defense to a treble-damage action that the defendants' illegal actions were taken in reprisal against altogether independent illegal actions by the plaintiff. Here again, I accept the decision that this is no defense. Our law frowns on vigilante justice. Since the plaintiff is in part enforcing the public interest against the defendants' violations, I would permit him to do so, and [*155] leave punishment for any independent violation by him to proper means of enforcement.

The third distinguishable situation may or may not be illustrated by Simpson v. Union Oil Co., 377 U.S. 13, [1993] and Albrecht v. Herald Co., 390 U.S. 145, two cases [*38] that I find it quite difficult to understand. [2] In each of them, the plaintiff had been offered a dealership, on terms that he did not participate in formulating, and in each case he at first "accepted" such a dealership. Since neither case stated satisfactorily where the alleged combination in restraint of trade was to be found, it is not clear whether the plaintiff's acceptance of a dealership was itself a forbidden act. If it was [1000] not, then these cases fall under the heading of "consent" cases. A person who engaged in a lawful business on the terms offered should not be prevented from suing merely by his knowledge that others violated the law in contriving those terms. If, however, those plaintiffs were doing something the law told them not to do, I suggest that recovery in those cases can best be understood on the theory of a "coercion" exception to the in pari delicto doctrine. That is, although a large business with the power to dictate terms and a small business that can only accept them or cease doing business may both, in principle, be liable to

---

[1] This is at least the traditional use of the term. See, e. g., Williams v. Hedley, 8 East 378, 381-382, 103 Eng. Rep. 388, 389. See generally Note, In Pari Delicto and Consent as Defenses in Private Antitrust Suits, 78 Harv. L. Rev. 1241, distinguishing the two defenses. The present case is as good an illustration as any of the usefulness of maintaining distinct terms for the distinct situations properly characterized by "in pari delicto," "consent," "unclean hands," and so forth.

[2] See my dissenting opinion in Albrecht, 390 U.S., at 156.

legal sanctions for the contract that results from the offer and acceptance, it is considered that the liability [*39] is not "par," and that the business accepting dictation is only minimally blameworthy.

In my view, the District Court and the Court of Appeals did not apply the true in pari delicto standard to this case. The District Court said that "each plaintiff voluntarily entered into the franchise agreement . . . and accepted the benefits therefrom. They are . . . [therefore?] in pari delicto with defendants . . . ." [3] [*40] At another [*156] point the court said, "We have repeatedly held that a person who freely assents to an act suffers 'no legal injury' if harm results therefrom." [4] Although the District Court made a passing distinction of the "coercion" and "unclean hands" doctrines, it is not clear that it meant to hold that the violation of the Sherman Act, if any, was one for which plaintiffs were subject to public-law sanctions along with the defendants.

The Court of Appeals decision was similar. That court relied on the District Court's language quoted above, adding that each of the plaintiffs had made a substantial profit from selling auto parts, a fact that might bear on the measure of any damages but which, apart from illegal action on the part of the plaintiffs, should not afford an absolute defense. [5]

It is by no means clear on this record, however, that the plaintiffs may not be said to have been in pari delicto in the proper sense of that term. This question is rendered more difficult by the complexity of the record history of plaintiffs' activities, and by the formidable obscurity of the law of dealer liability for vertical restraints, an obscurity fostered by Simpson, supra, Albrecht, supra, and above all by United States v. Parke, Davis & Co., 362 U.S. 29. [*41] Although I make no attempt to drain the bog at this point, I am of the view that before this case goes to trial the lower courts should be given another opportunity to consider the in pari delicto defense. I would remand this case to determine whether any agreement alleged to be in restraint of trade was one for which the plaintiffs were substantially as much responsible, and as much legally liable, as the defendants. I would permit the lower courts to consider this question upon the existing affidavits and such additional material as either side may wish to adduce.

References

Am Jur, Monopolies, Combinations, and Restraints of Trade (1st ed 28, 29, 32-36, 181-189)

14 Am Jur Pl & Pr Forms, Monopolies, Combinations, and Restraints of Trade, Forms 14:311, 14:312

11 Am Jur Legal Forms, Sales, Forms 11:1207 et seq.

US L Ed Digest, Restraints of Trade and Monopolies 14, 36, 41, 42, 50

ALR Digests, Restraints of Trade and Monopolies 10, 14, 15, 20, 24, 31, 32

L Ed Index to Anno, Restraints of Trade and Monopolies

ALR Quick Index, Restraints of Trade and Monopolies

[42] Annotation References:

Validity under federal antitrust laws of agreement conferring exclusive sales agency for designated territory. 9 L Ed 2d 1235.

Validity, under 3 of the Clayton Act (15 USC 14), of contract by purchaser of goods to take his entire requirements from the seller. 5 L Ed 2d 1105.

---

[3] 1966 Trade Cases para. 71,801, at 82,705.

[4] Id., at 82,706.

[5] See 376 F.2d 692, at 693, 695.

Robinson-Patman Act as construed by Supreme Court. 2 L Ed 2d 1737.

Validity, construction, and application of provisions of Robinson- Patman Act regarding furnishing of services or facilities. 89 L Ed 1336; 13 ALR 2d 362.

Actions for threefold damages under Federal Antitrust Act. 53 L Ed 826.

Right of manufacturer, producer, or wholesaler to control resale price. 7 ALR 449, 19 ALR 925, 32 ALR 1087, 103 ALR 1331, 125 ALR 1335.

Participation in illegal combination as defense to action under Anti-trust Act. 160 ALR 381.

Contract by one party to sell his entire output to, or to take his entire requirements of a commodity from, the other as contrary to public policy or antimonopoly statutes. 83 ALR 1173 .

Hanover Shoe v. United Shoe Mach. Corp.

Supreme Court of the United States

March 5, 1968, Argued ; June 17, 1968, Decided *

No. 335

Reporter

392 U.S. 481 *; 88 S. Ct. 2224 ; 20 L. Ed. 2d 1231 ; 1968 U.S. LEXIS 3147 *; 1968 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,490

HANOVER SHOE, INC. v. UNITED SHOE MACHINERY CORP.

Prior History: [1] CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE THIRD CIRCUIT.

Disposition: 377 F.2d 776, affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded.

Core Terms

leasing, machines, manufacturer, shoe, damages, monopolization, decree, overcharge, buyer, cases, competitors, shoe machinery, monopoly power, Sherman Act, profits, antitrust, customers, machinery, practices, anti trust law, violations, factories, bought, taxes, prima facie evidence, Clayton Act, treble-damage, predatory, charges, effects

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Penalties

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

HN1[] Clayton Act, Penalties

Section 5(a) of the Clayton Act, 38 Stat. 731, as amended, 69 Stat. 283, 15 U.S.C.S. § 16(a), makes a final judgment or decree in any civil or criminal suit brought by the United States under the antitrust laws prima facie evidence as to all matters respecting which said judgment or decree would be an estoppel as between the parties thereto.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Torts > Business Torts > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > Prioritizing Resources & Organization for Intellectual Property Act

* Together with No. 463, United Shoe Machinery Corp. v. Hanover Shoe, Inc., also on certiorari to the same court.

HN2[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

Section 4 of the Clayton Act, 38 Stat. 731, 15 U.S.C.S. § 15, provides that any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue therefor and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained. The court thinks it sound to hold that when a buyer shows that the price paid by him for materials purchased for use in his business is illegally high and also shows the amount of the overcharge, he has made out a prima facie case of injury and damage within the meaning of § 4.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Transportation Law > Carrier Duties & Liabilities > False Charges & Rebates

HN3[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

A person whose property is diminished by a payment of money wrongfully induced is injured in his property.

Lawyers' Edition Display

Summary

The plaintiff, a manufacturer of shoes and customer of the defendant manufacturer of shoe machinery, brought, in the United States District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, the present treble damage antitrust action based on defendant's monopolization of the shoe machinery market by offering its machines only for leasing but not for sale. In support of its action, plaintiff relied solely on a decree in favor of the United States in a former action against defendant as prima facie evidence under 15 USC 16(a). The District Court awarded damages, in the amount of $ 4,239,609. (245 F Supp 258.) On appeal, the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit affirmed the finding of liability but disagreed with the District Court on certain questions relating to the damage award. (377 F2d 776.)

On writs of certiorari, the Supreme Court reversed the judgment of the Court of Appeals on questions relating to the damage award. In an opinion by White, J., expressing the views of seven members of the court, it was held that (1) the decree in the government's suit determined the illegality of defendant's "lease only" policy and hence was prima facie evidence on that issue, (2) the plaintiff made out a prima facie case by showing the illegality of defendant's "lease only" practice and the amount of defendant's overcharge, (3) defendant was not entitled to assert a "passing on" defense, (4) plaintiff was entitled to damages for the entire period of the applicable Pennsylvania statute of limitations, and (5) the District Court, in computing damages, properly refused to reduce the amount of recovery by the amount of alleged tax advantages to plaintiff, and properly deducted a loan credit interest component of 2.5 percent from the profits that it thought plaintiff would have earned by purchasing machines.

Stewart, J., dissented, expressing the view that the decree in the government's suit was not prima facie evidence of the illegality of defendant's "lease only" practice, and that, in the absence of other evidence, defendant's liability to plaintiff was not established.

Marshall, J., did not participate.

Headnotes

CASES AND QUESTIONS CERTIFIED §9 > time for certification -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[1][] [1]

A Federal District Court acts within its discretion in denying as untimely certification to another District Court of a question of the construction of the latter court's opinion and decree in a former case, where the District Court, in the instant case, had already ruled upon the question.

EVIDENCE §486 > JUDGMENT §141 > in government's antitrust action -- estoppel -- prima facie evidence -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[2][] [2]

In determining the extent of estoppel resulting from a decree in favor of the government in its civil antitrust action, the court is not limited to the decree; if by reference to the findings, opinion, and decree it is determined that an issue was actually adjudicated in the government's antitrust suit, the private plaintiff in a subsequent action against the same defendant for treble damages can treat the outcome of the government's case as prima facie evidence on that issue.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §75 > scope of relief -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[3][] [3]

A provision in a decree rendered in favor of the government in its civil antitrust action which requires that defendant no longer offer for lease its machine type unless it also offers such type for sale, is a justifiable remedy even if the practice that it bans was not instrumental in the monopolization of the market.

EVIDENCE §486 > JUDGMENT §141 > antitrust action -- estoppel -- prima facie evidence -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[4][] [4]

The portions of the court's opinion in favor of the government in its civil antitrust action which, supported by the court's findings of fact, condemn defendant's practice of making its machines available by lease only, estop defendant as against the government, and therefore constitute prima facie evidence in a private plaintiff's subsequent antitrust action against the same defendant for treble damages.

JUDGMENT §65 > antitrust action -- construction -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[5][] [5]

Under the applicable standard for determining monopolization under 2 of the Sherman Act (15 USC 2), it is not error for the courts below to conclude--in a private party's antitrust action for treble damages--that defendant's practice of only leasing and refusing to sell its major machines was determined to be illegal monopolization in a judgment rendered in favor of the government in its former civil antitrust action against defendant, where the court, in the government's case, both in its opinion with respect to violation and in its opinion with respect to remedy, not only dealt with the objectionable clauses in defendant's standard lease but also addressed itself to the consequences of only leasing machines and to the manner in which that practice related to the maintenance of defendant's monopoly power, and where the court's relevant findings in the government's case were sufficient to show that the "lease only" system played a significant role in defendant's monopolization of the shoe machinery market, and those findings were not limited to the particular provisions of defendant's leases, but dealt as well with defendant's policy of leasing but not selling its important machines, with the advantages of that practice to defendant, and with its impact on potential and actual competition.

APPEAL §1512.5 > concurrent findings of courts below -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[6][] [6]

The United States Supreme Court will not disturb--in a treble damage antitrust action based on defendant's monopolization of the shoe machinery market by offering its machinery only for lease but not for sale--the findings of the District Court, affirmed by the Court of Appeals, that plaintiff would have bought rather than leased from defendant had it been given the opportunity to do so.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §67 > damages -- refusal to sell -- necessity of demand -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[7][] [7]

The plaintiff, in an action based on defendant's monopolization of the shoe machinery market by offering its machinery only for lease but not for sale, is not required to prove an explicit demand for the purchase of machines during the damage period, where, as stated by the Court of Appeals, plaintiff had been a customer of defendant in the leasing of machinery for many years, and was well aware of defendant's power as a supplier of machinery and of its policy against sales, and where in such circumstances it would be ironic as well as idle to require the victim of the monopoly to meet an explicit demand the denial of which was implicit in the continuance of the monopoly.

EVIDENCE §343.5 > antitrust suit -- treble damages -- prima facie case -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[8][] [8]

Under 4 of the Clayton Act (15 USC 15), providing for the recovery of treble damages by any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws, the plaintiff buyer has made out a prima facie case of injury and damage, where he shows that the price paid by him for materials purchased for use in his business was illegally high and where he also shows the amount of the overcharge.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §67 > treble damages -- seller's overcharges -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[9][] [9]

A buyer who was overcharged by the seller in violation of the federal antitrust laws is entitled to treble damages not only where, in the face of the overcharge, he does nothing and absorbs the loss, or maintains his own price and takes steps to increase his volume or to decrease other costs, but also where he raises the price for his own product.

EVIDENCE §395 > inferences -- damages -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[10][] [10]

The mere fact that a price rise followed an unlawful cost increase does not show that the sufferer of the cost increase was undamaged.

SALE §78 > unlawful price -- damages -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[11][] [11]

If a cost rise is merely the occasion for a price increase that a businessman could have imposed absent the rise in his costs, the fact that he was earlier not enjoying the benefits of the higher price should not permit the supplier who charges an unlawful price to take those benefits from the businessman without being liable for damages.

ACTION OR SUIT §2 > right of action -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[12][] [12]

The possessor of a right can recover for its unlawful deprivation whether or not he was previously exercising it.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §67 > damages -- "passing on" defense -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[13][] [13]

In a treble damage action based on defendant's monopolization of the shoe machinery market by offering its machines only for lease but not for sale, in which action plaintiff proved injury and the amount of its damages by proving that defendant had overcharged plaintiff during the damage period and by showing the amount of the overcharge, the defendant is not entitled to assert a "passing on" defense by contending that plaintiff suffered no legally cognizable injury because the illegal overcharge during the damage period was reflected in the price charged for shoes sold by plaintiff to its customers and that plaintiff, if it had bought machines at lower prices, would have charged less and made no more profit than it made by leasing.

COURTS §777.5 > retrospective operation of decision -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[14][] [14]

Cursory and conclusory statements in a decision do not provide sufficiently strong proof of a prevailing opinion as to the law to permit the sort of justifiable reliance thereon which alone could generate an argument that the decision should be given only prospective effect.

COURTS §777.5 > retrospective or prospective operation of decision -- in antitrust suit -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[15][] [15]

The decision in American Tobacco Co. v United States (1946) 328 US 781, 90 L Ed 1575, 66 S Ct 1125, holding that proof of predatory practices is not essential to a finding of monopolization in violation of 2 of the Sherman Antitrust Act (15 USC 2), does not fundamentally change the law of monopolization in a way which should be given only prospective effect.

DAMAGES §170 > time for which recoverable -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[16][] [16]

The plaintiff in a treble damage antitrust action who has proved defendant's monopolization of the shoe machinery market by offering its machine only for leasing but not for sale, is entitled to damages for the entire period of the applicable statute of limitations.

LIMITATION OF ACTION §201.5 > antitrust suit -- damages -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[17][] [17]

Even though plaintiff's cause of action--defendant's monopolization of the above machinery market, in violation of 2 of the Sherman Antitrust Act (15 USC 2)--arose outside the applicable state statute of limitations, plaintiff is not barred from claiming treble damages for injury occurring within the statutory period, since defendant's conduct is not the kind of violation which, if it occurs at all, must occur within some specific and limited timespan, and since defendant's conduct constitutes a continuing violation of the Act, inflicting continuing and accumulating harm on plaintiff.

DAMAGES §7 > deduction of tax benefits -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[18][] [18]

In computing plaintiff's damages resulting from defendant's monopolization of the shoe machinery market by offering its machines only for leasing but not for sale, the fact that plaintiff would have had to pay additional taxes, had he purchased machines instead of renting them during the years in question, cannot be considered in reducing the amount of plaintiff's recovery.

DAMAGES §159 > loss of profits -- cost of capital -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[19][] [19]

In computing damages resulting from defendant's monopolization of the shoe machinery market by offering its machines only for leasing but not for sale, the District Court properly deducts an interest component of 2.5 percent from the profits that it thought plaintiff would have earned by purchasing machines, and the court's determination is not subject to attack on the ground that it did not properly take account of the cost of capital to plaintiff, where the court found that in the years in question plaintiff was able to borrow money for between 2 percent and 2.5 percent per annum, and that had plaintiff bought machines it would have obtained the necessary capital by borrowing it at about this rate.

Syllabus

Following this Court's affirmance of a district court judgment in a civil action against United Shoe Machinery Corp. (United), a manufacturer and distributor of shoe machinery, which the Government had brought under § 4 of the Sherman Act, Hanover Shoe, Inc. (Hanover), a shoe manufacturer and customer of United's, brought this private treble-damage suit against United for its alleged monopolization of the shoe machinery industry in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act, by means of its practice of leasing and refusing to sell its shoe machinery. Hanover, relying on § 5 (a) of the Clayton Act (making a final judgment or decree in a Government antitrust suit prima facie evidence as to all matters respecting which the judgment or decree would be an estoppel between the parties thereto), submitted the court's findings, opinion, and decree in the Government's case as its evidence that United had monopolized the shoe [*2] machinery industry and that its refusal to sell the machines was an instrument of the monopolization. In 1965 the District Court rendered judgment for Hanover, holding that it was entitled to damages for the period from July 1, 1939 (the earliest date permitted by the statute of limitations), to September 21, 1955, when this suit was filed, in an amount equal to three times the difference between what Hanover had paid in rentals and what it would have paid had United been willing to sell the machines, plus interest. The Court of Appeals affirmed as to liability, but disagreed with the District Court on certain aspects of the damage award, including the relevant damage period. It fixed that period's end date somewhat earlier and ruled that its start was June 10, 1946, when this Court decided American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U.S. 781, and endorsed the views in United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 148 F.2d 416 (C. A. 2d Cir.), prior to which the Court of Appeals concluded it had been necessary in an action for violation of § 2 to prove the existence of predatory practices as well as monopoly power. Both parties were granted [*3] review of the Court of Appeals decision. United contends that the decision in the Government's suit against it did not determine that United's leasing practice was an instrument of monopolization; that Hanover sustained no injury since any excess cost of leasing over cost of ownership was not absorbed by Hanover but passed on to its customers; and that the District Court's damage calculations which the Court of Appeals upheld were erroneous because they did not properly allow for the cost of capital to Hanover as an element of the cost of acquiring the shoe machinery, the District Court having made an adjustment only to the extent of deducting a 2.5% interest component from the profits it thought Hanover would have earned by buying the machines. Hanover contends that the Court of Appeals erred in changing the start of the damage period and in ordering the District Court on remand to reduce its damage calculations by whatever tax advantages Hanover might have obtained by leasing as compared with buying the shoe machinery. Held:

1. The courts below did not err in holding that United's practice of leasing and refusing to sell its major machines was determined to be illegal monopolization [*4] in the Government's case, as reference to the court's findings and opinion, as well as decree, in that case makes clear. Pp. 483-487.

2. Hanover proved injury and the amount of its damages within the meaning of § 4 of the Clayton Act when it proved that United had overcharged it during the damage period and showed the amount of the overcharge; and the possibility that it might have recouped the overcharge by "passing it on" to its customers was not relevant in the assessment of its damages. Pp. 487-494.

3. Hanover is entitled to damages for the entire period of the applicable statute of limitations, since the Alcoa-American Tobacco decisions did not fundamentally alter the law of monopolization in a way which should be given only prospective effect. Pp. 495-502.

4. The District Court did not otherwise err in its computation of damages. Pp. 502-504.

Counsel: James V. Hayes argued the cause for petitioner in No. 335 and respondent in No. 463. With him on the briefs were Breck P. McAllister and Robert F. Morten.

Ralph M. Carson argued the cause for respondent in No. 335 and petitioner in No. 463. With him on the briefs were Robert D. Salinger, Philip C. Potter, Jr., and [*5] Roland W. Donnem.

Opinion by: WHITE

Opinion

[*483] [1235] [2226] MR. JUSTICE WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

Hanover Shoe, Inc. (hereafter Hanover) is a manufacturer of shoes and a customer of United Shoe Machinery Corporation (hereafter United), a manufacturer and distributor of shoe machinery. In 1954 this Court affirmed the judgment of the District Court for the District of Massachusetts, 110 F.Supp. 295 (1953), in favor of the United States in a civil action against United under § 4 of the Sherman Act, 26 Stat. 209, 15 U. S. C. § 4. United Shoe Machinery Corp. v. United States, 347 U.S. 521. In 1955, Hanover brought the present treble-damage action against United in the District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania. In 1965 the District Court rendered judgment for Hanover and awarded trebled damages, including interest, of $ 4,239,609, as well as $ 650,000 in counsel fees. 245 F.Supp. 258. On appeal, the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit affirmed the finding of liability but disagreed with the District Court on [1236] certain questions relating to the damage award. [*6] 377 F.2d 776 (1967). Both Hanover and United sought review of the Court of Appeals' decision, and we granted both petitions. 389 U.S. 818 (1967).

I.

Hanover's action against United alleged that United had monopolized the shoe machinery industry in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act; that United's practice of leasing and refusing to sell its more complicated and important shoe machinery had been an instrument of the unlawful monopolization; and that therefore Hanover [*484] should recover from United the difference between what it paid United in shoe machine rentals and what it would have paid had United been willing during the relevant period to sell those machines.

LEdHN[1][] [1]Section 5 (a) of the Clayton Act, 38 Stat. 731, as amended, 69 Stat. 283, 15 U. S. C. § 16 (a), HN1[] makes a final judgment or decree in any civil or criminal suit brought by the United States under the antitrust laws "prima facie evidence . . . as to all matters respecting which said judgment [*7] or decree would be an estoppel as between the parties thereto . . . ." Relying on this provision, Hanover submitted the findings, opinion, and decree rendered by Judge Wyzanski in the Government's case as evidence that United monopolized and that the practice of refusing to sell machines was an instrument of the monopolization. United does not contest that prima facie weight is to be given to the judgment in the Government's case. It does, however, contend that Judge Wyzanski's decision did not determine that the practice of leasing and refusing to sell was an instrument of monopolization. This claim, rejected by the courts below, is the threshold issue in No. 463. If the 1953 judgment is not prima facie evidence of the illegality of [2227] the practice from which Hanover's asserted injury arose, then Hanover, having offered no other convincing evidence of illegality, should not have recovered at all. [1]

[1] Following the District Court's rejection of United's construction of Judge Wyzanski's opinion and decree, United filed a motion requesting that the District Court certify the question of construction to Judge Wyzanski. United contends that the District Court erred in denying this motion, but we need not pass upon the merits of United's novel request, for the District Court clearly acted within its proper discretion in denying as untimely certification to another court of a question upon which it had already ruled.

[8] LEdHN[2][] [2]Both the District Court and the Court of Appeals concluded that the lease only policy had been held illegal in [*485] the Government's suit. We find no error in that determination. It is true that § 4 of the decree [2] on which United relies condemned only certain clauses in the standard lease and that nowhere in the decree was any other aspect of United's leasing system expressly described or characterized as illegal monopolization. It is also arguable that § 5 of the decree, which required that United thenceforward not "offer for lease any machine type, unless it also offers such type [1237] for sale," was included merely to insure an effective remedy to dissipate the accumulated consequences of United's monopolization. We are not, however, limited to the decree in determining the extent of estoppel resulting from the judgment in the Government's case. If by reference to the findings, opinion, and decree it is determined that an issue was actually adjudicated in an antitrust suit brought by the Government, the private plaintiff can treat the outcome of the Government's case as prima facie [*9] evidence on that issue. See Emich Motors Corp. v. General Motors Corp., 340 U.S. 558, 566-569 (1951).

LEdHN[3][] [3] LEdHN[4][] [4] LEdHN[5][] [5]Section 5 of the decree would have been a justifiable remedy even if the practice it banned had not been instrumental in the monopolization of the market. But in our view the trial court's findings and opinion put on firm ground the proposition [*10] that the Government's case involved condemnation of the lease only system as such. In both its opinion with respect to violation and its opinion with respect to remedy, the court not only dealt with the objectionable clauses in the standard [*486] lease but also addressed itself to the consequences of only leasing machines and to the manner in which that practice related to the maintenance of United's monopoly power. [3] [*12] These [2228] portions of the court's opinion are well supported by its findings of fact, which also estop United as against the Government and which therefore constitute prima facie evidence in this case. We have set out the relevant findings in an Appendix to this opinion. They are themselves sufficient to show that the lease only system played a significant role in United's monopolization of the shoe machinery market. Those findings were not limited to the particular provisions of United's [*487] leases. They dealt as well with United's policy of leasing but not selling its important machines, with the advantages of that practice to United, and with its impact on potential and actual competition. When the applicable standard for determining monopolization [*11] under § 2 is applied to these facts, it must be concluded that the District [1238] Court and the Court of Appeals did not err in holding that United's practice of leasing and refusing to sell its major machines was determined to be illegal monopolization in the Government's case. [4] [2] "4. All leases made by defendant which include either a ten-year term, or a full capacity clause, or deferred payment charges, and all leases under which during the life of the leases defendant has rendered repair and other service without making them subject to separate, segregated charges, are declared to have been means whereby defendant monopolized the shoe machinery market." 110 F.Supp., at 352.

---

[3] In its opinion on remedy, in answering United's objection to its conclusion that the decree should require United to offer machines for sale as well as for lease, the court plainly said that United "has used its leases to monopolize the shoe machinery market. And if leasing continues without an alternative sales system, United will still be able to monopolize that market." 110 F.Supp., at 350. Clearly, if after purging the leases of objectionable clauses United would still be monopolizing by leasing but not selling its machines, the lease only policy must also have made a substantial contribution to United's monopolization of the market during the period prior to the entry of the judgment. Moreover, in its opinion on violation, where the three principal sources of United's market power were identified, the court pointed to "the magnetic ties inherent in its system of leasing, and not selling, its more important machines" and to the "'partnership'" aspects of leasing but not selling those machines. 110 F.Supp., at 344. The leases assured "closer and more frequent contacts between United and its customers than would exist if United were a seller and its customers were buyers." Id., at 343. A shoe manufacturer by leasing was "deterred more than if he owned that same United machine, or if he held it on a short lease carrying simple rental provisions and a reasonable charge for cancelation before the end of the term." Id., at 340. The lease system had "aided United in maintaining a pricing system which discriminates between machine types," id., at 344, discrimination which the court later said had evidenced "United's monopoly power, a buttress to it, and a cause of its perpetuation . . . ." Id., at 349.

[4] In its brief on appeal from the judgment and decree rendered in the Government's case, United recognized that "the principal practices which the [District] Court stressed were that defendant offered important complicated machines only for lease and not for sale and that defendant serviced the leased machines without a separate charge." Brief for Appellant 6, United Shoe

II.

LEdHN[6][] [6] LEdHN[7][] [7]The District Court found that Hanover would have bought rather than leased from United had it been given the opportunity to do so. [5] [*14] The District Court determined that if United had sold its important machines, the cost to Hanover would have been less than the rental paid for leasing [*13] these same machines. This difference in cost, trebled, is the judgment awarded to Hanover in the District Court. United claims, however, that Hanover suffered no legally cognizable injury, contending [*488] that the illegal overcharge during the damage period was reflected in the price charged for shoes sold by Hanover to its customers and that Hanover, if it had bought machines at lower prices, would have charged less and made no more profit than it made by leasing. At the very least, United urges, the District Court should have determined on the evidence offered whether these contentions were correct. The Court of Appeals, like the District Court, rejected this assertion of the so-called "passing-on" defense, and we affirm that judgment. [6]

[15] LEdHN[8][] [8]Section [1239] 4 of the Clayton Act, 38 Stat. 731, 15 U. S. C. § 15, HN2[] provides that any person "who shall be injured [*489] in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue therefor . . . and [2229] shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained . . . ." We think it sound to hold that when a buyer shows that the price paid by him for materials purchased for use in his business is illegally high and also shows the amount of the overcharge, he has made out a prima facie case of injury and damage within the meaning of § 4.

LEdHN[9][] [9]If in the face of the overcharge the buyer does nothing and absorbs the loss, he is entitled to treble damages. This much seems conceded. The reason is that he has paid more than he should and his property has been illegally diminished, for had the price paid been lower his profits would have been higher. It is also clear that [*16] if the buyer, responding to the illegal price, maintains his own price but takes steps to increase his volume or to decrease other costs, his right to damages is not destroyed. Though he may manage to maintain his profit level, he would have made more if his purchases from the defendant had cost him less. We hold that the buyer is equally entitled to damages if he raises the price for his own product. As long as the seller continues to charge the illegal price, he takes from the buyer more than the law allows. At whatever price the buyer sells, the price he pays the seller remains illegally high, and his profits would be greater were his costs lower.

Fundamentally, this is the view stated by Mr. Justice Holmes in Chattanooga Foundry & Pipe Works v. City of Atlanta, 203 U.S. 390 (1906), where Atlanta sued the defendants for treble damages for antitrust violations in

---

Machinery Corp. v. United States, 347 U.S. 521 (1954). United also said that "evidently the Court below regarded the fact that United distributes its more important machines only by lease and not by sale as the basic objection to the system." Id., at 170.

[5] The Court of Appeals affirmed this finding and we do not disturb it. See also n. 16, infra. We also agree with the courts below that in the circumstances of this case it was unnecessary for Hanover to prove an explicit demand during the damage period. See Continental Ore Co. v. Union Carbide & Carbon Corp., 370 U.S. 690, 699 (1962).

[6] The chronology of events with respect to this issue in the lower courts was as follows: After the pretrial conference, a separate issue which was thought might determine the action was set for trial pursuant to Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 42 (b). The general question was whether, assuming that Hanover had paid illegally high prices for machinery leased from United, Hanover had passed the cost on to its customers, and if so whether it had suffered legal injury for which it could recover under the antitrust laws. After evidence had been taken on the issue, Judge Goodrich, sitting by designation, ruled that when Hanover had been forced to pay excessive prices for machinery leased from United, it had suffered a legal injury: "This excessive price is the injury." 185 F.Supp. 826, 829 (D. C. M. D. Pa. 1960). He also rejected the argument "that the defendant is relieved of liability because the plaintiff passed on its loss to its customers." Ibid. In his view it was unnecessary to determine whether Hanover had passed on the illegal burden because Hanover's injury was complete when it paid the excessive rentals and because "'the general tendency of the law, in regard to damages at least, is not to go beyond the first step'" and to exonerate a defendant by reason of remote consequences. Id., at 830 (quoting from Southern Pacific Co. v. Darnell-Taenzer Lumber Co., 245 U.S. 531, 533 (1918)). The Court of Appeals heard an interlocutory appeal pursuant to 28 U. S. C. § 1292 (b) and affirmed. 281 F.2d 481 (C. A. 3d Cir. 1960). Certiorari was denied. 364 U.S. 901 (1960). United preserved the issue and presented it again to the Court of Appeals in appealing the treble-damage judgment entered after trial of the main case. The Court of Appeals adhered to the principles of its prior decision. United brought the question here.

connection with the city's purchases of pipe for its waterworks system. The Court affirmed a judgment in favor of the city for an amount measured by the difference between the price paid and what the market or fair price would have been had the sellers not combined, [*490] the Court saying [*17] that the city "was injured in its property, at least, if not in its business of furnishing water, by being led to pay more than the worth of the pipe. HN3[] A person whose property is diminished by a payment of money wrongfully induced is injured in his property." Id., at 396. The same approach was evident in Thomsen v. Cayser, 243 U.S. 66 (1917), another treble-damage antitrust case. [7] [*18] [2230] With respect to overcharge cases arising under the transportation laws, similar views were expressed by Mr. Justice Holmes in Southern Pacific Co. v. Darnell-Taenzer Lumber Co., 245 U.S. 531, 533 (1918), [1240] and by Mr. Justice Brandeis in Adams v. Mills, 286 U.S. 397, 406-408 (1932). In those cases the possibility that plaintiffs had recouped the overcharges from their customers was held irrelevant in assessing damages. [8] [7] "It is, however, contended that even if it be assumed the facts show an illegal combination, they do not show injury to the plaintiffs by reason thereof. The contention is untenable. Section 7 of the act gives a cause of action to any person injured in his person or property by reason of anything forbidden by the act and the right to recover three-fold the damages by him sustained. The plaintiffs alleged a charge over a reasonable rate and the amount of it. If the charge be true that more than a reasonable rate was secured by the combination, the excess over what was reasonable was an element of injury. Texas & Pacific Ry. Co. v. Abilene Cotton Oil Co., 204 U.S. 426, 436. The unreasonableness of the rate and to what extent unreasonable was submitted to the jury and the verdict represented their conclusion." 243 U.S., at 88.

---

[8] Southern Pacific Co. v. Darnell-Taenzer Lumber Co., 245 U.S. 531 (1918), involved an action for reparations brought by shippers against a railroad. The shippers alleged exaction of an unreasonably high rate. To the claim that the shippers should not recover because they were able to pass on to their customers the damage they sustained by paying the charge, the Court said that the answer was not difficult:

"The general tendency of the law, in regard to damages at least, is not to go beyond the first step. As it does not attribute remote consequences to a defendant so it holds him liable if proximately the plaintiff has suffered a loss. The plaintiffs suffered losses to the amount of the verdict when they paid. Their claim accrued at once in the theory of the law and it does not inquire into later events. . . . The carrier ought not to be allowed to retain his illegal profit, and the only one who can take it from him is the one that alone was in relation with him, and from whom the carrier took the sum. . . . Probably in the end the public pays the damages in most cases of compensated torts." 245 U.S., at 533-534. Adams v. Mills, 286 U.S. 397 (1932), is to the same effect. See also I. C. C. v. United States, 289 U.S. 385 (1933).

Keogh v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 260 U.S. 156 (1922), is relied upon by United as stating a contrary rule. There the Court affirmed a judgment on the pleadings in a shipper's action under the antitrust laws charging a conspiracy among railroads to set unreasonably high rates. Because the rates had been approved as reasonable after a proceeding before the Interstate Commerce Commission, the shipper was held to have no cause of action under the antitrust laws. After giving this and other reasons for its judgment, the Court ended its opinion by saying that it would have been impossible for the shipper to have proved damages since no court could say that if the rate had been lower the shipper would have enjoyed the difference; the benefit might have gone to his customers. The Court, however, was careful to say earlier in its opinion that the result would have been different had the rate been unreasonably high, an approach confirmed by Mr. Justice Brandeis in Adams v. Mills, supra. We ascribe no general significance to the Keogh dictum for cases where the plaintiff is free to prove that he has been charged an illegally high price. It should also be noted that the Court, in speaking of the impossibility of proving damages, indicated no intention to preclude recovery in cases such as Chattanooga Foundry or Thomsen v. Cayser, supra.

That is where the matter stood in this Court when the issue came to be pressed with some regularity in the lower federal courts in treble-damage suits brought by customers of vendors who were charged with violating the Sherman Act by price fixing or monopolization. Some courts sustained the defense, both where the plaintiff complained of overcharging for materials or services used by him to produce his own product, e. g., Wolfe v. National Lead Co., 225 F.2d 427 (C. A. 9th Cir.), cert. denied, 350 U.S. 915 (1955), and where the price fixing concerned articles purchased for resale, e. g., Miller Motors, Inc. v. Ford Motor Co., 252 F.2d 441 (C. A. 4th Cir. 1958); Twin Ports Oil Co. v. Pure Oil Co., 119 F.2d 747 (C. A. 8th Cir.), cert. denied, 314 U.S. 644 (1941). Others, beginning with Judge Goodrich's 1960 decision in the case before us, deemed it irrelevant that the plaintiff may have passed on the burden of the overcharge. Recently, for example, the defense was rejected in the cases brought against manufacturers of electrical equipment by local utilities who purchased equipment at unlawfully inflated prices and used it [19] [*491] United [1241] seeks to limit the general principle that the victim of an overcharge is damaged within the meaning of § 4 [2231] to the extent of that overcharge. The rule, United argues, should be subject to the defense that economic [*492] circumstances were such that the overcharged buyer could only charge his customers a higher price because the price to him was higher. It is argued that in such circumstances the buyer suffers no loss from the overcharge. This situation might be present, it is said, where the overcharge is imposed equally on all of a buyer's competitors and where the demand for the buyer's product is so inelastic that the buyer and his competitors could all increase their prices by the amount of the cost increase without suffering a consequent decline in sales.

LEdHN[10][] [10] LEdHN[11][] [11] LEdHN[12][] [12]We are not impressed with the argument that sound laws of economics require recognizing this defense. A wide range of factors influence [*20] a company's pricing policies. Normally the impact of a single change in the relevant conditions cannot be measured after the fact; indeed a businessman may be unable to state whether, [*493] had one fact been different (a single supply less expensive, general economic conditions more buoyant, or the labor market tighter, for example), he would have chosen a different price. Equally difficult to determine, in the real economic world rather than an economist's hypothetical model, is what effect a change in a company's price will have on its total sales. Finally, costs per unit for a different volume of total sales are hard to estimate. Even if it could be shown that the buyer raised his price in response to, and in the amount of, the overcharge and that his margin of profit and total sales had not thereafter declined, there would remain the nearly insuperable difficulty of demonstrating that the particular plaintiff could not or would not have raised his prices absent the overcharge or maintained the higher price had the overcharge been discontinued. Since establishing the applicability of the passing-on defense would require a convincing showing of each of these virtually [*21] unascertainable figures, the task would normally prove insurmountable. [9] On the other hand, it is not unlikely that if the existence of the defense is generally confirmed, antitrust defendants will frequently seek to establish its applicability. Treble-damage actions would often require additional long and complicated proceedings involving massive evidence and complicated theories.

[22] [*494] In [2232] addition, if buyers are subjected to the passing-on defense, those who buy from them would also have to meet the challenge that they passed on the higher price to their customers. These ultimate consumers, [1242] in today's case the buyers of single pairs of shoes, would have only a tiny stake in a lawsuit and little interest in attempting a class action. In consequence, those who violate the antitrust laws by price fixing or monopolizing would retain the fruits of their illegality because no one was available who would bring suit against them. Treble-damage actions, the importance of which the Court has many times emphasized, would be substantially reduced in effectiveness.

LEdHN[13][] [13]Our conclusion is that Hanover proved injury and the amount of its damages for the purposes of its treble-damage suit when it proved that United had overcharged it during the damage period and showed the amount of the overcharge; United was not entitled to assert a passing-on defense. We recognize that there might be situations -- for instance, when an overcharged buyer has a pre-existing [*23] "cost-plus" contract, thus making it easy to prove that he has not been damaged -- where the considerations requiring that the passing-on to produce electricity sold to the ultimate consumer. E. g., Atlantic City Electric Co. v. General Electric Co., 226 F.Supp. 59 (D. C. S. D. N. Y.), interlocutory appeal refused, 337 F.2d 844 (C. A. 2d Cir. 1964).

---

Concerning the passing-on defense generally, see Clark, The Treble Damage Bonanza: New Doctrines of Damages in Private Antitrust Suits, 52 Mich. L. Rev. 363 (1954); Pollock, Standing to Sue, Remoteness of Injury, and the Passing-On Doctrine, 32 A. B. A. Antitrust L. J. 5 (1966); Note, Private Treble Damage Antitrust Suits: Measure of Damages for Destruction of All or Part of a Business, 80 Harv. L. Rev. 1566, 1584-1586 (1967).

[9] The mere fact that a price rise followed an unlawful cost increase does not show that the sufferer of the cost increase was undamaged. His customers may have been ripe for his price rise earlier; if a cost rise is merely the occasion for a price increase a businessman could have imposed absent the rise in his costs, the fact that he was earlier not enjoying the benefits of the higher price should not permit the supplier who charges an unlawful price to take those benefits from him without being liable for damages. This statement merely recognizes the usual principle that the possessor of a right can recover for its unlawful deprivation whether or not he was previously exercising it.

defense not be permitted in this case would not be present. We also recognize that where no differential can be proved between the price unlawfully charged and some price that the seller was required by law to charge, establishing damages might require a showing of loss of profits to the buyer. [10]

[*495] III.

The District Court held that Hanover was entitled to damages for the period commencing July 1, 1939, and terminating September 21, 1955. [*24] The former date represented the greatest retrospective reach permitted under the applicable statute of limitations, and the latter date was that upon which Hanover filed its suit. In addition to somewhat shortening the forward reach of the damage period, [11] the Court of Appeals ruled that June 10, 1946, rather than July 1, 1939, marked the commencement of the damages period. June 10, 1946, was the date this Court decided American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U.S. 781, which endorsed the views of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 148 F.2d 416 (1945). In the case before us the Court of Appeals concluded that the decisions in Alcoa-American Tobacco fundamentally altered the law of monopolization -- that prior to them it was necessary to prove the existence of predatory practices as well as monopoly power, whereas afterwards proof of predatory practices was not essential. The Court of Appeals was also of the view that because in prior litigation United's leases had escaped condemnation as predatory practices illegal under § 1, United's conduct should not be held to have violated [*25] [1243] § 2 at any time prior to June 10, 1946. 377 F.2d, at 790. This holding has been challenged, and we reverse it.

[*496] The [2233] theory of the Court of Appeals seems to have been that when a party has significantly relied upon a clear and established doctrine, and the retrospective application of a newly declared doctrine would upset that justifiable reliance to his substantial injury, considerations of justice and fairness require that the new rule apply [*26] prospectively only. Pointing to recent decisions of this Court in the area of the criminal law, the Court of Appeals could see no reason why the considerations which had favored only prospective application in those cases should not be applied as well as in the civil area, especially in a treble-damage action. There is, of course, no reason to confront this theory unless we have before us a situation in which there was a clearly declared judicial doctrine upon which United relied and under which its conduct was lawful, a doctrine which was overruled in favor of a new rule according to which conduct performed in reliance upon the old rule would have been unlawful. Because we do not believe that this case presents such a situation, we have no occasion to pass upon the theory of the Court of Appeals.

LEdHN[14][] [14]Neither the opinion in Alcoa nor the opinion in American Tobacco indicated that the issue involved was novel, that innovative principles were necessary to resolve it, or that the issue had been settled in prior cases in a manner contrary to the view held by those courts. In ruling that it was [*27] not necessary to exclude competitors to be guilty of monopolization, the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit relied upon a long line of cases in this Court stretching back to 1912. 148 F.2d, at 429. The conclusion that actions which will show monopolization are not "limited to manoeuvres not honestly industrial" was also premised on earlier opinions of this Court, particularly United States v. Swift & Co., 286 U.S. 106, 116 (1932). In the American Tobacco case, this Court noted [*497] that the precise question before it had not been previously decided, 328 U.S., at 811, and gave no indication that it thought it was adopting a radically new interpretation of the Sherman Act. Like the Court of Appeals, this Court relied for its conclusion upon existing authorities. [12] [*29] These cases make it clear that [10] Some courts appear to have treated price discrimination cases under the Robinson-Patman Act as in this category. See, e. g., American Can Co. v. Russellville Canning Co., 191 F.2d 38 (C. A. 8th Cir. 1951); American Can Co. v. Bruce's Juices, 187 F.2d 919, opinion modified, 190 F.2d 73 (C. A. 5th Cir.), petition for cert. dismissed, 342 U.S. 875 (1951).

---

[11] The Court of Appeals held that Hanover was entitled to damages only up to June 1, 1955, the date upon which Judge Wyzanski approved United's plan for terminating all outstanding leases and converting the lessee's rights to ownership. Because Hanover could have legally required United to convert from leasing to selling as of June 1, 1955, the Court of Appeals held it was not entitled to damages for United's failure to offer machines for sale after that date. This determination has not been challenged in this Court.

[2234] there was no accepted [*498] interpretation [1244] of the Sherman Act which conditioned a finding of monopolization under § 2 upon a showing of predatory practices by the monopolist. [13] In neither case was there such an abrupt and fundamental shift in doctrine as to constitute an entirely new rule which [*28] in effect replaced an older one. Whatever [*499] development in antitrust law was brought about was based to a great extent on existing authorities and was an extension of doctrines which had been growing and developing over the years. These cases did not constitute a sharp break in the line of earlier authority or an avulsive change which caused the current of the law thereafter to flow between new banks. We cannot say that prior to those cases potential antitrust defendants would have been justified in thinking that then current antitrust doctrines permitted

---

[12] Although the defendants in American Tobacco had been found guilty of conspiracy to restrain trade and of attempt and conspiracy to monopolize as well as of monopolization itself, the grant of certiorari was "limited to the question whether actual exclusion of competitors is necessary to the crime of monopolization under § 2 of the Sherman Act." 324 U.S. 836 (1945). After noting that "§§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act require proof of conspiracies which are reciprocally distinguishable from and independent of each other . . . ," 328 U.S., at 788, the Court determined that the jury could have found that the defendants had combined and conspired to monopolize, id., at 797, and that it would be "only in conjunction with such a combination or conspiracy that these cases will constitute a precedent," id., at 798. The Court stated that "the authorities support the view that the material consideration in determining whether a monopoly exists is not that prices are raised and that competition actually is excluded but that power exists to raise prices or to exclude competition when it is desired to do so," 328 U.S., at 811 (emphasis added), and quoted with approval from United States v. Patten, 187 F. 664, 672 (C. C. S. D. N. Y. (1911)), reversed on other grounds, 226 U.S. 525 (1913), that for there to be monopolization "it is not necessary that the power thus obtained should be exercised. Its existence is sufficient." The Court also said:

"A correct interpretation of the statute and of the authorities makes it the crime of monopolizing, under § 2 of the Sherman Act, for parties, as in these cases, to combine or conspire to acquire or maintain the power to exclude competitors from any part of the trade or commerce among the several states or with foreign nations, provided they also have such a power that they are able, as a group, to exclude actual or potential competition from the field and provided that they have the intent and purpose to exercise that power. See United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U.S. 150, 226, n. 59 and authorities cited.

"It is not the form of the combination or the particular means used but the result to be achieved that the statute condemns. It is not of importance whether the means used to accomplish the unlawful objective are in themselves lawful or unlawful." 328 U.S., at 809. (Emphasis added.)

The Court also welcomed the opportunity to endorse, 328 U.S., at 813-814, the following views of Chief Judge Hand in Alcoa, 148 F.2d., at 431-432:

"[Alcoa] insists that it never excluded competitors; but we can think of no more effective exclusion than progressively to embrace each new opportunity as it opened, and to face every newcomer with new capacity already geared into a great organization, having the advantage of experience, trade connections and the elite of personnel. Only in case we interpret 'exclusion' as limited to manoeuvres not honestly industrial, but actuated solely by a desire to prevent competition, can such a course, indefatigably pursued, be deemed not 'exclusionary.' So to limit it would in our judgment emasculate the Act; would permit just such consolidations as it was designed to prevent.

. . . .

"In order to fall within § 2, the monopolist must have both the power to monopolize, and the intent to monopolize. To read the passage as demanding any 'specific,' intent, makes nonsense of it, for no monopolist monopolizes unconscious of what he is doing."

[13] Any view of the earlier law of monopolization which would attempt, erroneously in our opinion, to find a requirement of predatory practices must rely heavily on certain dicta in United States v. United States Steel Corp., 251 U.S. 417, 451 (1920) (Mr. Justice McKenna for a four-to-three Court), and United States v. International Harvester Co., 274 U.S. 693, 708 (1927) (Mr. Justice Sanford reiterating the dicta in U.S. Steel). The commentators cited by United for the proposition that predatory practices were required prior to Alcoa-American Tobacco place major reliance on these dicta. In any event, the cursory and conclusory nature of these writings clearly does not provide sufficiently strong proof of a prevailing opinion as to the law to have permitted the sort of justifiable reliance which alone could generate a prospectivity argument.

them to do all acts conducive to the creation or maintenance of a monopoly, so long as they avoided direct exclusion of competitors or other predatory acts. [14]

[30] United [1245] relies heavily on three Sherman Act cases brought against it or its predecessors by the United States and decided by this Court. United argues that these cases demonstrate both that before Alcoa-American Tobacco the law was substantially different and that its leasing practices had been deemed by this Court not to be instruments of monopolization. United States v. Winslow, 227 U.S. 202 (1913); United States v. United Shoe [2235] Machinery Co. of New Jersey, 247 U.S. 32 (1918); United Shoe Machinery Corp. v. United States, 258 U.S. 451 (1922). In our opinion, however, United overreads and exaggerates the significance of these three cases. In Winslow, the Government charged the three groups of companies which had merged to form United with a violation of § 1. The trial court construed the indictment to pertain only to the merger of the companies and not to business practices which resulted from the merger; most significantly, it excluded United's leasing policies [*500] from consideration. The Court specifically stated that "the validity of the leases or of a combination [*31] contemplating them cannot be passed upon in this case." 227 U.S., at 217.

The third case, decided in 1922, was brought under § 3 of the Clayton Act rather than § 2 of the Sherman Act. This Court affirmed a decree enjoining United from making leases containing certain clauses, terms, and conditions. Nothing in that case indicates that predatory practices had to be shown to prove a § 2 monopoly charge or that the leases, or the clauses in them which were left undisturbed, would not adequately demonstrate monopolization by an enterprise with monopoly power.

Of the three cases, the 1918 case most strongly supports United. It involved a civil action by the United States charging violations of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. The Government contended that United's machinery leases and license agreements had been used to consummate both violations. A three-judge court dismissed the bill and this Court affirmed by a vote of 4 to 3. There is no question but that the leases as they were then constituted were held unassailable under § 1; the reasons for this ruling are not clear. As for the § 2 charge, we cannot read the opinion as specifying what course of conduct would [*32] amount to monopolization under § 2 if engaged in by a concern with monopoly power. At most the holding was that the leases themselves did not prove a § 2 charge -- did not themselves prove monopoly power as well as monopolization. But the issue in the case before us now is not whether United's leasing system proves monopoly power but whether, once monopoly power is shown, leasing the way United leased sufficiently shows an intent to exercise that power. There is little, if anything, in the 1918 opinion which is illuminating on this issue. Indeed, it may fairly be read as holding that United did not have monopoly power over the market at all, for in rejecting the claim that United's practice of [*501] leasing was illegal when used by a corporation [1246] dominant in the market, the Court said:

"This, however, is assertion and relies for its foundation upon the assumption of an illegal dominance by the United Company that has been found not to exist. This element, therefore, must be put to one side and the leases regarded in and of themselves and by the incentives that induced their execution . . . ." 247 U.S., at 60.

Any comfort United might have [*33] received from the 1918 case with respect to the legality of its leasing system when employed by one with monopoly power should have been short-lived. In the third case, which was brought under § 3 of the Clayton Act, and in which all the remaining Justices making up the majority in the 1918 case except Mr. Justice McKenna voted with the Court, the opinion for the Court described the 1918 decision as follows:

---

[14] United makes the independent argument that Judge Wyzanski's decision in the Government's case so fundamentally altered the law of monopolization that it should not be held liable for damages prior to the date the decision was handed down, February 18, 1953. We reject this contention for the reasons set forth in the textual discussion of Alcoa-American Tobacco and the previous United cases.

"That the leases were attacked under the former bill as violative of the Sherman Act is true, but they were sustained as valid and binding agreements within the rights of holders of patents." 258 U.S., at 460.

[2236] This view was supported by other references to the 1918 opinion which described the question at issue there as being whether United's leases went beyond the exercise of a lawful monopoly.

One might possibly disagree with this reading of the 1918 opinion, but it was an authoritative gloss. After 1922 and after the expiration of the patents on its major machines, there was no sound basis to justify reliance by United on the 1918 case as a definitive pronouncement that its leasing system provided legally insufficient evidence of monopolization, [*34] once United's power over the market was satisfactorily shown. The prior cases immunized United's monopoly insofar as it originated [*502] in a merger of allegedly competing companies and perhaps are of some help to United in other respects. But they do not establish either that prior to 1946 there was a well-defined interpretation of the Sherman Act which was abruptly overruled in Alcoa-American Tobacco or that United's leasing system could not be considered an instrument for the exercise and maintenance of monopoly power.

LEdHN[15][] [15] LEdHN[16][] [16] LEdHN[17][] [17]In these circumstances, there is no room for argument that Hanover's damages should reach back only to the date of the American Tobacco decision. Having rejected the contention that Alcoa-American Tobacco changed the law of monopolization in a way which should be given only prospective effect, it follows that Hanover is entitled to damages for the entire period permitted by the applicable statute of limitations. [*35] [15]

IV.

[*1247] LEdHN[18][] [18]Two questions are raised here about the [*36] manner in which damages were computed by the courts below. Hanover argues that the Court of Appeals erred in requiring the District Court, on remand, to take account of the additional taxes Hanover would have paid, had it purchased machines instead of renting them during the years in question. The Court of Appeals evidently [*503] felt that since only after-tax profits can be reinvested or distributed to shareholders, Hanover was damaged only to the extent of the after-tax profits that it failed to receive. The view of the Court of Appeals is sound in theory, but it overlooks the fact that in practice the Internal Revenue Service has taxed recoveries for tortious deprivation of profits at the time the recoveries are made, not by reopening the earlier years. See Commissioner v. Glenshaw Glass Co., 348 U.S. 426 (1955). As Hanover points out, since it will be taxed when it recovers damages from United for both the actual and the trebled damages, to diminish the actual damages by the amount of the taxes that it would have paid had it received greater profits in the years it was damaged would be to apply a double deduction for taxation, leaving Hanover with [*37] less income than it would have had if United had not injured it. It is true that accounting for taxes in the year when damages are received rather than the year when profits were lost can change the amount of taxes the Revenue Service collects; as United [2237] shows, actual rates of taxation were much higher in some of the years when Hanover was injured than they are today. But because the statute of limitations frequently will bar the Commissioner from recomputing for earlier years, and because of the policy underlying the statute of limitations -- the fact that such recomputations are immensely difficult or impossible when a long period has

---

[15] United has also advanced the argument that because the earliest impact on Hanover of United's lease only policy occurred in 1912, Hanover's cause of action arose during that year and is now barred by the applicable Pennsylvania statute of limitations. The Court of Appeals correctly rejected United's argument in its supplemental opinion. We are not dealing with a violation which, if it occurs at all, must occur within some specific and limited time span. Cf. Emich Motors Corp. v. General Motors Corp., 229 F.2d 714 (C. A. 7th Cir. 1956), upon which United relies. Rather, we are dealing with conduct which constituted a continuing violation of the Sherman Act and which inflicted continuing and accumulating harm on Hanover. Although Hanover could have sued in 1912 for the injury then being inflicted, it was equally entitled to sue in 1955.

intervened -- the rough result of not taking account of taxes for the year of injury but then taxing recovery when received seems the most satisfactory outcome. The District Court therefore did not err on this question, and the Court of Appeals should not have required a recomputation.

LEdHN[19][] [19]United contends that if Hanover had bought machines instead of leasing them, it would have had to invest its own capital in the machines. United argues that the District [*38] Court erred in computing damages because it did not properly take account of the cost of capital to [*504] Hanover. The District Court found that in the years in question Hanover was able to borrow money for between 2% and 2.5% per annum, and that had Hanover bought machines it would have obtained the necessary capital by borrowing at about this rate. It therefore deducted an interest component of 2.5% from the profits it thought Hanover would have earned by purchasing machines. Our review of the record convinces us that the courts below did not err in these determinations; on the basis of the determinations of fact, Hanover's damages were properly computed. [16]

[39] The [1248] judgment of the Court of Appeals is affirmed in part and reversed in part, and the cases are remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

MR. JUSTICE MARSHALL took no part in the consideration or decision of these cases.

APPENDIX TO OPINION OF THE COURT.

Excerpts From Judge Wyzanski's Opinion in United States v. United Shoe Machinery Corp., 110 F.Supp. 295, 323-325 (D. Mass. 1953).

Effects of the Leasing System.

The effect of United's leasing system as it works in practice may be examined from the viewpoints of United, of the shoe manufacturers, and of competitors potential or actual.

[*505] For United these are the advantages. (a) United has enjoyed a greater stability of annual revenues than is customary among manufacturers of other capital goods. But this is not due exclusively to the practice of leasing as distinguished from selling. It is attributable to the effects of leasing when, as is the case with United, the lessor already has a predominant share of the market. (b) United has been able to conduct research activities more favorably than if it sold its machines outright. [*40] The leasing system, especially the service aspect of that system, has given United constant access to shoe manufacturers and their problems. This has promoted United's knowledge of their problems and has stimulated United's shoe machinery development. This research knowledge would not be diminished substantially if United's service activities covered fewer factories. But if all access to shoe factories were denied the diminution would [2238] be of great consequence to research. (c) The steadiness of revenues, attributable, as stated above, not to the leases alone, but to leases in a market dominated by the lessor, has tended to promote fairly steady appropriations to research. But these appropriations declined in the 1929 depression. Research expenditures might or might not be increased if competition were increased. The experience of United when faced with Compo's cement process suggests that declining revenues, no less than steady revenues, may promote research expenditures. (d) United has kept its leased machines in the best possible condition. (e) Under the leasing system United has enjoyed a wide distribution of machinery in a relatively narrow market. But this [*41] is merely another way of saying that United's market position, market power, lease provisions, and lease practices give it an advantage over competitors.

---

[16] United also says that because Hanover's managers would have computed their capital costs differently, they would not in fact have decided to stop leasing machines and to begin purchasing them. The District Court found, however, that Hanover, had it been given the opportunity, would have bought rather than leased the machines offered by United. This finding, affirmed by the Court of Appeals, is supported by the evidence, and we do not disturb it.

Upon shoe manufacturers, United's leasing system has had these effects. It has been easy for a person with modest capital and of something less than superior efficiency [*506] to become a shoe manufacturer. He can get machines without buying them; his machines are serviced without separate charges; he can conveniently exchange an older United model for a new United model; he can change from one process to another; and his costs of machinery per pair of shoes produced closely approximate the machinery costs of every other manufacturer using the same machinery to produce shoes by the same process. [1249] Largely as a consequence of these factors, there were in 1950, 1,300 factories each having a daily production capacity of 3,000 pairs a day or less; 100 factories each having a capacity of 3,000 to 8,000 pairs; and 40 larger manufacturers. Many of these larger manufacturers, who collectively account for 40% of the shoe production of the United States, started in a small way and flourished under United's leasing system. [*42] Moreover the testimony in this case indicates virtually no shoe manufacturers who are dissatisfied with the present system. It cannot be said whether this absence of expressed dissatisfaction is due to lack of actual dissatisfaction, to practical men's preference for what they regard as a fair system, even if it should be monopolistic, or to fear, inertia, or reluctance to testify.

However, while United's system has made it easier to enter the shoe manufacturing industry than to enter many, perhaps most, other manufacturing industries, it has not necessarily promoted in the shoe manufacturing field the goals of a competitive economy and an open society. Without attempting to make findings that are more precise than the evidence warrants, this much can be definitely stated. If United shoe machinery were available upon a sale basis, then --

(a) Some shoe manufacturers would be able to secure credit whether by conditional sales, chattel mortgages, or other devices.

[*507] (b) Under such a system, there is no reason to suppose that a purchaser's first installment on a machine would significantly exceed the deposit now often required of a new shoe manufacturer by United.

[43] (c) A few shoe manufacturers would be able to borrow at rates of interest comparable to the interest rates at which United borrows, or raises capital.

(d) Some shoe manufacturers would be able to provide for themselves service at a cost less than the average cost to United of supplying service to all lessees of its machines.

(e) Those manufacturers who bought United machines would not be subject, as are those manufacturers who lease United machines, to the unilateral decision of United whether or not to continue or modify those informal policies which are not written in the leases and to which United is not expressly committed [2239] for any specific future period. While there is no evidence that United plans any change in its informal policies, and while United has not heretofore proceeded to alter its informal policies on the basis of its approval or disapproval of individual manufacturers, United has not expressly committed itself to continue, for example, its 1935 plan for return of machines, its right of deduction fund, its waiver for 4 months of unit charges, or its present high standard of service. United's reserved power with respect to these matters gives it some [*44] greater degree of psychological, and some greater degree of economic control, than a seller of machinery would have.

(f) Some manufacturers who had bought machinery would find that financial and psychological considerations made them more willing than lessees would be, to dispose of already acquired United machines and to take on competitors' machines in their place.

In looking at United's leasing system from the viewpoint of potential and actual competition, it must be [*508] confessed at the outset, that any [1250] system of selling or leasing one company's machines will, of course, impede to some extent the distribution of another company's machines. If a shoe manufacturer has already acquired one company's machinery either by outright purchase, by conditional purchase, or on lease on any terms whatsoever, the existence of that machine in the factory is a possible impediment to the marketing of a competitive machine.

Yet as already noted, a shoe manufacturer may psychologically or economically be more impeded by a leasing than by a selling system. And this general observation is buttressed by a study of features in the United leasing system which have a special deterrent [*45] effect. Though these features are stated separately, and some of them alone are important impediments, they must be appraised collectively to appreciate the full deterrent effect.

(a) The 10 year term is a long commitment.

(b) A shoe manufacturer who already has a United leased machine which can perform all the available work of a particular type may be reluctant to experiment with a competitive machine to the extent he would wish. He may hesitate to ask for permission to avoid the full capacity clause. If permission is given for an experimental period he may find the experimental period too short. Thus a competitor may not get a chance to have his machine adequately tried out by a shoe manufacturer. If a shoe manufacturer prefers a competitive machine to a United machine on hand, he may not know the exact rate at which future payments may be commuted. If he knows, he may find that a fresh outlay to make those commuted payments (which admittedly are not solely for revenue but also are for protection against competition, and which admittedly discriminate in favor of a lessee who takes a new United machine and not a competitor's machine) plus the rentals he has already [*509] [*46] paid cost him more than if he had bought a similar machine in the first place and were now to dispose of it in trade or in a second-hand market. Thus for a maker of competitive machines he may be a less likely customer than if United had initially allowed him to buy the machine.

(c) United's lease system makes impossible a second-hand market in its own machines. This has two effects. It prevents United from suffering that kind of competition which a second-hand market offers. Also it prevents competitors from acquiring United machines with a view to copying such parts of the machines as are not patented, and with a view to experimenting with improvements without disclosing them to United.

(d) United's practice of rendering repair service only on its own machines and without separate charge has brought about a situation in which there are almost no large scale independent repair [2240] companies. Hence when a typical small shoe manufacturer is considering whether to acquire a complicated shoe machine, he must look to the manufacturer of that machine for repair service. And a competitor of United could not readily market such a complicated machine unless in addition to offering [*47] the machine he was prepared to supply service. As the experience of foreign manufacturers indicates, this has proved to be a serious stumbling block to those who have sought to compete with United.

(e) If a shoe manufacturer is deciding [1251] whether to introduce competitive machines, (either for new operations or as replacements for United machines on which the lease has not expired), he faces the effect of those decisions upon his credit under the Right of Deduction Fund. If he already has virtually all United machines, and if he replaces few of them by competitive machines, the Fund will take care of substantially all his so-called deferred charges, and may cover some of his minimum payments. This is because credit to the Fund earned [*510] by a particular machine enures to the benefit of all leased machines in the factory, and the maximum advantage to the shoe manufacturer is to have a large number of United machines to which the credit can be applied. This advantage to the shoe manufacturer of acquiring and keeping a full line of United machines deters, though probably only mildly, the opportunities of a competing shoe manufacturer.

Dissent by: STEWART

Dissent

MR. JUSTICE [*48] STEWART, dissenting.

Hanover sued United under the Clayton Act for damages allegedly flowing from United's practice of offering its machines for lease but not for sale. Hanover did not attempt to prove as an original matter that this practice violated the antitrust laws. Instead, it relied exclusively upon § 5 (a) of the Clayton Act, 38 Stat. 731, as amended, which provides:

"A final judgment or decree heretofore or hereafter rendered in any civil or criminal proceeding brought by or on behalf of the United States under the antitrust laws to the effect that a defendant has violated said laws shall be prima facie evidence against such defendant in any action or proceeding brought by any other party against such defendant under said laws . . . as to all matters respecting which said judgment or decree would be an estoppel as between the parties thereto . . . ." 15 U. S. C. § 16 (a).

Hanover recovered an award of treble damages solely upon the theory that the 1953 judgment and decree in United States v. United Shoe Machinery Corp., 110 F.Supp. 295, aff'd per curiam, 347 U.S. 521, had established the unlawfulness [*49] of United's practice of making its machines available by lease only. So it follows, as the Court says, "if the 1953 judgment is not prima facie evidence of the illegality of the practice from which [*511] Hanover's asserted injury arose, then Hanover, having offered no other convincing evidence of illegality, should not have recovered at all." Ante, at 484.

I think that the 1953 judgment did not have the broad effect the Court attributes to it today. On the contrary, that judgment, it seems evident to me, held unlawful only particular kinds of leases with particular provisions, not United's general practice of leasing only. [1]

The only precedent cited by the Court for its expansive application of § 5 (a) is Emich Motors Corp. v. General Motors Corp., 340 U.S. 558. That case [*50] dealt with the estoppel effect of a general jury verdict in a criminal case. [2241] We deal here with a civil case which was [1252] tried to a federal judge, who rendered a thoroughly considered opinion and carefully precise decree.

One section of the decree, § 2, broadly set out what the court found United's antitrust violations to be:

"Defendant violated § 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U. S. C. A. § 2, by monopolizing the shoe machinery trade and commerce among the several States. Defendant violated the same section of the law by monopolizing that part of the interstate trade and commerce in tacks, nails, eyelets, grommets, and hooks, which is concerned with supplying the demand for those products by shoe factories within the United States. . . ." 110 F.Supp., at 352.

Another section of the decree, § 4, clearly specified the unlawful means by which these antitrust violations had been accomplished, and United's general leasing practice was not one of those means:

"All leases made by defendant which include either a ten-year term, or a full capacity clause, or deferred [*512] payment charges, and all leases under [*51] which during the life of the leases defendant has rendered repair and other service without making them subject to separate, segregated charges, are declared to have been means whereby defendant monopolized the shoe machinery market." Ibid.

In addition to these two sections setting forth the violations found, the decree contained some 20 remedial sections. Section 3 enjoined the violations found in § 2. Section 6 prohibited the particular types of leases found to be unlawful in § 4. Another section of the decree, § 5, went further and provided that in the future United's machines must be offered for sale as well as for lease. But it is a commonplace that "relief, to be effective, must go beyond the narrow limits of the proven violation," United States v. Gypsum Co., 340 U.S. 76, 90. United States v. Loew's Inc., 371 U.S. 38, 53; United States v. Bausch & Lomb Co., 321 U.S. 707, 724.

[1] I am not alone in this view. See Cole v. Hughes Tool Co., 215 F.2d 924, 932-933; Laitram Corp. v. King Crab, Inc., 244 F.Supp. 9, 18. See also n. 2, infra.

I can find nothing in Judge Wyzanski's written opinion in the 1953 case to suggest that he found United's lease-only practice, as such, to be a violation of the antitrust laws or illegal in any way. [2] [*53] To the contrary, that opinion [*52] repeatedly emphasized the anticompetitive effects of the particular types of leases held illegal, and carefully explained that the purpose of requiring that customers [*513] in the future be given an option to purchase was to create an eventual second-hand market in United's machines and to make the machines available to United's competitors, so that they might study and copy them. 110 F.Supp., at 349-350. The opinion specifically stated that the reason for ordering United to offer its machines for sale was not to [1253] widen the choices available to customers. [3]

The Court today adds as an Appendix to its opinion -- like a deus ex machina -- [2242] Judge Wyzanski's findings of fact. But it is irrelevant with respect to § 5 (a) that the 1953 findings describe United's lease-only practice, when neither the decree nor the opinion held that practice to be unlawful.

The real key to why the Court has gone astray in this case is to be found, I think, in the concluding sentence of Part I of the Court's opinion. For there the Court reveals that it is really not trying to determine what Judge Wyzanski decided in 1953, but is determining instead how this Court would decide the issues if the 1953 case were before it as an original matter today. [4] [54] In my view the 1953 United Shoe decision does not establish United's liability to Hanover. I do not reach, therefore, the other questions dealt with in the Court's opinion.

I would reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeals.

References

Am Jur, Judgments (Rev ed 69, 70); Monopolies, Combinations, and Restraints of Trade (1st ed 156, 181-183, 185, 188)

14 Am Jur Pl & Pr Forms, Monopolies, Combinations, and Restraints of Trade, Forms 14:311-14:314, 14:327, 14:328

US L Ed Digest, Damages 7, 159, 170; Evidence 343.5, 486; Judgment 65, 141; Limitation of Actions 201.5; Restraints of Trade and Monopolies 67

ALR Digests, Damages 14, 252, 365; Evidence 631; Judgment 68, 69, 102.5; Limitation of Actions 213; Restraints of Trade and Monopolies 13, 15

L Ed Index to Anno, Damages; Restraints of Trade and Monopolies

ALR Quick Index, Damages; Punitive Damages; Restraints of Trade and Monopolies

---

[2] Neither, apparently, could Judge Wyzanski. After the trial court in this action filed its opinion holding that the 1953 decree had condemned United's lease-only practice, United applied to Judge Wyzanski for a construction of his decree. While denying the application upon grounds of comity, Judge Wyzanski indicated a willingness to construe his decree if officially requested by the trial judge in the present case, Judge Sheridan. During the course of the hearing before Judge Wyzanski, he made his own views clear to government counsel:

"Now that you are here, are you not aware from being here on previous occasions that the government never contended, and I never ruled, as Judge Sheridan supposes the matter was decided?"

[3] 110 F.Supp., at 349-350. The language quoted by the Court, ante, at 486, n. 3, is not a statement of why the District Court in 1953 ordered United to offer its machines for sale, but rather part of the court's answer to United's argument that it would be unfair to make United sell while its competitors continued only to lease. 110 F.Supp., at 350.

[4] "When the applicable standard for determining monopolization under § 2 is applied to these facts, it must be concluded that the District Court and the Court of Appeals did not err in holding that United's practice of leasing and refusing to sell its major machines was determined to be illegal monopolization in the Government's case." (Emphasis added.)

Annotation References:

Punitive damages for business tort as subject to federal income tax. 99 L Ed 491 at page 495.

Actions for threefold damages under Anti-trust Act. 53 L Ed 826. [*55]

Northern Natural Gas Co. v. Federal Power Com.

United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit

June 21, 1968, Decided

No. 21,333

Reporter

399 F.2d 953 *; 1968 U.S. App. LEXIS 6434 ; 130 U.S. App. D.C. 220; 1968 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72,498

Northern Natural Gas Co. and Northern Natural Gas Transportation Co., Petitioners, v. Federal Power Commission, Respondent; Union Gas Co. of Canada, Ltd., Michigan Consolidated Gas Co., Michigan Wisconsin Pipe Line Co., Great Lakes Gas Transmission Co., TransCanada Pipe Lines Ltd. The Consumers' Gas Co., Midwestern Gas Transmission Co., Northern and Central Gas Co., Ltd., Michigan Public Service Commission, Wisconsin Gas Co., Wisconsin Public Service Corp., Wisconsin Michigan Power Co., Wisconsin Fuel & Light Co., Wisconsin Natural Gas Co., Panhandle Eastern Pipe Line Co., County of Wayne, Michigan, Public Service Commission of Wisconsin, Madison Gas and Electric Co., and State of Minnesota, Intervenors Disposition: [1] Remanded.

Core Terms

joint venture, Northern, natural gas, Transportation, pipeline, markets, suppliers, costs, subsidiary, consumers, regulation, proposals, anti trust law, monopoly, antitrust, public interest, benefits, estimate, certificated, lessen, competitor, customer, saving, weigh, utilized, appears, region, rates, pipe, per day

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Energy & Utilities Law > Antitrust Issues > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Regulators > Public Utility Commissions > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Regulators > US Federal Energy Regulatory Commission > General Overview

HN1[] Energy & Utilities Law, Antitrust Issues

Although the Federal Power Commission is not bound by the dictates of the antitrust laws, it is clear that antitrust concepts are intimately involved in a determination of what action is in the public interest, and therefore the Commission is obliged to weigh antitrust policy.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > General Overview

HN2[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Cartels & Horizontal Restraints

Regulated industries must, to some degree at least, accommodate the antitrust laws.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Collectives & Cooperatives > General Overview

Governments > Legislation > Interpretation

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > General Overview

HN3[] Exemptions & Immunities, Collectives & Cooperatives

Even where there are specific statutory exemptions for regulated industries from the antitrust laws, such exemptions are to be very narrowly construed.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > General Overview

Governments > Legislation > Interpretation

HN4[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Cartels & Horizontal Restraints

Congressional directives require certain regulatory agencies to enforce portions of the antitrust laws.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Public Enforcement > State Civil Actions

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > Natural Gas Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Regulators > Public Utility Commissions > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Regulators > US Federal Energy Regulatory Commission > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Antitrust Issues > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > Distribution & Sale

HN5[] Public Enforcement, State Civil Actions

The Federal Power Commission has been instructed to transmit evidence concerning apparent violations of the Federal antitrust laws to the Attorney General. Section 20(a) of the Natural Gas Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 717s(a) (1964).

Antitrust & Trade Law > Procedural Matters > Jurisdiction > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > General Overview

HN6[] Procedural Matters, Jurisdiction

Congress has also explicitly advised certain agencies to consider basic issues of competition while regulating the industries within their jurisdiction.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > General Overview

HN7[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Cartels & Horizontal Restraints

By its very nature an illegal restraint of trade is in some ways contrary to the public interest.

Administrative Law > Agency Adjudication > Presiding Officers > Administrative Law Judges

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > General Overview

HN8[] Presiding Officers, Administrative Law Judges

Regulatory agencies do not have jurisdiction to determine violations of the antitrust laws. Nor are the agencies strictly bound by the dictates of these laws, for they can and do approve actions which violate antitrust policies where other economic, social and political considerations are found to be of overriding importance. However, the antitrust laws are merely another tool that a regulatory agency employs to a greater or lesser degree to give understandable content to the broad statutory concept of the public interest.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Market Definition

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

HN9[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

Section 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 18 (1964), states: No corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another corporation where in any line of commerce in any section of the country, the effect of such acquisition may be substantially to lessen competition, or to tend to create a monopoly.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > Distribution & Sale

HN10[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

In deciding whether one is a true potential competitor for purposes of antitrust laws, consideration should be given to the nature or extent of the market, the nearness of the absorbed company to it, that company's eagerness to enter the market, its resourcefulness, and so on.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Utility Companies > Contracts for Service

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Regulators > Public Utility Commissions > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Antitrust Issues > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > Distribution & Sale

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > Marketing & Transportation > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > Marketing & Transportation > Capacity Allocation

Energy & Utilities Law > Pipelines & Transportation > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Pipelines & Transportation > Natural Gas Transportation

Energy & Utilities Law > Pipelines & Transportation > Pipelines > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Pipelines & Transportation > Pipelines > Construction Standards

Energy & Utilities Law > Utility Companies > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Utility Companies > Buying & Selling of Power

Energy & Utilities Law > Utility Companies > Ownership & Restructuring

Transportation Law > Interstate Commerce > Federal Powers

HN11[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

The natural gas market is not a field where merchants are in a continuous daily struggle to hold old customers and to win new ones over from their rivals. In this regulated industry a natural gas company (unless it has excess capacity) must compete for, enter into, and then obtain Federal Power Commission approval of sale contracts in advance of constructing the pipeline facilities. In the natural gas industry pipelines are very expensive; and to be justified they need long-term contracts for sale of the gas that will travel them. Once the Commission grants authorization to construct facilities or to transport gas in interstate commerce, once the distributing contracts are made, a particular market is withdrawn from competition. The competition then is for the new increments of demand that may emerge with an expanding population and with an expanding industrial or household use of gas.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > Distribution & Sale

Energy & Utilities Law > Regulators > Public Utility Commissions > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Antitrust Issues > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > Natural Gas Act > General Overview

HN12[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

Admittedly the Federal Power Commission possesses a ratemaking power and this power is designed to protect the consumers of natural gas. Sections 4 and 5 of the Natural Gas Act, 15 U.S.C.S. §§ 717c and 717d (1964). But it is clear that this power is largely a negative one. Thus the Commission may set a selling rate for a supplier only after it has been demonstrated that the present charge is unjust, unreasonable, unduly discriminatory or preferential, Section 5(a) of the Natural Gas Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 717d(a) (1964), a heavy burden even for specialists as intimately familiar with the natural gas industry as is the Commission. On the other hand, if competition exists, albeit in a limited area, there would be incentives for innovation by the regulated companies themselves and for their coming forward with proposals for better services, lower prices, or both.

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > Natural Gas Act > Certificates of Need

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Regulators > Public Utility Commissions > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Antitrust Issues > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > Natural Gas Act > General Overview

HN13[] Natural Gas Act, Certificates of Need

The Federal Power Commission has the power to maximize the effectiveness of limited competition by specifying the service area in which the certified pipeline may compete. Section 7(e)(f) of the Natural Gas Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 717f(e)(f) (1964).

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > General Overview

Business & Corporate Law > Joint Ventures > Formation

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Joint Ventures

Business & Corporate Law > Joint Ventures > General Overview

HN14[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Cartels & Horizontal Restraints

The rule where a corporation seeks to protect its market by acquiring a potential competitor applies to a joint venture where the same intent is present in the organization of the new corporation.

Energy & Utilities Law > Pipelines & Transportation > Certification & Licenses

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > Distribution & Sale

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > Marketing & Transportation > Marketability

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > Natural Gas Act > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > Natural Gas Act > Certificates of Need

Energy & Utilities Law > Pipelines & Transportation > Natural Gas Transportation

Energy & Utilities Law > Pipelines & Transportation > Pipelines > General Overview

HN15[] Pipelines & Transportation, Certification & Licenses

Although Congress has limited entry into natural gas markets by providing that new pipelines may not be built without prior certification of public convenience and necessity, 15 U.S.C.S. § 717f(c) (1964), it has not evinced an intention to restrict competition among qualified operators or a preference for monopoly service.

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > Natural Gas Act > Certificates of Need

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > Natural Gas Act > General Overview

HN16[] Natural Gas Act, Certificates of Need

A certificate shall be issued to any qualified applicant if it is found that the applicant is able and willing properly to do the acts and to perform the service proposed and to conform to the relevant law and regulations and that the proposed service is or will be required by the present or future public convenience and necessity. Section 7(e), Natural Gas Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 717f(e) (1964).

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > Natural Gas Act > Certificates of Need

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > Natural Gas Act > General Overview

HN17[] Natural Gas Act, Certificates of Need

Nothing contained in this section shall be construed as a limitation upon the power of the Federal Power Commission to grant certificates of public convenience and necessity for service of an area already being served by another natural gas company. Section 7(g) of the Natural Gas Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 717f(g) (1964).

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > Distribution & Sale

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Antitrust Issues > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > Natural Gas Act > General Overview

HN18[] Natural Gas Industry, Distribution & Sale

Nothing in the Natural Gas Act suggests that Congress thought monopoly better than competition or one source of supply better than two, or intended for any reason to give an existing supplier of natural gas for distribution in a particular community the privilege of furnishing an increased supply.

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > Distribution & Sale

Energy & Utilities Law > Administrative Proceedings > Judicial Review > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Regulators > Public Utility Commissions > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > General Overview

HN19[] Natural Gas Industry, Distribution & Sale

Comparative proceedings before regulatory agencies are sensitive mechanisms for weighing the relative merits of rival projects and one of the main competitive arenas of the natural gas industry since it is there that the sellers challenge one another for the favor of the Federal Power Commission. This process could easily be distorted if the Commission permitted potential applicants to get together to decide how a market would be divided before submitting their proposals to the Commission, for then private parties rather than the Commission would be determining what means of meeting a market demand is most closely in accord with the public interest. Courts cannot permit such an abrogation of administrative responsibility.

Energy & Utilities Law > Utility Companies > Rates > General Overview

Governments > Public Improvements > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Regulators > Public Utility Commissions > General Overview

HN20[] Utility Companies, Rates

One of the most important duties of a public utility, inherent in its franchise to serve the public, is the duty to take the initiative in proposing reasonable rates and rendering adequate services, taking into account changing conditions. The utility is not relieved from this duty because its activities are subject to governmental regulation, for a regulatory commission is not clothed with the responsibility or qualified to manage the utility's business.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Business & Corporate Law > Cooperatives > Formation

Energy & Utilities Law > Antitrust Issues > General Overview

Business & Corporate Law > Joint Ventures > General Overview

Business & Corporate Law > Joint Ventures > Formation

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Contracts Law > Types of Contracts > Joint Contracts

Energy & Utilities Law > Financing > Grants & Reservations > Joint Ventures & Partnerships

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Joint Ventures

HN21[] Cooperatives, Formation

The joint venture puts the parents, particularly if they are competitors, in dangerous proximity to discuss and act jointly on aspects of their business apart from the joint venture and creates an aura of cooperative team spirit which is apt to dampen competitive fires between the firms involved.

Energy & Utilities Law > Antitrust Issues > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Regulators > Public Utility Commissions > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Regulators > US Federal Energy Regulatory Commission > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > Natural Gas Act > General Overview

HN22[] Energy & Utilities Law, Antitrust Issues

The duty imposed upon the Federal Power Commission by Section 7 of the Natural Gas Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 717f, is not merely to determine which of the submitted applications is most in the public interest, but also to give proper consideration to logical alternatives which might serve the public interest better than any of the projects outlined in the applications.

Judges: Bastian, Senior Circuit Judge, and Wright and Robinson, Circuit Judges.

Opinion by: WRIGHT

Opinion

[*957] WRIGHT, Circuit Judge:

This is a petition by Northern Natural Gas Company (Northern) and its subsidiary, Northern Natural Gas Transportation Company (Northern Transportation), to review an order of the Federal Power Commission. The challenged order, issued June 20, 1967, authorized the Great Lakes Gas Transmission Company, a Delaware corporation owned jointly by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited and American Natural Gas Company, to construct and operate a 989-mile, 36-inch, natural gas pipeline extending from the Canadian border in northern Minnesota through northern Wisconsin and the Upper Peninsula of Michigan, across the straits of Mackinac, and through the lower Michigan peninsula to the Canadian border at Sarnia, Ontario. [1] [2] By the fifth year of operation, the

[1] Besides certificating the construction and operation of the Great Lakes facilities, the Commission issued certificates of public convenience and necessity for construction and operation of facilities to Midwestern Gas Transmission Company and Michigan Wisconsin Pipe Line Company, authorized the transportation, sale, importation and exportation above described, and issued pipeline is expected to be delivering 734,000 Mcf of gas per day, with approximately 57,000 Mcf per day being purchased by Michigan Consolidated Gas Company [2] and the remainder going to Trans-Canada in eastern Canada.

Simultaneously with the approval of the Great Lakes proposal, the Commission rejected a competitive application by Northern and Northern Transportation which proposed that the Canadian gas imported into northern Minnesota be utilized by Northern in its northern Minnesota markets and that Northern Transportation fulfill the needs of Michigan Consolidated and Trans-Canada by transporting domestic gas, originating in southwestern United States, from Northern's terminal at Ogden, Iowa, through Michigan to the Canadian border at Sarnia, Ontario. To accomplish this exchange-displacement, Northern Transportation would have constructed a 285-mile, 36-inch pipeline from Emerson, Manitoba, to Sandstone, Minnesota, and a 731-mile, 36-inch line from Ogden, Iowa, to Sarnia, Ontario.

Both proposals contemplated exportation of gas from northern Michigan to Sault Sainte Marie [3] (in each case this would entail construction of a short lateral line) and additional importation of 116,000 Mcf per day of Canadian gas by Midwestern Gas Transmission Company and sale of this gas to Michigan Wisconsin Pipe Line Company. Thus the essential difference between the proposals was that Great Lakes would utilize an entirely new pipeline to transport Canadian gas from western Canada to eastern Canada whereas Northern and Northern [*958] Transportation would utilize both existing and new facilities to effect an exchange of Canadian gas for United States production.

The principal question raised by this petition is whether the Great Lakes joint venture substantially lessened actual or potential competition and, if so, whether the Commission adequately took account of this factor. HN1[] Although the Commission is not bound by the dictates of the antitrust laws, it is clear that antitrust concepts are intimately involved in a determination of what action is in the public interest, and therefore the Commission is obliged to weigh antitrust policy. California v. F.P.C., 369 U.S. 482, 484-485, 8 L. Ed. 2d 54, 82 S. Ct. 901 (1962); [4] United States v. Borden Co., 308 U.S. 188, 198-199, 84 L. Ed. 181, 60 S. Ct. 182 (1939); Lynchburg Gas Co. v. F.P.C., 119 U.S. App. D.C. 23, 27, 30-31, 336 F.2d 942, 946, 949-950 (1964); City of Pittsburgh v. F.P.C., 99 U.S. App. D.C. 113, 126, 237 F.2d 741, 754 (1956); Pennsylvania Water & Power Co. v. F.P.C., 89 U.S. App. D.C. 235, 240, 193 F.2d 230, 235 (1951), affirmed, 343 U.S. 414, 96 L. Ed. 1042, 72 S. Ct. 843 (1952). [3] This much is conceded by the Commission and the intervenors. We think that implementation of the Commission's Presidential Permits for the border connections. The requested authorizations are contained in interdependent applications of Great Lakes, Michigan Wisconsin, and Midwestern.

---

These actions are required by § 7(c) of the Natural Gas Act, 15 U.S.C. § 717f(c) (1964 ed.):

> "No natural-gas company * * * shall engage in the transportation or sale of natural gas * * * or undertake the construction or extension of any facilities therefor, or acquire or operate any such facilities or extensions thereof, unless there is in force with respect to such natural-gas company a certificate of public convenience and necessity issued by the Commission authorizing such acts or operations * * *."

[2] In addition, Michigan Consolidated has an option to take another 50,000 Mcf per day in the fifth year. S.E.C. opinion, March 7, 1966 (Holding Company Act Release No. 15422), reprinted in Appendix B of intervenors' brief, pp. 4a, 6a.

[3] Just last year the Supreme Court summarized the responsibility of the regulatory agencies in this regard:

> "* * * Both the ICC and this Court have read terms such as 'public interest' broadly, to require consideration of all important consequences including anticompetitive effects. Thus the ICC is required to weigh anticompetitive effects in approving applications for merger or control under § 5 of the Act, authorizing the ICC to grant such applications only if 'consistent with the public interest.' McLean Trucking Co. v. United States, 321 U.S. 67 [88 L. Ed. 544, 64 S. Ct. 370]. And similarly broad responsibilities are encompassed within like broad directives addressed to other agencies. E.g., National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 190, 224 [87 L. Ed. 1344, 63 S. Ct. 997]; FCC v. RCA Communications, Inc., 346 U.S. 86, 94 [97 L. Ed. 1470, 73 S. Ct. 998]; California v. FPC, 369 U.S. 482, 484-485 [8 L. Ed. 2d 54, 82 S. Ct. 901]."

Denver & Rio Grande Western R. Co. v. United States, 387 U.S. 485, 492-493, 18 L. Ed. 2d 905, 87 S. Ct. 1754 (1967).

order will have serious anticompetitive effects and that, in issuing it, the Commission gave inadequate consideration to the antitrust policy of the United States. We therefore remand the case to the Commission for further consideration.

[5] I.

Petitioners have challenged the Commission's handling of the antitrust issues on three basic grounds: (1) the refusal by Trans-Canada either to deliver Canadian gas to petitioners or to purchase domestic gas from petitioners, the refusal by Michigan Consolidated to purchase gas from petitioners, and Midwestern's refusal to participate in petitioners' project constituted an illegal group boycott which contaminated the comparative proceeding conducted by the Commission and prejudiced petitioners' application; (2) the Commission's finding that the potential benefits from competition between Great Lakes and Northern in the taconite region of northern Minnesota outweighed the possible benefits afforded by the entry of Northern Transportation into the lower Great Lakes region was not supported by substantial evidence; and (3) the joint venture resulted in an illegal division of the consumer market between Trans-Canada and American Natural, substantially lessened competition between United States distributors for the supply of Canadian gas, and illegally eliminated competition between independent applicants (Trans-Canada versus American Natural and Midwestern) in a Commission comparative [6] proceeding.

It is the latter ground which is most troubling. The group boycott, though undesirable, did not overtly affect this proceeding because the Commission weighed petitioners' proposal as if the threatened boycott did not exist. As [*959] for the relative benefits of Great Lakes competition in the taconite region and Northern Transportation competition in the lower Great Lakes region, we believe there is sufficient evidence to support the finding in favor of competition in the taconite region. Thus the principal question to which we address ourselves is whether there is sufficient evidence to support the Commission's conclusion that "from the standpoint of enhanced competition, we do not think it very significant whether or not the American Natural system participates in the Great Lakes proposal."

A. The Relevance of Antitrust Law to Regulatory Agencies.

Even though the Commission concedes that it must consider the antitrust implications of its action, in order to determine the required extent of that consideration we think it helpful to examine the overall relationship between antitrust law and regulatory agencies. Despite a continuing debate, [4] [8] it appears [7] that the basic goal of direct governmental regulation through administrative bodies and the goal of indirect governmental regulation in the form of antitrust law is the same -- to achieve the most efficient allocation of resources possible. [5] For instance, whether a regulatory body is dictating the selling price or that price is determined by a market free from unreasonable restraints of trade, the desired result is to establish a selling price which covers costs plus a reasonable rate of return on capital, thereby avoiding monopoly profits. [6] Another example of their common purpose

---

[4] See Symposium on Regulated Industries and Antitrust, 32 A.B.A. Antitrust L.J. 215 (1966). Much of this debate seems to center on the objection of practicing lawyers to dealing with two heads of United States agencies on a single problem. That is, they complain that there are unnecessary complications when an antitrust question arises in a regulated industry because it often requires them to deal with not only the relevant regulatory agency but also the Department of Justice. It appears that this problem could be alleviated if the regulatory agencies were conscientiously to examine the antitrust implications of their actions, thereby taking much of the burden from the Department of Justice. This may have been one of the objectives of the recent Savings and Loan Holding Company Amendments, Pub. L. 90-255, § 408(e), 90th Cong., 2d Sess., 36 U.S.L. Week 77 (February 6, 1968).

[5] See Lynchburg Gas Co. v. F.P.C., 119 U.S. App. D.C. 23, 31, 336 F.2d 942, 950 (1964); California v. F.P.C., 111 U.S. App. D.C. 226, 231-232, 296 F.2d 348, 353-354 (1961), reversed, 369 U.S. 482, 8 L. Ed. 2d 54, 82 S. Ct. 901 (1962); Symposium, supra Note 4, at 239-242 (Zimmerman).

[6] In the original enactment, Congress stated that it was "the intention of Congress that natural gas shall be sold in interstate commerce for resale for ultimate public consumption for domestic, commercial, industrial, or any other use at the lowest possible is that both types of regulation seek to establish an atmosphere which will stimulate innovations for better service at a lower cost. This analysis suggests that the two forms of economic regulation complement each other.

This theory of complementary regulation appears to be borne out by the Supreme Court cases holding that HN2[] regulated industries must, to some degree at least, accommodate the antitrust laws. F.M.C. v. Aktiebolaget Svenska Amerika Linien, 390 U.S. 238, 19 L. Ed. 2d 1071, 88 S. Ct. 1005 (1968) [9] (ocean carriers); United Mine Workers of America v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657, 14 L. Ed. 2d 626, 85 S. Ct. 1585 (1965) (labor union); United States v. El Paso Natural Gas Co., 376 U.S. 651, 12 L. Ed. 2d 12, 84 S. Ct. 1044 (1964) (natural gas distributors); United States v. Philadelphia National Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 10 L. Ed. 2d 915, 83 S. Ct. 1715 (1963) (banking); Silver v. New York Stock Exchange, 373 U.S. 341, 10 L. Ed. 2d 389, 83 S. Ct. 1246 (1963) (stock exchange); United States v. Radio Corporation of America, 358 U.S. 334, 3 L. Ed. 2d 354, 79 S. Ct. 457 (1959) (television communication); Georgia v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 324 U.S. 439, 65 S. Ct. [*960] 716, 89 L. Ed. 1051 (1945) (railroads); United States v. South-Eastern Underwriters Ass'n, 322 U.S. 533, 88 L. Ed. 1440, 64 S. Ct. 1162 (1944) (insurance); McLean Trucking Co. v. United States, 321 U.S. 67, 88 L. Ed. 544, 64 S. Ct. 370 (1944) (trucking); United States v. Borden Co., 308 U.S. 188, 84 L. Ed. 181, 60 S. Ct. 182 (1939) (agricultural cooperatives). Moreover, the Court has held that [10] HN3[] even where there are specific statutory exemptions for regulated industries from the antitrust laws, such exemptions are to be very narrowly construed. See, e.g., California v. F.P.C., supra, 369 U.S. at 485-486; Maryland & Virginia Milk Producers Ass'n v. United States, 362 U.S. 458, 4 L. Ed. 2d 880, 80 S. Ct. 847 (1960).

The complementary regulation theory is also supported by HN4[] congressional directives requiring certain regulatory agencies to enforce portions of the antitrust laws. [7] HN5[] The Federal Power Commission, while not included on the list of enforcement agencies, has been instructed to "transmit * * * evidence * * * concerning apparent violations of the Federal antitrust laws to the Attorney General." [8] HN6[] Congress has also explicitly advised certain agencies to consider basic issues of competition while regulating the [11] industries within their jurisdiction. [9] [13] For other agencies the obligation to act in favor of "public convenience and necessity" has been construed as implying a duty to recognize and weigh traditional antitrust concepts. [10] For example, the Federal Maritime Commission has formulated a rule that acts of shipping conferences interfering with the policies of antitrust laws will be approved only if the conferences can '"bring forth such facts as would demonstrate that the * * * [act] was required by a serious transportation need, necessary to secure important public benefits or in furtherance of a valid regulatory purpose of the Shipping Act.'" F.M.C. v. Aktiebolaget Svenska Amerika Linien, supra, 390 U.S. at 243. In approving this standard the Supreme Court noted that "by HN7[] its very nature an reasonable rate consistent with the maintenance of adequate service in the public interest." Natural Gas Act, 52 Stat. 825 (1938).

---

[7] Section 11 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 21(a) (1964 ed.), rests authority to enforce compliance with § 7 by the persons subject thereto

> "in the Interstate Commerce Commission where applicable to common carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended; in the Federal Communications Commission where applicable to common carriers engaged in wire or radio communication or radio transmission of energy; in the Civil Aeronautics Board where applicable to air carriers and foreign air carriers subject to the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938; in the Federal Reserve Board where applicable to banks, banking associations, and trust companies; and in the Federal Trade Commission where applicable to all other character of commerce * * *."

[8] Section 20(a) of the Natural Gas Act, 15 U.S.C. § 717s(a) (1964 ed.).

[9] Savings and Loan Holding Company Amendments, supra Note 4; Bank Merger Act, 12 U.S.C. § 1828(c) (1964 ed.); Civil Aeronautics Act, 49 U.S.C. § 488(b) (1964 ed.); Interstate Commerce Act, 49 U.S.C. § 5(2)(c) (1964 ed.).

[10] F.M.C. v. Aktiebolaget Svenska Amerika Linien, 390 U.S. 238, 243-246, 19 L. Ed. 2d 1071, 88 S. Ct. 1005 (1968); California v. F.P.C., 369 U.S. 482, 484-485, 8 L. Ed. 2d 54, 82 S. Ct. 901 (1962); United States v. Radio Corporation of America, 358 U.S. 334, 351-352, 3 L. Ed. 2d 354, 79 S. Ct. 457 (1959); National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 190, 222-224, 87 L. Ed. 1344, 63 S. Ct. 997 (1943).

illegal restraint of trade is in some ways 'contrary to the public interest.'" Id. at 244. And while the Supreme Court did not say that the F.M.C. was obliged to display the degree of deference for antitrust laws suggested by its rule, the Court did conclude that "the [12] antitrust test formulated by the Commission is an appropriate refinement of the statutory 'public interest' standard." Id. at 246.

HN8[] This is not to suggest, however, that regulatory agencies have jurisdiction to determine violations of the antitrust laws. See California v. F.P.C., supra, 369 U.S. at 490; United States v. [*961] Radio Corporation of America, supra, 358 U.S. at 350 n. 18; National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 190, 223-224, 87 L. Ed. 1344, 63 S. Ct. 997 (1943); Mansfield Journal Co. v. F.C.C., 86 U.S. App. D.C. 102, 107, 180 F.2d 28, 33 (1950). Nor are the agencies strictly [14] bound by the dictates of these laws, for they can and do approve actions which violate antitrust policies where other economic, social and political considerations are found to be of overriding importance. [11] In short, the antitrust laws are merely another tool which a regulatory agency employs to a greater or lesser degree to give "understandable content to the broad statutory concept of the 'public interest.'" F.M.C. v. Aktiebolaget Svenska Amerika Linien, supra, 390 U.S. at 244. But because competitive considerations are an important element of the "public interest," we believe that in a case such as this the Commission was obliged to make findings related to the pertinent antitrust policies, draw conclusions from the findings, and weigh these conclusions along with other important public interest considerations. Johnston Broadcasting Co. v. F.C.C., 85 U.S. App. D.C. 40, 46, 175 F.2d 351, 357 (1949). See also Baltimore & Ohio R. Co. v. United States, 386 U.S. 372, 402-403, 436-437, 18 L. Ed. 2d 159, 87 S. Ct. 1100 (1967) (Mr. Justice Brennan concurring); Scenic Hudson Preservation Conference v. F.P.C., 2 Cir., 354 F.2d 608 (1965), [15] cert. denied, 384 U.S. 941, 86 S. Ct. 1462, 16 L. Ed. 2d 540 (1966).

B. Background of the Joint Venture.

In 1961 Trans-Canada concluded that the growing demand for gas in eastern Canada necessitated additional facilities to supplement the gas then being carried by its Canadian pipeline. Trans-Canada subsequently determined that it would be advantageous to build the new pipeline through the United States because: (1) it would be more economical than "looping" (building a parallel line) its existing line and again traversing the solid granite of the pre-Cambrian shield [16] in Ontario, and (2) a United States line offered the potential of expanding Trans-Canada's export sales. This interest in marketing gas to United States distributors while moving additional gas to eastern Canada [12] prompted Trans-Canada to hold meetings in 1962 with several United States gas distributing companies to determine whether any of them might be interested in a joint project.

As a result of these preliminary discussions, American Natural and Trans-Canada carried on joint studies to determine the feasibility of a joint project. The parties were unable, however, to reach an agreement on the division of ownership and the amount of gas to be purchased by Michigan Wisconsin, the American Natural subsidiary. Consequently, Trans-Canada decided to have Great Lakes, a wholly owned subsidiary incorporated in Delaware, construct and operate a 36-inch pipeline following the route now planned for the [17] joint venture. In accord with Section 7 of the Natural Gas Act, 15 U.S.C. § 717f (1964 ed.), Trans-Canada sought the approval of the Commission.

Shortly thereafter American Natural and Midwestern formulated an alternative to the transportation proposed by Trans-Canada, whereby Midwestern would take gas from Trans-Canada and transport it to Wisconsin, to be utilized there by Michigan Wisconsin in its domestic market, and Michigan Wisconsin would transport domestic gas from its Michigan storage fields to the Canadian border. Before submitting this alternative [*962] to the Commission as a competitive application, American Natural and Midwestern proposed to Trans-Canada that it utilize the American [11] See Seaboard Air Line R. Co. v. United States, 382 U.S. 154, 15 L. Ed. 2d 223, 86 S. Ct. 277 (1965); Pan American World Airways, Inc. v. United States, 371 U.S. 296, 9 L. Ed. 2d 325, 83 S. Ct. 476 (1963); McLean Trucking Co. v. United States, 321 U.S. 67, 88 L. Ed. 544, 64 S. Ct. 370 (1944). Also note the exceptions mentioned above which the F.M.C. has written into its policy.

---

[12] Trans-Canada now exports gas into Minnesota at Emerson, Manitoba, and into Vermont east of Lake Champlain.

Natural-Midwestern alternative. Trans-Canada rejected this proposition because it believed its own proposal was more economical and offered it greater flexibility. American Natural and Midwestern then filed their alternative proposal with the Commission.

Before the Commission had an opportunity to conduct competitive hearings on these mutually exclusive proposals, Trans-Canada and American Natural, subsequently joined by Midwestern, reopened their negotiations [18] for a joint venture. As a result of these negotiations, the three companies withdrew their previous competitive proposals and in their places filed the joint Great Lakes proposal which has been certificated by the Commission. Different reasons were expressed for the withdrawals of the three parties and their concurrence in the Great Lakes joint venture which was to be owned equally by American Natural and Trans-Canada: Mr. E.H. Holstead, a vice president of Trans-Canada and vice president and general manager of Great Lakes, stated that Midwestern withdrew its prior application on the condition that Trans-Canada would sell to it, and Michigan Wisconsin would buy from it, an additional 113,000 Mcf of gas. Mr. Holstead further stated that Trans-Canada would not have withdrawn its original proposal unless Michigan Consolidated agreed to purchase 57,000 Mcf of gas, and, although no direct statements were discovered in the record which revealed the thinking of American Natural, other statements made therein and its oral argument make it clear that it was willing to withdraw its prior application and make additional purchases of Canadian gas under the subsequent joint proposal in order [19] to guarantee itself a portion of the ownership of Great Lakes and a more direct link with the Canadian supply.

C. The Standards for Determining Whether the Joint Venture Was Contrary to Antitrust Policies.

The antitrust law most relevant to these facts is HN9[] Section 7 of the Clayton Act:

> "No corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire * * * the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital * * * of another corporation * * * where in any line of commerce in any section of the country, the effect of such acquisition may be substantially to lessen competition, or to tend to create a monopoly." 15 U.S.C. § 18 (1964 ed.).

The Supreme Court has emphasized many times that the purpose of Section 7 is "to arrest * * * the tendency to monopoly, before the consumer's alternatives disappeared through merger * *." United States v. Philadelphia National Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 367, 10 L. Ed. 2d 915, 83 S. Ct. 1715 (1963). In determining the applicability of Section 7 in specific cases, the judiciary has considered various elements. We [20] may quickly dispose of several of these. First, the natural gas industry is obviously a "line of commerce," United States v. El Paso Natural Gas Co., supra, 376 U.S. at 657, and the pipelines are in interstate commerce. Second, the relevant geographic market is easily defined by reference to the disputed pipelines. Also, it is no longer questioned that Section 7 applies to the acquisition of newly formed companies, such as this joint venture, as well as to the acquisition of companies already engaged in commerce. United States v. Penn-Olin Co., 378 U.S. 158, 167-168, 12 L. Ed. 2d 775, 84 S. Ct. 1710 (1964). Thus the only unanswered question is whether the probable effect of the joint venture is substantially to lessen competition.

The Commission concluded that American Natural's purchase of a 50 per cent interest in Great Lakes would not have a detrimental effect on competition because "there cannot be competition for * * * the transportation of western [*963] Canadian gas to eastern Canadian markets." Furthermore, the Commission found "that the Great Lakes line may well serve as a competitive stimulus" in the taconite region, a market [21] previously dominated by Northern. We do not dispute either of these findings. We do believe, however, that the joint venture will have substantial anticompetitive effects on the marketing of gas in the upper Midwest, since the joint venture appears to have effectively prevented competition from arising among natural gas suppliers selling to distributors in Michigan and Wisconsin, and between the supplier of Canadian gas and those suppliers seeking to market domestic gas.

1. Competition Among Suppliers in the Michigan-Wisconsin Market.

In considering the first of these anti-competitive effects, two facts should be recalled: (1) American Natural is the dominant supplier in Michigan and Wisconsin, supplying over 50 per cent of the gas utilized in both states [13] [22] ; and (2) as originally proposed the wholly-owned subsidiary of Trans-Canada contemplated substantial sales of gas in the United States in addition to transporting gas to eastern Canada. [14] From this we may conclude that, had the Trans-Canada subsidiary been certified by the Commission, the accessible Michigan-Wisconsin market, now dominated by American Natural, would have been open to competition.

In determining [23] whether the formation of the joint venture precluded this competition and, if it did, whether this competition would have been substantial, two questions must be considered: (1) Was Great Lakes, as a wholly-owned subsidiary of Trans-Canada, a probable entrant to the Michigan-Wisconsin market -- that is, was Great Lakes a true potential competitor? (2) Could competition between Great Lakes and American Natural have a substantial effect on the marketing of natural gas in Wisconsin and Michigan?

The Supreme Court has suggested that, HN10[] in deciding whether one is a true potential competitor, consideration should be given to "the nature or extent of [the] market, the nearness of the absorbed company to it, that company's eagerness to enter the market, its resourcefulness, and so on." [15] United States v. El Paso Natural Gas Co., supra, 376 U.S. at 660. See also F.T.C. v. Procter & Gamble Co., 386 U.S. 568, 580, 18 L. Ed. 2d 303, 87 S. Ct. 1224 (1967). The nature of the natural gas market was accurately described by Mr. Justice Douglas in El Paso:

[24]

> "This HN11[] is not a field where merchants are in a continuous daily struggle [*964] to hold old customers and to win new ones over from their rivals. In this regulated industry a natural gas company (unless it has excess capacity) must compete for, enter into, and then obtain Commission approval of sale contracts in advance of constructing the pipeline facilities. In the natural gas industry pipelines are very expensive; and to be justified they need long-term contracts for sale of the gas that will travel them. * * * Once the Commission grants authorization to construct facilities or to transport gas in interstate commerce, once the distributing contracts are made, a particular market is withdrawn from competition. The competition then is for the new increments of demand that may emerge with an expanding population and with an expanding industrial or household use of gas." 376 U.S. at 659-660.

In this case the additional demand in the eastern Canadian market made a new pipeline feasible. Because this market is reached most easily by traversing a part [25] of the large lower Michigan market, now dominated by [13] Petitioners allege that American Natural supplies over 50 per cent of the gas used in Wisconsin and over 78 per cent of Michigan's gas. American Natural contends that it supplies just over 50 per cent.

---

[14] Great Lakes Gas Transmission Company's Application for Certificate of Public Convenience and Necessity, Docket No. CP65-171. Petitioners have alleged that Trans-Canada proposed to serve in the United States 93 communities, four major iron ore producing areas, an extensive pulp and paper industry and public and privately-owned power generating plants, and that Trans-Canada estimated that the gas sold in the United States would produce revenues of more than $23,000,000 a year.

The Commission found that by the fifth year of operation (1970-71) the certificated Great Lakes pipeline, which is essentially the same as the one proposed originally, would carry approximately 734,000 Mcf/day, and be capable of carrying an additional 86,000 Mcf/day merely by increasing the compression of the system. It further found that by the fifth year of operation approximately 224,000 M2cf/year (about 612,000 Mcf/day) would be transported to eastern Canada. Therefore, approximately 248,000 Mcf/day, or 30 per cent of the capacity of the system, would be available for marketing in the United States.

[15] Professor Brodley has criticized this mode of analysis as being too dependent on subjective factors and has argued that a superior test for determining potential entrants would be one resting primarily on the nearness of the market to the potential entrant. Brodley, Oligopoly Power Under the Sherman and Clayton Acts -- From Economic Theory to Legal Policy, 19 Stan. L. Rev. 285, 335 (1967).

American Natural, and also the as yet undeveloped Upper Peninsula, there was additional incentive for Trans-Canada to seek the right to construct a pipeline to eastern Canada. In fact, every application made for the right to carry gas to eastern Canada contemplated the construction of a pipeline with a capacity in excess of the amount of gas needed to meet the Canadian demands since each hoped to market the excess gas in Michigan. Thus the nature and extent of the market would have been attractive to the Trans-Canada subsidiary.

The second consideration [26] -- the nearness of the absorbed company to the market -- also suggests that the Trans-Canada subsidiary was a true potential competitor. Trans-Canada has a market and pipelines on both sides of the Michigan-Wisconsin market and, therefore, a link between the two was reasonable and practicable from a business viewpoint. This is obvious in light of Trans-Canada's conclusion that a pipeline traversing the United States would be a more economical means of transporting gas to eastern Canada than looping its existing line in Canada.

Finally, it appears that Trans-Canada possessed the desire and resources to enter the market. Its intent is clearly demonstrated by its original application. And the mere size of its present operation would suggest that financing would not hinder its entry. Thus all factors indicate that a wholly-owned Trans-Canada subsidiary could have entered the Michigan-Wisconsin market.

If a wholly-owned subsidiary of Trans-Canada would have become an actual competitor of suppliers in Michigan and Wisconsin, we believe that the effect would have been substantial and that the northern Wisconsin and Michigan markets could have expected significant benefits. This is [27] so, in large part, because competition, even in a regulated industry, secures benefits which might otherwise be unattainable. HN12[] Admittedly the Commission possesses a rate-making power and this power is designed to protect the consumers of natural gas. [16] [28] But it is clear that this power is largely a negative one. [17] Thus the Commission may set a selling rate for a supplier only after it has been demonstrated that the present charge is unjust, unreasonable, unduly discriminatory or preferential, [18] a heavy burden even for specialists as intimately familiar with the natural gas industry as is the Commission. On the other hand, if competition exists, [*965] albeit in a limited area, there would be incentives for innovation by the regulated companies themselves and for their coming forward with proposals for better services, lower prices, or both. And once innovations or proposals are forthcoming by a supplier, the Commission could more easily act to universalize these benefits than it could have acted to extract them initially.

Consider the types of natural gas markets which exist. There are some markets which are natural monopolies -- that is, where the most efficient allocation of resources results in a single supplier. [19] In such markets, competition is sacrificed to avoid wasteful duplication of services and investment, and hence regulation by the Commission is the only protection a consumer has. In virtually all other natural gas markets, there is a tight oligopoly or partial monopoly. [20] [30] In these markets the fortunes of the few sellers are highly dependent, [21] and therefore there is [16] Sections 4 and 5 of the Natural Gas Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 717c and 717d (1964 ed.).

---

[17] See Symposium, supra Note 4, 32 A.B.A. Antitrust L.J. at 240 (Zimmerman).

[18] Section 5(a) of the Natural Gas Act, 15 U.S.C. § 717d(a) (1964 ed.).

[19] Professors Kaysen and Turner defined a natural monopoly as follows:

> "In the economic sense, natural monopoly is monopoly resulting from economies of scale * * * such that one firm of efficient size can produce all or more than the market can take at a remunerative price, and can continually expand its capacity at less cost than that of a new firm entering the business."

C. Kaysen & D. Turner, Antitrust Policy 191 (1959).

[20] A tight oligopoly market is one which is highly concentrated and which has been defined as a market in which eight or fewer firms supply over 50 per cent of the market, with the largest firm at least 20 per cent. A partial monopoly is defined as a market in which one supplier controls 60 per cent of the market and no other single seller has a significant proportion. C. Kaysen & D. Turner, supra Note 19, at 72. As noted earlier, American Natural supplies over 50 per cent of the Wisconsin and Michigan an incentive for the sellers to arrive at a price which will offer the highest return to all of them. [22] Such a uniform price, whether arrived at by formal agreements or merely through price leadership, is in essence a monopoly price and yields monopoly profits. [23] Where the few sellers strive for and attain a uniform monopoly price the only [29] significant difference between a tight oligopoly market and a monopoly market is that in the former the monopoly profits are shared among several sellers. [24] Thus direct rate regulation is as necessary for the protection of the consumer in these markets as it is in monopoly markets.

The above analysis suggests what might happen in a tight oligopoly market. But in practice it appears that firms selling in such a market do not always seek a uniform monopoly price and, if sought, do not always attain it. Among the reasons why uniform monopoly prices are not sought or attained is that one seller may believe he can maximize his profits by expanding his total sales rather than by taking a maximum profit on each sale. Also, even the mere addition of one seller [31] to an oligopoly market makes the market more complex and less predictable. [25] Therefore, there may [*966] be competitive actions and reactions in an oligopoly market.

One instance of such activity in a tight oligopoly market within the natural gas industry [32] was noted by the Supreme Court in United States v. El Paso Natural Gas Co., supra, 376 U.S. at 654-655. There Pacific Northwest Pipeline Corporation, a potential supplier to the California natural gas market, sought, in an attempt to gain entrance to that market, to attract a major customer from El Paso. Pacific Northwest offered lower prices and an uninterruptible supply to this customer whose El Paso supply was then subject to interruption during peak demands. Although El Paso was able to hold this customer and thereby prevent Pacific Northwest from entering the California market, it was able to do so only by giving the customer a firm supply and by dropping its selling price 25 percent. It is significant that these benefits were initially the result, not of Commission regulation to which El Paso had always been subjected, but rather of the competition of a single potential entrant to the market. Thereafter, since Section 4 (b) of the Natural Gas Act, 15 U.S.C. § 717c(b) (1964 ed.), prohibits suppliers of natural gas from maintaining preferential and unreasonable rates and Section 5(a), 15 U.S.C. § 717d(a) (1964 [33] ed.), empowers the Commission to set reasonable rates after it has established that the prior rates were unjust, it is probable that at least a portion of the 25 per cent drop in selling price enjoyed by this single customer who was the subject of the competition was subsequently extended to other customers of El Paso as well. Thus it appears that the competition and direct regulation would complement each other to the benefit of consumers generally.

This example demonstrates the important role competition can play as a complementary force in regulated industries. In the instant case, as the Commission recognized Trans-Canada's excess gas could have been marketed in the taconite area of northern Minnesota where Northern now enjoys a monopoly position. [26] On the markets. Two other suppliers compete with American Natural in lower Michigan, and Northern competes with it in a small corner of northern Michigan.

---

[21] Because the number of competitors is so small and because the demand is generally inelastic, one seller cannot significantly increase his market share without causing a significant decrease in the market shares held by his competitors. See Brodley, supra Note 15, 19 Stan L. Rev. at 289. See generally E. Chamberlin, Theory of Monopolistic Competition (8th ed. 1962).

[22] See Brodley, supra Note 15, 19 Stan. L. Rev. at 289-290.

[23] Ibid.; C. Kaysen & D. Turner, supra Note 19, at 25.

[24] Brodley, supra Note 15, 19 Stan. L. Rev. at 290.

[25] See Brodley, supra Note 15, 19 Stan. L. Rev. at 291 n. 20:

> "'[A] three-person game is very fundamentally different from a two-person game, a four-person game from a three-person game, etc. The combinatorial complications of the problem . . . increase tremendously with every increase in the number of players . . . Whenever the number of players, i.e., of participants in a social economy, increases, the complexity of the economic system usually increases too; e. g. the number of commodities and services exchanged, processes of production used, etc.' J. Von Neumann & O. Morgenstern, Theory of Games and Economic Behavior 13 (3d ed. 1953). See also [F.] Machlup, [The Economics of Sellers' Competition], at 429-30."

theory set out above, it is likely that, if there were competition in that region, the benefits of this competition would spread throughout the Northern system. Even more probable is that the wholly-owned Trans-Canada subsidiary would seek to sell its excess gas in that portion of northern Michigan which is not now served by any natural gas pipeline. [27] If American Natural's subsidiaries chose not to compete with the Trans-Canada [34] subsidiary for this market, there would not be any additional benefits to consumers. But it is more likely that the American Natural subsidiaries would compete for this market and, once again, any benefits derived from that competition could spread throughout the American Natural system.

[35] In its analysis of the joint venture in the instant case, the Commission ignored these potential benefits of increased [*967] competition. Indeed, by permitting American Natural to buy a half interest in the Great Lakes pipeline, the Commission enabled American Natural to protect its Michigan and northern Wisconsin markets from any competition by an independent competitor, even though there were no apparent economies of scale to be gained. [28] [37] It should be noted, moreover, that an acquisition tending to produce similar results was quite recently condemned by the Supreme Court as violative of the antitrust laws. Thus the Court held in United States v. El Paso Natural Gas Co., supra, a case brought by the Justice Department, that El Paso, the supplier of over 50 per cent of the California natural gas market, could not lawfully acquire Pacific Northwest, a pipeline that did not then supply the California market but had the potential for doing so in the future, since such a horizontal merger tended to lessen substantially competition in violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act. [29] The fact that in the instant case this protection of the market was accomplished [36] through a joint venture in which American Natural owned only a half interest, whereas in El Paso there was a complete merger, is not significant for, as the Supreme Court observed in United States v. Penn-Olin Co., supra, 378 U.S. at 168, "realistically, the parents would not compete with their progeny." According to the corporate agreement creating the joint venture, American Natural is permitted

---

[26] HN13[] The Commission has the power to maximize the effectiveness of limited competition by specifying the service area in which the certified pipeline may compete. See § 7(e)(f) of the Natural Gas Act, 15 U.S.C. § 717f(e)(f) (1964 ed.).

[27] It seems that competition would be more likely to develop sooner here than in the taconite region because it is a virgin market which a wholly-owned Trans-Canada subsidiary could seek immediately without waiting for the expiration of long-term contracts which encumber the taconite market. The development of this northern Michigan market was a factor which contributed to the Commission's conclusion that the route of the joint venture pipeline was more in the public interest than was the proposal of the petitioners.

[28] American Natural is not utilizing excess capacity or making possible other economies of scale. It is merely paying one-half the cost of the new line. In fact, American Natural may be sacrificing economies of scale in order to protect its market from an independent competitor. See § 1, C, 2 of text, infra. Although the certifications granted by the Commission would result in Midwestern's utilizing some of its excess capacity to bring Canadian gas to the Michigan Wisconsin Pipe Line Company, this was technically unrelated to the joint venture project after the second year.

If on remand Michigan Wisconsin and Midwestern choose to file their original proposal and Great Lakes again files an independent application, the Commission may find it necessary to weigh, along with other factors, the advantages of the limited competition offered by an independent Great Lakes against the economies of scale which Michigan Wisconsin and Midwestern might be able to demonstrate. A recent opinion of the Supreme Court indicates that the former is entitled to substantial weight. See Cascade Natural Gas Corp. v. El Paso Natural Gas Co., 386 U.S. 129, 141-142, 17 L. Ed. 2d 814, 87 S. Ct. 932 (1967), wherein the Court overturned the District Court divestiture decree ordered in United States v. El Paso Natural Gas Co., 376 U.S. 651, 662, 12 L. Ed. 2d 12, 84 S. Ct. 1044 (1964), thereby indicating its preference for some overlapping facilities in order to obtain meaningful competition between the parent company and the divested company.

[29] El Paso sought to accomplish the merger by purchasing the stock of Pacific Northwest and later acquiring the assets. After the Department of Justice had challenged the stock acquisition, El Paso sought to immunize the merger from § 7 of the Clayton Act by obtaining the approval of the Power Commission for the asset transfer and arguing that the proviso in § 7 was intended to preclude the Department of Justice from attacking a merger receiving the approval of the Commission. The Supreme Court rejected this argument. California v. F.P.C., supra Note 10. The effect of the proviso need not be considered here as this case only raises the question what the Commission must examine before approving an acquisition, not the question what significance this approval has.

to name the chief executive officer of the joint venture and to elect half of the members of the board of directors. Consequently, it is clear that American Natural will have a veto power over at least those matters which the corporate agreement requires the board to approve, such as changes in rate schedules, contracts for the purchase, sale or transportation of gas, construction contracts, and applications submitted to governmental authorities. We believe that this degree of control by American Natural will not only lessen competition between Great Lakes and American Natural, but will actually foreclose it. See United States v. Penn-Olin Co., supra, 378 U.S. at 168.

It should also be noted that the fact situation in the instant case presents the [*968] most clear example of a joint venture lessening competition, since the half-owner of the joint venture, American Natural, was already the dominant force in the market which the joint venture planned to enter. In Penn-Olin the Supreme [38] Court noted that joint ventures should not always be analyzed in the same manner as mergers because a merger eliminates an existing market participant whereas the joint venture might create a new competitive force therein. 378 U.S. at 168. This distinction was crucial in Penn-Olin because the District Court had found that neither of the owners of the joint venture would have entered the market and that the market in which entry was contemplated was then divided between two other companies. [30] In spite of these considerations, however, the Supreme Court reversed the District Court's finding that the joint venture would not substantially lessen competition and remanded the case for a determination of whether "one would have built 'while the other continued to ponder.'" 378 U.S. at 173. [31] But before reaching this conclusion, the Court hypothesized a situation wherein a joint venture would enter a market already dominated by one of the participants of the joint venture, which is the situation presented by this case. The Court dismissed this hypothesis as an obvious violation of Section 7:

> "* * * [39] HN14[] The rule of United States v. El Paso Natural Gas Co., 376 U.S. 651 [12 L. Ed. 2d 12, 84 S. Ct. 1044] (1964), where a corporation sought to protect its market by acquiring a potential competitor, would, of course, apply to a joint venture where the same intent was present in the organization of the new corporation." 378 U.S. at 170. [32]

[40] Finally, we note that, HN15[] although Congress has limited entry into natural gas markets by providing that new pipelines may not be built without prior certification of public convenience and necessity, 15 U.S.C. § 717f(c) (1964 ed.), it has not evinced an intention to restrict competition among qualified operators or a preference for monopoly service. To the contrary, the language of the Natural Gas Act carefully guards against such inferences. Thus the provision relating to the granting of certification is stated positively:

> "* * * [HN16[] A] certificate shall be issued to any qualified applicant * * * if it is found that the applicant is able and willing properly to do the acts and to perform the service proposed and to conform to the [relevant law and regulations] * * * and that the proposed service * * * is or will [*969] be required by the present or future public convenience and necessity * * *." Section 7(e), Natural Gas Act, 15 U.S.C. § 717f [41] (e) (1964 ed.).

---

[30] In such a market, the entry of the joint venture would actually decrease market concentration. Contrast the instant case, where the joint venture increases American Natural's share of the market and thereby decreases market competition.

[31] After remand to the District Court for a determination of this question, the District Court found that neither participant in the joint venture would have entered the market by itself and, therefore, again gave judgment to the defendants. The Department of Justice has again appealed to the Supreme Court. Affirmed, 389 U.S. 308, 88 S. Ct. 502, 19 L. Ed. 2d 545 (1967).

[32] See generally Brodley, supra Note 15, 19 Stan. L. Rev. 329-337. After recognizing that some joint ventures may be in the public interest for a variety of reasons, id. at 333, none of which are applicable to this case, Professor Brodley comments:

> "* * * Thus, to suggest the scope of the problem, if (1) the parents' market is highly concentrated, (2) at least one of the parents has a significant market share, and (3) the joint venture is horizontal, then any supposed advantage from the increase in the number of competitors in the market as a result of the joint venture seems wholly illusory. Indeed, the most probable result of the formation of the joint venture would be to add to the already excessive market share of the parent or parents. It must be assumed that parent and progeny will not compete, but will work together to extract a joint maximum return from the market they influence together." Id. at 335.

And HN17[] Section 7(g) of the Natural Gas Act provides:

> "Nothing contained in this section shall be construed as a limitation upon the power of the Commission to grant certificates of public convenience and necessity for service of an area already being served by another natural-gas company." 15 U.S.C. § 717f(g) (1964 ed.).

In accord with this statutory language, this court approved the Commission's certification of an American Natural subsidiary seeking to invade the territory previously monopolized by Panhandle Eastern Pipe Line Company, and in so doing made the following observation:

> "* * * HN18[] Nothing in the Natural Gas Act suggests that Congress thought monopoly better than competition or one source of supply better than two, or intended for any reason to give an existing supplier of natural gas for distribution in a particular community the privilege of furnishing an increased supply. * * *" Panhandle Eastern Pipe Line Co. v. F.P.C., 83 U.S. App. D.C. 297, 300, 169 F.2d 881, 884, [42] cert. denied, 335 U.S. 854, 93 L. Ed. 402, 69 S. Ct. 81 (1948).

And in Lynchburg Gas Co. v. F.P.C., supra, 119 U.S. App. D.C. at 30-31, 336 F.2d at 949-950, [33] Judge Washington, joined by Judge Burger, responded to an assertion that a certain rate schedule was in violation of the antitrust laws as follows:

> "* * * Investors in the natural gas industry, although granted an opportunity for a 'fair return', are by no means guaranteed freedom from risk or competition. Such assurance would, in a case such as this, deprive competitors of the right to compete, inhibit efficient allocation of resources and deny ultimate consumers the lowest prices to which they are entitled."

[43] In sum, Congress, the Supreme Court, and this court have concurred in the belief that competition has a role to play in the natural gas industry. Both [*970] courts have recognized specific instances where the goals of direct regulation and the antitrust laws have coalesced. This would seem to be increasingly true as the natural gas markets grow, often demanding new facilities because existing pipelines have reached their ultimate capacity. And

---

[33] But see Pennsylvania Water & Power Co. v. F.P.C., 89 U.S. App. D.C. 235, 193 F.2d 230 (1951), affirmed, 343 U.S. 414, 96 L. Ed. 1042, 72 S. Ct. 843 (1952), where a divided panel of this court affirmed a Commission proceeding approving certain rates even though foundation contracts upon which the rates depended had previously been found to be in violation of the antitrust laws. The majority there concluded:

> "* * * But where a statute provides for comprehensive and detailed regulation of a particular industry, as to the Interstate Commerce Act * * * and the Federal Power Act, there is, as we have indicated, only a limited area for application of antitrust considerations to Commission decisions." 89 U.S. App. D.C. at 240, 193 F.2d at 235.

The underlying rationale of this case seems to have been eroded by subsequent decisions in this court and in the Supreme Court and, therefore, does not appear to be controlling. See, e.g., F.M.C. v. Aktiebolaget Svenska Amerika Linien, supra Note 10; California v. F.P.C., supra Note 10. Furthermore, within a few months of the decision in Pennsylvania Water & Power, the Fourth Circuit considered a related case and rejected the above reasoning. Consolidated Gas Electric Light & Power Co. v. Pennsylvania Water & Power Co., 4 Cir., 194 F.2d 89, cert. denied, 343 U.S. 963, 72 S. Ct. 1056, 96 L. Ed. 1360 (1952). See also Pennsylvania Water & Power Co., 4 Cir., 184 F.2d 552, cert. denied, 340 U.S. 906, 71 S. Ct. 282, 95 L. Ed. 655 (1950). Finally, even in Pennsylvania Water & Power the court recognized that "regulated industries are not per se exempt from the antitrust laws and repeals by implication are not favored," and therefore the court only said that "the antitrust laws are superseded by more specific regulatory statutes to the extent of the repugnancy between them." 89 U.S. App. D.C. at 240, 193 F.2d at 235. For the reasons already set out, we believe that to a large degree the objectives of the Natural Gas Act and antitrust laws are not repugnant but rather complementary.

when new facilities must be built, the competitive advantages afforded by a new entrant might often be more meaningful than any economies of scale which could be attained by permitting the present monopolist, or dominant market force, to construct the new facilities and fulfill the increased demand. Even limited competition would seem to encourage suppliers of natural gas to become more aggressive in proposing new rates and services, and thereby increase the effectiveness of regulation by the Commission. The joint venture approved in this case had the effect of foreclosing this development and, therefore, tended to lessen competition substantially among suppliers in the Wisconsin and Michigan markets. This effect should have been [44] appraised by the Commission along with other relevant considerations.

2. Competition Between Canadian Source Gas and United States Source Gas.

In addition to the effect on suppliers marketing gas to consumers and distribution companies in Michigan and Wisconsin, the joint venture appears to have eliminated competition between Trans-Canada, the only source of Canadian gas east of the Rocky Mountains, and United States sources of supply. That is, the joint venture agreement gave Trans-Canada an assured outlet for additional sales of 170,000 Mcf of gas per day without having to compete with United States sources. [34] And these sales were agreed to, not because the Canadian gas was cheaper or because these sales were necessary to accomplish the transfer of western Canadian gas to eastern Canada, but rather because American Natural, the parent of the buying subsidiaries, seemed willing to sacrifice the interests of its consumers in order to protect its markets and enhance economically the joint venture in which it owned a half interest.

[45] From the beginning, it was obvious that the major reason Trans-Canada sought a United States partner in its venture to transport gas from western to eastern Canada was to help Trans-Canada market gas in the United States. Thus E.H. Holstead, the general manager of Trans-Canada, testified that one of the principal reasons Trans-Canada preferred a United States pipeline over a second Canadian line was to afford Trans-Canada greater access to United States markets. He further said that Trans-Canada was "particularly" interested in combining with United States companies which were "distributor-oriented" and that Trans-Canada "would not have entered into [the joint venture] agreement [with American Natural] without [the] sales [to Michigan Consolidated]."

American Natural agreed to purchase this gas despite the fact that its system had an excess capacity of 300 to 350 Mcf of gas per day which could be utilized with greater flexibility to transport United States gas to its markets at prices equal to or less than the cost of the Canadian gas delivered at Marshfield, Wisconsin. When Karl E. Schmidt, vice president and chief engineer for American Natural, was asked why American [46] Natural agreed to the purchase when it had this excess capacity, the only answer which was forthcoming was:

> "Well * * * as you know * * * we are a partner in the Great Lakes Transmission Company and the gas which we purchase and make a market for, as far as Great Lakes is concerned, enhances Great Lakes' economics and that certainly was a consideration given in our incentive in being a purchaser at this time."

[*971] Furthermore, American Natural flatly stated that if the joint venture were not certificated it would have no desire to take this Canadian gas from Midwestern. That these sales are not necessary to facilitate the transfer of western Canadian gas to eastern Canada is demonstrated by the fact that, after the exchange-displacement method of transferring ends in 1969, the agreement requires Michigan Wisconsin to continue purchasing, via Midwestern, 113,000 Mcf of Canadian gas per day. [35]

[47] From the above it is clear that Trans-Canada will be able to market an additional 170,000 Mcf of gas per day in the United States without having to meet or beat the competition provided by United States source gas, and that American Natural's agreement to purchase this gas through its subsidiaries was part of the bargaining price it

---

[34] 113,000 Mcf of gas per day was to be purchased by Michigan Wisconsin from Midwestern, which in turn purchased an additional 113,000 from Trans-Canada. Michigan Consolidated agreed to take 57,000 Mcf of gas per day from Great Lakes, whose gas was also supplied by Trans-Canada.

[35] One of the main purposes of tying this sale -purchase into this proceeding seems to have been to avoid a Commission rejection of the Great Lakes project because Midwestern's excess capacity was not being utilized.

had to pay in order to obtain a half interest in the joint venture. This had an effect not only on those who market United States gas at its source, but ultimately on the consumers in the American Natural system. The staff of the Commission detected this and commented:

> "* * * Thus the consumers of Michigan Wisconsin and Michigan Consolidated, to whom service could be rendered more readily and more economically through the combined American Natural System, are the sacrificial pawns by which American Natural received (1) half ownership in Great Lakes and (2) Midwestern's quiet acquiescence in the withdrawal of their joint competitive proposal."

To conclude this discussion of the antitrust issues, we believe that the joint venture substantially lessened competition among suppliers in the Michigan-Wisconsin consumer market and between Trans-Canada [48] and suppliers of gas from United States sources. Unless the Commission finds that other important considerations militate in favor of the joint venture and that these considerations are more beneficial to the public than additional competition, the antitrust policies should be respected and the joint venture set aside.

D. Other Undesirable Effects of the Joint Venture.

The joint venture has two other undesirable effects which should have been weighed by the Commission. The first of these relates to its effects on administrative proceedings in general; the second to the opportunity it provides for future anticompetitive activities.

Petitioners have aptly noted that HN19[] comparative proceedings before regulatory agencies are "sensitive mechanism[s] for weighing the relative merits of * * * rival * * * projects" and one of the "main competitive arenas" of the natural gas industry since it is there that the sellers challenge one another for the favor of the Commission. This process could easily be distorted if the Commission permitted potential applicants to get together to decide [49] how a market would be divided before submitting their proposals to the Commission, for then private parties rather than the Commission would be determining what means of meeting a market demand is most closely in accord with the public interest. We cannot permit such an abrogation of administrative responsibility.

The danger of allowing parties to agree among themselves prior to submitting their proposals to the Commission becomes all the more apparent when it is remembered that the Commission's power is largely a negative one; it must rely heavily on private initiative to propose projects to meet consumer needs. Indeed, the judiciary has many times emphasized the importance of maintaining free and vital proposals. Thus the [*972] Fourth Circuit, whose views were later endorsed by this court, [36] stated:

> HN20[] "One of the most important duties of a public utility, inherent in its franchise to serve the public, is the duty to take the initiative in proposing reasonable rates and rendering adequate services, taking into account changing conditions; and the utility is not relieved from [50] this duty because its activities are subject to governmental regulation, for a regulatory commission is not clothed with the responsibility or qualified to manage the utility's business. * * *" [37]

Because independent proposals are so important to the administrative process, the Commission as well as this court must be chary about permitting corporate agreements which limit the nature of the proposals submitted to the Commission. There are few opportunities for consumers [51] of natural gas to choose among the several suppliers offering a variety of services and prices. It is therefore extremely important that a competitive edge be maintained in Commission proceedings. This will increase the chance that the public will be given better service at a lower price. If the Commission determines, after reviewing individual proposals, that a joint project would be more advantageous, it can at that time refuse to certify the individual plans and itself suggest a joint application.

---

[36] Pennsylvania Water & Power Co. v. F.P.C., supra Note 33, 89 U.S. App. D.C. at 241, 193 F.2d at 236.

[37] Pennsylvania Water & Power Co. v. Consolidated Gas, Electric Light & Power Co., supra Note 33, 184 F.2d at 567. See also Baltimore & Ohio R. Co. v. United States, 386 U.S. 372, 437, 18 L. Ed. 2d 159, 87 S. Ct. 1100 (1967) (Mr. Justice Brennan concurring); Georgia v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 324 U.S. 439, 458-460, 89 L. Ed. 1051, 65 S. Ct. 716 (1945).

A second undesirable aspect of the joint venture is that it increases the risk of joint action between the parents in future endeavors. This increased risk was recognized in Timken Roller Bearing Co. v. United States, 341 U.S. 593, 600, 95 L. Ed. 1199, 71 S. Ct. 971 (1951), where Mr. Justice Black said, with respect to an international joint venture, that if it were "not severed, the intercompany relationships will provide in the future, as they have in the past, the temptation and means to engage in the prohibited conduct." Commentators considering this aspect of joint ventures have concurred in this analysis, explaining the phenomenon as follows:

> "* * * [52] HN21[] The joint venture puts the parents, particularly if they are competitors, in dangerous proximity to discuss and act jointly on aspects of their business apart from the joint venture and creates an aura of cooperative team spirit which is apt to dampen competitive fires between the firms involved. * * *" [38]

There is certainly the opportunity for such joint action from the parents in the instant case since here the officers of the joint venture are not only named by the parent companies but also serve as officers of those companies. There are many forms which this joint action may take. One form has already made its appearance: the threatened joint boycott of Northern and Northern Transportation if their proposals had been certificated. A second possibility is [53] reciprocal dealing -- that is, American Natural may continue to buy from Trans-Canada only if Trans-Canada promises not to sell to any competitors of American Natural, [39] or [*973] only if Trans-Canada promises to fill its short-term demands for United States gas, such as that now being supplied by the Tennessee Gas Transmission Company, by purchasing from American Natural subsidiaries. Another possible form of joint conduct is that Trans-Canada and American Natural could plan cooperative expansion programs which would divide future markets. Thus it seems that numerous undesirable joint anticompetitive actions may spring from this joint venture relationship.

[54] E. Prior Agency Orders of the Federal Power Commission and the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Intervenors, not the Commission, have suggested that the prior Commission order dated August 6, 1965, permitting Trans-Canada and Michigan Wisconsin and Midwestern to withdraw their competitive proposals, and the order of the Securities and Exchange Commission authorizing American Natural to acquire 50 per cent of the stock of the joint venture, should be respected, and that accordingly we are precluded from requiring the Power Commission to weigh the joint venture against antitrust policies. We disagree.

As for the prior order of the Power Commission, it should be recognized that it was merely an "order granting withdrawal of [the competitive] applications and terminating [the] proceeding" for weighing the original Trans-Canada proposal and the Michigan Wisconsin and Midwestern proposal against the public interest. In issuing the order, the Commission clearly did not intend to put a stamp of approval on the joint venture, for, apart from the fact that the parties anticipated submitting a joint proposal, the Commission had no knowledge of the joint venture. And it must [55] be assumed that its order was made in the belief that any future proposal would have to endure a full certification proceeding.

Moreover, HN22[] the duty imposed upon the Commission by Section 7 of the Natural Gas Act is not merely to determine which of the submitted applications is most in the public interest, but also to give proper consideration to logical alternatives which might serve the public interest better than any of the projects outlined in the applications. [40] Udall v. F.P.C., 387 U.S. 428, 18 L. Ed. 2d 869, 87 S. Ct. 1712 (1967); City of Pittsburgh v. F.P.C., supra, 99

---

[38] Brodley, supra Note 15, 19 Stan. L. Rev. at 333-334. See also C. Kaysen & D. Turner, supra Note 19, at 138; Comment, 26 Ohio L.J. 439, 441 (1965).

[39] The temptation to apply this type of pressure is made obvious by the following testimony of Ray J. Lynch, vice president of Michigan Wisconsin:

> "We know that each day gas is getting tighter here in the States * * *. And we feel very strongly that the long-range gas supply for our area, and, indeed, for many areas in the U.S. will be Western Canadian gas. And we want to be there to protect ourselves, and our customers."

U.S. App. D.C. at 123 n. 28, 237 F.2d at 751 n. 28; Scenic Hudson Preservation Conference v. F.P.C., supra, 354 F.2d at 617-620. See generally Reich, The Law of the Planned Society, 75 Yale L.J. 1227, 1248-1251 (1966). Therefore, the Commission was obliged in its examination of the joint venture to give some consideration to the first set of applications, even though they had been withdrawn. Indeed, the Commission, recognizing this duty, [56] pointed out in its brief that consideration was implicitly given to the original Trans-Canada proposal since, except for ownership, the joint venture and the original Trans-Canada proposal are essentially the same. Since the prior Commission order granting withdrawal did not foreclose the Commission from considering the original proposals, we cannot accept the intervenors' contention that the prior order bars our remanding this case to the Commission for further consideration of antitrust policies.

The Securities and Exchange Commission order permitting American Natural to acquire the joint venture stock is more troublesome. The S.E.C. order was sought and obtained because American Natural is a registered public utility holding company and, as such, requires S.E.C. approval before extending its holdings. Although some of the factors which are relevant to the Power [57] Commission's [*974] determination of the public interest may have been considered by the S.E.C. and, therefore, the order is perhaps deserving of some weight, there is nothing in either the Public Utility Holding Company Act or the Natural Gas Act which requires one agency to defer to the judgment of the other. In this case even limited comity is not practical because the S.E.C., before concluding that the proposed acquisition was "appropriate in the public interest and in the interest of investors and consumers," merely recounted the content of American Natural's application. American Natural Gas Co., No. 3-349, Holding Company Act Release No. 15422, March 7, 1966. The S.E.C. held no hearings and made no findings to support its conclusion. Therefore, there is little to compel either the Power Commission or this court to give substantial weight to the order of the S.E.C. [41]

[58] II

A second question raised on appeal is whether there is substantial evidence in the record to support the conclusions of the Commission with respect to cost analysis, expansibility of the proposed pipelines, and supply analysis. We find substantial evidence to support all conclusions other than two aspects of the cost analysis.

---

[40] The Commission noted this duty in its brief and gave partial recognition to it in its opinion by considering the merits of the staff proposal.

[41] This S.E.C. approval conceivably may prohibit the courts from ever determining if this joint venture violates § 7 of the Clayton Act. The proviso to § 7 states: "Nothing contained in this section shall apply to transactions duly consummated pursuant to authority given by the * * * Federal Power Commission, * * * the Securities and Exchange Commission in the exercise of its jurisdiction under section 79j [the Public Utilities Holding Company Act], * * * or the Secretary of Agriculture * * *." 15 U.S.C. § 18 (1964 ed.). Although none of the parties attempted to do so, it is possible to argue that if the Power Commission denied the joint venture application on the basis of policy underlying the broad prohibition of § 7 of the Clayton Act, then the Commission would be frustrating the policy of the proviso. That is, if the Department of Justice could not attack the joint venture on the basis of § 7, after the S.E.C. approved it, how can the Power Commission utilize § 7 for defining public policy?

In the first place it is far from clear that the approval of the S.E.C. would immunize the joint venture from a § 7 violation since this proviso has been restrictively interpreted in favor of the broader policy of § 7. California v. F.P.C., supra Note 10 (Power Commission approval of acquisition does not immunize agreement from pending Justice Department antitrust suit); cf. Maryland & Virginia Milk Producers Ass'n v. United States, 362 U.S. 458, 4 L. Ed. 2d 880, 80 S. Ct. 847 (1960) (acquisition is not immune from antitrust suit since authority of Secretary of Agriculture to approve marketing arrangements is narrowly construed). Secondly, even if the S.E.C. approval of American Natural's acquisition of the Great Lakes stock prevented the courts from finding American Natural in violation of § 7 of the Clayton Act, neither statutory language nor policy would prohibit the Power Commission from relying on § 7 policy in determining the public interest. The Power Commission is obliged to take those steps most likely to accomplish an efficient allocation of natural gas resources and give consumers better service at a lower price. To find that prior approval by the S.E.C. precludes the Power Commission from relying on the general policy underlying § 7 would permit the limited exception to § 7 to not only frustrate the broader § 7 prohibition but also the broader policy of the Natural Gas Act.

The Commission's initial opinion stated that in final analysis the costs of the joint venture were less than the costs of petitioners' project:

> "* * * We are convinced * * that the alleged rate savings to Trans-Canada and Michigan Consolidated under [the Northern] proposal would be but short-run."

But in the opinion following the rehearing, the Commission stated:

> "* * * We are fully aware of the cost savings intrinsic in an exchange [*975] transaction and the benefits that may result to consumers. However, here we find, as set out in our original opinion, that Northern Natural will incur significant costs which in a rate case would appear allocable to Northern Transportation's proposed service to Trans-Canada and Michigan Consolidated. Such an allocation does not deny that savings might arise from the exchange transaction; [59] but it would alter the economics of the Northern proposal by increasing the costs allocable to Trans-Canada and Michigan Consolidated to the point where those costs would exceed the cost of the Great Lakes proposal. * * *"

