Samsung then capitulated to Qualcomm's patent license demands. Injung Lee testified that after those delays, "Vice President Park [110] said that we would expedite thing and to wrap up the negotiations. So that was the course of action we took as a result." Id. at 75:5-9. Thus, on November 4, 2009, Samsung and Qualcomm entered into an Amendment to Infrastructure and Subscriber Unit License and Technical Assistance Agreement, with an effective date of January 1, 2009 ("Samsung 2009 SULA Amendment"). ECF No. 1326 at 8; see JX0047.

d. 2013 Samsung Views of Qualcomm Royalty Rates

In 2013, Samsung continued to view Qualcomm's royalty rates as unreasonably high. Contemporaneous notes from June 2013 patent license negotiations reflect Samsung's view that "[i]f each holder of [*708] communication [SEPs] were to collect royalties on the price of handsets at Qualcomm's rate, this would result in [cumulative] royalty rates of at least 10% being levied on handset manufacturers." CX2642A-002. According to the Samsung notes, Samsung argued that a handset is an outdated royalty base: "The value of smart phones lies in various computer functions, the operating system, software, applications, and design, etc., which have nothing to do with Qualcomm's chipset IP. Therefore it is unfair for Qualcomm to levy royalties on the basis of the entire phone." CX2642A-003. However, [111] Samsung attributed Qualcomm's maintenance of high royalty rates to Qualcomm's chip monopoly: "The structure of high royalties is only possible because Qualcomm has a monopoly position in the chipset market and does not supply chips to manufacturers without licenses to Qualcomm standard essential patents, giving manufacturers no choice but to accept." Id.

According to Samsung's notes, Qualcomm was not interested in negotiation: "Qualcomm is confident about defending against Samsung's royalty terms, and there is no additional room for negotiation with regard to royalty reductions." Id. Samsung notes from later in the negotiation indicate that Samsung felt unable to challenge

Qualcomm's patent license terms: "Samsung has been practically unable to purchase chips from other chipset suppliers, and had no choice but to enter into a license agreement with Qualcomm despite the unreasonable terms in order to engage in its mobile phone business." CX2643A-002.

Samsung also argued to Qualcomm that because "all Qualcomm [SEPs] are implemented within a chip, royalties should be assessed on a chipset basis." CX2643A-002. However, Injung Lee testified that "Qualcomm does not — has not granted licenses [112] to chipset manufacturers." Lee Depo. 136:3-5. Qualcomm's refusal to license its SEPs to rivals is discussed in more detail later in this order.

e. 2018 Qualcomm Monetary Payment to Extinguish Samsung's Antitrust Claims and Silence Samsung, and Chip Incentive Funds

Alex Rogers (QTL President) testified that in 2016, Samsung and Qualcomm entered another patent license renegotiation, which resolved on January 30, 2018 in several agreements. Tr. at 1988:16-18. Among the agreements are: (1) the 2018 Amendment to Infrastructure and Subscriber Unit License and Technical Assistance Agreement, a patent license agreement, JX0122-003; (2) the Amended and Restated Strategic Relationship Agreement, which provides Samsung chip incentives on QCT chips, JX0122-035; (3) the Amendment to Component Supply Agreement, which amends the 2004 CSA, JX0122-043; (4) the 2018 Settlement Agreement, in which both Samsung and Qualcomm release legal claims, JX0122-049; and (5) a foundry agreement, the terms of which are not in evidence. Tr. at 2007:2-2008:6.

The 2018 patent license amendment does not alter Samsung's contractual running royalty rate. JX0122-028 to -029. However, Qualcomm provides Samsung a quarterly [113] credit in exchange for Samsung's cross-license of patents. JX0122-008. Under the Strategic Relationship Agreement, Qualcomm promises to pay Samsung—through December 31, 2023—chip incentive funds that accrue on Samsung's purchases of QCT chips, provided that Samsung purchases specific volumes of Qualcomm chips. JX0122-036 to -037. Specifically, Samsung's receipt of incentive funds is conditioned on Samsung's purchase from Qualcomm of 100% of Samsung's premium modem chips and at least [*709] [TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT] medium and high tier chips. JX0122-036 to - 037. This agreement further ensures that rivals cannot sell modem chips to Samsung.

Under the 2018 Settlement Agreement, Qualcomm paid Samsung $100 million to extinguish all of Samsung's antitrust claims and to silence Samsung. JX0122-054. In the Settlement Agreement, Samsung specifically releases claims based on the following:

> any claim of coercion or other similar claims regarding the negotiation, execution, or terms of this Settlement Agreement, the 2018 Amendment, the CMCPCA, and/or the Collaboration Agreement . . .
> any patent licensing conduct of Qualcomm or any of its Affiliates or (b) any conduct of Qualcomm or any of its Affiliates in the Private and Regulatory Actions . . . [and]
> any [114] claim that Qualcomm's Existing Practices violate any antitrust, competition, or similar laws of any state or territory of the United States (including federal law), Korea, or any other country or any jurisdiction, or any principle of common or civil law to similar effect including any claim based on or arising from findings or conclusions articulated in . . . (4) the ultimate decisions, settlement agreements or other dispositions of any of the cases brought against Qualcomm (or that contain counterclaims against Qualcomm) by the U.S. Federal Trade Commission ("U.S. F.T.C.") (FTC v. Qualcomm Incorporated, Case No. 5:17-CV-00220-LHK (N.D. Cal.)) . . .

Further, in the Settlement Agreement, Samsung agreed to withdraw from participation in this action and others:

> Samsung will promptly take all actions reasonably required to withdraw all pending or accepted applications for intervention, or any other forms of substantive participation (except for any participation, including discovery or deposition, to the extent required by law), in any of the Private or Regulatory Actions and any other proceedings involving claims that Qualcomm's Existing Practices violate antitrust, competition, [115] or similar laws. . . . [and]

> Samsung will withdraw from all existing Common Interest Agreements and all other similar agreements in which the general purpose is to share information and communications under some form of protection against disclosure (collectively, the "CIAs") between Samsung or any of its Affiliates and any third party that pertains to any of the Private and Regulatory Actions or any other proceedings or collaboration by third parties involving claims or potential claims that Qualcomm's Existing Practices violate antitrust, competition, contract, or similar laws or undertakings.

JX0122-056. Moreover, Samsung promised to make the following statement to the KFTC: "[I]n any statement Samsung provides to the KFTC regarding Qualcomm's compliance with the KFTC 2017 Orders, Samsung agrees that it shall confirm that it has resolved its disputes with Qualcomm and the resolution of such dispute satisfies Samsung's demands made under the KFTC 2017 Orders." JX0122-055.

In sum, Qualcomm has engaged in anticompetitive conduct toward Samsung by threatening Samsung's chip supply, reducing the royalty rate if Samsung purchased at least 85% of its chipsets from Qualcomm, delaying the delivery [116] of software, threatening to withhold technical support, offering Samsung chip incentive funds if Samsung purchased 100% of its premium chips from Qualcomm, and paying to extinguish [*710] Samsung's antitrust claims and to silence Samsung.

4. Huawei

Qualcomm engaged in anticompetitive conduct toward Huawei by giving a drastically reduced royalty rate if Huawei purchased 100% of its chips from Qualcomm, requiring Huawei to grant Qualcomm a royalty-free cross-license to Huawei's patents, threatening to cut off Huawei's chip supply on multiple occasions, and demanding unreasonably high royalty rates but refusing to provide patent claim charts.

Moreover, Nanfen Yu (Huawei Senior Legal Counsel) testified that Qualcomm's requirement of a separate patent license when selling chips is unique in the industry:

> Q: Are there other suppliers that have that practice [of requiring a separate license when selling modem chips]?
> A: Not that I'm aware.

a. 2001 Component Supply Agreement

Qualcomm and Huawei entered into a Contract for the License of Certain Technology for the Manufacturing and Sale of Certain CDMA Infrastructure Equipment on September 22, 2001. ECF No. 1326 at 5. Qualcomm and Huawei [117] then entered into a component supply agreement effective November 13, 2001. CX1006-002.

The 2001 component supply agreement provides that Qualcomm's sale of modem chips to Huawei does not exhaust Qualcomm's intellectual property rights: "The sale of Products to Manufacturer does not convey to Manufacturer or Trade Corporation title to any embedded software or any intellectual property rights in such Products." CX1006-006. As with other Qualcomm supply agreements, Qualcomm's component supply agreement with Huawei provides that Qualcomm can terminate the supply agreement if Huawei becomes unlicensed: "QCTAP [QCT's Asia Pacific division] may terminate this Contract if Manufacturer is in default under the License Agreement." CX1006-007. Nanfen Yu (Huawei Senior Legal Counsel) testified that although Huawei asked to modify that termination provision, "Qualcomm refused Huawei's request." Yu Depo. 160:24-162:1.

b. 2003 and 2004 Chip Supply Leverage

Qualcomm also used its chip supply leverage to obtain substantial modem chip purchase commitments from Huawei. On May 29, 2003, Huawei and Qualcomm entered into a Contract between Qualcomm Incorporated and Huawei Technologies Co. Ltd. for the License [118] of Certain Technology for the Manufacturing and Sale of Certain CDMA Subscriber Units, with an effective date of May 29, 2003 ("2003 CDMA SULA"). ECF No. 1326 at 5; JX0022. In the 2003 CDMA SULA, Huawei agreed to purchase 100% of its CDMA chips for handsets sold in China from Qualcomm in exchange for a reduced royalty rate of 2.65%. JX0022-010, -012. However, if Huawei purchased chips from another supplier, or if Huawei sold handsets outside of China, Huawei owed a 5-7% royalty rate on those handsets. JX0022-010.

Qualcomm also required Huawei to provide Qualcomm royalty-free licenses to Huawei's patents. Nanfen Yu (Huawei Senior Legal Counsel) testified that QTL's patent licenses with Huawei all require Huawei to grant QCT royalty-free cross-licenses to all of Huawei's SEPs, which Yu testified "could be of great value if we license out by ourselves. But through the royalty free grant back license, we're just giving it out to Qualcomm and other handset manufacturers for free." Yu Depo. 195:23-196:13. For example, in the 2003 CDMA SULA, Huawei granted "QUALCOMM a worldwide, nontransferable, non-exclusive, [*711] irrevocable and royalty free license . . . to use LICENSEE's Intellectual Property" [119] to make modem chips. JX0022-016.

Qualcomm and Huawei entered into a Memorandum of Understanding ("Huawei MOU"), dated July 21, 2004. ECF No. 1326 at 5. The MOU agreement required Huawei to pay the royalty rates in the 2003 CDMA SULA on Huawei's sales of WCDMA handsets. JX0027-005.

Internally, Qualcomm understood that Qualcomm's chip supply leverage led Huawei to sign the MOU on Qualcomm's standard patent license terms. In a September 2004 email thread forwarded to Steve Altman (later Qualcomm President), Qualcomm employee Jing Wang wrote: "[I]f we could not resolve these issues timely, Huawei could be lured to use EMP's UMTS chip and we could lose a huge leverage (ie, MSM 6250 chip supply) in pushing Huawei to sign the definitive agreement with us." CX7886-001 (emphasis added). In a later email in the thread, Jing Wang wrote, "[t]he reason Huawei signed interim agreement on WCDMA IPR with QC two months ago on standard terms was . . . because of their hope to quickly develop UMTS terminals based on our MSM 6250 in order to sell to VF, H3G, Sunday and later China Mobile [all mobile carriers]." CX7886-001. Steve Altman (later Qualcomm President) forwarded the email to another Qualcomm employee [120] and wrote, "Jing is exactly right." Id. At trial, Steve Altman conceded that he was the "architect" of Qualcomm's licensing program and practices. Tr. at 177:21-25.

c. 2013 Chip Supply Threats

In 2013, Qualcomm and Huawei engaged in negotiations over renewing Huawei's 2003 CDMA SULA, which was slated to expire May 29, 2013. JX0022-007.

Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) threatened Huawei's chip supply from the outset of the negotiations. In a May 1, 2013 email, Reifschneider informed Xuxin Cheng (Huawei) that "if the C2K SULA expires and has not been replaced by a new patent license agreement covering C2K products, there will be issues with Huawei's ability to continue to use C2K chipsets or QMCi's software, issues which I am sure both our companies would like to avoid." CX1000-004.

On May 1, 2013, Cheng replied that Huawei wished to reduce the royalty rate it paid Qualcomm "because the current situation is significantly different from ten years ago, such as the fact that many essential patents for C2K [CDMA] have expired or will expire in the coming 3-5 years." CX1000-002.

Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) continued to threaten [121] Huawei's chip supply. In a May 8, 2013 email to Cheng and other Huawei negotiators, Reifschneider listed chip supply among the "topics that Qualcomm would like to discuss at our meeting this week." CX1000-001. Reifschneider wrote that if Huawei renewed the patent license, Huawei would not face any chip supply issues: "Ways to avoid any disruption in chipset supply at the end of this month without creating undue risk for either party (the simplest being for Huawei to exercise its right to renew the C2K license agreement under which it has been operating successfully for the last ten years)." Id.

Nanfen Yu (Huawei Senior Legal Counsel) testified that at the May 10, 2013 meeting between Huawei and Qualcomm, at which she was present, Reifschneider made oral threats to cut off Huawei's chip supply:

> Q: And subsequent to this, did you hear him say it again orally?

[*712] A: Yes.

Q: Did you believe it was just posturing?

A: No.

Yu Depo. 140:23-141:12. Yu testified that specifically, "Eric make it very clear that we have to sign a license agreement in some form. And we didn't see that there's any other possible ways to avoid the disruption of the chipset supply." Id. at 69:12-15.

Qualcomm's notes from [122] the May 10, 2013 meeting with Huawei also reflect Reifschneider's threats to Huawei: "Not to mention the chip supply problem. Letting the agreement expire takes flexibility away from both of us. It puts us both in a worse spot. Renewing does not put you in a worse negotiating position; it puts you in a better one." CX6528-002.

In his own notes from the 2013 Huawei negotiations, Eric Reifschneider observed that Qualcomm could not negotiate on the contractual royalty rates, but could negotiate on other points: "We explained why we have little flexibility with the royalty rates given the established value of our patent portfolio and indicated our willingness to consider other ways to have a mutual exchange of value such as a patent transfer" or a chip incentive fund. CX5211-002 to -003.

Other Qualcomm executives discussed using chip supply threats to get Huawei to renew its patent license. These discussions show that QTL, Qualcomm's licensing division, drove the chip supply threats. On May 20, 2013, Derek Aberle (QTL President) told Steve Mollenkopf (Qualcomm President) in an email that "I suggest you make the following points to Huawei's CEO." CX5231-001. Among those points was threatening [123] to cut off chip supply: "[I]f they don't extend we will have issues re continued chip supply on C2K. Note that Huawei has been claiming patent exhaustion based on their purchase of chips from QC despite the terms of our supply agreement." CX5231-001. Steve Mollenkopf replied, "I got it. Thanks." Id.

Only a week later, on May 27, 2013, Qualcomm and Huawei entered into an Amendment to Subscriber Unit License Agreement. ECF No. 1326 at 5. Nanfen Yu (Huawei Senior Legal Counsel) testified that although Huawei viewed Qualcomm's royalty rates as high, Huawei signed the license agreement because Huawei had "[n]o choice for the CDMA chipset supply." Yu Depo. 143:9-21. Yu testified that "Qualcomm was essentially the only supplier for CDMA chips in the market," such that "Qualcomm's royalty rate is nonnegotiable." Id. at 143:5-6, 149:19-21.

d. 2014 Chip Supply Leverage

On December 15, 2014, Huawei and Qualcomm entered an Amendment to Subscriber Unit License Agreement, with an effective date of July 1, 2014, amending the Contract for the License of Certain Technology for the Manufacturing and Sale of Certain CDMA Subscriber Units, dated May 29, 2003. ECF No. 1326 at 5. On December 15, 2014, Huawei [124] and Qualcomm entered a Subscriber Unit License Agreement ("2014 SULA"), with an effective date of July 1, 2014. ECF No. 1326 at 5; JX0098. The 2014 SULA requires Huawei to pay a 5% running royalty rate on devices containing WCDMA technology and a 3.5% running royalty rate on devices containing LTE technology, and includes a royalty cap of [TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT]. JX0098-011, -016.

Nanfen Yu (Huawei Senior Legal Counsel) testified that the need for chip supply left Huawei with little room to negotiate those royalty rates:

Q: Why do you say 'we had no choice'?

[*713] A: Firstly, there were dependency and need from the business unit for us to sign to maintain license agreement for them to be able to obtain chipsets from Qualcomm. . . . Qualcomm wouldn't agree to sign any agreement if we don't include LTE license here.

Yu Depo. 98:4-14.

e. 2016 Huawei Royalty Complaints

In June 2016, Huawei sent Qualcomm a proposal to renegotiate the royalty rates due under the Huawei SULA, which Fabian Gonell (QTL Legal Counsel and Senior Vice President, Licensing Strategy) received. CX1101-001. In the proposal, Huawei argued that Qualcomm's royalty rates are unreasonably high because (1) Qualcomm ties its high [125] 3G royalty rates to 4G products in contradiction of industry practice; (2) Qualcomm receives more than 50% of the accumulated royalty rate in the industry even though it contributed only 10% of WCDMA and LTE patents; (3) many of Qualcomm's CDMA patents have expired; and (4) Qualcomm charges its royalty rates on the price of a whole handset when Qualcomm's patents do not contribute to the whole handset's value. Specifically, Huawei stated:

> Qualcomm unreasonably ties its high 3G rates on 4G multimode products
> • Despite the fact that 3G is becoming a backup technology with a significant number of 3G patents being expired, Qualcomm is charging 4G multimode products on 3G rates. This is not consistent with industry practice where patent holders charge royalty at the rate of the latest technology and Qualcomm is trying to extend the benefits gained in 3G era based on its dominant position in chipset market and unique business model bundling chipset supply and patent license.
> Qualcomm's royalty rates are not consistent with its contribution to standards
> • Qualcomm's proportion of declared essential patents in both WCDMA and LTE are only around 10%, but its royalty rate is more than 50% of the [126] accumulated royalty rate in the industry
> • Huawei has entered into license agreements with major patent holders in the industry, but the royalty Huawei paid to Qualcomm each year consists of 80-90% of the total royalty we paid for terminal products, which well demonstrates that Qualcomm's royalty rate is excessively higher than other major patent holders in the industry
> The value of Qualcomm's WCDMA SEP portfolio has declined significantly but Qualcomm hasn't adjusted its WCDMA royalty rate accordingly
> • A significant number of Qualcomm's WCDMA patents are expired or expiring, particularly those early fundamental patents.
> Qualcomm's royalty model does not reflect the real value contributed by patent technology to handset
> • It is not reasonable to collect royalty on the selling price of the whole handset as Qualcomm's essential patents are mostly implemented by chipset.

CX1101-002 to -003 (emphases in original).

Nanfen Yu (Huawei Senior Legal Counsel) testified that despite Qualcomm's high rates, Qualcomm has never provided patent claim charts to Huawei, but that Nokia, Ericsson, and Siemens all have. Yu [*714] Depo. 216:4-217:2. Specifically, as to Qualcomm, Yu testified:

> Q: [I]n all of your negotiations [127] with Qualcomm throughout the course of your career, has Qualcomm ever provided claim charts for its patents?
> A: No.

Id. at 216:4-8. Yu testified that Huawei has not sued Qualcomm to determine a FRAND royalty rate because Qualcomm could cut off Huawei's chip supply: "[O]ne concern would be the chipset supply, and the other is that we have the existing licensing agreements in place." Id. at 158:7-9.

Yu testified that although Huawei recently has withheld royalty payments from Qualcomm during license renegotiations, Qualcomm has continued to supply chips to Huawei because, according to Yu, "the NDRC [Chinese antitrust agency] decision and KFTC [Korean Fair Trade Commission] decision requires that Qualcomm does not bundle the chipset into the international [sic] property rights license." Yu Depo. 47:17-21; 70:20-71:8.

In sum, Qualcomm engaged in anticompetitive conduct toward Huawei by giving a drastically reduced royalty rate if Huawei purchased 100% of its chips from Qualcomm, requiring Huawei to grant Qualcomm a royalty-free cross-license to Huawei's patents, threatening to cut off Huawei's chip supply on multiple occasions, and demanding unreasonably high royalty rates but refusing to [128] provide patent claim charts.

5. Motorola

Qualcomm engaged in anticompetitive conduct toward Motorola by offering a significantly reduced effective royalty rate if Motorola purchased 100% of its chips from Qualcomm and threatening to cut off Motorola's chip supply.

Moreover, Todd Madderom (Motorola Director of Procurement) testified that in his 15 years in procurement, no other company has asked him to take a separate patent license to buy components:

> Q: And in your experience aside from your experience with Qualcomm, have you ever been required to separately take a license from a component supplier in order to procure commercial quantities from that component supplier?
> A: No, this is a unique situation. I've never run across this prior.

Madderom Depo. 162:24-163:10. Madderom also testified that Qualcomm's royalty rates are vastly higher than those Motorola pays other patent licensors: "In our experience we've never seen such a significant licensing fee tied to any other IP we license." Madderom Depo. 217:24-218:2.

a. 2005 Chip Incentive Funds

On September 26, 1990, Qualcomm entered a license agreement with Motorola, which had an effective date of September 26, 1990. ECF No. 1326 at 6. Under [129] that patent license agreement, Qualcomm charged a 4% running royalty rate on handset sales and no royalties on chipset sales. Tr. at 216:20-217:3; JX0003-005. As relevant here, Qualcomm and Motorola executed a Second Amendment to the Agreement to Amend the Patent License Agreement and Technology License Agreement and Software License Agreement, with an effective date of April 11, 2003. ECF No. 1326 at 6.

In May 2005, as Motorola and Qualcomm were negotiating a WCDMA patent license, Paul Jacobs (Qualcomm CEO) wrote to Edward Zander (Motorola CEO) that Qualcomm could not budge on its contractual royalty rates, but could offer other consideration: "[I]t is difficult for us to reduce Motorola's royalties given the impact that it could have on other license [*715] agreements. We are prepared, however, to offer Motorola a marketing incentive payment to help defray a portion of Motorola's expenses incurred in selling WCDMA handsets in Europe." CX7041-002. Motorola and Qualcomm then reached a patent license amendment. An October 2006 presentation to the Qualcomm Board of Directors offered an "Executive Summary" of the amendment's benefits, including "Reduced likelihood of litigation with Motorola." CX7042-005.

b. [130] 2015 Chip Supply Threats

At trial and at his March 12, 2018 deposition, Cristiano Amon (Qualcomm President) testified that he had never been informed of Qualcomm threatening to cut off chip supply:

> Q: You were asked, 'You have never been informed that QTL threatened to cease supplying chipsets to a customer because of a licensing dispute; is that right?' You answered 'That is correct.' That was a true statement when you said it?
> A: That is correct.

Tr. at 548:3-17 (citing Amon Depo. 50:24-51:2).

However, Amon's own handwritten notes from 2015 license negotiations with Motorola's President Rick Osterloh, entitled " 12-9-15-Rick & Team-Motorola," state: "(1) Licensing > Eric [Reifschneider, QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager] constantly threatening to cut off chip supply." CX7024-001. Thus, despite Amon's own handwriting acknowledging 2015 chip supply threats, Amon testified under oath at his deposition and trial that he was unaware of QTL threats to cut off chip supply.

c. 2016 Chip Incentive Fund and Chip Supply Leverage

In 2016, Motorola and Qualcomm again entered patent license negotiations. An October 2016 internal Motorola presentation states that Qualcomm offered Motorola [131] a [TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT] chip rebate on purchases of Qualcomm modem chips. CX2060-020. Motorola analyzed Qualcomm's proposal on another slide, and concluded that only if Motorola purchased 100% of its modem chips from Qualcomm would Motorola be able to achieve a 3.8% effective royalty rate. CX2060-021.

Todd Madderom (Motorola Director of Procurement) testified that Qualcomm's royalty rates are vastly higher than those Motorola pays other licensors: "In our experience we've never seen such a significant licensing fee tied to any other IP we license." Madderom Depo. 217:24-218:2. A 2015 internal Motorola presentation titled "Motorola Qualcomm Briefing" includes Motorola's talking points for a meeting with Qualcomm, and reflects the same concern. CX2123-003. Under the header "Relationship Struggles," the slide states "Licensing fees are inflated and cost prohibitive to technological advances." Id. Todd Madderom testified that the slide reflects that Qualcomm's royalty rates are disproportionate: "I think it's perhaps a relative assessment of the millions of dollars we spend in licensing with Qualcomm is disproportionate to anyone else in the world that we would pay licensing fees [132] to." Madderom Depo. 218:2-5.

Todd Madderom testified that if Motorola did not have to pay Qualcomm's inflated patent license fees, Motorola could invest those funds in better features for consumers: "[W]e believe that the millions of dollars that we pay to royalty could be better — could be invested to perhaps develop our own technological advances." Id. at 218:24-219:3.

Madderom testified that Motorola has felt constrained from challenging Qualcomm's royalty rates because Qualcomm has provided the only CDMA and premium [*716] LTE modem chip solutions: "For 2013 the only company that offered an LTE solution that was viable was Qualcomm." Madderom Depo. 134:18-19. Madderom also testified that Qualcomm was Motorola's only CDMA modem chip option: "So there was a VIA Technologies in the market. They had CDMA IP. We didn't feel it was capable or competitive, and so we were sole sourced to Qualcomm." Id. at 157:21-23.

Any chip supply disruption would be catastrophic for an OEM, Madderom testified: "If we are unable to source the modem, we are unable to ship the handset. It's a direct correlation. No modem supply, no phone supply to our customer." Madderom Depo. 147:25-148:3. Further, "[i]t takes many [133] months of engineering work to design in a replacement solution, if there is even a viable one on the market that supports the need." Id. at 147:25-148:11.

Madderom testified that without a chip supply alternative, Motorola is effectively powerless to contest Qualcomm's royalty rates:

> Q: How, if at all, would moving away from Qualcomm chipsets better position Motorola to have a fight with Qualcomm about Qualcomm's royalties?
> A: Qualcomm would not be able to cut off our supply in that fight. It's as simple as that. We could create a fight, and we feel like our supply wouldn't be threatened.

Id. at 223:25-224:7.

In sum, Qualcomm engaged in anticompetitive conduct toward Motorola by offering a significantly reduced effective royalty rate if Motorola purchased 100% of its chips from Qualcomm and threatening to cut off Motorola's chip supply.

6. Lenovo

Qualcomm has engaged in anticompetitive conduct toward Lenovo by threatening to cut off Lenovo's chip supply; threatening that even Qualcomm's rival MediaTek cannot sell chips to Lenovo if Lenovo becomes unlicensed with Qualcomm; demanding unreasonably high royalty rates without providing technical or legal information about Qualcomm's patents; and [134] offering chip incentive funds if Lenovo committed to purchasing 30-50 million Qualcomm chips.

On June 30, 2003, Qualcomm and Legend Mobile Communication Technology Ltd. ("Legend") executed a Contract between Qualcomm Incorporated and Legend Mobile Communication Technology Ltd. for the License of Certain Technology for the Manufacturing and Sale of Certain CDMA Subscriber Units. ECF No. 1326 at 5-6. Lenovo is a successor in interest to Legend. Id. at 6. On March 28, 2007, Qualcomm and Lenovo executed an Amendment to Contract between Qualcomm Incorporated and Lenovo Mobile Communication Technology Ltd. for the License of Certain Technology for the Manufacturing and Sale of Certain CDMA Subscriber Units. ECF No. 1326 at 6.

a. 2013 Qualcomm "Carrots and Sticks" Strategy

Ira Blumberg (Lenovo Vice President of Intellectual Property) testified that during 2013 renegotiations of the Lenovo patent license agreement, Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) first threatened to cut off Lenovo's chip supply: "At that initial meeting, we explained that we were contemplating terminating the license through whatever mechanism we thought was applicable. And Mr. Reifschneider was very [135] calm about it, and said that we should feel free to do that, but if we did, we would no longer be able to purchase Qualcomm chips." Blumberg Depo. 157:7-14. Blumberg heard from a negotiating colleague that "that same assertion was repeated [*717] numerous times during the negotiation of these amendments by the licensing staff at Qualcomm." Id. at 158:1-4.

Reifschneider's threats were consistent with tactics articulated in a March 24, 2013 QTL slide deck titled "Lenovo 4G Strategy." CX5210-001. One slide in the presentation was headlined "Carrots and Sticks," with a table below including one column for "Carrots" and one column for "Sticks." CX5210-011. Under "Carrots," Qualcomm listed chip incentives, like "Offer Strategic Fund" and "Offer Chip Rebate." Id. Under "Sticks," Qualcomm listed cutting off Lenovo's chip supply: "Product hold on Chip shipments. QMC has 478.5K MSMs on backlog scheduled to ship by 4/9/13." Id.

Going into those 2013 patent license negotiations, Lenovo viewed Qualcomm's royalty rates as unreasonably high in comparison to the rates of other SEP licensors. Ira Blumberg testified that Qualcomm's royalty rates "don't take into account changes in the size of their portfolio [136] but fix the royalty rates, and fix those royalty rates at a level higher than most of the other licensors." Blumberg Depo. 30:22-21:2. Blumberg testified that although "I don't know what all other licensors in the field charge, . . . the ones that I do know of are — are lower," including Nokia, Ericsson, and Interdigital. Id. at 31:3-12.

Blumberg also testified that he viewed it as a FRAND violation for a modem chip supplier to refuse to license other modem chip suppliers: "My interpretation of FRAND obligations does suggest that the licensor has an obligation to license any company that requests a license, whether it is a chip company, a device company, or anything in between." Id. at 132:19-24.

Despite Lenovo's disagreement with Qualcomm's royalty rates, Ira Blumberg (Lenovo Vice President of Intellectual Property) testified that Lenovo was hamstrung by Qualcomm's chip supply leverage:

> My understanding from our business colleagues was that least with respect to high-end phones, at the time that we're talking about, Qualcomm had the best chipset available and that it would be difficult to convince > consumers and carriers to spend for a high-end phone if it did not have the — the features, [137] functions, and — and performance that the Qualcomm chip provided.

Blumberg Depo. 71:19-72:1. Further, "[i]n the absence of the ability to terminate the license, we don't feel we have much negotiating power to set new terms with Qualcomm." Id. at 156:8-11. A contemporaneous internal Lenovo presentation titled "Qualcomm Update" reflects the same concern, with text on one slide stating: "QC says they want to be partners but we see no sign of reducing royalties without a fight due to QC monopoly power." CX2121-005.

Blumberg also testified that litigation to challenge Qualcomm's royalty rate was not an option due to Qualcomm's chip supply leverage: "[T]he quickest legal resolution to that — at least in the US — you're looking at months and months, if not a year or more, without supply, which would be, if not fatal, then nearly fatal to almost any company in this business." Blumberg Depo. 189:13-18. As such, Blumberg testified that Qualcomm did not share any technical information about its patents: "[I]n the absence of the ability to cut off supply, we might have gone through that same kind of arrangement where Qualcomm would have been incented to give us technical and legal presentations [138] to explain why it would be a bad idea to terminate . . . [b]ut we never got to those discussions because Qualcomm didn't feel they needed to." Id. at 190:24-191:7.

[*718] Thus, shortly after Eric Reifschneider's (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) chip supply threats, Lenovo and Qualcomm agreed to a new patent license agreement. On June 27, 2013, Qualcomm and Lenovo executed an Amendment to Subscriber Unit License Agreement, with an effective date of June 28, 2013. ECF No. 1326 at 6. The 2013 CDMA SULA amendment preserved the royalty rate Lenovo pays to Qualcomm. JX0087-001.

b. 2013 Chip Incentive Fund Offer

Later in 2013, during LTE patent license negotiations, Qualcomm offered Lenovo substantial chip incentive funds, although Lenovo remained concerned about Qualcomm's ability to cut off chip supply.

In a November 19, 2013 email, Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) proposed that Qualcomm would rebate Lenovo $5 for every Qualcomm modem chip Lenovo purchased, up to a total of $180 million. CX6491-002. The chip incentive fund carried two conditions, according to Reifschneider's email. Lenovo would have to "[e]nter into a 4G SULA . . . with Qualcomm that [139] is generally on Qualcomm's standard terms including royalties of 4% of the net selling price" and "[c]ommit to purchase at least 30M Snapdragon chips from QTI during the first 18 months . . . and at least 50M Snapdragon chips from QTI during the last 12 months." CX6491-003 (emphases removed). QTI ("Qualcomm Technologies, Inc.") is the Qualcomm subsidiary that operates QCT.

Ira Blumberg (Lenovo Vice President of Intellectual Property) testified that the chip incentive fund would lower Lenovo's total cost of doing business with Qualcomm, but not reduce the royalty rate Lenovo paid whenever Lenovo purchased Qualcomm's rivals' chips:

> [I]n general, the way that Christian, who is typically the negotiator on the financial terms, would discuss it with Qualcomm was effectively a total cost of using Qualcomm: Cost of chips, cost of royalties, and so on. And so Qualcomm was basically saying, 'Well, we can address the total cost by doing things that will make it effectively less expensive.'

Blumberg Depo. 218:1-10.

During the negotiations, Lenovo worried about chip supply. On November 22, 2013, Ira Blumberg (Lenovo Vice President of Intellectual Property) wrote to other Lenovo executives that even [140] though Lenovo's strongest leverage in negotiations was to terminate the patent license, doing so could threaten Lenovo's chip supply from both Qualcomm and MediaTek: "Qualcomm has threatened to stop selling its chips to Lenovo if Lenovo terminates its license. Further, Qualcomm has threatened to force its chip licensees (including MediaTek) to stop selling mobile phone chips to Lenovo if Lenovo terminates its license." CX2079-004. As discussed below in the section on Qualcomm's refusal to license rivals, Qualcomm and MediaTek had entered an agreement that restricted MediaTek to selling modem chips only to Qualcomm licensees.

In later emails, Blumberg doubled down on the existential threat posed by a loss of chip supply: "[W]hat would Lenovo do if Qualcomm and/or Mediatek experienced a natural disaster that prevented it from delivering chips for 3† months? The legal situation Lenovo is facing is quite similar as there is risk that Lenovo could lose its supply of chips for a substantial period of time." CX2079-002. However, in December 20, 2013, Yang Chu (Lenovo) confirmed in an email to Blumberg that MediaTek "committed to ensure the supply for Lenovo even if we did not sign off the [141] contract with Qualcomm." CX2079-001. Ultimately, [*719] Lenovo did not accept Qualcomm's chip incentive offer. Blumberg Depo. 180:9-14.

c. 2015 Chip Supply Threats

China's National Development and Reform Commission ("NDRC"), the government antitrust agency, investigated Qualcomm's patent licensing practices and instituted a rectification plan that altered the terms for Qualcomm's China patent licenses. After the NDRC rectification plan, Qualcomm and Lenovo entered a negotiation regarding Lenovo's China patent license. In a December 16, 2015 email forwarded by Sanjay Vanjani (Lenovo Chief Financial Officer), Scott Offer (Lenovo) reported that Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) had again threatened Lenovo's chip supply: "Ira [Blumberg] made a proposal which Eric did not reject out of hand. On that call, Eric once more made another threat about continued chip supply if we do not have a license. Action: David/Heather to research what the NDRC rectification plan says about continued supply." CX2093-002. Two months after Reifschneider's threat, on February 17, 2016, Qualcomm and Lenovo entered a Chinese Patent License Agreement. QX9266-391.

In sum, Qualcomm has engaged [142] in anticompetitive conduct toward Lenovo by threatening to cut off Lenovo's chip supply; threatening that even Qualcomm's rival MediaTek cannot sell chips to Lenovo if Lenovo becomes unlicensed with Qualcomm; demanding unreasonably high royalty rates without providing technical or legal information about Qualcomm's patents; and offering chip incentive funds if Lenovo committed to purchasing 30-50 million Qualcomm chips.

7. BlackBerry

Qualcomm engaged in anticompetitive conduct toward BlackBerry by requiring BlackBerry to sign a patent license agreement before assuring BlackBerry's supply of modem chips and by providing BlackBerry chip incentive funds that effectively required BlackBerry to purchase Qualcomm modem chips exclusively.

John Grubbs (BlackBerry Senior Director of Intellectual Property Transactions) testified that Qualcomm's requirement of a license in order to buy chips is unique in the industry:

> Q: Do any other suppliers of BlackBerry require BlackBerry to acquire a patent license in order to purchase components from that supplier?
> A: No, not to my knowledge.
> Q: Do any of BlackBerry's suppliers own standard essential patents that breed [sic] on the products that they are selling [143] to BlackBerry?
> A: Historically when we were producing devices, yes, there were some of our suppliers that owned standard essential patents and — and we did not have a patent license agreement in place with those suppliers.

Grubbs Depo. 268:15-269:5.

On March 22, 2000, Qualcomm entered a patent license agreement with Research In Motion Limited ("RIM"), a corporate predecessor of BlackBerry, effective March 22, 2000. ECF No. 1326 at 4-5. On March 21, 2001, Qualcomm entered a patent license agreement amendment with RIM, effective March 21, 2001 ("2001 SULA"). ECF No. 1326 at 5.

a. 2010-2011 Chip Supply Leverage

BlackBerry and Qualcomm further amended the March 22, 2000 SULA in an agreement entered on January 26, 2011, with a retroactive effective date of October 1, 2010 ("2010 SULA"). ECF No. 1326 at 5; JX0094-002.

[*720] John Grubbs (BlackBerry Senior Director of Intellectual Property Transactions), who was involved in negotiations with Qualcomm, testified that Qualcomm required BlackBerry to sign a patent license before Qualcomm would sell BlackBerry premium LTE modem chips: "[A]t that point we had no license for LTE, and from what — from what I recall, we were told that we had to get a license [144] before they would supply us with LTE chipsets." Grubbs Depo. 225:9-13.

Grubbs testified that in 2010, BlackBerry and Qualcomm were engaged in a dispute over the existing 2001 SULA: "[T]here was a dispute between BlackBerry and Qualcomm over . . . the scope of whether the [2001] license agreement covered UMTS-only devices." Id. at 231:14-16. UMTS is a 3G standard. ECF No. 1326 at 3. As a result, Grubbs testified that BlackBerry was very concerned that Qualcomm could withhold BlackBerry's chips during the dispute:

> BlackBerry was very concerned that Qualcomm — if BlackBerry pushed that issue too far, that Qualcomm could just shut down supply and walk off, and BlackBerry had no contractual provisions or contractual agreements that would allow them to stop — to not do that or — or to where we could go sue for damages.

Grubbs Depo. 231:17-25. BlackBerry sought a component supply agreement to ensure supply, which Qualcomm conditioned on resolving the SULA, per a June 2010 email Derek Aberle (QTL President) wrote to Larry Conlee (BlackBerry): "As part of this overall deal, we will need to resolve our current disagreement regarding the SULA." CX3264-001.

The supply agreement bolstered Qualcomm's [145] no license, no chips practice, though. Qualcomm could terminate the supply agreement if BlackBerry defaulted on its patent license agreement: "QUALCOMM shall have the right to terminate this Agreement and/or to cancel or hold any and/or all orders placed by Buyer . . . if . . . Buyer is in default under the License Agreement." JX0093-121.

Under the 2010 SULA, BlackBerry paid Qualcomm a [TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT] advance fee and a [TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT] per handset royalty payment on each CDMA or WCDMA handset BlackBerry sold. JX0094-019, -027.

John Grubbs (BlackBerry Senior Director of Intellectual Property Transactions) testified that the royalty rates BlackBerry paid Qualcomm were "significantly higher than any other SEP rate [BlackBerry] paid to anybody else in the industry." Grubbs Depo. 236:5-7. However, Grubbs testified that BlackBerry felt unable to challenge Qualcomm's royalty rate without an assurance of chip supply: "I mean, at that point we had no license for LTE, and from what — from what I recall, we were told that we had to get a license before they would supply us with LTE chipsets." Grubbs Depo. 225:9-13.

Grubbs testified that he did not believe Qualcomm's 5% royalty [146] rate was FRAND because many of Qualcomm's CDMA patents had expired: "So at some point you get to the point where an entity is paying 5 percent for the CDMA patents when there may not be but just a handful of CDMA patents left. So that — in that respect, it — it becomes a not — it violates FRAND." Grubbs Depo. 235:10-15.

Grubbs also testified that BlackBerry considers the value of any patent cross-license from the licensee when setting royalty rates: "All I can say is based on what BlackBerry has done, and I know that we would take into account the value of any cross-license coming back — if there was any significant value there — before we [*721] would price our license." Grubbs Depo. 94:23-95:2.

However, because BlackBerry needed Qualcomm's CDMA and premium LTE modem chips, BlackBerry was unable to challenge Qualcomm's royalty rates, according to Grubbs: "[I]f BlackBerry tried to assert that the license terms were not FRAND, then that — I mean, that's been our concern, that we can't do that because of the supply issue." Id. at 240:25-241:3. When asked if BlackBerry had alternative suppliers for CDMA modem chips, Grubbs testified that there were "[n]ot viable alternatives, no." Id. at 213:23-214:8. [147] Thus, if Qualcomm shut off BlackBerry's CDMA chip supply, Grubbs testified that "30 percent of our device sales would have gone away overnight if we couldn't have supplied CDMA devices." Id. at 239:11-14.

BlackBerry was also concerned that Qualcomm could cut off engineering support, which would functionally cut off chip supply: "[I]f we were getting aggressive in terms of the license side, [then] Qualcomm could alter their engineering support services to us, which would have the net effect, or very close to it, of stopping our supply of chipsets." Id. at 240:7-20.

b. 2010-2011 Chip Incentive Funds

Qualcomm also gave BlackBerry [TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT] million in chip incentive funds to induce BlackBerry to sign the 2010 SULA. John Grubbs (BlackBerry Senior Director of Intellectual Property Transactions) agreed that the "strategic incentive[s] . . . were contingent on BlackBerry resolving its royalty dispute with Qualcomm." Grubbs Depo. 248:9-15.

The chip incentives effectively required BlackBerry to buy modem chips exclusively from Qualcomm. Derek Aberle's (QTL President) June 2010 proposal stated that BlackBerry could receive the chip incentives only if BlackBerry purchased a majority [148] of its modem chips from Qualcomm: "Savings predicated on achieving 50% of RIM UMTS volume by Q4'11." CX3264-005. BlackBerry received the incentives as rebates on Qualcomm modem chips, according to Grubbs' contemporaneous notes: "Incentive amount is: $1.75 per chip for the 7500A and 7600 chips [and] $2.75 per chip for the 7630 and 8655 chips." CX3255-002.

Thus, John Grubbs testified that because the chip incentives accrued only on purchases of Qualcomm chips and did not reduce BlackBerry's actual royalty burden, the chip incentives reduced the total cost of Qualcomm chips but not of Qualcomm's rivals' chips:

> BlackBerry is going to pay the royalty, regardless of whether it buys the chip from Qualcomm or Marvell. If — if Qualcomm agreed to reduce the royalty, then BlackBerry could buy the chips from Qualcomm or Marvell and still get the benefit of that reduced price. If Qualcomm reduces the chip cost, then we can only go to one person in order to take advantage of that and that's Qualcomm. So we can't go to Marvell and take advantage of a reduction in chip price unless they're going to get this reduction too.

Grubbs Depo. 259:13-25. Grubbs testified that the chip incentives reduced BlackBerry's [149] effective royalty rate on Qualcomm chips to 4.37%. Id. at 259:6-11.

Grubbs testified that these chip incentives contributed to BlackBerry shifting its modem chip purchases from Marvell to Qualcomm:

> [Marvell] apparently — or from what I — what I understand were about two years behind on LTE development. And in addition, we — we also switched to Qualcomm because of a — or at least one of them — the factors that didn't — didn't hurt was the fact that we had a large [*722] incentive to divert our UMTS business to Qualcomm.

Id. at 111:1-7.

In sum, Qualcomm engaged in anticompetitive conduct toward BlackBerry by conditioning chip supply assurances on BlackBerry signing a Qualcomm patent license agreement and by paying BlackBerry chip incentive funds that functionally required BlackBerry to buy Qualcomm modem chips, to the exclusion of rivals' modem chips.

8. Curitel

Qualcomm engaged in anticompetitive conduct toward the OEM Curitel by cutting off Curitel's chip supply.

In 2001, during patent license negotiations with Curitel, Marv Blecker (QTL Senior Vice President) recommended in an email to Steve Altman (Qualcomm lawyer and later Qualcomm President) and Derek Aberle (Qualcomm lawyer and later Qualcomm [150] President) that Qualcomm threaten Curitel's chip supply to end license negotiations: "I think we need to explicitly threaten to (and actually) cut off ASIC shipments if they do not accept our final proposal (this is our final proposal); after all, they are not licensed and we have moved considerably from our initial position." CX8286-001. Twenty minutes later, Jim Lederer (later QCT Executive Vice President and General Manager) replied that QCT had cut off supply: "We have stopped shipments until resolution of these terms . . . ." CX8286-001.

In January 2002, Marv Blecker told Curitel officials in an email, on which Derek Aberle (Qualcomm lawyer and later Qualcomm President) was copied, that QTL was cutting off Curitel's chip supply:

> I am asking our QCT Division to hold all sales and shipments of CDMA ASICs to Curitel until this agreement is executed because QUALCOMM does not sell CDMA ASICs to non-licensees. We have been working on this agreement for many months and it seems to me that it is well past time to bring this matter to conclusion.

9. BenQ

Qualcomm engaged in anticompetitive conduct by threatening to cut off the OEM BenQ's chip supply after BenQ challenged Qualcomm's [151] use of the handset as a royalty base.

In an October 5, 2004 email, Kim Huang (BenQ) stated in an email to Marv Blecker (QTL Senior Vice President) and Derek Aberle (Qualcomm lawyer and later Qualcomm President) that Qualcomm's use of the handset as the royalty base was "an out-of-date concept." CX8281-002. Huang argued that Qualcomm's intellectual property is for communication, and Qualcomm does not own intellectual property on color TFT LCD panel, mega-pixel DSC module, user storage memory, decoration, and mechanical parts. The costs of these non-communication-related components have become more expensive and now contribute 60-70% of the phone value. The phone is not just for communication, but also for computing, movie-playing, video-taking, and data storage. Huang stated specifically:

> Qualcomm owns IPR [intellectual property rights] on 'Communication' related components of a mobile phone; we appreciate and respect that. But you don't own IPR on most of the other key components. For example, color TFT LCD panel, mega-pixel DSC module, user storage memory, decoration mechanical parts and etc. These non-communications-related components have become more and more important and the cost [152] of them became higher and higher-probably contribute more than 60%-70% of a [*723] whole phoneset. Please note that, a phone in the future is not for communication only, but may be used for computing, movie playing, video taking, mega-picture taking, data storage and etc. Just like a notebook computer. Do you charge the whole notebook computer when a manufacturer build-in a CDMA modem in their notebooks?

CX8281-002. Huang's email provoked a backlash from Qualcomm.

Jeff Jacobs (Qualcomm)[7] forwarded Huang's email on October 6, 2004 and wrote: "Certainly send waves around the industry if they lose their license as they have made a visible commitment to CDMA and WCDMA." CX8281-001. Tony Thornley (Qualcomm) replied that Qualcomm may need to threaten BenQ's chip supply: "A situation we should work hard to fix rather than terminate. However, the threat may be what is needed." Id. The same day, only one day after Huang's email, Steve Altman (Qualcomm lawyer and later Qualcomm President) affirmed in an email sent to Paul Jacobs (later Qualcomm CEO) that Qualcomm had already threatened BenQ's chip supply: "We have made the threat. Hopefully, they will respond positively." Id.

Two months later, on January [153] 6, 2005, BenQ and Qualcomm signed a new patent license agreement. JX0030. Under the license agreement, BenQ owed Qualcomm's standard 5% running royalty rate, with the handset as royalty base. See JX0030-007 (defining the royalty base as "the Selling Price charged by LICENSEE for Subscriber Units Sold to such Purchaser." JX0030-007 to -008. Thus, BenQ responded "positively" to Qualcomm's chip supply threat. Accordingly, Qualcomm engaged in anticompetitive conduct by threatening to cut off BenQ's chip supply after BenQ challenged Qualcomm's use of the handset as a royalty base.

[7] Where the Court is not aware of a Qualcomm employee's job title, the Court identifies the individual's role solely as "Qualcomm."

10. Apple

Qualcomm engaged in anticompetitive conduct with respect to Apple by (1) refusing to sell Apple modem chips or even share sample chips until Apple signed a patent license; (2) eliminating a competing cellular standard that Intel was supporting; (3) attempting to require Apple to cross-license its entire patent portfolio to Qualcomm; and (4) using Qualcomm's monopoly power to enter exclusive deals with Apple that foreclosed Qualcomm's rivals from selling modem chips to Apple from 2011 to September 2016.

a. Qualcomm Refused to Sell Apple Modem Chips Until Apple Signed a Patent License

Tony Blevins (Apple Vice [154] President of Procurement) testified that Apple shipped its first handset, the iPhone, in January 2007. Tr. at 669:19-21. Blevins testified that two years before that launch, in 2005, Apple reached out to potential modem chip suppliers, including Qualcomm. Id. at 674:16-20. Blevins testified that Qualcomm informed Apple of Qualcomm's practices of not selling modem chips exhaustively and requiring OEMs to sign a license before purchasing modem chips: "[I]nstead of offering us samples and specifications, we got a letter indicating that they had a licensing agreement that had to be completed prior to them shipping us any samples or having any engagement." Id. at 675:14-17. That letter, which Jeff Altman (QTL Business Development) sent to Apple's Barry Corlett, stated, "Once this patent license has been completed, licensee would then have the rights to purchase chips, software, reference designs from our ASIC group (called QCT) or one of our [*724] other ASIC licensed suppliers." JX0032-001.

Tony Blevins (Apple Vice President of Procurement) testified that Qualcomm's practices were unique in multiple respects. First, that Apple could not even obtain samples without a Qualcomm patent license: "I'd [155] spent 20 years in the industry, I had never seen a letter like this. It was going to take me some time to evaluate, but it looked like there was a requirement for an agreement before we got samples." Tr. at 676:4-7.

Second, that Qualcomm required Apple to cross-license its patents to Qualcomm: "[W]e later learned that license also required Apple to cross-license its IP back to Qualcomm, which we found unsettling. . . . This is the only one that I've ever personally seen." Id. at 676:25-677:2, 678:7-10. As a result, Tony Blevins testified, Apple elected not to buy chips from Qualcomm that year: "But we knew that we weren't going to cross-license all of our IP back to Qualcomm. We were simply trying to buy a chip. So at this point we essentially eliminated Qualcomm from further consideration." Id. at 677:6-10.

Tony Blevins (Apple Vice President of Procurement) testified that as a procurement executive, he was not usually involved in intellectual property discussions, but that negotiations with Qualcomm always entangled patent licensing and chip supply: "I'm generally not involved in separate and distinct intellectual property licensing discussions. We have a separate team at Apple that [156] does that. However, in this case, these two issues, they were just hopelessly entangled." Id. at 704:3-7.

In 2006, Qualcomm reiterated its practice of requiring an OEM to sign a patent license before purchasing modem chips when Qualcomm responded to Apple's request for quotation to supply modem chips for a future Apple handset. In Qualcomm's response, which Tony Blevins (Apple Vice President of Procurement) received, Mark Savoy (QCT Director of Sales) attached a draft patent license agreement: "Attached are documents referenced in the RFQ regarding QUALCOMM's Subscriber User License Agreement (SULA) as well as a letter discussing our position on third party IPR rights." CX0507-001. According to Blevins, Apple viewed the response as a reiteration of Qualcomm's earlier approach: "So once again, they were reiterating that you have to sign this license agreement if you want to buy chips." Tr. at 679:18-20.

b. 2007 Marketing Incentive Agreement

Apple and Qualcomm eventually reached an indirect patent license agreement, which they memorialized in the Marketing Incentive Agreement, effective as of January 8, 2007 ("MIA"). ECF No. 1326 at 4. Of special note, Qualcomm used its monopoly power against [157] Apple to eliminate WiMax, a competing cellular standard supported by Intel.

The MIA lowered Apple's royalty payments to Qualcomm through a rebate structure. Apple does not manufacture handsets itself but instead uses contract manufacturers, including Pegatron and Wistron, to manufacture handsets. ECF No. 1326 at 4. These contract manufacturers pay Qualcomm a 5% running royalty rate on the manufacturers' handset selling price. JX0042-014 to -015 (Wistron SULA). Then, according to Jeff Williams (Apple COO), Apple reimburses the contract manufacturers: "Qualcomm had a standard agreement with contract manufacturers and the contract manufacturers paid Qualcomm, and we reimburse the contract manufacturers." Tr. at 868:5-7. In the MIA, Qualcomm agreed to provide Apple royalty rebates on each handset to reduce Apple's royalty payments: "For each Apple [*725] Phone purchased by Apple or an Apple Authorized Purchaser during the Term, Qualcomm agrees to pay a Marketing Incentive (defined below) to Apple." JX0040-002. According to Jeff Williams, the MIA rebated Apple's royalty payments to a total of $7.50 per handset. Tr. at 870:17-18.

Apple had contested Qualcomm's royalty terms during the negotiations [158] leading to the MIA. According to Jeff Williams (Apple COO), Apple did not view a handset as an appropriate royalty base for Qualcomm's cellular patents because Apple added handset value that had little to do with Qualcomm's patents. For example, Apple was the first to embed NAND memory, a type of flash memory. If Apple spent $100 on cost for NAND memory, Apple had to pay $5 to Qualcomm even though Qualcomm's intellectual property had nothing to do with NAND memory:

> We were bringing some innovation. And, for example, we were one of the first and led the charge to embed a lot of NAND memory. We did this on our iPods, and we were going to do it on our iPhones, and if we put another $100 of cost in NAND memory, per the Qualcomm agreement, they would get $5 of that even though their IP had nothing to do with that.

Tr. at 869:18-24. Accordingly, Williams testified that Apple had originally proposed a 5% royalty rate on the modem chip price, which amounted to $1.50 per modem chip: "[W]e originally proposed $1.50. We flew down to San Diego and proposed that. That was rejected." Id. at 870:22-24. Although Jeff Williams (Apple COO) testified that Apple viewed the $7.50 per handset royalty payment [159] the companies settled on as excessive, Apple had no alternative: "If we didn't agree, then we would be paying the contract manufacturer rate, which was in the high teens; or if we somehow challenged it, we stood the risk of our brand new iPhone we were working on getting enjoined." Id. at 871:8-12.

From Qualcomm's perspective, giving Apple royalty rate rebates was justified because Qualcomm used the MIA to eliminate WiMax, a competing cellular standard supported by Intel. In the MIA, Apple committed to "publicly announce that Apple has chosen GSM technology for its phone and that GSM provides the best global solution for its customers today and into the future with 3G and beyond." JX0040-001. Qualcomm enforced the WiMax provision with a clause that provided the MIA (and thus Apple's rebates) would terminate if (1) Apple sold 1,000 or more WiMax iPhones; or (2) Apple licensed a third party to sell WiMax phones. JX0040-003.

According to Jeff Williams (Apple COO), Apple's MIA with Qualcomm ended Apple's engagement with Intel's WiMax standard:

> Q: And following the execution of that agreement, did Apple pursue WiMax further?
> A: No. In essence, it was killed in the cradle for us. We did not. [160]

Tr. at 873:21-23.

Internally and in discussions with Apple, Qualcomm viewed Apple's commitment to GSM over WiMax as a crucial strategic win. In December 2006, Marv Blecker (QTL President) sent an email regarding the MIA negotiations, and Steve Altman (Qualcomm President) added his notes in a follow-up email. CX8260-001. Paul Jacobs (Qualcomm CEO) and Derek Aberle (Qualcomm General Manager of Licensing) received the email. Id. Blecker's email listed "key aspects" of the Apple deal, including "Apple Public commitment to WCDMA vs. WiMax for their next gen products." CX8260-002. Steve Altman responded, "We are most interested in their making it clear [*726] that they have no plans for supporting WiMax." Id.

Later, in January 2007, prior to the execution of the MIA, Marv Blecker (QTL President) emailed Jeff Williams (Apple COO) and told Williams that Qualcomm's first priority was eliminating WiMax: "However, we believe that the entire basis of this deal is that Apple is going to select either WCDMA [a GSM technology] or WiMax, not both. Motivating Apple to select WCDMA to the exclusion of WiMax is our primary motivation for entering into this agreement." CX0617-001.

Irwin Jacobs (Qualcomm Co-Founder [161] and former Qualcomm CEO) testified that Qualcomm would have been behind in supplying WiMax chips had WiMax become the 3G standard:

> Q: It's accurate to state, sir, that if WiMax had ended up as the standard, Qualcomm would have been far behind; is that right?
> A: That's fine.

Tr. at 1284:10-13.

Thus, via the MIA, Qualcomm used the threat of chip supply and its high royalty rate to eliminate WiMax not because WCDMA was a superior technology, but because Qualcomm's rival was supporting WiMax and Qualcomm was not.

In other contexts, too, Qualcomm has recognized that its chip supply leverage enhances Qualcomm's position in standards bodies. In an April 2015 email, David Wise (now Qualcomm Senior Vice President and Treasurer) told Steve Mollenkopf (Qualcomm CEO) that QCT gives Qualcomm a strong berth in SSOs, but "[i]f separate, QTL may be isolated and ineffective at getting tech into the std. No QCT distribution." CX5913-001. The MIA is one specific example of Qualcomm using chip leverage to have its standard adopted in the first place.

c. 2009 Strategic Terms Agreement

Qualcomm later exercised its CDMA monopoly power to charge Apple a CDMA price premium. Tony Blevins (Apple Vice President of Procurement) [162] testified that in 2009, Apple was planning to launch a 2011 CDMA iPhone worldwide. Tr. at 672:9-16. According to Jeff Williams (Apple COO), Qualcomm was Apple's only viable option to supply modem chips for the 2011 CDMA iPhone: "We also looked — there was also a small company in Taiwan, VIA, that we looked at, but concluded they weren't technically ready or capable. So just Qualcomm." Tr. at 874:21-23. On December 18, 2009, QCTAP (QCT's Asia Pacific arm) and Apple entered the Strategic Terms Agreement ("STA"), a CDMA chip supply agreement. JX0052-001.

Tony Blevins testified that the STA terms differed significantly from Apple's other component supply agreements, in that Qualcomm refused to sell modem chips exhaustively and refused to provide indemnification: "They're not what we typically want. Examples I can give you is we want to buy parts exhaustively; the agreement doesn't provide for that. We want indemnification; the agreement doesn't provide for that." Tr. at 686:21-24.

Qualcomm made it clear to Apple that Qualcomm's practice of refusing to sell modem chips exhaustively was unique within Qualcomm, and is limited to the modem chip markets where Qualcomm has monopoly power. A Qualcomm [163] slide deck presented to Tony Blevins (Apple Vice President of Procurement) includes a slide titled "Authorized Purchaser," which sets forth Qualcomm's licensing requirements. CX8261-004. Under "WAN," which means cellular modem chips, the slide states: "Must be a licensee in good standing." Id. However, under non WAN, which Blevins testified means all other components, like Wi-Fi, the slide states: "No separate license" [*727] and "Sold on an exhaustive basis." Id. Thus, Qualcomm does not require OEMs to sign a separate license before purchasing other products and sells products exhaustively in markets where Qualcomm lacks monopoly power, as Tony Blevins testified: "And so they were essentially saying that for these types of products where there was [sic] competitive alternatives, they would match what other competitors would provide." Tr. at 688:2-5.

Similarly, when asked at trial whether "device manufacturers purchasing Wi-Fi components from Qualcomm have to first take a license to Qualcomm's Wi-Fi standard essential patents," Fabian Gonell (QTL Legal Counsel and Senior Vice President, Licensing Strategy) testified "No." Tr. at 1483:18-21. Thus, Qualcomm's practice of only selling modem chips [164] to an OEM after the OEM signs a separate license agreement is unique even within Qualcomm.

During STA negotiations, Qualcomm knew that Qualcomm's monopoly position in CDMA modem chips gave Qualcomm leverage over Apple. For example, during 2009 internal Qualcomm discussions regarding how to price CDMA modem chips for Apple, Eric Koliander (QCT Vice President, Sales) wrote to Cristiano Amon (now Qualcomm President): "Truthfully, we should take a harder line with these issues for CDMA since their options are limited." CX6839-002. Cristiano Amon replied, "Can't imagine Via would be an option." CX6839-002.

Qualcomm proposed to charge Apple a $5 price premium on CDMA modem chips, according to an August 2009 email Koliander sent to Amon and other QCT officials recapping a Qualcomm meeting: "[A]ll are in agreement that we would like to see a CDMA price premium over UMTS quoted price." CX6840-001. Koliander observed later in the email that although Apple may respond negatively to the CDMA adder, Apple did not have other short-term supply options: "May motivate Maverick to light up a CDMA competitor (unlikely given time constraints)." CX6840-002. Maverick is Qualcomm's internal code name for Apple. [165] ECF No. 1326 at 10.

d. 2011 Transition Agreement

Qualcomm entered its first exclusive deal with Apple in 2011. In February 2011, Apple, Qualcomm, and QCTAP entered into a Transition Agreement ("TA"), effective as of February 11, 2011, under which Qualcomm paid Apple funds for Apple to transition its chip business to Qualcomm. ECF No. 1326 at 4.

The TA came about in part because Apple wanted to use Qualcomm modem chips as Apple began developing premium LTE handsets and because Apple wanted additional royalty rate rebates from Qualcomm. Jeff Williams (Apple COO) testified that Qualcomm would not apply the MIA rebate to Apple's CDMA handsets: "[W]e discovered that the $7.50 royalty agreement that we had reached was not going to apply to CDMA phones or iPads, and this really upset us." Tr. at 875:2-4. In addition, Williams testified that Apple needed Qualcomm's CDMA and premium LTE modem chips: "We needed their CDMA and LTE technology. We were interested in working with them. They had good engineering leadership in that space, and we asked for transition funds associated with moving business to them." Id. at 875:17-19.

According to an August 2010 email from Paul Jacobs (Qualcomm CEO) to Tim [166] Cook (now Apple CEO), Qualcomm would only provide Apple additional royalty rate rebates if Apple committed to purchasing Qualcomm's chips: "We did discuss potentially providing Apple with a rebate on larger screen devices like the iPad, but as part of a larger business relationship between [*728] the companies, including Apple's use of Qualcomm chips in its iPhones and devices like the iPad." CX0599-001.

Later in the TA negotiations, Steve Mollenkopf (QCT President) emphasized to Jeff Williams (Apple COO) that Qualcomm would only provide Apple royalty rate rebates if Apple agreed to use Qualcomm chips exclusively: "[W]e are unwilling to have the marketing agreement apply to CDMA iPhones as part of this deal but we are willing to provide a separate, significant sum of money as part of the chip deal. The structure and $1B (a huge number from our perspective) below is the entirety of our proposal." CX5363-017.

Internal Qualcomm documents from 2010, during the TA negotiations, show that Qualcomm was focused on using Apple's desire for royalty rate rebates to secure exclusivity.

A June 2010 Qualcomm modem strategic plan, which Steve Mollenkopf (QCT President) received, listed "Competition is laser [167] focused on thin modem with significant cost advantage based on scalable architectures" among threats to Qualcomm's modem business. CX6381-008. Mollenkopf agreed at trial that Apple purchases only thin modems. Tr. at 773:13-15.

Thus, in an August 2010 email, Steve Mollenkopf (QCT President) told Paul Jacobs (Qualcomm CEO), Derek Aberle (QTL President), and Steve Altman (Qualcomm President) that if Qualcomm secured Apple exclusivity in the TA, Qualcomm could prevent those thin modem competitors from becoming threats: "[T]here are significant strategic benefits as it is unlikely that there will be enough standalone modem volume to sustain a viable competitor without that slot." CX5348-001. Slot and socket are terms for a modem chip design win for a handset. Tr. at 775:8-10.

Later in the TA negotiations, in November 2010, Steve Mollenkopf (QCT President) received an email from Marc McCloskey (Qualcomm) that highlighted the competitive downside of Apple choosing a different modem chip supplier: "[I]f Maverick went to a competitor and made them more competitive in the market like IFX & Samsung, then what is the impact of losing share going forward?" CX5357-001. Maverick is Qualcomm's code [168] name for Apple, and IFX refers to Infineon. ECF No. 1326 at 9. In December 2010, as TA negotiations neared their end, Steve Mollenkopf (QCT President) again emphasized in an email to Derek Aberle (QTL President) and Steve Altman (Qualcomm President) that Qualcomm was focused on exclusivity: "Need payment and earn-out mechanism that aligns with goal of design-ins and exclusivity." CX5360-003.

Steve Mollenkopf (QCT President) elaborated in another December 2010 email to Cristiano Amon (now Qualcomm President) and other Qualcomm executives that Qualcomm needed to secure exclusivity in future Apple handset models: "The conclusion is that we want this account but the deal needs to tie any incentives to Mav3 and Mav5 as these are the key units with Mav5 being the more important one." JX0055-006.

The TA provided Qualcomm that exclusivity. Qualcomm committed to pay Apple up to $1 billion via a Transition Fund, Marketing and Development Fund ("MDF"), and Variable Incentive Fund ("VIF") from 2011 to 2015. JX0057-001 to -002.

Qualcomm's payments to Apple were subject to some conditions and volume requirements. If Apple did not launch a handset with a Qualcomm UMTS modem chip by March 2012, Apple [169] would forfeit all Transition Fund payments. JX0057-002. UMTS is an umbrella term for the 3G [*729] WCDMA standard, which is distinct from CDMA. ECF No. 1326 at 3. If Apple did not launch a UMTS handset by the end of 2012, Apple would have to pay back more than one hundred million in MDF payments. JX0057-002.

Apple's receipt of the hundreds of millions of VIF funds also depended on the volume of chips Apple purchased from Qualcomm. JX0057-002. If Apple purchased more than 115 million Qualcomm modem chips from October 1, 2011 to September 30, 2012, Apple received the full amount of VIF funds for that year. JX0057-002. If Apple purchased fewer than 80 million Qualcomm modem chips in that period, Apple received no money. JX0057-003. In future years, Apple needed to increase purchase volumes to 125 million annual units and then to 150 million units to receive the full amount of VIF funds for that year. JX0057-003.

Further, Tony Blevins (Apple Vice President of Procurement) testified that these payments, which effectively reduced Apple's royalty obligations, were contingent on modem chip exclusivity: "However, and importantly, there would be large rebates associated with the nominal royalty payments [170] if we were to use Qualcomm chips exclusively." Tr. at 689:7-9.

Of particular import in the TA are its termination and clawback provisions, which ensure exclusivity. The TA would automatically terminate if Apple sold any "Apple product commercially that incorporates a non-Qualcomm cellular baseband modem." JX0057-004. Thus, if Apple used any non-Qualcomm modem chip in an Apple handset, Apple would forfeit future TA payments. The clawback provision imposed even greater penalties. Under that provision, "if during calendar year 2013 Apple [sold] an Apple product commercially that incorporates a non-Qualcomm cellular baseband modem," Apple would have to pay back Qualcomm hundreds of millions in funds already received under the TA. JX0057-004.

According to Tony Blevins (Apple Vice President of Procurement), the TA's termination and clawback provisions were effectively exclusivity provisions: "They made it very unattractive for us to choose a different chipset supplier. . . . So when we factor in the rebates that we would forfeit by using a different chip supplier, it served as a very strong disincentive for us to do so." Tr. at 689:18-23.

Qualcomm ensured that those exclusivity provisions remained [171] in the TA. In a January 24, 2011 email attaching a proposed agreement, just weeks before the TA was executed, Steve Mollenkopf (QCT President) informed Jeff Williams (Apple COO) that Qualcomm had reinserted certain provisions: "Lastly, we added back in the language on general design commitments (see our page7) that fell out of this draft. They were in the earlier ones and are important to us." CX0526-002 to -003. Page 7 of the Qualcomm proposal includes the termination and clawback provisions in redline, which shows that Qualcomm reinserted those provisions:

> • If Maverick launches any device, with a non QC modem (regardless of technology), Maverick shall notify QC, and QC will no longer be obligated to make any future payments that otherwise would be required
> • Maverick will reimburse Qualcomm all amounts paid, without interest, if before December 31, 2013 Maverick has commercially sold a single or multimode LTE product that incorporates a non QC modem

CX0526-014.

A March 1, 2011 Qualcomm accounting memo discussing the TA shows that Qualcomm viewed the TA as securing exclusivity: [*730] "The primary benefits of the Transition Fund to Qualcomm are the volume requirements as well as the exclusivity [172] provision described above." CX5425-004. In sum, the TA ensured that Apple would source its modem chips exclusively from Qualcomm through at least 2013, and prevented rivals from selling any modem chips to Apple during that time period.

e. 2013 First Amendment to Transition Agreement

In 2013, Qualcomm again gave Apple royalty rate rebates in exchange for Apple's effective commitment to purchase modem chips exclusively from Qualcomm. Although Apple had planned to purchase modem chips from Qualcomm's rival Intel, Qualcomm's 2013 exclusive deal foreclosed Intel (and Qualcomm's other rivals) from working with Apple until September 2016. The Court discusses below the genesis of the 2013 agreement, its exclusivity provisions, and how Qualcomm used exclusivity to end Apple's engagement with Intel.

According to Jeff Williams (Apple COO), the MIA—which rebated Apple's royalty payments to $7.50 per handset—was set to expire at the end of 2012, and Apple wanted to secure continued royalty rate rebates to avoid hundreds of millions in additional royalty payments:

> [W]hat we were starting at is at the end of 2012, our $7.50 arrangement with Qualcomm was coming to an end and the default was that our royalty rate was [173] going to go up to the high teens because it was just going to flow through this, this crazy contract manufacturing arrangement. And so on top of the chips we're buying, on top of the $7.50 we're already paying, there was going to be another $8 or $10, we were selling a hundred million phones, it would be another billion dollars a year in royalty for, for no extra value from Qualcomm.

Tr. at 885:23-886:7.

Qualcomm documents make clear that with the MIA set to expire, Qualcomm's goal was to secure continued modem chip exclusivity from Apple. Cristiano Amon (QCT Co-President) recommended in a December 2012 email to Steve Mollenkopf (Qualcomm President) that QCT reduce its modem chip prices to secure exclusivity: "The above means that we reduce our ASP [average selling price] premium to buy exclusivity as done in the original deal." CX8276-001.

Specifically, Qualcomm sought continued exclusivity to prevent Apple from working with Intel, a rival modem chip supplier. Apple was in contact with multiple modem chip suppliers in 2011 and 2012, but only Intel proved to be a viable Qualcomm alternative.

At trial, Matthias Sauer (Apple Engineer) said that Apple discontinued working with ST Ericsson [174] in March 2012 because ST Ericsson could not meet Apple's schedules: "As it turned out in the course of the project, it turned out that they were slipping in their execution." Tr. at 1505:9-10. In a March 2012 email to Matthias Sauer, Steve Schell (Apple) offered a more vivid description of ST Ericsson's problems: "They can neither execute nor manage their way out of a paper bag." QX1353-223. Sauer testified that Apple also disengaged with Broadcom in 2012 in part because Broadcom was behind schedule in developing an LTE modem for Apple's 2014 handsets. Tr. at 1510:18-24.

However, Intel proved viable. In October 2012, Apple internally stated its intent to buy modem chips from Intel for a 2014 iPad. An email with the subject line "IMC Status/Next Steps Alignment — Notes" memorializes an Apple modem chip supply meeting. JX0074-001. IMC refers to Intel. [*731] Tr. at 691:18-20. The email stated, "Discussed other chipset options including ST Ericsson, Broadcom, Renesas, Mediatek and Marvell, but IMC is the only other Tier 1 option. . . . All agreed in the meeting that IMC for J86 was a good plan." JX0074-002.

At trial, Tony Blevins (Apple Vice President of Procurement), who received the Apple email [175] and attended the meeting, testified that Apple planned to use an Intel modem chip for an iPad as a test run before using Intel in an iPhone:

> At one point in time we had an official plan of record that we would implement Intel on an iPad product launch, and that would give us confidence to extend their presence into an iPhone. We felt that iPad was a simpler transition because it was data only, and then we would add voice as we moved to phone.

Tr. at 690:5-10. J86 was Apple's code name for the iPad Mini 2. Id. at 692:9-10.

Aicha Evans (Intel Chief Strategy Officer) testified that Intel's early exposure to Apple provided technical benefits to Intel: "First of all, you just execute, but you start gaining experience and exposure. You also get what I call the halo effect of better presence in the standards." Tr. at 569:8-10.

Around that time, Qualcomm knew that Intel was a threat to win Apple's business. Eric Koliander (QCT Vice President, Sales) sent a December 2012 email about Apple's sourcing plans to Steve Mollenkopf (Qualcomm President). CX5378-002. Koliander reported in the email, "Maverick [Qualcomm's code name for Apple] does appear to be working with Intel and we believe, Mav has assigned software [176] and hardware engineering resources to the development of an Intel based platform." Id. Koliander continued, "It is unlikely that Mav would launch an Intel based product until late 2013 earliest (believed to be data only for iPad)." Id. Mollenkopf testified at trial that Apple told Qualcomm directly that Apple was considering alternative suppliers, like Intel:

> Q: And during negotiation of the 2013 agreements, including the First Amendment to the Transition Agreement, Apple told Qualcomm that it was considering using alternative suppliers; correct?
> A: They did.

Tr. at 787:7-14.

Qualcomm recognizes that Apple is a particularly important OEM for modem chip suppliers in terms of scale, engineering support, and prestige. In a July 2012 slide deck presented to the Qualcomm Board of Directors and sent to Dr. Paul Jacobs (Qualcomm CEO) and Dr. Irwin Jacobs (Qualcomm Co-Founder and former CEO), Qualcomm highlighted Apple's significance to modem chip suppliers. CX6974-001. On a slide titled, "OEM Strategy: Win the Designs that Matter Most," Qualcomm listed as its primary goal "Hold position as Apple's primary modem supplier." CX6974-027. On the following slide, under the subtitle "Apple is Important," Qualcomm [177] highlighted the following benefits of Apple's business:

- The largest consumer of high-tier modems, with binary design awards
- Apple challenges suppliers to provide best-in-class products
- Apple modem supplier is enabled to fund R&D to maintain leadership

CX6974-028. Qualcomm projected that Apple's purchase of Qualcomm modem chips could represent approximately 25% of QCT's total modem chip revenue in 2013. Id.

Thus, Qualcomm structured two 2013 agreements to ensure that Apple would continue to purchase modem chips exclusively from Qualcomm, and not from Intel [*732] (or any other rival). In January 2013, Steve Mollenkopf (Qualcomm President) explained in an email to Derek Aberle (QTL President) and Paul Jacobs (Qualcomm CEO) that the FATA would sacrifice short-term profits for long-term exclusivity: "Economically, our best outcome is that they second SKU and we maintain the high-end via collection of features. Strategically, we are better off keeping them on our stuff." CX5381-001 (emphasis added). "Second SKU" refers to Apple using a second modem chip source.

On February 28, 2013, Apple, Qualcomm, and QCTAP entered into a First Amendment to Transition Agreement, effective as of January 1, 2013 ("FATA"). ECF [178] No. 1326 at 4. On February 28, 2013, Apple and Qualcomm entered into a Business Cooperation and Patent Agreement, effective as of January 1, 2013 ("BCPA"). ECF No.

1326 at 4. According to a 2013 Qualcomm accounting memo, Apple and Qualcomm negotiated the FATA and BCPA in tandem: "[T]he Agreements were negotiated at the same time and there is not sufficient evidence to show that they are separable." CX5391-002.

The BCPA extended and modified the MIA rebate, which lowered Apple's royalty payment per handset. Qualcomm paid Apple rebates to lower Apple's royalty payments to $10 per iPhone and $9 per iPad. JX0078-006. In exchange, Apple promised that "all the Apple Phones it markets, offers to sell and sells will implement one or more CDMA standards." JX0078-001. Apple would forfeit the BCPA rebates if Apple took any of three actions adverse to Qualcomm's licensing business: (1) initiating FRAND litigation against Qualcomm; (2) inducing a third party to initiate FRAND litigation against Qualcomm; or (3) arguing that any Qualcomm modem chip sale exhausted Qualcomm's patents. JX0078-006. Jim Lederer (QCT General Manager) told Steve Mollenkopf (Qualcomm President) in a March 2013 email that [179] the BCPA payments were beneficial to QTL because Qualcomm granted Apple smaller royalty rate rebates than in the MIA: "The large benefit that QTL accrues in the new deal ($10 vs $7.50) is not represented." CX7910-002.

The FATA extended and modified the TA's incentive fund payments. Qualcomm paid Apple a Marketing Fund of $2.50 per iPhone sold with a Qualcomm chip and $1.50 per iPad sold with a Qualcomm chip. JX0057-006 to -007. Qualcomm also paid Apple hundreds of millions in VIF funds conditioned on Apple's purchase of at least 100 million Qualcomm modem chips in both 2015 and 2016. JX0057-008.

Like the TA, the FATA included a clawback provision: "[I]f, during calendar years 2013 or 2014, Apple or any of its Affiliates sells a Non-QC Device commercially (i.e., more than 1000 units), Apple shall (i) promptly notify Qualcomm, and (ii) reimburse QCTAP any Marketing Fund amounts paid by Qualcomm and/or QCTAP in accordance with this Section 1.3A." JX0057-007. If Apple launched a handset with a non-Qualcomm modem chip in 2015, Apple would have to pay back any Marketing Fund amounts earned in the previous 15 months. JX0057-007 to -008. In addition, if Apple launched a handset with a non-Qualcomm modem [180] chip in 2015 or 2016, Apple would have to pay back hundreds of millions in VIF funds. JX0057-009.

As with the TA, the FATA's clawback and termination provisions effectively precluded Apple from working with any of Qualcomm's rivals, as Tony Blevins (Apple Vice President of Procurement) testified: "[I]t was very apparent to us that the very, very large rebates that I mentioned earlier would make it a complete nonstarter to work with someone else." Similarly, [*733] Jeff Williams (Apple COO) testified that using a second supplier became financially untenable under the FATA: "In the long term, it made it prohibitively expensive to work with someone else. For example, when we signed — or when we were — we knew we were going to close the 2013 agreement, we cut off the work we were doing with Intel on an iPad." Tr. at 889:9-18.

Contemporaneous Apple documents also reflect that the FATA forced Apple to disengage from Intel. In January 2013, shortly before the FATA was executed, Jeff Williams (Apple Chief Operating Officer) wrote in an email to Tony Blevins (Apple Vice President of Procurement) that Apple, even though it wanted to use a second supplier, would have to stop working with Intel: "Assuming [181] we close QC, we need to communicate to IMC that we will not use their chip in 2014. I think it's also true that given all of our product plan activities, that we don't want to do this." CX0531-001.

Tony Blevins replied that because Blevins made the deal with Intel to use an Intel modem chip, Blevins would tell Intel that the "new QC strategy"—i.e., the FATA—had changed Apple's product plan and prevented Apple from working with Intel:

> Jeff, I feel responsible for communicating this since I made the deal with him. Will do so when I return. We may have accidentally misled him based on the new QC strategy that was not known 6 mos ago. I think we should carefully consider what time window we communicate also ('15 ?).

Id.

The Court finds credible the testimony of Aicha Evans (Intel Chief Strategy Officer), who testified—consistently with the contemporaneous Apple emails—that it was the FATA, not Intel's technical execution, that forced Apple to stop working with Intel: "The reason was that they had, the company, Apple, had some type of business agreement with Qualcomm and that we would get a chance back for the 2016 launch, which means an engagement in 2015." Tr. at 572:1-7.

Evans testified that [182] losing the Apple iPad Mini 2 meant that Intel lost Apple's engineering support, in addition to the iPhone business that could have followed: "We went back to the kid's table in the sense that we didn't have now that deep engagement with their engineers and so on and so forth." Id. at 572:21-23. Evans also testified that losing the Apple business harmed Intel's standing in the industry: "It also sort of slowed us down in terms of getting to a more credible position with the operators, as well as with, with standards and TEMS. So, yeah, it set us back two years, and, frankly, it was a near-death experience." Id. at 573:19-23. TEMS are network testing companies. Id. at 578:19-20. Thus, the FATA had cascading negative effects on Intel.

Other evidence also shows that Apple would have worked with Intel absent the FATA. Although Apple had technical concerns about Intel's execution, Tony Blevins (Apple Vice President of Procurement) testified that Apple always has technical concerns about its modem chip suppliers, including Qualcomm:

> I should probably describe to you that Apple's engineering team are some of the most detail obsessed, insanely passionate people on this planet. They hold themselves [183] to high standards. They hold their suppliers to high standards. . . . So in every supplier engagement I've ever been involved in, no one ever meets all of their requirements. I'm not sure it's possible. So I do have some sympathy for our suppliers. But clearly Intel wasn't meeting all of our requirements. [*734] I'm not certain they've ever met all of our requirements on any product, and I'm not certain Qualcomm has either or even ever will. That's the nature of the game for us.

Tr. at 696:6-19. Thus, Matthias Sauer (Apple Engineer) testified that in 2016, Apple decided any technical risks were manageable and decided to proceed with purchasing Intel chips: "[T]he general engineering view was that, if we select a second supplier, we have a high chance of success. We had a cross-functional evaluation of different aspects of the engineering work. And we concluded that the identified risks are manageable." Tr. at 1528:2-6.

During the earlier engagement in 2012, the fact that Intel's modem chip did not support carrier aggregation was irrelevant to its suitability for the iPad Mini 2, which Apple launched in 2013. Tony Blevins (Apple Vice President of Procurement) testified: "The iPad Mini 2 architecture [184] itself didn't support carrier aggregation. So whether the chip was capable or not was irrelevant." Tr. at 697:11-13. Moreover, the Qualcomm chip for the next generation of the iPad Mini did not support carrier aggregation. Specifically, Blevins testified as follows:

> Q: Were any iPad Mini models released in 2014?

A: Yes, we released a new model in 2014.Q: Who was the modem supplier for that device?A: That was also Qualcomm.Q: Do you if the modem in that device supported carrier aggregation?A: I know for a fact the system did not. The system architecture was not designed to enable carrier aggregation.Tr. at 698:10-17.

Although Aicha Evans (Intel Chief Strategy Officer) conceded at trial that other OEMs, including Samsung and Motorola, decided not to purchase Intel's chip in 2013, those decisions post-date the FATA and Apple's disengagement from Intel and do not shed light on whether Apple thought Intel's modem chip was a viable product when Qualcomm entered the FATA with Apple. Tr. at 597:8-18.

Qualcomm's post-deal evaluations of the FATA highlighted its exclusivity provisions. Steve Mollenkopf (Qualcomm President) explained in a March 2013 internal email to Cristiano Amon (QCT Co-President) [185] and other Qualcomm executives that the FATA eliminated the Intel threat: "I understand it but the scenario is really that there would have been a license fight as well and a push for alternative source." CX7910-001. A slide deck on the FATA, sent to both Steve Mollenkopf and Paul Jacobs (Qualcomm Executive Chairman), touted that Qualcomm had won "100% share in wireless phone and tablet markets through 2016" with Apple. CX5389-011.

Another 2013 slide deck with an overview of the FATA, which the Qualcomm Board of Directors received, explained that the Apple exclusivity provisions had strategic benefits for Qualcomm despite a negative near-term financial impact on QCT. CX5527-027. A slide titled "Apple Deal Summary" included the header "QCT well-positioned until 2016," with this bullet underneath: "Strategic importance of Apple modem design-win." Id. However, in the next header, Qualcomm recognized that buying longer-term exclusivity through the FATA incentives would negatively impact Qualcomm's margins in the short term: "Near term financial impact QCT margin/growth rate." Id.

Specifically, a slide later in the slide deck titled "QCT Apple Financial Summary" compares Qualcomm's direct [186] margins on modem chip sales to Apple under the "Apple Deal" scenario and a "No Deal" [*735] scenario. CX5527-029. Qualcomm projected that because of the incentives Qualcomm paid Apple, Qualcomm's direct margins under the "Apple Deal" scenario would be 20% lower in both 2015 and 2016 than under the "No Deal" scenario. Id. This too shows that Qualcomm sacrificed profits for exclusivity.

Steve Mollenkopf (Qualcomm President) emphasized in a March 2013 email to Paul Jacobs (Qualcomm CEO) that exclusivity bore longer-term strategic benefits because Qualcomm could avoid both a licensing fight and secure future Apple business:

> The most relevant comparisons however should have been made to the case where they fight on IP and spin up a second source in 2014 and 2015. In this case, we would have lost Mav 10 low, Mav 13 and a bunch of the Mav7/8 volume in 2014 and 2015. You can size the impact on page 6. It is huge and has a large strategic downside.

f. FATA Prevents Apple from Purchasing Intel Modem Chips in 2014

In 2014, the FATA again prevented Qualcomm's rival Intel from selling modem chips to Apple, despite Apple's interest in Intel. Ina February 2014 email, Isabel Mahe (Apple Vice President [187] of Software Engineering) told Tony Blevins (Apple Vice President of Procurement) that Intel seemed capable of supplying modem chips for a 2015 iPad and 2016 iPhone: "I have some good news on Intel chipset roadmap. They are open to our proposal of a new chipset that is much lower risk from SW perspective than their current 7460. We may be able to do an iPhone in 2016 once we confirm that they can indeed deliver it." CX0853-001. In a later email, Mahe asked Blevins whether using Intel would lead to FATA penalties: "[C]an we absorb it knowing that this is paving the way so that we can have a phone in 2016?? Assuming iPads are launched in October — not sure how big is this penalty?" Id. Blevins replied that Apple could not work with Intel in 2015 given the FATA's clawback provisions: "In net, there is no way that we would forego otherwise earned incentives in favor of launching iPad only in '15." Id.

Qualcomm documents show that Qualcomm also knew the FATA precluded Apple from purchasing modem chips from Intel until spring 2016. Will Wyatt (QTI [Qualcomm Technologies, Inc., the Qualcomm subsidiary that operates QCT] Vice President, Finance) wrote in a June 2015 email to Sanjay Mehta (now [188] Qualcomm Senior Vice President for Compute Products) that Apple would have to pay back $645 million in FATA incentives if Apple launched a non-Qualcomm handset before February 2016:

> If Mav were to launch in Sept of 2015 we would get back $200M in VIF and $445M in MDF for a total of $645M in FYQ415. I would also argue that if we knew that Mav would be launching in Oct/Nov/Dec (i.e. they announce it) then we would be able to release the MDF of $445M. Mav also will know how the math will work and likely won't launch until after Feb 15th of 2016 when they have their money for the MDF.

Apple felt hamstrung by the inability to buy modem chips from a second supplier. Tony Blevins (Apple Vice President of Procurement) wrote to Isabel Mahe (Apple Vice President of Software Engineering) in a February 2014 email: "In an ideal world, we'd like to have the freedom to either choose QCOM chips or not on the basis of their overall value (specs, sch, terms, price, etc.) and not entangle the licensing issues." CX0578-001. Blevins testified at trial that his email referred to how the FATA prevented Apple from choosing the most competitive [*736] modem chip: "[W]e'd entered into agreements that offered [189] Apple very significant sums of money for using their chipsets exclusively. So it wasn't the kind of free market that would give us freedom to choose whomever we might want based on a level playing field." Tr. at 701:21-25.

Both Apple and Qualcomm were also aware that if Apple sourced modem chips from a rival supplier, Apple could have the leverage to challenge Qualcomm's royalty rates. Tony Blevins (Apple Vice President of Procurement) testified that a second supplier could provide competition on Apple's modem chip prices and reduce Apple's royalty burden:

> [O]ur view was that if we could establish a supplemental chip source, we would not only give some leverage on chipset pricing, but we would reduce the stranglehold that Qualcomm has on us relative to royalty leverage, that the point in time they knew we had to buy their chip, we felt it put us in a very unfavorable position on licensing.

Tr. at 711:9-15.

Qualcomm, too, viewed the union of QCT and QTL as important leverage against any Apple attack on Qualcomm's royalty rates. In a June 2014 email to Steve Mollenkopf (Qualcomm CEO), under the header "On QCT/QTL dis-synergy and QTL strategy in general," James Thompson (Qualcomm CTO) wrote [190] that Qualcomm should use its CDMA modem chip market power in response to Apple's desire to develop a second supplier:

> If Apple's ultimate goal is to take down our licensing business or at least chip away at it with a negotiation every few years we should fight back while we are strong. . . . We are the only supplier today that can give them a global launch. In fact, without us they would lose big parts of North America, Japan and China. That would really hurt them. Apple has already said they are going to second us with Intel based on the licensing issue and Intel's willingness to buy the business, so QCT has already lost 40-50% of their business. It can't go down any further. QCT has nothing to lose.

g. Apple Launches a Handset with an Intel Modem Chip in 2016

Finally, in late 2016, Apple launched a handset with an Intel modem chip. Qualcomm's rival Intel reaped significant benefits after Apple selected Intel to supply modem chips for a 2016 iPhone. Because an OEM must purchase modem chips well in advance of launching a handset, Apple made the decision to work with Intel in 2014, two years before the 2016 handset's commercial launch, as Matthias Sauer (Apple Engineer) testified [191] at trial:

> Q: And in 2014, the Apple engineering team made a unanimous recommendation to select Intel over Broadcom for engagement as a potential second source supplier of baseband modem chips; correct?
> A: That is correct.

Tr. at 1511:9-13.

Aicha Evans (Intel Chief Strategy Officer) testified that after Intel won Apple's business, other OEMs reached out about Intel's modem chips: "Lenovo is an example, LG is an example, Motorola is an example, Tesla is an example." Tr. at 576:20-577:4. Intel viewed the Apple win as a boon to Intel's business outside of the Apple volumes. Stefan Wolff (Intel Engineer) highlighted many such benefits in an internal Intel email after Intel won the Apple business:

> We will attract operators and network vendors to do early prototyping / field testing with our latest LTE platforms [*737] given Apples [sic] huge volumes in the field. This will speed up the development, hardening, and TTM of our modem technology and help us to providing leading [sic] LTE IP for emerging markets like China. The Apple business will boost our modem revenue and will support the funding of our next generation LTE 7460 on IA and 14nm Intel process.

As Intel and Apple continued to work [192] together, Apple pushed Intel to accelerate its engineering, Aicha Evans testified: "[O]n the 2017 launch, initially I had to run for a plan of record of 450 megabits per second, and [Apple] gently explained to me that that wasn't going to cut it, it needs to be 600. So eventually I'm sure we would have done it, but not in that timeframe." Tr. at 579:19-24.

Aicha Evans (Intel Chief Strategy Officer) also testified that when working with Apple, a modem chip supplier gains increased standing in SSOs and with operators (also referred to as carriers, like Verizon): "You also get what I call the halo effect of better presence in the standards, not just presence, but better weight in terms of your contributions, in terms of starting to get leadership positions. Same thing with the operators, because these devices eventually end up on their network." Tr. at 569:9-15.

Winning the Apple business for the 2016 launch enabled Intel to acquire VIA Telecom, a CDMA technology company. Intel acquired VIA in 2015, after Intel had won Apple's business but before the Apple handset had launched commercially. CX1598-001. Aicha Evans (Intel Chief Strategy Officer) testified that to win Apple's business worldwide, [193] including with carriers who use CDMA, Intel required CDMA technology: "So it was sort of getting the last piece of the puzzle that would allow us to have the privilege and opportunity to supply worldwide, including on Verizon." Tr. at 584:8-10. Internal Intel projections indicated that acquiring VIA would only be profitable if Intel could supply modem chips to Apple; else Intel would not recoup its investment. CX1598-009. In addition, Aicha Evans (Intel Chief Strategy Officer) testified that Intel's modem chip division was only able to pitch the VIA acquisition after Intel won initial Apple business:

> Q: So ultimately did the fact that Intel acquired, or won Apple's business affect its decision to acquire VIA?
> A: Oh, yeah. There wouldn't have been a — I wouldn't have been — yeah, there wouldn't have been a discussion.

Tr. at 581:17-20.

Thus, Qualcomm's exclusive deals, which delayed Intel's ability to sell modem chips to Apple until September 2016, foreclosed Intel and other rivals from benefits including: (1) a revenue boost critical to funding research and development and acquiring technology (as Intel did with VIA); (2) exposure to Apple's "best-in-class" engineering resources; (3) a [194] foothold at Apple for future handsets; (4) business opportunities with other OEMs; (5) enhanced standing in SSOs; and (6) opportunities to conduct early field testing and prototyping with network vendors and operators.

h. Qualcomm Again Refuses to Sell Modem Chips to Apple

Once Apple started purchasing modem chips from Intel, Apple challenged Qualcomm's royalty rates, as Tony Blevins (Apple Vice President of Procurement) testified at trial: "There are court proceedings where we're trying to establish what is a FRAND rate for royalty." Tr. at 712:2-3. In response, according to Blevins, Qualcomm sought patent injunctions around the world against Apple's handsets: [*738] "[T]hey had filed injunctions against Apple and lawsuits on non-SEPs, again, to improve their position . . . on the SEPs." Id. at 712:18-20.

Aicha Evans (Intel Chief Strategy Officer) also testified at trial that Qualcomm attempted to ban Apple from importing its handset with Intel chips in proceedings before the International Trade Commission ("ITC"):

> Q: [D]o you understand what Qualcomm was seeking in those ITC proceedings?
> A: Yeah, cut us off at the knees before we're born and ask for a ban of Intel-based iPhones from the United [195] States.

Tr. at 663:14-17.

Later, Qualcomm also cut off Apple's supply of new chips. In spring 2017, Steve Mollenkopf (Qualcomm CEO) testified, Apple's contract manufacturers stopped paying royalties to Qualcomm for Apple handset sales. Tr. at 836:16-25. According to Jeff Williams (Apple COO), Qualcomm then refused to provide Apple with any chips for new devices, although Qualcomm continued to ship Apple modem chips for older iPhones. As a result, Williams testified at trial, none of Apple's 2018 handset models contain Qualcomm modem chips and Apple has purchased modem chips for 2018 handsets solely from Intel:

> Qualcomm has continued to ship us product on the design wins that they have and had at the time. And so they have continued to sell us chips. We have been unable to get them to support us on new design wins past that time, and this has been a challenge. . . . We — I contacted Qualcomm, I contacted Steve, I sent him e-mails, I called. We tried to get them to sell us chips, and they would not.

Tr. at 890:13-24. Tony Blevins (Apple Vice President of Procurement) similarly testified that Apple's lawsuit spurred Qualcomm to use chip leverage: "At the time we made those challenges, Qualcomm [196] was no longer willing to sell us chips. That was very obvious, very apparent to us. And so we went right back to the no license, no chips, that we were facing back in 2005." Tr. at 711:12-16.

In sum, Qualcomm engaged in anticompetitive conduct with respect to Apple by (1) refusing to sell Apple modem chips or even share sample chips until Apple signed a license; (2) eliminating a competing standard supported by Intel; (3) attempting to require Apple to cross-license its entire patent portfolio to Qualcomm; and (4) and using Qualcomm's monopoly power to enter exclusive deals with Apple that foreclosed Qualcomm's rivals from selling modem chips to Apple from 2011 to September 2016.

11. VIVO

Qualcomm engaged in anticompetitive conduct toward VIVO by using the threat of cutting off VIVO's chip supply to enter an exclusive agreement with VIVO that prevented VIVO from using MediaTek modem chips even though the MediaTek chips had competitive advantages and were more compatible with VIVO's handset.

On December 24, 2015, Sanjay Mehta (QCT China Senior Vice President) emailed Derek Aberle (Qualcomm President), Cristiano Amon (QCT President), and Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and [197] General Manager) and stated that QCT could secure modem chip exclusivity with VIVO, if QTL would permit QCT to continue shipping modem chips to VIVO while VIVO negotiated a patent license with QTL. Sanjay Mehta explained that MediaTek, Qualcomm's rival, had a modem chip model that was more compatible with VIVO's handset, and that Qualcomm could eliminate the threat [*739] of VIVO using MediaTek with an exclusive agreement:

> The objective of this email is to request confirmation from you such that if VIVO negotiates it's [sic] QTL license in good faith that QCT will continue shipping chipsets. There is a summary deal below which makes sense for QCT to drive for various reasons (essentially we can achieve 100% of VIVO's roadmap in the face of 1) MTK has pin for pin and software compatibility and 2) other OEMs utilizing an inferior chipset with larger memory) and moving the market towards a QCT solution.

Under the "summary deal" with VIVO, Qualcomm would secure exclusivity if Qualcomm did not cut off Qualcomm's chip supply. Mehta's email summarizing the deal stated: "What VIVO will commit to (pending QTL confirmation that if VIVO continues to negotiate with QTL in good faith, QCT will [198] continue shipping chipsets) . . . will not launch 6755/6750 based handsets (which means QCT will win significant upside in 2016)." CX5321-002. Cristiano Amon (Qualcomm President) testified that the 6755 and 6750 modem chips were MediaTek modem chips that had "competition advantages . . . and software compatibility with whatever the incumbent chipset in VIVO was." Tr. at 509:13-510:7.

Even without an explicit threat from Qualcomm, the implicit threat that Qualcomm could cut off VIVO's chip supply was significant enough to convince VIVO to permanently stop working with MediaTek as soon as Qualcomm promised to ensure VIVO's chip supply, according to Sanjay Mehta's email: "VIVO CTO Mr. Shi has informed MTK that R&D on 6755/50 will be paused till Feb'16; between now and Feb, if QTL provides confirmation that if VIVO continues to negotiate with QTL in good faith, QCT will continue shipping chipsets, then VIVO will make that official & permanent." CX5321-002.

In sum, Qualcomm engaged in anticompetitive conduct by using the threat of cutting off VIVO's chip supply to enter an exclusive agreement with VIVO that prevented VIVO from using MediaTek modem chips even though the MediaTek chips had [199] competitive advantages and were more compatible with VIVO's handset.

12. Wistron

Qualcomm engaged in anticompetitive conduct toward Wistron by using Qualcomm's royalty rate to impose a surcharge on a MediaTek modem chip that Wistron otherwise thought was the most competitive for Wistron's devices and by refusing to give Wistron a list of Qualcomm's patents during patent license negotiations.

Apple does not manufacture iPhones and iPads itself but instead uses third-party manufacturers ("contract manufacturers") to manufacture those products. ECF No. 1326 at 3. The contract manufacturers that currently manufacture iPhones and/or iPads for Apple include: (i) FIH Mobile Ltd., Hon Hai Precision Industry Co., Ltd., and Foxconn International Holdings Limited (collectively, "Foxconn"); (ii) Pegatron; (iii) Wistron; and (iv) Compal Electronics, Inc. Id. at 4. Qualcomm and Wistron entered a CDMA SULA effective May 23, 2007. Id.

Under the Wistron SULA, which is perpetual, Wistron paid Qualcomm a [TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT] upfront fee and pays a 5% running royalty on handsets. JX0042-011, -014 to -015. Brian Chong (Wistron Chief of New Technology Development and Product Planning) testified that Wistron [200] could not afford to use MediaTek's modem chips because Qualcomm imposes onerous royalty payments on MediaTek's chips. This is true even when MediaTek's chips' price and specification are best suitable for Wistron's [*740] products. Specifically, Chong testified as follows:

> [T]here was a case that I remember in particular when we were considering introducing lower cost phones. And MTK was the chip supplier that we think best suitable for that product position in terms of price position and the spec corresponding that it offers. However, in the end we decided to stay Qualcomm for the simple reason that because Qualcomm responded that, even if we're using non-Qualcomm chips, we would still have to pay the onerous royalty that Qualcom dictated in the SULA.

Chong Depo. 256:9-20. Chong also testified that the upfront fee Wistron had paid Qualcomm incentivized Wistron to buy Qualcomm chips rather than rivals' chips: "So by staying with Qualcomm we would be able to recoup that investment faster." Id. at 256:21-257:1.

Qualcomm also limited Wistron's ability to evaluate Qualcomm's patents, as Brian Chong testified: "I know for a fact that we asked for a list of patents and never got that" and "I'm sure [201] we asked for the possibility of only licensing a portion of Qualcomm patents" Id. at 312:6-8, 23-24. When Qualcomm denied Wistron's requests, Chong testified that Wistron felt it had little option but to enter the patent license to obtain business from OEMs: "In a way, we're forced into the situation that we need to sign. Otherwise we will lose the Dell business that opened up as an opportunity for us to get into the smart phone business with a major player." Id. at 361:3-7.

13. Pegatron

Qualcomm engaged in anticompetitive conduct toward Pegatron by withholding chip samples until Pegatron would sign Qualcomm's patent license agreement, which requires Pegatron to grant Qualcomm a royalty-free cross-license to Pegatron's patents.

Qualcomm and Pegatron entered into a CDMA SULA effective April 29, 2010. Under the Pegatron SULA, which is perpetual, Pegatron paid Qualcomm a [TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT] upfront fee and pays a running 5% royalty charged on handsets. JX0053-015, -020. Pegatron also granted QCT a royalty-free cross-license to Pegatron's patents for QCT to produce CDMA modem chips. JX0053-028.

Monica Yang (Pegatron) testified that Qualcomm made clear throughout negotiations that [202] Qualcomm would not sell Pegatron chips until Pegatron signed the patent license: "So even if you sign the CSA [component supply agreement], you cannot get a chip, right. So you have to have the SULA at place. And when I negotiate, I know, okay, you really have to sign the SULA to get the chipset." Id. at 184:21-25.

Monica Yang testified that Qualcomm even refused to provide Pegatron any chip samples until Pegatron signed a patent license:

> Q: And, in fact, Qualcomm did not even allow Pegatron to obtain any engineering samples or test chips if Pegatron did not first enter into a license with Qualcomm; right?

Id. at 244:23-245:5.

Monica Yang also knew that Qualcomm's consistent practice was to threaten chip supply: "[I]t's my impression, like, since beginning, you — if you challenge something against Qualcomm, you might lose the chip supply." Id. at 184:9-16. Yang testified that chip supply was essential for Pegatron to retain its contract manufacturing opportunities, such that Pegatron did not challenge royalty rate or license terms: "[F]or us the important thing is to get business from customer. So if we don't [*741] have chip, we cannot finish any business opportunity then. That's a big [203] damage to us. So we were under pressure at that time, and we don't have the bargaining power to negotiate with Qualcomm." Id. at 247:1-7.

In sum, Qualcomm engaged in anticompetitive conduct toward Pegatron by withholding chip samples until Pegatron would sign Qualcomm's patent license agreement, which requires Pegatron to grant Qualcomm a royalty-free cross-license to Pegatron's patents.

14. ZTE

Qualcomm engaged in anticompetitive conduct toward ZTE by threatening ZTE's chip supply. Qualcomm also internally discussed withholding engineering support from ZTE.

Derek Aberle (QTL President) recommended in an April 14, 2011 email to Jing Wang (Qualcomm), Mike Hartogs (QTL Division Counsel), and other Qualcomm employees that Qualcomm threaten litigation and emphasize its practice of not selling chips to unlicensed OEMs in negotiations with ZTE: "They should also consider the impact on their business in the US (e.g., with VZW) if we are forced to sue them for patent infringement. Finally, they should be reminded that we do not supply chips to companies that are not licensed." CX6658-006. Aberle testified that "VZW" is Verizon, a CDMA carrier. Tr. at 275:11-12. On April 16, 2011, after a negotiation [204] with ZTE, Aberle recommended that Qualcomm consider pulling resources from ZTE: "I think we should consider stopping support in several areas until we conclude the agreements, but let me speak to Jing before we make any decisions." CX6658-001.

Qualcomm also used chip incentive funds to convince ZTE to sign a patent license agreement. Derek Aberle (QTL President) stated in the April 14, 2011 email to Jing Wang (Qualcomm), Mike Hartogs (QTL Division Counsel), and other Qualcomm employees that QTL proposed to offer ZTE rebates that accrued on ZTE's purchase of QCT chips: "Starting in the quarter in which we sign we have proposed 1.5% of QCT chipset purchases for 2011, 1.75% for 2012, 2% for 2013, 2.25% for 2014, and 2.5% for 2015 and thereafter. To close the deal, I would be willing to increase the 2011 percentage to 1.75%." CX6658-005. At trial, Aberle testified that by "the deal," he meant ZTE's patent license agreement: "Yeah, the license agreement was part of the overall package we were discussing." Tr. at 275:2-6. A few months later, on July 19, 2011, ZTE and Qualcomm signed CDMA and OFDMA patent licenses. ECF No. 1326 at 9-10.

In sum, Qualcomm engaged in anticompetitive conduct toward [205] ZTE by threatening ZTE's chip supply. Qualcomm also internally discussed withholding engineering support from ZTE.

15. Nokia

Qualcomm planned internally to cut off Nokia's chip supply to ensure that Nokia renewed its patent license agreement with Qualcomm.

Derek Aberle (Qualcomm Legal Counsel in 2004) testified at trial that although Nokia and Qualcomm had a patent license agreement that would expire in 2007, "[Nokia] had an option to keep the agreement going if they wanted to." Tr. at 193:1-6. On December 16, 2004, Derek Aberle (Qualcomm lawyer and later Qualcomm President) wrote to Steve Altman (Qualcomm lawyer and also later Qualcomm President) that Qualcomm should threaten Nokia's chip supply to ensure that Nokia renewed the patent license agreement: "If Nokia refuses to exercise the option in 2007, we would have the right [*742] to cut-off their DO chips. This may be enough to keep them from stringing us out until 2008 when the option expires. Just a thought." CX7141-001. Steve Altman (Qualcomm lawyer and later Qualcomm President) concurred: "It is the exact thought that I have had." Id.

In March 2005, Matti Kauppi (Nokia) expressed concern in an email to Steve Altman (Qualcomm lawyer and [206] later Qualcomm President) that Qualcomm could cut off Nokia's chip supply: "As you certainly understand, once Nokia proceeds with Qualcomm as its chipset provider, any interruption in supply would bring serious consequences for Nokia. . . . The availability of components is a necessity for doing business." CX6979-001.

However, in May 2005, Steve Altman wrote to Irwin Jacobs (Qualcomm Co-Founder and former CEO) and Paul Jacobs (Qualcomm CEO beginning in June 2005 and son of Irwin Jacobs) that Qualcomm should still plan to threaten Nokia's chip supply: "I would stay firm on a position that we will ship them or an ODM [original device manufacturer] the chips and the latest versions we have only as long as they pay us the current royalties with no recourse, and as soon as they stop paying royalties, we stop shipping." CX6987-001.

Thus, Qualcomm planned internally to cut off Nokia's chip supply to ensure that Nokia renewed its patent license agreement with Qualcomm.

16. Threats and Chip Incentive Funds to Smaller Chinese OEMs

With respect to smaller OEMs in China, QTL has planned to cut off the OEMs' chip supply if the OEMs did not pay royalties and has offered chip incentive funds that induce [207] OEMs to agree to Qualcomm's patent license terms.

In November 2012, Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) wrote to Cristiano Amon (QCT Co-President), Steve Mollenkopf (Qualcomm President), Derek Aberle (QTL President), and Marv Blecker (QTL Senior Vice President) regarding Chinese OEMs: "Cristiano, This summarizes the conclusions we reached regarding sales of TD-SCDMA chipsets to customers that we anticipate will use them in TD-SCDMA/GSM products." CX5053-002. TD-SCDMA is a 3G standard used primarily in China. ECF No. 1326 at 3. In the email, Reifschneider stated that Qualcomm would cut off OEMs' chip supply if an OEM stopped paying royalties under any Qualcomm patent license agreement: "3. If any of these customers refuses or fails to pay royalties on any other (i.e., C2L [CDMA], UMTS, LTE) devices, we will discontinue supply to such customers as necessary." CX5053-002.

Cristiano Amon (QCT Co-President) replied-all to Eric Reifschneider's (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) email. Amon wrote that QTL and QCT had agreed on that plan of action: "This summarizes well the discussion between QMC [Qualcomm Mobile Computing, a division of QCT]/QTL and [208] the agreed plan forward. We will start communicating the plan to the customer base." CX5053-001.

Three years later, QTL and QCT had a similar plan. In a July 2015, Eric Reifschneider (QTL General Manager and Senior Vice President) recommended to Cristiano Amon (QCT President) and Derek Aberle (Qualcomm President) that Qualcomm threaten the chip supply of a few Chinese OEMs that were not paying royalties: "[W]e discontinue chip supply for the small handful of customers/licensees who have stopped reporting and paying royalties altogether (BBK, Gionee, OPPO, perhaps one or two other small customers) - [*743] and make sure they understand why." CX6530-001.

In addition, Qualcomm has paired chip incentive funds with negotiation deadlines to induce OEMs to sign Qualcomm's patent licenses. QTL funds and proposes these chip incentive funds, even though the funds accrue as rebates on QCT modem chips. In 2013, QTL proposed to offer the OEM Yulong $15 million in modem chip rebates. Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) wrote that Qualcomm should condition the chip rebates on Yulong signing Qualcomm's patent license agreement: "If we make this offer to Yulong it needs to have [209] a firm deadline on it (e.g., a 4G SULA signed by Sept. 30). CX6500-002. In red text, Jeff Altman (QTL Business Development) wrote: "Agree." Id.

Similarly, in 2013, Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) wrote to Derek Aberle (QTL President) and Marv Blecker (QTL Senior Vice President) during patent license negotiations with the OEM OPPO that Qualcomm could exchange chip incentive funds for a patent license commitment: "Think we have a good chance of getting them to take a 4G license now, if we are willing to give them (in addition to the $5M strat fund) a capped deduction for marketing expenses." CX6516-001.

At trial, Will Wyatt (QTI Vice President, Finance) testified that QTL created and funded similar Qualcomm chip incentive funds developed in 2016:

Q: And these new incentive deals were funded by QTL even though they were offered by QCT; correct?

A: Yes. These deals were, were created by QTL.
Tr. at 438:9-18.

Thus, according to a Qualcomm accounting memorandum, in April 2016 Qualcomm and Yulong reached two simultaneous agreements: Yulong agreed to a Chinese Patent License Agreement ("CPLA") on Qualcomm's standard 5% royalty terms, and Qualcomm offered Yulong [210] chip incentives through a Strategic Funding Agreement ("SFA"). CX7571-002. Under the SFA, QCTAP (QCT's Asia Pacific division) paid Yulong rebates of $.30 to $.60 per Qualcomm chip Yulong purchased, up to a total of [TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT]. CX7571-003. The Qualcomm accounting team concluded that QTL obtained the primary benefit from the two agreements: "The SFA was entered into by QCTAP but was negotiated primarily by QTL in connection with the execution of the CPLA and transactions will therefore ultimately be reflected in the QTL segment." CX7571-006.

In sum, with respect to smaller OEMs in China, QTL has planned to cut off the OEMs' chip supply if the OEMs did not pay royalties and has offered chip incentive funds that induce OEMs to agree to Qualcomm's patent license terms.

17. Summary of Anticompetitive Conduct Against OEMs and Resulting Harm

In sum, Qualcomm has engaged in extensive anticompetitive conduct against OEMs. In practices that are unique within Qualcomm and unique in the industry, Qualcomm refuses to sell its modem chips exhaustively and to sell modem chips to an OEM until the OEM signs a separate patent license agreement. To enforce those licensing practices, Qualcomm [211] has cut off OEMs' chip supply, threatened OEMs' chip supply, withheld sample chips, delayed software and threatened to require the return of software, withheld technical support, and refused to share patent claim charts or patent lists. In addition, Qualcomm has required OEMs to grant QCT cross-licenses (often royalty-free) to OEMs' patent portfolios and charged [*744] OEMs higher royalty rates on rivals' chips. All of these tactics ensure that OEMs will sign Qualcomm's license agreements and generally result in exclusivity.

In addition to these "sticks," Qualcomm has offered OEMs the carrot of chip incentive funds to induce OEMs to sign patent license agreements. Those chip incentive funds result in exclusivity and near-exclusivity and, by preserving Qualcomm's royalty rates, enable Qualcomm to continue to collect its unreasonably high royalty rates on rivals' chips. Lastly, in 2018, Qualcomm paid to extinguish Samsung's antitrust claims and to silence Samsung.

C. Qualcomm's Refusal to License SEPs to Rivals and Resulting Harm

Next, the Court discusses another element of Qualcomm's anticompetitive conduct, Qualcomm's practice of refusing to license its cellular SEPs to rival modem chip suppliers. [212] This practice has promoted rivals' exit from the market, prevented rivals' entry, and delayed or hampered the entry and success of other rivals. Without a license to Qualcomm's SEPs, a rival cannot sell modem chips with any assurance that Qualcomm will not sue the rival and its customers for patent infringement. Qualcomm's refusal to license its SEPs to rivals also enables Qualcomm to demand unreasonably high royalty rates. Below, the Court discusses Qualcomm's refusal to license rivals, and how Qualcomm's practice has prevented entry, promoted rivals' entry, and hampered rivals in the market.

1. 2008 Refusal to License MediaTek

Qualcomm refused its rival MediaTek's 2008 request for a patent license, and would only enter an agreement that restricted MediaTek's customer base. Qualcomm's refusal suppressed MediaTek's revenues and prevented MediaTek from being able to fund research and development for future generations of modem chips.

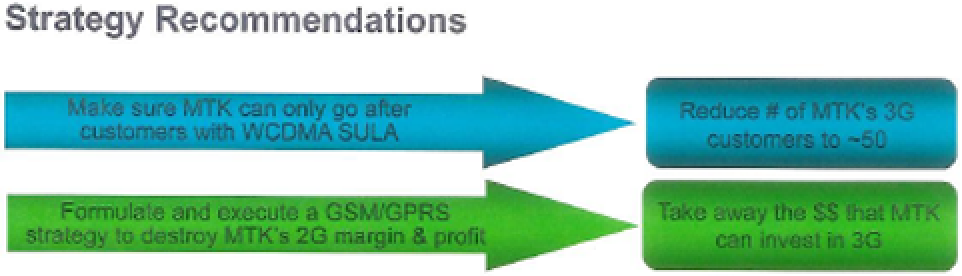
Finbarr Moynihan (MediaTek General Manager of Corporate Sales and Business Development) testified that when MediaTek was soliciting customers for its first 3G modem chip, OEMs uniformly told MediaTek that OEMs would not purchase the modem chips until MediaTek [213] had a license from Qualcomm: "[T]he kind of prevailing message from all of the customers I engaged with was that they expected us to have a license agreement with Qualcomm before they would consider purchasing 3G chipsets from MediaTek." Tr. at 336:13-16. Thus, Moynihan testified that the license requirement "sort of stalled the progress" of MediaTek's modem chip. Id. at 336:18-20. Moynihan testified that "somebody in the company reached out at some point to seek a license agreement from Qualcomm." Id. at 336:23-25. However, the negotiations went slowly, Moynihan testified: "We would have liked if they had gone faster. We felt like they were sort of maybe being slow." Id. at 337:8-10.

Ultimately, Qualcomm refused to enter a license, and would only offer an agreement called the CDMA ASIC Agreement. Id. at 337:11-17; see JX0050-001 (CDMA ASIC Agreement). The CDMA ASIC Agreement restricted MediaTek to selling modem chips only to "Authorized Purchasers," defined as "only those entities which have been granted a license by Qualcomm under at least Qualcomm's CDMA Technically Necessary Patents . . . but for only so long as such entities remain so licensed by Qualcomm," and included lists of [214] Authorized Purchasers. JX0050-006, -067. Thus, the CDMA ASIC Agreement gave Qualcomm the power to control to whom MediaTek, Qualcomm's rival, sold modem chips.

[*745] In addition, the CDMA ASIC Agreement imposed onerous reporting requirements. The agreement required MediaTek to report to Qualcomm "specific quantities" of modem chips that MediaTek sold to each Authorized Purchaser. JX0050-055 to -056. Thus, MediaTek was forced to give its rival Qualcomm sensitive business information about MediaTek's customers and the quantity of chips MediaTek sold to each customer.

In part due to the delay caused by the need for a license and Qualcomm's refusal, Finbarr Moynihan (MediaTek General Manager of Customers Sales and Business Development) testified that MediaTek's modem chip was outdated by the time it entered the market: "By the time we were really pushing it [in] the market, the requirements had moved on from what features the 6268 could deliver." Tr. at 338:10-12. Moynihan testified that Qualcomm's refusal to license also hampered MediaTek's ability to generate the customer base necessary to invest in future generations: "So not being able to generate profit revenue on 3G I think impacted our [215] ability to invest in 4G." Id. at 338:18-339:3.

Qualcomm had articulated such a strategy. A 2009 internal Qualcomm pricing presentation prepared within days of Qualcomm's CDMA ASIC Agreement with MediaTek includes a slide titled "Strategy Recommendations," which is reproduced below. CX5809-041.



The slide includes the strategy "make sure MTK can only go after customers with WCDMA SULA," with an arrow leading to "Reduce # of MTK's 3G customers to ~50." CX5809-041. The next strategy is "Formulate and execute a GSM/GPRS strategy to destroy MTK's 2G margin & profit," with an arrow to "Take away the $$ that MTK can invest in 3G." CX5809-041. Thus, Qualcomm's refusal to license MediaTek was designed to (and in fact did) limit MediaTek's customer pool and reduce MediaTek's revenue base to invest in future cellular generations.

2. 2011 Refusal to License Project Dragonfly

In 2011, Qualcomm refused the Project Dragonfly modem chip venture's request for a SEP license, which prevented Project Dragonfly from ever entering the modem chip market.

In 2011, the carrier NTT DoCoMo, several Japanese OEMs, and Samsung formed a joint venture called Project Dragonfly to design, develop, and sell modem chips. [216] CX2628-001 to -002, -004. Per the Project Dragonfly Joint Venture Agreement, NTT DoCoMo was to "provide the Company with reasonable support in negotiating with Qualcomm Incorporated in the U.S.A. a certain agreement necessary for the Company to implementing the Company's Business (the 'Q License Agreement')." CX2628-004.

Andrew Hong (Samsung Legal Counsel) testified that Project Dragonfly "wanted a license to be able to manufacture our own chips. And so we were trying to have NTT [*746] DoCoMo negotiate those rights, as well." Hong Depo. 176:3-11. However, Qualcomm refused a license, and Project Dragonfly failed to become a rival:

> Q: And I believe you testified earlier that NTT DoCoMo was unable to obtain such a license; is that correct?
> A: Yes.
> Q: And as you mentioned, that that [sic] failure to obtain a license was one of the reasons the joint venture did not proceed; is that correct as well?
> A: Yes.

Hong Depo. 173:3-10. Thus, Qualcomm's refusal to license Project Dragonfly contributed to Project Dragonfly's inability to enter the market.

3. 2011 Refusal to License Samsung

Around the same time that Qualcomm refused to license Project Dragonfly, Qualcomm also refused to license Samsung—a Project [217] Dragonfly member—out of fear that Samsung could enable Project Dragonfly to become a competitor.

Andrew Hong (Samsung Legal Counsel) testified that in 2011, Samsung requested a patent license, but "Qualcomm refused to provide license to manufacture chips, modem chips." Hong Depo. 81:19-21. Hong testified that Eric Reifschneider (then QTL outside counsel, later QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) refused to license Samsung because Qualcomm did not want to enable Project Dragonfly to become a rival:

> He was also aware that we were trying to enter into either joint ventures or license — licensing opportunities with third parties, and I believe he also aware of our, our attempts to form the, the Dragonfly JV that was discussed yesterday. So he was very adamant that we — that whatever modem chip of Samsung's was going to be covered under this agreement would not be that Dragonfly product. And he was aware that if we tried to develop our own chip, it would take several years. And Dragonfly was expected to be up and running within a year.
> So he was, he was very adamant that any such advantage in bringing in third-party technology to develop our modem chip product would not be permitted. [218] And he was very clear that he was not going to enable that through that — through this agreement and — give me a moment to think back and recall what he was talking about. I do recall he was very, very angry about this, and he said pretty much under no circumstances was he — was Qualcomm going to permit Samsung to, to have the advantage of, of bringing in third-party technology.

Hong Depo. 215:15-216:14. Hong testified that Reifschneider was aware that Project Dragonfly, given its joint resources, could quickly enter the market with a license: "He said to us pretty much, 'I know if you try to develop this on your own, it will take several years. And I'm not going to let you enter the market in a, in a year." Id. at 216:21-24.

Injung Lee (Licensing Lead at Samsung Intellectual Property Center) testified that Qualcomm's 2011 refusal to license Samsung prevented Samsung from selling modem chips to external OEMs: "In the end, Samsung was not able to obtain a license under which it would get to sell modem chipsets externally." Lee Depo. 227:7-9. Thus, in refusing to license Samsung, Qualcomm further ensured that Project Dragonfly could not enter the modem chip market and prevented Samsung [219] from selling modem chips to external OEMs.

4. Refusal to License VIA

As with MediaTek, Qualcomm refused to license VIA Telecom, a CDMA modem chip supplier, and entered an agreement [*747] that permitted VIA to sell modem chips only to Qualcomm licensees. VIA never cut into Qualcomm's CDMA market share and was eventually purchased by Intel in 2015, according to an Intel presentation. CX1598-004.

Qualcomm and VIA entered an ASIC Patent License Agreement that permitted VIA to sell ASICs "only to Authorized Purchasers for incorporation by such Authorized Purchasers in Subscriber Units." JX0007-007. The ASIC Patent License Agreement defined "Authorized Purchasers" as "only those companies which have been granted a license by QUALCOMM." JX0007-001. Thus, the CDMA ASIC Agreement gave Qualcomm the power to control to whom VIA sold modem chips.

In addition, the ASIC Patent License Agreement imposed onerous reporting requirements. The agreement required VIA to report to Qualcomm all of its sales of modem chips to each Authorized Purchaser. JX0007-017. Thus, VIA was forced to give its rival Qualcomm sensitive business information about VIA's customers and the quantity of chips VIA sold to each customer. [220]

Qualcomm's Authorized Purchaser requirement—in both the VIA agreement and the MediaTek agreement—came with serious ramifications. In November 2012, John Sun (VIA) sent an email to Luis Guerra (Qualcomm Contracts Specialist) to apologize for mistakenly selling chips to an unlicensed OEM and to state that VIA had immediately stopped shipments to that OEM:

We would like to inform Qualcomm that our team only realized earlier this month > that Hangzhou Asiafone Technology Co. Ltd. ("Asiafone") is no longer on the list of Sublicensed Affiliates, and that 236,050 units of CDMA ASICs was shipped by VIA Telecom in the months of September and October, with the last shipment taking place on October 29, 2012. We understand that Asiafone was removed from the August list of Sublicensed Affiliate, which was sent to VIA on August 25, 2012, but it appears that our team did not become aware of the fact until recently. As soon as we realized that Asiafone was no longer a Sublicensed Affiliate, we have taken steps to stop all further shipments. We are notifying Qualcomm of this incident at our earliest opportunity.

CX6552-001. Thus, through the Authorized Purchaser agreement, Qualcomm was able to employ VIA [221] to enforce Qualcomm's practices of not selling modem chips to OEMs without a patent license agreement and of cutting off chip supply.

With no license from Qualcomm, VIA was not able to generate a large share of the CDMA modem chip market. Todd Madderom (Motorola Director of Procurement) testified, "In my opinion, Qualcomm has not really had significant competition in CDMA. I think the VIA Technologies alternative IP that was out there in the world really wasn't a competitive threat." Madderom Depo. 206:6-9.

5. 2004 and 2009 Refusals to License Intel

Qualcomm has twice refused to license Intel, a rival modem chip supplier, which delayed Intel's entry into the CDMA and premium LTE modem chip markets.

In 2004, Sean Maloney (Intel) emailed Dr. Irwin Jacobs (Qualcomm CEO and co-founder) to propose that Intel receive a "license to Qualcomm patents in a completed cross-license agreement." CX7580-002. Steve Altman (then a Qualcomm lawyer, later Qualcomm President) responded to Maloney and Irwin Jacobs and rejected Intel's request:

> [A]re you suggesting that we change our existing licensing program such that a [*748] third party purchasing a CDMA ASIC from Intel would receive rights under QUALCOMM's patents? [222] If the later, given the negative impact that it could have on QUALCOMM's licensing program (which comprises a very substantial portion of the company's revenue and profit), we cannot agree to this proposal.

CX7580-001. Thus, Altman acknowledged that Qualcomm could not agree to patent exhaustion because doing so would reduce QTL's licensing revenues, which comprised "a very substantial portion of the company's revenue and profit." Id.

In 2009, Qualcomm again refused an Intel license request. Mike Hartogs (QTL Senior Vice President and Division Counsel) reported in an email to Steve Altman (Qualcomm President), Derek Aberle (QTL President), Marv Blecker (QTL Senior Vice President), and Fabian Gonell (QTL Division Counsel): "It was quickly made clear that Intel is not interested in a 'simple' mutual non-assert agreement. Just as in every past discussion, they claim their practise [sic] of indemnifying their customers renders meaningless to them receiving a covenant not to assert." CX6663-001. Derek Aberle confirmed at trial that Qualcomm had rejected Intel's request: "[T]here's no agreement in place granting any rights to Intel." Tr. at 311:22-23.

As a result, Intel did not generate a competitive [223] premium LTE modem chip until 2012, after Intel purchased Infineon and, according to Aicha Evans (Intel Chief Strategy Officer) invested "billions of dollars" to develop LTE. Tr. at 565:3-6. Intel did not begin to develop CDMA modem chips until 2015, when Intel was able to purchase VIA. CX1598-004. Aicha Evans testified that Intel did not release its first CDMA and LTE multimode modem chip until 2018. Tr. at 615:18-21. Thus, Qualcomm's refusals to license Intel delayed Intel's entry into the market.

6. 2009 Refusal to License HiSilicon

Qualcomm also refused to license HiSilicon, a modem chip supplier that is a subsidiary of the OEM Huawei. As a result, HiSilicon generally only sells modem chips to Huawei, and not to third-party OEMs.

According to Nanfen Yu (Huawei Senior Legal Counsel), Huawei asked Qualcomm for a license so that HiSilicon could sell modem chips to third parties: "We were seeking exhaustive license from Qualcomm." Yu Depo. 133:14-15. However, Yu testified that Qualcomm refused, and instead sent Huawei a draft ASIC Patent Agreement—similar to the MediaTek and VIA agreements—which was "only a covenant not to — which does not extend to HiSilicon's customer." Id. at 133:20-21. [224] Under the draft agreement, Huawei could only sell modem chips to Authorized Purchasers, defined as "only those persons or entities which have been granted a license by QUALCOMM." CX1009-003. Thus, Qualcomm controlled to whom Huawei could sell modem chips.

Nanfen Yu (Huawei Senior Legal Counsel) testified that Huawei refused to enter the draft agreement because of the onerous reporting requirements, and the requirement that Huawei promise not to assert its patents against Qualcomm:

> It requires a very broad nonassertion covenant from HiSilicon to Qualcomm. And it also requires that HiSilicon provide sensitive business information, including the customer and the quantity that we're selling to each customer. So those are the very sensitive business information as we're competitors — HiSilicon is a competitor of Qualcomm.

Yu Depo. 132:13-20.

Today, according to Finbarr Moynihan (MediaTek General Manager of Customer [*749] Sales and Business Development), HiSilicon is not a competitor for business from non-Huawei OEMs:

> Q: And have you ever changed MediaTek pricing in response to competition from HiSilicon at an OEM other than Huawei?
> A: No, not that I'm aware of.
> Q: And why is that?
> A: Same reason. I think [225] even more so we only see HiSilicon in Huawei phones.

Tr. at 327:16-21. Thus, Qualcomm's refusal to license HiSilicon has prevented HiSilicon from becoming a competitor for business from OEMs other than Huawei.

7. Refusal to License Broadcom

Qualcomm's refusal to license has also promoted rivals' exit from the modem chip business. Scott McGregor (former Broadcom CEO) testified that when Broadcom entered the modem chip business and asked Qualcomm for a license, Paul Jacobs (Qualcomm CEO) refused to license Broadcom:

> And I drove down to visit them in San Diego and I met with Paul and Sanjay[8] was in the office as well. . . . And I was surprised by the tone that Sanjay took and just was very aggressive and said, 'No, we can never work with you.' And, you know, 'We don't want you in the business.' And it was kind of alarming to me, and so I was sort of came to the conclusion that Qualcomm was going to be difficult to work with. And we subsequently tried to work out licensing terms with them and we didn't feel we could get reasonable licensing terms with working on that and we felt that may be blocking us in the space.

McGregor Depo. 151:3-14.

Qualcomm's failure to license Broadcom promoted Broadcom's [226] exit from the market. According to a 2016 internal Qualcomm pricing presentation, Broadcom exited the modem chip market in July 2014. CX8292-006.

8. Refusal to License Texas Instruments

Qualcomm also refused to license its SEPs to rival modem chip supplier Texas Instruments ("TI"), which promoted TI's exit from the market.

According to a June 2012 email from Marv Blecker (QTL Senior Vice President) to Derek Aberle (QTL Group President) and Fabian Gonell (QTL Division Counsel), Qualcomm had previously refused to license TI: "[W]e were also asked for licenses by Intel and TI at a minimum, probably others (e.g., Samsung, Mediatek) as well, and we refused to enter into anything other than a non-exhaustive covenant (or covenant to sue last in the case of SS and MT)." CX8285-001.

According to a 2016 internal Qualcomm pricing presentation, TI exited the modem chip market in November 2012. CX8292-006.

9. 2015 Refusal to License LGE

[8] There are two current or former Qualcomm executives named Sanjay (Sanjay Jha and Sanjay Mehta), ECF No. 1326, and it is not clear with which McGregor met.

Qualcomm also refused to license LGE, and LGE has not entered the market. According to an October 2015 email regarding LGE negotiations that Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) sent to Derek Aberle (Qualcomm President) and Fabian Gonell [227] (QTL Division Counsel), LGE had requested a SEP license from Qualcomm for LGE's potential modem chip, a request Qualcomm planned to refuse:

> Willing to have broad product coverage (as we already do in the existing agreements) but not willing to grant exhaustive [*750] license to LGE for chipsets (they don't even have a chipset business — they said they wanted a license just in case, and then they also said they wanted us to license other chip suppliers exhaustively so they could buy chips from them and not pay us royalties on that portion of our patent portfolio).

CX5179-001. Since Qualcomm's refusal to grant LGE a license, LGE has not entered the market as a modem chip supplier.

10. 2009 and 2018 Refusals to License Samsung

Qualcomm has also refused to license Samsung on multiple occasions—in addition to the 2011 refusal discussed above—which has prevented Samsung from selling its modem chips to external OEMs.

According to Andrew Hong (Legal Counsel at Samsung Intellectual Property Center), during license negotiations, Qualcomm made it clear to Samsung that "Qualcomm's standard business practice was not to provide licenses to chip manufacturers." Hong Depo. 161:16-19. Instead, Qualcomm had an [228] "unwritten policy of not going after chip manufacturers." Id. at 161:24-25. Samsung's internal notes from another Qualcomm negotiation demonstrate that Qualcomm's refusal to license restricted rivals from selling to third parties: "Qualcomm's business structure does not grant licenses to chipset suppliers, and grants non-assertion covenants to set manufacturers who are not Qualcomm licensees on the ground that they do not sell chipsets, restricting them from selling chipsets." CX2643A-001.

Hong testified that from Samsung's perspective, a promise not to assert patents against Samsung only did not provide sufficient security for Samsung's OEM customers:

> So as part of any chip manufacturing business, a lot of what we do is provide assurances to our customers that we have the rights to manufacture and sell chips. If there's any risk of being sued, meaning that the customer could not use the chip or would have to pay additional amounts, then those become problems for us that we have to address.

Hong Depo. 162:4-11.

In 2017, after the Korea Fair Trade Commission ("KFTC") found that Qualcomm had violated Korean law by "refusing to license, or imposing restrictions on licenses for, cellular communications [229] standard-essential patents with competing modem chipset makers," CX7257-099, Samsung again sought a license from Qualcomm for Samsung to sell modem chips. However, according to Seungho Ahn (Head of Samsung Intellectual Property Center), Qualcomm refused: "They have yet to give us a license." Ahn Depo. 105:9-11.

Qualcomm has also altered the agreements it offers modem chip suppliers in lieu of licenses. Alex Rogers (QTL President) testified at trial that as part of the 2018 Settlement Agreement between Samsung and Qualcomm, Qualcomm did not license Samsung, but instead promised only that Qualcomm would offer Samsung a FRAND license before suing Samsung: "Qualcomm gave Samsung an assurance that should Qualcomm ever seek to assert its cellular SEPs against that component business, against those components, we would first make Samsung an offer on fair, reasonable, and non-discriminatory terms." Tr. at 1989:5-10. Thus, Qualcomm has never licensed Samsung to sell modem chips.

As a result, Samsung is not a competitor to sell modem chips to external OEMs. Alex Rogers (QTL President) testified that Samsung's modem chip division, Exynos (also known as Samsung LSI), is not an external competitor: [230] "Samsung has a cellular [*751] baseband business that they make primarily for their own use." Tr. at 1989:5-6. Finbarr Moynihan (MediaTek General Manager of Customer Sales and Business Development) agreed: "We don't tend to see Samsung LSI as a supplier much outside of Samsung's own phones." Tr. at 327:14-15.

In sum, Qualcomm's refusal to license has prevented rivals' entry, impeded rivals' ability to sell modem chips externally or at all, promoted rivals' exit, and delayed rivals' entry. Qualcomm's refusal to license rivals has further limited OEMs' chip supply options, which has enabled Qualcomm's anticompetitive conduct toward OEMs, sustained Qualcomm's unreasonably high royalty rates, and required OEMs to spend more money on royalty payments to Qualcomm rather than on new technology and product development for consumers.

D. Qualcomm's FRAND Commitments Require Qualcomm to License its Modem Chip SEPs to Rivals

Next, the Court explains how Qualcomm's refusal to license rivals violates Qualcomm's FRAND commitments. The Court held on summary judgment that Qualcomm's FRAND commitments to two SSOs require Qualcomm to license its SEPs to rivals. Outside the context of this litigation, Qualcomm [231] and other SEP holders have advanced the same understanding of FRAND. In addition, Qualcomm's own recorded statements to the Internal Revenue Service ("IRS") show that Qualcomm previously licensed its SEPs to rivals, but stopped doing so because Qualcomm concluded that instead licensing its SEPs to only OEMs is "humongously more lucrative." Therefore, the Court rejects as pretextual Qualcomm's justifications for refusing to license its rivals. The Court discusses these conclusions in more detail below.

1. The Court's Summary Judgment Order

On summary judgment, the Court held that under Qualcomm's FRAND commitments to two cellular SSOs, the Telecommunications Industry Association ("TIA") and Alliance for Telecommunications Industry Solutions ("ATIS"), Qualcomm is required to license its SEPs to rival modem chip suppliers. *Fed. Trade Comm'n v. Qualcomm, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 190051, 2018 WL 5848999, at 7.

Although standards promote interoperability, standards also "threaten to endow holders of standard-essential patents with disproportionate market power." Microsoft Corp. v. Motorola Inc., 696 F.3d 872, 876 (9th Cir. 2012). As a result, the Ninth Circuit held in Microsoft v. Motorola that "SSOs requir[e] members who hold IP rights in standard-essential patents to agree to license those patents to all comers on [FRAND] terms." Id. (emphasis [232] added). These SSO intellectual property policies "admit[] of no limitations as to who or how many applicants could receive a license." Id. at 884. Three years later, the Ninth Circuit repeated the same principle: a "SEP holder cannot refuse a license to a manufacturer who commits to paying the RAND rate." Microsoft Corp. v. Motorola Inc., 795 F.3d 1024, 1031 (9th Cir. 2015) (emphasis added).

For example, under the intellectual property policy of TIA, a SEP holder like Qualcomm must commit to TIA that "A license under any Essential Patent(s), the license rights which are held by the undersigned Patent Holder, will be made available to all applicants under terms and conditions that are reasonable and non-discriminatory." *Fed. Trade Comm'n v. Qualcomm, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 190051, 2018 WL 5848999, at 3.

[*752] Consistent with the Ninth Circuit's precedents, the Court held at summary judgment that Qualcomm's commitments to ATIS and TIA to license its SEPs on terms "free of any unfair discrimination" prohibit Qualcomm from discriminating against rival modem chip suppliers by refusing to grant them licenses. *2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 190051, [WL] at 11. In addition, consistent with California contract law, the Court examined extrinsic evidence of the meaning of Qualcomm's FRAND commitments. The Court observed that guidelines to TIA's intellectual property policy specifically identify "a willingness [233] to license all applicants except for competitors of the licensor" as discriminatory conduct. *2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 190051, [WL] at 12. The Court further concluded that Qualcomm's contractual commitments to ATIS and TIA to license rivals are consistent with the purposes of SSO intellectual property policies, which require the licensing of SEPs to prevent a SEP holder from securing a monopoly based on the standardization of its technology. Id.

2. Qualcomm Had the Same Understanding of FRAND Outside This Litigation

Outside the context of this litigation, Qualcomm expressed the same understanding of FRAND as the Court's summary judgment ruling.

In a 1999 Qualcomm email regarding an Intel request for a license, Steve Altman (then a Qualcomm lawyer, and later Qualcomm President), wrote to Lou Lupin (a Qualcomm lawyer who became Qualcomm General Counsel in 2000) and Marv Blecker (QTL Senior Vice President) that Qualcomm's "commitment to the industry to license on fair and reasonable terms free from unfair discrimination would make it difficult to argue that we have the right to refuse to license [Intel]." CX8177-001 to -002.

Then, in 2000, Steve Altman (then a Qualcomm lawyer, and later Qualcomm President) complained in a letter to [234] Motorola that Motorola was not licensing its modem chip SEPs to Qualcomm despite "Motorola's commitment to the industry to license its essential patents." CX7799-001.

More recently, Qualcomm has repeated that understanding of FRAND. During a 2012 meeting with the IRS, Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) explained to the IRS that when SEP holders participate in SSOs, "as part of that you often have to make commitments that you will, you know, make that technology available to people who want to make products that practice the standard." CX6786-R at 33:1-7. Eric Reifschneider explained that refusing to license a rival modem chip supplier is "not a great, you know, position to be in in terms of defending yourself against, you know, claims that you've broken those promises to make the technology available." Id. at 33:11-17.

Similarly, Ira Blumberg (Lenovo Vice President of Intellectual Property) testified at trial that FRAND requires Qualcomm to license its SEPs to modem chip suppliers: "My interpretation of FRAND obligations does suggest that the licensor has an obligation to license any company that requests a license, whether it is a chip company, a device company, [235] or anything in between." Blumberg Depo. at 132:19-24.

3. Qualcomm Previously Licensed Rivals and Has Received Licenses at the Modem Chip Level

Consistent with its statements about FRAND outside litigation, Qualcomm has previously licensed its modem chip SEPs to rivals and received modem chip-level (as opposed to handset-level) licenses to other patent holders' SEPs.

Qualcomm told the IRS in 2012 that Qualcomm previously licensed its modem [*753] chips to rival modem chip suppliers. For example, Fabian Gonell (now QTL Legal Counsel and Senior Vice President, Licensing Strategy) told the IRS that Qualcomm had licensed rival modem chip suppliers: "The standard form for ASICs was a license, and royalties were charged. That was a limited license, but royalties were charged, and that changed some years ago so that it is now no longer a license and there are no royalties charged." CX6786-R at 22:18-22. ASIC is another term for modem chip. Similarly, Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) told the IRS that Qualcomm had previously licensed its rivals: "We don't collect license fees or royalties at — for chip sets, and we haven't done so for some time now." Id. at 15:9-11.

[236] Moreover, in a 1999 email, Steve Altman (then a Qualcomm lawyer, later Qualcomm President) stated to Marv Blecker (QTL Senior Vice President) that Qualcomm had licensed modem chip suppliers: "ASIC licensees pay royalties to QUALCOMM at 3% with no minimum dollar amount." CX8177-001. As the Court will explain below, Qualcomm later stopped licensing rivals because Qualcomm decided that it was more lucrative to license only OEMs.

Qualcomm has also received chip-level licenses to others' modem chip SEPs. At trial, Fabian Gonell (QTL Legal Counsel and Senior Vice President, Licensing Strategy) conceded that Qualcomm has received modem chip licenses from other companies:

Q: Qualcomm has had exhaustive chip-level licenses covering cellular standard essential patents from other companies; right?

A: Inbound licenses?

Q: Correct.

A: Yes.

Tr. at 1494:4-9. Specifically, Gonell conceded that Qualcomm has an existing license from Ericsson, id. at 1494:10-13, which Christina Petersson (Ericsson Vice President of Intellectual Property) confirmed. Petersson Depo. 26:5-10.

4. Other SEP Holders Have Granted and Received Modem Chip-Level Licenses

Other modem chip suppliers grant chip-level licenses to their modem chip SEPs. [237] Yooseok Kim (Samsung Intellectual Property Center Official) testified that Samsung has granted Google and Intel licenses to Samsung's cellular SEPs. When asked "[A]re you aware of any instances where Samsung gave a license to its cellular patents to a modem chip maker for the manufacture and sale of modem chipsets?", Kim answered "Yes, I am." Kim Depo. 29:24-30:3. Specifically, Kim identified Samsung licenses to Intel and Google. Id. at 30:4-12. As noted above, Ericsson also granted Qualcomm a chip-level license.

5. Qualcomm Now Refuses to License Rivals Because it is More Lucrative to License Only OEMs

Qualcomm stopped licensing rival modem chip suppliers not because Qualcomm's view of FRAND changed, but rather because Qualcomm determined that it was far more lucrative to license only OEMs.

For example, at the 2012 IRS meeting, Marv Blecker (QTL Senior Vice President) told the IRS that when Qualcomm licensed rival modem chip suppliers, revenue from those licenses amounted to only a tiny fraction of Qualcomm's handset royalty revenues: "[W]hen ninety-five percent of the royalties come from manufacturers of these things, and I don't know what the percentage was when we were collecting [238] royalties, but it had to be well less than one percent came from component suppliers." CX6786-R at 32:6-10.

[*754] According to a 1999 email Steve Altman (then a Qualcomm lawyer, and later Qualcomm President) sent to Marv Blecker (QTL Senior Vice President), Qualcomm received as little as $.30 in royalty payments per modem chip from modem chip licensees: "Other ASIC licensees pay royalties to QUALCOMM at 3% with no minimum dollar amount. Therefore, on a $10 ASIC, other licensees will pay us 30 cents." CX8177-001.

Qualcomm stopped licensing rivals because doing so could jeopardize Qualcomm's ability to charge unreasonably high royalty rates to OEMs. Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) told the IRS that if Qualcomm continued to license rival modem chip suppliers, a rival's modem chip sale to an OEM could prevent Qualcomm from collecting royalties from the OEM: "[W]hen [the rival] sell[s] that chip to somebody who's going to put the chip in a cell phone, okay, the licensee's sale of that chip will exhaust our rights and then we won't be able to collect a royalty on a cell phone that's based on the price of the cellphone." CX6786-R at 26:6-12.

Similarly, in 2004, Steve Altman (Qualcomm President [239] beginning in 2005) told Sean Maloney (Intel) in an email that Qualcomm could not grant Intel a license to sell modem chips to OEMs "given the negative impact that it could have on Qualcomm's licensing program (which comprises a very substantial portion of the company's revenue and profit)." CX7580-001.

Given the choice, collecting handset royalties is far more lucrative than collecting modem chip royalties. Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) so told the IRS: "[W]e collect a royalty on a cell phone that's based on the price of the cell phone, and that's a lot higher than the price of the chip. So given a choice, you're always going to want to collect a royalty on the cell phone, not on the chip." CX6786-R at 26:6-18. More simply, Reifschneider told the IRS that Qualcomm decided to "concentrate our licensing program and our licensing negotiations on the guys who make the cell phones and the base stations and the test equipment, because that's where the real money is." Id. at 27:1-16, 32:14-22 (emphasis added).

Thus, when the IRS asked whether Qualcomm's decision to stop licensing its SEPs to rivals was a "business decision," Marv Blecker (QTL Senior Vice President) [240] agreed: "Oh it's more than that, it's more than that. That's an understatement." Id. at 70:22-71:3. Blecker told the IRS that to license rivals would have "the potential of threatening our entire revenue stream at the handset level." Id. at 71:5-6.

Fabian Gonell (now QTL Legal Counsel and Senior Vice President, Licensing Strategy) agreed that Qualcomm stopped licensing rival modem chip suppliers because Qualcomm had to choose between licensing rivals and OEMs, and licensing OEMs is far more lucrative: "But having — having to choose between one or the other then you're right, obviously the handset is humongously more . . . lucrative for a bunch of — a bunch of reasons." Id. at 71:18-23. At trial, Fabian Gonell again conceded that it is "absolutely correct" that licensing OEMs rather than rivals is more lucrative. Tr. at 1492:7-11. Thus, Qualcomm stopped licensing its SEPs to rivals because licensing rivals could jeopardize Qualcomm's ability to charge unreasonably high royalty rates to OEMs.

6. Other SEP Licensors Have Imitated Qualcomm's Practice Because it is Lucrative

Following Qualcomm's lead, other SEP licensors like Nokia and Ericsson have concluded that licensing only OEMs is [*755] more [241] lucrative, and structured their practices accordingly.

At the 2012 IRS meeting, Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) told the IRS that Nokia and Ericsson have similar patent portfolios to Qualcomm: "[I]f you have a licensing program like ours — and to some extent Nokia and Ericsson do — they were also companies who participated in the development of wireless technology in the '90s and in the - 2000 decade, and they have large patent portfolios." CX6786-R at 42:11-15.

Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) told the IRS that Nokia and Ericsson have imitated Qualcomm's practice and license only OEMs in order to make more money: "[S]o they also — following our lead I might say — you know, decided hey, we can license these patents and make money by doing and we can make more money licensing this than licensing the chip. So like they licensed the cell phone, not the chip." Id. at 42:17-21.

A 2014 internal MediaTek memo, another contemporaneous document, confirms that Qualcomm and other SEP holders, like Nokia and Ericsson, refuse to license modem chip suppliers because licensing only OEMs is more lucrative. In the memo, Finbarr Moynihan [242] (MediaTek General Manager of Customer Sales and Business Development) wrote that evolutions in patent exhaustion law "caused many of the IPR holders to rework their licensing agreements and policies and in my experience they now go out of their way to make it absolutely clear that they are NOT licensing to the chipset company." QX0219-002. Previously, most SEP holders—including Qualcomm—would "license everyone [in] the supply chain," including modem chip suppliers. QX0219-002 (emphasis added).

Nokia and Ericsson's contemporaneous documents and statements contradict Nokia's and Ericsson's self-serving and made-for-litigation justifications for refusing to license modem chip suppliers. For example, in 2006, Nokia argued before the European Commission that Qualcomm's FRAND commitment to license its SEPs to a modem chip supplier was "unequivocal." *FTC v. Qualcomm, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 190051, 2018 WL 5848999, at 13. Specifically, Nokia "alleged that Qualcomm's termination of a modem chip license agreement 'after having induced SSOs to base . . . standards on Qualcomm's technology' breached 'Qualcomm's duty to license on FRAND terms' based on multiple IPR policies." *FTC v. Qualcomm, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 190051, 2018 WL 5848999, at 13.

However, to preserve its lucrative OEM licensing business modeled after Qualcomm, Dirk Weiler [243] (Nokia Head of Standards Policy) testified at the instant trial that Nokia follows FRAND "by licensing its patents on the device level." Tr. at 1672:4-6. To license at the "device level" means to license the OEM, not the modem chip supplier. Id. at 1674:14-17. This is diametrically opposed to what Nokia represented to the European Commission in 2006.

Despite opining about how the entire industry licenses modem chip SEPs, Weiler conveniently claimed complete ignorance about the specific licenses and licensing discussions of Weiler's employer, Nokia. Thus, Weiler was unable to answer any questions about whether Nokia had licensed its SEPs to modem chip suppliers: "I'm not aware of specific licenses from — inside of Nokia, no." Id. at 1688:17-18; see also id. at 1688:9-11 (Q: And you testified that you've never been involved in any licensing discussions at Nokia; right? A: This is correct, yes.). Thus, the FTC could not cross-examine Weiler about Nokia's 2006 statements to the European Commission. [*756] The Court finds that Weiler was not credible.

Thus, other SEP holders like Nokia and Ericsson have followed Qualcomm's lead and refuse to license modem chip suppliers because it is more lucrative [244] to license only OEMs.

7. Qualcomm's Justifications for its Refusal to License Rivals Are Pretextual

Qualcomm offers self-serving and pretextual justifications for Qualcomm's refusal to license modem chip suppliers. Qualcomm argues that refusing to license its SEPs to rivals and instead licensing only OEMs is procompetitive because the practice "reduces transaction costs, aligns royalties with the value of the licensed patents, and is much more efficient than the multi-level licensing that would be required if Qualcomm and other innovators licensed other than at the device level." QC FOFCOL at 128.

However, Qualcomm's own recorded statements to the IRS show that Qualcomm used to license rival modem chip suppliers, and that Qualcomm stopped licensing rivals because it is more lucrative to license only OEMs. Nowhere in QTL's long discussion with the IRS did any QTL executive raise concerns about multi-level licensing.

In addition, the unsupported trial testimony that Qualcomm offered to support its justification was not credible. Fabian Gonell (QTL Legal Counsel and Senior Vice President, Licensing Strategy) testified that if Qualcomm had to license modem chip suppliers, Qualcomm would have to engage in [245] multi-level licensing because some of Qualcomm's cellular SEPs read on a handset but not on modem chips. Tr. at 1433:12-14. Thus, Gonell testified, "Once you're in a world where you have to license a device anyway, it's just much more efficient to do one negotiation rather than two." Id. at 1434:5-7.

Gonell was not credible in multiple respects. First, Gonell pretended not to recall Qualcomm's 2012 IRS meeting until the FTC played a recording from the meeting with which Gonell disagreed. Second, Gonell's own recorded statements to the IRS, a U.S. government agency, contradict Gonell's prepared for trial testimony.

At trial, Fabian Gonell (QTL Legal Counsel and Senior Vice President, Licensing Strategy) initially claimed to have no memory of the IRS meeting:

> Q: In July 2012, you had a conversation with the Internal Revenue Service discussing Qualcomm's licensing practices. Do you recall that?
> A: No, but I've seen something that purports to be a transcript of that conversation. But I don't have a distinct recollection of that. . . . I really, at this point, don't have a, a memory of the meeting. But I have no reason to doubt that it happened.

Tr. at 1484:17-1485:5. After the FTC played a [246] clip of Marv Blecker (then QTL Senior Vice President) speaking to the IRS, Gonell continued to claim no memory of the meeting:

Q: So do you agree with Mr. Blecker that the ASIC patent agreements that he was describing that you've just testified about were not licenses?

A: . . . That is absolutely 100 percent Marv Blecker's voice. There is no question in my mind. I don't know who the woman on the tape is, but that is absolutely Marv Blecker's voice. So he said those things, absolutely. I just don't know what he means by those things so I can't tell you whether I agree with it or not.

[*757] Q: Okay. But you agree that that is something he said?

A: That is absolutely Marv Blecker's voice. I don't know what else is said on the tape. But that is 1,000 percent, to my ears, Marv Blecker's voice.

Q: Okay. And I'd like to play another statement from Mr. Reifschneider. Actually, excuse me. Is it a true statement that Qualcomm told the IRS that its ASIC patent agreements are not license agreements in reality?

A: Well, I don't know. No, I don't know. I mean, Marv Blecker said that. I don't know what the context was, and I don't know what else was said. So I don't know the entirety of what was communicated [247] to the IRS. But those words, whatever those words just, we just heard, Marv Blecker said for sure. But what was communicated and what was intended to be communicated, you know, I'd have to listen to the whole thing or read the transcript to try to understand.

Id. at 1487:23-1489:4. Then, the FTC played a clip of Eric Reifschneider (then QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) at the meeting, and Gonell continued to profess ignorance:

Q: Okay. And so that was a statement that Mr. Reifschneider made to the Internal Revenue Service on this phone — in this meeting; correct?

A: If this is — if this is a meeting of something with the Internal Revenue Service, I — and he's saying that to — that's who he's talking to, then, yes. It was clearly him talking.

Id. at 1489:17-23.

Finally, the FTC played another clip of Marv Blecker (then QTL Senior Vice President) at the IRS meeting, in which Blecker said that Qualcomm could not charge unreasonably high royalty rates if Qualcomm licensed rival modem chip suppliers. Specifically, Blecker told the IRS:

Yeah, but if I would average royalty on all the handsets that we collect royalties on — I don't remember what it is anymore, I used to know the number [248] — but if — if it were ten dollars, for example, you couldn't charge a ten-dollar royalty on a chipset that cost five dollars, or six dollars, or seven dollars.

CX786R at 73:10-15. Blecker (then QTL Senior Vice President) continued: "Yeah, and it would be hard to convince a court that that was a fair royalty also." Id. at 73:20-21.

In court, Fabian Gonell's (QTL Legal Counsel and Senior Vice President, Licensing Strategy) memory of the call suddenly returned:

Q: Are those statements made by Mr. Blecker and yourself on this conversation, in this conversation with the IRS?

A: Yes, although the conversation continued, and I expressed my disagreement with Mr. Blecker's statement.

Q: So you recall this meeting now?

A: No. I remember — I remember reading that.

Id. at 1490:24-1491:6.

Gonell's sudden recall once the FTC played a clip with which Gonell disagreed is not credible given Gonell's prior failure to recall the IRS meeting. Previously, Gonell would only agree that he recognized Reifschneider's or Blecker's voice. Gonell's demeanor in court when feigning ignorance was also not credible.

Most importantly, Fabian Gonell's (QTL Legal Counsel and Senior Vice President, Licensing Strategy) own recorded [249] statements to the IRS, a U.S. government agency, contradict Gonell's trial claim that Qualcomm refuses to license rivals to avoid multi-level licensing. Rather, Gonell told the IRS in 2012 that Qualcomm stopped licensing its rivals because licensing only [*758] OEMs is more lucrative: "But having — having to choose between one or the other then you're right, obviously the handset is humongously more . . . lucrative for a bunch of — a bunch of reasons." CX6786R at 71:18-23. Thus, Gonell's trial testimony was not credible, and the Court rejects Qualcomm's self-serving justifications as pretextual.

Accordingly, the Court concludes that Qualcomm's FRAND commitments—consistent with Qualcomm's prior actions and statements—require Qualcomm to license its SEPs to rival modem chip suppliers.

E. Qualcomm Has an Antitrust Duty to License its SEPs to Rivals

The Court now addresses whether Qualcomm has a duty under the Sherman Act to license its SEPs to rival modem chip suppliers. The United States Supreme Court has explained that, in general, "there is no duty to aid competitors." Trinko, 540 U.S. at 411. Nonetheless, "[u]nder certain circumstances, a refusal to cooperate with rivals can constitute anticompetitive conduct and [250] violate § 2." Id. For the reasons explained below, the Court concludes that Qualcomm has an antitrust duty to license its SEPs to rival modem chip suppliers.

One circumstance where a monopolist has a duty to deal with rivals is explained in Aspen Skiing, 472 U.S. 585, 105 S. Ct. 2847, 86 L. Ed. 2d 467. In Aspen Skiing, the defendant owned three of the four ski resorts in Aspen, Colorado, and the plaintiff owned the fourth resort. Id. at 585. The defendant and the plaintiff had, for many years, offered skiers a joint "all-Aspen ticket" that gave skiers admission to all four resorts. Id. at 589-90. Revenues from the joint ticket were divided according to the relative percentage of skiers that visited each mountain with the joint ticket. Id. at 589.

Believing that it could get greater revenues without the joint ski pass, the defendant offered the plaintiff "an offer that [the plaintiff] could not accept." Id. at 592. Essentially, the defendant would only agree to continue the joint ticket if the plaintiff agreed to a fixed percentage of revenue that was below the revenue that the plaintiff had historically received under the joint ticket. Id. Significantly, after the plaintiff refused the defendant's offer and the joint ticket was discontinued, the defendant also refused to sell the plaintiff [251] any lift tickets to the defendant's ski resorts, even though the plaintiff offered to pay the defendant retail price for the tickets. Id. at 593.

The United States Supreme Court found that the defendant in Aspen Skiing violated an antitrust duty to deal with its competitor. The United States Supreme Court explained the general rule that, "[i]n the absence of any purpose to create or maintain a monopoly, the [Sherman] [A]ct does not restrict the long recognized right of a" business to "exercise [its] own independent discretion as to the parties with whom [it] will deal." Id. at 602. However, in Aspen Skiing, there was sufficient evidence to show that the defendant had refused to deal with the plaintiff only because of the defendant's anticompetitive intent to maintain its monopoly. Specifically, as the United States Supreme Court later explained in Trinko, the Aspen Skiing Court "found significance in the defendant's decision to cease participation in a cooperative venture." Trinko, 540 U.S. at 409. The Aspen Skiing defendant's "unilateral termination of a voluntary (and thus presumably profitable) course of dealing suggested a willingness to forsake short-term profits to achieve an [*759] anticompetitive end." Id. Moreover, "the defendant's [252] unwillingness to renew the [joint] ticket even if compensated at retail price revealed a distinctly anticompetitive bent." Id. In those circumstances, the defendant's refusal to deal with the plaintiff violated the Sherman Act.

By contrast, the United States Supreme Court in Trinko held that Verizon did not have an antitrust duty to deal with its competitors. There, the Telecommunications Act of 1996 for the first time imposed on Verizon an obligation to share its telephone network with its rivals. Id. at 402. However, Verizon did not process its rivals' requests "in a timely manner, or not at all." Id. at 404-05. Among other provisions, the Telecommunications Act required Verizon to allow rivals to actually enter Verizon's property and "locate and install [the rival's] equipment on the incumbent's [Verizon's] premises." Id. at 406.

Verizon's rivals sued Verizon and alleged that Verizon's refusal to deal was part of an anticompetitive scheme to harm its rivals and maintain Verizon's monopoly. Id. However, the United States Supreme Court in Trinko held that the plaintiffs had failed to show that Verizon's conduct fell within Aspen Skiing's exception to the general no-duty-to-deal rule. Id. at 408-09. Specifically, the Trinko Court [253] stated that the plaintiff's complaint "d[id] not allege that Verizon voluntarily engaged in a course of dealing with its rivals," or that Verizon would have ever have dealt with its rivals absent the Telecommunications Act's requirements. Id. at 409.

Moreover, the Trinko Court found further significance in the fact that, unlike the lift tickets at issue in Aspen Skiing, the sharing of Verizon's telephone network was "not otherwise marketed or available to the public." Id. at 410. Furthermore, elements of Verizon's telephone network "exist[ed] only deep within the bowels of Verizon" on Verizon's property and could only be shared "at considerable expense and effort" from Verizon. Id. Thus, the Trinko Court "conclude[d] that Verizon's alleged insufficient assistance to the provision of service to rivals is not a recognized antitrust claim under this Court's existing refusal-to-deal precedents." Id.

In MetroNet Services Corp. v. Qwest Corp., 383 F.3d 1124, 1131 (9th Cir. 2004), the Ninth Circuit discussed Trinko and Aspen Skiing and determined that the United States Supreme Court considered three factors "significant for creating antitrust liability" in Aspen Skiing that were not present in Trinko. First, the Aspen Skiing defendant's "unilateral termination of a voluntary and profitable [254] course of dealing." Id. at 1132. Second, the Aspen Skiing defendant's refusal to deal even if compensated at retail price, which suggested that the defendant's conduct was anticompetitive. Id. at 1132. Third, the fact that the Aspen Skiing defendant refused to provide its competitor a product that was "already sold in a retail market to other customers." Id. at 1133.

Therefore, MetroNet's three factors "significant for creating antitrust liability" guide the Court's analysis. See also *SmithKlineBeecham Corp. v. Abbott Labs., 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 164367, 2014 WL 6664226, at 4 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 24, 2014) (holding that an antitrust duty to deal exists where a defendant decided "to alter a voluntary course of dealing together with evidence of anticompetitive malice"). The Court discusses below how Qualcomm's refusal to license rivals satisfies all three factors relevant to the antitrust duty to deal.

1. Qualcomm Terminated a Voluntary and Profitable Course of Dealing

The first factor relevant to the antitrust duty to deal is [*760] whether Qualcomm terminated a "voluntary and profitable course of dealing." MetroNet, 383 F.3d at 1131. For example, in Aspen Skiing, the defendant discontinued offering a joint lift ticket after many years of doing so. 472 U.S. at 604. Here, because Qualcomm previously licensed its rivals, but voluntarily stopped licensing rivals even though doing [255] so was profitable, Qualcomm terminated a voluntary and profitable course of dealing.

As the Court explained at length in Section V.D., Qualcomm previously licensed its rivals, as its FRAND commitments require. For example, Fabian Gonell (now QTL Legal Counsel and Senior Vice President, Licensing Strategy) told the IRS that Qualcomm had licensed rival modem chip suppliers: "The standard form for ASICs was a license, and royalties were charged." CX6786R at 22:18-22. ASIC is another term for modem chip.

Licensing rivals was also profitable for Qualcomm, as Qualcomm received royalties on patent licenses to modem chip suppliers. In a 1999 email, Steve Altman (then a Qualcomm lawyer, later Qualcomm President) stated to Marv Blecker (QTL Senior Vice President) that Qualcomm had licensed modem chip suppliers: "ASIC licensees pay royalties to QUALCOMM at 3% with no minimum dollar amount." CX8177-001.

However, Qualcomm voluntarily stopped licensing its rivals. Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) told the IRS that Qualcomm no longer licensed its rivals: "We don't collect license fees or royalties at — for chip sets, and we haven't done so for some time now." CX6786R at 15:9-11. [256] Later in the IRS meeting, Reifschneider again emphasized that Qualcomm voluntarily stopped licensing its rivals: "So we'd gotten to the point where we decided you know what? We're not even going to try to collect license fees and royalties from guys who make chips." Id. at 32:14-16.

Thus, because Qualcomm previously licensed its rivals but voluntarily terminated that practice even though it was profitable, the Court concludes that Qualcomm voluntarily terminated a profitable course of dealing, and that the first factor relevant to the antitrust duty to deal is present in this case.

2. Qualcomm's Refusal to License Rivals is Motivated by Anticompetitive Malice

The second factor relevant to the antitrust duty to deal is whether Qualcomm's refusal to deal with its rivals is motivated by "anticompetitive malice." *SmithKline Beecham Corp., 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 164367, 2014 WL 6664226, at 4. In Trinko, the United States Supreme Court observed that the defendant's refusal to deal in Aspen Skiing "revealed a distinctly anticompetitive bent" because the defendant would not renew the joint lift ticket even if compensated at retail price. 540 U.S. at 409 (citing Aspen Skiing, 472 U.S. at 608). Here, Qualcomm's refusal to deal with its rivals reveals similar anticompetitive malice.

Qualcomm's own statements indicate [257] that Qualcomm refuses to license rivals out of anticompetitive malice. For example, in 2012, Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) told the IRS that QTL refuses to license rivals explicitly to avoid enabling competition to QCT, Qualcomm's chip business: "You know, we also have a big chipset business, you know, of our own, and we're also interested in protecting that, right?" CX6786R at 33:15-20.

In addition, refusing to license rivals preserves Qualcomm's unreasonably high royalty rates because if Qualcomm licensed its rivals, a rival's sale to an OEM could [*761] prevent Qualcomm from collecting royalties from the OEM, as Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) told the IRS: "[T]he licensee's sale of that chip will exhaust our rights and then we won't be able to collect a royalty on a cell phone that's based on the price of the cellphone." CX6786-R at 26:6-12.

Marv Blecker (QTL Senior Vice President) also told the IRS that Qualcomm refuses to license rivals to preserve its unreasonably high royalty rates, and that to license rivals has "the potential of threatening our entire revenue stream at the handset level." CX6786R at 71:5-6.

Similarly, [258] when Qualcomm refused Intel's 2004 request for a license, Steve Altman (Qualcomm lawyer, and later Qualcomm President) told Sean Maloney (Intel) in an email that Qualcomm could not license Intel because doing so would exhaust Qualcomm's patents and destroy Qualcomm's licensing program:

> [A]re you suggesting that we change our existing licensing program such that a third party purchasing a CDMA ASIC from Intel would receive rights under QUALCOMM's patents? If the later, given the negative impact that it could have on QUALCOMM's licensing program (which comprises a very substantial portion of the company's revenue and profit), we cannot agree to this proposal.

CX7580-001. Thus, Qualcomm's refusal to license rivals bolsters Qualcomm's unique practice of only selling modem chips to an OEM after the OEM signs a separate license agreement and helps Qualcomm avoid patent exhaustion.

In addition, Qualcomm admits that refusing to license rivals harms its rivals in the marketplace and that Qualcomm does so intentionally. In 2009, Qualcomm refused to license MediaTek and instead entered a CDMA ASIC Agreement that permitted MediaTek to sell modem chips only to Qualcomm licensees. JX0050-006. A Qualcomm [259] presentation shared with Will Wyatt (QTI [Qualcomm Technologies, Inc., the Qualcomm subsidiary that operates QCT] Vice President, Finance) within days of the CDMA ASIC Agreement reveals Qualcomm's intent to reduce MediaTek's customer base and ability to invest in future products. Specifically, the presentation includes the strategy "make sure MTK can only go after customers with WCDMA SULA," with the goals to "Reduce # of MTK's 3G customers to ~50" and "Take away the $$that MTK can invest in 3G." CX5809-041.

Thus, Qualcomm's contemporaneous documents and recorded statements to the IRS indicate that Qualcomm's refusal to license rivals is characterized by a "willingness to sacrifice short-term benefits"—like profitable licenses from modem chip rivals—"in order to obtain higher profits in the long run from the exclusion of competition" to QCT, Qualcomm's modem chip [*762] business. See MetroNet, 383 F.3d at 1132. Accordingly, with Qualcomm's anticompetitive malice evident, the Court concludes that the second antitrust duty to deal factor is present in this case.

3. There is an Existing Retail Market for Licensing Modem Chip SEPs

The third factor relevant to the antitrust duty to deal is whether Qualcomm refuses to sell [260] products "already sold at retail," such that the Court will not need to set the terms of dealing in a new market. Trinko, 540 U.S. at 410. For example, in Trinko, the "services allegedly withheld [were] not otherwise marketed or available to the public." 540 U.S. at 410. Here, by contrast, because Qualcomm and other SEP holders have licensed modem chip SEPs at the chip level—as the Court explained in detail in Section V.E.—there is an existing market for modem chip SEP licenses.

For example, in the 2012 IRS meeting, Qualcomm admitted that Qualcomm has licensed its SEPs to modem chip suppliers for royalties. Fabian Gonell (now QTL Legal Counsel and Senior Vice President, Licensing Strategy) told the IRS that Qualcomm had licensed modem chip rivals and "royalties were charged." CX6786R at 22:18-22. Similarly, in a 1999 email, Steve Altman (then a Qualcomm lawyer, later Qualcomm President) told Marv Blecker (QTL Senior Vice President) that Qualcomm licensed its SEPs to modem chip suppliers "at 3% with no minimum dollar amount." CX8177-001.

Furthermore, Qualcomm has received chip-level licenses to modem chip SEPs, as Fabian Gonell (QTL Legal Counsel and Senior Vice President, Licensing Strategy) conceded at trial. Tr. at 1494:4-9. [261] For example, Qualcomm has an existing license from Ericsson, according to both Gonell and Christina Petersson (Ericsson Vice President of Intellectual Property). Id. at 1494:10-13; Petersson Depo. 26:5-10. Yooseok Kim (Samsung Intellectual Property Center Official) testified that Samsung has entered chip-level cross-license agreements with both Intel and Google. Kim Depo. 30:5-12.

Thus, with an existing market for modem chip SEPs, this case is in stark contrast to Trinko, in which the "services allegedly withheld [were] not otherwise marketed or available to the public." 540 U.S. at 410. Therefore, the Court concludes that the third factor relevant to the antitrust duty to deal is present in this case. Accordingly, with all three factors from Aspen Skiing met, the Court concludes that Qualcomm has an antitrust duty to license its SEPs to rival modem chip suppliers.

Next, the Court discusses Qualcomm's exclusive dealing agreements with Apple.

F. Qualcomm's Exclusive Deals with Apple and Resulting Harm

The Court now explains how Qualcomm's exclusive deals with Apple, the 2011 Transition Agreement ("TA") and the 2013 First Amendment to Transition Agreement ("FATA"), violate the Sherman Act. Through the TA and FATA, Qualcomm [262] shrunk rivals' sales and foreclosed its rivals from the positive network effects of working with Apple, which the Court discusses below. In so doing, Qualcomm maintained the monopoly power in the CDMA and premium LTE modem chip markets that Qualcomm has used to sustain QTL's unreasonably high royalty rates.

The United States Supreme Court has held that agreements that condition benefits to the buyer on exclusivity may be de facto exclusive dealing contracts if the "practical effect" is "to prevent . . . a buyer from using the products of the competitor [*763] of the . . . seller." Tampa Elec. Co. v. Nashville Coal Co., 365 U.S. 320, 326, 81 S. Ct. 623, 5 L. Ed. 2d 580 (1961). The Ninth Circuit has held that an unlawful exclusive dealing arrangement "is an 'agreement between a vendor and a buyer that prevents the buyer from purchasing a given good from any other vendor,' and forecloses competition." Aerotec Int'l, 836 F.3d at 1180 (quoting Allied Ortho., 592 F.3d at 996 & n.1). "This inquiry requires that we look at the actual terms of the agreements; indeed, 'a prerequisite to any exclusive dealing claim is an agreement to deal exclusively.'" Id. at 1181 (quoting ZF Meritor, LLC v. Eaton Corp., 696 F.3d 254, 270 (3d Cir. 2012)).

1. De Facto Exclusive Dealing

The Court first addresses whether the TA and FATA were de facto exclusive deals. "In certain limited situations, discounts and rebates conditioned on a promise of [263] exclusivity or on purchase of a specified quantity or market share of the seller's goods or services may be understood as 'de facto' exclusive dealing contracts because they coerce buyers into purchasing a substantial amount of their needs from the seller." Aerotec Int'l, 836 F.3d at 1182; see also *Pro Search Plus, LLC v. VFM Leonardo, Inc., 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 169856, 2013 WL 6229141, at 5 (C.D. Cal. Dec. 2, 2013) ("[D]e facto exclusive dealing claims are cognizable under the antitrust laws." (quoting ZF Meritor, 696 F.3d at 270)).

Here, the Court easily concludes that both the TA and FATA were de facto exclusive deals because both coerced "[Apple] into purchasing a substantial amount of their needs from [Qualcomm]." Aerotec Int'l, 836 F.3d at 1182. Under both the TA and FATA, Apple received hundreds of millions in incentives from Qualcomm only if Apple purchased substantial volumes of Qualcomm modem chips. For example, under the TA, Apple would only receive transition funds if Apple purchased at least 80 million Qualcomm modem chips each year. JX0057-003.

Even more so, the TA and FATA functioned as exclusive deals by imposing substantial penalties if Apple purchased any modem chips from a Qualcomm rival. The TA would automatically terminate if Apple sold any "Apple product commercially that incorporates a non-Qualcomm cellular baseband modem," and Apple would forfeit all future TA payments. [264] JX0057-004. Under the clawback provision of the TA, Apple would have to pay back hundreds of millions in earned incentives if Apple sold a handset containing a Qualcomm rival's modem chip. Id. Thus, Tony Blevins (Apple Vice President of Procurement) testified that the TA's termination and clawback provisions effectively prevented Apple from buying modem chips from any supplier other than Qualcomm: "They made it very unattractive for us to choose a different chipset supplier. . . . So when we factor in the rebates that we would forfeit by using a different chip supplier, it served as a very strong disincentive for us to do so." Tr. at 689:18-23.

The FATA also included similar de facto exclusivity provisions. According to a June 2015 email from Will Wyatt (QTI Vice President, Finance) to Sanjay Mehta (QCT), Apple (whom Qualcomm code named "Maverick" or "Mav") would have to return $645 million in FATA incentives if Apple launched a handset containing a Qualcomm rival's chip before February 2016: "If Mav were to launch in Sept of 2015 we would get back $200M in VIF and $445M in MDF for a total of $645M in FYQ415." CX5767-001. The FATA would also terminate and Apple would forfeit future [265] FATA payments if during the term of the agreement Apple sold "a Non-QC Device commercially (i.e., more than 1000 units)." JX0057-010. Accordingly, Tony [*764] Blevins (Apple Vice President of Procurement) testified that the FATA, like the TA, effectively precluded Apple from buying modem chips from any of Qualcomm's rivals: "[I]t was very apparent to us that the very, very large rebates that that I mentioned earlier would make it a complete nonstarter to work with someone else." Tr. at 698:21-24.

Therefore, the Court concludes that the TA and FATA were exclusive deals that both coerced "[Apple] into purchasing a substantial amount of [its] needs from [Qualcomm]." Aerotec Int'l, 836 F.3d at 1182.

2. Anticompetitive Exclusive Dealing

Although exclusive dealing is a theory under both sections of the Sherman Act, exclusive dealing is not always anticompetitive. Feitelson v. Google Inc., 80 F. Supp. 3d 1019, 1029-30 (N.D. Cal. 2015). The Ninth Circuit has explained that there are "well-recognized economic benefits to exclusive dealing arrangements, including the enhancement of interbrand competition." Omega, 127 F.3d at 1162. For a buyer, an exclusive dealing agreement "may assure supply, afford protection against rises in price, enable long-term planning on the basis of known costs, and obviate the expense and risk of [266] storage in the quantity necessary for a commodity having a fluctuating demand." Std. Oil Co. v. United States, 337 U.S. 293, 306, 69 S. Ct. 1051, 93 L. Ed. 1371 (1949).

The exclusive dealing arena is one where § 1 and § 2 of the Sherman Act diverge to some degree, at least in terms of the showing required to demonstrate anticompetitive effect. The Ninth Circuit has held that "an exclusive dealing arrangement violates Section 1 only if its effect is to 'foreclose competition in a substantial share of the line of commerce affected." Allied Orthopedic Appliances Inc. v. Tyco Health Care Grp. LP, 592 F.3d 991, 996 (9th Cir. 2010) (quoting Omega, 127 F.3d at 1162). The "substantial share" standard has typically "been quantified as foreclosure of 40% to 50% of the relevant market." Feitelson, 80 F. Supp. 3d at 1030.

By contrast, "a monopolist's use of exclusive contracts, in certain circumstances, may give rise to a § 2 violation even though the contracts foreclose less than the roughly 40% or 50% share usually required in order to establish a § 1 violation." Microsoft, 253 F.3d at 70. Courts have also held that exclusion from market share is not the sole means to show substantial foreclosure. An exclusive agreement may substantially lessen competition if the agreement "severely limit[s] . . . competition for the most important customers." Kolon Indus., 637 F.3d at 452. For example, in Microsoft, the D.C. Circuit concluded that Microsoft's exclusive dealing harmed competition by keeping "usage of [267] [the rival's product] below the critical level necessary for Navigator or any other rival to pose a real threat to Microsoft's monopoly." 253 F.3d at 71. Beyond market share, other indicia of anticompetitive exclusive dealing contracts include "requirements terms, steep market-share requirements, [and] contract duration." Aerotec Int'l, 836 F. 3d at 1182.

The Third Circuit in ZF Meritor, 696 F.3d 254, addressed the anticompetitive effects of de facto exclusive dealing agreements between a monopolist transmission supplier and truck manufacturers (referred to as OEMs). In ZF Meritor, Eaton, the transmission supplier, conditioned rebates to OEMs on the OEMs agreeing to purchase high percentages of transmissions from Eaton. Id. at 265. OEMs maintained "data books," which listed the product specifications (including transmission options) that end consumers could request [*765] when purchasing an OEM's truck. Id. at 264.

Although the specific arrangements varied, the OEMs all received rebates only if they purchased between 70% to 97.5% of their transmissions from Eaton. Id. at 265. As in Qualcomm's exclusive deals with Apple, Eaton retained the option to "require repayment of all contractual savings" or to terminate agreements if an OEM did not meet the required purchase threshold. Id. Eaton also [268] required the OEMs "to publish Eaton as the standard offering" in their data books, and in two cases the agreements required OEMs to remove competing products from the data books altogether. Id. at 265-66. Eaton required the OEMs to price Eaton products preferentially as compared to those of its rival, ZF Meritor. Id. at 266.

The Third Circuit explained that "[e]xclusive dealing arrangements are of special concern when imposed by a monopolist," id. at 271, and gave the following example:

> [S]uppose an established manufacturer has long held a dominant position but is starting to lose market share to an aggressive young rival. A set of strategically planned exclusive-dealing contracts may slow the rival's expansion by requiring it to develop alternative outlets for its product, or rely at least temporarily on inferior or more expensive outlets. Consumer injury results from the delay that the dominant firm imposes on the smaller rival's growth.

Id. (quoting Phillip Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law ¶ 1802c, at 64 (2d ed. 2002)).

In evaluating whether Eaton's exclusive dealing agreements were anticompetitive, the Third Circuit looked at three principal factors. First, the Third Circuit concluded that Eaton's exclusive [269] deals with OEMs reduced the share of the market available to Eaton's competitors to approximately 15%. Id. at 286. Second, the exclusive deals were all at least five years in duration, and although the OEMs could technically terminate the agreements, the evidence showed that the termination clause was "essentially meaningless" in light of commercial realities. Id. at 287. Third, the Third Circuit observed that the exclusive deals included additional anticompetitive provisions, including the requirements to remove competitors from OEMs' data books and to offer preferential pricing on Eaton's transmissions. Id. at 287-88. Those provisions increased transaction costs on any sales of competitors' transmissions and "limited the ability of truck buyers to choose from a full menu of available transmissions." Id. Therefore, the Third Circuit held that Eaton's exclusive dealing agreements violated the Sherman Act.

As a point of contrast, the Ninth Circuit's decision in Allied Orthopedic provides an example of lawful exclusive dealing agreements. 592 F.3d 991. The defendant, Tyco, sold sensors to health care providers. Id. at 993. When Tyco launched a new product in 2003, Tyco offered health care providers discounts if the providers committed to [270] purchase a minimum percentage of sensors from Tyco. Id. at 995. Tyco also entered sole-source agreements with purchasing groups of health care providers, which gave the purchasing groups deeper discounts if the purchasing groups agreed to buy exclusively Tyco sensors. Id. The health care providers sued Tyco and argued that Tyco's agreements unlawfully restrained sellers of generic sensors. Id.

The Ninth Circuit found it significant that the Tyco agreements "did not contractually obligate Tyco's customers to purchase anything from Tyco," and instead provided discounts only if customers in fact purchased high volumes of sensors [*766] from Tyco or did so exclusively. Id. at 996. Therefore, health care providers were free to forgo the discounts and purchase lower-cost generic sensors at any time, such that a "competing manufacturer need only offer a better product or a better deal to acquire their [business]." Id. at 997 (quoting Omega, 127 F.3d at 1164) (alterations in original). The Ninth Circuit thus held that Tyco's agreements did not foreclose a substantial share of the market and did not unlawfully restrain trade. Id. at 998.

3. Qualcomm's Exclusive Deals with Apple Foreclosed a Substantial Share of the Market

As set forth above, an exclusive deal is [271] unlawful under the Sherman Act if the agreement "substantially foreclosed competition" in the market. Tampa Elec., 365 U.S. at 334. Here, Qualcomm's own documents recognize that exclusivity with Apple could in fact eliminate competition in modem chip markets because the remaining sales to other OEMs could not sustain a rival. Qualcomm's exclusive deals with Apple foreclosed rivals not only from Apple's market share, but also from the other benefits of selling modem chips to Apple that increase a modem chip supplier's standing in the industry. Qualcomm's exclusive deals with Apple also contain other anticompetitive indicia, including Qualcomm's intent to prevent Intel from selling modem chips to Apple. Lastly, Qualcomm's exclusive deals with Apple cannot be viewed in isolation, as Qualcomm has given several other OEMs chip incentive funds that further foreclose the market available to Qualcomm's rivals. The Court addresses each point in turn.

a. Qualcomm Recognizes That Without Sales to Apple, Competitors Could Not Survive

Exclusive dealing agreements are particularly fraught in markets, like the modem chip market, that are "highly concentrated" with few market participants. ZF Meritor, 696 F.3d at 284. Here, Qualcomm recognized that given [272] that concentration in the market, exclusive deals with Apple could eliminate competition.

For example, in an August 2010 email, Steve Mollenkopf (QCT President) told Paul Jacobs (Qualcomm CEO), Derek Aberle (QTL President), and Steve Altman (Qualcomm President) that if Qualcomm secured Apple exclusivity in the TA, Qualcomm could eliminate any competition from modem chip markets: "[T]here are significant strategic benefits as it is unlikely that there will be enough standalone modem volume to sustain a viable competitor without that slot." CX5348-001. Slot and socket are terms for a modem chip design win for a handset. Tr. at 775:8-10. Thus, by Qualcomm's own accounting, the TA could foreclose Qualcomm's rivals not only from a substantial share of the market, but from remaining in the market altogether.

b. Qualcomm's Exclusive Deals with Apple Foreclosed Rivals from Gaining a Foothold in the Market

In addition, Qualcomm's exclusive deals with Apple deprived rivals of all benefits of selling modem chips to Apple and thus from gaining a foothold in the market. Specifically, Qualcomm's exclusive deals with Apple foreclosed Qualcomm's rivals from: (1) a revenue boost critical to funding research [273] and development and acquisitions; (2) exposure to Apple's "best-in-class" engineering resources; (3) a foothold at Apple for future handsets; (4) opportunities to field test new products with Apple; (5) business opportunities from other OEMs; (6) enhanced standing in SSOs; and (7) opportunities to conduct early field testing and prototyping with network vendors and operators. Even though Qualcomm's own documents recognize that Apple's [*767] business generates such benefits for modem chip suppliers, Qualcomm attempts to define the foreclosed market by reference only to the five iPads that Intel lost in 2013 after Qualcomm entered the FATA. QC FOFCOL at 128. Alternatively, Qualcomm claims that Apple's own share of LTE handsets was never more than 41% in any single year. Id.

However, the Fourth Circuit and D.C. Circuit have both recognized that pure market share can be an inadequate measure of market foreclosure. In Kolon Industries, the Fourth Circuit held that it was sufficient at the pleading stage for the plaintiff to allege that the exclusive dealing agreements "severely limited [the plaintiff] from competition for the most important customers in categories needed to gain a foothold for effective competition." [274] 637 F.3d at 452. Similarly, in Microsoft, the D.C. Circuit found it dispositive that the monopolist's exclusive deals kept the rival's share "below the critical level necessary for Navigator or any other rival to pose a real threat to Microsoft's monopoly." 253 F.3d at 59.

Qualcomm recognizes that winning business from an OEM in one year can lead to repeat business with that OEM. Will Wyatt (QTI Vice President, Finance) testified that winning an OEM's business strengthens a modem chip supplier's ability to supply modem chips to that OEM in future years:

> Q: In general, winning one design with an OEM can improve that chip supplier's chances of winning business with the OEM in the future; correct?
> A: It depends if they do a good job.
> Q: But in general, that's a true statement; correct?
> A: If they perform, yes.

Tr. at 443:11-16.

Moreover, Qualcomm's own documents recognize that selling modem chips to Apple helps modem chip suppliers become more competitive. A 2012 Qualcomm presentation shared with the Qualcomm Board of Directors identifies Apple as the OEM that "matters most." CX6974-027. In that presentation, Qualcomm stated that Apple's business is strategically beneficial for a modem chip supplier because Apple is the [275] largest consumer of premium modems; Apple "challenges suppliers to provide best-in-class products" and thereby improves suppliers' products in the broader marketplace; and Apple's supplier receives the sales volumes necessary to fund research and development and produce continually advanced products. CX6974-028.

However, by striving to eliminate competition, Qualcomm's exclusive deals with Apple deprived rival modem chip suppliers of these benefits. As the 2012 Qualcomm presentation recognizes, sales are critical to investment in research and development. Similarly, Scott McGregor (former Broadcom CEO) testified that "the economics of being in the cellular baseband business are very sensitive to volume of customers" because of the investments necessary to fund research and development. McGregor Depo. 174:19-21.

In addition, sales help fund acquisitions to develop new technology. Intel acquired VIA in 2015, after Intel had won Apple's business but before the Apple handset had launched commercially. CX1598-001. Internal Intel projections indicated that acquiring VIA would only be profitable if Intel could supply modem chips to Apple; else Intel would not recoup its investment. CX1598-009. [276] Aicha Evans (Intel Chief Strategy Officer) testified that Intel's modem chip division was only able to pitch the VIA acquisition to Intel management after Intel won initial Apple business:

> Q: So ultimately did the fact that Intel acquired, or won Apple's business affect its decision to acquire VIA?
> [*768] A: Oh, yeah. There wouldn't have been a — I wouldn't have been — yeah, there wouldn't have been a discussion.

Tr. at 581:17-20.

Apple's engineering expertise also benefited Intel. As Intel and Apple continued to work together, Apple pushed Intel to accelerate its engineering, Aicha Evans (Intel Chief Strategy Officer) testified: "[O]n the 2017 launch, initially I had to run for a plan of record of 450 megabits per second, and [Apple] gently explained to me that that wasn't going to cut it, it needs to be 600. So eventually I'm sure we would have done it, but not in that timeframe." Tr. at 579:19-24. Similarly, Christopher Johnson (Bain & Co. Partner), who consulted for Intel, testified that engineering engagement with an OEM like Apple sharpens a modem chip supplier's products and leads to opportunities to customize products for that OEM: "[B]y working with a customer and having access to their [277] products and their engineering teams, you can customize your products and basically improve your pace of innovation in the features you're bringing out." Tr. at 1854:16-23.

Working with Apple may also generate business opportunities with other OEMs. Aicha Evans (Intel Chief Strategy Officer) testified that after Intel won Apple's business, other OEMs reached out about Intel's modem chips: "Lenovo is an example, LG is an example, Motorola is an example, Tesla is an example." Tr. at 576:20-577:4.

In addition, sales to OEMs also provide modem chip suppliers with opportunities to field test modem chips in real-world conditions. Finbarr Moynihan (MediaTek General Manager of Customer Sales and Business Development) testified that field testing sharpens a supplier's product and helps a supplier spot technical issues: "[I]f you're launching a new modem generation into the market, it takes certainly some time to get it into production, launch it with multiple OEMs into multiple operator networks and operators, network operators, and iron out any of the issues, the bugs that it might find in the field." Tr. at 365:20-25. During generational transitions especially, Moynihan testified, OEMs can [278] "help us as a supplier and navigate some of those transitions without falling down." Id. at 339:19-340:4.

Furthermore, Aicha Evans (Intel Chief Strategy Officer) testified that when working with Apple, a modem chip supplier gains increased standing in SSOs and with operators (also referred to as carriers, like Verizon): "You also get what I call the halo effect of better presence in the standards, not just presence, but better weight in terms of your contributions, in terms of starting to get leadership positions. Same thing with the operators, because these devices eventually end up on their network." Tr. at 569:9-15.

Sales to OEMs like Apple also attract interest from operators and network vendors, who engage successful modem chip suppliers for field testing and early prototyping. For example, Stefan Wolff (Intel Engineer) explained in an internal Intel email that winning Apple's business improved Intel's standing with operators and network vendors, and gave Intel opportunities to conduct early field-testing of its newest products. Those early testing opportunities and the revenue from the Apple business would accelerate Intel's development of new products:

> We will attract operators [279] and network vendors to do early prototyping / field testing with our latest LTE platforms given Apples [sic] huge volumes in the field. This will speed up the development, hardening, and TTM of our modem technology and help us to providing leading [sic] LTE IP for emerging markets like China. The Apple business will boost our modem revenue and will support the [*769] funding of our next generation LTE 7460 on IA and 14nm Intel process.

Here, however, Qualcomm's exclusive deals with Apple deprived rival modem chip suppliers of the foregoing benefits of selling modem chips to Apple. See Kolon Indus., 637 F.3d at 452 (holding that exclusive dealing agreements are unlawful where they "severely limit[] . . . competition for the most important customers in categories needed to gain a foothold for effective competition"). Specifically, Qualcomm's exclusive deals foreclosed rivals from: (1) a revenue boost critical to funding research and development and acquisitions; (2) exposure to Apple's "best-in-class" engineering resources; (3) a foothold at Apple for future handsets; (4) opportunities to field test new products with Apple; (5) business opportunities from other OEMs; (6) enhanced standing in SSOs; and (7) opportunities [280] to conduct early field testing and prototyping with network vendors and operators.

c. Anticompetitive Indicia

Moreover, Qualcomm's exclusive deals with Apple contain other indicia that Qualcomm's exclusive deals with Apple were anticompetitive. See ZF Meritor, 696 F.3d at 289 (noting, in addition to exclusivity requirements, that the exclusive deals "included numerous provisions raising anticompetitive concerns"). Specifically, Qualcomm intended to foreclose rivals from selling modem chips to Apple and prevented Apple from initiating patent litigation against Qualcomm, which could jeopardize Qualcomm's licensing business.

Qualcomm sought exclusivity in the FATA after learning that Apple planned to buy modem chips from Qualcomm's rival Intel. At trial, Tony Blevins (Apple Vice President of Procurement) testified that in 2012, prior to the execution of the FATA, Apple planned to use an Intel modem chip for a 2013 iPad as a test run before using Intel in an iPhone:

> At one point in time we had an official plan of record that we would implement Intel on an iPad product launch, and that would give us confidence to extend their presence into an iPhone. We felt that iPad was a simpler transition because it was data only, [281] and then we would add voice as we moved to phone.

Tr. at 690:5-10. J86 was Apple's code name for the iPad Mini 2. Id. at 692:9-10.

Qualcomm knew that Apple wanted to source from Intel. Eric Koliander (QCT Vice President, Sales) sent a December 2012 email about Apple's sourcing plans, which Steve Mollenkopf (Qualcomm President) received. CX5378-002. Koliander reported in the email, "Maverick [Qualcomm's code name for Apple] does appear to be working with Intel and we believe, Mav has assigned software and hardware engineering resources to the development of an Intel based platform." Id.

Qualcomm's post-deal evaluations of the FATA highlighted that the FATA prevented Apple from working with a second source. Steve Mollenkopf (Qualcomm President) explained in a March 2013 internal email to Cristiano Amon (QCT Co-President) and other Qualcomm executives that the FATA eliminated the Intel threat: "I understand it but the scenario is really that there would have been a license fight as well and a push for alternative source." CX7910-001.

The TA and FATA also included other anticompetitive provisions, as each would automatically terminate "[i]f Apple or any of its Affiliates initiates any action [282] or litigation against Qualcomm, its Affiliates, or the foundries which includes any claim for intellectual property infringement." JX0057-004. By preventing Apple—a particularly [*770] important OEM—from engaging in litigation over Qualcomm's patents, these provisions further impaired "the health of the competitive process." Roland Mach. Co. v. Dresser Indus., Inc., 749 F.2d 380, 394 (7th Cir. 1984).

d. The Duration of Qualcomm's Exclusive Agreements with Apple Compounds their Anticompetitive Effect

The five-year duration of Qualcomm's exclusive deals with Apple also makes them unlawful. The Ninth Circuit has upheld exclusive dealing agreements of "short duration." Christofferson Dairy, Inc. v. MMM Sales, Inc., 849 F.2d 1168, 1173 (9th Cir. 1988); see also Omega Envtl., 127 F.3d at 1163 (noting that the "easy terminability" of an exclusive deal renders it less likely to foreclose competition).

Although there is no set duration past which an exclusive dealing agreement is no longer "short," the United States Supreme Court upheld the FTC's determination that in an industry characterized by significant entry barriers, exclusive dealing agreements stretching beyond one year were unlawful. Fed. Trade Comm'n v. Mot. Picture Adv. Serv. Co., 344 U.S. 392, 396, 73 S. Ct. 361, 97 L. Ed. 426, 49 F.T.C. 1730 (1953). Similarly, the Third Circuit in ZF Meritor found unlawful exclusive dealing agreements that stretched "for at least five years." 696 F.3d at 287. Such long-term agreements were "unprecedented" in the transmissions [283] industry. Id.

Here, the TA and the FATA together secured Qualcomm exclusivity with Apple for over five years, and Qualcomm identifies no other exclusive deals in the industry of comparable duration. The clawback provisions, which imperiled $645 million in earned incentives if Apple purchased modem chips from a Qualcomm rival, meant that neither agreement was at all "easily terminable." Thus, the five-year duration of Qualcomm's exclusive deals with Apple further renders the agreements anticompetitive.

e. Qualcomm's Other Exclusive Deals Compounded the Effect of Qualcomm's Exclusive Deals with Apple

Qualcomm's exclusive deals with Apple cannot be viewed in isolation. Qualcomm has a pattern of seeking this type of exclusivity with other OEMs, which further restricts the market available to rivals.

For example, in 2010, Qualcomm gave BlackBerry [TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT] million in chip incentives, which BlackBerry received as rebates on QCT modem chips, according to the contemporaneous notes of John Grubbs (BlackBerry Senior Director of Intellectual Property Transactions). CX3255-002. Grubbs testified that because Qualcomm did not reduce BlackBerry's overall royalty burden, the chip incentive [284] fund reduced the effective price of only Qualcomm modem chips, and resulted in exclusivity:

> BlackBerry is going to pay the royalty, regardless of whether it buys the chip from Qualcomm or Marvell. If — if Qualcomm agreed to reduce the royalty, then BlackBerry could buy the chips from Qualcomm or Marvell and still get the benefit of that reduced price. If Qualcomm reduces the chip cost, then we can only go to one person in order to take advantage of that and that's Qualcomm. So we can't go to Marvell and take advantage of a reduction in chip price unless they're going to get this reduction too.

Similarly, a 2004 QTL chip incentive fund required LGE to purchase at least 85% of its modem chips from QCT to be eligible for the chip incentives. CX6809-004.

[*771] In 2003, Qualcomm's chip incentive fund required Samsung to purchase at least 85% of its modem chips from QCT in 2003 to "take market share from manufacturers that do not use our ASICs," according to Irwin Jacobs (Qualcomm Co-Founder). CX6719-002. As recently as 2018, Qualcomm's chip incentive fund required Samsung to purchase from Qualcomm 100% of Samsung's premium modem chips and at least a certain number of medium [285] and high tier modem chips. JX0122-036.

In 2013, QTL offered Lenovo $180 million in chip incentives that were contingent on Lenovo purchasing at least 80 million modem chips from QCT over two years. CX6491-003.

In 2016, QTL offered Motorola a chip incentive fund that Motorola concluded would reduce Motorola's effective royalty rate to 3.8% only if Motorola purchased 100% of its modem chips from Qualcomm. CX2060-021.

In addition, Qualcomm used the threat of chip supply to preclude MediaTek from selling modem chips to VIVO, even though MediaTek's modem chips were more compatible with VIVO's handset. In a December 24, 2015 email, Sanjay Mehta told Derek Aberle (Qualcomm President), Cristiano Amon (QCT President), and Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) that if Qualcomm committed to ensuring VIVO's chip supply, VIVO would stop working with MediaTek: "What VIVO will commit to (pending QTL confirmation that if VIVO continues to negotiate with QTL in good faith, QCT will continue shipping chipsets) . . . will not launch 6755/6750 based handsets (which means QCT will win significant upside in 2016)." CX5321-002. Cristiano Amon (Qualcomm President) testified that [286] the 6755 and 6750 modem chips were MediaTek modem chips that had "competition advantages . . . and software compatibility with whatever the incumbent chipset in VIVO was." Tr. at 509:13-510:7.

Similarly, Brian Chong (Wistron Chief of New Technology Development and Product Planning) testified that Wistron could not afford to use MediaTek's modem chips because Qualcomm imposes onerous royalty payments on MediaTek's chips. This is true even when MediaTek's chips' price and specification are best suitable for Wistron's products. Specifically, Chong testified as follows:

> [T]here was a case that I remember in particular when we were considering introducing lower cost phones. And MTK was the chip supplier that we think best suitable for that product position in terms of price position and the spec corresponding that it offers. However, in the end we decided to stay Qualcomm for the simple reason that because Qualcomm responded that, even if we're using non-Qualcomm chips, we would still have to pay the onerous royalty that Qualcom dictated in the SULA.

Chong Depo. 256:9-20. Chong also testified that the upfront fee Wistron had paid Qualcomm incentivized Wistron to buy Qualcomm chips rather than [287] rivals' chips: "So by staying with Qualcomm we would be able to recoup that investment faster." Id. at 256:21-257:1.

All of these agreements either resulted in or would have resulted in exclusivity, and further restricted the market available to rival modem chip suppliers. The cumulative impact of Qualcomm's pattern of exclusive deals is to suppress the OEM sales available to rival modem chip suppliers and to substantially foreclose the market available to rivals.

Accordingly, the Court concludes that because Qualcomm's exclusive deals with Apple foreclosed a "substantial share" of the modem chip market, Qualcomm's exclusive [*772] deals violate the Sherman Act. Tampa Elec., 365 U.S. at 327.

4. Qualcomm's Sales of Modem Chips to Apple Were Profitable Without Exclusivity

Qualcomm's own documents and testimony show that selling modem chips to Apple was profitable for Qualcomm without exclusivity. A 2011 Qualcomm slide deck, which James Thompson (Qualcomm CTO) and Steve Mollenkopf (Qualcomm President) received, represents final approval of the "Elan" chipset. CX6334-001. One slide shows that although Qualcomm anticipated primarily selling Elan chips to Apple in 2013, Qualcomm anticipated selling much higher volumes of Elan [288] chips to other OEMs in future years. CX6334-024. Similarly, Aicha Evans (Intel Chief Strategy Officer) testified that Intel's investments in products for Apple benefit Intel's other products: "Even if we do something that's custom for them, it usually finds itself in the broader, in the broader market. So I would say the majority of the development, the R&D, it eventually will apply to scale." Tr. at 586:17-19.

In addition, Qualcomm's own expert, Dr. Tasneem Chipty, conceded that Qualcomm's exclusive deals with Apple were not necessary for Qualcomm to realize its target profits on thin modems. Dr. Chipty testified that when deciding whether to make a research and development investment for a product, Qualcomm compares the product's anticipated gross margin to the upfront research and development investment necessary to develop the product. Tr. at 1752:5-8. Dr. Chipty testified that Qualcomm calls this a "payback ratio" and that Qualcomm generally targets a payback ratio of three, such that a product's gross margin should triple the upfront research and development investment. Id. at 1752:10-13.

Dr. Chipty conceded that to realize that target payback ratio for certain thin modems, Qualcomm [289] did not need to sell any thin modems to Apple. On the MDM 9X15, future sales to other OEMs would enable Qualcomm to realize a payback ratio of 8.2 without counting a single sale to Apple. Id. at 1753:2-5. In addition, for the Elan thin modem, Dr. Chipty conceded that exclusivity was not necessary to reach Qualcomm's profit goal: "Qualcomm needed to sell some 9X25 chipsets to Apple to meet its target payback ratio of 3, but Qualcomm didn't need to sell all of the chips it actually sold to Apple in order to recognize that payback ratio." Id. at 1753:13-16.

Thus, these Qualcomm documents contradict Qualcomm's claim that its exclusive deals with Apple were necessary to defray "relationship-specific" costs of working with Apple. QC FOFCOL at 130. Like Qualcomm's other supposed justifications for its unlawful conduct, this alleged justification is pretextual and contradicted by Qualcomm's own documents.

Rather, the evidence above shows that Qualcomm's sales to Apple already exceeded Qualcomm's target profit ratios. In fact, because of Qualcomm's billion dollar incentive payments to Apple, Qualcomm sacrificed short-term profit margins—by 20% in both 2015 and 2016—for the "[s]trategic importance of Apple modem design-win," [290] according to a Qualcomm slide deck presented to the Qualcomm Board of Directors in 2013. CX5527-029. Steve Mollenkopf (Qualcomm CEO) acknowledged those financial implications in a March 2013 email, but said they were worth it for exclusivity: "I understand it but the scenario is really that there would have been a license fight as well and a push for alternative source." CX7910-001. Thus, Qualcomm's litigation justification is pretextual and contradicted by Qualcomm's own documents.

[*773] G. Qualcomm's Royalty Rates Are Unreasonably High

Next, the Court explains how Qualcomm's royalty rates are unreasonably high. Qualcomm's own documents repeatedly recognize that Qualcomm's unreasonably high royalty rates are set by its monopoly chip market share rather than the value of its patents. In fact, Qualcomm refuses to provide patent lists and patent claim charts during license negotiations, unlike other patent holders, and Qualcomm's own documents state that Qualcomm is not the top standards contributor. Moreover, like OEMs, Qualcomm admits that the modem chip no longer drives the value of cellular handsets. Yet Qualcomm continues to charge unreasonably high royalty rates on the sale of the whole [291] handset.

Further, Qualcomm's royalty rate stays constant even though Qualcomm's share of SEPs is declining, Qualcomm's patents expire with successive standards, and Qualcomm receives cross-licenses to OEMs' patent portfolios. OEMs uniformly testified that Qualcomm's royalty rates are higher than any other cellular patent holder. Because of Qualcomm's chip monopoly power, Qualcomm's royalty rates are untested by litigation. For these reasons, and as explained in more detail below, Qualcomm's royalty rates are unreasonably high.

1. Qualcomm Has Admitted That its Chip Market Share Rather Than the Value of its Patents Sustains Qualcomm's Unreasonably High Royalty Rates

In Qualcomm's own documents, Qualcomm has repeatedly admitted that Qualcomm's monopoly chip market share—not the value of Qualcomm's patents—sustains Qualcomm's royalty rates. Qualcomm explicitly considered how QCT chip market share sustains QTL's royalty rates during two internal analyses of whether to split QCT and QTL, as discussed below.

Qualcomm first analyzed whether to split QCT and QTL beginning in 2007, in an analysis called Project Berlin. David Wise (Qualcomm Senior Vice President and Treasurer) led Project Berlin. [292] Tr. at 103:16-18. Qualcomm's Project Berlin documents show that Qualcomm consistently recognized that QCT's modem share sustains QTL's royalty rates.

For example, in May 2007, Marv Blecker (QTL President) emailed Paul Jacobs (Qualcomm CEO) with a list of pros and cons for separation, in which Blecker observed that QCT protects QTL's royalty rates: "Without chip business, more licensees/potential licensees might fight QTL license demands." CX6605-001.

Specifically, OEMs cannot fight QTL's license demands because OEMs need QCT's modem chips. For example, in a February 2008 email, Steve Altman (Qualcomm President) told Paul Jacobs (Qualcomm CEO and son of Qualcomm Co-Founder Irwin Jacobs) that the only companies that had attacked Qualcomm bought little or no chips from Qualcomm, so the combination of QCT and QTL greatly enhances QTL's success. Steve Altman wrote in that email that it was essential for QCT to maintain market share and keep OEMs "reliant on us for continued supply" to protect QTL from royalty attacks:

> If you consider the fact that the only companies that have attacked us today are companies that essentially purchase little or no ASICs from us, you can understand how the combination [293] of QCT with QTL greatly enhances QTL's success. As CDMA2000 grows and OEMs desire to participate in it to grow their market share, OEMs will remain reliant on us for continued supply and will need to maintain positive relationships with us . . . [if split] they would rely entirely on [*774] QCT, but would have no incentive NOT to attack QTL.

CX7035-001. At trial, Steve Altman (Qualcomm President during Project Berlin) claimed that he had "always been an advocate" of splitting QCT and QTL. Tr. at 238:21-25. However, the contemporaneous document Altman prepared eleven years earlier when he was Qualcomm President and Qualcomm was considering whether to split QCT and QTL is more persuasive than Altman's trial testimony given to avoid antitrust liability.

In other Project Berlin documents, Qualcomm admitted that without QCT's chip share, QTL might lack "leverage" to negotiate patent license agreements, and thus to continue to receive its unreasonably high royalty rates. A July 2007 Project Berlin presentation that Paul Jacobs (Qualcomm CEO) sent to Sanjay Jha (Qualcomm CEO and QCT President) discussed arguments for and against separation. CX7279-003. The presentation identified the following risk [294] of separation: "Can hurt QTL's leverage to negotiate 3G renewals and 4G (OFDMA) licensing deals (ie. LG)." CX72979-008.

In 2015, Qualcomm again recognized in contemporaneous documents that QCT's monopoly chip power sustains QTL's unreasonably high royalty rates.

In 2015, Qualcomm initiated Project Phoenix, a second analysis of whether to split QCT and QTL, due to "concerns over [the] long-term sustainability of QTL royalty stream," according to a Qualcomm Project Phoenix presentation. CX6837-004. By 2015, several government antitrust investigations into Qualcomm's licensing practices were underway, including this action. According to Qualcomm's 2017 10-K filing with the SEC, the FTC first notified Qualcomm of its investigation related to the instant case in September 2014. CX7257-099. According to the 10-K, the Japan Fair Trade Commission ("JFTC"), Korea Fair Trade Commission ("KFTC"), and China's National Development and Reform Commission ("NDRC") had all investigated Qualcomm's licensing practices by the time Qualcomm initiated Project Phoenix, and the KFTC and JFTC had each concluded that certain Qualcomm practices violated those countries' laws. CX7257-097 to -098.

David Wise (Qualcomm [295] Senior Vice President and Treasurer), who led Project Berlin in 2007-2008, also helped lead Project Phoenix and acknowledged that a special committee of Qualcomm's Board of Directors was responsible for Project Phoenix. Tr. at 88:2-4; 88:24-89:1.

Throughout Project Phoenix, Qualcomm executives explained in contemporaneous documents that QCT's monopoly power sustains QTL's unreasonably high royalty rates. David Wise (Qualcomm Senior Vice President and Treasurer) wrote in an October 2015 email to himself and Neil Martin (Qualcomm) that separating QCT and QTL could jeopardize QTL's licensing revenue, which would harm Qualcomm's overall valuation:

> I believe the QTL business model risk is our BIGGEST issue . . . because QTL represents the vast majority of our value at $50-$70B. Note that 1 point of royalty is $16-$20B in value. Also, a slow erosion of the model vs. sustaining the business would reduce valuation by $30B+. QCT risks are important, but less binary and less impactful to overall QC valuation.

Then, David Wise (Qualcomm Senior Vice President and Treasurer) explained that because there is a high correlation between Qualcomm's chip market share and the sustainability of [296] Qualcomm's royalty rate, it is critical for Qualcomm to maintain [*775] a high modem chip share to sustain its licensing revenues:

> Notably, we are seeing in the market today that there is a high correlation between our modem (chip) share and licensing compliance and royalty rate sustainability. Where we have low chip share we are seeing challenges with compliance and maintaining the royalty rate. So in a sense, QCT has provided the 'give/get' relationship highlighted in the last point. If it's [sic] share falls, however, we lose that important element to > sustaining our royalties. SO IT'S CRITICAL THAT WE MAINTAIN HIGH MODEM SHARE TO SUSTAIN LICENSING.

Id. (emphasis in original). In short, Wise admitted that without QCT's chip market share, QTL was "seeing challenges with compliance and maintaining the royalty rate."

David Wise (Qualcomm Senior Vice President and Treasurer) included the same points in a November 2015 Project Phoenix slide deck, which Alex Rogers (now QTL President) and other Qualcomm executives received. CX5953-001. On one slide, under the header "High modem share drives compliance and royalty rate," Wise again explained that there is a high correlation between QCT's modem chip [297] market share and sustaining QTL's unreasonably high royalty rates:

> - Addresses QTL compliance challenges and sustainability of long term royalty rate; without risky litigation
> - High correlation between modem share and QTL compliance and royalty rate sustainability
> - Adds value to our licensees beyond our patent licenses; improving the 'give/get' equation where QTL can't
> - Reduces dependence on legal and regulatory structures to sustain royalty rates

CX5953-011.

Like the Qualcomm executives, consultants for Qualcomm during Project Phoenix also concluded that QCT's market power sustains QTL's unreasonably high royalty rates. In slides prepared for the Project Phoenix committee of the Qualcomm Board of Directors, BCG concluded that separating QCT and QTL could reduce QTL's royalty leverage: "Separation could weaken Tulane [the Project Phoenix code name for QTL] in rate negotiations with major customers — similar to other commercial precedents." CX3755-001. Thus, the Qualcomm Board's Project Phoenix committee knew that without QCT's monopoly chip power, QTL would lose leverage in license negotiations.

David Wise (Qualcomm Senior Vice President and Treasurer) again emphasized in an October 2015 [298] Project Phoenix email to Derek Aberle (Qualcomm President) that maintaining high modem chip market shares was critical to QTL's licensing revenue, and admitted that without "broad modem scale," QTL could not sustain its royalty rates:

> I agree with the viewpoint that as long as QCT has a very high share, they are beneficial to QTL. But if their share drops meaningfully (ie, in China at 30%'ish) then they are less beneficial. That's the logic behind the whole modem licensing concept. We need broad modem scale to support the licensing business.

CX5417-001. Thus, Qualcomm has consistently admitted that without QCT's monopoly chip power, QTL cannot sustain its royalty rates.

As set forth extensively in Section V.B., Qualcomm wields that monopoly chip power against OEMs by cutting off chip supply, [*776] threatening to cut off chip supply, refusing to provide chip samples, withholding technical support, and delaying delivery of software or threatening to require the return of software—all to coerce OEMs to sign patent license agreements that sustain Qualcomm's unreasonably high royalty rates.

2. Unlike Other SEP Holders, Qualcomm Refuses to Give Patent Lists or Patent Claim Charts During Patent License Negotiations [299]

Consistent with Qualcomm's admissions that its royalty rates are sustained by QCT's chip monopoly power rather than by Qualcomm's patent portfolio, Qualcomm also refuses to provide patent lists and patent claim charts to OEMs during patent license negotiations, unlike other patent holders.

For example, Ira Blumberg (Lenovo Vice President of Intellectual Property) testified that patent license negotiations typically include technical discussions of the licensor's patents:

> Typically, you'll see technical engagement in a licensing scenario before there is a license, as part of the licensor's practice to convince the licensee why they need a license. So in circumstances like that, you typically have lots of claim charts outlining the licensor's best patents, how they cover the licensee's products, arguments, or at least presentations about how there's no alternative, and so on.

Blumberg Depo. 190:10-19. However, Blumberg testified, Qualcomm never engaged in such a technical discussion with Lenovo during patent license negotiations "because Qualcomm didn't feel they needed to" with its ability to threaten chip supply. Blumberg Depo. 191:6-12.

Similarly, Nanfen Yu (Huawei Senior Legal Counsel) [300] testified that despite Qualcomm's high rates, Qualcomm has never provided patent claim charts to Huawei, but that Nokia, Ericsson, and Siemens all have. Yu Depo. 216:4-217:2. Specifically, as to Qualcomm, Yu testified:

> Q: [I]n all of your negotiations with Qualcomm throughout the course of your career, has Qualcomm ever provided claim charts for its patents?
> A: No.

Id. at 216:4-8.

Brian Chong (Wistron Chief of New Technology Development and Product Planning) testified that Qualcomm would not even provide Wistron a list of any Qualcomm patents: "I know for a fact that we asked for a list of patents and never got that." Chong Depo. 312:6-8, 23-24.

3. Qualcomm's Anticompetitive Licensing Practices are Unique to Modem Chip Markets Where Qualcomm Has Monopoly Power

Furthermore, even within Qualcomm, Qualcomm's anticompetitive practices are unique to the modem chip market where Qualcomm has monopoly power, which further indicates that QCT's monopoly power sustains Qualcomm's unreasonably high royalty rates.

When asked at trial whether "device manufacturers purchasing Wi-Fi components from Qualcomm have to first take a license to Qualcomm's Wi-Fi standard essential patents," Fabian Gonell (QTL Legal [301] Counsel and Senior Vice President, Licensing Strategy) testified "No." Tr. at 1483:18-21.

Qualcomm made the distinction explicit in a Qualcomm slide deck presented to Tony Blevins (Apple Vice President of Procurement). CX8261-004. To purchase modem chips, an OEM "[m]ust be a licensee in good standing." Id. For all other components, however, an OEM needs "[n]o separate license," and Qualcomm will sell [*777] the component on an exhaustive basis. Id. Thus, Qualcomm only refuses to sell modem chips exhaustively and requires OEMs to sign patent license agreements before purchasing modem chips where Qualcomm has monopoly power.

Qualcomm's practice is also unique in the industry. Cellular company after cellular company testified that no other modem chip supplier or component supplier refuses to sell components until the OEM signs a license agreement.

Tony Blevins (Apple Vice President of Procurement) testified: "I'd spent 20 years in the industry, I had never seen a letter like this [requiring Apple to sign a license agreement before purchasing chips]." Tr. at 676:4-7.

Similarly, Todd Madderom (Motorola Director of Procurement) testified of Qualcomm's practice: "[T]his is a unique situation. I've never [302] run across this prior." Madderom Depo. 162:24-163:10.

John Grubbs (BlackBerry Senior Director of Intellectual Property Transactions) testified that no other component supplier required BlackBerry to sign a separate patent license agreement: "[T]here were some of our suppliers that owned standard essential patents and — and we did not have a patent license agreement in place with those suppliers." Grubbs Depo. 268:15-269:25.

Hwi-Jae Cho (Director of LGE Intellectual Property Center), when asked whether "other suppliers of components to LGE required LGE to execute a separate license agreement in order to obtain access to their components," testified "No." Cho Depo. ¶ 15.

Likewise, when asked whether "Samsung's prospective supplier require[d] that Samsung execute a patent license agreement prior to agreeing to sell their product to Samsung," Andrew Hong (Samsung Legal Counsel) testified "No."

When asked whether other component suppliers require Huawei "to obtain a separate license and enter into a separate license agreement," Nanfen Yu (Huawei Senior Legal Counsel) testified that she was not aware of any suppliers. Yu Depo. 121:6-22.

Aicha Evans (Intel Chief Strategy Officer) testified that [303] no component supplier—"except for one, Qualcomm"—requires OEMs to sign a license before purchasing components. Tr. at 555:2-4.

Even though Qualcomm sells other components exhaustively and does not require OEMs to sign a separate license before purchasing other components, and even though no other component supplier with patents follows Qualcomm's practices, Qualcomm contends that its practices are procompetitive "because Qualcomm has never priced its intellectual property into its chip prices; [thus] OEMs that bought Qualcomm chips without a license would be using Qualcomm's intellectual property for free." ECF No. 1322 at 6. If Qualcomm's practices were truly procompetitive and "involve[], for example, greater efficiency or enhanced consumer appeal," Qualcomm would not implement the practice only where Qualcomm has monopoly power, and not on sales of any other Qualcomm chips. See Microsoft, 253 F.3d at 59.

Qualcomm offers no documents to explain its inconsistent licensing practices. In fact, Qualcomm's own documents discussed above reveal that Qualcomm's practices are designed to leverage Qualcomm's "high modem share to sustain licensing." CX8299-001. Specifically, as Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President [304] and General Manager) admitted at his deposition, Qualcomm can only sustain that licensing business aimed at OEMs by refusing to sell modem chips to unlicensed [*778] OEMs and avoiding exhaustion of its patents: "[T]he concern for the risk to the licensing business of selling — selling chips to unlicensed customers, the — the risk of a customer making an argument of patent exhaustion and sort of undercutting the ability to license the patent portfolio." Reifschneider Depo. 30:15-20.

Thus, Qualcomm leverages its monopoly chip supply and engages in a host of anticompetitive practices to avoid exhaustion and ensure that OEMs acquiesce to Qualcomm's license demands. For example, Qualcomm cuts off chip supply, threatens to cut off chip supply, threatens to withhold engineering support, and delays and threatens to take back software, among other tactics—all to coerce an OEM into signing a Qualcomm license agreement before purchasing modem chips, unlike any other component supplier in the industry. Thus, the Court rejects Qualcomm's justification as pretextual.

4. Qualcomm's Contributions to Standards Do Not Justify its Unreasonably High Royalty Rates

Moreover, Qualcomm's own documents also show that [305] Qualcomm is not the top standards contributor, which confirms Qualcomm's own statements that QCT's monopoly chip market share rather than the value of QTL's patents sustain QTL's unreasonably high royalty rates. According to internal Qualcomm documents not created for antitrust investigations, other patent holders like Nokia and Ericsson have made comparable or even greater contributions to cellular standards than Qualcomm.

Lorenzo Casaccia (Qualcomm Vice President of Technical Standards) leads Qualcomm's participation in 3GPP, the SSO that standardized LTE. ECF No. 1326 at 11. In 2009, Casaccia sent a slide deck to Edward Tiedemann (Qualcomm Senior Vice President, Engineering) that discussed Qualcomm's 3GPP contributions relative to other licensors. CX6336-001. On one slide, Casaccia posed the question: "To which level is Qualcomm a player in 3GPP?" CX6336-009. Casaccia gave the answer: "Another metric is the number of rapporteurships," defined "rapporteur of a work area" as "has opened/created the work area." Id. On the following slide, Casaccia displayed a pie chart and table listing Qualcomm's relative rapporteurships in 3GPP. CX6336-010. According to Casaccia, Qualcomm was responsible [306] for 7% of all rapporteurships, whereas Ericsson was responsible for 17%, more than twice Qualcomm's contribution. Id. Casaccia stated that Qualcomm's 7% share of rapporteurships rendered it a "major player" in 3GPP. Id.

Similarly, in 2015, Lorenzo Casaccia (Qualcomm Vice President of Technical Standards) prepared and sent a slide deck to Fabian Gonell (QTL Division Counsel) and David Wise (now Qualcomm Senior Vice President and Treasurer). CX6138-001. On one slide, Casaccia referred to the top five "technical contributors" to 3GPP as Ericsson, Huawei, Qualcomm, Samsung, and Nokia, in that order, and referred to those five companies as the "big boys" in 3GPP. CX6138-032. Thus, even if approved contributions are an imperfect means of measuring a company's contributions to cellular standards, as the Court notes below, Qualcomm itself internally charts the major players in standards by reference to technical contributions.

Moreover, Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) conceded to the IRS in 2012 that Nokia and Ericsson contributed to the development of cellular standards, have large patent portfolios, and claim to have many SEPs: "[I]f you have a licensing [307] program like ours — and to some extent Nokia and Ericsson do — they were also companies [*779] who participated in the development of wireless technology in the '90s and in the - 2000 decade, and they have large patent portfolios, and they also claim to have many patents that are — that are essential to those technical standards." CX6786-R at 42:11-15.

Even in documents Qualcomm created expressly for antitrust investigations into Qualcomm's licensing practices, Qualcomm has represented that Ericsson and Nokia possess significant SEP portfolios. In a September 2016 Qualcomm SEPs and standards presentation to the European Commission during the Commission's investigation into Qualcomm's licensing practices, Qualcomm included a slide titled "The Handful of Active Contributors are the Major SEP Owners." CX8262-035. In a table of the "Top 10 Patent Holders," Qualcomm listed itself as the top patent holder, with Nokia second, InterDigital third, and Ericsson fourth. Id. Thus, only in a document created to avoid antitrust liability has Qualcomm identified itself as the top SEP holder, and even in that presentation Qualcomm acknowledged that other patent holders have comparable SEP portfolios and made [308] comparable contributions to standards. The Court finds most persuasive Qualcomm's internal documents not prepared to avoid antitrust liability, which acknowledge that by multiple metrics Qualcomm is not the leading contributor to standards.

Despite Qualcomm's representations about Nokia and Ericsson's comparable contributions, Nokia and Ericsson's royalty rates and licensing revenues are a fraction of Qualcomm's, as the Court discusses in more detail below.

Qualcomm tried to refute its own documents and statements with trial testimony and expert opinion prepared for litigation, but none of Qualcomm's witnesses assessed the relative value of Qualcomm's patent portfolio or testified about Qualcomm's royalty rates. Liren Chen (QTL Senior Vice President of Engineering and Legal Counsel) testified about the aggregate number of Qualcomm's patents and patent applications, Tr. at 1540:14-17, and Dr. Irwin Jacobs (Qualcomm Co-Founder and former Qualcomm CEO) testified that Qualcomm was instrumental in developing CDMA technology in the early 1990s, Tr. at 1264:7-1265:16. Neither witness's testimony is probative of the relative value of Qualcomm's patents from 2006 to 2016—particularly when many [309] of Qualcomm's early CDMA patents have expired.

Similarly, Durga Malladi (Qualcomm Senior Vice President of Engineering and General Manager of 4G/5G) testified that Qualcomm played a "pioneering role" in unlicensed spectrum technology, which "unleashed gigabit LTE data rates in North America." Tr. at 1326:3-1329:6. However, Malladi conceded that he has no perspective on the relative value of Qualcomm's contributions: "I don't actually look at what others are doing. I only look at what we are doing." Id. at 1336:25-1337:9. Moreover, Malladi conceded that he could not offer insight into the value of 5G technology "from a royalty rate standpoint." Id. at 1335:16-19.

Qualcomm's expert testimony on this point was equally inapposite. Dr. Jeffrey Andrews opined that 34 of Qualcomm's cellular SEPs "made very fundamental contributions to cellular standards." Tr. 1592:22-23. However, Dr. Andrews analyzed only 34 cellular SEPs, and Dr. Andrews offered no opinion on whether other patent holders have developed more or equally fundamental contributions to cellular communications. In addition, Dr. Andrews admitted at trial that he offered no opinion on:

(1) the royalty value of those 34 Qualcomm patents, [310] id. at 1615:2-24;

[*780] (2) the value of any of Qualcomm's non-essential patents, which Qualcomm also licenses, id. at 1616:23-1617:1;

(3) the value of any Qualcomm patents outside cellular standards, id. at 1617:2-8;

(4) whether any other company owns any valuable patents related to the technologies Dr. Andrews discussed, id. at 1617:9-12; or

(5) the relative strength of Qualcomm's patent portfolio or of Qualcomm's patents essential to any standard, id. at 1617:16-1618:3.

Neither Dr. Andrews's qualitative opinions on 34 Qualcomm cellular patents nor any of Qualcomm's witnesses rebut or even respond to the evidence in Qualcomm's own documents that Qualcomm's royalty rates are unreasonably high and are sustained by Qualcomm's chip market share.

Furthermore, Qualcomm helped design the patent portfolio scoring system of the patent pool Avanci, which scores Qualcomm's portfolio comparably to Ericsson's even though Ericsson's licensing revenue is a small fraction of Qualcomm's.

Fabian Gonell (QTL Legal Counsel and Senior Vice President, Licensing Strategy) testified at trial that Qualcomm, Ericsson, Nokia, and InterDigital are participants in Avanci, "an effort at joint licensing of cellular essential [311] patents for certain products," including vehicles and smart meters. Tr. at 1467:6-10. A smart meter is a utility meter with cellular connectivity. Id. at 1467:12-15. As a participant in Avanci, Qualcomm has agreed to grant licenses to its 3G and 4G SEPs to any vehicle or smart meter OEM that wishes to license Avanci's patents. Id. at 1467:18-21. Avanci then distributes those royalty revenues to the individual SEP licensors according to Avanci's distribution method. Id. at 1467:23-24.

Avanci's royalty distribution method apportions royalty revenues to Qualcomm and other SEP licensors based on a point-scoring system, according to the Avanci Master License Management Agreement. JX0116-133. Fabian Gonell (QTL Legal Counsel and Senior Vice President, Licensing Strategy) testified that Qualcomm negotiated the point-scoring system with Ericsson, another founding Avanci participant: "[S]o it was basically a three-way negotiation between Qualcomm and Ericsson and the founders of Avanci." Tr. at 1474:14-15.

Michael Lasinski, an FTC patent expert, testified that Avanci awards SEP licensors a maximum of [TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT] points for deemed SEPs, a maximum of [TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT] [312] points for approved contributions, and a maximum of [TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT] points for historical licensing revenue. Tr. at 1025:21-1026:1. According to Lasinski, "deemed SEPs" are SEPs that studies have concluded are in fact essential to a standard. Id. at 1016:23-1017:2. According to Lasinski, Qualcomm and Ericsson have comparable SEP portfolios under Avanci's point-scoring system. Id. at 1027:2-13. That is so even though one of the Avanci methods—historical licensing revenue—clearly favors Qualcomm because Qualcomm charges vastly higher royalty rates to OEMs than Ericsson does, as the Court will explain in more detail below. Despite having comparable SEP portfolios, Ericsson's royalty rate is a fraction of Qualcomm's, according to Injung Lee (Samsung Intellectual Property Center). Lee Depo. 145:8-17. Accordingly, Qualcomm's contributions to standards do not justify Qualcomm's unreasonably high royalty rate.

5. Qualcomm's Documents Recognize That Modem Chips Do Not Drive Handset Value

In addition, it is unreasonable for Qualcomm to charge its unreasonably high royalty [*781] rates on the sale price of an entire handset, as even Qualcomm's own document recognizes that a modem chip does [313] not drive a cellular handset's value.

In a 2008 QCT strategic plan shared with Steve Mollenkopf (now Qualcomm CEO) and Cristiano Amon (now Qualcomm President), Qualcomm stated that the user experience rather than the modem chip drive a handset's value:

> Past: Modem Leadership Drove Value
> Now: Best User Experience Drives Value

CX7559-018 (emphasis in original).

OEMs also recognize that the modem chip does not drive handset value. For example, in 2004, Kim Huang (BenQ) emailed Marv Blecker (QTL Senior Vice President) and Derek Aberle (Qualcomm lawyer, and later Qualcomm President). Huang argued that Qualcomm's intellectual property is for communication, and Qualcomm does not own intellectual property on color TFT LCD panel, mega-pixel DSC module, user storage memory, decoration, and mechanical parts. The costs of these non-communication-related components have become more expensive and now contribute 60-70% of the phone value. The phone is not just for communication, but also for computing, movie-playing, video-taking, and data storage. Huang stated in full:

> Qualcomm owns IPR [intellectual property rights] on 'Communication' related components of a mobile phone; we appreciate and respect that. [314] But you don't own IPR on most of the other key components. For example, color TFT LCD panel, mega-pixel DSC module, user storage memory, decoration mechanical parts and etc. These non-communications-related components have become more and more important the cost them became higher and higher-probably contribute more than 60%-70% of a whole phoneset. Please note that, a phone in the future not for communication only, but may be used for computing, movie playing, video taking, mega-picture taking, data storage and etc.

Similarly, Jeff Williams (Apple COO) testified that because Apple invests heavily in the handset's physical design and enclosures to add value, and those physical handset features clearly have nothing to do with Qualcomm's cellular patents, it is unfair for Qualcomm to receive royalty revenue on that added value:

> Apple spends a lot of time making its products really beautiful, so we'll spend an extra $60 on the stainless steel and aluminum enclosures and things like that. And per the agreement, if we spent cost on that, say that extra $60, it has nothing to do with their IP, the Qualcomm arrangement would have them collect $3. So that, that didn't make sense to [315] us, and still doesn't today.

Tr. at 869:25-870:5.

Samsung's contemporaneous notes from June 2013 license negotiations reflect Samsung's concurring view that Qualcomm's royalty rates have nothing to do with Qualcomm's patents: "The value of smart phones lies in various computer functions, the operating system, software, applications, and design, etc., which have nothing to do with Qualcomm's chipset IP. Therefore it is unfair for Qualcomm to levy royalties on the basis of the entire phone." CX2642A-003.

Qualcomm's own document recognizes that decorative parts, design, user interface, and mechanical features—the "user experience"—now drive the handset's value rather than the modem chip. See CX7559-018. Thus, it makes little sense for Qualcomm to receive royalty revenue on [*782] the added value to which Qualcomm did not contribute.

OEMs add other value to handsets unrelated to modem chips. For example, Hwi-Jae Cho (Director of LGE Intellectual Property Center) testified that during 2004 license negotiations LGE argued that Qualcomm should deduct the cost of camera modules and mobile television from the royalty base because those features are independent of Qualcomm's modem chip SEPs: "LGE argued [316] to deduct the cost of camera modules and DMB (which is the Korean version of mobile TV) modules because, at a minimum, those two features were functionally independent from Qualcomm's standard essential patents at that time." Cho Depo. ¶ 101.

Jeff Williams (Apple COO) also testified that Apple invests in other innovations beyond its handset enclosures that add value to a handset. For example, Apple was the first to embed NAND memory, a type of flash memory. If Apple spent $100 on cost for NAND memory, Apple had to then pay Qualcomm $5 even though Qualcomm's intellectual property had nothing to do with NAND memory:

> We were bringing some innovation. And, for example, we were one of the first and led the charge to embed a lot of NAND memory. We did this on our iPods, and we were going to do it on our iPhones, and if we put another $100 of cost in NAND memory, per the Qualcomm agreement, they would get $5 of that even though their IP had nothing to do with that.

Tr. at 869:18-24.

Thus, in 2016, Huawei argued in a letter to Fabian Gonell (QTL Division Counsel) that Qualcomm's royalty rates do not reflect the proportional contribution of Qualcomm's patents to handset value: "It is not reasonable [317] to collect royalty on the selling price of the whole handset as Qualcomm's essential patents are mostly implemented by chipset." CX1101-003.

Expert testimony was consistent with the documentary evidence and OEM testimony. Richard Donaldson, the FTC's licensing expert, explained that Qualcomm's royalty rates should decline over time because handsets are now essentially computers:

> [I]n the case of Qualcomm when rates were first established back when CDMA was used in telephones were our cell phones were — it was just a cell phone. No other capabilities. And those products have changed dramatically over the life since then and we now have smartphones with many, many features that do not infringe the cellular patents, the SEPs. So I would expect that to drive a lower royalty rate.

Tr. at 971:7-14. Likewise, Qualcomm expert Dr. Aviv Nevo testified that handsets have changed dramatically since Qualcomm entered its first license agreements:

> Q: The product in which the IP was going to be used changed dramatically over that time; correct?
> A: Cell phones did, yeah, they clearly changed.

Tr. at 1944:14-16.

The modem chip also does not drive handset value because handset users can now more easily use [318] Wi-Fi to transmit data. Michael Lasinski, an FTC expert, testified that the use of Wi-Fi to transmit data has increased: "[I]t turns out that significantly more data is being offloaded to WiFi networks." Tr. at 1016:2-3. Qualcomm expert Dr. Jeffrey Andrews agreed that handset users can use Wi-Fi rather than a modem chip to access data "[a]ssuming they're connected to a Wi-Fi access point that works." Tr. at 1615:7-8.

[*783] Qualcomm's constant royalty rate does not reflect the decline in the importance of modem chips in handsets.

6. Qualcomm's Use of the Handset as the Royalty Base is Inconsistent with Federal Circuit Law

Further, Qualcomm's use of the handset device as the royalty base is inconsistent with Federal Circuit law on the patent rule of apportionment. Under the rule of apportionment, "[a] patentee is only entitled to a reasonable royalty attributable to the infringing features." Power Integrations, Inc. v. Fairchild Semiconductor Int'l, Inc., 904 F.3d 965, 977 (Fed. Cir. 2018). In line with that principle, the Federal Circuit held in LaserDynamics, Inc. v. Quanta Computer, Inc. that "it is generally required that royalties be based not on the entire product, but instead on the smallest salable patent-practicing unit." 694 F.3d 51, 67 (Fed. Cir. 2012). Thus, Qualcomm is not entitled to a royalty on the entire [319] handset.

Subsequent to Quanta, the Federal Circuit has clarified that "[w]here the smallest salable unit is, in fact, a multi-component product containing several non-infringing features with no relation to the patented features . . . , the patentee must do more to estimate what portion of the value of that product is attributable to the patented technology." Virnetx, Inc. v. Cisco Sys., Inc., 767 F.3d 1308, 1327 (Fed. Cir. 2014). This Court has held, in a different case, that "the baseband processor"—the modem chip—"is the proper smallest salable patent-practicing unit" in a cellular handset. *GPNE v. Apple, Inc., 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 53234, 2014 WL 1494247, at 10 (N.D. Cal.

Apr. 16, 2014), aff'd, 830 F.3d 1365 (Fed. Cir. 2016). Because Qualcomm's own document states that a handset's value is now attributable primarily to the "user experience" and not "modem leadership," Qualcomm's collection of a royalty on the entire handset is inconsistent with VirnetX and Federal Circuit law on the smallest salable patent practicing unit.

7. Qualcomm Acknowledges That its SEP Share Has Declined with Successive Standards Yet its Royalty Rate Has Remained Constant for 30 Years

Moreover, even though Qualcomm's share of SEPs is declining and Qualcomm's SEPs expire with successive standards, Qualcomm still maintains a constant royalty rate. A summary exhibit collecting Qualcomm's patent license agreements [320] over the past 30 years shows that Qualcomm has consistently charged OEMs a 5% running royalty for licenses to Qualcomm's patent portfolio. QX9148. Qualcomm charged Siemens a 5% running royalty in 1996 and charged VIVO a 5% running royalty in 2015. QX9148-003, -004.

At trial, Alex Rogers (QTL President) testified that as of 2018, Qualcomm's royalty rate for a portfolio license remains 5%. Tr. at 1972:23-24. Yet according to a March 2016 Qualcomm slide deck that Alex Rogers (QTL President) himself received, Qualcomm's "SEP share has declined with successive standards." CX6594-067.

Consistent with that Qualcomm document, Huawei argued in a 2016 letter to Qualcomm that it is unreasonable for Qualcomm to charge 4G royalty rates predicated on the value of Qualcomm's 3G patent portfolio when Qualcomm's 4G patent portfolio is lower in value:

> Despite the fact that 3G is becoming a backup technology with a significant number of 3G patents being expired, Qualcomm is charging 4G multimode products on 3G rates. This is not consistent with industry practice where patent holders charge royalty at the rate of the [*784] latest technology and Qualcomm is trying to extend the benefits gained in 3G era based on [321] its dominant position in chipset market and unique business model bundling chipset supply and patent license.

CX1101-002. Qualcomm's royalty rate should not stay constant across standards when its patent portfolio has declined with successive standards.

As Qualcomm's March 2016 slide deck and Huawei's 2016 letter pointed out, Qualcomm's patent contributions are declining with successive standards. Under the Patent Act, a patent expires twenty years from the date of patent application. 35 U.S.C. § 154(a)(2). Thus, many of Qualcomm's patents—especially those patents covered in early CDMA license agreements—have doubtless expired, as OEMs have asserted.

For example, John Grubbs (BlackBerry Senior Director of Intellectual Property Transactions) testified that Qualcomm's 5% running royalty violates FRAND because many of Qualcomm's CDMA patents have expired: "So at some point you get to the point where an entity is paying 5 percent for the CDMA patents when there may not be but just a handful of CDMA patents left. So that — in that respect, it . . . it violates FRAND." Grubbs Depo. 235:10-15.

Similarly, according to Eric Reifschneider's (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) contemporaneous notes, Huawei [322] asserted in 2013 license negotiations that Qualcomm's royalty rate should decline with the expiration of Qualcomm's patents: "As to term, it makes sense to keep it short for c2k [CDMA2000] since half of your patents have expired or will expire in 3-5 years." CX6528-009.

Richard Donaldson, the FTC's expert, testified consistently: "Many of Qualcomm's early patents are expiring which, in my experience in license negotiations, when your portfolio is weakened by expiring significant patents, the royalty rate would typically decrease." Tr. at 971:22-25. Yet Qualcomm's rates have not decreased, which further indicates that Qualcomm's royalty rates are unreasonably high.

Qualcomm's royalty rate stays constant even though Qualcomm receives cross-licenses to OEMs' patent portfolios, which differ in value. John Grubbs (BlackBerry Senior Director of Intellectual Property Transactions) testified that BlackBerry considers the value of cross-licenses when setting a royalty rate: "All I can say is based on what BlackBerry has done, and I know that we would take into account the value of any cross-license coming back — if there was any significant value there — before we would price our license." Grubbs [323] Depo. 94:23-95:2.

In addition, OEMs uniformly testified that Qualcomm's royalty rates are disproportionately higher than the royalty rates OEMs owe other licensors. Jeff Williams (Apple Chief Operating Officer) testified that "Qualcomm charges us more than everybody else put together." Tr. at 871:2-6.

Similarly, Todd Madderom (Motorola Director of Procurement) testified that Qualcomm's royalty rates are the highest Motorola has ever had to pay: "In our experience we've never seen such a significant licensing fee tied to any other IP we license." Madderom Depo. 217:24-218:2.

Ira Blumberg (Lenovo Vice President of Intellectual Property) concurred: "Based on the negotiations I've had with companies like Nokia, Ericsson, InterDigital, and other significant patent holders, Qualcomm's rates are substantially higher." Blumberg Depo. 149:9-13.

Likewise, John Grubbs (BlackBerry Senior Director of Intellectual Property Transactions) testified that Qualcomm's [*785] royalty rate was the highest in the industry: "[T]he 5 percent royalty rate was significantly higher than any other SEP rate we paid to anybody else in the industry." Grubbs Depo. 236:5-7.

Hwi-Jae Cho (Director of LGE Intellectual Property Center) [324] testified that Qualcomm's royalty rate was so high that it could lead to an aggregate royalty that would make it impossible to generate profit on handsets:

> If Qualcomm attempted to assert a 5.75% royalty for its small share of WCDMA technology alone, the aggregate royalty for the entire WCDMA patent portfolio would be more than 25% of handset price, which was far more than what LGE or the industry thought at that time. If the royalty for WCDMA alone was more than 25% of the phone price, it would be impossible to make any profit by selling handsets.

Cho Depo. ¶ 38h.

Similarly, in a June 2016 proposal to Fabian Gonell (QTL Division Counsel) to renegotiate the royalty rate Huawei paid to Qualcomm, Huawei stated that Huawei's royalty payments to Qualcomm comprised 80-90% of the total royalty payments Huawei paid for terminal products:

> Huawei has entered into license agreements with major patent holders in the industry, but the royalty Huawei paid to Qualcomm each year consists of 80-90% of the total royalty we paid for terminal products, which well demonstrates that Qualcomm's royalty rate is excessively higher than other major patent holders in the industry.

Qualcomm has sustained [325] by far the highest royalty rates of any cellular patent holder despite its declining SEP share with successive standards and the expiration of its patents. The degree to which Qualcomm's royalty rates and revenues outstrip the rates and revenues of SEP holders that Qualcomm's own documents state are the top contributors to standards is staggering. For example, QTL's 2017 strategic plan, which Derek Aberle (Qualcomm President) and Alex Rogers (QTL President) reviewed, states that QTL earned $7.7 billion in licensing revenue for Qualcomm in 2016, which exceeded the combined licensing revenue of twelve other licensors, including Ericsson, Nokia, and Interdigital. CX7122-026.

Similarly, a slide deck that Bain prepared for Intel, and which Qualcomm introduced into evidence, shows that in 2011, Qualcomm earned over 25% of global cellular patent licensing revenue and over 50% of global patent licensing revenue related to modem chips. QX0121A-009.

Qualcomm generates that revenue with unreasonably high royalty rates, even though Qualcomm's own documents recognize that Qualcomm is not the top contributor to standards. Injung Lee (Licensing Lead at Samsung Intellectual Property Center) testified [326] that in comparison to Qualcomm's 5% running royalty rate, Samsung paid Ericsson a lump sum royalty payment that worked out to a [TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT] % effective royalty rate and Nokia a lump sum royalty payment that worked out to a [TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT] % effective royalty rate. Lee Depo. 145:8-17. According to Nokia's discovery responses to the FTC, Nokia[9] licenses its SEPs at rates between [TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT] per handset. QX2778-008. %, but caps its royalty charges at [[TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT] Euros]

[*786] Other patent licensors like Nokia and Ericsson have announced publicly that the aggregate royalty an OEM pays to all SEP licensors should not exceed 5%. In 2002 (at the launch of WCDMA), Ericsson, Siemens, Nokia, and other SEP licensors stated in a press release their mutual understanding to "enable the cumulative royalty rate for W-CDMA to be a modest single digit level"—specifically under a 5% cumulative royalty rate paid to all SEP licensors. CX4103-001. In 2008 (at the launch of LTE), those same SEP holders similarly stated in a press release that an OEM's aggregate LTE royalty rate paid to all SEP licensors should be a single digit rate: "[T]he companies [327] support that a reasonable maximum aggregate royalty level for LTE essential IPR in handsets is a single-digit percentage of the sales price." CX4104-001.

Against this wave of evidence that Qualcomm's unreasonably high royalty rate should not stay constant and Qualcomm's admissions that only its monopoly modem chip share sustains Qualcomm's royalty rate, Qualcomm economic expert Dr. Aviv Nevo opined that Qualcomm's royalty rates are reasonable because the rates are constant. However, Dr. Nevo was contradicted by Qualcomm's own documents, and the Court does not find his testimony reliable.

Dr. Nevo explained that economists generally believe that to determine a FRAND rate, one should look at rates negotiated before the standard was adopted: "[O]ne thing that's in pretty consensus agreement is the fact that we should be looking at, at negotiations that happened ex ante. Ex ante means before the standard was adopted." Tr. at 1872:13-16. Dr. Nevo observed that Qualcomm entered five CDMA license agreements before 1993, when the CDMA standard was adopted, and that Qualcomm's royalty rates varied from 4% to 6.5%. Id. at 1873:1-2.

However, Dr. Nevo made the faulty assumption that Qualcomm's royalty [328] rates in later patent licenses are only unreasonably high if Qualcomm's royalty rates increased over time. Tr. at 1865:12-15. Dr. Nevo's assumption ignores the foregoing evidence that Qualcomm's royalty rate should instead decline over time. Dr. Nevo himself admitted that handsets have changed since Qualcomm first licensed its patents: "Cell phones did, yeah, they clearly changed." Id. at 1944:16

Most important, Qualcomm's own admissions contradict Dr. Nevo's claim. For example, in a 2015 Project Phoenix email, David Wise (Qualcomm Senior Vice President and Treasurer) explained that "there is a high correlation between our modem (chip) share and licensing compliance and royalty rate sustainability." CX8299-001. Where QCT had low chip share, Wise stated, "we are seeing challenges with compliance and maintaining the royalty rate." Id. Thus, Qualcomm has recognized that QCT's monopoly power helps Qualcomm sustain its unreasonably high royalty rates, and that QTL's unreasonably high royalty rates are not attributable to the value of QTL's patents.

8. Qualcomm's Unreasonably High Royalty Rates Have Not Been Tested by Litigation

Moreover, Qualcomm's unreasonably high royalty rates have not [329] been tested by litigation because Qualcomm's chip supply leverage insulates Qualcomm from legal challenges. Qualcomm's own documents recognize how Qualcomm's monopoly modem chip share prevents litigation, which sustains Qualcomm's unreasonably high royalty rates.

For example, Steve Altman (Qualcomm President) prepared portions of a January 2008 Project Berlin presentation shared [*787] with Steve Mollenkopf (QCT President). CX6992-001. On one slide, Altman wrote that if Qualcomm separated, Qualcomm's licensing business may be in jeopardy: "Post spin, many current QCT customers may more aggressively seek to challenge certain aspects of our licensing business and/or their agreements with Qualcomm."

[9] As the Court explained in Section V.E., Nokia followed Qualcomm's lead in licensing at the handset instead of the chipset level and thus to protect its licensing revenue supported Qualcomm at summary judgment and testified for Qualcomm at trial.

CX6992-035. Altman testified that "spin" refers to separating QTL and QCT. Tr. at 201:15-18. Among those challenges might be FRAND litigation to challenge Qualcomm's royalty rates, Altman testified:

> Q: One argument that's available to companies trying not to pay royalties that they agreed to pay would be to bring a claim that Qualcomm's royalties did not comport with Qualcomm's FRAND commitments; isn't that right?
> A: They would try that.

Tr. at 202:11-15.

Seven years later, during Project Phoenix, David [330] Wise (Qualcomm Senior Vice President and Treasurer) included the same points in a slide deck sent to Alex Rogers (now QTL President) and other Qualcomm executives. CX5953-001. On one slide, under the header "High modem share drives compliance and royalty rate," Wise wrote that QTL could avoid "risky litigation" thanks to QCT's modem share: "Addresses QTL compliance challenges and sustainability of long term royalty rate; without risky litigation." CX5953-011. At trial, David Wise (Qualcomm Senior Vice President and Treasurer) conceded that avoiding risky litigation helps avoid any reduction in QTL's royalty rates:

> Q: But one component of risky litigation is the risk that Qualcomm doesn't get the royalty rate it seeks? Isn't that fair?
> A: You could end up with not getting the royalty rate you think you deserve, sure.

Tr. at 109:25-110:4.

Consistent with Qualcomm's contemporaneous documents, OEMs testified at trial that QCT's monopoly power and QTL's use of chip supply threats precluded litigation over Qualcomm's royalty rates, or over whether Qualcomm's patents are valid or infringed. For example, Ira Blumberg (Lenovo Vice President of Intellectual Property) testified that ordinarily, litigation [331] provides a tool for both parties to a license negotiation if one thinks the other is being unreasonable:

> [T]hat's the number one thing I use to assess whether I want to sign a license, is a careful analysis of whether litigation and the likely outcome of litigation, plus the expense, taking into account the time value of money and so on, is ultimately greater than or less than the negotiated alternative. And I'm very pragmatic; when the negotiated alternative is clearly less expensive, I'm happy to take a license. When the negotiated alternative is equal to or greater than the likely litigation outcome, I'm not ready to sign, and I'm ready to keep negotiating and/or litigating as necessary.

Blumberg Depo. 188:2-15. However, Blumberg testified that Qualcomm's chip supply leverage took litigation off the table: "But [w]hen you're facing, as we've discussed, a dispute resolution that says either you agree or can't get any more key supplies, it certainly changes the balance of negotiating capabilities." Id. at 189:6-9.

Similarly, John Grubbs (BlackBerry Senior Director of Intellectual Property Transactions) testified that Qualcomm rejected BlackBerry's request to arbitrate Qualcomm's royalty [332] rate:

> Q: And is this email requesting an arbitration on the royalty cap and on a FRAND determination for Qualcomm's royalty rate?
> A: Yes.
> [*788] Q: Was Qualcomm willing to arbitrate the claim . . . that royalties were not FRAND?
> A: No, it was not.

Grubbs Depo. 295:6-14.

Nanfen Yu (Huawei Senior Legal Counsel) also testified that Huawei could not litigate Qualcomm's royalty rates because Huawei was concerned about chip supply:

> Q: Would there be practical problems with suing Qualcomm for determination of the FRAND royalty rate while you are obtaining product from Qualcomm?
> A: So one concern would be the chipset supply, and the other is that we have the existing license agreements in place. And we have contractual obligations under the agreement, too.

Yu Depo. 158:3-10.

Specifically, Todd Madderom (Motorola Director of Procurement) testified that if an OEM challenged Qualcomm's royalty rate and lost chip supply, an OEM would lose all of its related handset business: "If we are unable to source the modem, we are unable to ship the handset. It's a direct correlation. No modem supply, no phone supply to our customer." Madderom Depo. 147:25-148:3.

Richard Donaldson, the FTC's licensing expert, offered expert [333] testimony consistent with Qualcomm's documents and OEM testimony. Donaldson testified that in a typical negotiation, a licensee always has FRAND litigation as a recourse: "[I]f he is of the opinion that what is being proposed, the rates being proposed are unreasonably high, he would have an expectation that a reasonable court would lower what a reasonable — his determination of a reasonable royalty." Tr. at 966:2-5. However, Qualcomm's licensing practices removed that option: "[I]t would put the licensee at a severe disadvantage. He's basically — and as the testimony reflects — he's basically in the position, I agree to the license or basically go out of business." Id. at 967:-18-21. Consistent with the trial evidence, Donaldson opined that this dynamic "results in a disproportionately high royalty rate." Id. at 967:24-25.

In addition, Donaldson testified that from 2006 to 2016, Qualcomm was involved in only two patent litigation lawsuits "unrelated to enforcing the SEP patents." Tr. at 973:23-24. By contrast, other SEP holders like Ericsson, Nokia, and InterDigital each were involved in more than twice as many patent litigations over the same period. Id. at 973:19-22; see CX0101-001 (chart comparing [334] litigation by company). According to Donaldson, those figures undersell the effect of Qualcomm's licensing practices:

> Ericsson, Nokia, and InterDigital did not have a no license, no chip policy, so their negotiations would have always included, or been negotiated in the shadow of what possible legal remedies might exist, which would have — which would suggest that they would have been more reasonable in setting what their royalty demands were and avoiding litigation in a number of cases that aren't reflected here.

Tr. at 973:25-974:7. Because Donaldson's testimony was consistent with Qualcomm's documents and the trial evidence, the Court finds reliable his opinion that Qualcomm's monopoly chip power both sustains Qualcomm's unreasonably high royalty rates and prevents litigation to challenge those royalty rates.

Although Qualcomm's license agreements offer OEMs binding arbitration, Qualcomm has threatened to cut off chip supply and technical support, and to require the return of software when OEMs attempt to arbitrate royalty rates. This renders arbitration a functional nonstarter. For example, after LGE and Qualcomm [*789] exchanged arbitration demands in 2004 relating to LGE's WCDMA royalty [335] obligations, Dr. Irwin Jacobs (Qualcomm Co-Founder and former CEO) stated that unless LGE withdrew its arbitration claims and paid past WCDMA royalties, Qualcomm would stop accepting LGE purchase orders for chips, cease all shipments of chips, withdraw all technical support, and require LGE to return all chip software. Specifically, Irwin Jacobs stated:

> I therefore request that LGE promptly (i) retract and waive Mr. Ham's claim that QUALCOMM has waived its rights under our existing Supply Agreement or that LGE has received or somehow receives any implied royalty free license to use our WCDMA ASICs and (ii) without prejudice to either party's position in the present arbitration, agree to report and pay royalties on all of its sales of past and future WCDMA subscriber units and infrastructure equipment in accordance with the terms of the license agreement. Otherwise, QUALCOMM is left with no choice but to take the following steps:
> 1) QUALCOMM will stop accepting LGE purchase orders for WCDMA ASICs;
> 2) QUALCOMM will cease all shipments of WCDMA ASICs to LG, beginning with the next-scheduled shipments of 500 units of the MSM 6250 for June 30, and 6000 units of the MSM 6200 scheduled to ship [336] during the first week in July;

> 3)QUALCOMM will withdraw all of its substantial WCDMA engineering resources currently providing technical support to LGE and reassign those resources to our strategic ASIC customers, all of whom are honoring their supply contracts and licensing obligation; and
> 4) QUALCOMM will require that LGE return to QUALCOMM all versions and derivations of our WCDMA ASIC software.

CX6814-022. At trial, Irwin Jacobs testified that Qualcomm then cut off LGE's chip supply: "We did not ship to them the chips that were specified here, the 500 and then 6,000 chips as far as I know at this time." Tr. at 1293:25-1294:2.

Hwi-Jae Cho (Director of LGE Intellectual Property Center) testified that "[w]hen Qualcomm threatened to terminate the Supply Agreement, LGE had no option but to agree to whatever Qualcomm demanded. LGE's top management did not want to take the risk of endangering LGE's mobile business." Cho Depo. ¶ 91.

Thus, because Qualcomm threatened to cut off and actually did cut off OEMs' chip supply and threatened to revoke technical support and software from OEMs, arbitration—even if technically available—was not a realistic path for an OEM. Accordingly, Qualcomm's monopoly [337] chip power leads to unreasonably high royalty rates by eliminating the prospect of FRAND litigation or arbitration.

Lastly, Michael Lasinski, the FTC's patent valuation expert, also concluded that Qualcomm's royalty rates are unreasonably high. Lasinski's methodologies are not reliable, as he evaluated SEP holders' relative portfolio strength in part by counting SEP holders' approved contributions to standards. At trial, Lasinski admitted that a company can receive credit for an approved contribution based on a mere cosmetic change to an existing standards document. Id. at 1067:17-1068:9. For example, one approved contribution to 3GPP states that the contribution provides "editorial corrections" to a standards document and "has no impact on the implementations" of the standard. QX6457-001. Accordingly, the district court in [*790] TCL Communication Technology Holdings, Ltd. v. Telefonaktiebolaget LM Ericsson, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 214003, 2018 WL 4488286 (C.D. Cal. Nov. 8, 2017), concluded that using contribution counting to value a patent portfolio suffers from two flaws: "the absence of any evidence that it corresponds to actual intellectual property rights, and its inability to account for transferred or expired patents." *2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 214003, [WL] at 41. Thus, the Court does not rely on Lasinski's testimony.

However, Lasinski's ultimate conclusions are in line with [338] the documentary evidence that Qualcomm's royalty rates are unreasonably high. Specifically, Lasinski determined that for any OEM, Qualcomm's FRAND royalty rate should be below 1%: "So my highest indicator here is 0.58%, which is significantly below what Qualcomm has actually charged historically to these licensees." Tr. at 1034:25-1035:2. The Court notes that Lasinski's calculations are consistent with [TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT]'s and [TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT]'s rates.

Thus, based on all the foregoing evidence—primarily Qualcomm's own documents—the Court concludes that Qualcomm's royalty rates are unreasonably high. These unreasonably high royalty rates raise costs to OEMs, and harm consumers because OEMs pass those costs along to consumers. Qualcomm's unreasonably high royalty rates also prevent OEMs from investing in new handset features, which further harms consumers. Todd Madderom (Motorola Director of Procurement) testified that if Motorola did not have to pay Qualcomm's inflated license fees, Motorola could invest those funds in better features for consumers: "[W]e believe that the millions of dollars that we pay to royalty could be better — could be invested to perhaps develop [339] our own technological advances." Madderom Depo. 218:24-219:3.

Moreover, Qualcomm's unreasonably high royalty rates may dissuade OEMs from investing in new features that would benefit consumers because an OEM will have to pay Qualcomm additional royalties if the new features add to the handset's price. For example, Jeff Williams (Apple COO) testified that if Apple added $60 of value to its handset enclosure, Qualcomm would receive $3 in royalty payments on each Apple handset even though Qualcomm's cellular patents had nothing to do with Apple's addition. Tr. at 869:21-24.

H. Qualcomm's Surcharge on Rivals Bolsters Qualcomm's Monopoly Chip Market Share, Unreasonably High Royalty Rates, and Exclusivity with OEMs

Next, the Court discusses how Qualcomm's unreasonably high royalty rates impose a surcharge on rivals' modem chips. Under Qualcomm's patent license agreements with OEMs, Qualcomm charges its unreasonably high royalty rates anytime an OEM sells a handset, even when that handset contains a rival's modem chip. Thus, Qualcomm imposes an artificial surcharge on all sales of its rivals' modem chips. The surcharge increases the effective price of rivals' modem chips, reduces rivals' margins, [340] and results in exclusivity.

For example, Brian Chong (Wistron Chief of New Technology Development and Product Planning) testified that Qualcomm's patent license restricts Wistron's ability to use rivals' modem chips because the royalty rate imposes a surcharge on rivals' chips:

> [T]here was a case that I remember in particular when we were considering introducing lower cost phones. And MTK was the chip supplier that we think best suitable for that product position in terms of price position and the spec [*791] corresponding that it offers. However, in the end we decided to stay Qualcomm for the simple reason that because Qualcomm responded that, even if we're using non-Qualcomm chips, we would still have to pay the onerous royalty that Qualcom dictated in the SULA.

Chong Depo. 256:9-20. Chong also testified that the upfront fee Wistron had paid Qualcomm incentivized Wistron to buy Qualcomm chips rather than rivals' chips: "So by staying with Qualcomm we would be able to recoup that investment faster." Id. at 256:21-257:1.

Practices that unfairly suppress sales of competing products "below the critical level necessary for any rival to pose a real threat" cause anticompetitive harm because they [341] exclude competitors from the marketplace and thereby harm competition in general. Dentsply, 399 F.3d at 191; see also Spectrum Sports, 506 U.S. at 458 (holding that the Sherman Act "directs itself . . . against conduct which unfairly tends to destroy competition itself").

The Seventh Circuit's decision in Premier Electrical Construction Company v. National Electrical Contractors Association, 814 F.2d 358 (7th Cir. 1987), demonstrates how a monopolist can use an across-the-board price increase to impose artificial constraints that disproportionately harm the monopolist's competitors, as Qualcomm has done.

In Premier, an association of electrical employers known as the National Electrical Contractors Association ("the Association") established a fund with an electrical workers' union ("the Union"). Id. at 359. Association members contributed 1% of their gross payroll into the fund to offset the cost of collective bargaining and administrative services. Id. at 359-60. However, because electrical employers who were not Association members were "free of the 1% contribution," these electrical employers "had lower costs of doing business" and could charge lower prices. Id. at 368. Electrical employers who were not Association members thus began to underbid the Association's members for electrical contracting work. Id.

To prevent being underbid, the Association enlisted the Union to collect the [342] 1% fee from non-Association electrical employers as well. Id. at 368. In this way, the Association "leveled" the playing field because all employers had to pay into the fund, but in so doing the Association gave itself an advantage. "The result was higher prices to purchasers of electrical work and higher profits for members of the Association—both because there is more in the fund, for the Association's use, and because the reduction in competition enabled the members to capture more of the market." Id. Although the Association in Premier charged the 1% fee directly to its rivals—whereas Qualcomm's surcharge raises the price an OEM must pay for rivals' modem chips—the result is substantially the same. Like the Association, Qualcomm has "raised its rivals' costs, and thereby raised the market price to its own advantage." Id.

Qualcomm's unreasonably high royalty rates enable Qualcomm to control rivals' prices because Qualcomm receives the royalty even when an OEM uses one of Qualcomm's rival's chips. Thus, the "all-in" price of any modem chip sold by one of Qualcomm's rivals effectively includes two components: (1) the nominal chip price; and (2) Qualcomm's royalty surcharge.

To Qualcomm, the surcharge [343] represents "higher profits," both because the surcharge brings additional revenue to Qualcomm, and "because the reduction in competition enable[s]" Qualcomm "to capture more of the [modem chip] market." [*792] Premier, 814 F.2d at 368; see United Shoe Mach. Corp. v. United States, 258 U.S. 451, 457, 42 S. Ct. 363, 66 L. Ed. 708 (1922) (holding that agreements with "the practical effect" to exclude purchases of a competitor's products are anticompetitive).

Because the surcharge also raises the market price of rivals' chips, Qualcomm prevents rivals from underbidding Qualcomm, so that Qualcomm can maintain its modem chip market power. The surcharge affects demand for rivals' chips because as a matter of basic economics, regardless of whether a surcharge is imposed on OEMs or directly on Qualcomm's rivals, "the price paid by buyers rises, and the price received by sellers falls." N. Gregory Mankiw, Principles of Microeconomics, Vol. 1 156 (7th ed. 2014). Thus, the surcharge "places a wedge between the price that buyers pay and the price that sellers receive," and demand for such transactions decreases. Id. Rivals see lower sales volumes and lower margins, and consumers see less advanced features as competition decreases.

The district court in Caldera, Inc. v. Microsoft Corp., 87 F. Supp. 2d 1244 (D. Utah 1999), addressed how a similar royalty surcharge increased rivals' prices [344] and promoted exclusivity. Caldera alleged that Microsoft had unlawfully maintained its monopoly in operating systems used for personal computers through several practices. Id. at 1246. In one practice, Microsoft entered multiyear licenses with OEMs that required OEMs to pay Microsoft "a royalty on every machine the OEM shipped regardless of whether the machine contained [Microsoft's operating system] or another operating system." Id. at 1249-50. This raised the all-in price of Caldera's operating system. Id. at 1250.

Further, Microsoft offered discounts on Microsoft's operating system if OEMs entered the license agreements, which induced OEMs to enter agreements that raised the effective price of Caldera's operating system. Id. At summary judgment, the district court concluded that a reasonable jury could conclude that Microsoft's license agreements and discounts "resulted in an agreement with the practical effect of exclusivity" because Microsoft's surcharge increased the effective price of Caldera's operating systems. Id. Here, too, Qualcomm's surcharge increased the effective price of rivals' modem chips and Qualcomm's agreements with OEMs result in exclusivity.

I. Qualcomm's Chip Incentive Funds Bolster Qualcomm's [345] Monopoly Chip Market Share, Unreasonably High Royalty Rates, and Exclusivity with OEMs

QTL's chip incentive funds lower the effective price of Qualcomm's modem chips, which exacerbates the effect of Qualcomm's surcharge on rivals' chips. Qualcomm's exclusive deals with Apple are the most prominent single example of such funds, but Qualcomm regularly gave OEMs chip incentives that result in exclusivity and in combination "severely restrict the market's ambit." Dentsply, 399 F.3d at 191. In turn, QTL's unreasonably high royalty rates generate the revenue that enables QTL to offer OEMs hundreds of millions (or in the case of Qualcomm's exclusive deals with Apple, billions) in chip incentives.

In 2010, Derek Aberle (QTL President) offered BlackBerry [TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT] million in chip incentives, which BlackBerry received as rebates on QCT modem chips, according to the contemporaneous notes of John Grubbs (BlackBerry Senior Director of Intellectual Property Transactions). CX3255-002. Grubbs testified that because Qualcomm did not reduce BlackBerry's overall royalty burden, the chip incentive fund [*793] reduced the effective price of only Qualcomm modem chips, and resulted in exclusivity:

> BlackBerry is going to [346] pay the royalty, regardless of whether it buys the chip from Qualcomm or Marvell. If — if Qualcomm agreed to reduce the royalty, then BlackBerry could buy the chips from Qualcomm or Marvell and still get the benefit of that reduced price. If Qualcomm reduces the chip cost, then we can only go to one person in order to take advantage of that and that's Qualcomm. So we can't go to Marvell and take advantage of a reduction in chip price unless they're going to get this reduction too.

Similarly, a 2004 QTL chip incentive fund required LGE to purchase at least 85% of its modem chips from QCT to be eligible for the chip incentives. CX6809-004.

In 2003, Qualcomm's chip incentive fund required Samsung to purchase at least 85% of its modem chips from QCT in 2003 to "take market share from manufacturers that do not use our ASICs," according to Irwin Jacobs (Qualcomm Co-Founder). CX6719-002. As recently as 2018, Qualcomm's chip incentive fund required Samsung to purchase from Qualcomm 100% of Samsung's premium modem chips and at least a certain number of medium and high tier modem chips. JX0122-036.

In 2013, QTL offered Lenovo $180 million in chip incentives that were contingent [347] on Lenovo purchasing at least 80 million modem chips from QCT over two years. CX6491-003.

In 2016, QTL offered Motorola a chip incentive fund that Motorola concluded would reduce Motorola's effective royalty rate to 3.8% only if Motorola purchased 100% of its modem chips from Qualcomm. CX2060-021.

In 2003, Qualcomm charged Huawei a reduced royalty rate of 2.65% if Huawei purchased 100% of its CDMA modem chips for use in China from Qualcomm, but a 5-7% royalty rate if Huawei purchased CDMA modem chips from a Qualcomm rival. JX0022-010.

Similarly, for years Qualcomm charged LGE a 5.75% running royalty rate on handsets containing Qualcomm's rival's chips and a 5% running royalty rate on handsets containing Qualcomm's chips. JX0026-005. Thus, all of these chip incentives and license provisions tend to result in exclusivity.

In internal documents, Qualcomm has recognized that reducing its chip price rather than reducing its royalty rate—as Qualcomm does via chip incentive funds—prevents Qualcomm from having to compete with rival modem chip suppliers on price, and results in exclusivity. Thus, in a 1998 email to Steve Altman (later Qualcomm President), Marv Blecker (QTL Senior Vice President) [348] recommended that Qualcomm reduce prices on modem chips, rather than reducing Qualcomm's royalty rates:

> Basically, by reducing royalties we are doing nothing more than competing on price with our asic competitors; that is if the reduced or zero royalty is the incentive to buy Q ASICs, then the same effect can be achieved by simply reducing price on our ASICs by that same amount. The advantage of doing it the latter way is that we have preserved the integrity of our royalty rate; ie we have not started down the 'slippery slope' of reducing royalty rates.

Qualcomm's billion-dollar exclusive deals with Apple are the most prominent single [*794] example of Qualcomm eliminating chip price competition for OEM business. As the Court discussed at length in Section V.G., Qualcomm's exclusive deals with Apple foreclosed rivals from the many direct and indirect benefits of selling modem chips to Apple. Per a 2012 presentation to the Qualcomm Board of Directors, Apple is the OEM that "matters most" because Apple is the largest consumer of premium modem chips—thus providing its suppliers with high sales volumes—and Apple "challenges suppliers to provide best-in-class products," which improves [349] suppliers' products in the broader marketplace. CX6974-029.

Qualcomm has recognized that Apple's purchase volumes are significant enough that without selling thin modem chips to Apple, a rival supplier of thin modem chips cannot survive in the market. In August 2010, Steve Mollenkopf (QCT President) told Paul Jacobs (Qualcomm CEO), Derek Aberle (QTL President), and Steve Altman (Qualcomm President) in an email that if Qualcomm secured Apple exclusivity in the TA, Qualcomm could prevent rivals from becoming threats: "[T]here are significant strategic benefits as it is unlikely that there will be enough standalone modem volume to sustain a viable competitor without that slot." CX5348-001.

Furthermore, Aicha Evans (Intel Chief Strategy Officer) testified that after Intel won Apple's business, other OEMs, including Lenovo, LGE, Motorola, and Tesla, reached out about Intel's modem chips. Tr. at 576:20-577:4. Evans testified that Apple enhances a modem chip supplier's presence in SSOs. Id. at 569:9-10. Similarly, Stefan Wolff (Intel Engineer) explained in a contemporaneous email that winning Apple's business would enable Intel to attract operators and network vendors for early prototyping [350] of Intel's newest LTE modem chips. CX1599-001. Thus, Qualcomm's exclusive deals with Apple both restricted rivals' sales and deprived rivals of the positive network effects of supplying modem chips to Apple.

Qualcomm's chip incentive funds also help maintain Qualcomm's unreasonably high royalty rates and surcharge on rivals' chips by inducing OEMs to sign license agreements. In 2013, Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) told Derek Aberle (QTL President) and Marv Blecker (QTL Senior Vice President) that Qualcomm could convince OPPO to sign a QTL license if QTL offered chip incentives: "Think we have a good chance of getting them to take a 4G license now, if we are willing to give them (in addition to the $5M strat fund) a capped deduction for marketing expenses." CX6516-001.

Similarly, John Grubbs (BlackBerry Senior Director of Intellectual Property Transactions) testified that BlackBerry's receipt of chip incentive funds was "contingent on BlackBerry resolving its royalty dispute with Qualcomm." Grubbs Depo. 248:9-15. By using chip incentive funds to close the gap on license agreements, Qualcomm ensures that QTL can continue to charge unreasonably high royalty [351] rates on rivals' modem chips.

Finally, QTL's unreasonably high royalty rates continue the cycle of anticompetitive harm because royalty revenues fund QTL's enormous chip incentive funds.

A May 2007 Qualcomm accounting memo concluded that even though a chip incentive fund accrued on LGE's purchase of QCT modem chips, QTL would fund the chip incentive fund because QTL received the primary benefit: "QTL is deemed to be the primary beneficiary of the elements of these agreements, including the expected royalty streams resulting from QC's first OFDM [an LTE technology] subscriber device license with a major handset manufacturer. [*795] Therefore, the amounts under these agreements will be recorded in the QTL business unit." CX7556-005. Because Qualcomm's unreasonably high royalty rates are not based on the value of Qualcomm's patents but rather on Qualcomm's chip monopoly power, using those unfairly obtained royalty revenues to impair rivals "does not further competition on the merits." PeaceHealth, 515 F.3d at 894.

Thus, QTL's unreasonably high royalty rates enable QTL to offer OEMs enormous chip incentive funds, which lower the relative price of Qualcomm's modem chips, result in exclusivity, and maintain Qualcomm's ability [352] to impose a surcharge on rivals' modem chips.

Qualcomm argues that its chip incentive funds are procompetitive as "legitimate marketing funds rather than exclusionary conduct." ECF No. 1470-2 ¶ 697. However, Qualcomm's own documents discussed at length above show that QTL's chip incentive funds preserve QTL's "royalty stream" and enable Qualcomm to avoid competing on chip price with its rivals. Qualcomm offers no evidence that Qualcomm or OEMs viewed Qualcomm's chip incentive funds as anything other than rebates designed to lower Qualcomm's chip prices relative to Qualcomm's rivals and to preserve Qualcomm's unreasonably high royalty rates. Therefore, the Court rejects Qualcomm's procompetitive justification as pretextual.

J. Qualcomm's Refusal to License Rivals Bolsters Qualcomm's Monopoly Chip Share, Unreasonably High Royalty Rates, and Exclusivity with OEMs

Qualcomm also refuses to license rivals in violation of its FRAND commitments and its antitrust duty to deal with rivals. As the Court explained in Section V.C., Qualcomm's refusal to license its modem chip SEPs to rival modem chip suppliers prevents rivals' entry, promotes rivals' exit, and hampers Qualcomm's rivals in the marketplace. [353] Instead of licensing rivals, Qualcomm will only enter CDMA ASIC Agreements, which enable Qualcomm to control to whom its rivals sell modem chips and to require that rivals report to Qualcomm the identities of specific quantities sold to each customer.

In so doing, Qualcomm reduces its rivals' customer base and sales, which results in exclusivity. By preventing rivals from entering the market and restricting the sales of those rivals that do enter, Qualcomm entrenches its monopoly power, maintains its chip leverage over OEMs, and sustains its unreasonably high royalty rates. See Dentsply, 399 F.3d at 191 (holding that anticompetitive harm results when anticompetitive practices "bar a substantial number of rivals" from the market).

Qualcomm's refusal to license rivals boxes out rivals. Scott McGregor (former Broadcom CEO) testified that Qualcomm refused to license Broadcom to prevent Broadcom from becoming a competitor: "[W]e subsequently tried to work out licensing terms with them and we didn't feel we could get reasonable licensing terms with them working on that and we felt they may be blocking us in the space." McGregor Depo. 151:10-14.

Instead of licenses, Qualcomm enters CDMA ASIC Agreements that permit rivals [354] to sell modem chips to only "Authorized Purchasers"—Qualcomm licensees. JX0050-001. Qualcomm's CDMA ASIC Agreements also require rivals to report to Qualcomm "specific quantities" of modem chips sold to each Authorized Purchaser, and thus give Qualcomm sensitive business information about rivals' sales and customers. JX0050-055 to -056. Thus, Qualcomm controls and monitors to whom its rivals sell modem chips.

[*796] Qualcomm has emphasized to OEMs that Qualcomm controls to whom its rivals sell modem chips, which bolsters Qualcomm's chip supply leverage and ability to extract unreasonably high royalty payments from OEMs. In November 2013, Ira Blumberg (Lenovo Vice President of Intellectual Property) wrote to other Lenovo executives that Qualcomm had threatened to withhold Lenovo's chip supply and to force MediaTek to withhold Lenovo's chip supply: "Qualcomm has threatened to stop selling its chips to Lenovo if Lenovo terminates its license. Further, Qualcomm has threatened to force its chip licensees (including MediaTek) to stop selling mobile phone chips to Lenovo if Lenovo terminates its license." CX2079-004.

Qualcomm even boxes out its rivals through chip supply threats to OEMs. For example, [355] in 2015, Qualcomm used the threat of chip supply cutoff to prevent VIVO from purchasing a more competitive modem chip from Qualcomm's rival MediaTek. Sanjay Mehta (QCT China Senior Vice President) told Derek Aberle (Qualcomm President) and Cristiano Amon (QCT President) in an email that QCT could secure exclusivity with VIVO if QTL permitted QCT to continue supplying chips: "What VIVO will commit to (pending QTL confirmation that if VIVO continues to negotiate with QTL in good faith, QCT will continue shipping chipsets) . . . will not launch 6755/6750 [MediaTek modem chips] based handsets (which means QCT will win significant upside in 2016)." CX5321-002. When asked about the email, Cristiano Amon (now Qualcomm President) testified that the 6755 and 6750 modem chips were MediaTek modem chips that had "competition advantages . . . and software compatibility with whatever the incumbent chipset in VIVO was." Tr. at 509:13-510:7. Thus, Qualcomm used VIVO's fear of losing chip supply to secure exclusivity with VIVO and eliminate a competitive threat from MediaTek.

Similarly, Brian Chong (Wistron Chief of New Technology Development and Product Planning) testified that Qualcomm's refusal to [356] license rivals, and the resulting surcharge on rivals' chips, limited Wistron's ability to use a MediaTek modem chip that Wistron preferred:

> [T]here was a case that I remember in particular when we were considering introducing lower cost phones. And MTK was the chip supplier that we think best suitable for that product position in terms of price position and the spec corresponding that it offers. However, in the end we decided to stay Qualcomm for the simple reason that because Qualcomm responded that, even if we're using non-Qualcomm chips, we would still have to pay the onerous royalty that Qualcom dictated in the SULA.

Chong Depo. 256:9-20.

Refusing to license rivals not only blocks rivals, but also preserves Qualcomm's ability to demand unreasonably high royalty rates from OEMs. Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) told the IRS in 2012 that if Qualcomm licensed a rival, and that rival sold a modem chip to an OEM, Qualcomm could not then collect additional royalty revenues from that OEM: "[W]hen [the rival] sell[s] that chip to somebody who's going to put the chip in a cell phone, okay, the licensee's sale of that chip will exhaust our rights and then [357] we won't be able to collect a royalty on a cell phone that's based on the price of the cellphone." CX6786-R at 26:6-12. Instead, Qualcomm would only charge its royalty rate against the price of a modem chip. According to an email Steve Altman (former Qualcomm President) sent in 1999, the total royalty payment per chip has been as low as $.30. CX8177-001. That revenue pales in comparison [*797] to the $20 royalty payment per chip Qualcomm can receive when demanding a 5% royalty rate on a $400 handset.

Accordingly, when the IRS asked whether Qualcomm's decision to stop licensing its SEPs to rivals was a "business decision," Marv Blecker (QTL Senior Vice President) agreed: "Oh it's more than that, it's more than that. That's an understatement." CX6786R at 70:22-71:3. Blecker told the IRS that to license rivals would have "the potential of threatening our entire revenue stream at the handset level." Id. at 71:5-6.

Fabian Gonell (now QTL Legal Counsel and Senior Vice President, Licensing Strategy) also conceded to the IRS that Qualcomm stopped licensing rivals because Qualcomm had to choose between licensing rivals and OEMs, and licensing OEMs is far more lucrative: "But having — having to choose between [358] one or the other then you're right, obviously the handset is humongously more . . . lucrative for a bunch of — a bunch of reasons." Id. at 71:18-23.

Thus, Qualcomm's refusal to license rivals prevents entry, promotes exit, and hampers rivals in the marketplace by reducing rivals' customer base and sales. This results in exclusivity, like Qualcomm's other practices. By reducing the sales available to rivals and avoiding exhaustion claims, Qualcomm's refusal to license rivals also helps Qualcomm maintain the chip supply leverage against OEMs that sustains Qualcomm's unreasonably high royalty rates.

K. Qualcomm's Monopoly Chip Market Share, Unreasonably High Royalty Rates, and Exclusivity with OEMs Create Insurmountable Barriers for Rivals

Collectively, the harms caused by Qualcomm's anticompetitive practices take repeated aim at the elements necessary for a rival modem chip supplier to compete in the market. The Ninth Circuit has held that "[a]nticompetitive conduct is behavior that tends to impair the opportunities of rivals and either does not further competition on the merits or does so in an unnecessarily restrictive way." PeaceHealth, 515 F.3d at 894.

Here, Qualcomm's interrelated practices create insurmountable [359] and artificial barriers for Qualcomm's rivals, and thus do not further competition on the merits. Qualcomm's practices all reduce rivals' sales. Qualcomm's chip incentive funds for OEMs lower the effective price of Qualcomm's modem chips, result in exclusivity, and restrict the OEM customer base available to Qualcomm's rivals. Through CDMA ASIC Agreements, Qualcomm limits its rivals' customers and further reduces sales. The surcharge on rivals' modem chips imposed by Qualcomm's unreasonably high royalty rates increases the cost of rivals' chips, which reduces demand for rivals' chips and reduces rivals' margins. By attacking all facets of rivals' businesses and preventing competition on the merits, these practices "harm the competitive process and thereby harm consumers." See Microsoft, 253 F.3d at 59.

Qualcomm's licensing practices have enabled Qualcomm to eliminate a cellular standard supported by a rival. Qualcomm's suppression of rivals' sales also forecloses rivals from the revenue necessary to invest in research and development and acquisitions to develop new technology. Without sales to OEMs, rivals lack opportunities to engage with OEMs' engineering teams, customize products for an OEM, and win year-after-year [360] business from an OEM. Finally, Qualcomm's practices harm rivals' standing with SSOs and network vendors. As a result, rivals lack the resources and industry standing to [*798] bring the most advanced modem chips to market, which further reduces rivals' sales, and increases Qualcomm's sales. Then, the cycle begins again. The Court discusses these compounding anticompetitive harms in more detail below.

1. Qualcomm Strives to Eliminate Rivals and Eliminated a Competing Standard

Qualcomm's licensing practices, which result in exclusivity, can make it impossible for rivals to survive—as Qualcomm's own documents recognize. For example, as Qualcomm sought exclusivity from Apple in 2010, Steve Mollenkopf (QCT President) told Paul Jacobs (Qualcomm CEO), Derek Aberle (QTL President), and Steve Altman (Qualcomm President) that exclusivity would so restrict the market that no rival supplier of premium thin modems could survive: "[T]here are significant strategic benefits as it is unlikely that there will be enough standalone modem volume to sustain a viable competitor without that slot." CX5348-001.

Not only did Qualcomm strive to eliminate thin modem competitors, but also Qualcomm attempted to and succeeded [361] at eliminating a competing cellular standard. Qualcomm wielded chip supply leverage and the specter of its unreasonably high royalty rates to eliminate WiMax, a competing cellular standard supported by Intel. In the 2007 Marketing Incentive Agreement ("MIA"), Qualcomm offered Apple royalty rate rebates conditioned on (1) Apple publicly announcing that Apple had "chosen GSM technology for its phone . . . into the future with 3G and beyond"; (2) Apple not selling more than 1,000 WiMax handsets; and (3) Apple not licensing a third party to sell WiMax handsets. JX0040-003. During MIA negotiations, Marv Blecker (QTL President) emailed Jeff Williams (Apple COO) to state that Qualcomm's first priority was eliminating WiMax: "Motivating Apple to select WCDMA to the exclusion of WiMax is our primary motivation for entering into this agreement." CX0617-001.

Irwin Jacobs (Qualcomm Co-Founder and former Qualcomm CEO) testified at trial that Qualcomm would have been behind in supplying WiMax chips had WiMax become the standard:

Q: It's accurate to state, sir, that if WiMax had ended up as the standard, Qualcomm would have been far behind; is that right?

A: That's fine.
Tr. at 1284:10-13.

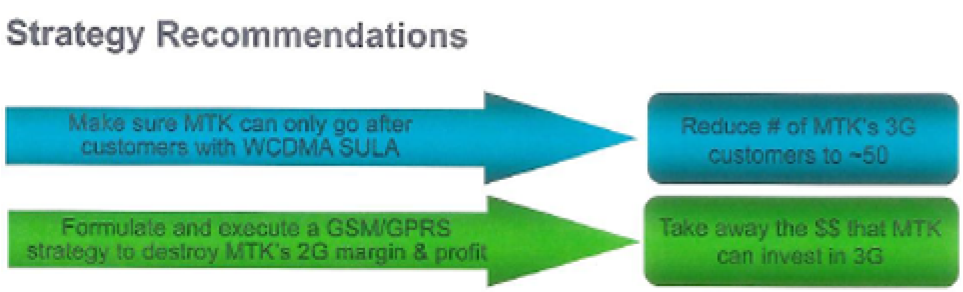
As a result [362] of the MIA, WiMax was eliminated. Jeff Williams (Apple COO) testified that the Qualcomm agreement ended Apple's engagement with Intel's WiMax standard:

Q: And following the execution of that agreement, did Apple pursue WiMax further?

A: No. In essence, it was killed in the cradle for us. We did not.
Tr. at 873:21-23. Thus, Qualcomm eliminated a competing cellular standard supported by Intel not because WiMax was inferior, but to eliminate competition.

2. Qualcomm's Licensing Practices Prevent Rivals from Investing in New Technology Through Research and Development and Acquisitions

Even when Qualcomm's licensing practices do not outright eliminate competition, Qualcomm can suppress rivals' sales such that rivals lack revenue to invest in research and development, as Qualcomm's own documents recognize. For example, in a 2009 presentation that Qualcomm prepared within days of its CDMA ASIC Agreement with MediaTek—which restricted MediaTek's sales to Qualcomm licensees [*799] only—Qualcomm stated that by reducing MediaTek's customer base, Qualcomm could "[t]ake away the $$ that MTK can invest in 3G." CX5809-041. The slide is reproduced below. Thus, Qualcomm aimed to reduce MediaTek's customer base [363] to destroy MediaTek's margin, and thereby impede MediaTek's ability to invest in 3G.



Reducing rivals' revenue to invest in research and development gravely harms rivals because producing modem chips requires very high fixed research and development costs. For example, after Intel purchased Infineon, Intel had to spend "billions of dollars" to develop LTE technology from scratch, according to Aicha Evans (Intel Chief Strategy Officer). Tr. at 565:3-6.

Accordingly, to cover the costs of research and development, a modem chip supplier must generate a larger customer base. Will Wyatt (QTI [Qualcomm Technologies, Inc., the Qualcomm subsidiary that operates QCT] Vice President, Finance) testified at trial that a large customer base provides the revenue necessary "to make R&D investments to support customers and develop technology." Tr. at 443:6-10. Thus, after Intel won Apple's high-volume business, Stefan Wolff (Intel Engineer) emphasized in an internal Intel email that revenue from sales to Apple would "support the funding of our next generation LTE 7460" modem chip. CX1599-001.

Similarly, Scott McGregor (former Broadcom CEO) testified that because modem chip research and development is so [364] expensive, the economics of supplying modem chips are very sensitive to customer volume:

> I mean, the cellular baseband business is extremely R&D intensive. More so than probably any other semiconductor business by a lot. And it's a lot of software people, a lot of engineers to do the hardware, a lot of testing, a lot of other things. And the more volume you have, the more you can amortize the fixed costs of doing the development on chips. And so the economics of being in the cellular baseband business are very sensitive to volume of customers.

McGregor Depo. 174:12-21.

Producing premium LTE modem chips is especially sensitive to customer volume because research and development for premium modem chips is more expensive. Finbarr Moynihan (MediaTek General Manager of Corporate Sales and Business Development) testified that premium LTE modem chips require more upfront investment and require higher margin to support that investment: "You'd certainly like to see that the higher tiers generate higher profit, higher margins, yeah. It takes more R&D to develop those products." Tr. at 378:18-20.

Qualcomm's own documents and testimony recognize that research and development is necessary to win the [365] race to market. For example, a 2016 Qualcomm pricing strategy plan received by Will [*800] Wyatt (QTI Vice President, Finance) twice makes the point that being first to market has compounding advantages for a modem chip supplier: "Winner Take All in the Mobile Silicon Space" and "It's very simple: If you are first > you win / If you are late > you lose." CX8262-003. At trial, Will Wyatt also testified that it is essential for a modem chip supplier to be first to market:

> Q: And you would agree that in the semiconductor space, being early in terms of new technology is very helpful in terms of being successful; correct?
> A: Yes. You need to win each of the specific modem socket designs, and they turn over very quickly.

Tr. at 445:2-6.

Thus, by suppressing rivals' sales and revenue to invest in research and development for new technology, Qualcomm ensures that its rivals will lose repeatedly. Those losses further suppress rivals' sales, and further suppress rivals' ability to fund research and development.

In contrast, by winning repeatedly, Qualcomm maintains the scale and margin to have "large teams" that "work around the world" on research and development, as James Thompson (Qualcomm CTO) testified [366] at trial. Tr. at 1382:10-18.

Qualcomm also has two monopoly-generated revenue streams to invest in research and development, unlike its rivals. Qualcomm's monopoly chip power sustains Qualcomm's unreasonably high royalty rates and billions in licensing revenue. Qualcomm's monopoly chip power also enables Qualcomm to charge monopoly prices on modem chips. For example, according to an April 2009 VIA presentation, Qualcomm reduced its prices whenever VIA introduced a comparable chip—which shows that Qualcomm was previously receiving monopoly prices on its modem chips: "When [VIA] first introduced CBP6 to US market, the price of QSC6055 [a Qualcomm chip] was $18," but within weeks "the QSC6055 price was reduced to $10." CX1770-004. Similarly, Will Wyatt (QTI Vice President, Finance) conceded at trial that a 2015 Qualcomm pricing proposal, CX7591-011, shows that Qualcomm reduced its modem chip prices by more than $2 following MediaTek's introduction of a competitive modem chip. Tr. at 433:2-5. Thus, Qualcomm's monopoly chip power has enabled Qualcomm to charge monopoly chip prices.

With those two revenue streams, and with rivals' revenues suppressed, Qualcomm can "take risk and invest in [367] new areas before our competition, so we often have a green field to create new intellectual property," as Paul Jacobs (Qualcomm CEO) stated in a July 2012 letter to the Qualcomm Board of Directors. CX6974-017.

Similarly, suppressing rivals' sales also prevents rivals from developing new technology by acquisition, an alternative to research and development. For example, according to Intel's internal projections, spending [TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT] million to acquire VIA (and its CDMA technology) was only profitable for Intel once Intel secured business from Apple. CX1598-009. Similarly, Aicha Evans (Intel Chief Strategy Officer) testified that without proof of Intel's capability in the market, "there wouldn't have been a discussion" at Intel about acquiring VIA. Tr. at 581:17-20.

Accordingly, Qualcomm's suppression of rivals' sales deprives rivals of revenue to invest in research and development and acquisitions to develop new technology, which prevents the emergence of new rivals, hampers rivals already in the market, and hinders the development of new technologies available to consumers. See Microsoft, 253 F.3d at 79 (holding the court [*801] may infer that conduct caused anticompetitive harm "when exclusionary [368] conduct is aimed at producers of nascent competitive [products] as well as when it is aimed at producers of established substitutes").

3. Qualcomm's Licensing Practices Foreclose Rivals from New and Repeat Business, Engineering Engagement, and Field Testing with OEMs

By restricting rivals' sales, Qualcomm's licensing practices also prevent rivals from developing new and maintaining ongoing business relationships with OEMs.

Sales to one OEM can lead to sales to other OEMs, who, impressed that the modem chip supplier can execute, may then reach out to the supplier. For example, Aicha Evans (Intel Chief Strategy Officer) testified that several OEMs reached out to Intel after Intel won Apple's business: "Lenovo is an example, LG is an example, Motorola is an example, Tesla is an example." Tr. at 576:20-577:4.

In addition, winning business from an OEM in one year can lead to repeat business with that OEM. Will Wyatt (QTI Vice President, Finance) testified that winning an OEM's business strengthens a modem chip supplier's ability to supply modem chips to that OEM in future years:

> Q: In general, winning one design with an OEM can improve that chip supplier's chances of winning business with the [369] OEM in the future; correct?
> A: It depends if they do a good job.
> Q: But in general, that's a true statement; correct?
> A: If they perform, yes.

Tr. at 443:11-16.

Winning business with an OEM generates deep engagement with that OEM's engineering teams. That engagement both sharpens a modem chip supplier's products and leads to opportunities to customize modem chips for that OEM, as Christopher Johnson (Bain & Co. Partner), who consulted for Intel, testified: "[B]y working with a customer and having access to their products and their engineering teams, you can customize your products and basically improve your pace of innovation in the features you're bringing out." Tr. at 1854:16-23. Specifically, a July 2012 Qualcomm presentation to the Qualcomm Board of Directors states that Apple's engineering team challenges modem chip suppliers to produce "best-in-class" products. CX6974-029.

Sales relationships with OEMs also provide modem chip suppliers with opportunities to field test modem chips in real-world conditions. Finbarr Moynihan (MediaTek General Manager of Customer Sales and Business Development) testified field testing sharpens a supplier's product and helps a supplier spot technical issues: [370] "[I]f you're launching a new modem generation into the market, it takes certainly some time to get it into production, launch it with multiple OEMs into multiple operator networks and operators, network operators, and iron out any of the issues, the bugs that it might find in the field." Tr. at 365:20-25. During generational transitions especially, Moynihan testified, OEMs can "help us as a supplier and navigate some of those transitions without falling down." Id. at 339:19-340:4.

Qualcomm's licensing practices suppress rivals' sales and thus foreclose rivals from new or repeat OEM business, engineering engagement with OEMs, and field testing with OEMs. Missing out on those opportunities further weakens rivals, reduces rivals' ability to produce competitive modem chips, and bolsters Qualcomm's monopoly chip power.

4. Qualcomm's Licensing Practices Harm Rivals' Standing with Other Industry Participants Like SSOs, Network Vendors, and Operators

As discussed above, Qualcomm used its monopoly chip power to eliminate a competing [*802] standard, WiMax. However, Qualcomm's licensing practices also harm rivals' standing with SSOs, network vendors, and operators (also referred to as carriers, like Verizon), [371] which further suppresses rivals' sales and further entrenches Qualcomm's monopoly power.

Sales to OEMs are correlated with a supplier's standing in SSOs. For example, Qualcomm's own documents recognize that without QCT's monopoly chip power, QTL would be isolated in SSOs. In April 2015, Steve Mollenkopf (Qualcomm CEO) and David Wise (Qualcomm Senior Vice President and Treasurer) exchanged views over email on how the coming 5G transition may affect QTL and QCT. CX5913-001. Steve Mollenkopf wrote to David Wise and the "exc@qualcomm.com" distribution list: "One of the arguments for not splitting is that we need to be positioned for 5G." CX5913-001. David Wise replied that without QCT's monopoly power, QTL may become isolated and ineffective at embedding its technology into standards:

> The main point on 5G is that we are in a stronger position to extend QTL licensing model together than separate. Less about level of spend. Much more about our strength in the standards process and regulatory. If separate, QTL may be isolated and ineffective at getting tech into the std. No QCT distribution.

CX5913-001. With QCT's monopoly power, though, QTL retains a strong presence in the standards.

In turn, [372] QTL's influence in SSOs bolsters QCT's chip monopoly power because QTL can embed Qualcomm's technology into cellular standards and enable QCT to win the race to market. For example, a BCG presentation prepared during Project Phoenix states that QCT's share of modem chip sales is "~30% higher in first years of technology standard." CX3755-014. Speaker's notes for the slide explain that Qualcomm's influence in standards enables QCT to get a head start on product development: "Standards are set in ways favorable to [QCT] due to research capabilities and strong influence on SSOs . . . Influence enables head start in product development even before standard is fully set." Id.

Similarly, Aicha Evans (Intel Chief Strategy Officer) testified that working with Apple in particular enhances a modem chip supplier's position in the standards: "You also get what I call the halo effect of better presence in the standards, not just presence, but better weight in terms of your contributions, in terms of starting to get leadership positions." Tr. at 569:9-13. Evans testified that winning Apple's business "really got us to the table in terms of standards . . . meaning 3GPP and IEEE [two SSOs]." Id. at [373] 574:20-22.

However, by limiting rivals' sales to OEMs like Apple, Qualcomm prevented its rivals from obtaining more influence in standards, and thus ensured that Qualcomm could maintain a time-to-market advantage.

Sales also attract interest from operators and network vendors, who engage successful modem chip suppliers for field testing and early prototyping. Those opportunities help accelerate a modem chip supplier's development of new products.

For example, after Intel won Apple's business, Stefan Wolff (Intel Engineer) wrote in a contemporaneous email that operators and network vendors reached out to Intel for field testing of Intel's latest LTE modem chips because of Intel's increased sales volumes: "We will attract operators and network vendors to do early prototyping / field testing with our latest LTE platforms given Apples [sic] huge volumes in the field." CX1599-001. As a result, Wolff wrote, Intel could bring its [*803] modem chips to market more quickly: "This will speed up the development, hardening, and TTM [time-to-market] of our modem technology." Id. Likewise, Aicha Evans (Intel Chief Strategy Officer) testified that operators are not interested in working with a modem chip supplier [374] with low sales: "[F]or the operators, too, to give you that credibility, they're not going to give you that credibility because you have one phone in the corner of the third shelf that nobody buys." Tr. at 576:17-19.

By harming rivals' standing with industry participants, Qualcomm suppresses rivals' ability to generate additional business, develop new products, and win the race to market. Instead, Qualcomm wins these opportunities, which further entrenches Qualcomm's monopoly chip power.

5. Qualcomm's Rivals Have Exited the Market, and Those That Remain are Hobbled

In sum, with practices that result in exclusivity and eliminate opportunities to compete for OEM business, Qualcomm undermines rivals in every facet. Qualcomm attempts to eliminate competition in certain markets; eliminates competing standards; deprives rivals of revenues to invest in research and development and acquisitions; forecloses rivals from establishing technical and business relationships with OEMs; prevents rivals from field testing with OEMs, network vendors, and operators; and ensures that Qualcomm retains influence in SSOs, so that Qualcomm can maintain its time-to-market advantage and its unlawful monopoly. By [375] so hobbling rivals, Qualcomm's practices "unfairly tend[] to destroy competition itself." Spectrum Sports, 506 U.S. at 458.

Foreclosed from sales to OEMs and the resulting benefits, rivals are unable to produce competitive modem chips, which further suppresses rivals' sales. Because Qualcomm's practices all reduce rivals' ability to become and remain viable competitors, the Court concludes that the practices "reasonably appear[] capable" of maintaining Qualcomm's monopoly power. See Microsoft, 253 F.3d at 59; see also id. at 79 ("We may infer causation when exclusionary conduct is aimed at producers of nascent competitive technologies as well as when it is aimed at producers of established substitutes.").

The modem chip market reflects the cumulative anticompetitive harm of Qualcomm's practices. Many of Qualcomm's rivals have exited, and those rivals that remain are hobbled by Qualcomm's anticompetitive harms.

On this causation question, Qualcomm overstates the FTC's burden. For example, Qualcomm presents evidence that Apple viewed both Broadcom and ST Ericsson—rivals that have exited the market—as technically not capable to supply modem chips for a 2013 Apple handset. QX1353-223; Tr. at 1510:18-24.

In addition, Qualcomm cites a Bain & Company presentation [376] that concluded that although Intel invested only 32% less than Qualcomm in research and development into SoC modem chips in 2015, Qualcomm was more efficient and produced two or three times the product output as Intel. QX0123A-002. However, Intel had to build its modem chip research and development infrastructure from scratch, whereas Qualcomm had two decades head start on Intel. For example, Aicha Evans (Intel Chief Strategy Officer) testified that Intel had to invest "lots of money, billions of dollars, and an army of engineers" to generate a premium LTE modem chip business from scratch. Tr. at 565:3-6. Moreover, Qualcomm ignores how Qualcomm's set of anticompetitive licensing practices undermine [*804] its rivals' ability to execute and compete in the market.

Furthermore, Qualcomm's licensing practices blocked Project Dragonfly, a potentially powerful rival, from ever entering the market. Project Dragonfly was a joint venture to sell modem chips comprised of Samsung, one of the largest global OEMs selling cellular handsets; NTT DoCoMo, the largest carrier in Japan; and several Japanese OEMs. CX2628-001. Qualcomm's own document recognizes that Samsung is one of the top five contributors [377] to SSOs. CX6138-032. Thus, Project Dragonfly had access to engineering expertise, the combined capital to fund research and development and acquisitions, the benefit of Samsung's standing in SSOs, and Samsung's existing relationships with operators and network vendors, all of which would have primed Project Dragonfly for success.

According to Andrew Hong (Samsung Legal Counsel), Qualcomm knew that Project Dragonfly could enter the market in a year because of its joint resources. Hong Depo. 215:15-216:14. However, aware of that threat, Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) rejected Project Dragonfly's request for a license and Samsung's request for a license, which would have covered Project Dragonfly and its customers. Andrew Hong (Samsung Legal Counsel) testified that Reifschneider explicitly rejected Samsung's request for a license to avoid enabling Project Dragonfly to come to market: "He said to us pretty much, 'I know if you try to develop this on your own, it will take several years. And I'm not going to let you enter the market in a, in a year." Hong Depo. at 216:21-24. After Qualcomm rejected Project Dragonfly's and Samsung's requests for licenses, [378] Project Dragonfly did not proceed. Id. at 173:3-10. Thus, Qualcomm's licensing practices also bar potentially strong rivals from ever entering the market, which stifles competition and harms consumers.

Moreover, even if Qualcomm's rivals have contributed to their own failings, the Court need not conclude that Qualcomm's conduct is the sole reason for its rivals' exits or impaired status to conclude that Qualcomm's practices harmed competition and consumers. Where a government agency seeks injunctive relief, the Court need only conclude that Qualcomm's conduct made a "significant contribution" to Qualcomm's maintenance of monopoly power. Microsoft, 253 F.3d at 79 (citation omitted). The plaintiff is not required to "present direct proof that a defendant's continued monopoly power is precisely attributable to its anticompetitive conduct." Id.

Qualcomm ignores that standard and argues that the FTC must present evidence that "tends to exclude the possibility" that Qualcomm's rivals exited the industry or are hobbled for reasons independent of Qualcomm's conduct. QC FOFCOL at 127. However, in Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 764, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775 (1984), the United States Supreme Court held in the context of a conspiracy to restrain trade that the evidence must "tend[] to exclude the possibility" [379] that the alleged conspirators were acting independently. The instant case does not allege a conspiracy. Qualcomm's authorities say little about the causation standard for the FTC's Sherman Act claims.

Rather, the United States Supreme Court has held that indirect evidence of anticompetitive conduct includes "proof of market power plus some evidence that the challenged restraint harms competition." Am. Express, 138 S. Ct. at 2284. Where the government is a plaintiff, the Court may "infer 'causation' from the fact that a defendant has engaged in anticompetitive [*805] conduct that 'reasonably appear[s] capable of making a significant contribution to . . . maintaining monopoly power." Microsoft, 253 F.3d at 79 (citation omitted). The FTC is not required "to reconstruct the hypothetical marketplace absent a defendant's conduct." Id. Thus, the Court need not conclude that Qualcomm's anticompetitive licensing practices are the sole reason for any particular rival's exit or any particular rival's reduced performance to conclude that Qualcomm's anticompetitive practices harmed competition in the CDMA and premium LTE modem chip markets.

Rather than address that causation question, Qualcomm's experts all simply ignored the effects of Qualcomm's own anticompetitive [380] conduct. It makes little sense to evaluate whether conduct "reasonably appears capable" of causing anticompetitive harm, see Microsoft, 253 F.3d at 79, by ignoring evidence of that conduct altogether. Without considering Qualcomm's anticompetitive conduct, one cannot answer whether that conduct has sustained Qualcomm's monopoly power. Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 571. But that is how Qualcomm's experts proceeded.

For example, Dr. Edward Snyder, a Qualcomm economic expert, never even considered how Qualcomm's anticompetitive practices affect Qualcomm's rivals. Dr. Snyder testified that only had he found evidence to contradict his own theory that "independent" factors harmed Qualcomm's rivals "would [he] have gone to the next step to evaluate . . . the FTC's claims about Qualcomm's conduct." Tr. at 1788:6-8. Dr. Snyder ignored Qualcomm's conduct even though Dr. Snyder conceded that his "independent" factors are not mutually exclusive with Qualcomm's conduct, and that "anticompetitive conduct by a dominant firm can affect its rivals' investment decisions." Id. at 1808:24-1809:1. Because Dr. Snyder did not even evaluate Qualcomm's conduct, the Court finds that Dr. Snyder's opinions are not reliable.

Similarly, Dr. Aviv Nevo also ignored Qualcomm's [381] anticompetitive practices. Dr. Nevo opined that the modem chip industry is "thriving," but made no claim about how Qualcomm's practices might have affected the industry:

> Q: Well, can you rule out the possibility that things would have been better were it not for conduct that's been alleged?
> A: No, I can't rule that out, and that's not what I'm claiming here.

Id. at 1905:5-8. Thus, the Court finds that Dr. Nevo's opinions are not reliable.

Finally, Dr. Tasneem Chipty also acknowledged that her analysis ignored Qualcomm's anticompetitive practices. For example, Dr. Chipty conceded that she conducted no analysis of how Qualcomm's refusal to license rivals, refusal to sell modem chips exhaustively, requirement that an OEM sign a license before purchasing modem chips, and threats to cut off chip supply and other support affected modem chip markets. Tr. at 1738:3-1739:3. Therefore, because Dr. Chipty failed to consider whether Qualcomm's actual anticompetitive practices harmed rivals, the Court finds that Dr. Chipty's opinions are not reliable.

Here, the modem chip market reflects the expected outcomes of Qualcomm's anticompetitive practices, which "impair the opportunities of rivals" and "do[] [382] not further competition on the merits." PeaceHealth, 515 F.3d at 894.

Many of Qualcomm's rivals have exited the market. Scott McGregor (former Broadcom CEO) testified that remaining in the modem chip market was not "economically viable" for Broadcom because Broadcom did not generate the scale "sufficient to cover the R&D and other costs [*806] required to create those chips." McGregor Depo. 12:14-17. According to a 2014 Qualcomm presentation shared with Will Wyatt (QTI Vice President, Finance), the former modem chip supplier Freescale exited the market in 2008 due to "customer concentration and the need for significant investment in scale to supply customers." CX8292-006. According to the same 2014 Qualcomm presentation, ST-Ericsson left the market in 2013 due to reduced purchase volumes from two OEM customers, and Texas Instruments also left the market in 2012 due to a reduced customer base. Id.

Qualcomm's rivals that remain in the market are hobbled by Qualcomm's practices. For example, Qualcomm's rival MediaTek had to discontinue its [TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT]. CX3551-004. Finbarr Moynihan (MediaTek General Manager of Customer Sales and Business Development) testified at trial that MediaTek has not "penetrated ever [383] what I would call the premier tiers in the market." Tr. at 324:25-325:2. According to Moynihan, MediaTek has not "been able to invest enough I think in the modem technology and deploy it fast enough to market." Id. at 365:10-13. Although MediaTek licensed VIA's CDMA technology in 2013, MediaTek only sold its first CDMA modem chip in 2015. Id. at 328:13-16. According to a 2017 presentation to Qualcomm's Board of Directors, which Steve Mollenkopf (Qualcomm CEO) received, MediaTek has no premium LTE modem chip offering. CX8191-089.

In addition, even though Intel is supplying modem chips to Apple, Aicha Evans (Intel Chief Strategy Officer) testified that Intel has never met its target margins and that Intel's sales of modem chips to Apple have not yet been profitable. Tr. at 587:12-22. When asked about the probable effect of losing Apple's business in any given year, Evans testified that losing Apple's business "would not be near death, that would be death." Id. at 589:18-19. Specifically, Evans testified: "Once you're in the cycle and you've shipped millions of units, it's — I call it it's Christmas, there's Christmas every year and you can't miss it essentially." Id. at 589:11-14.

Furthermore, [384] Samsung's and Huawei's modem chip supply divisions do not compete with Qualcomm for third-party OEM business. At trial, Alex Rogers (QTL President) testified that Exynos is not an external competitor: "Samsung has a cellular baseband business that they make primarily for their own use." Tr. at 1989:5-6. Finbarr Moynihan (MediaTek General Manager of Corporate Sales and Business Development) agreed: "We don't tend to see Samsung LSI as a supplier much outside of Samsung's own phones." Tr. at 327:10-15. The same is true of HiSilicon, Huawei's modem chip division, according to Finbarr Moynihan (MediaTek General Manager of Corporate Sales and Business Development): "I think even more so we only see HiSilicon in Huawei phones." Id. at 327:20-21.

Given the fragile state of Qualcomm's rivals, the exits of several other rivals, and Qualcomm's continued dominance, the Court concludes that there is plentiful "evidence that the challenged restraint harms competition." See Am. Express, 138 S. Ct. at 2284.

The Court has already rejected all of Qualcomm's litigation justifications for its conduct as pretextual. See Section V.C. (refusal to license rivals); Section V.E. (Apple exclusive agreements); Section V.F. (refusal to sell [385] modem chips without a license agreement); Section V.I. (chip incentive funds). Even if Qualcomm had shown non-pretextual procompetitive justifications for its conduct, the foregoing anticompetitive harm is so severe that the "anticompetitive harm outweighs [any] [*807] procompetitive benefit" of Qualcomm's conduct. Microsoft, 253 F.3d at 59.

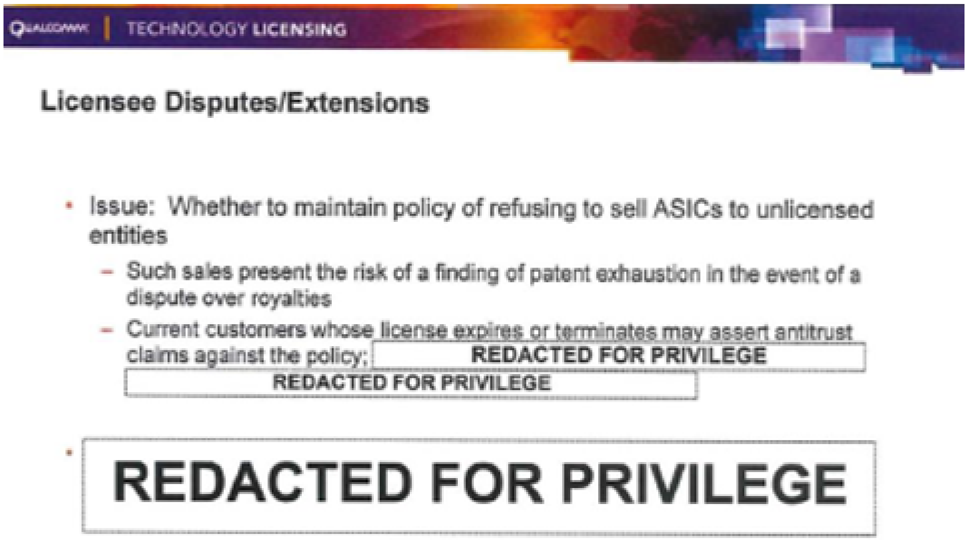
Finally, the Court turns to evidence of Qualcomm's intent to harm competition, as found in Qualcomm's own documents.

L. Qualcomm's Intent to Harm Competition Confirms That Qualcomm's Practices Cause Anticompetitive Harm

Qualcomm's own documents show that Qualcomm knew its licensing practices could lead to antitrust liability, knew its licensing practices violate FRAND, and knew its licensing practices harm competition, yet continued anyway—even in the face of government investigations in Japan, Korea, Taiwan, China, the European Union, and the United States. This evidence of Qualcomm's intent confirms the Court's conclusion that Qualcomm's practices cause anticompetitive harm because "no monopolist monopolizes unconscious of what he is doing." Aspen Skiing, 472 U.S. at 602; see also Chicago Bd. of Trade, 246 U.S. at 238 ("[K]knowledge of intent may help the court to interpret facts and to predict consequences.").

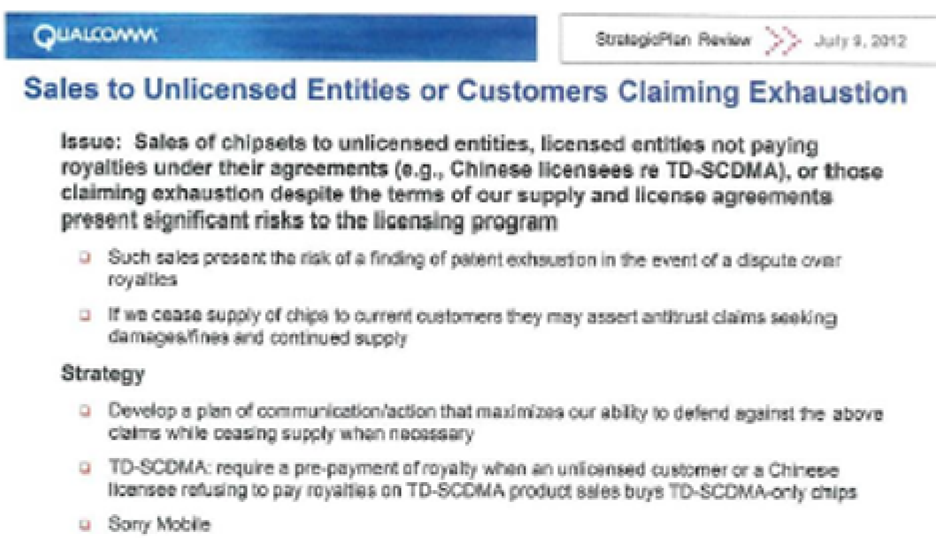
First, Qualcomm admitted in contemporaneous [386] documents that its practices of avoiding patent exhaustion, requiring OEMs to sign a separate license before purchasing modem chips, and threatening to cut off OEMs' chip supply may cause antitrust liability.

For example, in a May 2012 slide deck prepared by Fabian Gonell (now QTL Legal Counsel and Senior Vice President, Licensing Strategy) and reproduced below, Qualcomm admitted that its licensing practices could lead to antitrust claims.



Gonell's slide was shared with Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager), Derek Aberle (QTL President), Marv Blecker (QTL Senior Vice President), and Lou Lupin (Qualcomm Legal Consultant). Gonell stated that selling modem chips to an unlicensed OEM could "present the risk of a finding of patent exhaustion in the event of a dispute over royalties." CX6548-002. As a result, Qualcomm "refus[es] to sell ASICs to unlicensed entities." Id. However, Gonell expressed the concern that "[c]urrent customers whose license expires may assert antitrust claims against the policy." Id.

Qualcomm's internal contemporaneous documents repeatedly acknowledge that its licensing practices expose Qualcomm to antitrust claims. The following slide is [387] contained in: (1) a July 2, 2012 QTL strategic [*808] plan presentation that Derek Aberle (QTL President) created and sent to Dr. Paul Jacobs (Qualcomm CEO), Steve Mollenkopf (Qualcomm President), and Steve Altman (Qualcomm Vice Chairman), CX6998-001; and (2) a July 9, 2012 presentation to the Qualcomm Board of Directors, which Dr. Irwin Jacobs (Qualcomm Co-Founder) also received. CX6974-001. Yet despite a concern about antitrust claims, Qualcomm planned to continue the anticompetitive practices and to develop a plan of communication against antitrust claims.



The slide states that Qualcomm's licensing practices may expose Qualcomm to antitrust liability: "If we cease supply of chips to current customers they may assert antitrust claims seeking damages/fines and continued supply." CX6974-070. In response, Qualcomm planned to continue its anticompetitive practices: "Develop a plan of communication/action that maximizes our ability to defend against the above claims while ceasing supply when necessary." Id. Thus, Qualcomm repeatedly acknowledged that its licensing practices raise antitrust claims, yet continued the licensing practices anyway.

In fact, Qualcomm's threats to OEMs' chip supply are [388] an ongoing company practice that began with Qualcomm's co-founder, Dr. Irwin Jacobs. For example, in June 2004, Irwin Jacobs (then Qualcomm CEO) threatened LGE that unless LGE withdrew arbitration claims and paid past due royalties, Qualcomm would "stop accepting LGE purchase orders for WCDMA ASICs," "cease all shipments of WCDMA ASICs to LGE," "withdraw all of its substantial WCDMA engineering resources currently providing technical support to LGE," and require LGE to return software to Qualcomm. CX6814-022. At trial, Irwin Jacobs testified that Qualcomm in fact did cut off LGE's chip supply: "We did not ship to them the chips that were specified here, the 500 and then 6,000 chips as far as I know at this time." Tr. at 1293:25-1294:2.

Similarly, after Qualcomm presented the above July 2012 slide to the Board of Directors, Qualcomm continued to threaten OEMs' chip supply. For example, only three months after the July 2012 Board of Directors meeting, Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) threatened to cut off Sony's chip supply. In an October 27, 2012 email, Eric Reifschneider told Jonathan Pearl (Sony General Counsel) that "I must report to [*809] QCT that SMC [389] [Sony Mobile Corp.] appears unwilling to enter into a license agreement with Qualcomm," CX5185-005, to which Reifschneider referred as "the next step in the escalation process." Reifschneider Depo. 207:6-16.

In 2013, Reifschneider threatened Huawei's chip supply. In a May 1, 2013 email, Reifschneider informed Xuxin Cheng (Huawei) that "if the C2K SULA expires and has not been replaced by a new patent license agreement covering C2K products, there will be issues with Huawei's ability to continue to use C2K chipsets or QMCi's software, issues which I am sure both our companies would like to avoid." CX1000-004.

In 2013, according to contemporaneous Lenovo documents, Qualcomm threatened to cut off chip supply to Lenovo and to force MediaTek to cut off chip supply to Lenovo: "Qualcomm has threatened to stop selling its chips to Lenovo if Lenovo terminates its license. Further, Qualcomm has threatened to force its chip licensees (including MediaTek) to stop selling mobile phone chips to Lenovo if Lenovo terminates its license." CX2079-004.

In 2015, Cristiano Amon's (QCT President) own handwritten notes from 2015 license negotiations with Motorola's President Rick Osterloh, entitled "12-9-15-Rick [390] & Team-Motorola," state: "(1) Licensing > Eric [Reifschneider, QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager] constantly threatening to cut off chip supply." CX7024-001.

These chip supply threats are critical for maintaining Qualcomm's unreasonably high royalty rate. If Qualcomm sells a modem chip to an unlicensed OEM, that OEM can claim that Qualcomm's sale of the modem chip exhausted Qualcomm's patent rights, according to a 2012 QTL slide presented to the Qualcomm Board of Dirctors: "Such sales present the risk of a finding of patent exhaustion." CX6974-070. If a modem chip sale exhausts Qualcomm's patent rights, Qualcomm cannot then collect its unreasonably high royalty rate from the OEM, as Eric Reifschneider (former QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) testified: "[T]he concern for the risk to the licensing business of selling — selling chips to unlicensed customers, the — the risk of a customer making an argument of patent exhaustion and sort of undercutting the ability to license the patent portfolio." Reifschneider Depo. 30:15-20.

Yet Qualcomm has recognized that Qualcomm's licensing practices and its unreasonably high royalty rates—the royalty rates that its practices [391] are designed to sustain—violate FRAND. Marv Blecker (QTL Senior Vice President) told the IRS in 2012 that Qualcomm could not obtain the same royalty revenue through patent licenses to rival modem chip suppliers because doing so would violate FRAND. Specifically, Blecker told the IRS:

> Yeah, but if I would average royalty on all the handsets that we collect royalties on — I don't remember what it is anymore, I used to know the number — but if — if it were ten dollars, for example, you couldn't charge a ten-dollar royalty on a chipset that cost five dollars, or six dollars, or seven dollars.

CX786-R at 73:10-15. Blecker (then QTL Senior Vice President) continued: "Yeah, and it would be hard to convince a court that that was a fair royalty also." Id. at 73:20-21.

Similarly, Eric Reifschneider (QTL Senior Vice President and General Manager) told the IRS that Qualcomm's refusal to license rivals violates FRAND. CX6786-R at 33:1-7. Specifically, Reifschneider explained to the IRS that when Qualcomm participates in SSOs, "as part of that you [*810] often have to make commitments that you will, you know, make that technology available to people who want to make products that practice the standard." Id. Reifschneider [392] explained that refusing to license a rival modem chip supplier is "not a great, you know, position to be in in terms of defending yourself against, you know, claims that you've broken those promises to make the technology available." Id. at 33:11-17. Thus, Qualcomm recognizes that its licensing practices and royalty rates violate FRAND.

Moreover, Qualcomm has admitted that its monopoly chip share sustains Qualcomm's ability to receive that unreasonably high royalty rate. During Project Phoenix, David Wise (Qualcomm Senior Vice President and Treasurer) explained in an email that because there is a high correlation between Qualcomm's chip market share and the sustainability of Qualcomm's royalty rate, it is critical for Qualcomm to maintain a high modem chip share to sustain its licensing revenues:

> Notably, we are seeing in the market today that there is a high correlation between our modem (chip) share and licensing compliance and royalty rate sustainability. Where we have low chip share we are seeing challenges with compliance and maintaining the royalty rate. So in a sense, QCT has provided the 'give/get' relationship highlighted in the last point. If it's [sic] share falls, however, [393] we lose that important element to sustaining our royalties. SO IT'S CRITICAL THAT WE MAINTAIN HIGH MODEM SHARE TO SUSTAIN LICENSING.

Id. (emphasis in original). In short, Wise admitted that without QCT's chip market share, QTL was "seeing challenges with compliance and maintaining the royalty rate."

Because Qualcomm acknowledges that chip market share and not the value of its patents determines Qualcomm's royalty rate, Qualcomm refuses to give OEMs information about Qualcomm's patents, including even patent lists, when negotiating patent licenses with OEMs.

Nanfen Yu (Huawei Senior Legal Counsel) testified that Qualcomm has never provided patent claim charts to Huawei, but that Nokia, Ericsson, and Siemens all have. Yu Depo. 216:4-217:2. Specifically, as to Qualcomm, Yu testified:

> Q: [I]n all of your negotiations with Qualcomm throughout the course of your career, has Qualcomm ever provided claim charts for its patents?
> A: No.

Id. at 216:4-8.

Brian Chong (Wistron Chief of New Technology Development and Product Planning) testified that Qualcomm would not even provide Wistron a list of any Qualcomm patents: "I know for a fact that we asked for a list of patents and never got that." Chong Depo. [394] 312:6-8, 23-24.

Qualcomm not only knows that its royalty rates violate FRAND and are sustained by Qualcomm's modem chip share, but Qualcomm has also intended to harm competition via its practices.

For example, Qualcomm wielded chip supply leverage and the specter of its unreasonably high royalty rates to eliminate WiMax, a competing cellular standard supported by Intel. In the 2007 Marketing Incentive Agreement ("MIA"), Qualcomm offered Apple royalty rate rebates conditioned on (1) Apple publicly announcing that Apple had "chosen GSM technology for its phone . . . into the future with 3G and beyond"; (2) Apple not selling more than 1,000 WiMax handsets; and (3) Apple not licensing a third party to sell WiMax handsets. JX0040-003. During MIA negotiations, [*811] Marv Blecker (QTL President) emailed Jeff Williams (Apple COO) to state that Qualcomm's first priority was eliminating WiMax: "Motivating Apple to select WCDMA to the exclusion of WiMax is our primary motivation for entering into this agreement." CX0617-001.

Irwin Jacobs (Qualcomm Co-Founder and former Qualcomm CEO) testified at trial that Qualcomm would have been behind in supplying WiMax chips had WiMax become the standard:

> Q: It's accurate [395] to state, sir, that if WiMax had ended up as the standard, Qualcomm would have been far behind; is that right?
> A: That's fine.

Tr. at 1284:10-13.

As a result of the MIA, WiMax was eliminated. Jeff Williams (Apple COO) testified that the Qualcomm agreement ended Apple's engagement with Intel's WiMax standard:

> Q: And following the execution of that agreement, did Apple pursue WiMax further?
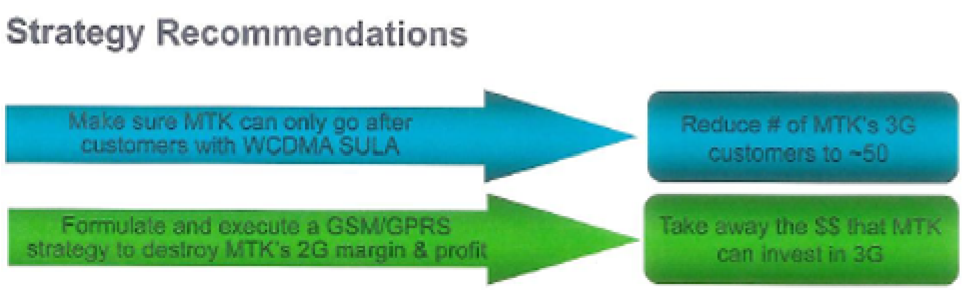
> A: No. In essence, it was killed in the cradle for us. We did not.

Tr. at 873:21-23.

Similarly, Qualcomm entered an exclusive deal with Apple because doing so would eliminate competition. In an August 2010 email, Steve Mollenkopf (QCT President) told Paul Jacobs (Qualcomm CEO), Derek Aberle (QTL President), and Steve Altman (Qualcomm President) that if Qualcomm secured Apple exclusivity in the TA, Qualcomm would eliminate thin modem competitors: "[T]here are significant strategic benefits as it is unlikely that there will be enough standalone modem volume to sustain a viable competitor without that slot." CX5348-001.

In addition, Qualcomm refused to license its rivals and restricted rivals' customer base with the intent to prevent rivals from investing in research and development, and to weaken them in the [396] market. For example, in a 2009 pricing presentation that Qualcomm prepared within days of its CDMA ASIC Agreement with MediaTek—which limited MediaTek's sales to Qualcomm licensees only—Qualcomm stated that by reducing MediaTek's customer base, Qualcomm could "[t]ake away the $$ that MTK can invest in 3G." CX5809-041. The slide is reproduced below:



Lastly, lawyers—including Derek Aberle, Steve Altman, Eric Reifschneider, Fabian Gonell, and Lou Lupin—were the architect, implementers, and enforcers of Qualcomm's licensing practices. Lawyers explicitly stated that Qualcomm's licensing practices raised concerns about antitrust liability, but chose to continue those practices anyway, with full knowledge that Qualcomm's unreasonably high royalty rates violate FRAND and that Qualcomm's licensing practices harm rivals. That willful, conscious decision to continue [*812] Qualcomm's licensing practices is further evidence of intent to harm competition. Although intent is not dispositive, evidence of Qualcomm's intent confirms the Court's conclusion that Qualcomm's licensing practices cause antitrust harm because "no monopolist monopolizes unconscious of what he is doing." Aspen Skiing, 472 U.S. at 602.

In combination, Qualcomm's [397] licensing practices have strangled competition in the CDMA and premium LTE modem chip markets for years, and harmed rivals, OEMs, and end consumers in the process. Qualcomm's conduct "unfairly tends to destroy competition itself." Spectrum Sports, 506 U.S. at 458. Thus, the Court concludes that Qualcomm's licensing practices are an unreasonable restraint of trade under § 1 of the Sherman Act and exclusionary conduct under § 2 of the Sherman Act. Microsoft, 253 F.3d at 58-59 (holding that where conduct causes anticompetitive harm not justified by procompetitive business reasons, the monopolist violates both § 1 and § 2). Therefore, Qualcomm's practices violate § 1 and § 2 of the Sherman Act, and that Qualcomm is liable under the FTC Act, as "unfair methods of competition" under the FTC Act include "violations of the Sherman Act." Cement Inst., 333 U.S. at 693-94.

VI. INJUNCTIVE RELIEF

The FTC Act authorizes the FTC to seek, and the Court to order, a permanent injunction "after proper proof" of an FTC Act violation. 15 U.S.C. § 53(b). The FTC has shown that Qualcomm is liable under the FTC Act for violating the Sherman Act. Therefore, the Court must consider whether to permanently enjoin Qualcomm and, if so, in what fashion.

A. Legal Standard

Injunctive relief should be granted if "there exists some cognizable danger [398] of recurrent violation." United States v. W.T. Grant Co., 345 U.S. 629, 633, 73 S. Ct. 894, 97 L. Ed. 1303 (1953). In a case governed by the FTC Act, "an injunction will issue only if the wrongs are ongoing or likely to recur." Fed. Trade Comm'n v. Evans Prods. Co., 775 F.2d 1084, 1087 (9th Cir. 1985). The Court has already rejected Qualcomm's pre-trial argument that a court must consider "post-discovery evidence of current market power" before issuing an injunction. ECF No. 997.

Injunctive relief may be appropriate under this standard even when the unlawful conduct has ceased. Evans Prods., 775 F.2d at 1088 ("Even though Evans' alleged violations have completely ceased, we must review whether those violations are likely to recur."); see also Fed. Trade Comm'n v. Accusearch Inc., 570 F.3d 1187, 1201-02 (10th Cir. 2009) (concluding that the district court properly issued an injunction under the FTC Act despite cessation of the unlawful conduct because of the possibility of recurrence); Fed. Trade Comm'n v. Affordable Media, LLC, 179 F.3d 1228, 1237 (9th Cir. 1999) (same). Past unlawful conduct is "highly suggestive of the likelihood of future violations." *CFTC v. Yu, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 113122, 2012 WL 3283430, at 4 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 10, 2012) (quoting CFTC v. Hunt, 591 F.2d 1211, 1220 (7th Cir. 1979)).

In terms of the scope of any injunction, the United States Supreme Court instructs "that a remedies decree in an antitrust case must seek to 'unfetter a market from anticompetitive conduct,' to 'terminate the illegal monopoly, deny to the defendant the fruits of its statutory violation, and ensure that there remain no practices likely to result in monopolization [399] in the future.'" Microsoft, 253 F.3d at 103 (quoting [*813] Ford Motor Co. v. United States, 405 U.S. 562, 577, 92 S. Ct. 1142, 31 L. Ed. 2d 492 (1972), and United States v. United Shoe Mach. Corp., 391 U.S. 244, 250, 88 S. Ct. 1496, 20 L. Ed. 2d 562 (1968)). "[A]dequate relief in a monopolization case should put an end to the combination and deprive the defendants of any of the benefits of the illegal conduct, and break up or render impotent the monopoly power found to be in violation of the Act." Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 577.

Thus, it is "entirely appropriate" for a court to order an injunction "beyond a simple proscription against the precise conduct previously pursued." Nat'l Soc'y of Prof'l Eng'rs v. United States, 435 U.S. 679, 698, 98 S. Ct. 1355, 55 L. Ed. 2d 637 (1978). The relevant question is "whether the relief represents a reasonable method of eliminating the consequences of the illegal conduct." Id.; accord Fed. Trade Comm'n v. Grant Connect, LLC, 763 F.3d 1094, 1105 (9th Cir. 2014). Where the government has established a violation of law, "all doubts as to the remedy are to be resolved in [the government's] favor." United States v. E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 366 U.S. 316, 334, 81 S. Ct. 1243, 6 L. Ed. 2d 318 (1961). Further, a district court in an antitrust case has "'large discretion' to fit the decree to the special needs of the individual case." Ford Motor Co., 405 U.S. at 573.

Qualcomm also argues that the Court must consider traditional equitable factors, including whether the public interest would be disserved by a permanent injunction. QC FOFCOL at 141. Although Qualcomm cites the FTC Act for the proposition that the Court may issue an FTC Act injunction only after "weighing the equities," that provision refers only to the issuance [400] of a preliminary injunction: "Upon a proper showing that, weighing the equities and considering the Commission's likelihood of ultimate success, such action would be in the public interest, and after notice to the defendant, a temporary restraining order or a preliminary injunction may be granted without bond." 15 U.S.C. § 53(b) (emphasis added). Qualcomm cites no FTC Act case in which a court considered those equitable factors at the permanent injunction stage.

Regardless, by its very nature, the determination that a monopolist has violated the Sherman Act and that "the wrongs are ongoing or likely to recur" is a finding that an injunction is in the public interest because it will restrain the defendant from further anticompetitive conduct. Evans Prods., 775 F.2d at 1087.

Thus, the Court first considers whether "there exists some cognizable danger of recurrent violation," W.T. Grant Co., 345 U.S. at 633, and then whether the FTC's requested relief will "unfetter [the] market from anticompetitive conduct." Ford Motor Co., 405 U.S. at 577.

B. Qualcomm's Practices Are Ongoing

The evidence demonstrates that Qualcomm's anticompetitive conduct is ongoing and that an injunction is thus warranted. See Evans Prods, 775 F.2d at 1087 (holding that an injunction may issue where unlawful conduct is "ongoing").

Qualcomm continues to refuse [401] to provide patent exhaustion, refuse to sell modem chips to an OEM until the OEM signs a license, and engage in chip supply threats and cutoffs. Steve Mollenkopf (Qualcomm CEO) conceded at trial that Qualcomm does not sell chips to unlicensed OEMs:

> Q: And you would agree, sir, that it is Qualcomm's policy not to sell chips to companies that are unlicensed or not complying with their licenses; right?
> [*814] A: We have that policy, yes.

Tr. at 842:25-843:3.

In addition, Qualcomm continues to withhold chip supply as leverage against OEMs. After Apple challenged Qualcomm's royalty rates in 2016, Qualcomm refused to provide Apple with any chips for new devices, and none of Apple's 2018 handset models contain Qualcomm chips, per Jeff Williams (Apple Chief Operating Officer):

> Qualcomm has continued to ship us product on the design wins that they have and had at the time. And so they have continued to sell us chips. We have been unable to get them to support us on new design wins past that time, and this has been a challenge. . . . We — I contacted Qualcomm, I contacted Steve, I sent him e-mails, I called. We tried to get them to sell us chips, and they would not.

Tr. at 890:13-24. Tony Blevins (Apple [402] Vice President of Procurement) similarly testified that Apple's lawsuit spurred Qualcomm to use chip leverage: "At the time we made those challenges, Qualcomm was no longer willing to sell us chips. That was very obvious, very apparent to us. And so we went right back to the no license, no chips, that we were facing back in 2005." Tr. at 711:12-16.

Qualcomm has also continued to use chip incentive funds and other payments to silence OEMs. For example, Qualcomm and Samsung entered a series of agreements in early 2018, including the Amended and Restated Strategic Relationship Agreement and the Settlement Agreement. JX-0122-001. The Amended and Restated Strategic Relationship Agreement continues Qualcomm's practice of incentivizing OEMs to buy Qualcomm modem chips to the exclusion of rivals' chips, as Qualcomm promises to pay Samsung rebates only when Samsung purchases Qualcomm modem chips. JX0122-036 to -037. To receive the rebates, Samsung must purchase from Qualcomm 100% of Samsung's premium modem chips and at least a certain number of mid and higher tier chips. Id.

The Settlement Agreement represents a new Qualcomm tactic in license negotiations. Qualcomm paid Samsung $100 million to [403] extinguish Samsung's antitrust claims and to silence Samsung. JX0122-054. Samsung specifically releases claims based on the following:

> any claim of coercion or other similar claims regarding the negotiation, execution, or terms of this Settlement Agreement, the 2018 Amendment, the CMCPCA, and/or the Collaboration Agreement . . .
> any patent licensing conduct of Qualcomm or any of its Affiliates or (b) any conduct of Qualcomm or any of its Affiliates in the Private and Regulatory Actions . . . [and]
> any claim that Qualcomm's Existing Practices violate any antitrust, competition, or similar laws of any state or territory of the United States (including federal law), Korea, or any other country or any jurisdiction, or any principle of common or civil law to similar effect including any claim based on or arising from findings or conclusions articulated in . . . (4) the ultimate decisions, settlement agreements or other dispositions of any of the cases brought against Qualcomm (or that contain counterclaims against Qualcomm) by the U.S. Federal Trade Commission ("U.S. F.T.C.") (FTC v. Qualcomm Incorporated, Case No. 5:17-CV-00220-LHK (N.D. Cal.)) . . .

JX0122-050 to -052. Samsung also agreed to withdraw from participation in the instant action and [404] others:

> [*815] Samsung will promptly take all actions reasonably required to withdraw all pending or accepted applications for intervention, or any other forms of substantive participation (except for any participation, including discovery or deposition, to the extent required by law), in any of the Private or Regulatory Actions and any other proceedings involving claims that Qualcomm's Existing Practices violate antitrust, competition, or similar laws. . . . [and]
> Samsung will withdraw from all existing Common Interest Agreements and all other similar agreements in which the general purpose is to share information and communications under some form of protection against disclosure (collectively, the "CIAs") between Samsung or any of its Affiliates and any third party that pertains to any of the Private and Regulatory Actions or any other proceedings or collaboration by third parties involving claims or potential claims that Qualcomm's Existing Practices violate antitrust, competition, contract, or similar laws or undertakings.

Further, in the Settlement Agreement, Samsung agreed to make the following statement to the KFTC: "[I]n any statement Samsung provides to the KFTC regarding [405] Qualcomm's compliance with the KFTC 2017 Orders, Samsung agrees that it shall confirm that it has resolved its disputes with Qualcomm and the resolution of such dispute satisfies Samsung's demands made under the KFTC 2017 Orders." JX0122-055.

Qualcomm also continues to refuse to license rival modem chip suppliers. Alex Rogers (QTL President) testified, "So we don't license at the component level." Id. at 1978:7. Licensing at the component level refers to licensing to modem chip suppliers. Id. at 1978:5-6.

Therefore, all of Qualcomm's unlawful practices continue unabated. This is so even though government agencies in Japan, Korea, Taiwan, China, the European Union, and the United States began investigating Qualcomm's licensing practices as early as 2009, as Qualcomm reported in its own 2017 10-K filed with the SEC. CX7257-097. Qualcomm has fought against attempts in those investigations to change its licensing practices. For example, presentation notes from slides that BCG presented in 2015 to the Project Phoenix committee of the Qualcomm Board of Directors explained that Qualcomm evaded more serious penalties—including a ban on its refusal to sell modem chips to unlicensed OEMs or more [406] aggressive royalty rate cuts—by making a $150 million contribution to the Chinese government. CX3755-004.

That Qualcomm's unlawful practices continue is consistent with its own longstanding strategy. In a 2012 QTL strategic plan presentation that Derek Aberle (QTL President) created and sent to Dr. Paul Jacobs (Qualcomm CEO), Steve Mollenkopf (Qualcomm President), and Steve Altman (Qualcomm Vice Chairman), Aberle included a slide titled, "Sales to Unlicensed Entities or Customers Claiming Exhaustion." CX6998-011. Aberle wrote, "If we cease supply of chips to current customers they may assert antitrust claims seeking damages/fines and continued supply." Id. In a section titled "Strategy," Aberle identified the following strategy: "Develop a plan of communication/action that maximizes our ability to defend against the above claims while ceasing supply when necessary." Id. In July 2012, Qualcomm presented to the Qualcomm Board of Directors an identical slide, with the identical strategy: "Develop a plan of communication/action that maximizes our ability to defend [*816] against the above claims while ceasing supply when necessary." CX6974-070.

Therefore, the Court concludes that Qualcomm's unlawful [407] practices are "ongoing" or likely to recur.

Qualcomm argues that although Qualcomm's practices are ongoing, an injunction may only issue if Qualcomm continues to maintain monopoly power in the CDMA and premium LTE modem chip markets. QC FOFCOL at 142. However, Qualcomm identifies no legal requirement that a plaintiff show future market power. The Court has already concluded that "evidence of Qualcomm's past conduct is sufficient to show whether any violations are 'likely to recur.'" ECF No. 997 at 7 (quoting Evans Prods. Co., 775 F.2d at 1087).

Regardless, Qualcomm's internal documents and public statements show that Qualcomm is likely to replicate its market dominance during the transition to 5G, the next generation of modem chips. Here, in both internal documents and public statements, Qualcomm has consistently stated that it is ahead of rival modem chip suppliers in developing 5G modem chips.

For example, in a January 2018 letter to Qualcomm shareholders, Steve Mollenkopf (Qualcomm CEO), stated, "Qualcomm is 12-24 months ahead of our merchant competitors in the transition to 5G — a result of our innovation and technological advancements." CX8198-004. At trial, Mollenkopf agreed that his January 2018 statement was true when made. Tr. [408] at 765:17-19. Similarly, a Qualcomm script for a January 2018 earnings call includes the following talking point: "Another important area is 5G and we estimate that we have a 12 to 24 month lead ahead of our key competitors in the transition to 5G." CX8195-083. The script further highlights carriers and OEMs with whom Qualcomm has "already partnered . . . across the globe as we work to bring 5G to market." Id.

Internally, Qualcomm maintains similar messaging about its leadership position. For example, in a presentation prepared for a December 2017 Qualcomm Board of Directors meeting, Qualcomm included a slide, "Global 5G Momentum," which highlighted Qualcomm's existing 5G design engagements with several OEMs. CX8196-129. In addition, in a QTL slide deck titled "FY17 Strategic Plan Review" and sent to Derek Aberle (Qualcomm President) and Alex Rogers (QTL President), a slide highlights that 12 of Qualcomm's top 20 licensees by revenue have entered license agreements with no fixed expiration date and which may already cover some 5G patents. CX7122-016. In another slide deck shared in December 2017 with the Qualcomm Board of Directors, Qualcomm acknowledged that it may face some competition [409] in 5G, as a "5G Leadership Summary" slide stated that, "Samsung & HiSilicon expected to compete with QCT," but "Intel & MTK lagging on time to market." CX8191-121.

However, since then, Qualcomm has remained optimistic about its 5G positioning because of Qualcomm's previous experience at cellular standards transitions. In January 2018, Qualcomm presented to shareholders a slide deck titled, "A Clear Roadmap for Value Creation." CX8197-001. One slide states that "Technology transitions create significant returns for Qualcomm." CX8197-020. Specifically, "During 3G to 4G transition, Qualcomm revenues more than doubled." Id. In addition, Qualcomm "[c]aptured 80% share of units during first 3 years of technology transition from 3G to 4G." Id. Thus, with 5G imminent, "Qualcomm stockholders [are] poised to achieve substantial returns on 5G investment." Id. At trial, Steve Mollenkopf (Qualcomm CEO) conceded that each of the foregoing statements are true. Tr. at 766:6-18.

[*817] Further, Qualcomm explicitly considered its potential advantages in 5G during its 2015 Project Phoenix analysis of whether to split QTL and QCT. In a series of emails from April 2015 before a Qualcomm executive committee meeting, [410] Steve Mollenkopf (Qualcomm CEO) and David Wise (Qualcomm Senior Vice President and Treasurer) exchanged their views on how the coming 5G transition should play into the decision whether to split QTL and QCT. CX5913-001. Steve Mollenkopf wrote to David Wise and the "exc@qualcomm.com" email distribution list, "One of the arguments for not splitting is that we need to be positioned for 5G." CX5913-001. David Wise, who was then working on the Project Phoenix analysis, replied to all on the email thread and explained a Qualcomm lead in 5G modem chips could continue to prop up Qualcomm's royalty rates:

> The main point on 5G is that we are in a stronger position to extend QTL licensing model together than separate. Less about level of spend. Much more about our strength in the standards process and regulatory. If > separate, QTL may be isolated and ineffective at getting tech into the std. No QCT distribution. Longer term an independent QTL may not be seen as much as an enabler and more pressure could come on its model risking erosion or worse. Made worse by the fact the dollars are small and could be replicated by an independent QCT who would also probably be in favor of curtailing the QTL model, [411] although you could keep the two contractually connected for a few years.

OEMs and rival modem chip suppliers have also recognized that Qualcomm is likely to have a 5G chip lead. In a May 2016 email to a colleague, Todd Madderom (Motorola Director of Procurement) wrote, "Procurement is actively seeking 5G chipset alternatives from MTK and Intel. Neither supplier is responding with the urgency we seek. This is very concerning and suggests a new technology gap is forming which will, once again, put Qualcomm in a position of dominance and monopoly." CX2125-001. Madderom testified consistently at trial, "[W]hat I wrote was that we may be doing a reset in the market where Qualcomm resets and maybe they become several years ahead of the competitor, the competitive alternatives where it took several years for MediaTek or Intel to catch up." Madderom Depo. 234:17-23.

Finbarr Moynihan (MediaTek General Manager of Corporate Sales and Business Development) testified, "I think on the flavor of 5G that will be required for markets like the U.S., I believe there's still a substantial gap," with MediaTek behind Qualcomm. Tr. at 380:1-5. Aicha Evans (Intel Chief Strategy Officer) testified [412] that Intel plans to release a 5G modem chip in late 2019. Tr. at 619:7-16.

Therefore, although rivals anticipate commercializing 5G chips, Qualcomm's own documents and statements show that Qualcomm is already engaged with a significant number of prominent OEMs on 5G designs and that Qualcomm projects the 5G transition may enable Qualcomm to achieve a dominant position in the 5G modem chip market. CX8196-129 (Qualcomm list of its 5G engagements with OEMs); CX8197-020 (Qualcomm projection that 5G transition can provide Qualcomm a dominant share of 5G market). This disposes of Qualcomm's argument that its 5G license agreement with Samsung, for example, is free of anticompetitive conduct because Qualcomm is not yet selling 5G modem chips. QC Pretrial Brief at 17. If Qualcomm has a lead on 5G chips, as Qualcomm states it does, then Samsung had little option but to sign Qualcomm's 5G license agreement to ensure access to Qualcomm's chip supply.

[*818] Moreover, the Ninth Circuit has held that an injunction is appropriate when there is a "possibility of recurrence" of illegal conduct. Affordable Media, 179 F.3d at 1237 (holding that the district court properly entered an injunction under the FTC Act against future conduct despite [413] the defendant's cessation of illegal conduct due to the "possibility of recurrence"). Furthermore, the United States Supreme Court has held that where the government has established a violation of law, all doubts as to the remedy are to be resolved in the government's favor. E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 366 U.S. at 334 (holding that where the government has established a violation of law, "all doubts as to the remedy are to be resolved in [the government's] favor").

Therefore, because Qualcomm's unlawful practices continue and there is a significant risk that Qualcomm will be dominant in 5G, the Court concludes that the unlawful conduct is likely to recur and that a permanent injunction is warranted. See W.T. Grant Co., 345 U.S. at 633 (holding that an injunction is warranted under the FTC Act where "there exists some cognizable danger of recurrent violation").

C. The Injunction

The Court now turns to the appropriate remedies. The FTC's Complaint does not specify the relief it seeks, other than to ask "[t]hat Qualcomm is permanently enjoined from engaging in its lawful conduct" and "[t]hat Qualcomm is permanently enjoined from engaging in similar and related conduct in the future." Compl. at 32. In the parties' joint pretrial statement, the FTC specifies the [414] relief it seeks and requests that the Court:

(1) Prohibit Qualcomm from conditioning the supply of modem chips on a customer's patent-license status;

(2) Require Qualcomm to negotiate or renegotiate, as applicable, license terms with customers in good faith under conditions free from the threat of lack of access to or discriminatory provision of modem chip supply or associated technical, software, or other support;
(3) Require Qualcomm to submit, as necessary, to arbitral or judicial dispute resolution to determine reasonable royalties and other license terms should a customer choose to pursue such resolution;
(4) Require Qualcomm to make exhaustive SEP licenses available to modem-chip suppliers on fair, reasonable, and non-discriminatory terms and to submit, as necessary, to arbitral or judicial dispute resolution to determine such terms;
(5) Prohibit Qualcomm from discriminating or retaliating in any way against any modem-chip customer or modem-chip supplier because of a dispute with Qualcomm over license terms or because of a customer's license status;
(6) Prohibit Qualcomm from making payments or providing other value contingent on a customer's agreement to license terms;

(7) Prohibit [415] Qualcomm from entering express or de facto exclusive-dealing agreements for the supply of modem chips;
(8) Prohibit Qualcomm from interfering with the ability of any customer to communicate with a government agency about a potential law enforcement or regulatory matter; (9) Require Qualcomm to adhere to compliance and monitoring procedures and

(9) Require Qualcomm to adhere to compliance and monitoring procedures and appropriate 'fencing in' provisions, including but not limited to a potential [*819] firewall between patent licensing and chip personnel; and
(10) Impose any other relief that the Court finds necessary and appropriate to redress and prevent recurrence of Qualcomm's conduct.

ECF No. 1314-3 at 3-4.

Under United States Supreme Court precedent, "a remedies decree in an antitrust case must seek to 'unfetter a market from anticompetitive conduct,' to 'terminate the illegal monopoly, deny to the defendant the fruits of its statutory violation, and ensure that there remain no practices likely to result in monopolization in the future.'" Microsoft, 253 F.3d at 103 (quoting Ford Motor Co., 405 U.S. at 577, and United Shoe Mach. Corp., 391 U.S. at 250). "[A]dequate relief in a monopolization case should put an end to the combination and deprive the defendants of any of the benefits of [416] the illegal conduct, and break up or render impotent the monopoly power found to be in violation of the Act." Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 577. Thus, it is "entirely appropriate" for a court to order an injunction "beyond a simple proscription against the precise conduct previously pursued." Nat'l Soc'y of Prof'l Eng'rs, 435 U.S. at 698.

Qualcomm raises the overarching argument that all of the FTC's proposed relief is overbroad because the FTC seeks to enjoin Qualcomm's conduct in all modem chip markets, not merely those in which the FTC alleged and showed that Qualcomm held monopoly power. QC FOFCOL at 144. Qualcomm contends that such a remedy is not "tailored to remedy the specific harm alleged." Id. (citing Lamb-Weston, Inc. v. McCain Foods, Ltd., 941 F.2d 970, 974 (9th Cir. 1991)). However, this argument is simplistic and factually faulty.

Although Qualcomm argues that Qualcomm could not have used CDMA market power to obtain unreasonably high royalty rates in WCDMA license agreements, Qualcomm's own expert Dr. Aviv Nevo admitted at trial that Qualcomm's WCDMA license agreements often covered sales of CDMA handsets. Tr. at 1646:9-13. Therefore, Qualcomm's CDMA modem chip leverage could have come to bear on WCDMA license negotiations. Further, Qualcomm primarily sells multimode modem chips that support multiple cellular standards. Tr. at 1355:2-6. [417] Accordingly, Qualcomm's monopolies in premium LTE and CDMA modem chip markets could have come to bear on Qualcomm's other license negotiations, if the OEM needed access to Qualcomm's multimode LTE or CDMA modem chips. See also E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 366 U.S. at 334 (holding that where the government has established a violation of law, "all doubts as to the remedy are to be resolved in its favor").

The Court, however, agrees that certain of the FTC's proposed remedies are either vague or not necessary to "'unfetter a market from anticompetitive conduct,' to 'terminate the illegal monopoly, deny to the defendant the fruits of its statutory violation, and ensure that there remain no practices likely to result in monopolization in the future.'" Microsoft, 253 F.3d at 103 (citations omitted).

Lastly, the Court notes that more than three months after this trial concluded, the United States filed a statement of interest. ECF No. 1487. The United States argues that if the Court finds a violation of the FTC Act, the Court "should permit additional briefing and schedule an evidentiary hearing to resolve any disputes regarding the scope and impact of injunctive relief." [*820] Id. at 3. However, an evidentiary hearing is not necessary where "the matter of relief was part [418] of the trial on liability." Microsoft, 253 F.3d at 101.

Here, for example, the parties presented considerable testimony, evidence, and argument on the feasibility of requiring Qualcomm to license its SEPs to rival modem chip suppliers, and on other issues related to the scope or nature of the remedy. See, e.g., QX2778C-012 (Nokia response to FTC civil investigative demand regarding licensing to modem chip suppliers); Tr. at 1913:3-16 (Qualcomm's expert Dr. Aviv Nevo testifying about the implications of enjoining Qualcomm's practice of requiring OEMs to sign a separate license before buying modem chips); Tr. at 1432:25-1434:21 (Fabian Gonell, QTL Legal Counsel and Senior Vice President, Licensing Strategy, testifying about implications of requiring Qualcomm to license its SEPs to rival modem chip suppliers); Tr. at 2169:12-2173:3 (Qualcomm closing argument on remedies, including on implications of requiring Qualcomm to renegotiate existing patent licenses with OEMs).

In addition, the circumstances in Microsoft, on which the United States chiefly relies, are distinguishable. In Microsoft, the district court instituted the extraordinary remedy of requiring divestiture, even though "[i]n two separate offers of proof, [419] Microsoft identified 23 witnesses who . . . would have challenged a wide range of plaintiffs' factual representations." Id. at 101. The district court acknowledged the "acute factual disagreements," but declined to hold an evidentiary hearing. Id. The United States identifies no such disagreements or circumstances in this case. Therefore, the Court declines to hold an evidentiary hearing on the question of remedy.

In accordance with the principles above and consistent with the Court's findings of fact and conclusions of law, the Court orders the following injunctive relief:

(1) Qualcomm must not condition the supply of modem chips on a customer's patent license status and Qualcomm must negotiate or renegotiate license terms with customers in good faith under conditions free from the threat of lack of access to or discriminatory provision of modem chip supply or associated technical support or access to software.

This remedy addresses Qualcomm's practices of not selling modem chips exhaustively, requiring OEMs to sign a separate license before buying modem chips, and Qualcomm's associated threats to cut off OEMs' chip supply and technical support and to delay or revoke access to software, which [420] the Court held constitute anticompetitive conduct under the Sherman Act. Prohibiting Qualcomm from cutting off OEMs' chip supply, technical support, and access to software ensures that Qualcomm and OEMs can negotiate patent license terms that reflect the fair value of Qualcomm's patents, rather than terms that reflect Qualcomm's monopoly power in modem chips. The evidence showed a sufficient risk that Qualcomm will have market power in 5G modem chips and could exercise its dominance to extract unreasonably high royalties. Therefore, prohibiting Qualcomm from cutting off OEMs' chip supply, technical support, and access to software helps "ensure that there are no practices likely to result in monopolization in the future." Microsoft, 253 F.3d at 103.

Requiring Qualcomm to renegotiate its existing patent license agreements also addresses the "fruits of [Qualcomm's] statutory [*821] violation." United Shoe Mach. Corp., 391 U.S. at 250. Many of Qualcomm's existing patent licenses negotiated under the threat of lack of access to chip supply, technical support, or software are long-term or perpetual in duration. For example, a 2017 Qualcomm slide deck states that 12 of Qualcomm's top 20 licensees by licensing revenue have entered patent license agreements that [421] have no fixed expiration date and that may already cover 5G technology. CX7122-016.

It makes little sense for the Court, having found that Qualcomm's patent licenses are the product of anticompetitive conduct, to leave those licenses in place. To permit Qualcomm to continue to charge unreasonably high royalty rates would perpetuate its artificial surcharge on rivals' chips, which harms rivals, OEMs, and consumers, and would enable Qualcomm to continue to reap the fruits of its Sherman Act violation. Thus, the Court finds it necessary to require Qualcomm to renegotiate those license agreements. See Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 577 (holding "that adequate relief in a monopolization case should put an end to the combination and deprive the defendants of any of the benefits of the illegal conduct") (emphasis added).

Requiring negotiations and renegotiations of license agreements to occur without the threat of chip supply, technical support, and software cutoff will enable Qualcomm and OEMs to negotiate license terms that reflect the fair value of Qualcomm's patents. Although this remedy does not merely proscribe future Qualcomm conduct, and will require Qualcomm to renegotiate many licenses, it is "entirely appropriate" [422] for a court to order an injunction "beyond a simple proscription against the precise conduct previously pursued." Nat'l Soc'y of Prof'l Eng'rs, 435 U.S. at 698.

(2) Qualcomm must make exhaustive SEP licenses available to modem-chip suppliers on fair, reasonable, and non-discriminatory ("FRAND") terms and to submit, as necessary, to arbitral or judicial dispute resolution to determine such terms.

This remedy addresses Qualcomm's refusal to license rival modem chip suppliers on FRAND terms, which the Court held is anticompetitive conduct under the Sherman Act. Thus, requiring Qualcomm to license its SEPs to rival modem chip suppliers on FRAND terms "unfetter[s] [the] market from anticompetitive conduct." Ford Motor Co., 405 U.S. at 577. Although Qualcomm claims such a remedy is inconsistent with industry practice, Qualcomm conceded to the IRS in 2012 that Qualcomm licensed modem chip suppliers only until Qualcomm decided that licensing OEMs at the handset level instead was "humongously more lucrative." CX6786-R at 71:18-23. Thus, Qualcomm itself has licensed its SEPs to rival modem chip suppliers.

Licensing SEPs to rival modem chip suppliers is also consistent with Qualcomm's existing voluntary FRAND commitments. Requiring Qualcomm to license its SEPs to rival [423] modem chip suppliers will eliminate the anticompetitive conduct in this case because Qualcomm's rivals may enter modem chip markets without fear of an infringement action. Further, requiring Qualcomm to license its SEPs to rival modem chip suppliers on FRAND terms will enable a fair valuation of Qualcomm's modem chip SEPs because modem chip suppliers are unaffected by chip supply leverage. Finally, arbitral and judicial dispute resolution procedures are already in place for FRAND disputes.

This remedy addresses Qualcomm's exclusive dealing agreements with Apple; de facto exclusive dealing agreements with LGE, BlackBerry, Samsung, and VIVO; and offers of de facto exclusive dealing agreements to Motorola and Lenovo. Qualcomm's exclusive dealing agreements have foreclosed Qualcomm's rivals from a substantial share of the CDMA and premium LTE modem chip markets. Exclusive dealing agreements are particularly fraught in markets, like the modem chip market, that are "highly concentrated" with few market participants and where there are significant barriers to entry. ZF Meritor, 696 F.3d at 284. Exclusive dealing [424] by a monopolist in particular "raise[s] legitimate concerns about harm to competition." Microsoft, 253 F.3d at 70.

In 2018, Qualcomm agreed to give Samsung chip incentive funds only if Samsung purchases 100% of its premium modem chips from Qualcomm in a given year. JX0122-036 to - 037. The Court notes that Qualcomm entered into this de facto exclusive agreement with Samsung a year after the KFTC made adverse findings against Qualcomm for Qualcomm's licensing practices and a year after the FTC filed the instant action.

Thus, Qualcomm continues to enter exclusive deals that could foreclose rivals from the market. In addition, Qualcomm entered its exclusive dealing agreements with Apple during the transition to LTE, when Qualcomm maintained a 100% share of the premium LTE modem chip market. The cellular industry is preparing to transition to 5G, a new generation, and Qualcomm's own internal and public statements represent that Qualcomm "has a 12 to 24 month lead ahead of [its] key competitors in the transition to 5G." CX8195-083. Thus, there is a sufficient likelihood that Qualcomm will hold monopoly power in the 5G modem chip market such that exclusive dealing agreements for the supply of modem chips could foreclose [425] competition in that emerging market.

Moreover, the Court notes that the Ninth Circuit has held that an injunction is appropriate when there is a "possibility of recurrence" of illegal conduct. Affordable Media, 179 F.3d at 1237 (holding that the district court properly entered an injunction under the FTC Act against future conduct despite the defendant's cessation of illegal conduct due to the "possibility of recurrence"). Furthermore, the United States Supreme Court has held that where the government has established a violation of law, all doubts as to the remedy are to be resolved in the government's favor. E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 366 U.S. at 334 (holding that where the government has established a violation of law, "all doubts as to the remedy are to be resolved in [the government's] favor").

(4) Qualcomm may not interfere with the ability of any customer to communicate with a government agency about a potential law enforcement or regulatory matter.

This remedy protects against Qualcomm's continued violation of the Sherman Act. See W.T. Grant Co., 345 U.S. at 633 (holding that an injunction is warranted under the FTC Act where "there exists some cognizable danger of recurrent violation"). Without the aid of market participants, a government agency may be hamstrung in pursuing a potential [426] law enforcement or regulatory matter. Many of Qualcomm's OEM customers testified at trial in both the FTC's and Qualcomm's cases in chief. Thus, this remedy is designed to unfetter the market from anticompetitive conduct. See [*823] Microsoft, 253 F.3d at 103. This remedy also addresses Qualcomm's conduct in this case because Qualcomm has, even with this action in progress, interfered with the ability of its OEM customers to assist government agencies.

In January 2018, a year after the KFTC made a finding against Qualcomm in January 2017 and fined Qualcomm $927 million, and a year after the FTC filed its complaint in this case, Qualcomm entered a Settlement Agreement in which Qualcomm paid Samsung $100 million to extinguish Samsung's antitrust complaints and to silence Samsung as to any anticompetitive conduct by Qualcomm. For example, in the Settlement Agreement, Samsung specifically releases claims based on the following:

> any claim of coercion or other similar claims regarding the negotiation, execution, or terms of this Settlement Agreement, the 2018 Amendment, the CMCPCA, and/or the Collaboration Agreement . . .
> any patent licensing conduct of Qualcomm or any of its Affiliates or (b) any conduct of Qualcomm or any of its Affiliates in the Private and Regulatory Actions [427] . . . [and]
> any claim that Qualcomm's Existing Practices violate any antitrust, competition, or similar laws of any state or territory of the United States (including federal law), Korea, or any other country or any jurisdiction, or any principle of common or civil law to similar effect including any claim based on or arising from findings or conclusions articulated in . . . (4) the ultimate decisions, settlement agreements or other dispositions of any of the cases brought against Qualcomm (or that contain counterclaims against Qualcomm) by the U.S. Federal Trade Commission ("U.S. F.T.C.") (FTC v. Qualcomm Incorporated, Case No. 5:17-CV-00220-LHK (N.D. Cal.)) . . .

JX0122-050 to -052. In addition, in the 2018 Settlement Agreement, Samsung promised to withdraw from participation in the instant action and other antitrust actions, outside of that participation required by law:

> Samsung will promptly take all actions reasonably required to withdraw all pending or accepted applications for intervention, or any other forms of substantive participation (except for any participation, including discovery or deposition, to the extent required by law), in any of the Private or Regulatory Actions [428] and any other proceedings involving claims that Qualcomm's Existing Practices violate antitrust, competition, or similar laws.

Moreover, Samsung promised to make the following statement to the KFTC: "[I]n any statement Samsung provides to the KFTC regarding Qualcomm's compliance with the KFTC 2017 Orders, Samsung agrees that it shall confirm that it has resolved its disputes with Qualcomm and the resolution of such dispute satisfies Samsung's demands made under the KFTC 2017 Orders." JX0122-055. Qualcomm's pursuit of this and similar releases to extinguish antitrust claims threatens to impede the government's ability to enforce the antitrust laws, and could enable future unlawful Qualcomm conduct to go unreported.

This remedy is particularly relevant given the Court's order below that Qualcomm submit to compliance and monitoring procedures. In the course of such monitoring, the FTC may seek information from OEM customers and other market participants to confirm Qualcomm's compliance with the Court's order enjoining Qualcomm's [*824] license practices. Qualcomm could frustrate such inquiries by interfering with OEM's communications to the FTC.

(5) In order to ensure Qualcomm's compliance [429] with the above remedies, the Court orders Qualcomm to submit to compliance and monitoring procedures for a period of seven (7) years. Specifically, Qualcomm shall report to the FTC on an annual basis Qualcomm's compliance with the above remedies ordered by the Court.

It is well established that in FTC enforcement actions, a court may require a defendant to submit to compliance reporting or monitoring by the FTC. See United States Dep't of Justice v. Daniel Chapter One, 89 F. Supp. 3d 132, 144 (D.D.C. 2015) (citing cases and holding that "courts may order record-keeping and monitoring to ensure compliance with a permanent injunction"). For example, in F.T.C. v. Direct Marketing Concepts, Inc., 648 F. Supp. 2d 202 (D. Mass. 2009), the district court concluded that monitoring provisions were appropriate because the defendants had "violated a preliminary injunction" and otherwise "demonstrated a history of poor diligence." Id. at 216.

Similarly, Qualcomm's failure to alter its unlawful licensing practices despite years of foreign government investigations, findings, and fines suggests an obstinance that a monitoring provision may address. Other courts in FTC enforcement actions have held that compliance reporting requirements are not "unduly burdensome," even when the provisions require reporting for a period of twenty years. See Fed. Trade Comm'n v. John Beck Amazing Profits LLC, 888 F. Supp. 2d 1006, 1016 (C.D. Cal. 2012). Accordingly, the Court finds that [430] requiring Qualcomm to submit annual compliance reports and submit to FTC monitoring is appropriate in this case.

OPINION AND ORDER DENYING DEFENDANTS' MOTION TO DISMISS (Doc. #26)

I. INTRODUCTION

On October 15, 2018, Harley Blanton, individually and as a representative of similarly-situated [*2] persons, filed suit against Defendants Domino's Pizza Franchising LLC, Domino's Pizza Master Issuer LLC, Domino's Pizza LLC, and Domino's Pizza, Inc. (collectively, "Defendants").

Blanton says Defendants violated the Sherman Antitrust Act by orchestrating an employee no-hire agreement among their nationwide network of franchisees. Under the no-hire provision at issue—included in every Domino's franchise agreement from at least January 2013 to April 2018—Domino's franchisees agreed not to solicit or hire current employees of other Domino's franchisees and affiliated entities.

Blanton alleges that this is a "horizontal" restraint of trade that is sufficiently pled. Defendants disagree and move to dismiss under Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 12(b)(1) and 12(b)(6); they say that Blanton failed to sufficiently allege injury and state a claim upon which relief can be granted. Oral argument was heard on April 15, 2019.

The Court finds that Blanton has sufficiently pled a horizontal restraint of trade between franchisees at the same level. The Court also finds that—contrary to what Defendants urge—it need not now decide what standard of review will ultimately govern once all facts become known.

Defendants' motion to dismiss is DENIED.

II. BACKGROUND [*3]

Blanton worked for a Domino's franchise in Port Orange, Florida, from January 2017 until April or May of that year; he says he quit because his hours were repeatedly cut back. The Domino's franchise that Blanton worked for is one of many in the nation that signed the Domino's franchise agreement and agreed to the no-hire provision.

Defendant Domino's Pizza Franchising, LLC—the current franchising arm of Defendant Domino's Pizza, Inc.—enters into a standard franchise agreement with each new Domino's franchise owner; Domino's franchises are independently owned and operated as separate entities from Defendants.

Until at least April of 2018, each franchise agreement included the no-hire provision. The no-hire provision required franchisees to agree not to:

> Directly or indirectly, solicit or employ any person who is employed by Domino's, by any entity controlled by or affiliated with Domino's, or by any other of our franchisees, nor will you induce any of these people to leave their employment without the prior written consent of their employers.

[Doc. No. 1, pp. 3].

This provision prohibits a Domino's franchisee from recruiting or hiring a current employee of another Domino's franchisee without [*4] prior written consent. Franchisees also agree that a violation of the no-hire provision will cause "irreparable harm" to Defendants; moreover, a violation triggers termination of the violating franchisee's franchise agreement.

Blanton says that Defendants used the franchise agreements to orchestrate a conspiracy among their franchisees to not compete for labor; Blanton says that the no-hire provision is evidence of that conspiracy and violates the Sherman Antitrust Act because it unreasonably restrains competition for Domino's franchise employees and depresses employee wages, lessens employee benefits, and stifles employee mobility.

III. STANDARD OF REVIEW

A motion to dismiss pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) tests a complaint's legal sufficiency. Although the federal rules only require that a complaint contain a "short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief," see Rule 8(a)(2), the statement of the claim must be plausible. Indeed, "[t]o survive a motion to dismiss, a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to 'state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'" Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) (quoting Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007)). A claim is plausible where the facts allow the Court to infer that the defendant [*5] is liable for the misconduct alleged. Id. This requires more than "bare assertions of legal conclusions"; a plaintiff must provide the "grounds" of his or her "entitlement to relief." LULAC v. Bredesen, 500 F.3d 523, 527 (6th Cir. 2007). In deciding a motion under Rule 12(b)(6), the Court must construe the complaint in the light most favorable to the plaintiff and accept as true all well-pled factual allegations. Id. The Court "may consider the Complaint and any exhibits attached thereto, public records, items appearing in the record of the case and exhibits attached to defendant's motion to dismiss so long as they are referred to in the Complaint and are central to the claims contained therein." Bassett v. Nat'l Collegiate Athletic Ass'n, 528 F.3d 426, 430 (6th Cir. 2008).

IV. ANALYSIS

A. Antitrust Overview

The Sherman Antitrust Act prohibits "every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations." 15 U.S.C. § 1.

The Clayton Act provides that "any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue . . . and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained." 15 U.S.C. § 15. Claims brought under the Sherman Antitrust Act are subject to a four-year statute of limitations from the [*6] date "the cause of action accrued." Z Techs. Corp. v. Lubrizol Corp., 753 F.3d 594, 598 (6th Cir. 2014).

Because Defendants spend considerable time in their papers discussing the standard of review that the Court should apply in deciding whether Blanton plausibly states a Sherman Act violation, the Court will address the standard of review. However, the Court's attention is on whether the allegations are sufficient to demonstrate that Defendants entered into agreements with franchisees that resulted in less mobility and lower wages for employees. The focus is on whether the allegations themselves are sufficiently specific to "raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of illegal agreement." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556.

Under the Sherman Act, restraints of trade are classified as either vertical or horizontal. Courts typically analyze vertical restraints of trade—agreements made between entities at different levels of the distribution chain—under the "rule of reason" standard. See Com-Tel, Inc. v. DuKane, Corp., 669 F.2d 404, 409 (6th Cir. 1982) (quoting Oreck Corp. v. Whirlpool Corp., 579 F.2d 126, 131 (2d Cir. 1978)).

Courts use rule of reason analysis where an agreement's "competitive effect can only be evaluated by analyzing the facts peculiar to the business, the history of the restraint, and the reasons why it was imposed." Nat'l Soc. Of Prof'l Engineers v. United States, 435 U.S. 679, 692, 98 S. Ct. 1355, 55 L. Ed. 2d 637 (1978). "Under this rule, the factfinder weighs all of the [*7] circumstances of a case in deciding whether a restrictive practice should be prohibited as imposing an unreasonable restraint on competition . . . Appropriate factors to take into account include . . . 'the restraint's history, nature, and effect.'" Leegin Creative Leather Products, Inc. v. PSKS, Inc., 551 U.S. 877, 885-86, 127 S. Ct. 2705, 168 L. Ed. 2d 623 (2007).

Horizontal restraints—which Blanton alleges is the restraint Defendants engage in—are agreements made between entities operating at different levels of distribution. By contrast, they are deemed per se illegal. Horizontal restraints are typically characterized as "naked restraints of trade with no purpose except stifling competition," and "therefore, [are] per se violations of the Sherman Act." Com-Tel, Inc., 669 F.2d at 409 (quoting Oreck Corp. v. Whirlpool Corp., 579 F.2d 126, 131 (2d Cir. 1978)); a naked restraint of trade is one "in which the restriction on competition is unaccompanied by new production or products . . . If two people meet one day and decide not to compete, the restraint is 'naked'; it does nothing but suppress competition." Polk Bros., Inc. v. Forest City Enterprises, Inc., 776 F.2d 185, 188-89 (7th Cir. 1985).

Not all horizontal restraints are "naked" restraints of trade. Indeed, horizontal restraints that are ancillary to procompetitive agreements are typically judged under the rule of reason. See *Deslandes v. McDonald's USA, LLC, No. 17-C-4857, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 105260, 2018 WL 3105955, at 7 (N.D. Ill. June 25, 2018); see also Polk Bros., 776 F.2d at 188-89 ("If A hires B as a salesman and passes customer lists to B, then B's reciprocal covenant [*8] not to compete with A is 'ancillary.' At the time A and B strike their bargain, the enterprise (viewed as a whole) expands output and competition by putting B to work . . . Covenants of this type are evaluated under the Rule of Reason as ancillary restraints, and unless they bring a large market share under a single firm's control they are lawful.").

Finally, there is a third, intermediate mode of analysis—which courts refer to as the "quick-look" approach. Courts take a "quick-look" where the per se rule is inapplicable, but the anticompetitive effects of an agreement are so obvious that "an observer with even a rudimentary understanding of economics could conclude that the arrangements in question would have an anticompetitive effect on customers and markets." California Dental Ass'n v. F.T.C., 526 U.S. 756, 770, 119 S. Ct. 1604, 143 L. Ed. 2d 935 (1999).

Blanton challenges what he says is a horizontal restraint of trade that is so pernicious that it is a per se violation of the Sherman Act. Alternatively, Blanton says he has sufficiently pled a claim under the "quick look" approach, but reiterates the precise standard need not be decided by the Court now.

B. Blanton Sufficiently Alleges Article III Standing and Antitrust Injury

Defendants say Blanton's complaint should be dismissed for lack of Article III standing under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(1). They also say Blanton [*9] fails to allege antitrust injury. The Court disagrees.

To establish Article III standing, a plaintiff must plead facts showing actual injury, causation, and redressability. Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560-61, 112 S. Ct. 2130, 119 L. Ed. 2d 351 (1992). Moreover, an antitrust plaintiff must establish antitrust injury, "which is to say injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes the defendants' acts unlawful." NicSand, Inc. v. 3M Co., 507 F.3d 442, 450 (6th Cir. 2007).

Blanton pleads that Defendants' no-hire provision "harmed [Domino's franchise] employees by lowering the salaries and benefits employees otherwise would have commanded in a competitive marketplace." Blanton says that his own wages were depressed.

Economic injuries like this "have long been recognized as sufficient to lay the basis for [Article III] standing." Sierra Club v. Morton, 405 U.S. 727, 733, 92 S. Ct. 1361, 31 L. Ed. 2d 636 (1972); see also Milwaukee Police Ass'n v. Flynn, 863 F.3d 636, 639 (7th Cir. 2017) ("concrete financial injuries, namely deprivation of wages . . . are prototypical of injuries for the purposes of Article III standing.").

Blanton also alleges causation and redressability. He asserts that his depressed wages were a direct result of the allegedly unlawful no-hire agreement; further, he seeks treble damages, which would more than make up for lost wages.

The Court finds that Blanton has sufficiently alleged [*10] standing.

Blanton also sufficiently alleges antitrust injury. Blanton contends that Defendants' no-hire agreement is "a conspiracy not to compete for labor." As discussed above, Blanton says the conspiracy had the purpose and effect of depressing wages and limiting the employment mobility of Domino's franchise employees, including himself. Blanton also alleges that Domino's franchises compete against one another for labor.

"The relevant cases hold that plaintiffs whose opportunities in the employment market have been impaired by an anticompetitive agreement directed at them as a particular segment of employees have suffered an antitrust injury under the governing standard." Roman v. Cessna Aircraft Co., 55 F.3d 542, 544 (10th Cir. 1995) (citing Radovich v.

National Football League, 352 U.S. 445, 77 S. Ct. 390, 1 L. Ed. 2d 456 (1957)); see also Phillip Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law ¶ 377c (rev. ed. 1995) ("[a]ntitrust law addresses employer conspiracies controlling employment terms precisely because they tamper with the employment market and thereby impair the opportunities of those who sell their services there . . . An employee overcomes the primary hurdle to standing when he shows that the alleged violation restrains competition in the labor market.").

Blanton alleges facts sufficient to show Article III standing and antitrust [*11] injury.

C. Blanton Pleads a Plausible Violation of the Sherman Act

Blanton says that the no-hire provision is a per se violation of the Sherman Act; he argues that the no-hire provision is evidence of the type of horizontal agreement that courts always deem per se illegal. Courts hold that this type of restraint has such a clear lack of redeeming value that it is conclusively presumed to be unreasonable. See Expert Masonry, Inc. v. Boone Cty., Ky., 440 F.3d 336, 342 (6th Cir. 2006).

In the alternative, Blanton says that the no-hire provision is illegal under the quick-look approach. Defendants disagree and urge the Court to apply the "rule of reason" approach discussed above and dismiss Blanton's complaint. Notably, Defendants rely on a number of summary judgment and trial decisions in their motion papers, both of which are improper at this stage—where the Court is only to evaluate the sufficiency of the pleadings.

The Court declines to announce a rule of analysis at this juncture. More factual development is necessary. The Court does find that Blanton pled a plausible violation of the Sherman Act.

The essential elements of a violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act are: (1) a contract, combination, or conspiracy; (2) affecting interstate commerce; (3) which imposes [*12] an unreasonable restraint on trade. White and White, Inc. v. Am. Hosp. Supply Corp., 723 F.2d 495, 504 (6th Cir. 1983). As discussed, an antitrust plaintiff must also plead antitrust injury, "which is to say injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes the defendants' acts unlawful." Valley Products Co., Inc. v. Landmark, a Div. of Hospitality Franchise Systems, Inc., 128 F.3d 398, 402 (6th Cir. 1997) (citing Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 489, 97 S. Ct. 690, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977)).

Blanton says Defendants orchestrated an agreement not to compete for labor among their franchisees; he says that franchisees, by signing the franchise agreement, tacitly agree not to hire one another's employees—an agreement he says is evidenced by the provision that allows franchisees the power to waive the no-hire restraint. Further, Blanton says this agreement lowered the wages and depressed the mobility of a nationwide class of Domino's employees.

Blanton has plausibly pled a "contract, combination, or conspiracy" affecting interstate commerce, in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. Blanton has also plausibly alleged that the agreement is unreasonable under both the per se rule and quick-look analysis. He sufficiently alleges that the agreement "has such a clear lack of redeeming value that it is conclusively presumed to be unreasonable"; he also sufficiently pleads that the anticompetitive effects of the agreement are [*13] so obvious that "an observer with even a rudimentary understanding of economics could conclude that [the agreement] in question would have an anticompetitive effect on customers and markets." However, as discussed, more factual development is necessary to determine which standard of review will apply to the no-hire provision.

D. Blanton States a Plausible Claim Against all Defendants

Defendants say that Domino's Pizza Master Issuer LLC, Domino's Pizza LLC, and Domino's Pizza, Inc. should be dismissed because Blanton fails to plead facts sufficient to plausibly allege their involvement in the purported conspiracy. Defendants say that Blanton's only allegations with respect to the non-franchisor defendants pertain to places of incorporation and corporate affiliation; most importantly, Defendants claim that no allegations plausibly connect the non-franchisor defendants to the challenged provision.

Defendants misrepresent Blanton's complaint.

To state a plausible antitrust conspiracy claim, the allegations in the complaint must "be specific enough to establish the relevant 'who, what, where, when, how, or why.'" Carrier Corp. v. Outokumpu Oyj, 673 F.3d 430, 445 (6th Cir. 2012). The complaint must also "specify how [each] defendant [was] involved in the [*14] alleged conspiracy." Id. "Generic pleading, alleging misconduct against defendants without specifics as to the role each played in the conspiracy" is insufficient. *In re Refrigerant Compressors Antitrust Litig., No. 2:09-MD-02042, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 80269, 2012 WL 2114997, at 8 (E.D. Mich. June 11, 2012).

Contrary to Defendants' assertions, Blanton sufficiently alleges the role each Defendant played in the purported conspiracy. Blanton alleges more than mere corporate affiliation and place of incorporation; he says that each Defendant either acted as franchisor or was otherwise involved in the franchising process with respect to franchise agreements still in effect over the past four years.

Simply put, Blanton's allegations are sufficient to allow this Court to reasonably infer the involvement of all Defendants in the alleged conspiracy. See Bredesen, 500 F.3d at 527 ("[i]n deciding a motion under Rule 12(b)(6), the Court must construe the complaint in the light most favorable to the plaintiff and accept as true all well-pled factual allegations."). See also *Catlin Indem. Co. v. Westfield Ins. Co., No. 14-13685, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 133193, 2015 WL 5728838, at 2 (E.D. Mich. Sept. 30, 2015) ("[a] claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.") (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556).

Blanton plausibly alleges the involvement [*15] of all Defendants in the purported conspiracy.

E. Blanton Sufficiently Pleads Fraudulent Concealment

Blanton seeks to represent a class of plaintiffs that goes back more than four years; he argues that the four-year statute of limitations for Sherman Act claims should be tolled because Defendants fraudulently concealed their conspiracy.

Defendants say that Blanton's allegation of fraudulent concealment should be stricken; they say Blanton fails to plead the requisite elements with the particularity required by Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 9(b). Specifically, Defendants assert that they could not have wrongfully concealed the no-hire provision because it was publicly available, and they claim that Blanton impermissibly fails to plead the affirmative steps he took to discover his cause of action within the statute of limitations period. Again, Defendants are wrong.

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 9(b) mandates that "[i]n alleging fraud or mistake, a party must state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud or mistake." Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b).

To state a claim of fraudulent concealment, a plaintiff must plead "'(1) wrongful concealment of their actions by the defendants; (2) failure of the plaintiff to discover the operative facts that are the basis of his cause of [*16] action within the limitations period; and (3) plaintiff's due diligence until discovery of the facts.'" Dayco Corp. v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 523 F.2d 389, 394 (6th Cir. 1975). Importantly, "[t]he requirement of diligence is only meaningful, however, when facts exist that would excite the inquiry of a reasonable person." See Conmar Corp. v. Mitsui & Co. (U.S.A.), Inc., 858 F.2d 499, 504 (9th Cir. 1988); see also Carrier Corp. v. Outokumpu Oyj., 673 F.3d 430, 448 (6th Cir. 2012) ("[t]his would appear to be enough to place [Plaintiff] on inquiry notice, which in turn would require [Plaintiff] diligently to investigate its possible claim."). Blanton says that Defendants made "false public representations" which concealed the existence of the no-hire provision. Specifically, Blanton claims that Defendants publicly represented that franchisees make their own employment decisions; Defendants also allegedly stated that employees may advance from an entry level position to store owner. Blanton says that the no-hire provision prohibited franchisees from hiring employees of other franchisees; he also says that it operated to limit employee mobility. Given Blanton's assertions, the above statements—if in fact made by Defendants—plausibly operate to conceal the existence of the no-hire provision.

Finally, Blanton sufficiently pleads due diligence, notwithstanding that he does not plead the affirmative steps [*17] taken to discover the cause of action. While Defendants claim that the franchise agreement and no-hire provision were publicly available, they fail to say where or how employees could have found them. Instead, Blanton alleges that employees had no access to franchise agreements. He says the 2013 franchise agreement was the only agreement available online; further, he says that the agreement was only available through a third-party website that franchise employees had no reason to know of. Given Blanton's allegations, it is reasonable to infer that Domino's franchise employees had no reason to suspect that the no-hire provision existed.

Blanton plausibly alleges that Defendants fraudulently concealed the existence of the no-hire provision. His allegations are sufficient to create the reasonable inference that members of the potential class were not aware of facts that would require diligence on their part.

V. CONCLUSION

Blanton's allegations are sufficient to establish both Article III standing and antitrust injury. He also plausibly alleges that all Defendants were involved in the purported conspiracy. Fraudulent concealment is sufficiently pled. Finally—and most importantly—Blanton plausibly [*18] alleges that Defendants violated the Sherman Antitrust Act. See In re Text Messaging Antitrust Litig., 630 F.3d 622, 629 (7th Cir. 2010) ("the case is just at the complaint stage and the test for whether to dismiss a case at that stage turns on the complaint's plausibility.")

Defendants' motion to dismiss is DENIED in its entirety.

IT IS ORDERED.

[*1346] ORDER

THIS CAUSE comes before the Court upon Defendants' Motion to Dismiss (Dkt. 36), Plaintiff's Response in Opposition (Dkt. 42), Defendants' Memorandum in Support of the Motion (Dkt. 48), and Plaintiff's Response to Defendants' Memorandum (Dkt. 55). The Court, having reviewed the filings and being otherwise advised in the premises, concludes that Defendants' Motion should be granted in part.

BACKGROUND

The 340B Drug Pricing Program [2] ("340B Program" or "340B") is a federal government program that allows qualifying healthcare providers, called "covered entities," to purchase outpatient drugs at a [*1347] significant discount. After purchasing the discounted drugs, covered entities can dispense them to patients directly, or through third-party pharmacies called "contract pharmacies." The 340B Program provides covered entities with savings based on the discounted prices of drugs. And participants in the program can choose how to use the savings they realize, including "caring for more patients, providing charitable medical care, and offsetting losses incurred from treating underinsured, uninsured, and indigent patients." Dkt. 30, p. 5.

The 340B Program holds participating covered entities responsible for complex tasks such as managing the contract pharmacies, preventing duplicate discounts for certain drugs, and ensuring compliance with government regulations. Plaintiff RxStrategies, Inc. ("RxStrategies") is a 340B program administrator, hired by covered entities to ensure their compliance with the 340B Program. Defendant CVS Pharmacy, Inc. ("CVS") is a retail pharmacy chain with some (or as RxStrategies argues, many) contract [3] pharmacies that dispense outpatient drugs pursuant to the 340B Program.

According to RxStrategies, in 2016, CVS approached RxStrategies with the idea that RxStrategies could serve as a program administrator for CVS. The two entities entered into a mutual non-disclosure agreement ("NDA"), and RxStrategies began designing, building, and testing software solutions for CVS. RxStrategies alleged it shared proprietary information with CVS during these development phases, including lists of RxStrategies' covered entity customers and data processing solutions.

On December 18, 2017, CVS announced it acquired Defendant Wellpartner, LLC ("Wellpartner") to serve as CVS's exclusive program administrator for the 340B Program. RxStrategies alleged that CVS shared RxStrategies' proprietary information with Wellpartner, and Wellpartner contacted some of RxStrategies' covered entity customers. Wellpartner and RxStrategies are direct competitors.

CVS now requires any covered entity that wants to fill 340B Program prescriptions at a CVS pharmacy to use Wellpartner as its program administrator. If the covered entity does not want to use Wellpartner as its 340B program administrator, it cannot utilize CVS [4] as a contract pharmacy for the 340B Program.

RxStrategies filed suit against CVS and Wellpartner alleging claims for illegal tying in violation of the Sherman Act against both Defendants (Count I); breach of contract against CVS (Count II); tortious interference with a contractual relationship against both Defendants (Count III); tortious interference with a business relationship against both Defendants (Count IV); misappropriation of trade secrets against both Defendants (Counts V and VI); fraud in the inducement against CVS (Count VII); fraudulent misrepresentation against CVS (Count VIII); negligent misrepresentation against CVS (Count IX); and unjust enrichment against CVS (Count X). Defendants move to dismiss RxStrategies' Amended Complaint.

MOTION TO DISMISS STANDARD

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) allows a court to dismiss a complaint when it fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. When reviewing a motion to dismiss, a court must accept all factual allegations in the complaint as true. Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89, 94, 127 S. Ct. 2197, 167 L. Ed. 2d 1081 (2007) (internal citation omitted). It must also construe those factual allegations in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. Hunt v. Aimco Properties, L.P., 814 F.3d 1213, 1221 (11th Cir. 2016) (internal citation omitted).

[*1348] To withstand a motion to dismiss, the complaint must include [5] "enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). A claim has facial plausibility "when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009). Pleadings that offer only "labels and conclusions," or a "formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action," will not do. Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555.

DISCUSSION

Count I: Tying in Violation of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §1, against both Defendants

As an initial matter, the Court notes that RxStrategies is required to establish antitrust standing to assert its antitrust claim. See Palmyra Park Hosp. Inc. v. Phoebe Putney Mem'l Hosp., 604 F.3d 1291, 1298 (11th Cir. 2010) ("courts require parties to show that they are the proper plaintiffs to vindicate the public's interest in enforcing the antitrust laws.") "Standing in an antitrust case involves more than the 'case or controversy' requirement that drives constitutional standing." Todorov v. DCH Healthcare Auth., 921 F.2d 1438, 1448 (11th Cir. 1991). The Eleventh Circuit has established a two-prong test for antitrust standing: "(1) the plaintiff must establish that it has suffered an antitrust injury, and (2) the plaintiff must be an 'efficient enforcer' of the antitrust laws." Sunbeam Television Corp. v. Nielsen Media Research, Inc., 711 F.3d 1264, 1271 (11th Cir. 2013) (internal citations omitted). Neither party disputes RxStrategies' antitrust standing, [6] and the Court concludes that RxStrategies has established standing to bring its antitrust claim.

With its antitrust claim, RxStrategies takes issue with CVS's mandate: covered entities that want to use CVS for 340B contract pharmacy services must also use Wellpartner for 340B program administrator services. RxStrategies alleges that Defendants violate the Sherman Act by tying these two services.

To bring a claim under section one of the Sherman Act, RxStrategies "must define the relevant market and establish that the defendants possessed power in that market." Duty Free Americas, Inc. v. Estee Lauder Companies, Inc., 797 F.3d 1248, 1263 (11th Cir. 2015) (citation omitted). See also Jacobs v. Tempur-Pedic Intern., Inc., 626 F.3d 1327, 1336 (11th Cir. 2010). The relevant market includes the geographic market and the product market. Id. Defendants argue the Court should dismiss RxStrategies' claim because RxStrategies fails to establish the geographic market and the requisite market power. The Court discusses each element below.

Geographic Market

The relevant geographic market is "the area of effective competition in which a product or its reasonably interchangeable substitutes are traded." Duty Free Americas, 797 F.3d at 1263 (citing L.A. Draper & Son v. Wheelabrator-Frye, Inc., 735 F.2d 414, 423 (11th Cir.1984)). It is "comprised of the area where [ ] customers would look to buy [ ] a product." Tunis Bros. Co., Inc. v. Ford Motor Co., 952 F.2d 715, 726 (3d Cir. 1991). When determining a geographic market, a court must consider "economic [7] and physical barriers to expansion [such] as transportation costs, delivery limitations and customer convenience and preference." *Cobb Theatres III, LLC v. AMC Entm't Holdings, [1349] Inc., 101 F. Supp. 3d 1319, 1336 (N.D. Ga. 2015). And markets that involve services offered only at a particular location "like those provided by hospitals [and] theaters . . . will often be defined by how far consumers are willing to travel." Id. (citing Earl W. Kintner, Federal Antitrust Law § 10.15 (2013)).

RxStrategies alleges the relevant geographic market in this case "consists of local relevant geographic markets across the country . . . limited to the distance that a covered entity's patients travel to fill their prescriptions." Dkt. 30, p. 35. RxStrategies supports this allegation with facts including a covered entity's strong preference for utilizing contract pharmacies located close to the entity's patients and ways in which covered entities compete with one another. RxStrategies notes the "area of competition is typically small" based on patients' travel preferences. Id. at p. 35.

Defendants argue that "local" markets are not proper geographic markets and that RxStrategies does not provide the specific size or boundary of any local market. Defendants cite to Spanish Broadcast System of Fla., Inc. v. Clear Channel [8] Communications, Inc., where the Eleventh Circuit described a relevant geographic market as "a distinct market, with a specific set of geographical boundaries." 376 F.3d 1065, 1074 (11th Cir. 2004). But this description was not made in the context of pleading requirements. See Thompson v. Metro. Multi-List, Inc., 934 F.2d 1566, 1573 (11th Cir. 1991) ("The parameters of a given market are questions of fact."). Six years later, the Eleventh Circuit decided Jacobs v. Tempur-Pedic Intern., Inc., and declared that to survive a motion to dismiss, "antitrust plaintiffs . . . must present enough information in their complaint to plausibly suggest the contours of the relevant geographic and product markets." 626 F.3d at 1336. RxStrategies' allegations, taken together, "plausibly suggest the contours" of the relevant geographic market.

Market Power

Market power exists when a "seller has some special ability . . . to force a purchaser to do something that he would not do in a competitive market." Illinois Tool Works Inc. v. Indep. Ink, Inc., 547 U.S. 28, 36, 126 S. Ct. 1281, 164 L. Ed. 2d 26 (2006) (citing Jefferson Par. Hosp. Dist. No. 2 v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 13, 104 S. Ct. 1551, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2 (1984), abrogated by Illinois Tool Works, 547 U.S. 28, 126 S. Ct. 1281, 164 L. Ed. 2d 26). In the context of antitrust claims, "sufficient economic power in the tying product market," enables a seller to "coerce buyer acceptance of the tied product." Tic-X-Press, Inc. v. Omni Promotions Co. of Georgia, 815 F.2d 1407, 1414 (11th Cir. 1987), holding modified by Thompson v. Metro. Multi-List, Inc., 934 F.2d 1566 (11th Cir. 1991).

"[In] all cases involving a tying arrangement, the plaintiff must prove that the defendant has market power in the tying [9] product." Illinois Tool Works, 547 U.S. at 46. "[A] showing of market power is necessary, but not sufficient, to establish potential harm to competition." Jacobs, 626 F.3d at 1340 (internal citation omitted). It is "unmistakably clear" that a seller's "economic power over the tying product can be sufficient even though the power falls far short of dominance and even though the power exists only with respect to some of the buyers in the market." Fortner Enterprises, Inc. v. U.S. Steel Corp., 394 U.S. 495, 502-03, 89 S. Ct. 1252, 22 L. Ed. 2d 495 (1969). "Even absent a showing of market dominance, the crucial economic power may be inferred from the tying product's desirability to consumers or from uniqueness in its attributes." Id.

[*1350] "Relevant determinants of the market power of a prospective predator . . . include its absolute and relative market shares, and those of competing firms; the strength and capacity of current competitors; the potential for entry; the historic intensity of competition; and the impact of the legal or natural environment." U.S. Anchor Mfg., Inc. v. Rule Indus., Inc., 7 F.3d 986, 994 (11th Cir. 1993), certified question answered, 264 Ga. 295, 443 S.E.2d 833 (1994) (citing International Tel. & Tel. Corp., 104 F.T.C. 280, 412 (1984)). Overall, "the principal judicial device for measuring actual or potential market power remains market share, typically measured in terms of a percentage of total market sales." Id.

Defendants argue that RxStrategies alleges information about CVS's dominance among retail [10] pharmacies, not 340B contract pharmacies. Therefore, Defendants argue, RxStrategies does not allege market power in the relevant market. Defendants also argue that RxStrategies does not allege enough for the Court to infer that CVS's retail pharmacy market power (a market share of 23.6% of retail pharmacies) is sufficient to establish market power for 340B contract pharmacies. The Court addresses each argument.

RxStrategies alleges many facts about CVS. According to RxStrategies, 82% of the population lives within 10 miles of a CVS pharmacy location; CVS is the second-largest contract pharmacy; CVS has grown its number of locations by 281% since 2013, and has 9,800 pharmacy locations ("the most pharmacy locations"); patients fill their prescriptions, including prescriptions pursuant to the 340B Program, close to where they live; covered entities utilize pharmacies that a large percentage of their patients already use to fill prescriptions; and covered entities view CVS as an "essential" contract pharmacy. RxStrategies also urges the Court to accept that available data about CVS's market share in the 340B contract pharmacy market is understated because of CVS's recent changes to its [11] policies for partnering with covered entities.[1]

[1] According to RxStrategies, before acquiring Wellpartner, CVS had a "one-to-one" policy where one CVS pharmacy location would serve as a contract pharmacy to only one covered entity. RxStrategies alleges this policy protected CVS from potential

In a way, RxStrategies asks the Court to infer that CVS's dominance among retail pharmacies results in dominance in the 340B contract pharmacy market. Though this may be true, RxStrategies' Amended Complaint does not include enough for the Court to infer the level of dominance that equates to market power in the relevant product market. Importantly, as Defendants argue, RxStrategies alleges much about CVS's national market power and market share in certain states. But RxStrategies alleged its geographic markets are local. The allegations are not inconsistent, but they are lacking for the geographic market RxStrategies defined.

The parties argue over the importance of CVS's alleged 23.6% nationwide market share of retail pharmacies. Though the number would likely be insufficient to establish market power, the figure is for a different product market, so it does not have as much relevance here. With 23.6% of the retail pharmacy market share, CVS could have a 10% market share of 340B contract pharmacies or a 90% share. RxStrategies alleges that the five largest pharmacy chains (as alleged, "CVS, Walgreens, Walmart, Rite Aid, and Kroger") represent [12] 60% of 340B contract pharmacies. [*1351] Dkt. 30, p. 12. It is unclear what percentage of this share CVS occupies.

RxStrategies does allege that CVS has a 60% market share for specialty drugs in the 340B Program. But RxStrategies does not allege how this figure translates to the 340B drug market as a whole, and importantly, CVS's share of the market.[2]

RxStrategies also alleges that "nearly 8,000 covered entities participate" in the 340B Program. Dkt. 30, p. 4. And since CVS's partnership with Wellpartner, 1,200 covered entities that previously used only RxStrategies as their 340B program administrator now use only Wellpartner. These figures, among others, help explain the alleged effects CVS's decision has had on some of the contract pharmacy market. But they are not enough to establish market power in the relevant market, especially when RxStrategies' geographic markets are local markets.

Though the Amended Complaint paints the picture of CVS's dominance in the retail pharmacy market, the facts do not establish the requisite market power. Accordingly, the Court will dismiss the claim, without prejudice.

Counts V and VI; Misappropriation of Trade Secrets, against both Defendants

A misappropriation [13] claim requires a showing that "(1) the plaintiff possessed secret information and took reasonable steps to protect its secrecy and (2) the secret it possessed was misappropriated, either by one who knew or had reason to know that the secret was improperly obtained or by one who used improper means to obtain it." *Audiology Distribution, LLC v. Simmons, 812CV02427JDWAEP, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 196272, 2014 WL 12620835, at 1 (M.D. Fla. Jan. 8, 2014). RxStrategies brings two misappropriation claims: one under the Defend Trade Secrets Act ("DTSA"), codified at 18 U.S.C. 1836, and the other under the Florida's Uniform Trade Secrets Act ("FUTSA"), codified at Chapter 688 of Florida Statutes.

The DTSA defines "misappropriation" as the "acquisition of a trade secret of another by a person who knows or has reason to know that the trade secret was acquired by improper means" or "disclosure or use of a trade secret of another without express or implied consent by a person who . . . at the time of disclosure or use, knew or had reason to know that the knowledge of the trade secret was . . . acquired under circumstances, which gives rise to a duty to maintain the secrecy or limit the use of the trade secret." *Temurian v. Piccolo, 18-CV-62737, 2019 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 67469, 2019 WL 1763022, at 10 (S.D. Fla. Apr. 22, 2019) (citing 18 U.S.C. § 1839(5)). The FUTSA provides an identical definition.

The DTSA defines a "trade [14] secret" as 340B Program compliance violations. Dkt. 30, p. 17. Today, CVS allows each of its pharmacies to contract with more than one covered entity for the 340B Program.

[2] RxStrategies does allege that "[i]n 2016, CVS received $32 billion from specialty drugs, or 28% of all specialty drug prescription revenues." Dkt. 30, p. 15. But this fact does not allow the Court to glean CVS's market power in the relevant, 340B contract pharmacy market.

18 U.S.C. § 1839. RxStrategies alleged Defendants misappropriated trade secrets, in the form of proprietary customer information and data processing solutions. Defendants argue that neither constitutes a trade secret and that RxStrategies failed to establish Defendants misappropriated the information. The Court discusses each category of information below.

Customer Information

Defendants first argue RxStrategies' customer information [15] is not a trade secret because the information, such as a covered entity's "authorizing official and primary contact," is publicly available on a government website. Dkt. 36, p. 23. RxStrategies argues that each covered entity's 340B program administrator is not available on the website. As presented, the issue is a factual dispute, not a legal one.

Defendants also argue that RxStrategies' customers' "needs and goals" are too broad to be considered trade secrets. But RxStrategies alleged sufficient facts to establish, at this stage, that it expended effort to compile this information and transform it into a trade secret. For example, RxStrategies alleged it "devote[d] substantial resources and investment . . . to prospecting, identifying, and developing covered entities interested in participating in the 340B program. . . . [and] deploy[ed] its professionals to study a covered entity and the patient community it serves in order to understand the covered entity's needs and goals for participation in the 340B program, and to develop meaningful relationships with various individuals within the covered entity." Dkt. 30, p. 20. See *SMS Audio, LLC v. Belson, 9:16-CV-81308, 2016 WL 8739764, at 3 (S.D. Fla. Aug. 16, 2016) ("Customer lists [16] can constitute trade secrets where the lists are acquired or compiled through the industry of the owner of the lists and are not just a compilation of information commonly available to the public."). RxStrategies also alleged it took protective measures to prevent disclosure of the information including "restricting access to authorized users only via password-protected portals." Id. The Court concludes RxStrategies alleged sufficient facts to establish its customer lists are trade secrets.

Defendants also argue RxStrategies failed to allege any facts showing Defendants misappropriated any of the information. RxStrategies responded to Defendants' argument with caselaw the Court finds persuasive. And to allege misappropriation, RxStrategies alleged facts about its reliance on its NDA with CVS, among other things. At this stage, RxStrategies has alleged sufficient facts to support its claim.

Data Processing Solutions

Defendants also argue that RxStrategies failed to show its "proprietary data processing solutions" are trade secrets. As alleged, however, RxStrategies does more than allege "the existence of general categories of 'confidential information.'" *Elsevier Inc. v. Doctor Evidence, LLC, 17-CV-5540 (KBF), 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10730, 2018 WL 557906, at 6 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 23, 2018) [17] . RxStrategies alleged that its data processing solution, "identifies and segregates eligible 340B prescription activity by an eligible covered entity's patients at the pharmacy level," and enables a drug's replenishment through a covered entity's 340B Program account, instead of other accounts. Dkt. 30, p. 22-23. The solutions included "reporting [*1353] and tracking mechanisms" to comply with the 340B program. Id. Based on RxStrategies' allegations of the complexities of compliance with the 340B Program and its efforts to create software solutions for such compliance, the allegations are sufficient to establish that the processing solutions are trade secrets.

Defendants again argue RxStrategies failed to allege enough to support any misappropriation of the processing solutions. Defendants focus on one of RxStrategies' allegations and deem it insufficient: Wellpartner transitioned customers from RxStrategies to Wellpartner at a quicker rate than it would have been able to absent information from RxStrategies' data processing solutions. But RxStrategies alleged other facts to indicate that Defendants disclosed or used RxStrategies' data processing solutions. Among them, RxStrategies [18] alleges that CVS would not have been able to eliminate its one-to-one policy without RxStrategies' processing solutions. The alleged facts taken together plausibly establish misappropriation of the data processing solutions to survive a motion to dismiss.

Count II, Breach of Contract, against CVS

Defendants urge dismissal of RxStrategies' breach of contract claim for the same reasons Defendants argued the misappropriation claims should be dismissed. Because the Court rejected the arguments, the breach of contract claim remains.

Further, RxStrategies alleged that CVS and RxStrategies entered into an NDA, CVS breached the NDA, and RxStrategies suffered damages as a result of the alleged breach. With these allegations, RxStrategies plausibly alleged a breach of contract claim.

Counts III and IV, Tortious Interference with a Contractual Relationship and Tortious Interference with a Business Relationship, against both Defendants

A plaintiff must prove four elements to establish tortious interference with a contractual or business relationship: "(1) the existence of a business relationship or contract; (2) knowledge of the business relationship or contract on the part of the defendant; (3) an [19] intentional and unjustified interference with the business relationship or procurement of the contract's breach; and (4) damage to the plaintiff as a result of the interference." Howard v. Murray, 184 So. 3d 1155, 1166 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2015).

RxStrategies alleged all four elements for each of its tortious interference claims. But Defendants argue that RxStrategies' claims fail because they are based on a failed antitrust claim and are otherwise preempted by FUTSA.

As to Defendants' preemption argument, FUTSA "displace[s] conflicting tort, restitutory, and other law[s] of [the state of Florida] providing civil remedies for misappropriation of a trade secret." Fla. Stat. § 688.008(1). But it does not affect "[o]ther civil remedies that are not based upon misappropriation of a trade secret." Fla. Stat. § 688.008(2)(b). Courts in this Circuit have concluded that "to pursue claims for additional tort causes of action where there are claims for misappropriation of a trade secret, there must be material distinctions between the allegations comprising the additional torts and the allegations supporting the FUTSA claim." *PB Legacy, Inc. v. Am. Mariculture, Inc., 2:17-CV-9-FTM-29CM, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 204892, 2018 WL 6325315, at 2 (M.D. Fla. Dec. 4, 2018) (citing New Lenox Indus., Inc. v. Fenton, 510 F. Supp. 2d 893, 908 (M.D. Fla. 2007)) (citation omitted). "Thus, the issue becomes whether allegations of trade secret [*1354] misappropriation alone comprise [20] the underlying wrong; if so, the cause of action is preempted by the FUTSA." Id. (quotation and citation omitted).

RxStrategies' tortious interference claims do not consist only of allegations of misappropriation. For example, RxStrategies alleged CVS interfered with RxStrategies' contracts and business relationships by forcing customers to use Wellpartner as their exclusive 340B program administrator. The Court concludes that RxStrategies' tortious interference claims are not preempted by FUTSA. And because neither tortious interference claim depends on the success of RxStrategies' antitrust claim, the claims withstand Defendants' Motion to Dismiss.

Counts VII, VIII, IX, Fraud in the Inducement, Fraudulent Misrepresentation, and Negligent Misrepresentation, against CVS

Claims for fraudulent misrepresentation and fraudulent inducement require a showing of: "(1) a false statement concerning a material fact; (2) the representor's knowledge that the representation is false; (3) an intention that the representation induce another to act on it; and (4) consequent injury by the party acting in reliance on the representation." Moriber v. Dreiling, 194 So. 3d 369, 373 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2016). And "to establish negligent misrepresentation, a party is required [21] to prove: (1) a misrepresentation of material fact that the defendant believed to be true but which was in fact false; (2) that defendant should have known the representation was false; (3) the defendant intended to induce the plaintiff to rely on the misrepresentation; and (4) the plaintiff acted in justifiable reliance upon the misrepresentation, resulting in injury." Arlington Pebble Creek, LLC v. Campus Edge Condo. Ass'n, Inc., 232 So. 3d 502, 505 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2017).

RxStrategies "must state with particularity the circumstances constituting [the] fraud or mistake" for these three claims. Fed. R. Civ. P. 9. This requires RxStrategies to allege "(1) precisely what statements were made in what documents or oral representations or what omissions were made, and (2) the time and place of each such statement and the person responsible for making (or, in the case of omissions, not making) same, and (3) the content of such statements and the manner in which they misled the plaintiff, and (4) what the defendants obtained as a consequence of the fraud." Smiley v. Nationstar Mortgage LLC, 202 F. Supp. 3d 1322, 1324 (M.D. Fla. 2016) (citing Garfield v. NDC Health Corp., 466 F.3d 1255, 1262 (11th Cir. 2006)) (citation omitted).

Defendants argue these three claims should be dismissed because the claims are preempted by FUTSA. Defendants also argue RxStrategies did not comply with Rule 9(b)'s particularity requirement and RxStrategies failed to allege that Defendants [22] intended to deceive RxStrategies. The Court will discuss RxStrategies' claims for fraudulent inducement, fraudulent misrepresentation, and negligent misrepresentation together because Defendants' arguments for dismissal apply to each claim equally.

First, because these claims do not consist only of allegations relating to Defendants' alleged misappropriation of trade secrets, they are not preempted by FUTSA.

Second, in support of its claims, RxStrategies alleged that Christian Reid ("Reid"), the Senior Director of the 340B Program for CVS, and Jaclyn Baptista ("Baptista"), the "Senior Implementation Manager, Health System Alliances, for [*1355] CVS," falsely assured several RxStrategies' representatives (whom RxStrategies lists) that RxStrategies' software was going live soon but had technical issues. Dkt. 30, p. 46. These individuals also allegedly made representations that "a timeline for going live was pending." Id. RxStrategies alleges Reid and Baptista made these representations over the course of a few months, and specifically via email on July 5, 2017. These allegations meet Rule 9(b)'s pleading requirements.

And finally, RxStrategies alleged that Reid and Baptista, on behalf of CVS, "intended [23] to induce RxStrategies to rely and act on the misrepresentations." Dkt. 30, p. 47, 49, 51. This satisfies the requirement that RxStrategies plead "intent" for each of the three claims. To the extent Defendants argue RxStrategies' allegations of intent lack detail, Rule 9 specifically permits "[m]alice, intent, knowledge, and other conditions of a person's mind [to] be alleged generally." Fed. R. Civ. P. 9. Accordingly, the Court will not dismiss RxStrategies' claims for fraudulent inducement, fraudulent misrepresentation, and negligent misrepresentation.

Count X Unjust Enrichment, against CVS

"A claim for unjust enrichment is an equitable claim, based on a legal fiction created by courts to imply a 'contract' as a matter of law." Tooltrend, Inc. v. CMT Utensili, SRL, 198 F.3d 802, 805 (11th Cir. 1999) (citing Commerce Partnership 8098 Ltd. Partnership v. Equity Contracting Co., 695 So. 2d 383, 386 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1997) (en banc)). "[T]he law will, in essence, 'create' an agreement in situations where it is deemed unjust for one party to have received a benefit without having to pay compensation for it." Id.

The elements of a claim for unjust enrichment are: "(1) the plaintiff has conferred a benefit on the defendant; (2) the defendant voluntarily accepted and retained that benefit; and (3) the circumstances are such that it would be inequitable for the defendants to retain it without paying [24] the value thereof." Virgilio v. Ryland Grp., Inc., 680 F.3d 1329, 1337 (11th Cir. 2012) (citing Fla. Power Corp. v. City of Winter Park, 887 So. 2d 1237, 1241 n. 4 (Fla. 2004)).

RxStrategies alleged each element required for the cause of action. But CVS argues RxStrategies' claim is preempted by FUTSA. The Court agrees that the alleged benefits RxStrategies conferred to CVS mimic the proprietary information and trade secrets found in RxStrategies' misappropriation claims. See *PB Legacy, 2:17-CV-9-FTM-29CM, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 204892, 2018 WL 6325315, at 2. So, the unjust enrichment claim would ordinarily be preempted. But if no trade secrets exist, the claim would be proper. RxStrategies can therefore maintain its unjust enrichment claim for now, in the alternative.

CVS also argues it entered into a mutual NDA with RxStrategies, and the NDA governs the use (and misuse) of confidential information RxStrategies references in its unjust enrichment claim. The Court recognizes that "Florida courts have held that a plaintiff cannot pursue a quasi-contract claim for unjust enrichment if an express contract exists concerning the same subject matter." Diamond "S" Dev. Corp. v. Mercantile Bank, 989 So. 2d 696, 697 (Fla. Dist. App. Ct. 2008). But this Court has allowed a claim for unjust enrichment to be pled in the alternative to a breach of contract claim. See *Bruggemann v. Amacore Group, Inc., 8:09-CV-2562-T-30MAM, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 66971, 2010 WL 2696230, at 5 (M.D. Fla. July 6, 2010) (Moody, J.) ("although Defendants are correct [25] that a plaintiff cannot recover under both unjust enrichment and breach of contract, both the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and Florida law [*1356] permit a party to allege these claims in the alternative."). RxStrategies even argues that the "thrust of the claim-RxStrategies' uncompensated time and expense in developing the software solution for CVS-has nothing to do with confidential information and is not covered by the [NDA]." Dkt. 42, p. 20. Accordingly, the Court will allow the claim to remain.

Upon review and consideration, it is therefore

ORDERED AND ADJUDGED that:

1. Defendants' Motion (Dkt. 36) is GRANTED in part, as described herein.
2. Plaintiff's Count I is dismissed without prejudice.
3. Plaintiff may file an amended complaint within twenty-one (21) days from the date of this Order.

Order

ORDER ON DESIGNATION

1. THIS MATTER is before the Court pursuant to the Order of the Honorable Cheri Beasley, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of North Carolina, directing the undersigned to determine whether this action is properly designated as a mandatory complex business case in accord with N.C. Gen. Stat. § 7A-45.4(a) (the "Determination Order").

2. Plaintiff filed the Complaint initiating this action in Guilford County Superior Court on May 20, 2019, asserting claims for tortious interference with contract, and unfair and deceptive trade practices under N.C. Gen. Stat. § 75-1.1. Plaintiff timely filed the Notice of Designation ("NOD") on the same day.

3. Plaintiff contends that designation as a mandatory business case is proper under N.C. Gen. Stat. § 7A-45.4(a)(3) ("7A-45.4(a)(3)"), (NOD 1), which provides for designation of "an action that involves a material issue related to . . . [d]isputes involving antitrust law, including disputes arising under Chapter 75 of the General Statutes that do not arise solely under G.S. 75-1.1 or Article 2 of Chapter 75 of the General Statutes." Plaintiff does not seek to base designation on any provision of 7A-45.4(a) other than section 7A-45.4(a)(3).

4. In support of designation, Plaintiff argues that the factual allegations supporting its claims for tortious interference [*2] with contract and violation of Chapter 75 satisfy the requirements of section 7A-45.4(a)(3). Plaintiff's Chapter 75 claim, however, is brought solely under section 75-1.1 and Plaintiff does not reference, invoke, or otherwise seek recovery under any other provision of Chapter 75 in its Complaint. Nor does Plaintiff allege or contend that the current action involves consideration and application of federal or state antitrust law, other than section 75-1.1. As such, designation is improper because Plaintiff's Chapter 75 claim in this action arises solely under N.C. Gen. Stat. § 75-1.1, there has been no showing that the dispute otherwise involves antitrust law, and Plaintiff has not identified any other basis for designation of this action as a mandatory complex business case. See Market Am., Inc. v. Doyle, 15 CVS 9658, 2016 NCBC LEXIS 182, Order at 2, ECF No. 36.

5. Based on the foregoing, the Court determines that this action is not properly designated as a mandatory complex business case in accord with N.C. Gen. Stat. § 7A-45.4(a) and thus shall not be assigned to a Special Superior Court Judge for Complex Business Cases.

6. Consistent with the Determination Order, the Court hereby advises the Senior Resident Superior Court Judge of Judicial District 18 that this action is not properly designated as a [*3] mandatory complex business case so that the action may be treated as any other civil action, wherein designation as a Rule 2.1 exceptional case may be pursued with the Senior Resident Judge.

7. The Court's ruling is without prejudice to the right of any other party to seek designation of this matter as a mandatory complex business case as provided under section 7A-45.4.

SO ORDERED, this the 30th day of May, 2019.

[*897] MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

Certifications help consumers assess products. In the market for dental services, specialty boards issue certifications to dentists that meet certain criteria, and patients use those certifications to identify qualified dentists. Right [2] now, allegedly, the only organization issuing certifications to dentists in the United States that specialize in oral implantology is one of the defendants, the American Board of Oral Implantology. This board has in turn received a certification from another defendant, the American Board of Dental Specialties (a certifier of certifiers). The plaintiffs—two entities that also issue certifications—allege that the defendants' market stronghold violates both § 1 and § 2 of the Sherman Act. They add that the defendants have disparaged plaintiffs' goods in violation of the Illinois Uniform Deceptive Trade Practices Act. The defendants say that nothing is preventing the plaintiffs from issuing their own certifications, and there is nothing illegal about defendants' conduct. They move to dismiss the complaint in its entirety.

I. Legal Standards

A complaint must contain a short and plain statement that plausibly suggests a right to relief. Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 677-78, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009); Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2). In ruling on a motion to dismiss, although a court must accept all factual allegations as true and draw all reasonable inferences in the plaintiffs' favor, the court need not do the same for legal conclusions or "threadbare recitals" supported by only "conclusory [3] statements." Ashcroft, 556 U.S. at 678, 680-82. The plaintiff must provide "more than labels" or "a formulaic recitation of a cause of action's elements," Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007), and the complaint must "contain either direct or inferential allegations respecting all the material elements necessary to sustain recovery under some viable legal theory." Id. at 562. When the allegations involve complex litigation, a "fuller set of factual allegations may be necessary to show that relief is plausible." Tamayo v. Blagojevich, 526 F.3d 1074, 1083 (7th Cir. 2008).

II. Facts

People that need dental implants have imperfect information; they need a capable dentist but often lack the time and know-how to distinguish between a hack and a crackerjack. They might rely on someone else's opinion, especially if that someone is particularly skilled at telling the two apart. In the dentistry field, that someone could be a "specialty certifying board"; a group that issues certifications to dentists who meet certain criteria (and pay the required fee). See [1] ¶¶ 2-4.[1] The more that patients trust the specialty certifying board, the more dentists value their certifications. See id.

Ordinarily, specialty certifying boards would compete based on the quality of the information they provide. But state governments have regulated this [4] market by, among other things, restricting dentists' [*898] ability to advertise their certifications. [1] ¶¶ 3, 48. Many states prohibit advertising a dental certification unless it was issued by a specialty certifying board that has been approved by the American Dental Association. [1] ¶¶ 3, 11, 12, 48, 49.[2]

The defendants include three entities that have changed this regulatory landscape. [1] ¶ 63. The American Academy of Implant Dentistry is an Illinois corporation with its principle place of business in Suite 750B of a building in Chicago. [1] ¶ 31. The Academy provides continuing education and training opportunities to its members, hosts conferences, and publishes an industry newsletter. Id. The American Board of Dental Specialties is an Illinois corporation based in Suite 750C. [1] ¶ 29. Like the American Dental Association, the Board of Dental Specialties reviews and approves specialty boards that wish to issue certifications. [1] ¶ 29. Since its creation in 1967, it has only approved one board in the field of oral implantology: the American Board of Oral Implantology. [1] ¶¶ 30, 60.

[1] Bracketed numbers refer to entries on the district court docket.

[2] This is a simplification. See [1] ¶ 11. Historically, state dental boards delegated to the American Dental Association the power to "(i) determine which fields of dentistry qualify as specialties, and (ii) authorize specialty certifying boards to certify dentists as specialists within a given field." Id. The American Dental Association recognizes nine specialties, but oral implantology (the "field of dentistry dealing with the diafvgnosis, surgical placement, prosthetic reconstruction, and maintenance of dental implants," [1] ¶ 5) is not one of them. [1] ¶ 50.

The American Board of Oral Implantology is an Illinois corporation that issues certifications [5] to dentists that practice oral implantology (and provides other continuing education services). [1] ¶ 30. It is based in Suite 750. Id.[3]

These entities' efforts to change the status quo included lobbying and litigation. [1] ¶¶ 12, 63, 65. In New Jersey, the American Board of Dental Specialties petitioned the state's board of dentistry to relax its advertising restrictions. [1] ¶ 65. Elsewhere, the Academy filed a lawsuit alleging that Indiana violated the Sherman Act when it delegated regulatory authority to the American Dental Association. [1] ¶ 69. There are other examples, the earliest of which dates back to 2010. See [1] ¶¶ 63, 64, 70, 71. In the process, the defendants told state legislatures and courts that, if granted the authority to approve specialty certifying boards themselves, they would be neutral and impartial. [1] ¶¶ 14, 70, 72.

Defendants have also sought to influence public opinion. See [1] ¶ 73. During an interview, the Academy's general counsel (Frank Recker) said that the Board of Dental Specialties would "not consider competition, political decisions, or turf wars," and that its decisions would not be "made by a group of competitors who could be economically or politically [6] affected by their own decisions." [1] ¶ 73. Ronald Brown, the former secretary of the Board of Dental Specialties, wrote that "[i]t is hoped for that the [Board of Dental Specialties] will take over from the ADA with respect to emerging dental specialties." Id. ¶ 74.

Their efforts have partially paid off: in at least six states, dentists are not restricted to advertising only ADA-approved certifications. [1] ¶¶ 13, 75; see footnote 8 [*899] below. Until one of them—Ohio—finishes amending its rules, dentists there can only advertise their certifications if they were issued by specialty certifying boards approved by either the American Dental Association or the American Board of Dental Specialties. [40] at 13 n.5.

The plaintiffs are in the business of oral implantology certifications, too. See [1] ¶ 7. Similar to the Academy, plaintiff International Congress of Oral Implantologists provides continuing education services. [1] ¶ 7. It also issues certifications to oral implantologists. [1] ¶ 44. In 2017, it formed plaintiff United States Board of Implantology, which wants to be approved by the American Board of Dental Specialties as a specialty certifying board (like the American Board of Oral Implantology) [7] for dentists in the field of oral implantology. [1] ¶¶ 7, 45. It has designed its own rigorous process for determining whether an oral implantology specialist should receive a certification. [1] ¶ 46.

The United States Board of Oral Implantology set out to obtain that approval in early 2018. [1] ¶¶ 16, 87. It submitted an application to the American Board of Dental Specialties that, according to the complaint, satisfied all of the relevant criteria (and included the $7,500 filing fee). [1] ¶ 91. It heard back about a month later, when Cheryl Parker (the executive director of both the American Board of Dental Specialties and the Academy) replied in writing (copying Dr. Michael Mashni, president of the American Board of Dental Specialties) to say that they had "suspended applications pending a comprehensive update to the application form." [1] ¶ 92. She also returned the filing fee. Id.

The United States Board of Oral Implantology demanded that the American Board of Dental Specialties complete the revisions quickly, [1] ¶¶ 21, 92-98, 100-102, and even offered to assist with the finalization of the application, [1] ¶ 99, but the revised form did not arrive for eight months. [1] ¶ 103. When [8] it came, it included only minor changes to the substantive requirements of the original application, [1] ¶¶ 23, 88-89, 104, plus two procedural changes: (1) any new applications had to be submitted by February 1, 2019, and would not be considered until January of 2020, id. ¶¶ 24, 105, and (2) any appeals would be limited to procedural issues. Id. ¶¶ 25, 106. The defendants say the United States Board of Oral Implantology has not submitted a new application. [42] at 7.

The plaintiff's theory is that these actions harmed competition. They acknowledge that the defendants' lobbying and litigation efforts are protected, [1] ¶ 76, but say that the way they have exercised their authority shows it "was all a sham" meant to further "deceptive, anticompetitive, monopolistic behavior." [1] ¶ 77. They also allege that the defendants have constructively denied their application, and that the delay itself is harmful. See [1] ¶¶ 21, 84, 107;

[3] The Academy chartered the American Board of Oral Implantology in 1967, [1] ¶¶ 6, 31, which in turn (along with three other professional organizations) formed the American Board of Dental Specialties in 2013. [1] ¶ 55. The Board of Dental Specialties then approved one of its creators, the Board of Oral Implantology, as a certifier of dentists in the field of implantology. [1] ¶ 30.

[40] at 18-19.[4] Again, they allege that the intent was to protect the American Board of Oral Implantology's monopoly on certifying dentists as oral implantology specialists. See [1] ¶ 19. Without the approval of the American Board of Dental Specialties to issue [9] certifications, the United States Board of Oral Implantology will have trouble attracting customers because its certifications will not come with the usual benefits (e.g., the ability to advertise the certification, charge more for performing procedures, and receive reimbursements from insurance companies at increased rates). [1] ¶¶ 16, 26, 51, 110. And, [*900] as a result, the United States Board of Oral Implantology will lose membership dues, certification fees, and revenues associated with providing other professional services. Id. ¶ 111. This in turn will affect membership in the International Congress of Implantologists, because members of the United States Board of Oral Implantology must also be members of the International Congress of Implantologists. [1] ¶ 112.

Lastly, plaintiffs allege the defendants have made false and misleading representations of fact. [1] ¶ 128. According to the complaint, defendants told graduates of a renowned implantology institute that the United States Board of Oral Implantology would never be recognized as an organization capable of certifying oral implantology specialists. [1] ¶ 81. The American Board of Oral Implantology also published a newsletter in [10] which its president (Kevin O'Grady) said that the United States Board of Oral Implantology does not have "the experience, knowledge and history to administer a psychometrically and legally defensible examination." [1] ¶¶ 82, 128. O'Grady also allegedly urged members of the Academy to tell other dentists that the United States Board of Oral Implantology "is not a 'bona fide credential.'" Id.

All of this—the constructive denial of the application, the lobbying and litigation, the statements to the press, and the creation of a "front organization" (presumably, the American Board of Dental Specialties), combined with the fact that the defendants are attempting to redirect internet traffic to their website by including the term "ICOI" in their website metatags—are, according to the complaint, part of a conspiracy to restrain trade and maintain a monopoly in the market for oral implantology specialty certifications. See [1] ¶¶ 1-2, 5, 79.

Plaintiffs define the relevant markets as follows: "(i) the market for certifying dentists as oral implantology specialists, and (ii) the markets to provide professional services associated with such certifications (e.g., continuing education courses, journal [11] and other publication subscriptions, and conferences)." Id. ¶ 113. They allege that there are no effective or reasonable substitutes in either market, id. ¶ 114, and that the relevant geographic market is the United States. [1] ¶ 115.

III. Analysis

A. Ripeness

The claims are ripe. "A claim is unripe when critical elements are contingent or unknown." Marusic Liquors, Inc. v. Daley, 55 F.3d 258, 260 (7th Cir. 1995). Disputes over pending applications normally do not ripen until the application is denied. See Hendrix v. Poonai, 662 F.2d 719, 722 (11th Cir. 1981) (declining to address antitrust claims while doctor's application to be readmitted at a hospital was pending because the complaint asked the court to deliver an "opinion advising what the law would be upon a hypothetical state of facts"); *MD Pharmaceutical v. DEA, No. 95-1474, 95-1475, 1996 U.S. App. LEXIS 7263, 1996 WL 135318, at 1 (D.C. Cir. Feb. 2, 1996).

The allegations here are different. There is nothing pending; the application in question was returned without being approved. [1] ¶ 92. The defendants say this was not a denial of the application, see [34] at 15, but there is little difference between a denial and a declination to consider an application. And according to the complaint, it was all a ruse; their true intent was to permanently prevent the plaintiffs from entering the market. [1] ¶ 19; [40] at 18-19. The harm here includes the refusal to consider [12] the application, and that sets this case apart from those where the only [*901] alleged harm is the anticipated denial of the application.

The return of the application is harm enough. Even if the plaintiffs had immediately submitted a new application under the revised guidelines, and even if the defendants had granted that application, plaintiffs still would have suffered a two-year delay. [1] ¶ 87-89, 105. See also [1] ¶ 21 ("[d]elay meant more money for the [Academy] and [American Board of Oral Implantology], and always maintained the prospect that the [United States Board of Oral Implantology] would simply go away, with competition indefinitely foreclosed"). Delays can violate the Sherman Act. Broad. Music, Inc. v. Columbia Broad. Sys., Inc., 441 U.S. 1, 37, 99 S. Ct. 1551, 60 L. Ed. 2d 1 (1979). Defendants' promises to abide by their new deadlines are better than nothing, but they cannot use those promises (and the possibility that the plaintiffs reapply) to manufacture a "contingent future event[s] that may not occur as anticipated, or indeed may not occur at all." Texas v. United States, 523 U.S. 296, 300, 118 S. Ct. 1257, 140 L. Ed. 2d 406 (1998).

This case is also different than Clapper v. Amnesty Int'l USA, where there was only a "highly speculative fear" that respondents would be injured. 568 U.S. 398, 401, 410, 133 S. Ct. 1138, 185 L. Ed. 2d 264 (2013). See also Otrompke v. Hill, 592 Fed. App'x 495, 498 (7th Cir. 2014) (plaintiff lacked standing to challenge constitutionality of rules [13] governing admission to the Illinois bar when those rules were enacted after his original application had been denied, and when he declined to reapply). It is also not the harbinger that defendants make it out to be, see [42] at 8; deciding this dispute will have no bearing on standard application procedures. It will simply resolve whether defendants harmed competition when they prevented plaintiffs from entering the market. When "[t]he terms of the law are clear" and "their application straightforward," a claim is ordinarily ripe for decision. Marusic Liquors, Inc., 55 F.3d at 260. This case is no exception.

B. Section 1 of the Sherman Act

Section 1 of the Sherman Act declares illegal "[e]very contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States." 15 U.S.C. § 1. Since it takes two to conspire, agreements do not violate the act if they are between a parent and a wholly-owned subsidiary, Copperweld Corp. v. Indep. Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 759, 769-770, 104 S. Ct. 2731, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628 (1984), or between "affiliated corporate entities [that] have a complete unity of interest." D'Last Corp. v. Ugent, 863 F.Supp. 763, 768 (N.D. Ill. 1994), aff'd, 51 F.3d 275 (7th Cir. 1995). The deciding factor is whether the agreement results in the "sudden joining of two independent sources of economic power" that had been "previously pursuing separate interests." Copperweld, 467 U.S. at 770-71. "Substance, not [14] form" controls. Id. at 760. See also Am. Needle, Inc. v. Nat'l Football League, 560 U.S. 183, 195, 130 S. Ct. 2201, 176 L. Ed. 2d 947 (2010).

Defendants see a Copperweld problem, but only because they read the complaint too narrowly. See [34] at 17-18. There is no allegation that any one defendant is a wholly owned (or even partially owned) subsidiary of another. There is no explicit allegation that any of them share profits. Absent the alleged conspiracy, each would be independent decision makers pursuing related but distinct economic interests: the Academy's interests in obtaining new, dues-paying members would be distinct from the American Board of [*902] Dental Specialties interest in receiving new, fee-generating applications from hopeful specialty certifying boards, which would be distinct from the American Board of Oral Implantology's interest in receiving new, fee-generating applications from hopeful oral implantology specialists. See [40] at 26-27.[5] Insofar as the complaint alleges that they all operate "as a single enterprise with common actors and common goals," it alleges that the conspiracy is what unites them. See [1] ¶ 62.

[5] The complaint suggests, but does not quite allege, that in order to receive a certification from the American Board of Oral Implantology, dentists also must make payments to the Academy. See [1] ¶¶ 1, 4 (dentists seeking certifications "generally pay membership dues to their specialty certifying board and/or its sponsoring organization (such as the [Academy] or the [International Congress of Oral Implantologists])"). Assuming that is true, the Academy might have partially overlapping interests with the American Board of Oral Implantology (both the Academy and the American Board of Oral Implantology would receive

There is a snag, but not a determinative one. The complaint is so caught up with showing that collusion is happening that it neglects to describe a time when it was [15] not. That makes it hard to know whether the three defendants ever acted in accordance with their theoretically distinct economic interests. This problem is especially acute with the allegations against the American Board of Dental Specialties; the complaint makes it seem as though the sole reason for its formation was to further the already-existing conspiracy. See, e.g., [1] ¶ 1 (the American Board of Dental Specialties is a "front organization" meant to "ensure only that members of the [Academy] and [the American Board of Oral Implantology] could receive the coveted (and financially valuable) specialist certification"); [1] ¶ 8 (the American Board of Dental Specialties is a "shill organization," and "all along the intention was for it to be nothing more than an instrument of monopoly maintenance and destruction of competition") (emphasis added). See also [1] ¶ 31 (the Academy chartered the American Board of Dental Specialties "to act as its 'specialty certifying board branch'").

If true, there might be a Copperweld problem in alleging that the American Board of Dental Specialties conspired with anyone. But the complaint also contains facts that suggest the American Board of Dental [16] Specialties remains (or at least was, at some point) independent. See [1] ¶ 57 (the American Board of Dental Specialties website says that it is "an independent organization," and that such independence is necessary for the "objective evaluation and determination of specialty areas"). A complaint should not be dismissed just because it has an internal contradiction, Atkins v. City of Chicago, 631 F.3d 823, 832 (7th Cir. 2011), and drawing all reasonable inferences in the plaintiff's favor, Ashcroft, 556 U.S. at 680-82, the American Board of Dental Specialties was at some point independent enough to be considered separate for purposes of Copperweld. The conspiracy was possible.

But just because the conspiracy was possible does not mean it has been plausibly alleged. Conspiracies to restrain trade can be proven by either direct or circumstantial evidence. In re Text Messaging Antitrust Litig., 630 F.3d 622, 629 (7th Cir. 2010). The parties agree that there is no direct evidence here. See [40] at 20-21. Circumstantial evidence can be enough if it includes "a mixture of parallel [*903] behaviors, details of industry structure, and industry practices, that facilitate collusion." Id. at 627. Parallel behaviors include those which "would probably not result from chance, coincidence, independent responses to common stimuli, or mere interdependence unaided by an advance [17] understanding among the parties," and "conduct [that] indicates the sort of restricted freedom of action and sense of obligation that one generally associates with agreement." Id. (citing Bell, 550 U.S. at 557 n.4).

Plaintiffs' circumstantial case is thin. They cite two[6] instances of parallel conduct, neither of which is all that unusual. See [40] at 22. The first is the forming of the American Board of Dental Specialties. Id. Leaving aside the observation that this was an action taken by the American Board of Oral Implantology and three non-defendants, [1] ¶ 55, forming an independent entity to serve as a body that approves specialty certifying boards is not an action so unusual or indicative of restricted freedom that it gives rise to an inference of an anticompetitive agreement.[7]

The only other allegedly parallel, non-protected action was the constructive denial of the United State Board of Oral Implantology's application. [40] at 22. But the complaint does not allege facts that suggest the defendants conspired together to accomplish that result; the American Board of Dental Specialties (along with defendants Parker and Mashni, discussed below) acted unilaterally. See [1] ¶ 86-106. The complaint [18] says that their conduct "reveal[s] the hidden hands of [their] sponsors," [1] ¶ 107, but does not explain how or why. At most, one other application was denied without citation to a "legitimate, substantive" reason, [40] at 29 n.18, but without knowing the more money if more dentists applied for certifications from the American Board of Oral Implantology). But partial overlap is not enough—there must be "complete unity." D'Last, 863 F.Supp. at 768.

[6] The defendants engaged in parallel litigation and lobbying, but the complaint admits that such conduct is exempt under the Noerr-Pennington doctrine. See [1] ¶ 76; E. R. R. Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 81 S. Ct. 523, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464 (1961); United Mine Workers of Am. v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657, 85 S. Ct. 1585, 14 L. Ed. 2d 626 (1965).

[7] That is, after all, fairly similar to what the International Congress of Oral Implantologists did when it formed the United States Board of Oral Implantology to serve as a body that approves certification applications from dentists.

total number of applications, these two instances fail to raise the inference that the decisions were anything other than routine, independent decisions by the certifying entity.

The other allegations do not push the plaintiffs' theory from possible to plausible. Allegations about market share could be used to suggest a vertical conspiracy, but such allegations are more compelling in the horizontal-agreement context (when they are necessary to show the conspiracy could have been effective). In the context of a vertical agreement, the fact that the American Board of Oral Implantology has a 100% market share is at most consistent with the inference the plaintiffs seek to raise, rather than a necessary precondition; the defendants are in theory depending on the American Board of Dental Specialties to perpetuate the monopoly, so the fact that the American Board of Oral Implantology has power is beside the point. Nor is the market naturally [19] "ripe for collusion," at least not for the reason the plaintiffs say it is. The complaint does not explain in what way the American Board of Dental Specialties needed either the Academy or the American Board of Oral Implantology to restrict access to the relevant market. See [40] at 23. If there was a profit-sharing arrangement, the American Board of Dental Specialties might need the [*904] American Board of Oral Implantology or the Academy to pass along the money it received from its applicants and members, respectively, but there is no such allegation. Nothing else about the market for certifications suggests it is uniquely suited to collusion (other than, perhaps, the fact that there are only a few entities—the ADA and the American Board of Dental Specialties—that are empowered to approve the boards that issue the certifications).

The defendants did make public statements critical of the United States Board of Oral Implantology, but those statements do not "endorse[] an industry strategy to reduce ... output," or otherwise plausibly suggest concerted efforts to restrain trade. Standard Iron Works v. ArcelorMittal, 639 F.Supp.2d 877, 897 (N.D. Ill. 2009). They simply reflect the belief that the United States Board of Oral Implantology's product was inferior. And [20] even if the defendants had the opportunity to collude because they shared office space, [40] at 23-24, those allegations are less compelling in the context of a vertical conspiracy when there are plenty of "legitimate reasons to exchange information." See Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 762, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775 (1984). Taken together and as a whole, the allegations in the complaint fall short of plausibly suggesting a conspiracy.

For some of the defendants, the complaint is silent about their role in a conspiracy. Lozada is the vice president of the American Board of Oral Implantology, and has held positions at the Academy and American Board of Dental Specialties as well. [1] ¶ 36. Gowey is the director of the American Board of Oral Implantology and the secretary of the American Board of Dental Specialties. [1] ¶ 35. Together, the complaint alleges that they "directed" the conduct of the defendants, [1] ¶¶ 33-37, an accusation made somewhat more believable by the fact that they all shared office space. But that is it, and that is not enough. O'Grady is the president of the American Board of Oral Implantology (and a former president of both the Academy and the American Board of Dental Specialties). [1] ¶ 34. To the degree the complaint alleges that [21] he was involved in the conspiracy, it ties his liability to the allegedly derogatory remarks he made in a summer newsletter. See [40] at 25; [1] ¶ 82. That, too, falls short of plausibly alleging that he conspired to violate the Sherman Act.

The complaint does not fare much better with the other individual defendants. First, directors of an organization cannot conspire with their organization—that is covered by Copperweld, 467 U.S. at 769 ("officers or employees of the same firm do not provide the plurality of actors imperative for a § 1 conspiracy")—so Cherly Parker did not conspire with either the American Board of Dental Specialties or the Academy because she is a director of both. [1] ¶ 33. And Dr. Mashni did not conspire with the American Board of Dental Specialties because he is its president. [1] ¶ 37. At most, the complaint alleges that Parker participated in the denial of the United States Board of Implantology's application because she favored the Academy's interests over the American Board of Dental Specialties' interests. But a preference is not a suggestion of an agreement and is at most consistent with a conspiracy. See, e.g. Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678 ("[w]here a complaint pleads facts that are merely consistent with a defendant's [22] liability, it stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility of entitlement to relief"); Standard Iron Works, 639 F.Supp.2d at 900 ("[w]hile the complaint need not contain detailed 'defendant by defendant' allegations, it 'must allege that each individual [*905] defendant joined the conspiracy and played some role in it because, at the heart of an antitrust conspiracy is an agreement and a conscious decision by each defendant to join it'").

The Academy's alleged involvement is also minimal. It chartered the American Board of Oral Implantology in 1967, [1] ¶ 6, and almost fifty years later, engaged in protected lobbying and litigation. [1] ¶¶ 13, 70. "Generally," dentists have to make payments to both the specialty certifying board (the American Board of Oral Implantology) "and/or" its sponsoring organization (the Academy) in order to receive a certification, see [1] ¶¶ 1, 4, so the Academy may have had a motive for preserving the market share of the American Board of Oral Implantology. And it shared office space with the other defendants, so it had an opportunity. But nothing it did suggests an agreement to restrict competition; it was all either protected activity or innocuous and consistent with competitive instinct. [23] In re Text Messaging Antitrust Litig., 630 F.3d at 629.

The allegations against the American Board of Oral Implantology are similarly modest. Allegedly, it has a monopoly in the market for oral implantology certifications. See [1] ¶ 5; [40] at 23. But it has that monopoly as a result of actions taken by a different entity (the American Board of Dental Specialties), and the complaint does not allege facts suggesting even basic details about the terms of an agreement the two might have shared. The complaint does allege that the American Board of Oral Implantology acted as "puppet-master" while pulling strings at the American Board of Dental Specialties, [1] ¶ 19, but neglects to include facts that elaborate on what, exactly, that means. It also shares office space with the other defendants and has overlapping leadership, [1] ¶ 62 (a)—(b), and one might imagine that its leaders sat down and agreed to restrict competition. But none of the Board of Oral Implantology's members played any role in the denial of the plaintiff board's application; Parker and Dr. Mashni are directors at the Academy and the American Board of Dental Specialties—not the American Board of Oral Implantology. [1] ¶¶ 33, 37. Again, their involvement in the conspiracy has [24] not been plausibly alleged.

The allegations against the American Board of Dental Specialties are more detailed, but they also depict unilateral rather than parallel activity. According to the complaint, the American Board of Dental Specialties duped states into believing it would operate neutrally but then exercised its discretion to protect the American Board of Oral Implantologists' monopoly. See [1] ¶¶ 8, 30, 60 (the only specialty certifying boards that the American Board of Dental Specialties has ever approved are the four boards that helped found it). The American Board of Dental Specialties was also the only entity directly involved in the pretextual, constructive denial of the United States Board of Oral Implantology's application. [1] ¶ 107. As far as cooperation, the complaint again alleges that it met and conspired with other entity defendants behind closed doors in Suite 750 of a building in Chicago, and that it was particularly easy to do so because the defendants have overlapping leadership. [1] ¶ 62 (a)—(b). Cooperation was possible but not plausible.

Even if the complaint had sufficiently alleged a conspiracy, it does not allege a cognizable restraint on trade. "There [25] can be no restraint of trade without a restraint." Schachar v. Am. Acad. of Ophthalmology, Inc., 870 F.2d 397, 397 (7th Cir. 1989). Similarly, "'when a trade association provides information' (by giving its approval in that case, its disapproval in this case) 'but does not constrain [*906] others to follow its recommendations, it does not violate the antitrust laws.'" Lawline v. Am. Bar Ass'n, 956 F.2d 1378, 1383 (7th Cir. 1992); Greater Rockford Energy & Tech. Corp. v. Shell Oil Co., 998 F.2d 391, 396 (7th Cir. 1993) ("the failure of a private, standard-setting body to certify a product is not, by itself, a violation of § 1" of the Sherman Act); *Patel v. American Bd. of Psychiatry & Neurology, Inc., No. 89 C 1751, 1989 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14011, 1989 WL 152816, at 3 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 20, 1989); Consol. Metal Prod., Inc. v. Am. Petroleum Inst., 846 F.2d 284, 292 (5th Cir. 1988) ("a trade association that evaluates products and issues opinions, without constraining others to follow its recommendations, does not per se violate section 1 when, for whatever reason, it fails to evaluate a product favorably to the manufacturer"). "This is so even where the organization at issue has a towering reputation." Lawline, 956 F.2d at 1384. See also Republic Tobacco Co. v. N. Atl. Trading Co., 381 F.3d 717, 736 (7th Cir. 2004) ("vertical exclusive distributorships ... are presumptively legal").

The market and product alleged here make this like other cases involving professional-association endorsements. See Schachar, 870 F.2d at 397; Lawline, 956 F.2d at 1384. If the certifying entity lacks the power to prevent (or has not prevented) the professional from practicing without a certification, there has been no antitrust violation. Here, plaintiffs represent a type of rival certifier suing the group that issues a certification [26] that plaintiffs would like to have. But the defendants have not prevented any dentists from practicing implantology and they have not prevented plaintiffs from issuing their own certifications. And they lack the authority to prevent dentists from advertising those certifications once they are issued.

The lack of restraint is apparent. According to the complaint, in forty-four states, dentists cannot advertise any certifications, and in six, dentists can advertise certifications that are backed by specialty certifying boards approved by the American Board of Dental Specialties. [1] ¶ 75. Absent is an allegation that dentists in those six states cannot also advertise certifications issued by the United States Board of Oral Implantology.[8] At most, in Ohio, there are restraints on advertising certifications issued by plaintiffs that do not apply equally to certifications issued by defendants (and, apparently, those restrictions are temporary). See [34] at 23. But even then, the culprit is the Ohio state government, not the defendants.

There are no other restraints occurring in the markets set out in the complaint. The plaintiffs say that the restraints are occurring in "(i) the market for [27] certifying dentists as oral implantology specialists, and (ii) the markets to provide professional services associated with such certifications (e.g., continuing education courses, journal and other publication subscriptions, and conferences)." [1] ¶ 113. But they have failed to allege any restraint that prevents them from certifying dentists as oral implantology specialists and providing related professional services. Trade in that market occurs when dentists pay application fees to specialty certifying boards, and specialty certifying boards consider the dentists' credentials and, if justified, issue the certification. The defendants cannot prevent (and have not prevented, judging from the allegations in the complaint) dentists from paying an application fee to the [*907] United States Board of Oral Implantology in return for one of its certifications.

The American Board of Dental Specialties has the power to place (or decline to place) its seal of approval on a specialty certifying board. So if the defendants have restrained trade, they have done so in a different market: that for issuing certifications that are backed by the American Board of Dental Specialties. The problem is that "[p]roduct [28] markets are not defined in terms of one trademark or another." Generac Corp. v. Caterpillar Inc., 172 F.3d 971, 977 (7th Cir. 1999). For the same reason, the product market cannot be defined here in terms of the backing of the American Board of Dental Specialties.

The plaintiff's alleged harms derive from the defendants' "towering reputation," another give-away that this is not an antitrust violation. Lawline, 956 F.2d at 1384. The theory is that dentists will not value the plaintiffs' certifications if they are not backed by the American Board of Dental Specialties, and that this will cause the American Board of Oral Implantology to lose members (which will in turn cause the International Congress of Implantologists to lose members, too). [1] ¶¶ 111, 112. But that is just another way to say that the source of the harm is the American Board of Dental Specialties' reputation, and that is not enough. The § 1 claims are dismissed.

C. Section 2 of the Sherman Act

Section 2 of the Sherman Act prohibits monopolization. 15 U.S.C. § 2. There are two elements to a claim under § 2: "(1) the possession of monopoly power in the relevant market and (2) the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident." [29] United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 570-71, 86 S. Ct. 1698, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778 (1966). When the plaintiff is a private party, it must also show that "the monopolization caused 'injur[y].'" Comcast Corp. v. Behrend, 569 U.S. 27, 43, 133 S. Ct. 1426, 185 L. Ed. 2d 515 (2013).

The complaint alleges that all of the defendants violated § 2 of the Sherman Act, but only identifies one that has monopoly power: the American Board of Oral Implantology. See [40] at 22-23. The implication, albeit it one not explicit in the complaint, is that the remaining defendants conspired to monopolize the market for certifying dentists as oral implantology specialists. See [1] ¶¶ 123-126. But the complaint adds no facts related to the conspiracy that are specific to the monopolization claim, see id., and fails to adequately allege a conspiracy under § 1, see above, so the complaint fails to allege facts that make it plausible that defendants conspired to monopolize the relevant market or willfully engaged in anticompetitive conduct. The § 2 claims against the defendants, other than the Board of Oral Implantology and Board of Dental Specialties, are dismissed. Even if the American Board of Dental Specialties did not possess monopoly power in the relevant market, they were at least in a position to help the American Board of Oral Implantology obtain it, so it is possible they combined [30] or conspired to monopolize.

[8] The motion to dismiss cites state statutes, federal case law and other administrative rules showing that, in at least five of those remaining states, dentists can advertise certifications from the United States Board of Oral Implantology as freely as they can advertise certifications by the American Board of Oral Implantology. [34] at 23.

The parties agree that the plaintiffs must adequately allege a restraint applicable to the "relevant market." Republic Tobacco Co., 381 F.3d at 738. The relevant market consists of both "a product and a geographic dimension," id., and is "comprised of those 'commodities reasonably interchangeable by consumers for the same purposes.'" Fishman v. Estate of Wirtz, 807 F.2d 520, 531 (7th Cir. 1986). [*908] See also Queen City Pizza, Inc. v. Domino's Pizza, Inc., 124 F.3d 430, 436 (3d Cir. 1997) ("[w]here the plaintiff fails to define its proposed relevant market with reference to the rule of reasonable interchangeability and cross-elasticity of demand, or alleges a proposed relevant market that clearly does not encompass all interchangeable substitute products even when all factual inferences are granted in plaintiff's favor, the relevant market is legally insufficient and a motion to dismiss may be granted").

Plaintiffs have adequately alleged that sellers in the market for certifying dentists as oral implantology specialists reach consumers across the United States. Each individual state may restrict the ability to advertise those certifications, [34] at 26, but the certifications have value beyond the dentists' ability to advertise them (for instance, dentists can charge more if they have certain certifications, [40] at 33). The certifications [31] are not geographically limited, either (i.e., they indicate to consumers that the recipient has qualifications that are valuable in any state). See [40] at 32. Their relevant geographic market is the United States.

But there is no plausible market power in an appropriate product market. "If rivals may design and offer a similar package for a similar cost, there is no barrier, and without a barrier there is no market power." Will v. Comprehensive Accounting Corp., 776 F.2d 665, 672 (7th Cir. 1985). "[T]he power to control a given market's total output" is "a necessary prerequisite to obtaining power over price or monopoly power," and if there is no power to control output, "it matters little that high barriers to entry might exist to help that firm maintain monopoly power it could never achieve." Indiana Grocery, Inc. v. Super Valu Stores, Inc., 864 F.2d 1409, 1415 (7th Cir. 1989). But at least in the "market for certifying dentists as oral implantology specialists,"[9] there is nothing preventing the plaintiffs from designing and offering a similar certification, in part because the plaintiffs have not alleged that there is anything enabling the defendants to limit the market's total output.

The complaint fails to allege monopoly power in the second market for similar (and additional) reasons. The second market is derivative of the [32] first, see [1] ¶ 113 (the "markets to provide professional services associated with such certifications (e.g., continuing education courses, journal and other publication subscriptions, and conferences)"), so if there is no market power in the first market, there is none in the second market, either. It is also too vague to satisfy even the more modest pleading standards for non-conspiracy claims; it identifies at least four examples of products that might be sold in that market, and acknowledges the list is incomplete. Hooper v. Proctor Health Care Inc., 804 F.3d 846, 851 (7th Cir. 2015) (the plaintiff must plead "sufficient facts to put [the defendant] on notice of his claim"); [*909] Republic Tobacco Co., 381 F.3d at 738 (the plaintiff must "precisely establish a relevant market"). Further, the complaint also alleges that other entities (notably, the American Dental [9] The defendants might have limited output in "the market for certifications issued by specialty certifying boards that were approved by the American Board of Dental Specialties." But that is not the market alleged in the complaint. And again, "[p]roduct markets are not defined in terms of one trademark or another." Generac Corp., 172 F.3d at 977. See also Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp. v. F.T.C., 652 F.2d 1324, 1330 (7th Cir. 1981) ("well-defined submarkets may exist which, in themselves, constitute product markets for antitrust purposes," but the "boundaries of such a submarket may be determined by examining such practical indicia as industry or public recognition of the submarket as a separate economic entity, the product's peculiar characteristics and uses, unique production facilities, distinct customers, distinct prices, sensitivity to price changes, and specialized vendors").

Association and the International Congress of Oral Implantology) are currently providing such professional services, and there is no allegation that any defendant has monopoly power in that market.

The complaint also does not allege any anticompetitive conduct. "Antitrust law does not compel your competitor to praise your product or sponsor your work," Schachar, 870 F.2d at 399 (7th Cir. 1989), and even false statements do not amount to anticompetitive conduct because [33] they do not curtail output—they just "set the stage for competition in a different venue: the advertising market." Sanderson v. Culligan Int'l Co., 415 F.3d 620, 623 (7th Cir. 2005). None of the defendants' alleged statements suffice as anticompetitive conduct, see, e.g., [1] ¶¶ 13-14, 63-77, 81-83, even when taken in combination with the alleged power that the American Board of Dental Specialties has to approve specialty certifying boards. Sanderson, 415 F.3d at 624 ("[c]ommercial speech is not actionable under the antitrust laws"). With regards to the denial of the application, the defendants were free to decline to deal with the plaintiffs. See United States v. Colgate & Co., 250 U.S. 300, 307, 39 S. Ct. 465, 63 L. Ed. 992, 1919 Dec. Comm'r Pat. 460 (1919). Plaintiffs' § 2 claim is dismissed.

D. The Illinois Uniform Deceptive Trade Practices Act

Diversity jurisdiction exists over plaintiffs' state-law claim. The plaintiffs are citizens of New Jersey and Washington D.C., and the defendants are citizens of Illinois, Ohio, Wisconsin and California. [1] ¶¶ 27-38; 28 U.S.C. § 1332.[10]

Under Illinois law, "[a] person engages in a deceptive trade practice when, in the course of his or her business, vocation, or occupation, the person: (8) disparages the goods, services, or business of another by false or misleading representation of fact." 815 Ill. Comp. Stat. Ann. 510/2. Neither party disputes that this claim sounds in fraud and must be [34] alleged with particularity. Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b); Borsellino v. Goldman Sachs Grp., Inc., 477 F.3d 502, 506-07 (7th Cir. 2007); [34] at 33; [40] at 40. That is, the complaint must allege "the identity of the person making the misrepresentation, the time, place, and content of the misrepresentation, and the method by which the misrepresentation was communicated to the plaintiff." *Uni*Quality, Inc. v. Infotronx, Inc., 974 F.2d 918, 923 (7th Cir. 1992)*.

The misrepresentation must be sufficiently tied to Illinois. In order to [*910] state a claim under a similar act (the Illinois Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Practices Act, 815 Ill. Comp. Stat. Ann. 505/1 et seq.), a plaintiff must allege that the statements in question occurred "primarily and substantially in Illinois." Avery v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 216 Ill.2d 100, 187, 835 N.E.2d 801, 296 Ill. Dec. 448 (2005) ("there is no single formula or bright-line test for determining whether a transaction occurs within this state" under 815 Ill. Comp. Stat. Ann. 505/1 et seq.).[11] Illinois courts have considered "the place where a company policy is created or where a form document is drafted" to be relevant to whether a statement or transaction occurred "primarily and substantially in Illinois." Avery, 216 Ill. 2d at 187. They have also found relevant the location "where the injury or deception took place." Int'l Profit Assocs. v. Linus Alarm Corp., 2012 IL App (2d) 110958, ¶ 11, 971 N.E.2d 1183, 361 Ill. Dec. 661. See also Specht v. Google, Inc., 660 F.Supp.2d 858, 866 (N.D. Ill. 2009) ("[c]ourts consider several factors to determine whether a transaction occurred 'primarily and substantially' in Illinois, bringing a claim under the ambit of the [Illinois Uniform Deceptive [35] Trade Practices Act], including: (1) the plaintiff's residence, (2) where the misrepresentation was made, (3) where the damage to the plaintiff occurred, and (4) whether the plaintiff communicated with the defendant in Illinois"); *Shaw v. Hyatt Int'l Corp., No. 05 C 5022, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28250, 2005 WL 3088438, at 2 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 15, 2005), aff'd, 461 F.3d 899 (7th Cir. 2006). In addition, a claim will lie "when the quality of [one's] goods or services is attacked," Allcare, Inc. v. Bork, 176 Ill.App.3d 993, 1000, 531 N.E.2d 1033, 126 Ill. Dec. 406 (1st Dist. 1988), but not when the statement was an "expression[s] of opinion." Soderlund Bros. v. Carrier Corp., 278 Ill.App.3d 606, 620, 663 N.E.2d 1, 215 Ill. Dec. 251 (1st Dist. 1995) ("[m]atters of fact are distinguishable from expressions of opinion").

[10] The complaint also lists fifty unnamed Doe defendants "whose identities and roles will be developed through discovery and Plaintiffs' independent investigations." [1] ¶ 38. Normally, "'John Doe' defendants are not permitted in federal diversity suits" because "the existence of diversity jurisdiction cannot be determined without knowledge of every defendant's place of citizenship." Howell by Goerdt v. Tribune Entm't Co., 106 F.3d 215, 218 (7th Cir. 1997). But "[a]n exception applies when the John Does are nominal parties—nothing more than placeholders 'in the event that during discovery [the plaintiff] identifie[s] any additional defendants he wishe[s] to add to the suit." Pain Ctr. of SE Indiana LLC v. Origin Healthcare Sols. LLC, 893 F.3d 454, 459 (7th Cir. 2018) (citing Moore v. Gen. Motors Pension Plans, 91 F.3d 848, 850 (7th Cir. 1996)) ("[t]he 150 John Does are mere placeholders, so we can safely ignore them for purposes of diversity jurisdiction"). The Doe defendants in the complaint are "mere placeholders," so "jurisdiction is secure." Id.

[11] Other courts have applied this rule to the Illinois Uniform Deceptive Trade Practices Act. See, e.g., *Underground Solutions, Inc. v. Palermo, No. 13 C 8407, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 132441, 2014 WL 4703925, at 10 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 22, 2014); *Purepecha Enters. v. El Matador Spices & Dry Chiles, No. 11 C 2569, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 120499, 2012 WL 3686776, at 15 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 24, 2012); *Maui Jim, Inc. v. SmartBuy Guru Enters., No. 1:16 CV 9788, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10093, 2018 WL 509960, at 5 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 23, 2018) ("[a]lthough the [U]DTPA does not contain text expressly confining its application to events or circumstances arising in Illinois, there is a 'long-standing rule of construction in Illinois which holds that a 'statute is without extraterritorial effect unless a clear intent in this respect appears from the express provisions of the statute'").

The complaint alleges that all defendants violated the Illinois Uniform Deceptive Trade Practices Act, but cites only a few statements, leaving most of the defendants out of the claim entirely. [1] ¶¶ 127-130. First, the complaint alleges that the American Board of Oral Implantology published a newsletter in which O'Grady was quoted as saying that the United States Board of Oral Implantology does not have the "experience, knowledge and history to administer a psychometrically and legally defensible examination." [1] ¶ 82. In the same newsletter, O'Grady said that the American Board of Oral Implantology is the "only bona fide credential in implantology." Id. Those statements [36] are specific enough under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 9(b); the allegation includes "the identity of the person making the misrepresentation" (O'Grady and the American Board of Oral Implantology), the time, place, and content of the misrepresentation" (a summer, 2018 newsletter) and "the method by which the misrepresentation was communicated to the plaintiff" (publication). *Uni*Quality, Inc., 974 F.2d at 923*. The statements were phrased [*911] conclusively and without reference to probabilities or the possibility that O'Grady was incorrect; they were not phrased as opinions. And while a statement must be disparaging of the quality of a plaintiffs' goods, Allcare, Inc., 176 Ill.App.3d at 999, here, the goods in question are in part derivative of the plaintiffs' reputation, so it is enough to allege that the statements disparaged the plaintiffs themselves.

But the complaint does not adequately allege that this statement occurred "primarily and substantially" in Illinois. True, the American Board of Oral Implantology is an Illinois corporation with its headquarters in Chicago, [1] ¶¶ 30, 60, and the location where a document is drafted is relevant. O'Grady resides in Ohio and serves as president of the American Board of Oral Implantology. [1] ¶ 34. But the complaint does not allege where [37] the newsletter was published, or whether its readers were located "primarily and substantially" in Illinois. [1] ¶ 82. That makes it too speculative to infer where the damage (and where the misrepresentation) actually occurred.

Second, the complaint alleges that the "defendants" told graduates of Misch Institute that "the USBOI will never be recognized as an organization capable of certifying oral implantology specialists." [1] ¶ 81. This allegation is not particular enough; it does not allege who said it or where they were located at the time. *Uni*Quality, Inc., 974 F.2d at 923*. The complaint also fails to allege that this statement was made "primarily and substantially in Illinois." Avery. 216 Ill.2d at 187.

The complaint also alleges that there were "myriad other [statements] made by all defendants, including, on information and belief, the Doe Defendants." [1] ¶ 130. But these allegations are insufficient to meet the pleading requirements under Rule 9(b), and they also fail to allege that they were made primarily and substantially in Illinois. The complaint does not identify any other statements[12] particularly enough to survive the motion to dismiss, either; that count of the complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

[12] Plaintiffs attached to their opposition an email that the Academy sent to its members saying it was the "only organization that serves implant dentists." [40-5] at 2. But even if misleading, the statement is not disparaging to the plaintiffs' goods or services; it does not even mention them. See 815 Ill. Comp. Stat. Ann. 510/2.

IV. Conclusion

Defendants' [38] motion to dismiss is granted. All dismissals are without prejudice. See Runnion ex rel. Runnion v. Girl Scouts of Greater Chicago & Nw. Indiana, 786 F.3d 510, 519 (7th Cir. 2015). A status hearing is set for June 28, 2019, at 9:30 a.m.

ORDER GRANTING GBS INSURANCE & FINANCIAL SERVICES INC.'S MOTION TO DISMISS [Dkt. 11] AND GRANTING IN SUBSTANTIAL PART JACKSON NATIONAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY'S MOTION TO DISMISS [Dkt. 12]

I. INTRODUCTION

This action arises out of Defendant Jackson National Life Insurance Company's denial of Plaintiff Lisa Richardson Schertz's life insurance claim under the policy of her late husband, Thomas E. Schertz. On January 14, 2019, Plaintiff Schertz filed this action in Los Angeles County Superior Court against Defendants Jackson National Life

Insurance Company ("Jackson"), GBS Insurance & Financial Services Inc., formerly known as Flynn Associates ("GBS"), and Does 1 through 50, inclusive. (Dkt. 1-1 [Complaint]; [*2] see Dkt. 9 [Operative First Amended Complaint, hereinafter "FAC"].) On March 15, 2019, Defendants removed the action to this Court pursuant to diversity jurisdiction. (Dkt. 1 [Notice of Removal].) Before the Court are Defendants GBS and Jackson's separate motions to dismiss Plaintiff's First Amended Complaint. (Dkts. 11, 12.) For the following reasons, GBS's motion is GRANTED, and Jackson's motion is GRANTED IN SUBSTANTIAL PART.[1]

II. BACKGROUND

Plaintiff's late husband, Thomas E. Schertz, purchased a $500,000 life insurance policy (hereinafter "the Policy") from Valley Forge Life Insurance Company ("Valley Forge") on November 9, 1999. (FAC ¶ 12.) The Policy named Plaintiff Schertz as the sole beneficiary and was set to expire on November 1, 2042. (See id. ¶¶ 12, 15, 18.) On November 12, 1999, GBS's predecessor, Flynn Associates, "stamped and processed" the Policy. (Id. ¶ 16.) In September 2012, Jackson became the insurer of the Policy as a result of acquiring Valley Forge. (Id. ¶¶ 20, 22.) On July 19, 2013, Jackson sent Mr. Schertz a letter informing him that it had acquired the Policy. (Id. ¶ 23.) Jackson's letter allegedly "assured" Mr. Schertz that its acquisition "in no way alter[ed] [*3] the terms and conditions" of the Policy. (Id. ¶ 24.)

Some time in 2016, Jackson sent a letter to Mr. Schertz stating that the Policy had lapsed on March 3, 2016. (Id. ¶¶ 25-26.) Mr. Schertz then made "immediate" efforts to reinstate the Policy. (Id. ¶ 32.) He submitted a reinstatement application, which Jackson approved on July 13, 2016. (Id. ¶ 34.) Once Mr. Schertz paid the past-due premiums, Jackson returned the Policy to active status as of August 17, 2016. (Id.)

Mr. Schertz passed away on February 11, 2017, due to myocardial infarction, stroke, and hypertension. (Id. ¶ 36.) Plaintiff, as the Policy's sole beneficiary, timely filed a claim for the Policy's face value of $500,000. (Id.) On March 3, 2017, Jackson informed her that it would conduct a post-death investigation and review because Mr. Schertz's death occurred within two years of the Policy's reinstatement. (Id. ¶ 37.) On July 24, 2017, Jackson denied Plaintiff's claim. (Id. ¶ 39.) It explained that Mr. Schertz had failed to disclose certain health problems that would have caused Jackson to deny Mr. Schertz's application for reinstatement. (Id. ¶ 38.)

Plaintiff filed the instant action on January 14, 2019. She contends that [*4] Defendants were engaged in an "illicit scheme" to sell life insurance contracts to customers and then "knowingly deprive their heirs and beneficiaries of the proceeds from those contracts." (Id. ¶ 7.) In her capacity as personal representative for The Estate of Thomas E. Schertz[2] and as successor-in-interest to the decedent, she asserts claims for (1) financial elder abuse, (2) unfair business practices, (3) breach of contract, (4) breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, (5) negligent misrepresentation, and (6 & 7) violations of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act ("RICO"). She brings claims three and four against Jackson only. Both Defendants move to dismiss the claims against them pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6). (Dkts. 11, 12.)

III. LEGAL STANDARD

A motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6) tests the legal sufficiency of the claims asserted in the complaint. The issue on a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim is not whether the claimant will ultimately prevail, but

[1] Having read and considered the papers presented by the parties, the Court finds this matter appropriate for disposition without a hearing. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 78; Local Rule 7-15. Accordingly, the hearing set for June 3, 2019, at 1:30 p.m. is hereby vacated and off calendar.

[2] Jackson contends that The Estate of Thomas E. Schertz is not a proper party to this action. While The Estate of Thomas E. Schertz is listed on the caption page of the First Amended Complaint, Plaintiff does not name it as a party on any of the seven causes of action.

whether the claimant is entitled to offer evidence to support the claims asserted. Gilligan v. Jamco Dev. Corp., 108 F.3d 246, 249 (9th Cir. 1997). Rule 12(b)(6) is read in conjunction with Rule 8(a), which requires only a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is [*5] entitled to relief. Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2). When evaluating a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, the district court must accept all material allegations in the complaint as true and construe them in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party. Moyo v. Gomez, 32 F.3d 1382, 1384 (9th Cir. 1994). The district court may also consider additional facts in materials that the district court may take judicial notice, Barron v. Reich, 13 F.3d 1370, 1377 (9th Cir. 1994), as well as "documents whose contents are alleged in a complaint and whose authenticity no party questions, but which are not physically attached to the pleading," Branch v. Tunnell, 14 F.3d 449, 454 (9th Cir. 1994), overruled in part on other grounds by Galbraith v. Cty. of Santa Clara, 307 F.3d 1119 (9th Cir. 2002).

However, "the tenet that a court must accept as true all of the allegations contained in a complaint is inapplicable to legal conclusions." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009); see also Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007) (stating that while a complaint attacked by a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss does not need detailed factual allegations, courts "are not bound to accept as true a legal conclusion couched as a factual allegation" (citations and quotes omitted)). Dismissal of a complaint for failure to state a claim is not proper where a plaintiff has alleged "enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570. In keeping with this liberal pleading standard, the district court should grant the plaintiff leave to amend if the [*6] complaint can possibly be cured by additional factual allegations. Doe v. United States, 58 F.3d 494, 497 (9th Cir. 1995).

In federal court, a plaintiff alleging fraud must also "state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud or mistake." Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b); see Kearns v. Ford Motor Co., 567 F.3d 1120, 1145 (9th Cir. 2009); UMG Recordings, Inc. v. Glob. Eagle Entm't, 117 F. Supp. 3d 1092, 1106 (C.D. Cal. 2015). Under Rule 9(b), the plaintiff must set forth the "who, what, when, where, and how" of the alleged fraud. Vess v. Ciba-Geigy Corp. USA, 317 F.3d 1097, 1106 (9th Cir. 2003). When an artificial entity is the alleged perpetrator of the fraud, the plaintiff must "allege the names of the persons who made the allegedly fraudulent representations, their authority to speak, to whom they spoke, what they said or wrote, and when it was said or written." UMG Recordings, 117 F. Supp. 3d at 1107.

IV. DISCUSSION

Financial Elder Abuse (Claim 1)

Plaintiff brings her first claim for financial elder abuse against both Defendants. The California Elder Abuse and Dependent Adult Civil Protection Act, Cal. Welf. & Inst. Code § 15600 et seq., was enacted to "encourage private, civil enforcement of laws against elder abuse and neglect." Negrete v. Fid. & Guar. Life Ins. Co., 444 F. Supp. 2d 998, 1001 (C.D. Cal. 2006). To qualify as an "elder" under the Act, an individual must be "65 years of age or older." Cal. Welf. & Inst. Code § 15610.27. An entity commits elder abuse when it "takes, secretes, appropriates, or retains real or personal property of an elder . . . for a wrongful use or with intent to defraud." See id. § 15610.30(a)(1). Any person or entity who assists in such conduct [*7] may also be held liable. Id. § 15610.30(a)(2). Plaintiff alleges that Defendants committed elder abuse by creating "an illicit scheme to make policy holders update their medical information even if there was a brief lapse in the policy as a condition of reinstatement." (FAC ¶ 45.)

Plaintiff has failed to state a plausible claim for financial elder abuse against either Defendant. Because this claim sounds in fraud, it must meet the heightened pleading standards of Rule 9(b). See *Bertolina v. Wachovia Mortg., FSB, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 87937, 2011 WL 3473527, at 11 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 9, 2011) (applying Rule 9(b) when "the gravamen of an alleged Elder Abuse Act violation is fraud"). The only allegations Plaintiff makes as to GBS are that its predecessor, Flynn Associates, stamped and processed Mr. Schertz's Policy on November 12, 1999. (FAC ¶ 16.) Although Mr. Schertz was over 65 years old when Jackson reinstated the Policy in 2016, he was only 51 years old when the only conduct alleged as to GBS occurred. Plaintiff has failed to explain how GBS took, appropriated, or retained—or assisted Jackson in taking, appropriating, or retaining—Mr. Schertz's property once he was 65. See id. § 15610.30(a)(1)-(2). Plaintiff's remaining allegations as to Jackson are likewise deficient. Plaintiff claims that Jackson "duped" policyholders like Mr. Schertz "by making [*8] them update their medical information." (See FAC ¶¶ 45-49.) However, Plaintiff fails to identify the "who, what, when, where, and how" of any purportedly fraudulent statement or act. Cf. Vess, 317 F.3d at 1106. Because it is not clear these deficiencies could not be cured by amendment, Plaintiff's first claim for financial elder abuse is DISMISSED WITH FOURTEEN DAYS' LEAVE TO AMEND.

B. Contract Claims (Claims 3, 4)

Plaintiff brings her third and fourth claims for breach of contract and breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing against Jackson only. To state a claim for breach of contract under California law, a plaintiff must plead: (1) the existence of a contract between the parties, (2) the plaintiff's performance or excuse for nonperformance, (3) the defendant's failure to perform, and (4) resulting damages. Harris v. Rudin, Richman & Appel, 74 Cal. App. 4th 299, 307, 87 Cal. Rptr. 2d 822 (1999). To state a claim for breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, a plaintiff must show that the other party somehow injured its ability to "receive the benefits" of the contract. Careau & Co. v. Sec. Pac. Bus. Credit, Inc., 222 Cal. App. 3d 1371, 1393, 272 Cal. Rptr. 387 (1990). The covenant of good faith in fair dealing cannot "impose substantive duties or limits on the contracting parties beyond those incorporated in the specific terms of their agreement." [*9] Guz v. Bechtel Nat'l Inc., 24 Cal. 4th 317, 349-50, 100 Cal. Rptr. 2d 352, 8 P.3d 1089 (2000).

Plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts in support of her contract-based claims. To satisfy federal pleading standards, "a plaintiff must describe the alleged terms of the contract in a sufficiently specific manner to give the defendant notice of the nature of the claim." Aspray v. Fed. Home Loan Mortg. Corp., 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 46029, 2011 WL 1532326, at *3 (C.D. Cal. Apr. 20, 2011) (citation and quotation marks omitted); Plastino v. Wells Fargo Bank, 873 F. Supp. 2d 1179, 1191 (N.D. Cal. 2012). Although Plaintiff does not attach a copy of the Policy to her pleading, she identifies the basis for Jackson's alleged breach of its terms. She alleges Jackson acquired Mr. Schertz's Policy in 2012 and reinstated the Policy in 2016. The terms of that Policy provide for a death benefit of $500,000 and identify Plaintiff as the sole beneficiary. Mr. Schertz purportedly complied with his obligations under the Policy by paying the premiums, including the past-due amounts once the Policy was reinstated. According to Plaintiff, Jackson breached the Policy by then refusing to pay the death benefit based on a pretextual and biased post-death investigation. Contrary to Jackson's assertion, Plaintiff's allegations give Jackson fair notice of the nature of her claims. Accordingly, Jackson's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's contract-based claims is DENIED.

C. Negligent Misrepresentation [*10] (Claim 5)

Plaintiff brings her fifth claim for negligent misrepresentation against both Defendants. Under California law, "[t]he elements of negligent misrepresentation include: (1) misrepresentation of a past or existing material fact, (2) without reasonable grounds for believing it to be true, (3) with intent to induce another's reliance on the misrepresentation, (4) ignorance of the truth and justifiable reliance on the misrepresentation by the party to whom it was directed, and (5) resulting damage." Glenn K. Jackson Inc. v. Roe, 273 F.3d 1192, 1201 n.2 (9th Cir. 2001). Plaintiff claims that "Defendants and their agents" misrepresented (1) that the face amount of the Policy would be paid as long as Mr. Schertz continued to pay the premiums, and (2) that the Policy had been reinstated after a brief lapse. (FAC ¶¶ 96-97.)

Plaintiff has failed to state a plausible claim for negligent misrepresentation as to either Defendant. Because this claim is based on Defendants' purported efforts to dupe Mr. Schertz into purchasing a Policy that Defendants never intended to carry out, it must be plead with particularity under Rule 9(b). See Francois & Co., LLC v. Nadeau, 2019 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 42754, 2019 WL 994402, at *5 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 8, 2019) (stating that a negligent misrepresentation claim "based in fraud" must satisfy Rule 9(b)). However, Plaintiff has failed to identify any specific [*11] misrepresentation, when it was made, or who made it. (See FAC ¶¶ 96-97 [lumping GBS and Jackson together as "Defendants and their agents"]; id. ¶ 97 [stating that the "precise dates of these misrepresentations and further particulars are unknown"].) Further, it is unclear how either Defendant could have "misrepresented" that the Policy was reinstated. Plaintiff's own allegations aver that the Policy was reinstated. (See id. ¶ 34.) Rather, Plaintiff takes issue with Jackson's basis for denying her claim under the reinstated Policy. (See id. ¶¶ 38-39.) Accordingly, Plaintiff's fifth claim for negligent misrepresentation as to both Defendants is DISMISSED WITH FOURTEEN DAYS' LEAVE TO AMEND.

D. RICO (Claims 6, 7)

Plaintiff brings her sixth claim for violations of RICO and seventh claim for conspiracy to violate RICO against both Defendants. To state a civil RICO claim, a plaintiff must allege facts showing "(1) conduct (2) of an enterprise (3) through a pattern (4) of racketeering activity (known as 'predicate acts') (5) causing injury to plaintiff's 'business or property.'" Living Designs, Inc. v. E.I. Dupont de Nemours & Co., 431 F.3d 353, 361 (9th Cir. 2005). To allege an "enterprise," a plaintiff must state facts that establish a group of persons (1) associated together [*12] for "a common purpose of engaging in a course of conduct," (2) have an "ongoing organization, formal or informal," and (3) "function as a continuing unit." Odom v. Microsoft Corp., 486 F.3d 541, 548, 552 (9th Cir. 2007). To show "predicate acts," a plaintiff must allege that the defendant engaged in racketeering activity outlined in 18 U.S.C. § 1961(1). Here, Plaintiff claims that Jackson and GBS engaged in an enterprise to commit wire and mail fraud for the common purpose of "altering the terms of original life insurance policies when those policies have lapsed" and using those new terms as a basis for later denying claims for death benefits. (See FAC ¶ 104.)

Plaintiff fails to state a plausible RICO claim against either Defendant. First, Plaintiff's allegations fall far short of showing the existence of an "enterprise" between GBS and Jackson. As noted, Plaintiff's only specific allegation regarding GBS pertains to its predecessor's conduct in 1999. Plaintiff has not offered any facts that support finding that GBS had any "ongoing organization, formal or informal" with Jackson, or that the two "function as a continuing unit." (See id. ¶¶ 103-104.) Second, Plaintiff has failed to allege Defendants' supposed "predicate acts"—mail and wire fraud—with sufficient particularity. [*13] See Edwards v. Marin Park, Inc., 356 F.3d 1058, 1066 (9th Cir. 2004) (applying Rule 9(b) to civil RICO claims sounding in fraud). To state a claim for mail or wire fraud, Plaintiff must allege that Defendants used the mail or electronic means in furtherance of their scheme to defraud. See 18 U.S.C. §§ 1341, 1343. Plaintiff contends that Defendants committed mail and wire fraud "because they altered the terms of the original Policy and . . . had no intention of paying the death benefit under the [P]olicy." (FAC ¶ 109.) But she at no point alleges any specific use of the mail or electronic means to carry out a scheme to defraud. (Id. ¶ 110 [stating, in conclusory fashion, that unspecified "communications took place by telephone and mail"].) Accordingly, Plaintiff's sixth and seventh claims under RICO are DISMISSED WITH FOURTEEN DAYS' LEAVE TO AMEND.

Plaintiff brings her second claim for unfair, unlawful, and fraudulent business practices in violation of California's Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200 et seq. "Unlawful" practices are those "forbidden by law, be it civil or criminal, federal, state, or municipal, statutory, regulatory or court-made." Saunders v. Superior Court, 27 Cal. App. 4th 832, 838, 33 Cal. Rptr. 2d 438 (1999). "Unfair" practices are "conduct that threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit [*14] of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition." Cel-Tech Commc'ns, Inc. v. L.A. Cellular Tel. Co., 20 Cal. 4th 163, 187, 83 Cal. Rptr. 2d 548, 973 P.2d 527 (1999). Finally, "fraudulent," as used in California's UCL, requires only a showing that members of the public "are likely to be deceived." Saunders, 27 Cal. App. 4th at 839 (citation and quotation marks omitted).

Plaintiff has failed to state a plausible claim under the UCL as to either Defendant. As with her other fraud-based claims, Plaintiff does not plead any specific business act or practice, attribute it to a specific Defendant, or describe when or how it occurred. Her vague allegation that Defendants "fraudulently, deceptively, and unfairly deprived Plaintiffs of their property and legal rights under the Policy" is insufficient to satisfy Rule 9(b). (See FAC ¶ 57.)

Accordingly, Plaintiff's second claim for violation of California's UCL is DISMISSED WITH FOURTEEN DAYS' LEAVE TO AMEND.

V. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, GBS's motion to dismiss is GRANTED and Jackson's motion to dismiss is GRANTED IN SUBSTANTIAL PART. Plaintiff's first, second, fifth, sixth, and seventh claims are DISMISSED WITH FOURTEEN DAYS' LEAVE TO AMEND. Jackson's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's [*15] third and fourth claims is DENIED.

ORDER ON MOTION FOR JUDGMENT ON THE PLEADINGS AND MOTIONS FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT

Before the Court in the above-styled cause of action are the following four dispositive motions: Defendants Wants2Scrap, LLC and Michele Parrish's Motion for Judgment [*2] on the Pleadings Pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(c) [#58], Defendants Wants2Scrap, LLC and Michele Parrish's Motion for Summary Judgment [#61], Plaintiff and Counter-Defendants' Motion for Partial Summary Judgment or Alternatively to Exclude Evidence [#62], and Defendants Wants2Scrap, LLC and Michele Parrish's Supplemental Motion for Summary Judgment [#96]. In reviewing these motions, the Court has also considered the numerous responses and replies on file pertaining to the motions [#59, #66, #72, #80, #83, #86, #88, #89, #94, #95, #97, #98, #99]. The undersigned has authority to enter this Order as all parties have consented to the jurisdiction of a United States Magistrate Judge [#17, #18]. See 28 U.S.C. § 636(c)(1). For the reasons set forth below, the Court will (1) grant Defendants' Supplemental Motion for Summary Judgment and dismiss Plaintiff's copyright claim for failure to obtain a copyright registration prior to filing suit; (2) order Defendants to show cause as to why their counterclaims for a declaratory judgment of non-infringement and claims of copyright infringement and breach of contract should not be dismissed sua sponte along with Plaintiff's copyright claim; (3) grant in part Defendants' motion for judgment [*3] on the pleadings and dismiss Plaintiff's conversion claim as preempted by the Copyright Act; (4) grant in part Defendants' motion for summary judgment on Plaintiff's fraud and Texas Free Enterprise and Antitrust Act claims; and (5) hold in abeyance Plaintiff's and Counter-Defendants' motion for partial summary judgment while the Court considers whether to dismiss Defendants' counterclaims sua sponte after receiving Defendants' show cause response.

I. Procedural Background

The procedural history of this case begins on October 24, 2017 in the Northern District of Indiana, where Defendant Want2Scrap, LLC filed suit seeking a declaration of non-infringement of copyright and asserting claims of breach of contract, copyright infringement, and other torts against Mabel Larsen and the two unincorporated entities through which she conducts business—Mai Larsen Designs and Creative Scrap Designs. The following day, Mai Larsen Designs filed this action against Want2Scrap and its owner Michele Parrish, asserting claims of copyright infringement, fraud, and theft by conversion in this district. (Orig. Compl. [#1].) The Indiana court transferred the Indiana case to this division, where it was assigned [*4] the cause number 5:18-CV-321-OLG. Following the transfer, the Court consolidated the Texas and Indiana cases and designated cause number 5:17-CV-1084-OLG as the lead case. (Consolidation Order [#14].)

Plaintiff Mai Larsen Designs subsequently filed her First Amended Complaint [#15] in the lead case; the parties consented to the jurisdiction of a United States Magistrate Judge; and the consolidated action was transfered to the undersigned's docket on May 22, 2018 [#19]. The undersigned thereafter realigned the parties post-consolidation, designating Mai Larsen Designs as Plaintiff (hereinafter "Larsen"),[1] Want2Scrap and Michele Parrish as Defendants/Counter-Plaintiffs (hereinafter "Defendants"), and Mabel Larsen, Creative Scrap Designs, and Mai Larsen Designs ("the Larsen Parties") as Counter-Defendants [#31].

The Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiff's First Amended Complaint [#28], and Larsen filed a Second Amended Complaint on December 12, 2018 [#41], again asserting claims of copyright infringement (Count I), fraud (Count II), fraud in the inducement (Count III), theft by deception and conversion (Count IV), and conspiracy and unfair competition in violation of the Texas [*5] Free Enterprise and Antitrust Act (Counts V and VI). Larsen's Second Amended Complaint alleges that Mai Larsen Designs is a designer of chipboard embellishment and craft designs for use in homemade scrapbooks that are original works that may be copyrighted under federal law. (Second Am. Compl. [#41] at ¶ 4.) Larsen accuses Defendants of infringing its copyrights by: selling her designs on Want2Scrap's website, at trade shows, and directly to retailers; failing to compensate Larsen for her designs as promised in an oral agreement between the parties; and harassing Larsen on social media to prevent her from competing with Want2Scrap in the sale of scrapbook designs and chipboard products. (Id. at ¶¶ 4-9.)

[1] The Court refers to Plaintiff as "Larsen" throughout this Order, as she is functionally the Plaintiff in this action because her entities are not registered with the State of Texas and she is the only individual associated with these assumed names. (Pl.'s Resp. [#94] at 3.)

In response, Defendants filed Counterclaims on December 26, 2018 [#42], seeking a declaratory judgment of non-infringement of copyright against the Larsen Parties (Count I); alleging a claim of breach of contract against Larsen (Count II); and asserting claims against the Larsen Parties for copyright infringement (Count III), tortious interference with business relations (Count IV), unfair competition (Count V), inducing copyright infringement (Count VI), and defamation (Count VII). [*6] Defendants allege that Want2Scrap and Larsen entered into a copyright license agreement whereby Want2Scrap was granted an exclusive license to Larsen's artwork that allowed Defendants to use all of the works at issue in this lawsuit. (Counterclaim [#42] at ¶ 73.) Defendants contend that Want2Scrap fullfilled all of its obligations under the copyright license agreement, but Larsen breached her contractual duties by advertising, selling, or distributing works substantially similar to the licensed works without Want2Scrap's permission. (Id. at ¶¶ 137-38.) Defendants further allege that the Larsen Parties made false and misleading statements about Want2Scrap to its prospective customers and publicized false statements harmful to the interests of Want2Scrap. (Id. at ¶¶ 148, 163.)

Defendants filed a motion for judgment on the pleadings pursuant to Rule 12(c) on March 7, 2019 [#58], arguing that Larsen's fraud, conversion, and unfair competition claims are all preempted by the Copyright Act and must be dismissed. Defendants thereafter filed a motion for summary judgment on March 14, 2019 [#61], arguing that Larsen's copyright claims fail as a matter of law because the parties' copyright license agreement [*7] operates as a complete defense to copyright infringement; there is no evidence of any oral agreement to compensate Larsen for its designs; and Larsen fails to allege an antitrust injury under the Texas Free Enterprise and Antitrust Act. The Larsen Parties filed a Motion for Partial Summary Judgment on the same day [#62], arguing that the identified copyright license agreement is unenforceable and seeking summary judgment on all of Defendants' counterclaims that are based on the agreement (the request for declaratory judgment and claims for breach of contract, copyright infringement, and inducing copyright infringement) or, alternatively, seeking an order excluding the agreement from evidence admitted at trial.

The Court held a pretrial status conference in this case on April 24, 2019, at which it heard argument on these three dispositive motions. At the close of the hearing, Defendants' counsel alerted the Court to a recent Supreme Court decision, Fourth Estate Public Benefit Corp. v. Wall-Street.com, LLC, ___ U.S. ___, 139 S. Ct. 881, 203 L. Ed. 2d 147 (2019), which interprets the Copyright Act's statutory preconditions to filing a civil suit under the Act. The Court ordered briefing on the impacts, if any, of Fourth Estate on the instant case. In response, Defendants filed their supplemental [*8] motion for summary judgment [#96] on May 2, 2019, which argues that Larsen's copyright claims must be dismissed for failure to obtain registered copyrights prior to instituting this lawsuit. All four dispositive motions are ripe for the Court's resolution.

II. Legal Standards

A. Judgment on the Pleadings

Rule 12(c) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provides: "After the pleadings are closed—but early enough not to delay trial—a party may move for judgment on the pleadings." Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(c). The standard for dismissal under Rule 12(c) is the same as that for dismissal for failure to state a claim under Rule 12(b)(6). Johnson v. Johnson, 385 F.3d 503, 529 (5th Cir. 1999).

To survive a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6), "a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to 'state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'" Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) (quoting Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007)). "A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Id. Although a complaint "does not need detailed factual allegations," the "allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555. The allegations pleaded must show "more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully." Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678.

Furthermore, a court must [*9] accept "all well-pleaded facts as true, viewing them in the light most favorable to the plaintiff." Martin K. Eby Const. Co. v. Dallas Area Rapid Transit, 369 F.3d 464, 467 (5th Cir. 2004). However, a court need not credit conclusory allegations or allegations that merely restate the legal elements of a claim. Chhim v. Univ. of Texas at Austin, 836 F.3d 467, 469 (5th Cir. 2016) (citing Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678). In short, a claim should not be dismissed unless the court determines that it is beyond doubt that the plaintiff cannot prove a plausible set of facts that support the claim and would justify relief. Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570.

B. Summary Judgment

Summary judgment is appropriate under Rule 56 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure only "if the pleadings, depositions, answers to interrogatories, and admissions on file, together with the affidavits, if any, show that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the moving party is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law." Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 322, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986); see also Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c). A dispute is genuine only if the evidence is such that a reasonable jury could return a verdict for the nonmoving party. Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 248, 106 S. Ct. 2505, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1986).

The party moving for summary judgment bears the initial burden of "informing the district court of the basis for its motion, and identifying those portions of [the record] which it believes demonstrate the absence of a genuine issue of material fact." Catrett, 477 U.S. at 323. Once the movant carries its burden, the burden shifts to [*10] the nonmoving party to establish the existence of a genuine issue for trial. Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., Ltd. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 587, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986); Wise v. E.I. Dupont de Nemours & Co., 58 F.3d 193, 195 (5th Cir. 1995). The non-movant must respond to the motion by setting forth particular facts indicating that there is a genuine issue for trial. Miss. River Basin Alliance v. Westphal, 230 F.3d 170, 174 (5th Cir. 2000). The parties may satisfy their respective burdens by tendering depositions, affidavits, and other competent evidence. Topalian v. Ehrman, 954 F.2d 1125, 1131 (5th Cir. 1992). The Court will view the summary judgment evidence in the light most favorable to the non-movant. Rosado v. Deters, 5 F.3d 119, 123 (5th Cir. 1993).

"After the non-movant has been given the opportunity to raise a genuine factual issue, if no reasonable juror could find for the non-movant, summary judgment will be granted." Westphal, 230 F.3d at 174. However, if the party moving for summary judgment fails to satisfy its initial burden of demonstrating the absence of a genuine issue of material fact, the motion must be denied, regardless of the nonmovant's response. Little v. Liquid Air Corp., 37 F.3d 1069, 1075 (5th Cir. 1994) (en banc).

III. Analysis

The Court will grant Defendants' supplemental motion for summary judgment and dismiss Larsen's claim for copyright infringement for failure to obtain a copyright registration prior to filing this lawsuit. The Court will also (1) grant in part Defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings and dismiss Larsen's conversion claim as preempted under the [*11] Copyright Act and (2) grant in part Defendants' motion for summary judgment as to Larsen's claims of fraud and claims under the Texas Free Enterprise and Antitrust Act. These rulings result in the dismissal of all of the claims asserted by Larsen in her Second Amended Complaint.

As to Defendants' counterclaims, the Court will hold in abeyance Plaintiff's partial motion for summary judgment while the Court considers whether to dismiss Defendants' request for declaratory judgment of non-infringement and counterclaims of copyright infringement and breach of contract sua sponte along with Larsen's copyright infringement claim in light of the Supreme Court's decision in Fourth Estate.

A. Defendants' Supplemental Motion for Summary Judgment [#96]

Defendants seek dismissal of Larsen's claim of copyright infringement (Count I of the Second Amended Complaint) on the basis that Plaintiff failed to satisfy the statutory precondition to bringing suit under the Copyright Act as interpreted by the Supreme Court's recent decision in Fourth Estate Public Benefit Corp. v. Wall-Street.com, LLC, __ U.S. __, 139 S. Ct. 881, 203 L. Ed. 2d 147 (2019). The Court agrees with Defendants that Fourth Estate requires dismissal of Larsen's copyright infringement claim.

The Copyright Act provides that "no civil action for infringement [*12] of the copyright in any United States work shall be instituted until preregistration or registration of the copyright claim has been made in accordance with this title." 17 U.S.C. § 411(a). On March 4, 2019, the Supreme Court issued its decision in Fourth Estate, which held that "registration . . . has been made" within the meaning of Section 411(a) when the Register of Copyrights "has registered a copyright after examining a properly filed application."[2] 139 S. Ct. at 892. This decision resolved a split in the Circuit Courts of Appeals and rejected the interpretation of the Fifth and Ninth Circuits, which had previously held that registration has been made under Section 411(a) when the copyright claimant's complete application for registration is received by the Copyright Office. See Cosmetic Ideas, Inc. v. IAC/Interactivecorp, 606 F.3d 612, 621 (9th Cir. 2010); Lakedreams v. Taylor, 932 F.2d 1103, 1108 (5th Cir. 1991).

"Section 411(a)'s registration requirement is a precondition to filing a claim that does not restrict a federal court's subject-matter jurisdiction." Reed Elsevier, Inc. v. Muchnick, 559 U.S. 154, 157, 130 S. Ct. 1237, 176 L. Ed. 2d 18 (2010). "[A]lthough an owner's rights exist apart from registration, . . . registration is akin to an administrative exhaustion requirement that the owner must satisfy before suing to enforce ownership rights . . . ." Fourth Estate Public Benefit Corp., 139 S. Ct. at 887. In the wake of Fourth Estate, district courts have dismissed copyright claims based on this administrative requirement, [*13] even if the suit was properly filed before Fourth Estate was decided, under Circuit law embracing the application approach, as here. See, e.g., *Boost Beauty, LLC. v. Woo Signatures, LLC., No. 2:18-CV-02960-CAS-EX, 2019 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 82318, 2019 WL 2122984, at 2 (C.D. Cal. May 14, 2019) (granting motion for judgment on the pleadings for failure to obtain registration of copyright for online advertisement which was subject of copyright claims).

Larsen instituted this suit on October 25, 2017 by filing an Original Complaint, which alleged that Larsen applied for copyright registrations with the United States Copyright Office in July 2017 and that the certificates of registration remained "pending." (Orig. Compl. [#1] at ¶ 2.) Larsen's First Amended Complaint was filed on April 25, 2018. This Complaint again stated that Larsen had applied for copyright protection in June 2017 but the applications still remained "pending." (First Am. Compl. [#15] at ¶ 4.) Larsen filed a Second Amended Complaint on December 12, 2018. This Complaint alleged that certificates of registration had been issued and were effective as of August 18, 2017, the date of application.[3] (Second Am. Compl. [#41] at ¶ 4.) The registrations were not attached to the Complaint, but Larsen provided the Court [*14] with two copyright registrations as part of her summary judgment evidence. (Certificate of Registration [#95-1]; Certificate of Registration [#95-2].)

The summary judgment record demonstrates that these two registrations award a certificate to Mabel Mai Larsen for hand drawn art, Registration Number VAu 1-184-921, with an effective date of August 7, 2014 [#95-1] and for 2-D artwork, Registration Number VAu 1-319-215, with an effective date of August 18, 2017 [#95-2]. The registrations do not indicate the date the applications were processed. The Court extrapolates from Larsen's pleadings, however, that the 2017 registration was processed and awarded sometime between April 25, 2018 (when the First Amended Complaint was filed) and December 12, 2018 (when the Second Amended Complaint was filed).

Larsen argues that it complied with Section 411(a)'s registration requirement because its copyright registrations were made effective on August 7, 2014 and August 18, 2017, before she filed suit on October 25, 2017. (Summ. J. Resp. [#97].) As a preliminary matter, the Court finds that the 2014 registration is not relevant to this suit. This registration is not referenced in any of Larsen's pleadings, nor are [*15] the 2014 copyrighted works. Rather,

[2] The Supreme Court explained that "[i]n limited circumstances, copyright owners may file an infringement suit before undertaking registration. If a copyright owner is preparing to distribute a work of a type vulnerable to predistribution infringement—notably, a movie or musical composition—the owner may apply for preregistration." Fourth Estate Pub. Benefit Corp., 139 S. Ct. at 888. No party is asserting that this limited circumstance applies here.

[3] Copyright registrations, once approved, are retroactively effective from the date the application was filed. 17 U.S.C. § 410(d).

Larsen has repeatedly referred to Exhibit A to the Original and First and Second Amended Complaints as the works at issue in this lawsuit. (Orig. Compl. [#1] at ¶ 4; First Am. Compl. [#15] at ¶ 4; Second Am. Compl. [#41] at ¶ 4.) Exhibit A is a chart of the 2-D chipboard designs submitted to the Copyright Office on July 28, 2017 and August 18, 2017.[4] (Ex. A [#1] at 6-13; Ex. A [#15] at 7-18.) The drawings protected by the 2014 copyright registration are not chipboard designs; they are hand sketches of doll figures. (2014 Application [#95-3] at 12-47.) Larsen now attempts to argue that "several of [Larsen's] earlier drawings were her inspiration for later developed designs that Defendants have infringed." (Brief at 3.) This assertion is irrelevant, however, as Larsen has never claimed that Defendants have infringed upon the works protected by the 2014 registration. Accordingly, the 2014 registration has no bearing on her claim of copyright infringement in this lawsuit.

As to the 2017 registration, Larsen does not disclose to the Court the date on which she received notice that the registrations had been awarded. She simply argues the effective date [*16] of the registration predates the filing of this lawsuit, and therefore she satisfied the administrative preconditions to suit under the Copyright Act. To adopt Larsen's reasoning the Court would have to hold that Fourth Estate allows a plaintiff to file a lawsuit before copyright registrations have been awarded and to amend the pleadings after registration is obtained, so long as the effective date (i.e., the date of application) predates the filing of the lawsuit. The Court cannot square this argument with the holding of Fourth Estate, and Larsen's argument has been directly rejected by at least one federal district court since the Supreme Court issued its decision.

In Malibu Media, LLC v. Doe, the Southern District of New York addressed the issue of "whether a plaintiff that improperly filed suit before a copyright was registered can cure that defect by amending its complaint after the Register has completed registration of the copyright." *No. 18-CV-10956 (JMF), 2019 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 56578, 2019 WL 1454317, at 1 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 2, 2019). The Court held that "such a prematurely filed suit must be dismissed notwithstanding a plaintiff's post-registration amendment." Id. The Court agrees with the Southern District of New York that embracing the argument advanced by Larsen "would [*17] make a meaningless formality out of Fourth Estate's requirement that an application be approved prior to filing suit." *2019 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 56578, [WL] at 2. Because Larsen's pleadings do not comply with Section 411(a)'s pre-suit registration requirement, the Court will dismiss Larsen's claim of copyright infringement (Count I of the Second Amended Complaint).[5]

Finally, although not addressed in any party's filings, the Court suspects that Defendants' counterclaims for a declaratory judgment of non-infringement (Count I), breach of contract (Count II), copyright infringement (Count III), and inducing copyright infringement (Count VI) should also be dismissed under Fourth Estate. The precondition of copyright registration applies with equal force to declaratory judgment actions of copyright non-infringement. *See BHL Boresight, Inc. v. Geo-Steering Sols., Inc., No. 4:15-CV-00627, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 44729, 2016 WL 8648927, at 4 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 29, 2016), modified on reconsideration, No. 4:15-CV-00627, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47196, 2017 WL 1177966 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 29, 2017) (collecting cases). The other listed counterclaims are all various iterations of Defendants' allegation that the Larsen Parties infringed their copyright to use Larsen's designs based on an enforceable transfer of copyright ownership through the parties' license agreement. (Counterclaims [#42] at ¶¶ 133-146, [*18] 157-161.) However, the Court will give Defendants an opportunity to show cause as to why these claims should not be dismissed under the reasoning of Fourth Estate before dismissing these claims sua

[4] Larsen explains in her briefing that she submitted an additional application to the Copyright Office on July 28, 2017 but has still not received a certificate of registration or a rejection notification regarding this application. (Pl.'s Brief [#95] at 3.) Larsen believes the application was closed or suspended due to an unknown administrative error. (Id.)

[5] In light of this holding, the Court need not and will not address Defendants' alternative arguments for summary judgment on Larsen's copyright claim related to their affirmative defense of a copyright license agreement between the parties governing Larsen's work at issue. However, the Court will note that it appears that the agreement attached to Defendants' answer and counterclaims, which was signed by Larsen on January 30, 2017, is enforceable. (Copyright License Agreement [#42-1] at 2-4.) The agreement grants Want2Scrap "an exclusive, transferable license to use [Larsen's] work in the course of its business." (Id.) The arguments raised by Larsen to support her contention that the agreement is invalid, such as her argument the agreement is invalid because it lacks Parrish's signature, do not appear to be supported by Texas or Indiana law (regardless of which applies) or the Copyright Act.

sponte. See Brown v. Taylor, 829 F.3d 365, 370 (5th Cir. 2016) ("[A] district court may only dismiss a case sua sponte after giving the [party] notice of the perceived inadequacy of the complaint and an opportunity for the [party] to respond.").

B. Defendants' Motion for Judgment on the Pleadings [#58]

Defendants move to dismiss all of the state-law claims in Larsen's Second Amended Complaint as preempted by the Copyright Act. The Court holds that Larsen's conversion claim is preempted and must be dismissed with prejudice. Larsen's claims of fraud, fraud in the inducement, and conspiracy and unfair competition under the Texas Free Enterprise and Antitrust Act, however, are not preempted.

The Copyright Act provides:

> all legal and equitable rights that are equivalent to any of the exclusive rights within the general scope of copyright as specified by section 106 in works of authorship that are fixed in a tangible medium of expression and come within the subject matter of copyright as specified by sections 102 and 103, whether created before or after that date and whether [*19] published or unpublished, are governed exclusively by this title . . . .

17 U.S.C. § 301(a). This provision has been interpreted as expressly preempting all causes of action falling within the scope of the Copyright Act, thereby accomplishing "the general federal policy of creating a uniform method for protecting and enforcing certain rights in intellectual property by preempting other claims." Daboub v. Gibbons, 42 F.3d 285, 288 (5th Cir. 1995).

Courts have interpreted the provision as containing a two-step test for preemption. Id. at 288-89. First, the cause of action is examined to determine if it falls "within the subject matter of copyright." Id. at 289; see, e.g., Brown v. Ames, 201 F.3d 654, 658 (5th Cir. 2000) (tort claim of misappropriation did not fall under subject of copyright where misappropriation concerned name or likeness, which were non-copyrightable). Second, the cause of action is examined to determine if it protects rights that are "equivalent" to any of the exclusive rights of a federal copyright, as provided in 17 U.S.C. § 106, which grants the holder of a copyright the exclusive right to reproduce, distribute, perform, and display the copyrighted work. Daboub, 42 F.3d at 289. The analysis required at this step is more complex. Alcatel USA, Inc. v. DGI Techs., Inc., 166 F.3d 772, 787 (5th Cir. 1999).

The Fifth Circuit evaluates equivalency through the "extra element" test. Id. According to this test, if the [*20] act or acts about which a plaintiff complains would violate both state law and copyright law, then the state right is deemed "equivalent to copyright." Id. "If, however, one or more qualitatively different elements are required to constitute the state-created cause of action being asserted, then the right granted under state law does not lie within the general scope of copyright, and preemption does not occur." Id. (internal quotation omitted).

i. Conversion (Count IV)

Larsen's conversion claim alleges that Defendants wrongfully converted Larsen's designs for their own illegal use and benefit. (Second Am. Compl. [#41] at ¶ 8.) This claim concerns the same material that is underlying Laren's infringement claim—Larsen's chipboard designs. This material is subject to copyright protection and therefore falls "within the subject matter of copyright." See Daboub, 42 F.3d at 289. The conversion claim also protects rights that are "equivalent" to the exclusive rights of federal copyright. See id. The elements of a conversion claim under Texas law are: (1) the plaintiff's legal possession or entitlement to property; (2) defendant's wrongful exercise of dominion and control over the property, excluding the plaintiff; [*21] (3) plaintiff's demand of the property's return; and (4) defendant's refusal. Arthur W. Tifford, PA v. Tandem Energy Corp., 562 F.3d 699, 705 (5th Cir. 2009). Because there is no qualitatively different element that would remove the conversion claim from the scope of the Copyright Act's preemption provision, this claim should be dismissed with prejudice as preempted. See Daboub, 42 F.3d at 289.

ii. Fraud and Fraudulent Inducement (Counts II and III)

Larsen's fraud claims are not preempted. Larsen alleges that Parrish made numerous representations to Larsen that Larsen would be compensated for Defendants' sale of her designs but that Larsen only ever received $350.00 per month for development of Defendants' social media and YouTube presence pursuant to a separate oral agreement between the parties. (Second Am. Compl. [#41] at ¶¶ 6-7.) Larsen claims she would not have agreed to submit her designs to Defendants but for Defendants' misrepresentations about the additional compensation. (Id. at ¶ 7.) Larsen conceded at the Court's April 24, 2019 pretrial status conference that these fraud claims are related to the question of whether there is a valid copyright license agreement between the parties. The Court therefore finds that these particular fraud claims fall within the subject matter [*22] of copyright—step one of this Court's preemption inquiry—because they concern whether Larsen's copyrightable designs were distributed by Defendants illegally and without proper compensation to Larsen. See Daboub, 42 F.3d at 289.

However, the fraud claims fail the second step of the Court's preemption inquiry—the extra element test. The Fifth Circuit has held that claims requiring proof of fraud or misrepresentation are generally not preempted by the Copyright Act because they involve the extra element of a statement or misrepresentation that induced specific reliance and caused damages that are not attributable to copyright infringement. See Computer Mgmt. Assistance Co. v. Robert F. DeCastro, Inc., 220 F.3d 396, 404-05 (5th Cir. 2000) (Louisiana Unfair Trade Practices Act is not preempted by Copyright Act because it requires proof of fraud, misrepresentation, or unethical conduct); McArdle v. Mattel Inc., 456 F. Supp. 2d 769, 779 (E.D. Tex. 2006) (summarily concluding that fraud and negligent misrepresentation claims were not preempted by Copyright Act under Fifth Circuit law) (quoting Computer Mgmt. Assistance Co., 220 F.3d at 404-05). Indeed, Larsen's fraud claims require proof of a (1) a misstatement or omission; (2) of material fact; (3) made with the intent to defraud; (4) on which the plaintiff relied; and (5) which proximately caused the plaintiff's injury. Williams v. WMX Techs., Inc., 112 F.3d 175, 177 (5th Cir. 1997). Larsen's fraud claims fail for other reasons, [*23] see infra, but the Court declines to find these claims preempted in light of the alleged misrepresentations by Defendants, which are acts above and beyond their alleged infringement.

iii. Texas Free Enterprise and Antitrust Act Claims (Counts V and VI)

Larsen's conspiracy and unfair competition claims under the Texas Free Enterprise and Antitrust Act are also not preempted. Larsen alleges that Parrish and her staff conspired with other named individuals to attack and defame Larsen on social media in order to prevent her from competing with Want2Scrap in the market for the sale of scrapbook designs and chipboard products. (Second Am. Compl. [#41] at ¶ 9.) A claim under the Texas Free Enterprise and Antitrust Act requires Larsen to prove that Defendants engaged in an illegal act that interfered with its ability to conduct its business. See Settlement Capital Corp. v. BHG Structured Settlements, Inc., 319 F. Supp. 2d 729, 734 (N.D. Tex. 2004). "Although the illegal act need not necessarily violate criminal law, it must at least be an independent tort." Id. Here the focus is on alleged defamatory conduct of Defendants. This cause of action does not fall "within the subject matter of copyright" but instead addresses independent allegations of wrongdoing surrounding Defendants' and others' [*24] behavior on social media. See Daboub, 42 F.3d at 289. Accordingly, Larsen's claims under the Texas Free Enterprise and Antitrust Act are not preempted by the Copyright Act.

C. Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment [#61]

Defendants alternatively move for summary judgment on all of Larsen's claims on the basis that Larsen cannot prove these claims as a matter of law. The Court has already determined Larsen's copyright infringement claim should be dismissed for failure to obtain a registration prior to filing this suit and Larsen's conversion claim is preempted by the Copyright Act. Accordingly, the Court only considers whether Larsen's claims of fraud, fraudulent inducement, conspiracy, and unfair competition should be dismissed because no genuine dispute of material fact exists as to these claims such that Defendants are entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Defendants are entitled to summary judgment on these claims.

i. Fraud and Fraudulent Inducement (Counts II and III)

As previously stated, Larsen's fraud claims allege that Parrish made numerous representations to Larsen that she would be compensated for Defendants' sale of her designs but that Larsen only ever received $350.00 per month for development [*25] of Defendants' social media and YouTube presence pursuant to a separate oral agreement between the parties. (Second Am. Compl. [#41] at ¶¶ 6-7.) Larsen claims she would not have agreed to submit her designs to Defendants but for Defendants' misrepresentations. (Id. at ¶ 7.) Defendants argue they are entitled to judgment as a matter of law on Larsen's claims of fraud because Larsen has failed to come forth with any evidence to show that Parrish made an oral promise to compensate Larsen for the designs beyond the compensation that has already been received.

Again, to prevail on her claim of fraud, Larsen must prove that (1) Defendants made a misstatement or omission; (2) of material fact; (3) made with the intent to defraud; (4) on which Larsen relied; and (5) which proximately caused Larsen's injuries. See Williams, 112 F.3d at 177. A claim of fraudulent inducement shares the same elements as a claim of fraud but with the additional requirement of an agreement between the parties, as the fraud arises only in the context of a contract. Bohnsack v. Varco, L.P., 668 F.3d 262, 277 (5th Cir. 2012). Although Larsen does not reference the copyright license agreement in her pleadings, in her response to Defendants' motion for summary judgment, she states that her claim of [*26] fraud in the inducement rests on the allegation that Defendants fraudulently induced Larsen into signing a royalty free, exclusive copyright license agreement under duress. (Summ. J. Resp. [#94] at 2.) The Court agrees with Defendants that Larsen has failed to carry her burden to come forth with specific evidence establishing a genuine issue for trial as to these claims.

First and foremost, Larsen has not identified a misstatement of material fact by Parrish to support her fraud claims, regardless of whether or not the copyright license agreement is valid. Under Texas law, a "material" fact is one to which "a reasonable person would attach importance" and "would be induced to act on the information in determining his choice of actions in the transaction in question." N. Cypress Med. Ctr. Operating Co., Ltd. v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 898 F.3d 461, 474 (5th Cir. 2018). To constitute actionable fraud, false representations must relate to material facts, as distinguished from matters of opinion, judgment, probability, or expectation. GMAC Commercial Mortg. Corp. v. E. Texas Holdings, Inc., 441 F. Supp. 2d 801, 806 (E.D. Tex. 2006); see also See Transport Ins. Co. v. Faircloth, 898 S.W.2d 269, 276 (Tex. 1995) ("[A] pure expression of opinion will not support an action for fraud.").

The only statements identified by Larsen in her summary judgment response are allegations of a vague promise by Parrish that "Larsen would prosper as Want2Scrap and Parrish [*27] prospered" and a January 2017 representation that Parrish "would financially compensate Larsen for her designs." (Summ. J. Resp. [#94] at 4, 9.) Larsen does not attach any evidence to her response to Defendants' motion for summary judgment to support these allegations—no deposition testimony, documents, affidavits, declarations—so as to raise a genuine issue for trial as to whether these statements were made, whether they were material, and whether they were false.[6] On this basis alone, the Court should grant Defendants' summary judgment on these claims.

Yet the summary judgment evidence submitted by Defendants—which is uncontroverted by Larsen—further establishes that Parrish did not make any specific promise to compensate Larsen. Parrish's declaration states that she never made any oral or written promise to pay Larsen for submitting her designs to Want2Scrap; that she offered to pay Larsen $5 for each kit sold and that she paid those amounts; and that her generalized statements regarding making more money referred to the sale of Larsen's kits and nothing more. (Parrish Decl. [#61-1] at 19-20.) The correspondence between the parties in the record supports Parrish's declaration. Again, [*28] Larsen has not presented the Court with any evidence of a promise to pay her for her designs. Text messages submitted to the Court by Defendant confirm that Parrish only made statements such as, "If I make more money, you make more money!" (Jan. 10, 2017 Text Message [#61-1] at 225). Moreover, when Parrish suggested Larsen receive a commission, Larsen declined and refused Parrish's offers of payment on several other occasions. (Jan. 10, 2017 Text Message [#61-1] at 228 ("nah I'm good I get gratification of seeing them create."); id. at 229 ("I don't need the money. I design for you remember."); id. at 231 ("I'm not worried about commission."); id. at 232 ("I don't need money for it hun."); April 4, 2017 Text Message [#61-1] at 233 ("No remember I said no more paying Hun.").). Additionally, Larsen admitted in her deposition that she was paid for some kit designs and when Larsen asked for payment in May 2017 and sent an invoice for outstanding expenses, Parrish paid her that amount. (Larsen Dep. [#61-1] at 72:9-13 ("She insisted on paying for that."); id. at 67:7-15, 145:3-18.) Larsen also admits she received additional payments for her work for Parrish in February and March 2017 over and above the $350 she was paid [*29] each month for social media development. (Larsen Dep. [#61-1] at 143:4-144:10, 147:6-15.) In light of this evidence and Larsen's failure to proffer evidence demonstrating a material misrepresentation by Parrish, Larsen cannot prove her allegations to the contrary.

[6] Larsen did, however, attach an affidavit to her own motion for partial summary judgment, in which she simply reiterates that Parrish repeatedly told Larsen she would prosper from their relationship. (Larsen Decl. [#62-1] at ¶ 5.)

ii. Texas Free Enterprise and Antitrust Act Claims (Counts V and VI)

Larsen's conspiracy and unfair competition claims under the Texas Free Enterprise and Antitrust Act allege that Parrish and her staff conspired with other named individuals to attack and defame Larsen on social media in order to prevent her from competing with Want2Scrap in the market for the sale of scrapbook designs and chipboard products. (Second Am. Compl. [#41] at ¶ 9.) Defendants argue Larsen lacks standing to sue them under the Texas Free Enterprise and Antitrust Act and therefore they are entitled to judgment as a matter of law on her conspiracy and unfair competition claims. The Court agrees.

The Texas Free Enterprise and Antitrust Act of 1983 ("Texas Antitrust Act"), codified at Texas Business and Commerce Code § 15.01, et seq., has the stated purpose of "maintain[ing] and promot[ing] economic competition in trade and commerce occurring wholly or partly within the State of Texas and to provide the [*30] benefits of that competition to consumers in the state." Tex. Bus. & Comm. Code § 15.04. The Texas Antitrust Act grants a private right of action to bring suit to persons "whose business or property has been injured by reason of anything declared unlawful" in the Act. Id. at § 15.21(b). It is unlawful under the Act for "any person to monopolize, attempt to monopolize, or conspire to monopolize any part of trade or commerce." Id. at § 15.05(b).

Antitrust law imposes a threshold standing requirement upon persons seeking liability for antitrust violations, which involves more than the "case or controversy" requirement underlying constitutional standing. McPeters v. LexisNexis, 11 F. Supp. 3d 789, 797 (S.D. Tex. 2014) (collecting Texas case law); Marlin v. Robertson, 307 S.W.3d 418, 424 (Tex. App.—San Antonio 2009, no pet.) Whether a given plaintiff is the proper individual to bring an antitrust claim is a question of law and exist if the plaintiff shows the following: (1) injury-in-fact, which is an injury to the plaintiff proximately caused by the defendant's conduct; (2) antitrust injury; and (3) proper plaintiff status, which assures that other parties are not better situated to bring suit. Marlin, 307 S.W.3d at 424 (citing Doctor's Hosp. of Jefferson, Inc. v. Southeast Med. Alliance, Inc., 123 F.3d 301, 305 (5th Cir. 1997)).

An antitrust injury is an "injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes the defendants' acts unlawful." Atl. Richfield Co. v. USA Petroleum Co., 495 U.S. 328, 334, 110 S. Ct. 1884, 109 L. Ed. 2d 333 (1990) (internal quotation [*31] omitted). "The injury should reflect the anticompetitive effect of either the violation or of anticompetitive acts made possible by the violation." Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl—O—Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 498, 97 S. Ct. 690, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977). "[I]njury, although causally related to an antitrust violation, nevertheless will not qualify as 'antitrust injury' unless it is attributable to an anti-competitive aspect of the practice under scrutiny. . . ." Atl. Richfield Co., 495 U.S. at 334 (internal quotation omitted). "On its own, the elimination of a single competitor" is not sufficient to state an antitrust injury; a plaintiff must "plead . . . a reduction of competition in the market in general and not mere injury to their own positions as competitors in the market." In re Mem'l Hermann Hosp. Sys., 464 S.W.3d 686, 709 (Tex. 2015) (internal quotation omitted). Allegations surrounding the removal of a single competitor must also suggest that this act "would adversely and unreasonably affect overall competitive conditions." Id. at 710 (internal quotation omitted).

Larsen has not alleged an antitrust injury sufficient to establish her standing under the Texas Antitrust Act. Larsen claims that Parrish and various third parties targeted Larsen on social media in an attempt to prevent her from competing with Want2Scrap in the scrap book design market by "leaving [*32] nasty messages" about Larsen and "putting thumbs down" on Larsen's YouTube channel in response to her postings. (Second Am. Compl. [#41] at ¶ 9; Larsen Dep. [#61-1] at 94:10-15.) According to Larsen, these attacks were personal and concerned her family and her religion. (Resp. [#94] at 5.) Larsen alleges that she was eliminated from the crafting market due to this harassment and that Defendants have made other defamatory remarks about all crafters they believe to be their competitors in order to monopolize the scrap book design market. (Second Am. Compl. [#41] at ¶ 9.)

Yet the summary judgment evidence establishes that Larsen has not in fact been eliminated from the crafting market; rather, Larsen admitted in her deposition that she is still selling her designs for royalty payments through various websites that are still a part of the crafting market. (Larsen Dep. [#61-1] at 92:11-93:4.) Defendants submitted to the Court copies of these websites, which include Larsen's Creative Scrap Designs website, a British site entitled "Fernli Designs," and weCraft.com. (Fernli Designs Website [#61-1] at 210-12; Creative Scrap Designs Website [#61-1] at 213-17; weCraft Website [#61-1] at 298-47.) [*33] Larsen clarified in her deposition that the market exclusion she alleges through her Texas Antitrust Act claims is the loss of her YouTube channel, where she posted instructional videos on crafting, rather than exclusion from the scrap book market in its entirety. (Larsen Dep. [#61-1] at 93:1-4.) Larsen claims that she was forced to close her YouTube account due to the harassing behavior of Defendants and as a result she lost over 6,000 followers of her channel. (Id.)

Larsen's decision to close her YouTube channel, which is not in itself a commercial site, does not constitute an antitrust injury because Larsen fails to explain how Defendants' harassment of Larsen "adversely and unreasonably affect[ed] overall competitive conditions" in the scrap book design market. See In re Mem'l Hermann Hosp. Sys., 464 S.W.3d at 709. Again, the purpose of the Texas Antitrust Act is to protect consumers from the monopolization of any part of trade or commerce. Tex. Bus. & Comm. Code § 15.05(b). Larsen has failed to allege how Defendants' and others' personal attacks of Larsen on social media reduced competition in the market in general beyond merely damaging her own reputation within the scrap book and crafting community. See In re Mem'l Hermann Hosp. Sys., 464 S.W.3d at 709. Larsen lacks standing to assert her claim under the [*34] Texas Antitrust Act because she has failed to allege an antitrust injury.

D. The Larsen Parties' Motion for Partial Summary Judgment [#62]

The Larsen Parties seek a partial summary judgment on Defendants' counterclaims and defenses relating to the copyright license agreement identified by Defendants. The Larsen Parties contend that the copyright license agreement is invalid and unenforceable and therefore cannot serve as a basis for Defendants' requested declaratory judgment of non-infringement or claims of breach of contract, copyright infringement, or inducing copyright infringement. As previously explained, the Court will order Defendants to show cause as to why these counterclaims should not be dismissed sua sponte along with Larsen's copyright infringement claim for failure to first obtain a copyright registration before filing suit as required by Section 411(a) of the Copyright Act. The Court will therefore hold in abeyance the Larsen Parties' motion for partial summary judgment while the Court awaits Defendants' show cause response. If the Court determines that these counterclaims should be dismissed, the Court will also dismiss the motion for partial summary judgment as moot. If the Court [*35] retains these counterclaims, it will issue a ruling on the Larsen Parties' motion.

IV. Conclusion

Having considered the parties' dispositive motions and the responses and replies thereto under the governing legal standards and in light of the record before the Court, the Court will grant Defendants' supplemental motion for summary judgment; order Defendants to show cause as to why the Court should not sua sponte dismiss their counterclaims for a declaratory judgment of non-infringement, copyright infringement, and breach of contract; grant in part Defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings; grant in part Defendants' motion for summary judgment, and hold in abeyance the Larsen Parties' motion for partial summary judgment.

IT IS THEREFORE ORDERED that Defendants Wants2Scrap, LLC and Michele Parrish's Supplemental Motion for Summary Judgment [#96] is GRANTED. Larsen's claim of copyright infringement (Count I) is DISMISSED WITHOUT PREJUDICE for failure to obtain a copyright registration prior to filing suit.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that Defendants SHOW CAUSE why their counterclaims for a declaratory judgment of non-infringement, claims of copyright infringement, inducing copyright infringement, [*36] and breach of contract should not be dismissed along with Larsen's copyright infringement claim in light of the Supreme Court's holding in Fourth Estate Public Benefit Corp. V. Wall-Street.com, LLC, 139 S. Ct. 881, 203 L. Ed. 2d 147 (2019), within seven days of this Order.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that Defendants Wants2Scrap, LLC and Michele Parrish's Motion for Judgment on the Pleadings Pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(c) [#58] is GRANTED IN PART. Larsen's claim of conversion (Count IV) is DISMISSED WITH PREJUDICE as preempted by the Copyright Act.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that Defendants Wants2Scrap, LLC and Michele Parrish's Motion for Summary Judgment [#61] is GRANTED IN PART. Larsen's claims of fraud, fraudulent inducement, and conspiracy and unfair competition under the Texas Free Enterprise and Antitrust Act (Counts II, III, V, and VI) are DISMISSED WITH PREJUDICE.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that Plaintiff and Counter-Defendants' Motion for Partial Summary Judgment or Alternatively to Exclude Evidence [#62] is HELD IN ABEYANCE pending Defendants' response to the Court's order to show cause.

IT IS FINALLY ORDERED that in all other respects, the motions are DENIED.

[*787] ORDER RENOTING PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT

This matter comes before the Court on "Defendants' Motion to Permit Discovery Necessary to Oppose Summary Judgment." Dkt. # 103. Defendants argue that a continuance of plaintiffs' pending summary judgment motions is necessary so that they can conduct discovery regarding (a) whether the labor exemption to federal antitrust law applies to drivers covered by the City of Seattle Ordinance 124968 and (b) whether the for-hire transportation services offered by plaintiffs depend upon coordinated driver conduct, making the per se rules of unlawful conduct inapplicable. Having reviewed the memoranda and declaration submitted by the parties as well as the underlying motion for summary judgment, the Court finds as follows:

Rule 56(d) offers relief to a litigant who, when faced with a summary judgment motion, "shows by affidavit or declaration that, for specified reasons, it cannot present facts essential to justify its opposition."[1] The party seeking a continuance bears the burden of showing the specific facts it hopes to elicit in discovery, that there is reason to believe the facts sought exist, and that [3] the facts are essential to oppose summary judgment. Family Home and Fin. Center, Inc. v. Fed. Home Loan Mortg. Corp., 525 F.3d 822, 827 (9th Cir. 2008). The party must also show that it has diligently pursued discovery. Qualls By and Through Qualls v. Blue Cross of Cal., Inc., 22 F.3d 839, 844 (9th Cir. 1994). If the requesting party cannot support its request for a continuance, the Court may proceed to summary judgment. Id. If, on the other hand, an appropriate showing is made, the Court may "(1) defer considering the motion or deny it; (2) allow time to obtain affidavits or declarations or to take discovery; or (3) issue any other appropriate order." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(d).

By agreement of the parties, discovery in this matter has not yet commenced. See Dkt. # 98 at 1. Plaintiffs have filed a motion for summary judgment seeking a determination that the City's Ordinance is preempted by federal antitrust laws because it authorizes per se illegal group boycotts and/or price fixing.[2] Dkt. # 100. Defendants, in responding to the motion for summary judgment, intend to argue that the "labor" exemption to the federal antitrust laws applies. 15 U.S.C. § 17 ("The labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce" subject [*788] to regulation under the Clayton Act). The argument is not frivolous,[3] and discovery from ride referral services and drivers regarding (a) whether the for-hire drivers are selling their [4] labor, as opposed to a product or service that qualifies as a commodity under the antitrust laws, (b) the nature and scope of the drivers' entrepreneurial investments in training, vehicles, and other business expenditures, and (c) the drivers' control over the supply of whatever commodity they are selling is needed to support the argument. In addition, defendants hope to be able to show that the product the ride referral companies are selling - namely, ready access to a private car and driver at a predetermined (fixed) price - requires a certain degree of cooperation between and among the drivers in order to make the product available at all. If that is the case, the per se rules of illegality under the antitrust laws may be inapplicable, and the Court would have to decide whether the undeniable restraint on trade arising from that cooperation is nevertheless reasonable in that it allows the product to be offered and does not unnecessarily restrict competition or decrease output. See Am. Needle, Inc. v. Nat'l Football League, 560 U.S. 183, 203, 130 S. Ct. 2201, 176 L. Ed. 2d 947 (2010); NCAA v. Bd. of Regents of Univ. of Okla., 468 U.S. 85, 98-103, 104 S. Ct. 2948, 82 L. Ed. 2d 70 (1984). Discovery regarding what powers and authority the drivers cede to the ride referral companies, the process by which the ride referral applications can generate a single ride option at a fixed price, [5] and the market appeal and efficiencies of the coordinated selling arrangement will inform the initial determination of whether the activities at issue here can only be carried out jointly.

[1] Subdivision (d) of Rule 56 "carries forward without substantial change the provisions of former subdivision (f)." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56, Advisory Committee Note to the 2010 Amendments.

[2] Seattle amended the Ordinance in January 2019 to eliminate the provisions authorizing collective bargaining over the nature and amount of payments between drivers and ride referral companies. See Dkt. # 100-1.

[3] Plaintiffs argue that the labor exemption applies only in the context of an employer-employee relationship, not to independent contractors. The exemption uses the phrase "labor of a human being," however, and a recent Supreme Court decision makes clear that, at the time the Clayton Act was written, even the narrower term "employment" encompassed both master-servant relationships and independent contractors. New Prime Inc. v. Oliveira, ___ U.S. ___, 139 S. Ct. 532, 542-44, 202 L. Ed. 2d 536 (2019).

Defendants have shown that the facts they hope to elicit from further discovery are essential to oppose summary judgment and, given the procedural posture of this case, they have not yet had an opportunity to pursue their investigation of these matters. For all of the foregoing reasons, the motion for a 56(d) continuance (Dkt. # 103) is GRANTED. In light of the delay in ruling on this motion, the Clerk of Court is directed to renote plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment (Dkt. # 100) on the Court's calendar for Friday, November 22, 2019.

Dated this 4th day of June, 2019.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

This matter is before the Court on the parties' cross motions for summary judgment. (Docs. 127, 138). CRST Expedited ("plaintiff") moves for partial summary judgment, and Swift Transportation [*2] ("defendant") moves for complete summary judgment. Each party timely resisted the other party's motion (Docs. 146, 159), and each party timely filed a reply in support of its own motion (Docs. 154, 167). The Court heard oral argument on the motions on April 11, 2019. (See Doc. 168). For the following reasons, plaintiff's motion (Doc. 127) is granted in part and denied in part, and defendant's motion (Doc. 138) is granted in part and denied in part.

I. FACTUAL BACKGROUND

Plaintiff and defendant are both commercial trucking companies that provide freight-hauling services throughout the country. To operate a semi-trailer, an individual must possess a commercial driver's license ("CDL"). (Docs. 130-1, at 2; 146-1, at 2). The trucking industry, however, is facing a shortage of licensed drivers. (Docs. 130-1, at 1-2; 146-1, at 2). Plaintiff operates a driver training program that allows individuals to obtain their CDLs. (Docs. 130-1, at 2; 146-1, at 2). When individuals enroll in the training program, plaintiff advances the costs of transportation to the training site, lodging, drug tests, physicals, and tuition for the program. (See Docs. 130-1, at 2; 146-1, at 2). These advances are ultimately [*3] to be repaid to plaintiff either through a reduced rate of pay until the debt has been satisfied, or through a lump sum payment to plaintiff, as is explained below. (Docs. 140-1, at 8-9; 159-1, at 18, 20).

Before training commences, each trainee signs a Pre-Employment Agreement. (Docs. 43, at 2-3; 146-1, at 5; see, e.g., Doc. 159-9, at 242-46). The training program consists of four phases (Docs. 140-1, at 6; 159-1, at 10), and upon completion of the first two phases, those students who are hired by plaintiff sign a Driver Employment Contract ("Driver Contract") (Docs. 140-1, at 12; 159-1, at 26). The Driver Contracts contain either an eight-month or a ten-month restrictive term, during which time the driver-signatory is prohibited from driving for one of plaintiff's "competitors."[1] (Docs. 130-2, at 51-52; 140-1, at 12; 159-1, at 28). If a driver is discharged or leaves employment before the restrictive term ends, the driver cannot work for any "CRST competitor" during the remainder of the restrictiveduring the remainder of the restrictive term.[2] (Docs. 130-2, at 51-52; 140-1, at 16; 159-1, at 38-39). In addition, a driver who leaves employment before his restrictive term ends is charged [*4] $6,500, regardless of the amount of time remaining on his restrictive term.[3] (Docs. 140-1, at 16; 159-1, at 38-39; see also, e.g., Doc. 130-2, at 52 (a representative Driver Contract that contains a $6,500 liquidated damages provision)). Plaintiff asserts that if a driver repays the $6,500, he is released from the contract. (Doc. 159-1, at 39).

[1] In their pleadings, the parties refer to the restrictive term as being for ten months, even though certain contracts specify an eight-month restrictive term. For the sake of simplicity, the Court will refer to the restrictive term as being for ten months for all drivers at issue. Additionally, the parties have produced hundreds of Driver Contracts to the Court, all of which appear to contain the same material terms, with the exception of the duration of the restrictive term. The parties have not identified any material differences in any of the contracts, and the Court will cite to only one contract as representative of the entire body of contracts.

Plaintiff brought suit alleging that defendant has actively recruited and continues to actively recruit plaintiff's drivers, even though those drivers remain within the restrictive terms of their Driver Contracts. (Doc. 43, at 4). Specifically, plaintiff asserts that defendant is aware that the drivers at issue[4] remain within the restrictive terms of their contracts, and that defendant's conduct of actively recruiting its drivers is the cause of the drivers leaving plaintiff to drive for defendant. (Id., at 5-10). By hiring drivers who obtained their CDL at plaintiff's expense, plaintiff asserts that defendant is able to gain the advantage of hiring licensed commercial truck drivers without undertaking the expense of training those drivers. (Id., at 6-7). Based on these allegations, plaintiff brought claims for intentional interference with contract, intentional [*5] interference with prospective economic advantage, and unjust enrichment. (Id., at 5-8). Plaintiff also seeks permanent injunctive relief "enjoining [defendant] from any further or continued interference with [plaintiff's] prospective economic advantage and/or contracts with its drivers . . .." (Id., at 8-10).

An essential element of plaintiff's tortious interference with contract claim is that the contracts with the drivers were valid. See [Gen. Elec. Capital Corp. v. Commercial Servs. Grp., Inc., 485 F. Supp. 2d 1015, 1025 (N.D. Iowa 2007)] (citations omitted). Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment requests only that the Court find that the contracts were valid and that the Court "eliminate all affirmative defenses addressing that element." (Doc. 130, at 3). Defendant's motion seeks complete summary judgment as to each of plaintiff's claims. (Doc. 138).

II. APPLICABLE LAW

Summary judgment is appropriate when "the movant shows that there is no genuine dispute as to any material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law." [Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(a)]. When asserting that a fact is undisputed or is genuinely disputed, a party must support the assertion by "citing to particular parts of materials in the record, including depositions, documents, electronically stored information, affidavits or declarations, stipulations [*6] . . ., admissions, interrogatory answers, or other materials." [Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c)(1)(A)]; see [Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 322, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986)]. Alternatively, a party may "show[ ] that the materials cited do not establish the absence or presence of a genuine dispute, or that an adverse party cannot produce admissible evidence to support the fact." [Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c)(1)(B)]. More specifically, "[a]

[2] It is unclear whether plaintiff considers a driver to be within the restrictive term of his contract until he has worked for plaintiff for ten months, or whether plaintiff considers the restrictive term to have lapsed ten months after the driver signed the contract. Defendant asserts that plaintiff operates under the former interpretation. (Doc. 140-1, at 16-17). Although plaintiff "[d]enie[s]" these assertions (Doc. 159-1, at 40-41), plaintiff does not clearly explain its interpretation of when the restrictive terms lapse. (See Doc. 130, at 11 ("Ten months after [plaintiff's] drivers fulfill the period for which they agreed to drive for [plaintiff], these previously unqualified drivers are available to [defendant] and other competitors . . ..")). Further, plaintiff asserts that when the restrictive terms expire is immaterial to the current issues because, plaintiff urges, "all of the drivers at issue herein were hired by [defendant] within the restrictive term of their respective contract obligations." (Doc. 159-1, at 41).

[3] The Court notes that the Pre-Employment Agreements provide that each trainee will repay plaintiff for the costs of training and also contain non-competition provisions. (See, e.g., Doc. 159-9, at 243-44). The parties do not, however, argue their motions for summary judgment with respect to these provisions in the Pre-Employment Agreements. The Court's focus will, thus, remain on the Driver Contracts.

[4] Plaintiff has identified 250 drivers as being at issue in this case. (Docs. 140-1, at 33; 159-1, at 79). Plaintiff has provided a spreadsheet that identifies each of the drivers at issue. (Doc. 130-7, at 75-79). Although there are 251 individuals listed on the spreadsheet, one name appears twice. (See id., at 75). Based on the parties' representations that only 250 drivers are at issue here, the Court assumes that the name that appears twice belongs to the same individual.

party may object that the material cited to support or dispute a fact cannot be presented in a form that would be admissible in evidence." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c)(2).

A fact is "material" if it "might affect the outcome of the suit under the governing law . . .." Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 248, 106 S. Ct. 2505, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1986) (citation omitted). "An issue of material fact is genuine if it has a real basis in the record," Hartnagel v. Norman, 953 F.2d 394, 395 (8th Cir. 1992) (citation omitted), or "when a reasonable jury could return a verdict for the nonmoving party on the question," Woods v. DaimlerChrysler Corp., 409 F.3d 984, 990 (8th Cir. 2005) (internal quotation marks and citation omitted). Evidence that presents only "some metaphysical doubt as to the material facts," Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 586, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986), or evidence that is "merely colorable" or "not significantly probative," Anderson, 477 U.S. at 249-50, does not make an issue of fact genuine. In sum, a genuine issue of material fact requires "sufficient evidence supporting the claimed factual dispute" that it "require[s] a jury or judge to resolve the parties' differing versions of the truth [*7] at trial." Id. at 249 (citation and internal quotation marks omitted).

The party moving for summary judgment bears "the initial responsibility of informing the district court of the basis for its motion and identifying those portions of the record which show a lack of a genuine issue." Hartnagel, 953 F.2d at 395 (citation omitted). Once the moving party has met this burden, the nonmoving party must go beyond the pleadings and by depositions, affidavits, or other evidence designate specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial. See Mosley v. City of Northwoods, Mo., 415 F.3d 908, 910 (8th Cir. 2005).

In determining whether a genuine issue of material fact exists, courts must view the evidence in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, giving that party the benefit of all reasonable inferences that can be drawn from the facts. Tolan v. Cotton, 572 U.S. 650, 651, 134 S. Ct. 1861, 188 L. Ed. 2d 895 (2014); Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 587-88 (citation omitted); see also Reed v. City of St. Charles, Mo., 561 F.3d 788, 790 (8th Cir. 2009) (stating that in ruling on a motion for summary judgment, a court must view the facts "in a light most favorable to the non-moving party—as long as those facts are not so 'blatantly contradicted by the record . . . that no reasonable jury could believe' them" (alteration in original) (quoting Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372, 380, 127 S. Ct. 1769, 167 L. Ed. 2d 686 (2007))). A court does "not weigh the evidence or attempt to determine the credibility of the witnesses." Kammueller v. Loomis, Fargo & Co., 383 F.3d 779, 784 (8th Cir. 2004) (citation omitted). [*8] "Rather, the court's function is to determine whether a dispute about a material fact is genuine . . .." Quick v. Donaldson Co., Inc., 90 F.3d 1372, 1376-77 (8th Cir. 1996).

The mere existence of cross motions for summary judgment does not mean the parties are taking inconsistent positions. See Jacobson v. Md. Cas. Co., 336 F.2d 72, 75 (8th Cir. 1964). There may be genuine issues of material facts regarding one motion but not the other. Id. (citation omitted). When a court confronts cross motions for summary judgment, the court views the record in the light most favorable to plaintiff when considering defendant's motion, and the court views the record in the light most favorable to defendant when considering plaintiff's motion. Weber v. Travelers Home & Marine Ins. Co., 801 F. Supp. 2d 819, 825 (D. Minn. 2011). On cross motions for summary judgment, a party concedes there are no factual issues and accepts the other party's allegations only for the purpose of the party's own motion. C. Line, Inc. v. City of Davenport, 957 F. Supp. 2d 1012, 1024 (S.D. Iowa 2013). A court must consider each motion separately. Wright v. Keokuk Cty. Health Ctr., 399 F. Supp. 2d 938, 946 (S.D. Iowa 2005) (citations omitted). Indeed, the presentation of cross motions for summary judgment does not mandate that a court grant summary judgment in favor of one side or the other. Hot Stuff Foods, LLC v. Houston Cas. Co., 771 F.3d 1071, 1076 (8th Cir. 2014). Similarly, the filing of cross motions for summary judgment does not mean that the parties have waived their right to trial. See Wermager v. Cormorant Twp. Bd., 716 F.2d 1211, 1214 (8th Cir. 1983) ("[T]he filing of cross motions for summary judgment does [*9] not necessarily indicate that there is no dispute as to a material fact, or have the effect of submitting the cause to a plenary determination on the merits." (citations omitted)).

III. NATURE OF CLAIMS AND CONTRACTS

The parties agree that the Court should apply Iowa law to the merits of plaintiff's claims. (Docs. 140, at 14, 37-38, 39; 159, at 13, 41, 44). The parties disagree, however, as to whether Iowa law governs the validity of the contracts themselves. Plaintiff argues that Iowa law should apply to determine the validity of the contracts. (Doc. 130, at 6 n.2). Defendant does not argue in favor of any specific body of law, but defendant does indicate that other states' laws may be applicable in determining the validity of the contracts. (Doc. 146, at 6 n.1; see also Doc. 92, at 57 (hearing transcript in which counsel for defendant agreed to the application of the Iowa standard for tortious interference but advocated for the application for different states' laws in determining the validity of the contracts at issue)). Defendant does not substantiate this argument or otherwise request that the Court engage in a conflict of laws analysis. Thus, the Court will not engage in a conflict [*10] of laws analysis and will, instead, apply Iowa law as to all issues. See Wolgin v. Simon, 722 F.2d 389, 391 (8th Cir. 1984) ("A federal court exercising jurisdiction solely on the basis of diversity of citizenship must apply the substantive law of the forum in which it sits." (citation omitted)).

Of plaintiff's four claims, two have the potential to be duplicative, either in whole or in part. Plaintiff's claims for tortious interference with contract and for tortious interference with prospective economic advantage are each based on a similar premise, and the claims have similar elements. The differences between the claims lie in the type of interference that is considered "improper," and whether the harm alleged is based on an existing contractual relationship as opposed to a relationship that may vest in the future. Nesler v. Fisher & Co., 452 N.W.2d 191, 196-99 (Iowa 1990); RTL Distrib., Inc. v. Double S Batteries, Inc., 545 N.W.2d 587, 590-91 (Iowa Ct. App. 1996). The type of interference that is considered "improper" is discussed below.

Plaintiff argues that defendant's interference is twofold. First, plaintiff argues that by hiring plaintiff's drivers, defendant has prevented—and continues to prevent—plaintiff's drivers from working for plaintiff. (Doc. 43, at 5-6 (alleging that defendant's actions deprive plaintiff of "a reliable source of professional truck drivers")). Second, [*11] plaintiff argues that by hiring plaintiff's drivers, defendant has caused—and continues to cause—plaintiff's drivers to breach their non-competition agreements. (Id., at 7-8 ("[Defendant] has intentionally and improperly interfered with [plaintiff's] Employment Contracts by recruiting, encouraging, and/or otherwise assisting drivers to leave [plaintiff] during the [r]estrictive [t]erm . . ..")).

Under Iowa law, "contracts [that are] terminable at will are more properly protected as a prospective business advantage rather than as a contract." Compiano v. Hawkeye Bank & Tr., 588 N.W.2d 462, 464 (Iowa 1999) (citation omitted). See also Mills v. Iowa, 924 F. Supp. 2d 1016, 1041 (S.D. Iowa 2013). Before addressing the merits of each claim, then, the Court must determine whether the drivers were employed on an at-will basis and whether the restrictive covenants were terminable at will. If the Court finds that either, or both, sets of contractual provisions were terminable at will, the Court will characterize the claim relating to that provision as a claim for tortious interference with a prospective economic advantage.

To be bound by an ongoing obligation requires a binding contract. Under Iowa law, "[i]t is fundamental that a valid contract must consist of an offer, acceptance, and consideration." Margeson v. Artis, 776 N.W.2d 652, 655 (Iowa 2009) (citation omitted). [*12] The Court finds that each Driver Contract at issue is supported by an offer, acceptance, and consideration. The parties do not dispute that each driver indicated acceptance, so the Court will assume that each driver accepted the contract offered to him. Likewise, the Court finds that the Driver Contracts were supported by an offer and consideration.

The parties do not dispute that an offer was made to each driver, and the Court agrees. The exact terms of those offers, however, requires some discussion. The Court finds that, in addition to the restrictive covenant discussed at length below, there are two paragraphs of the Driver Employment Contracts that are relevant for present purposes. Those paragraphs read as follows:

> 3. TERM OF EMPLOYMENT. The term of [plaintiff's] employment of Employee under this Contract shall be for a period of ten (10) months commencing as of the [date of signing the Contract] (the "Term") subject to termination prior to the end of the Term pursuant to Section 4 of this Contract. Following the Term, [plaintiff] shall employ Employee on an at-will basis, and either party may terminate the employment relationship at any time effective immediately[.]

> 4. TERMINATION OF EMPLOYMENT [*13] . During the Term[,] Employee's employment may be terminated only for the following reasons: 1) by [plaintiff] with or without Due Cause effective immediately, 2) by mutual agreement of [plaintiff] and Employee, or 3) upon the death of Employee. For purposes of this Contract, "Due Cause" means Employee's breach of this Contract and/or Employee's failure to satisfy or comply with any of the standards, requirements, obligations and conditions set forth in the [CRST Professional Driver's Handbook]. . . .

(Doc. 130-2, at 51).

Paragraph Three of the Driver Contracts would suggest that the drivers are not hired as at-will employees, but, rather, are hired for a defined term of employment. Paragraph Four, however, shows otherwise. Paragraph Four provides that plaintiff can terminate an employee's employment for cause, or for no reason at all, which amounts to plaintiff's reservation of the right to terminate an employee at any time. Thus, even though Paragraph Three purports to set forth a ten-month employment term, Paragraph Four modifies the purported employment term and is best characterized as an offer to employ an employee for an indefinite period of time. The offer that was made to each [*14] driver-signatory, then, was not an offer of employment for a period of ten months.

Neither party contends that any driver made a counter offer, so the Court will assume that no counter offers were made. Plaintiff offered to employ each driver for an indefinite period of time, and it is this offer that each driver at issue is alleged to have accepted. Employees who are hired for an indefinite period of time are considered at-will employees. Allen v. Highway Equip. Co., 239 N.W.2d 135, 142 (Iowa 1976). See also Fitzgerald v. Salsbury Chem., Inc., 613 N.W.2d 275, 281 (Iowa 2000) ("[T]he traditional doctrine of [at-will employment] is now more properly stated as permitting termination at any time for any lawful reason." (citation, internal quotation marks, and emphasis omitted)). The Court concludes that the drivers at issue here were at-will employees.

The restrictive covenants were, however, for a defined period of time. The contracts specify that the restrictive covenants were for a period of ten months, and the restrictive covenants were not terminable at will by either party. (See Doc. 130-2, at 51-52). Although the offer of employment that was made was at-will, the offer to accept employment on condition of the restrictive covenant amounted to an offer to accept employment subject to an ongoing obligation. [*15] The contracts were, consequently, for employment at-will, subject to an ongoing obligation not to compete.

Defendant argues that the Driver Contracts were supported by the same consideration as were the Pre-Employment Agreements and were, therefore, invalid for lack of independent consideration. (Doc. 146, at 11-12). The Court disagrees. The consideration for the Pre-Employment Agreements was plaintiff providing training for the drivers. The consideration for the Driver Contracts was plaintiff hiring the drivers. Thus, each contract was supported by independent consideration.

Defendant suggests that plaintiff purports to rely on continued employment as consideration for the Driver Contracts. (Id., at 12, n.5). The Court does not view plaintiff as arguing this theory, but the Court would reject the proposal if plaintiff were offering it. The contracts were for at-will employment and could not constitute an agreement for continued employment. Thus, any promise made by plaintiff to continually employ the drivers would have been illusory and could not constitute consideration. See *Raccoon Valley State Bank v. Gratias, No. 04-1854, 2006 Iowa App. LEXIS 1920, 2006 WL 3798902, at 3 (Iowa Ct. App. Dec. 28, 2006) ("A promise is illusory when it fails to bind the promisor, who retains the option of discontinuing performance." (citing [*16] 17A AM. JUR. 2D Contracts § 130, at 150-51 (2004))). This is inconsequential, however, because the mere act of hiring the drivers constituted consideration for the Driver Contracts.

The Court finds that all three elements necessary for formation of a valid contract are present with respect to the Driver Contracts. The contracts were, however, partially terminable at will and partially subject to an ongoing obligation. Because the drivers were at-will employees, plaintiff's claim that defendant actively recruited and hired plaintiff's drivers is best characterized as a claim for tortious interference with prospective economic advantage. Compiano, 588 N.W.2d at 464. The claim for interference with the restrictive covenants, on the other hand, amounts to a claim for interference with an ongoing contractual obligation and is best characterized as a claim for tortious interference with contract. See Nesler, 452 N.W.2d at 196-99. The Court will consider each claim consistent with these conclusions.

IV. CRST v. TransAm

This Court recently considered whether to grant summary judgment in a companion case that presented factual allegations nearly identical to those alleged in this case. See CRST Expedited, Inc. v. TransAm Trucking, Inc., No. C16-52-LTS, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 135900, 2018 WL 3738017 (N.D. Iowa July 31, 2018) ("TransAm"). In TransAm, however, [*17] the parties did not directly address the applicability of the at-will employment doctrine. Rather, the plaintiff in that case—which is also the plaintiff in this case—summarily asserted that the contracts at issue were not at-will contracts. (See TransAm, No. 16-cv-52-LTS, Doc. 167, at 22 n.12, 38). The Court therefore did not address whether the contracts were at-will contracts, in whole or in part.

In this case, by contrast, plaintiff has raised the at-will employment issue, and plaintiff has directly argued the applicability of the doctrine to the tortious interference claims. (See, e.g., CRST v. Swift, 17-cv-25-CJW-KEM, Doc. 159, at 23-24). Indeed, plaintiff's briefing in this case highlights plaintiff's argument that even if a contract is partially terminable at will, "when the obligation to refrain from working for a competitor is not at-will, but, instead, an ongoing obligation, a competitor makes a second, conscious decision beyond acquiring services in the open market—the competitor causes the breach by hiring the applicant . . .." (Id., at 25). Because plaintiff, here, raises the at-will employment issue in a non-conclusory fashion and now applies the at-will employment doctrine to [*18] the facts of this case, the Court finds it appropriate to address the issue.

It is this application of the at-will employment doctrine that leads the Court to reach a different conclusion now than it did when considering TransAm. The Court notes, specifically, that when the drivers' status as at-will employees is considered separately from the restrictive covenants, the causation analysis reaches a different conclusion as to the restrictive covenants. That is, because plaintiff now successfully argues that the restrictive covenants were not terminable at will, the Court will address causation separately as to the restrictive covenants under plaintiff's tortious interference with contract claim. The Court did not do so in TransAm because the plaintiff did not fully set forth this argument, and the plaintiff did not address how the ongoing nature of the restrictive covenants impacted the causation analysis. The Court's causation analysis in TransAm closely mirrors the causation analysis the Court now engages in under plaintiff's tortious interference with prospective economic advantage claim. *See TransAm, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 135900, 2018 WL 3738017, at 15-17.

V. DISCUSSION OF CLAIMS

A. Intentional Interference with Contract

Under Iowa law, the elements [*19] of intentional interference with contract are:

> 1) the plaintiff had a valid contractual relationship with a third party; 2) the defendant knew of that relationship; 3) the defendant intentionally interfered with that relationship; 4) the defendant's action caused the third party to breach its contractual relationship with the plaintiff or disrupted the contractual relationship between the third party and the plaintiff by making performance more burdensome or expensive; and 5) . . . damages.

Gen. Elec. Capital Corp., 485 F. Supp. 2d at 1025 (citations omitted). Defendant argues that plaintiff's interference with contract claim fails as a matter of law on each of the five elements. (Doc. 140, at 14-37). As discussed above, the Court will consider only plaintiff's claim that defendant tortiously interfered with the drivers' restrictive covenants under the intentional interference with contract claim. Plaintiff's claim that defendant interfered with the drivers' agreement to work for plaintiff will be considered under the tortious interference with prospective economic advantage claim.

1. Contract Validity and Enforceability

The bulk of the parties' arguments, including those in plaintiff's own motion for summary judgment, revolve around [*20] the validity of the Driver Contracts. In its affirmative motion, defendant asserts that the contracts are void 1) as a matter of law because the non-competition provisions are unsupported by a protectable interest, and 2) as against public policy. These flaws in the non-competition provisions, defendant argues, invalidate the entirety of the contracts.

Plaintiff argues that defendant can be liable for tortious interference with contract if defendant improperly interfered with a contract that was not void ab initio and had not been avoided at the time of the interference. (Doc. 130, at 12-14). From this premise, plaintiff reasons that if a contract was not actually avoided before defendant's alleged interference, defendant lacks standing to assert those defenses that would permit a contracting party to avoid a contract. (Id.). Plaintiff, consequently, seeks summary judgment as to defendant's affirmative defenses that would permit defendant to argue that the contracts are voidable. (Id., at 14-23). In response, defendant maintains that the contracts were void from their inception, but argues that even if they were not, the Court should still find that the contracts are invalid. (Doc. 146, at 21-22). [*21] In support, defendant asserts that courts, including Iowa courts, no longer "emphasize the void versus voidable distinction," and that the Restatement (Third) of Torts: Liability for Economic Harm "does not even reference the void versus voidable distinction, but instead looks to whether the contract is 'valid.'" (Id., at 22).

The Court rejects defendant's assertion that the void/voidable distinction is inapplicable. As this Court recognized in TransAm, "[t]he void/voidable distinction is far from outdated." *2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 135900, 2018 WL 3738017, at 9. Iowa courts have continued to follow the Restatement (Second) of Torts for intentional interference cases. See, e.g., Jones v. Univ. of Iowa, 836 N.W.2d 127, 151 (Iowa 2013); Spreitzer v. Hawkeye State Bank, 779 N.W.2d 726, 737 (Iowa 2009); Kern v. Palmer Coll. of Chiropractic, 757 N.W.2d 651, 663-64 (Iowa 2008); Condon Auto Sales & Serv., Inc. v. Crick, 604 N.W.2d 587, 601 (Iowa 2000); RTL Distrib., Inc. v. Double S Batteries, Inc., 545 N.W.2d 587, 590 (Iowa Ct. App. 1996). This Court has addressed the void/voidable distinction in this very case, as well as in two companion cases. *See TransAm, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 135900, 2018 WL 3738017, at 9-10; *CRST Expedited, Inc. v. JB Hunt Transp., Inc., Nos. 17-CV-26 CJW & 17-CV-24 CJW, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 96434, 2018 WL 2768874, at 10-13 (N.D. Iowa June 8, 2018) ("JB Hunt"); *CRST Expedited, Inc. v. Swift Transp. Co. of Ariz., LLC, No. 17-CV-25-CJW, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 81755, 2018 WL 2016274, at 7-9 (N.D. Iowa Apr. 30, 2018) ("Swift"). Finally, the Court has been unable to find any Iowa caselaw adopting the Restatement (Third) of Torts: Liability for Economic Harm, which is still in draft form and has yet to be officially published. RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF [*22] TORTS: LIABILITY FOR ECONOMIC HARM (AM. LAW INST., Tentative Draft No. 3, 2018).

When addressing the void/voidability distinction in this case previously, the Court engaged in the following discussion:

> The Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 766, Intentional Interference with Performance of Contract by Third Person, Comment f provides as follows:
> > Voidable contracts. The word "contract" connotes a promise creating a duty recognized by law. The particular agreement must be in force and effect at the time of the breach that the actor has caused; and if for any reason it is entirely void, there is no liability for causing its breach. Furthermore, it must be applicable to the particular performance that the third person has been induced or caused not to discharge. It is not, however, necessary that the contract be legally enforceable against the third person. A promise may be a valid and subsisting contract even though it is voidable. The third person may have a defense against action on the contract that would permit him to avoid it and escape liability on it if he sees fit to do so. Until he does, the contract is a valid and subsisting relation, with which the actor is not permitted to interfere improperly. Thus, by reason of [*23] the statute of frauds, formal defects, lack of mutuality, infancy, unconscionable provisions, conditions precedent to the obligation or even uncertainty of particular terms, the third person may be in a position to avoid liability for any breach. The defendant actor is not, however, for that reason free to interfere with performance of the contract before it is avoided.

> (emphasis added) (internal citations omitted). Peterson v. First Nat'l Bank of Iowa, 392 N.W.2d 158, 165-66 (Iowa Ct. App. 1986). See also Stone's Pharmacy, Inc. v. Pharmacy Accounting Mgmt., Inc., 875 F.2d 665, 668 (8th Cir. 1989). Further, the Supreme Court of Iowa has held that "[i]n the case of a voidable contract, if neither party seeks avoidance, the court cannot avoid the contract, and the contract remains valid." Nichols v. City of Evansdale, 687 N.W.2d 562, 571 (Iowa 2004) (citing First State Bank v. Shirley Ag Serv., Inc., 417 N.W.2d 448, 452 (Iowa 1987)).
> Whether the contracts are voidable, therefore, is a separate issue from whether the contracts were valid at the time of the alleged wrongful interference. Defendant appears to confuse the two concepts by arguing that should the drivers successfully argue that the contracts are substantively unenforceable, defendant cannot face any liability for its alleged interference. On the other hand, if any of the drivers successfully avoided their contracts prior to defendant's alleged interference, defendant would not be liable for any alleged interference with those contracts. [*24]

*Swift, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 81755, 2018 WL 2016274, at 8. When asked to address the void/voidability distinction in TransAm, this Court again reached the same conclusion. See *TransAm, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 135900, 2018 WL 3738017, at 10. The Court is unpersuaded that it should now abandon the void/voidability distinction.

Defendant has not identified any contract that defendant asserts was avoided.[5] The issue, then, is twofold. First, the Court must consider whether the contracts were void ab initio. If the Court answers that question in the negative, the Court will then address which of defendant's affirmative defenses, if any, assert principles of law that would permit a contracting party to avoid a contract. Those defenses that would permit a contracting party to avoid a contract cannot be properly asserted by defendant and must fail as a matter of law, unless defendant is able to identify contracts that it contends were avoided before defendant's alleged interference.

Defendant asserts that the contracts are void because the non-competition provisions contained within the contracts are not supported by a protectable interest, which, defendant argues, renders the contracts facially invalid. (Doc. 140, at 27, 27 n.7-8, 30). Defendant also argues that the contracts are void as a matter of law because [*25] the non-competition provisions operate as "indefinite, lifetime non-compete agreement[s]." (Doc. 140, at 30-33). The former argument addresses whether a non-competition provision renders a contract void when the reasons supporting the non-competition provision are insufficient, and the latter argument addresses whether a non-competition provision renders a contract void if the non-competition provision is in violation of public policy. The Court will address each issue in turn, considering whether either argument, if successful, would render the contracts void or merely voidable.

a. Lack of Protectable Interest

Under Iowa law, non-competition provisions are measured against a reasonability standard. Mut. Loan Co. v. Pierce, 245 Iowa 1051, 65 N.W.2d 405, 407 (Iowa 1954) ("It comes down to a question of reasonableness. The restraint will be enforced if reasonably necessary to afford a fair protection to the business interests of the party in favor of whom it is given."). See also Ag Spectrum Co. v. Elder, 191 F. Supp. 3d 966, 971 (S.D. Iowa 2016) (setting forth the relevant Iowa standards in assessing whether a contract is "enforceable"). If a non-competition provision is not reasonably necessary, it is "unenforceable." Mut. Loan Co., 65 N.W.2d at 408. Iowa courts have not squarely addressed what it means for a contract to be "unenforceable." That is, [*26] Iowa law is unclear as to whether a contract is "unenforceable" because it is void, or whether the contract is "unenforceable" because an unreasonable non-competition provision permits avoidance.

[5] The Court notes that although defendant has not identified any contract that defendant contends was avoided, plaintiff has not come forward with conclusive evidence that no contract was avoided. The Court, therefore, cannot conclusively find that defendant is unable to prove that any contract was avoided.

The Court finds that the use of the term "unenforceable," as opposed to "void," is intentional. The Iowa Supreme Court has repeatedly recognized the distinction between contracts that are unenforceable versus those that are void. See Mincks Agric. Ctr., Inc. v. Bell Farms, Inc., 611 N.W.2d 270, 273-74 (Iowa 2000) (recognizing that a contract is void if performance of the contract would require criminal conduct but explaining that a contract that violates a statutory provision without implicating criminal law calls the contract's enforceability into question); Mut. Loan Co., 65 N.W.2d at 407-08 (adopting rule that a contract is unenforceable if not reasonably necessary but recognizing that at least one other court found that restraints on competition are void, except in special circumstances). The Iowa Supreme Court, in explaining the reasonability standard for enforcement of non-competition provisions, seemed to adopt the rule that "[r]estraints on competition are void, except in the special case where they are necessary in order to prevent the employee from unjustly enriching himself at the expense of [*27] his former employer." Mut. Loan Co., 65 N.W.2d at 408 (emphasis added) (quoting John Roane, Inc. v. Tweed, 32 Del. Ch. 90, 80 A.2d 290, 293 (Del. Ch. 1951) (interpreting Maryland contract law), rev'd 33 Del. Ch. 4, 89 A.2d 548 (Del. 1952)).

Reading Mutual Loan more closely, however, reveals that the Iowa Supreme Court did not, in fact, hold that restraints on competition are void where not necessary. Rather, the Mutual Loan court quoted the Delaware Court of Chancery's decision in John Roane, Inc. v. Tweed for illustrative purposes only. Further, the Mutual Loan court cited John Roane for the proposition that a non-competition provision must be reasonably necessary. See Mut. Loan Co., 65 N.W.2d at 408. The Mutual Loan court did not reference John Roane to determine the legal implications of an improper non-competition provision. Had the Mutual Loan court intended to reference John Roane to determine the validity, as opposed to enforceability, of an improper non-competition provision, the Mutual Loan court likely would have discussed two separate principles.

First, the Mutual Loan court likely would have focused on the use of "void" in John Roane in an attempt to discern whether the John Roane court meant "void" in the traditional sense, or whether "void" was mistakenly used in place of "unenforceable." Second, the Mutual Loan court likely would have turned [*28] to the Delaware Supreme Court's review of the Court of Chancery's John Roane decision.[6] The Delaware Supreme Court, in reviewing the John Roane decision, spoke in terms of the "enforceability" of the contract at issue. John Roane, Inc. v. Tweed, 33 Del. Ch. 4, 89 A.2d 548, 550 (Del. 1952) ("[T]he essential question here concerns the enforceability of a contract admittedly in partial restraint of trade and competition."). The Delaware Supreme Court did not adopt the lower court's holding that "[r]estraints on competition are void" when special circumstances cannot be shown. John Roane, Inc., 80 A.2d at 293.

Had the Iowa Supreme Court intended to rely upon the Delaware Court of Chancery's proclamation regarding the validity of contracts, the Iowa Supreme Court likely would have either attempted to distinguish Iowa contract law from Maryland contract law, or would have explained the basis for the Iowa Supreme Court's disagreement with the Delaware Supreme Court. That the Iowa Supreme Court made no attempt to analyze the use or meaning of the term "void" indicates that the word "void" was not the Iowa Supreme Court's focus in Mutual Loan and was included in the opinion merely because the term was encompassed within a relevant quotation.

Moreover, in Mutual [*29] Loan, the Iowa Supreme Court referenced whether a contract would be "void," as discussed above, but went on to speak in terms of a contract's enforceability. That the court contemplated both validity and enforceability in the same decision indicates that the court spoke in terms of "enforceability," and reached a holding based on "enforceability," intentionally. The Iowa Supreme Court just as easily could have spoken in terms of validity and reached a holding based on the validity of the contract at issue. The court did not do so, however, and the case law leaves this Court persuaded that "void" and "unenforceable" are not synonymous in the Iowa non-competition clause context.

[6] The Court notes that the Delaware Supreme Court's John Roane decision was issued two years before the Iowa Supreme Court's Mutual Loan decision. Thus, the Delaware Supreme Court's decision was available to the Iowa Supreme Court when the Iowa Supreme Court decided Mutual Loan.

Finally, this Court has been unable to find any Iowa state court decision, Iowa federal court decision, or Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals decision, other than Mutual Loan, referencing the lower court's John Roane decision,[7] or holding that an improper non-competition provision would render a contract—or the non-competition provision alone—void. If Iowa courts were of the opinion that a problematic non-competition provision renders a non-competition clause void, the Court finds it likely that this opinion would [*30] have been articulated in more than one decision and would not have been mentioned only in passing. The Court concludes that under Iowa law, a non-competition clause that is not reasonably necessary may be rendered unenforceable, but a finding that the clause is not reasonably necessary does not, alone, serve to void either the non-competition clause or the contract as a whole.[8]

As this Court has repeatedly found, if a third party interferes with a valid contract, that third party may be liable for tortious interference, if all other elements of the claim are met. The Court now finds that although a non-competition clause can be rendered unenforceable if it is not reasonably necessary, the lack of reasonable necessity does not render the contract void. Thus, the contract would remain a valid agreement and the contracting party against whom enforcement is sought could argue that the non-competition provision is unenforceable as to him. This defense, however, would not relieve an alleged tortious interferer because, as set out above, "[a] promise may be a valid and subsisting contract even though it is voidable." Restatement (Second) of Torts, § 766, cmt. f (AM. LAW INST. 2018).

Defendant argues that an unenforceable contract cannot support a claim for tortious interference with contract. (Doc. 140, at 24-25, 25 n.5 (citing Iowa Office Supply, Inc. v. Access Techs., Inc., No. EQCV150495, 2013 WL 6511495, at *5 (Iowa Dist. Feb. 22, 2013))). The Restatement (Second) of Contracts and Eighth Circuit precedent, however, counsel otherwise. Rucker v. Taylor, 828 N.W.2d 595 (Iowa 2013) (relying on numerous provisions of the [*32] Restatement (Second) of Contracts)). The Restatement (Second) of Contracts provides, and the Eighth Circuit has agreed, that "[w]here a party to a contract which is unenforceable against him refuses . . . to perform the contract . . ., the other party is justified in suspending any performance for which he has not already received the agreed return . . .." RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONTRACTS, § 141(2) (AM. LAW INST. 2019); Black v. Hesse, 869 F.2d 420, 422 (8th Cir. 1989) (stating common law principle). Under the Restatement (Second) of Contracts and Black v. Hesse, a wronged party may suspend performance but is not required to. Until the wronged party chooses to suspend performance, then, the parties are free to operate as though the contract is fully enforceable. The recognition that the subject contract would be unenforceable as to only one contracting party also implies that the contract remains valid. This is because an invalid contract would not be enforceable against any party. Again, the Court finds a distinction between validity of a contract and enforceability.

In support of its position that an improper non-competition provision renders the provision, and the contract, void rather than voidable, defendant cites a number of cases. The first, Iowa Office Supply, Inc. [*33] v. Access

[7] The Iowa Supreme Court has, on one occasion, referenced the Delaware Supreme Court's John Roane decision. See Ehlers v. Iowa Warehouse Co., 188 N.W.2d 368, 370 (Iowa 1971) (referring to John Roane, Inc. v. Tweed as Roane, Inc. v. Tweed). It is the lower court's John Roane decision, however, that this Court is concerned with.

[8] The Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 8 addresses this very issue. Section 8 reads: "An unenforceable contract is one for the breach of which neither the remedy of damages nor the remedy of specific performance is available, but which is recognized in some other way as creating a duty of performance, though there has been no ratification." Comment a to Section 8 elaborates:

> a. Distinction between "voidable" and "unenforceable." Just as a contract may be voidable by one party or by either party, so it may be enforceable by one and not by the other or it may be unenforceable by either. Similarly, one party to an unenforceable contract may have a power to make the contract enforceable by all the usual remedies, and both voidable and unenforceable contracts may have collateral consequences. Voidable contracts might be defined as one type of unenforceable contract. As defined here, however, the term unenforceable contract refers to rules under which the duty of performance does not depend solely on the election of one party. In the transactions here classified as unenforceable, some legal consequences other than the [*31] creation of a power of ratification follow without further action by either party.

Technologies, Inc., is cited only for a sentence contained in the Iowa District Court's conclusion paragraph: "Because the agreement is unenforceable, [plaintiff's] claim for intentional interference with a contract must necessarily fail." (Doc. 140, at 24-25, 25 n.5). As discussed, the Court finds that there is a distinction between contracts that are unenforceable and those that are void. Further, the cited proposition is accompanied by no analysis and can be viewed as a conclusory holding that the defense of unenforceability falls into the "void category." The Court declines to adopt this conclusory holding when the state case law and Restatement (Second) of Contracts instruct that the Court should reach a different conclusion.

Next, defendant turns to a case from the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, NCH Corp. v. Share Corp., 757 F.2d 1540 (5th Cir. 1985), for the proposition that "unreasonable noncompetes are void rather than voidable 'because of the public policy against restraints of trade,' and [can] not support tortious interference claim[s]." (Doc. 140, at 26 (quoting NCH Corp., 757 F.2d at 1543)). The Court recognizes that the Fifth Circuit, in applying Texas law, held that a defendant could assert unenforceability as a defense to a tortious interference [*34] with contract claim. NCH Corp., 757 F.2d at 1543-44. Defendant does not, however, argue that the Court should apply Texas law to determine the validity of the contracts at issue. Indeed, defendant does not argue in favor of application of any specific body of law. As noted above, the Court is, thus, applying Iowa law throughout its analysis, including in determining the validity of the contracts. Had defendant argued in favor of applying Texas law to determine the validity of the contracts, perhaps the outcome would be different. Under Iowa law, however, defendant is precluded from asserting unenforceability as a defense in this action.

Defendant cites to five other cases in support of its argument that the absence of a protectable interest renders a non-competition clause, and the accompanying contract, void. (See Doc. 140, at 26, 27 n.7-8, 30). Each of the cited cases, however, relies on the laws of a state other than Iowa. Spectrum Creations, L.P. v. Carolyn Kinder International, LLC, No. SA-05-CV-750-XR, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10603, 2008 WL 416264 (W.D. Tex. Feb. 13, 2008), was decided by a federal court sitting in Texas that applied Florida law, in relevant part. *See 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10603, 2008 WL 416264, at 66. Two of defendant's other cited cases, GPS Industries, LLC v. Lewis, 691 F. Supp. 2d 1327 (M.D. Fla. 2010), and In re Maxxim Medical Group, Inc., 434 B.R. 660 (M.D. Fla. 2010), likewise applied Florida law. As has already been discussed, the [*35] Court is applying Iowa law throughout its analysis, and the Court does not find it necessary to look beyond the Iowa case law to determine whether defendant can assert the defense of unenforceability. Even if the Court were inclined to look beyond the Iowa case law, however, these three cases would be of limited value to the Court.

Florida has codified limitations on restrictive covenants: "Any restrictive covenant not supported by a legitimate business interest is unlawful and is void and unenforceable." FLA. STAT. § 542.335(1)(b). Each of the three cases decided under Florida law cite to this statute in addressing the validity of the restrictive covenants at issue. In re Maxxim Med. Grp., Inc., 434 B.R. at 684-85, 685 n.182; GPS Indus., LLC, 691 F. Supp. 2d at 1333; *Spectrum Creations, L.P., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10603, 2008 WL 416264, at 66. Iowa does not have an analogous statute that addresses the legal effects of a restrictive covenant that is not supported by a protectable interest. The cases decided under Florida law, then, are not on point because they were decided with reference to a law that is not implicated here.

Defendant cites to Rebsamen Insurance v. Milton, 269 Ark. 737, 600 S.W.2d 441, 444 (Ark. Ct. App. 1980), in which the Arkansas Court of Appeals held that a restrictive covenant was unreasonable and therefore "against public policy, unenforceable and void." To determine whether to uphold the restrictive covenant at issue, the Rebsamen court considered [*36] the reasonableness of the covenant. 600 S.W.2d at 443-44. The Rebsamen court ultimately concluded that the restrictive covenant was "broader than necessary to protect [the plaintiff's] legitimate business interests," which led the court to conclude that the restrictive covenant was unreasonable. Id. at 444.

Although the test employed by the Rebsamen court is similar to the test employed under Iowa law, the Rebsamen court did not explain why it found the contract "unenforceable and void." Id. There is no indication that the Rebsamen court found a distinction between contracts that are "unenforceable" and those that are "void." As discussed supra, however, the Court is persuaded that Iowa law does distinguish between contracts that are "unenforceable" and those that are "void." Rebsamen is, thus, distinguishable.

Finally, defendant cites to *Cytimmune Sciences, Inc. v. Paciotti, No. PWG-16-1010, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 121188, 2016 WL 4699417, at 2 (D. Md. Sept. 8, 2016), in which the District of Maryland held that a restrictive covenant was not enforceable because it was not supported by a legally protected interest and was contrary to public policy. The Cytimmune Sciences court, however, was faced with a very different issue than this Court is confronted with. In Cytimmune Sciences, the plaintiff [*37] brought a motion for preliminary injunction to enforce a restrictive covenant that would have prevented the defendant from working for a competitor. Because the movant only sought to enforce the restrictive covenant, the Cytimmune Sciences court did not need to consider whether the unenforceability of the restrictive covenant would render either the restrictive covenant or the entire contract void. Instead, the court could—and did—decide only the narrower question of whether to enforce the restrictive covenant. See *2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 121188, [WL] at 4. Cytimmune Sciences, then, does not assist this Court in determining whether the contracts in this case would be rendered void, as opposed to voidable, if the Court were to find that the restrictive covenants were unenforceable.

The Court rejects defendant's argument that defendant is entitled to summary judgment because the potential lack of a protectable interest renders the contracts void. The Court, instead, finds that any lack of a protectable interest would render the contracts voidable. As defendant does not argue that any contracts at issue were avoided before defendant's alleged interference, defendant cannot presently rely upon the defense of a lack of a protectable [*38] interest. See Nichols, 687 N.W.2d at 571 (holding that when a contract has not been avoided, the contract remains valid (citation omitted)). The Court need not consider whether plaintiff has a protectable interest sufficient to support the non-competition provisions because the Court's conclusion on this issue would be of no consequence as to the issues before the Court.

b. Violation of Public Policy

Defendant next argues that the contracts are void as a matter of law because the non-competition provisions "operate[ ] as . . . indefinite and lifetime non-competition restriction[s], again violative of the public interest." (Doc. 140, at 26). Additionally, defendant argues that the contracts are procedurally and substantively unconscionable, which renders them void as a matter of law. (Id., at 26 n.6; see also Doc. 146, at 17-21). The Court rejects both arguments.

When addressing the defense of unconscionability, Iowa courts consider whether to enforce contracts. See, e.g., Lakeside Boating & Bathing, Inc. v. Iowa, 402 N.W.2d 419, 422 (Iowa 1987) ("We have held that a bargain will be deemed unenforceable if it is such as no man in his senses and not under delusion would make on the one hand, and as no honest and fair man would accept on the other." (citations and internal quotation marks omitted)). [*39] See also In re Marriage of Shanks, 758 N.W.2d 506, 513 (Iowa 2008) ("We next consider whether the agreement is unconscionable and therefore unenforceable."). The Court has already determined that "unenforceable" is not synonymous with "void." The Court thus concludes that an unconscionability defense permits a party to avoid a contract, but an unconscionability defense, if successful, does not render the underlying contract void. This is consistent with this Court's holding in TransAm and with the Restatement (Second) of Torts. See *TransAm, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 135900, 2018 WL 3738017, at 10; Restatement (Second) of Torts § 766 cmt. f ("[B]y reason of . . . unconscionable provisions, . . . the [contracting party] may be in a position to avoid liability for any breach. The defendant actor is not, however, for that reason free to interfere with the performance of the contract before it is avoided."). Because defendant has not argued that any driver avoided his contract with plaintiff, the defense of unconscionability would be of no benefit to defendant, and defendant does not have standing to raise the defense, unless defendant can show that one or more drivers avoided his contract.

Defendant next argues that the restrictive covenants are "indefinite, lifetime non-compete agreement[s]," that violate public policy. (Doc. 140, at 30). This argument, [*40] if successful, would render the non-competition clauses void from their inception. See Harvey v. Care Initiatives, Inc., 634 N.W.2d 681, 684 n.4 (Iowa 2001). The invalidity of the non-competition clauses would relieve defendant from liability on plaintiff's tortious interference with contract claim because the entirety of plaintiff's contract claim rests on the restrictive covenants. Because no other contractual provision is implicated in the contract claim, whether the invalidity of the restrictive covenants would render any other contract term invalid or void is irrelevant. The Court, however, finds that the restrictive covenants do not operate as "indefinite, lifetime non-compete agreements." (Doc. 140, at 30).

Defendant argues that plaintiff's interpretation of the restrictive covenants turns the restrictive covenants into a lifetime ban of each driver-signatory from the trucking industry. (Doc. 140, at 31-33). The restrictive term contained in the contracts reads as follows:[9]

> The term of [plaintiff's] employment of Employee under this Contract shall be for a period of ten (10) months commencing as of the Effective Date (the "Term") . . .. Following the Term, [plaintiff] shall employ Employee on an at-will basis, and either party may terminate the [*41] employment relationship at any time effective immediately[.]

(Doc. 130-2, at 51). The "Effective Date" is the date a driver enters into the contract. (Id.). The contracts go on to state that "Employee agrees and covenants that for a period equal to the greater of the [r]estrictive [t]erm and the duration of [plaintiff's] employment of Employee, Employee will not directly or indirectly provide truck driving services to any CRST Competitor within the continental United States of America." (Id.). The "[r]estrictive [t]erm" is defined as "the Term including any period of the Term remaining after the termination of [plaintiff's] employment of Employee with or without cause by either party . . .." (Id., at 52). The Term can lapse if the employee pays back the full amount that plaintiff advanced for that driver's training. (Id.).

Defendant argues that plaintiff's interpretation of the restrictive covenants is such that, for example, a driver with a ten-month restrictive term who leaves plaintiff's employ after five months cannot work for one of plaintiff's competitors until the driver returns to plaintiff and works for another five months. (Doc. 140, at 31). Thus, even a driver who left plaintiff's [*42] employ ten years ago would be barred from working for a competitor if the driver had any time remaining on his restrictive term. (Id.). In support, defendant cites to the testimony of plaintiff's former chief executive officer, who provided that "if a driver does not either complete his contract term or pay off his contract, he cannot work for another motor carrier for the rest of his life."[10] (Docs. 140, at 31; 140-1, at 16; 140-2, at 16).

In response, plaintiff states that "equating [the contractual exclusive driving and non-compete] terms to a lifetime ban ignores obvious and critical contract terms." (Doc. 159, at 18). Plaintiff goes on to explain that the restrictive covenants are only applicable to plaintiff's competitors and not to the motor carrier industry as a whole. (Id.). Additionally, plaintiff reiterates that a driver-signatory can "simply pay off [his] contract, thus extinguishing the brief ten (10) month exclusive driving commitment." (Id.). Plaintiff does not directly address whether it interprets the restrictive covenants to extend, potentially, for life. Nor does plaintiff address whether its own interpretation of the restrictive covenants matters when considering [*43] the validity of the covenants or the underlying contracts.

The plain meaning of the restrictive covenants does not support defendant's "lifetime ban" interpretation. See Pro-Edge L.P. v. Gue, 419 F. Supp. 2d 1064, 1084-85 (N.D. Iowa 2006) ("[I]n interpreting written contracts[,] . . . the intent of the parties controls, [but] this intent is determined by the language of the contract unless it is ambiguous. . . . [I]t is a court's duty to give effect to the language of the contract in accordance with its plain and ordinary meaning." (citations omitted)); DuTrac Cmty. Credit Union v. Radiology Grp. Real Estate, L.C., 891 N.W.2d 210,

[9] As explained above, some contracts are for a term of ten months and others are for a term of eight months. (Compare Doc. 130-2, at 51, with id., at 57). This difference is immaterial in considering whether the restrictive covenants operate as a lifetime ban. Further, the parties do not argue that this difference is material, nor do the parties point to any other differences in the restrictive covenants contained in the various contracts at issue.

[10] The Court notes that the witness did not, himself, make this statement. Rather, defense counsel asked: "And, in fact, it is the position of CRST that if a driver does not either complete his contract term or pay off his contract, he cannot work for another motor carrier for the rest of his life?" (Doc. 140-2, at 16). The witness responded "Correct." (Id.). Plaintiff does not take issue with this characterization of the testimony, however, and the Court will therefore consider the characterization to be inconsequential.

216 (Iowa 2017) (recognizing that restrictive covenants are contracts and that contract-based rules of construction should apply). The restrictive covenants limit the time a driver agrees not to compete with plaintiff to the greater of "a period equal to" 1) the time remaining on the Restrictive Term, or 2) "the duration of [plaintiff's] employment of Employee." (Doc. 130-2, at 51). The Court finds that this language is not ambiguous and, thus, the language of the restrictive covenants determines the intent of the contracting parties.

Defendant addresses only the first possibility in arguing that the restrictive covenants operate as a "lifetime ban." The plain, commonly understood meaning of "a period equal to" would [*44] mean, for example, that a driver with a ten-month restrictive term who leaves plaintiff's employ after five months would be bound for five months after his employment ended. The plain, commonly understood meaning does not support an interpretation that the driver would be bound indefinitely until he either returned to work for plaintiff for an additional five months or repaid plaintiff for the costs of the driver's training. Indeed, the drivers at issue here are only those who ceased working for plaintiff while still within their restrictive terms. (See Docs. 130, at 3 n.1; 130-7, at 75-79 (identifying the drivers at issue)). Even if plaintiff's employees, including its chief executive officer, interpret the restrictive terms more expansively, the plain meaning of those covenants controls. The plain meaning of the restrictive terms does not support defendant's "lifetime ban" theory.

Defendant does not advance any other arguments as to why the Court should find that the contracts were void ab initio, and the Court thus concludes that they were not void ab initio. Defendant has not carried its burden of establishing that plaintiff lacked a valid contractual relationship with each driver [*45] at the time of defendant's alleged interference, and defendant is, thus, not entitled to summary judgment on the first element of plaintiff's tortious interference with contract claim. Defendant's motion for summary judgment is denied to the extent it seeks a finding that plaintiff did not have a valid contractual relationship with each of the drivers at issue.

Plaintiff's motion for partial summary judgment seeks, in part, to establish the existence of valid contractual relationships with the drivers. The Court finds that plaintiff is entitled to summary judgment to the extent plaintiff's motion seeks to establish that the Driver Contracts, and the restrictive covenants contained therein, are valid. Plaintiff's motion is granted to this limited extent. Plaintiff is not, however, entitled to a finding that plaintiff had valid contracts with the drivers for the drivers' continued employment because, as explained above, the drivers were at-will employees.

2. Knowledge

Plaintiff argues that defendant had actual and constructive knowledge of the contracts at issue at the time of defendant's alleged interference. (Doc. 159, at 18-21). The Iowa Supreme Court has directly addressed the issue [*46] of constructive knowledge in the context of tortious interference with contract: "It is not necessary that the [d]efendant had actual knowledge of the specific contract. It is sufficient that the [d]efendant had knowledge of facts which, if followed by reasonable inquiry, would have led to the disclosure of the contractual relationship . . .." Revere Transducers, Inc. v. Deere & Co., 595 N.W.2d 751, 764 (Iowa 1999) (citation and internal quotation marks omitted). Defendant agrees that plaintiff sent defendant "Contract Notice Letters" advising defendant that certain drivers were "under contract" with plaintiff.[11] (Doc. 140, at 3). Defendant maintains, however, that it did not have notice of the restrictive covenants contained within the Driver Contracts. In doing so, defendant's argument is limited to asserting that "[n]othing in the record suggests [defendant] or anyone at [defendant] had any knowledge as to what 'under contract' means." (Doc. 140, at 33). In ascertaining whether the drivers at issue were subject to ongoing contractual obligations, however, defendant was not limited to the "Contract Notice Letters."

[11] Defendant has not advised whether a "Contract Notice Letter" was sent for each driver at issue here. From prior proceedings in this case, the Court understands that defendant inquires as to a driver's past employment history with other trucking companies before hiring the driver. Mistakes can happen, however, especially when dealing with such a large volume of drivers. Defendant does not argue that it was not advised that any of the drivers at issue were "under contract," and the Court will therefore assume that defendant received a "Contract Notice Letter" for each of the 250 drivers at issue here.

In response to an interrogatory, defendant stated "that it possesses a limited number of Driver Contracts . . .." (Doc. 140-6, at 32). If defendant [*47] came into possession of these contracts before hiring the driver-signatories of those contracts, defendant would have had actual notice of the contracts and of the restrictive covenants contained therein. Defendant's argument that it did not have actual notice of the restrictive covenants because defendant did not know what "under contract" meant fails. Defendant had the contracts themselves and had every opportunity to interpret the relevant provisions itself. That defendant declined to do so, or declined to act upon the interpretation defendant attributed, does not equate to a lack of knowledge. At the very least, the Court finds that defendant could have had actual knowledge of those Driver Contracts that defendant received.

Further, a reasonable factfinder could conclude that the Driver Contracts are standardized such that each driver employed by plaintiff signs an identical contract. If the factfinder were to reach this conclusion, the factfinder could likewise find that actual notice of one contract provided defendant with constructive notice of all other contracts that defendant knew to exist. That is, if defendant had actual notice of any contract, regardless of whether a driver [*48] at issue was a signatory to that contract, receipt of the Contract Notice Letter for any other driver could vest defendant with constructive notice of the terms of the contract referenced in the Contract Notice Letter. Likewise, a reasonable factfinder could find that upon receipt of the Contract Notice Letters, defendant should have inquired as to the meaning of "under contract," and that such an inquiry would have led defendant to learn of the restrictive covenants. Under Revere Transducers, this finding would be sufficient to establish the knowledge element of plaintiff's contract claim. 595 N.W.2d at 764.

Neither party has provided the Court with the date on which defendant first came into possession of one of the Driver Contracts, nor has either party otherwise given the Court enough information to determine, definitively, the earliest date on which defendant could have had either actual or constructive knowledge of the Driver Contracts and their terms. Indeed, based on the facts the Court has, a reasonable factfinder could conclude that defendant first received a Driver Contract before defendant recruited or hired any of the drivers at issue. Drawing all conclusions in plaintiff's favor, as the [*49] Court must, the Court finds that defendant is not entitled to summary judgment on the knowledge element of plaintiff's contract claim for any of the contracts at issue. Based on the evidence presented to the Court, there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether defendant had actual, constructive, or inquiry notice of all of the Driver Contracts and the restrictive covenants contained therein.

3. Intentional and Improper Conduct

This Court has previously addressed the issue of intentional and improper conduct in the context of tortious interference claims. See, e.g., Gen. Elec. Capital Corp., 485 F. Supp. 2d at 1026-27. Plaintiff must prove that defendant's conduct was intentional and improper to succeed on its tort claims; satisfaction of one standard without the other is insufficient to make out a prima facie case. Id. See also Green v. Racing Ass'n of Cent. Iowa, 713 N.W.2d 234, 244 (Iowa 2006). That a defendant interferes intentionally does not necessarily mean that the interference was improper. Gen. Elec. Capital Corp., 485 F. Supp. 2d at 1026-27; Green, 713 N.W.2d at 244 (citations omitted).

"The 'impropriety' or 'wrongfulness' of conduct alleged to be tortious interference is determined according to somewhat different standards, depending upon whether the claim is for tortious interference with an existing contract or for tortious interference with a prospective [*50] or potential contract or business relationship." Gen. Elec. Capital Corp., 485 F. Supp. 2d at 1026. To determine whether conduct was improper in the case of a tortious interference with contract claim, the factors to be considered include: 1) the nature of the conduct; 2) the defendant's motive; 3) the interests of the party with which the conduct interferes; 4) the interest sought to be advanced by the defendant; 5) the social interests in protecting the freedom of action of the defendant and the contractual interests of the other party; 6) the nearness or remoteness of the defendant's conduct to the interference; and 7) the relations between the parties. Green, 713 N.W.2d at 244 (citing Revere Transducers, Inc., 595 N.W.2d at 767; Restatement (Second) of Torts § 767).

"In determining whether the interference is improper, it may become very important to ascertain whether the actor was motivated, in whole or in part, by a desire to interfere with the other's contractual relations. If this was the sole motive the interference is almost certain to be held improper." Nesler, 452 N.W.2d at 197 (quoting Restatement (Second) of Torts § 767 cmt. d). The Iowa Supreme Court has further elaborated:

> [I]f there is no desire at all to accomplish the interference and it is brought about only as a necessary consequence of the conduct of the actor engaged in for an entirely different purpose, his knowledge of this [*51] makes the interference intentional, but the factor of motive carries little weight toward producing a determination that the interference was improper.

Berger v. Cas' Feed Store, Inc., 543 N.W.2d 597, 599 (Iowa 1996) (quoting Restatement (Second) of Torts § 767 cmt. d). Accord Green, 713 N.W.2d at 244. Finally, to show that the alleged interference was intentional requires plaintiff to establish that defendant's interference with plaintiff's "contractual relations was either desired by [defendant] or known by him to be a substantially certain result of [defendant's] conduct." Restatement (Second) of Torts § 767 cmt. d. See also Nesler, 452 N.W.2d at 197.

Here, the questions of whether defendant's alleged interference was intentional and improper are questions of material fact that are genuinely in dispute. The Court, thus, is not permitted to answer those questions at the summary judgment stage. The question of defendant's motive, specifically, is so fraught with factual determinations that the Court could not properly determine the weight to attribute to this factor without weighing the facts of this case. Plaintiff argues, for instance, that defendant changed its hiring practices in August 2016 to permit defendant's recruiters to begin hiring plaintiff's drivers. (Doc. 159, at 24). This change in policy, plaintiff urges, shows that defendant was motivated by a desire to interfere [*52] with those drivers' restrictive covenants in the contracts the drivers had with plaintiff. (Id.). Importantly, plaintiff argues that defendant's knowledge of the contracts, in combination with the change in defendant's hiring practices, generates a genuine issue of material fact as to whether defendant's conduct was intentional and improper. (Id. ("[Defendant's] decision to hire [plaintiff's] drivers knowing it would breach those drivers' [contracts] with [plaintiff], alone, makes [defendant's] actions improper." (emphasis added))).

Plaintiff is correct. Although the evidence plaintiff turns to is circumstantial, the evidence is sufficient for a reasonable jury to find that defendant changed its hiring practices to facilitate interference with plaintiff's Drivers Contracts.[12] This conclusion, were the jury to reach it, would encompass findings of both intentional interference and improper interference. If plaintiff shows that defendant had knowledge of the contracts and interfered with the contracts anyway, this showing will satisfy the intent prong. If plaintiff shows that defendant acted specifically for the purpose of interfering with the contracts, this showing will satisfy the impropriety [*53] prong. The Court thus finds that there are genuine issues of material fact as to whether defendant's conduct was intentional and improper, and summary judgment is therefore inappropriate as to this element.

Although these factual determinations do not make up the entirety of the improper interference element, these determinations are so integral that the Court could not determine, here, whether defendant's conduct was either intentional or improper without considering defendant's motive and desire to interfere. As the Court is not permitted to engage in such factual determinations at this stage as to material facts that are genuinely disputed, the Court is precluded from granting defendant's motion for summary judgment on the improper interference element. Defendant's motion is denied as to this element.

4. Causation

[12] As is discussed below, plaintiff's intentional interference with prospective economic advantage claim requires plaintiff to show that defendant acted with the intent to damage plaintiff. Compiano, 588 N.W.2d at 464. Should the jury find that defendant intended to interfere with the contracts, it does not necessarily follow that defendant did so because defendant wanted to damage plaintiff. Because the two concepts differ, the Court's differing conclusions on the two claims are not inconsistent with each other.

When considering a tortious interference with contract claim, the causation inquiry is whether the alleged tortfeasor's actions caused the breaching party not to perform his contract, or made performance more burdensome or expensive. Gibson v. ITT Hartford Ins. Co., 621 N.W.2d 388, 399 (Iowa 2001). Here, then, the Court's inquiry is whether plaintiff can produce sufficient evidence such that a reasonable jury could find that defendant's [*54] alleged interference caused the drivers not to perform, or that defendant's alleged interference made performance more burdensome or expensive. See Anderson, 477 U.S. at 249. That is, the issue is whether defendant's act of hiring the drivers caused the drivers to breach their restrictive covenants.

The Restatement (Second) of Torts is instructive on the issue of causation:

> An employment contract . . . may be only partially terminable at will. Thus it may leave the employment at the employee's option but provide that he is under a continuing obligation not to engage in competition with his former employer. Under these circumstances a defendant engaged in the same business might induce the employee to quit his job, but he would not be justified in engaging the employee to work for him in an activity that would mean violation of the contract not to compete.

Here, the restrictive covenants prohibit driver-signatories from "directly or indirectly provid[ing] truck driving services to any CRST Competitor within the continental United States of America." (Doc. 130-2, at 51). The wording of the restrictive covenants makes it impossible for a driver-signatory to be in breach without the assistance of a "CRST [*55] Competitor." That is, even if a driver-signatory were to quit working for plaintiff, the only way he could breach his restrictive covenant would be by beginning work for a "CRST Competitor" during the driver's restrictive term. He could not do this unless a competitor agreed to hire him. As a result, the competitor's act of hiring the driver-signatory could directly cause a driver-signatory to breach his restrictive covenant. The Court, thus, finds that defendant's act of hiring drivers who were still within their restrictive terms could be sufficient to establish the causation element of plaintiff's tortious interference with contract claim. See *Books Are Fun, Ltd. v. Rosebrough, No. 4:05-cv-00644-JEG, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 105304, 2007 WL 9711266, at 36 (S.D. Iowa Mar. 29, 2007) (finding that the defendant could be liable for tortious interference with contract by inducing employees to become independent contractors with the defendant while bound by non-competition agreements with the plaintiff). See generally Revere Transducers, Inc., 595 N.W.2d at 768 (citing persuasive authority for the proposition that "defendant, a competitor of plaintiff, had [a] right to persuade plaintiff's employees to work for defendant, so long as defendant did not induce employees to breach any existing contracts").

This finding [*56] extends to all drivers who were within their restrictive terms when defendant hired them, regardless of whether the drivers left plaintiff and immediately began working for defendant, left plaintiff and refrained from driving for a period before beginning to work for defendant, or left plaintiff and worked for a different trucking company for a period before beginning to work for defendant. If the Court were to hold that defendant could not be held liable for causing the latter two groups of drivers to breach their restrictive covenants, the focus would shift from considering whether the drivers were still bound by their restrictive covenants when hired by defendant to whether the drivers were still employed by plaintiff when they were hired by defendant.

Whether the drivers were employed by plaintiff when the drivers breached their contracts could be relevant to whether defendant hiring the drivers was the actual cause of the drivers breaching their contracts. Plaintiff's prima facie case, however, requires the existence of a valid contract, not an existing employment relationship. The validity of the contracts at issue—the restrictive covenants—turns on whether each driver's restrictive [*57] term had lapsed by the time defendant hired him. If the Court were to hold that defendant could not be held liable for the latter two groups of drivers breaching their restrictive covenants, the Court would be holding that the fact of employment is an essential element of plaintiff's contract claim. As explained supra, this is not the case.

The Court notes, however, that a reasonable jury could find that the drivers would have breached their restrictive covenants by going to work for a different CRST Competitor, even if defendant had not hired those drivers. This conclusion would be wholly consistent with the Court's recognition that defendant's act of hiring the drivers could lead the drivers to breach their restrictive covenants, which is different from the factual determination of whether the act of hiring the drivers actually led the drivers to breach their restrictive covenants. The issue of whether defendant hiring the drivers actually caused the drivers to breach their contracts is a factual question that must be submitted to the factfinder. Defendant's motion for summary judgment is, thus, denied on the element of causation.

5. Damages

Finally, defendant asserts that plaintiff [*58] cannot establish that plaintiff incurred damages as a result of defendant's alleged interference. (Doc. 140, at 35-37). At the heart of defendant's argument is the assertion that plaintiff's alleged damages are too speculative to sustain recovery. Further, a close reading of defendant's brief reveals that defendant's damages argument is made only with respect to damages plaintiff allegedly sustained by plaintiff's drivers leaving plaintiff to work for defendant. (See, e.g., Doc. 140, at 35 ("[Plaintiff] is apparently seeking damages for the profits it claims it would have earned if the [d]rivers had not gone to [defendant].")). That argument, however, is more properly attributed to plaintiff's prospective economic advantage claim. Defendant's argument does not address damages sustained under plaintiff's tortious interference with contract theory.

Plaintiff's contract claim is concerned with breaches of the restrictive covenants and damages that resulted from defendant's alleged conduct leading to those breaches. If the drivers ceased working for plaintiff but did not begin working for defendant while still within their restrictive terms, those drivers would not be encompassed by plaintiff's [*59] contract claim, but they could be encompassed by plaintiff's prospective economic advantage claim. Whether the drivers stopped working for plaintiff, then, is inconsequential to plaintiff's damages under the contract claim. A proper measure of damages for the contract claim would center around the contract at issue. For instance, the value attributed to the restrictive covenants, including the value the restrictive covenants hold, if any, in discouraging drivers from leaving plaintiff's employ,[13] could be a proper measure of damages. Defendant has not argued that plaintiff is unable to prove a proper measure of damages relating to breaches of the restrictive covenants and summary judgment is, therefore, improper as to the damages element of plaintiff's contract claim.

The Court will, however, note that plaintiff's argument that the damages are too speculative would fail, even if defendant had advanced that argument with respect to damages associated with the restrictive covenants themselves.

> As a general rule, the party seeking damages bears the burden of proving them; if the record is uncertain and speculative as to whether a party has sustained damages, the factfinder must deny recovery. [*60] There is a distinction between proof of the fact that damages have been sustained and proof of the amount of those damages. If the uncertainty lies in the amount of damages sustained, recovery may be had if there is proof of a reasonable basis from which the amount can be inferred or approximated. Thus, some speculation on the amount of damages sustained is acceptable, but a plaintiff cannot recover overly speculative damages.

St. Malachy Roman Catholic Congregation of Geneseo v. Ingram, 841 N.W.2d 338, 351 (Iowa 2014) (alteration and internal citations and quotation marks omitted).

A reasonable factfinder could find that plaintiff suffered damages from the drivers breaching their restrictive covenants, and defendant does not argue otherwise. As the example above shows, a reasonable factfinder could determine that the restrictive covenants have value because they encourage driver retention, which likely increases plaintiff's profit margin. The Court likewise finds that the factfinder could attribute a reasonably certain measure of damages to plaintiff's alleged harm. One possible method of calculating those damages would be to consider the liquidated damages provision in the restrictive covenants. The liquidated damages figure has already been set forth and is a definitive dollar [*61] amount. (See, e.g., Doc. 130-2, at 52). Should plaintiff choose to pursue the liquidated damages as its theory of recovery, plaintiff's damages would not be speculative because the factfinder would have a basis from which to infer or approximate damages. Based on the Court's finding that a reasonable factfinder could find that plaintiff suffered damages, and that a reasonable basis for the measure of those damages exists, the Court finds that defendant is not entitled to summary judgment on the damages element of plaintiff's contract claim. Defendant's motion for summary judgment is, thus, denied as to the damages element of plaintiff's contract claim.

[13] The Court notes that the fact of drivers leaving plaintiff's employ in spite of the restrictive covenants could be relevant to determining whether the restrictive covenants are effective in encouraging retention. This, however, is a different inquiry than assessing damages stemming from the drivers leaving plaintiff's employ.

The Court has addressed each element of plaintiff's tortious interference with contract claim, and the Court has found that defendant's arguments fail as to each element. Defendant has failed to defeat any essential element of plaintiff's tortious interference with contract claim, and the claim may properly proceed to trial. The Court reiterates, however, that this holding extends only to the issue of whether defendant tortiously interfered with the restrictive covenants that may have existed between the drivers at issue and plaintiff. [*62] Plaintiff's claim that defendant wrongfully induced the drivers to leave plaintiff's employ and instead begin working for defendant is more properly considered under plaintiff's prospective economic advantage claim and is not contemplated in this section. Defendant's motion for summary judgment as to the tortious interference with contract claim is denied.

B. Intentional Interference with Prospective Economic Advantage

Under Iowa law, the elements of intentional interference with prospective economic advantage are 1) the plaintiff had a prospective contractual or business relationship; 2) the defendant knew of the prospective relationship; 3) the defendant intentionally and improperly interfered with the relationship; 4) the defendant's interference caused the relationship to fail to materialize; and 5) damages. Gen Elec. Capital Corp., 485 F. Supp. 2d at 1025 (citations omitted).

As the Court has already explained, the drivers were at-will employees and any relationship plaintiff may have had with the drivers was prospective. The facts here could support a reasonable factfinder's determination that a prospective relationship actually existed. For example, the drivers were employed by plaintiff for at least some period of time. Any [*63] potential for that employment relationship to continue would lend itself to a finding that a prospective relationship existed. Likewise, the Court finds that a reasonable factfinder could find that defendant knew of the prospective relationship. The Court's analysis on this second element is identical to the Court's analysis of the knowledge element of plaintiff's contract claim.

As to damages, the Court finds that although certain theories of recovery could be overly speculative, plaintiff could pursue a theory of recovery based on the liquidated damages clauses contained in the Driver Contracts. This theory would be proper because the liquidated damages could be found to be based on plaintiff's expectation that the drivers would each work for plaintiff for the entire duration of his restrictive term. Failure to do so could be found to implicate the liquidated damages provision.

Plaintiff must also show that defendant's interference was intentional and improper. Tortious interference with prospective economic advantage claims require a higher standard of proof than tortious interference with contract claims. Under prospective economic advantage claims, the plaintiff is required to produce [*64] "substantial evidence that the defendant's predominant or sole motive was to damage the plaintiff." Compiano, 588 N.W.2d at 464.

Assuming, for the sake of argument, that defendant's interference was intentional, plaintiff has produced no evidence that would permit a reasonable factfinder to determine that defendant was motivated, even in part, to damage plaintiff. Indeed, plaintiff's theory as to defendant's motive is speculative and addresses the knowledge component of the prospective economic interference claim, as opposed to the motive component of the claim. (See Doc. 159, at 41-43). Although plaintiff asserts that the circumstantial evidence would permit a reasonable jury to conclude defendant was acting under an improper motive, the evidence plaintiff turns to is probative on the knowledge component of the claim. (Id.). Plaintiff fails to draw a connection between the circumstantial evidence of defendant's knowledge and any motive at all, much less an improper motive. (Id.). Plaintiff's inability to make a showing of defendant's motive renders plaintiff wholly incapable of showing that defendant's primary or sole motive was to injure plaintiff. The Court thus finds that plaintiff's tortious interference [*65] with prospective economic advantage claim fails on the element of improper conduct.

Finally, the Court will turn to the causation element, which also fails. Although the parties have briefed the issue of causation under different standards, the issue of factual causation is the same under both standards and is dispositive here.[14] (Compare Doc. 140, at 15-17 with Doc. 159, at 22-25). The Iowa Supreme Court has addressed factual causation:[15]

> "But for" is an absolute minimum for causation because it is merely causation in fact. Any attempt to find liability absent actual causation is an attempt to connect the defendant with an injury or event that the defendant had nothing to do with. Mere logic and common sense dictate[ ] that there be some causal relationship between the defendant's conduct [and] the injury or event for which damages are sought.

Rieger v. Jacque, 584 N.W.2d 247, 251 (Iowa 1998) (citation and internal quotation marks omitted).

The only interference at issue under plaintiff's prospective economic advantage claim is the loss of plaintiff's drivers, who were at-will employees. The only evidence plaintiff has that defendant caused the [*66] loss of plaintiff's drivers is that the drivers at issue went to work for defendant at some point after they worked for plaintiff. This is insufficient to establish causation. The fact that the drivers accepted employment with defendant can only show that the drivers found defendant's employment terms acceptable, but the drivers' acceptance of employment with defendant, alone, cannot shed any light on why the drivers chose to end their employment with plaintiff. Why the drivers decided to end their employment with plaintiff is the operative question, and plaintiff has come forward with no evidence that would show that the drivers left because of any action taken by defendant.

Even if plaintiff were able to show that defendant recruited plaintiff's drivers, that recruitment would likely be justified. The record before the Court shows that any recruitment strategies defendant may have employed amounted to promises of a different work environment and perhaps better pay. The Restatement (Second) of Torts explains that competing for employees in this fashion is proper:

> i. Contracts terminable at will. The rule . . . that competition may be an interference that is not improper also applies [*67] to existing contracts that are terminable at will. If the third person is free to terminate his contractual relation with the plaintiff when he chooses, there is still a subsisting contract relation; but any interference with it that induces its termination is primarily an interference with the future relation between the parties, and the plaintiff has no legal assurance of them. As for the future hopes he has no legal right but only an expectancy; and when the contract is terminated by the choice of the third person there is no breach of it. The competitor is therefore free, for his own competitive advantage, to obtain the future benefits for himself by causing the termination. Thus he may offer better contract terms, as by offering an employee of the plaintiff more money to work for him . . ., and he may make use of persuasion or other suitable means, all without liability.

§ 768 cmt. i. The conduct alleged in this case falls squarely within Section 768, and defendant was well within its rights to compete with plaintiff for the future benefit of the drivers' services. The Court, thus, finds that plaintiff cannot establish causation on its tortious interference with prospective economic advantage [*68] claim and that defendant is entitled to summary judgment on that claim.

As explained above, the prospective economic advantage claim concerns the recruitment of the drivers themselves and does not address whether defendant caused the drivers to breach their restrictive covenants. Defendant's motion for summary judgment is granted as to plaintiff's claim for tortious interference with prospective economic [14] In Thompson v. Kaczinski, 774 N.W.2d 829, 836-38 (Iowa 2009) the Iowa Supreme Court adopted a modified approach to considering proximate cause in cases addressing physical and emotional harm. The Iowa Supreme Court has not been called on to determine if this modified approach also applies to cases involving purely economic torts. This Court need not consider the issue, however, because factual causation is dispositive.

[15] In TransAm, this Court found that "nothing in Thompson, or the subsequent decisions of the Iowa Supreme Court, [suggests] that Iowa's adoption of the causation principles set forth in the [Restatement (Third) of Torts: Liability for Physical and Emotional Harm] has changed the traditional analysis of factual causation under Iowa law." *2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 135900, 2018 WL 3738017, at 15. The Court's conclusions remain unchanged, even when considering cases that were decided after TransAm.

advantage. Plaintiff's claim for tortious interference with contract encompasses only defendant's alleged interference with the restrictive covenants and, thus, survives the grant of summary judgment as to the prospective economic advantage claim.

C. Unjust Enrichment

The equitable doctrine of unjust enrichment "is based on the principle that a party should not be permitted to be unjustly enriched at the expense of another or receive property or benefits without paying just compensation." Iowa Dep't of Human Servs. ex rel. Palmer v. Unisys Corp., 637 N.W.2d 142, 154 (Iowa 2001) (citations omitted) ("Palmer"). "[U]njust enrichment can be distilled into three basic elements of recovery. They are: 1) [the] defendant was enriched by the receipt of a benefit; 2) the enrichment was at the expense of the plaintiff; and 3) it is unjust to allow the defendant to retain the benefit [*69] under the circumstances."[16] Id. at 154-55 (citations and footnotes omitted).

"[U]njust enrichment is a broad principle with few limitations." Id. at 155. The benefits a defendant receives can be direct or indirect and need not be conferred directly by the plaintiff. Id. (citation omitted). Further, benefits conferred by third parties can be sufficient under an unjust enrichment claim. Id. (citation omitted). "The critical inquiry is that the benefit be received at the expense of the plaintiff." Id. (citation omitted).

Here, defendant correctly argues that the drivers were enriched by undergoing training at plaintiff's expense then later breaching their restrictive covenants with plaintiff.[17] By doing so, the drivers retained the benefit of the training without the obligation of working exclusively for plaintiff for the duration of the drivers' restrictive terms. When the drivers went to work for defendant, however, defendant indirectly benefitted from plaintiff paying the costs to train the drivers. Those benefits included defendant having the ability to hire trained drivers in the midst of a driver shortage. (See Doc. 159-3, at 165 & 171 (defendant's acknowledgment of driver shortage), 201 [*70] (defendant's 2017 Form 10-K identifying the driver shortage as an operational risk)).

When the drivers began working for defendant, the drivers carried with them their pre-existing CDLs, meaning that defendant did not have to invest any funds in training the drivers so that they would be employable. This saved defendant the expense of training these drivers through defendant's own training program, as defendant does with certain unlicensed individuals who are hired as drivers. (See id., at 134-36 (discussing defendant's training program and costs)). This, presumably, increased defendant's profit margin. The difference between defendant's actual profit margin for each driver at issue and the lesser profit margin defendant would have realized had it been required to train the drivers at issue are profits that defendant indirectly obtained as a result of plaintiff paying the training costs.

[16] In Palmer, the Iowa Supreme Court acknowledged in a footnote that "[t]he court of appeals . . . identified four elements of recovery on the basis of unjust enrichment, including the element that there be no at-law remedy available to the plaintiff. See Iowa Waste Sys., Inc. v. Buchanan Cty., 617 N.W.2d 23, 30 (Iowa Ct. App. 2000)." Palmer, 637 N.W.2d at 154 n.2. See also Union Pac. R.R. Co. v. Cedar Rapids & Iowa City Ry. Co., 477 F. Supp. 2d 980, 1000 (N.D. Iowa 2007) (holding that an element of an unjust enrichment claim is that "there is no at-law remedy that can appropriately address the claim" (citations omitted)). The Iowa Supreme Court went on to agree that "[t]he adequacy of a legal remedy is a general limitation on the exercise of equity jurisdiction and is properly considered when restitution is sought in equity." Palmer, 637 N.W.2d at 154 n.2. The Iowa Supreme Court stopped short of adopting the Court of Appeals' holding, however, in determining that "no independent principle exists that restricts restitution to cases where alternative remedies are inadequate." Id. (citation omitted). The parties have not addressed the adequacy of a legal remedy with respect to plaintiff's unjust enrichment claim, and the Court will, thus, decline to address the issue, including the issue of whether the adequacy of a legal remedy is a separate and distinct element of plaintiff's claim.

[17] Under Iowa law, unjust enrichment is "an equitable doctrine based on the concept of an implied contract." *EAD Control Sys., LLC v. Besser Co. USA, No. C 11-4029-MWB, 2012 WL 2357572, at 3 (N.D. Iowa June 19, 2012) (citation and internal quotation marks omitted). "[A]n express contract and an implied contract cannot coexist with respect to the same subject matter, and the law will not imply a contract where there is an express contract." Id. (citations, alterations, and internal quotation marks omitted). The parties have not raised an issue as to whether an express contract is implicated as to plaintiff's unjust enrichment claim, and the Court, therefore, will not address the issue.

See Brown v. Kerkhoff, 504 F. Supp. 2d 464, 544-45 (S.D. Iowa 2007) (recognizing that increased profits can be realized either directly or indirectly and can constitute a benefit under an unjust enrichment claim). Thus, the benefit of additional profits was received at plaintiff's expense.[18]

Having found that the first two elements of plaintiff's [*71] unjust enrichment claim are capable of satisfaction, the Court must consider whether plaintiff would be able to show that it would be unjust to permit defendant to retain the benefit. See Schildberg Rock Prods. Co. v. Brooks, 258 Iowa 759, 140 N.W.2d 132, 138-39 (Iowa 1966). Unjust enrichment can occur, for example, "when a person retains money or benefits which in justice and equity belong to another." Id. at 139. Whether it would be unjust to allow a defendant to retain the benefit it received depends on the circumstances implicated. See Palmer, 637 N.W.2d at 154-55 (holding that the third element of an unjust enrichment claim is that "it is unjust to allow the defendant to retain the benefit under the circumstances" (emphasis added)).

To determine whether, under the circumstances here, principles of justice and equity counsel that the benefits defendant realized belong to plaintiff would require the Court to make findings of genuinely disputed material facts. Specifically, the Court would have to consider the circumstances of this case and would have to make a conclusive finding as to whether it would be just to allow defendant to retain any benefits it may have realized at plaintiff's expense. Defendant argues that it is standard in the trucking industry to hire drivers who have been trained at a competitor's [*72] expense. (Doc. 140, at 40). The issue of whether this practice outweighs other considerations that may weigh in favor of plaintiff's position, however, is a question of fact that is in dispute.

Defendant may well be able to persuade the factfinder that it would not be unjust to permit defendant to retain the benefits it realized at plaintiff's expense. Should defendant be able to make this showing, the Court will have to enter judgment in defendant's favor on the unjust enrichment claim. At this stage, however, there exist genuine issues of material fact regarding whether defendant should be permitted to retain the benefits. These factual issues preclude summary judgment.[19] See Kammueller, 383 F.3d at 784.

Finally, defendant seeks to limit plaintiff's damages under the unjust enrichment claim and, in support, asserts that "in Iowa, the proper measure of damages for unjust enrichment is limited to the value of the benefit conferred, not a defendant's profits." (Id. (citations omitted)). This Court has previously addressed the damages issue. In doing so, the Court acknowledged that the Iowa Court of Appeals "has explained that '[d]amages under a claim of unjust enrichment are limited to the value of what was inequitably [*73] retained.'" Catipovic v. Turley, 68 F. Supp. 3d 983, 996 (N.D. Iowa 2014) (alteration in original) (quoting Iowa Waste Sys., Inc., 617 N.W.2d at 30). The Court went on to explain that "the value of what was inequitably retained" could be "the value of the services provided," depending on the case. Id. (citation omitted). Further, the doctrine of unjust enrichment is based, in part, on the principle that a party should not be permitted to receive benefits without paying just compensation. Palmer, 637 N.W.2d at 154.

The question, then, becomes what "just compensation" is for the benefits defendant received. If defendant were required to disgorge all additional profits it received by hiring drivers who did not need to be trained, defendant would not be "compensating" plaintiff for training the drivers. Rather, defendant would be disgorging the entire benefit it received. This measure of damages goes beyond what is required by the doctrine of unjust enrichment.

The doctrine permits a party to receive benefits as long as the party pays just compensation. To require defendant to disgorge the entire benefit it received would be tantamount to prohibiting a defendant who was unjustly enriched from retaining any benefits from that unjust enrichment. This is not consistent with the doctrine of unjust enrichment, and [*74] the Court will not impose such a prohibition. The Court therefore concludes that the proper measure of damages here is damages that amount to "just compensation," without being in excess of "just compensation." Whether "just compensation" is the costs plaintiff incurred in training the drivers, or whether "just compensation" is measured by some other theory, is for the factfinder to determine. The Court is able to determine, however, that "just compensation" is not disgorgement of defendant's profits. Defendant's motion for summary judgment is granted in part to the extent defendant seeks to limit plaintiff's damages, and denied to the extent defendant seeks dismissal of plaintiff's unjust enrichment claim.

[18] The measure of defendant's benefit is not necessarily the same as the measure of damages plaintiff may recover. The issue of damages is addressed below.

[19] Under Iowa law, "[t]he doctrine of unjust enrichment is an equitable principle." Johnson v. Dodgen, 451 N.W.2d 168, 175 (Iowa 1990). Iowa generally does not afford the right to a jury trial on those claims that sound in equity. Weltzin v. Nail, 618 N.W.2d 293, 296-97 (Iowa 2000). Here, the parties have demanded a jury trial. (Docs. 43, at 10; 44, at 1). Before trial, the Court may be called upon to address whether to submit plaintiff's unjust enrichment claim to the jury.

D. Injunctive Relief

Plaintiff's prayer for permanent injunctive relief is narrow. "[Plaintiff] demands the entry of a permanent injunction enjoining [defendant] from any further or continued interference with [plaintiff's] prospective economic advantage and/or contracts with its drivers . . .." (Doc. 43, at 10). Although plaintiff's request for injunctive relief does not rest, directly, on plaintiff's tortious interference claims, the same facts and legal arguments that form the [*75] basis for the tort claims form the basis for plaintiff's request for injunctive relief.

To obtain a permanent injunction, the requesting party must show actual success on the merits of its claim. PIC USA v. N.C. Farm P'Ship, 672 N.W.2d 718, 723 (Iowa 2003) (citation omitted). Having found that plaintiff's prospective economic advantage claim fails, the Court likewise finds that plaintiff's request for permanent injunctive relief must fail, to the extent plaintiff's request rests on the same basis as the tortious interference with prospective economic advantage claim. The only issue remaining to be considered under plaintiff's request for injunctive relief is whether injunctive relief could be proper under plaintiff's claim that defendant has interfered, and continues to interfere, with plaintiff's "contracts with its drivers."

Under Iowa law, "[a]n injunction is warranted when necessary to prevent irreparable injury and when the plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law." Opat v. Ludeking, 666 N.W.2d 597, 603 (Iowa 2003) (citations omitted). A party is entitled to a permanent injunction only if proof exists that the injunction would effectively prevent the irreparable harm from occurring. Hockenberg Equip. Co. v. Hockenberg's Equip & Supply Co. of Des Moines, Inc., 510 N.W.2d 153, 158 (Iowa 1994) (citation omitted). "[A] party requesting injunctive relief must establish 1) an invasion or threatened [*76] invasion of a right, 2) substantial injury or damages will result unless an injunction is granted, and 3) no adequate legal remedy is available." Opat, 666 N.W.2d at 603-04 (citation and internal quotation marks omitted). "In deciding whether an injunction should be issued, the court must weigh the relative hardships on the parties by the grant or denial of injunctive relief." Id. (citation omitted).

The Court will assume for present purposes that defendant has improperly interfered, and continues to improperly interfere, with plaintiff's Driver Contracts. The harm caused by this interference is the breach of the restrictive terms contained in the Driver Contracts. The loss of trained drivers would fall under plaintiff's request for injunctive relief to prohibit "continued interference with [plaintiff's] prospective economic advantage," which the Court has already found to be an improper basis for injunctive relief. The Court will thus address plaintiff's request for injunctive relief only with respect to the allegation that defendant has caused, and continues to cause, the breach of the restrictive terms contained in the Driver Contracts.

The Court has determined that defendant's act of hiring the drivers satisfies [*77] the causation element of plaintiff's contract claim. This, however, does not establish that barring defendant from engaging in this causative action will prevent plaintiff's drivers from breaching their restrictive covenants. The drivers can be in breach of their restrictive covenants by "provid[ing] truck driving services to any CRST Competitor within the continental United States of America." (Doc. 130-2, at 51 (emphasis added)). If the Court were to grant the injunctive relief sought, the injunction would not prevent the drivers from breaching their restrictive covenants. Rather, the injunction would only prevent the drivers from breaching their contracts in favor of working for one of many CRST Competitors.[20]

[20] The Court finds that there is no real dispute as to whether plaintiff competes with a number of companies, as opposed to just with defendant. This case is one in a series of four cases filed in this Court against purported CRST Competitors, and each of the cases rests on the same basic allegations and factual assertions. See TransAm, 1:16-cv-00052-LTS; CRST Expedited, Inc.

Because an injunction against defendant would not prevent the drivers from breaching their restrictive covenants and thereby causing plaintiff harm, the Court finds injunctive relief inappropriate. See Hockenberg Equip. Co., 510 N.W.2d at 158 (citation omitted).

Plaintiff has neither alleged nor shown that an injunction would prevent its drivers from breaching their restrictive covenants. Plaintiff argues only that an [*78] injunction would prevent defendant from causing plaintiff irreparable harm. (Doc. 159, at 49-53). This argument, however, does not amount to an argument that the irreparable harm will not occur anyway. To truly protect against the irreparable harm alleged, plaintiff would either need to obtain injunctive relief against all of its competitors—or at least a substantial number—or plaintiff would need to obtain injunctive relief against the drivers themselves. Plaintiff is not pursuing either course here.

The Court recognizes that in a proper case, a party could argue that the injunction sought would not, on its own, provide a guarantee against the irreparable harm, but would provide such a guarantee when considered in conjunction with other factors or additional injunctions. That is not this case, however, and the Court thus finds that this theory, if proper, cannot save plaintiff's request for injunctive relief. Defendant's motion for summary judgment is therefore granted as to plaintiff's request for injunctive relief.[21]

VI. AFFIRMATIVE DEFENSES

As part of its motion for summary judgment, plaintiff seeks a ruling that eight affirmative defenses fail as a matter of law[22] on the [*79] basis that those affirmative defenses assert arguments that would render the Driver Contracts voidable, as opposed to void. (Doc. 130, at 23). The challenged affirmative defenses read as follows:

> First Affirmative Defense: The claims are barred, in whole or in part, because [p]laintiff's Employment Contracts are void, unenforceable, and/or unconscionable.
> Second Affirmative Defense: The claims are barred, in whole or in part, because the Employment Contracts at issue harm and inhibit driver mobility.
> Sixth Affirmative Defense: Plaintiff's claim for permanent injunctive relief is barred, in whole or in part, because such relief constitutes a restraint of trade and violates antitrust laws.

v. Knight Transp., Inc., 1:17-cv-00024-CJW-KEM; CRST Expedited, Inc. v. JB Hunt Transp., Inc., 1:17-cv-00026-CJW-KEM. Knight and Swift merged in 2017 to form Knight-Swift Transportation Holdings, Inc. Thus, the Court will consider Knight-Swift Transportation Holdings to be one company that competes with plaintiff, rather than two separate entities that both compete with plaintiff. That the number of companies plaintiff competes with was reduced by one, however, is of no consequence to the Court's analysis because there remain three separate competitor companies—TransAm, JB Hunt, and Knight-Swift Transportation Holdings—that the Court can readily identify.

[21] The Court notes that defendant argues this section of its motion for summary judgment with reference to Iowa state law, but plaintiff's arguments in resistance are made largely with reference to federal law. (Compare Docs. 140, at 42-45 with 159, at 49-58). Regardless of which body of law applies, the Court's conclusions would be the same because the Court finds that the injunctive relief sought would not remedy the harm alleged. See Winter v. Nat. Res. Def. Council, 555 U.S. 7, 32, 129 S. Ct. 365, 172 L. Ed. 2d 249 (2008) ("An injunction is a matter of equitable discretion; it does not follow from success on the merits as a matter of course." (citation omitted)); Weinberger v. Romero-Barcelo, 456 U.S. 305, 313, 102 S. Ct. 1798, 72 L. Ed. 2d 91 (1982) ("[A] federal judge sitting as chancellor is not mechanically obligated to grant an injunction for every violation of law." (citations omitted)).

[22] In its Motion for Partial Summary Judgment, plaintiff requests that the Court "dismiss[ ]" the subject affirmative defenses. (Doc. 127, at 2). In its brief, however, plaintiff only requests that the Court find that the subject affirmative defenses "fail as a matter of law." (Doc. 130, at 23). Plaintiff has not asserted a procedural basis upon which the Court can strike the affirmative defenses, and plaintiff's arguments regarding the affirmative defenses are offered with reference to summary judgment law. (See, e.g., id., at 5). The Court will, thus, construe plaintiff's motion as seeking a judgment that the subject affirmative defenses fail as a matter of law, and the Court will not consider plaintiff's motion as seeking to strike the affirmative defenses.

> Twenty-Second Affirmative Defense: The claims are barred, in whole or in part, because the requested relief potentially violates the blacklisting statutes of different states, including but not limited to Iowa Code §§ 730.1 and 730.2 and Arizona Revised Statutes § 23-1361(A).
> Twenty-Third Affirmative Defense: The claims are barred, in whole or in part, to the extent [d]efendant's compliance with [p]laintiff's demands and/or requested relief may also be subject to violation of the blacklisting statutes of different states, including but not limited to Iowa Code §§ 730.1 and 730.2 and Arizona Revised Statutes § 23-1361(A) [*80] .
> Twenty-Sixth Affirmative Defense: The claims are barred, in whole or in part, to the extent [p]laintiff breached its Employment Contracts by failing to honor such contracts with its drivers.
> Twenty-Seventh Affirmative Defense: The claims are barred, in whole or in part, for lack of a protectable interest supporting the underlying Employment Contracts.
> Twenty-Eighth Affirmative Defense: The claims are barred, in whole or in part, for lack of consideration supporting the underlying Employment Contracts.

(Doc. 44, at 13-17).

A. Voidability Defenses

The Court has already determined that the Driver Contracts are supported by consideration and are valid. Thus, defendant's twenty-eighth affirmative defense, which asserts that the contracts are unsupported by consideration, must fail as a matter of law. Similarly, the Court has already found that the defense that the contracts are not supported by a protectable interest would permit a signatory to avoid the contract, and defendant does not argue that any driver actually did avoid his contract. The twenty-seventh affirmative defense, which relies on defendant's theory that the contracts are not supported by a protectable interest is, [*81] consequently, unavailable to defendant and must fail as a matter of law, unless defendant can show that one or more drivers avoided his contract on this basis.

The twenty-sixth affirmative defense purports to defeat plaintiff's claims by asserting that plaintiff breached the contracts. Without reaching the issue of whether plaintiff did breach the contracts, the Court finds that this defense is unavailable to defendant, unless defendant can show that one or more drivers avoided his contract on this basis. When a party to a contract breaches the contract, the contract becomes voidable, not void, at the wronged party's option. *JB Hunt, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 96434, 2018 WL 2768874, at 13 (citing Hubbard v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 33 Iowa 325, 329 (1871)). Defendant has not asserted that any driver attempted to avoid his Driver Contract, and the twenty-sixth affirmative defense therefore must fail as a matter of law if defendant cannot show that a driver attempted to avoid his contract on this basis.

Likewise, the Court has already addressed whether the defense that a contract is "unenforceable" necessarily renders the contract void. The Court answered that question in the negative. Thus, to the extent the first affirmative defense asserts that the Driver Contracts are void, either facially or because they [*82] are "unenforceable," the defense must fail as a matter of law. To the extent the "unenforceable" defense asserts a voidability defense, defendant does not have standing to pursue the defense, and the defense therefore must fail as a matter of law, unless defendant can show that one or more drivers attempted to avoid his contract on an "unenforceability" basis. This finding amounts to a finding that the "unenforceable" defense, as articulated in the first affirmative defense, must fail in its entirety as a matter of law on the record currently before the Court.

Finally, the first affirmative defense asserts that the Driver Contracts are unconscionable. As the Court has already determined, this defense would permit a driver-signatory to avoid his contract, but the unconscionability would not render the contracts void. See Bartlett Grain Co., LP v. Sheeder, 829 N.W.2d 18, 26-27 (Iowa 2013) (holding that when a contract is unconscionable, a court may refuse to enforce the contract, in whole or in part). Defendant, thus, cannot assert this defense absent actual avoidance, and the defense must fail as a matter of law unless defendant can show that one or more drivers avoided his contract as unconscionable. The first affirmative defense, in its entirety, [*83] fails as a matter of law on the record currently before the Court. Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment is granted to the extent plaintiff seeks a determination that the first, twenty-sixth, twenty-seventh, and twenty-eighth affirmative defenses fail as a matter of law on the record currently before the Court.

B. Remaining Defenses

The defenses that remain to be considered are the second, sixth, twenty-second, and twenty-third affirmative defenses. The twenty-second and twenty-third affirmative defenses both address blacklisting statutes, and the second affirmative defense could be read as implicating blacklisting issues. Plaintiff argues that defendant cannot rely on state blacklisting statutes because the statutes are simply inapplicable here. (See Doc. 130, at 17-19). In response, defendant argues that the contracts are void ab initio under state blacklisting statutes because the restrictive covenants amount to lifetime bans on commercial driving. (Doc. 146, at 15-16). Defendant's argument rests entirely on the idea that the restrictive covenants amount to lifetime bans, which the Court has already rejected. Thus, to the extent the second, twenty-second, and twenty-third affirmative [*84] defenses seek to show the invalidity of the contracts, the defenses fail as a matter of law.

Plaintiff's motion, however, does not address any potential value the second, twenty-second, and twenty-third affirmative defenses could have in defendant's attempts to resist plaintiff's prayer for injunctive relief. To the extent the second, twenty-second, and twenty-third affirmative defenses may be relevant in defending against plaintiff's request for injunctive relief, the defenses survive. The Court notes, however, that even though the second, twenty-second, and twenty-third affirmative defenses do not fail as a matter of law as to plaintiff's prayer for injunctive relief, the Court has found injunctive relief inappropriate. Thus, to the extent the defenses do not fail, they are of no benefit to defendant.

Finally, the sixth affirmative defense directly implicates antitrust law, and the second affirmative defense could be read as implicating antitrust law. Plaintiff argues that the defenses must fail for two separate reasons. First, plaintiff asserts that the defenses fail because the parties have not entered into an agreement not to recruit each other's drivers. Next, plaintiff argues [*85] that defendant "cannot show that its ability to compete in the marketplace is somehow endangered if drivers who received specialized training . . . are required to either pay for that training or drive for [plaintiff]." (Doc. 130, at 8-10). As to the first argument, even if plaintiff is correct that no agreement exists between the parties, the lack of an agreement would not defeat the defense's applicability in assessing whether injunctive relief is proper. If the Court were to grant the injunctive relief plaintiff seeks, which the Court has already determined it will not do, defendant could be prohibited from hiring plaintiff's drivers. Abiding by a negative injunction is different from agreeing to refrain from certain conduct, and plaintiff has not argued that the defense of limited driver mobility would be inapplicable to the Court's equitable consideration of whether to grant injunctive relief.

Similarly, plaintiff has not addressed whether defendant could face antitrust liability for abiding by a negative injunction. In other words, plaintiff has not addressed the competing interests of the antitrust laws and a Court order mandating conduct that would ordinarily be prohibited under [*86] the antitrust laws. The Court cannot find, at this stage, that the second affirmative defense, to the extent it implicates antitrust law, and the sixth affirmative defense fail as a matter of law. Again, however, the Court notes that even though these defenses do not fail as a matter of law, the Court has already rejected plaintiff's request for injunctive relief, and these defenses would therefore be of no benefit to defendant, to the extent the defenses would be relevant in arguing against an injunction.

Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment seeking a determination that the second, twenty-second, and twenty-third affirmative defenses fail as a matter of law on the record currently before the Court is granted to the extent they seek to show the invalidity of the Driver Contracts. Plaintiff's motion is denied to the extent the second affirmative defense implicates antitrust law. Plaintiff's motion is denied as to the sixth affirmative defense. To the extent not otherwise addressed, plaintiff's motion for a determination that certain affirmative defenses fail as a matter of law is denied.

VII. CONCLUSION

For the aforementioned reasons, plaintiff's Motion for Partial Summary Judgment [*87] (Doc. 127) is granted in part and denied in part, and defendant's Motion for Summary Judgment (Doc. 138) is granted in part and denied in part. Consistent with this Order, plaintiff's claim for tortious interference with contract survives, plaintiff's claim for tortious interference with prospective economic advantage fails as a matter of law, plaintiff's claim for unjust enrichment survives in part, and plaintiff's request for a permanent injunction fails as a matter of law.

IT IS SO ORDERED this 4th day of June, 2019.

SETTLEMENT AGREEMENT AND STIPULATED ORDER FOR PERMANENT INJUNCTION AND MONETARY RELIEF

This Settlement Agreement and Stipulated Order ("ASO") is made and entered into this 7th day of May, 2019 ("Effective Date"), by the Attorney General of the State of California ("California" or "Attorney General"), on the one hand, and Endo Pharmaceuticals Inc. and Endo International plc (collectively "Endo"), on the other (California and Endo, collectively, the "Parties").

WHEREAS, Endo Pharmaceuticals is or was engaged in the manufacturing, marketing, and/or selling certain pharmaceuticals, including but not limited to Lidoderm®, throughout the United States;

WHEREAS, the State of California alleges that it has reason to believe that Endo Pharmaceuticals entered into an agreement that foreclosed competition [*3] from generic equivalents of the brand-name drug Lidoderm® for a period of time in violation of federal antitrust and state antitrust and consumer protection laws;

WHEREAS, California initiated an investigation of Endo with respect to the above alleged actions;

WHEREAS, California has filed an enforcement Complaint ("Complaint") against Endo in this Court alleging such violations of federal and state laws;

WHEREAS, Endo denies that it engaged in any wrongful or unlawful conduct and asserts that it has, at all times, operated within the law and within industry standard practices; and

WHEREAS, nothing in this ASO will be construed as a finding or admission of any violation of law on the part of Endo.

The Parties have agreed to resolve California's concerns identified through the investigation and the allegations in the Complaint by entering into this ASO, as follows:

FINDINGS

1. This Court has jurisdiction over the Parties and the subject matter of this action. Endo has stipulated that, for purposes of this ASO alone, the Court has jurisdiction over Endo Pharmaceuticals Inc. and Endo International plc.

2. Venue for these matters is proper in this Court under 15 U.S.C. § 22 and 28 U.S.C. § 1391(b) and (c).

3. The Complaint alleges [*4] that Endo engaged in violations of 'federal antitrust and state antitrust and consumer protection laws by entering an agreement that foreclosed competition from generic equivalents of the brand-name drug Lidoderm® and later reduced competition between sellers of generic lidocaine patches.

4. Endo admits the facts necessary to establish the personal and subject matter jurisdiction of this Court in this matter only.

5. Endo denies the charges in the Complaint and disputes that California is entitled to obtain relief.

6. This Order does not constitute any evidence against Endo, or an admission of liability or wrongdoing by Endo, in this case or in any other litigation. This ASO shall not be used in any way, as evidence or otherwise, in any other litigation or proceeding; provided, however, that this provision shall not prevent California or Endo from using this ASO in any proceeding regarding enforcement or modification of this ASO or as otherwise required by law.

7. Entry of this ASO is in the public interest. California and Endo have agreed to stipulate to entry of this ASO to finally resolve the claims and litigation between them.

STIPULATIONS

1. California stipulates that it will not file [*5] litigation or any other proceedings against Endo asserting, or seeking remedies based on, Released Claims, other than any legal proceeding regarding enforcement or modification of this ASO.

2. Upon entry of this ASO by the Court, the Complaint shall be deemed dismissed with prejudice.

II. RELEASED CLAIMS

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that:

A. Release. In consideration of [*21] the injunctive provisions and Settlement Amount contained herein, the State of California will be deemed, upon the Effective Date, to have fully, finally, and forever released Endo and affiliated entities and their current and former officers, directors, employees, agents, other associated persons and attorneys (collectively "Releasees") from any and all manner of claims, counterclaims, set-offs, demands, actions, rights, liabilities, costs, debts, expenses, attorneys' fees, and causes of action of any type, whether or not accrued in whole or in part, known or unknown, under federal or state law, arising from the Lidoderm Settlement Agreement and from the facts, matters, transactions, events, occurrences, acts, disclosures, statements, omissions, or failures to act arising from said agreement ("Covered Conduct") that were asserted or alleged, or could have been asserted or alleged, in the Complaint by its Attorney General in his sovereign capacity as the chief law enforcement officer of the State of California. The State of California is otherwise deemed to have stipulated and agreed that, in light of the terms of this settlement agreement and the class settlement reached on behalf [*22] of California natural persons in In re Lidoderm Antitrust Litigation, No. 14-md-02521-WHO (N.D. This agreement does not relate to or release the Excluded Claims defined below. In addition, in connection with the release provided above, the Parties expressly waive, release, and forever discharge any and all provisions, rights, and benefits conferred by § 1542 of the California Civil Code, which reads:

> Section 1542*. General Release; extent. A general release does not extend to claims which the creditor does not know or suspect to exist in his or her favor at the time of executing the release, which if known by him or her must have materially affected his or her settlement with the debtor; or by any law of any state or territory of the United States or other jurisdiction, or principle of common law, which is similar, [*23] comparable or equivalent to § 1542 of the California Civil Code. A Party may hereafter discover facts other than or different from those which he, she, or it knows or believes to be true with respect to the Released Claims, but each Party hereby expressly waives and fully, finally, and forever settles, releases, and discharges, upon this ASO becoming final, any known or unknown, suspected or unsuspected, asserted or unasserted, contingent or non-contingent claim that would otherwise fall within the definition of Released Claims, whether or not concealed or hidden, without regard to the subsequent discovery or existence of such different or additional facts. This provision shall not in any way expand the scope of the Released Claims and shall not convert what is a limited release into a general release.

B. Excluded Claims. The release provided herein shall not have an effect on the following Excluded Claims and such Excluded Claims shall not be included within the Released Claims:

(1) claims for alleged violations of state revenue codes;

(2) claims based on alleged breach of expressed or implied warranty claims or other liability for defective or deficient products and services provided by Endo;

(3) claims based on alleged [*24] failure to deliver goods or services due; or

(4) any claim for liability under common law, any statute, regulation, or rule lawfully promulgated under California's administrative code or other enabling legislation for any conduct other than the Covered Conduct, including but not limited to:

i. claims regarding Medicare or Medicaid fraud, false claims, unlawful kickbacks, off-label marketing, unfair or deceptive representations, false advertising or product liability;

ii. claims for criminal liability; or

iii. claims for breach of this ASO.

C. Res Judicata. The ASO shall be deemed to have rendered any Released Claim as res judicata.

III. SETTLEMENT PAYMENT

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that:

A. Endo Pharmaceuticals Inc. shall make a payment to California in the amount of U.S. $760,000 ("Settlement Amount") within the later of thirty (30) calendar days after the Effective Date or thirty (30) calendar days after receiving written payment processing instructions and any related documentation reasonably requested by Endo. In accordance with Section 162(f) of the Internal Revenue Code, the Settlement Amount is an amount paid to come into compliance with the antitrust, consumer protection and other laws of California as cited in the Complaint. No [*25] portion of that Settlement Amount represents reimbursement to California or any other person or entity for the costs of any investigation or litigation. In addition, the Parties understand and agree that no portion of the Settlement Amount represents or can be characterized as the payment of fines, penalties, or other punitive assessments. Each Party agrees to perform such further acts and to execute and to deliver such further documents as may reasonably be necessary to carry out this Agreement.

Notwithstanding the foregoing regarding what the Settlement Amount represents, upon receipt of the Settlement Amount, California shall have sole discretion as to its use and the allocation of settlement, and Endo shall have no responsibility for or influence with respect to such use(s) or allocation(s). California shall provide Endo Pharmaceuticals Inc. with written payment processing instructions for payment of the Settlement Amount by electronic transfer.

The payment may be used by the California Attorney General for any one or more of the following purposes, as the Attorney General, in his sole discretion, sees fit: (i) antitrust or consumer protection law enforcement; (ii) for deposit of [*26] monies received under the Cartwright Act into a state antitrust or consumer protection account for use in accordance with the state laws governing that account; (iii) for deposit into a fund exclusively dedicated to assisting the California Attorney General enforce the antitrust laws; or (iv) for such other purpose as the California Attorney General deems appropriate, consistent with state law.

B. Endo warrants that, as of the date of this Settlement Agreement, it is not insolvent, nor will its Settlement Payment render it insolvent within the meaning of and/or for the purposes of the United States Bankruptcy Code. If (i) a case is commenced with respect to Endo under Title 11 of the United States Code (Bankruptcy), or a trustee, receiver or conservator is appointed under any similar law, and (ii) a court of competent jurisdiction enters a final order determining the Settlement Payment, or any portion thereof, by or on behalf of Endo Pharmaceuticals Inc., to be a preference, voidable transfer, fraudulent transfer or similar transaction, and (iii) pursuant to an order of a court of competent jurisdiction monies paid by Endo Pharmaceuticals Inc. pursuant to this Settlement Agreement are [*27] either not delivered or are returned to Endo Pharmaceuticals Inc. or the trustee, receiver, or conservator appointed by a court in any bankruptcy proceeding with respect to Endo Pharmaceuticals Inc., the releases given and judgment entered in favor of Endo pursuant to this Settlement Agreement shall be null and void.

IV. PERMANENT INJUNCTION

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that:

A. In connection with any actions in or affecting Commerce, Endo shall cease and desist from, either directly or indirectly, or through any corporate or other device, individually or collectively entering into a Brand/Generic Settlement that includes:

1. (i) a No-AG Commitment and (ii) an agreement by the Generic Filer not to research, develop, manufacture, or Market the Subject Drug Product for any period of time; or
2. (i) any Payment by the NDA Holder to the Generic Filer that is not an Exception or an Exempted Agreement and (ii) an agreement by the Generic Filer not to research, develop, manufacture, or Market the Subject Drug Product for any period of time, Provided, however, that any agreement entered into by an entity prior to that entity becoming part of Endo is not subject to the terms of this ASO.

B. In the event [*28] of a material change in the law governing the antitrust implications of Brand/Generic Settlements, California will consider, in good faith, modifications to this ASO proposed by Endo.

C. Nothing in this ASO shall prohibit Endo from entering a written agreement, including a Brand/Generic Settlement, for which Endo has submitted to California a request for prior approval of the agreement, which shall include any information provided to the FTC pursuant to Paragraph III of the FTC Order, so long as (1) within thirty (30) days of California's receipt of the request for prior approval under this provision, California has not notified Endo in writing that, after considering the request in good faith, it believes the relevant agreement raises substantial questions regarding violation of state or federal antitrust law or any other applicable law that its Attorney General has authority to enforce and of the reasons for such a belief, or (2) Endo has received California's prior approval.

D. Nothing in this Section IV shall prohibit Endo from executing a written agreement so long as such agreement contains a provision or provisions expressly stating: (1) Endo will submit to California a request [*29] for prior approval of the agreement, and (2) the agreement is not effective, and shall not become effective, until and unless (i) thirty (30) days have passed since the request for prior approval was submitted to California and California has not notified Endo in writing that it believes the agreement raises substantial questions regarding violation of state or federal antitrust law or any other applicable law that its Attorney General has authority to enforce, or (ii) California has approved of the agreement.

V. ENFORCEMENT AUTHORITY

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that:

A. The Attorney General of the State of California shall have exclusive responsibility for enforcing this ASO running in favor of California.

B. If California believes that Endo is not in compliance with the terms of this ASO, it shall give Endo written notice of such alleged non-compliance and the reasons why it believes that Endo is not complying with this ASO. Endo shall have twenty (20) business days from the date of receipt of such notice to respond in writing unless otherwise agreed by the Parties. If California is not satisfied with Endo's response, it shall so notify Endo in writing, and Endo shall have seventy-five (75) [*30] calendar days from the date of receipt of such notice to cure such alleged non-compliance.

C. In the event that California believes that Endo remains in non-compliance with any of the provisions of this ASO other than those in Section IV (Permanent Injunction) following the notice and cure period provided in Section V.B., above, California may seek to enforce such provisions of this ASO by filing a motion in this Court, seeking such relief as is available under applicable laws, including, if so available, fees and costs thereof, and civil penalties. Such civil enforcement proceedings shall be governed by a preponderance of the evidence standard, absent an applicable statutory provision or other binding legal authority to the contrary

D. In the event that California believes that Endo remains in non-compliance with any of the provisions of Section IV (Permanent Injunction) of this ASO following the notice and cure period provided in Section V.B., above, California shall request that the FTC review Endo's compliance with the corresponding provisions of Paragraph II of the FTC Order and consider pursuing coordinated enforcement proceedings under this ASO and the FTC Order. In the event [*31] that the FTC declines or fails to agree after forty-five (45) days from such a request by California to take action to enforce Paragraph II of the FTC Order, California may then seek to enforce Section IV of this ASO by filing a motion in this Court, seeking such relief as is available under applicable laws, including, if so available, fees and costs thereof, and civil penalties. Such civil enforcement proceedings shall be governed by a preponderance of the evidence standard, absent an applicable statutory provision or other binding legal authority to the contrary. California shall provide written notice to Endo within three (3) business days of any request(s) to the FTC provided herein.

E. Nothing in this Section V, however, prohibits California from pursuing immediate enforcement for alleged non-compliance with this ASO upon a showing that delay would cause irreparable harm or would prevent California from seeking adequate enforcement of the ASO.

VI. REPORTING AND MONITORING OBLIGATIONS

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that:

A. Each Verified Written Report that Endo is required to submit to the FTC shall also be submitted to California within five (5) business days of submission to the FTC.

B. Each [*32] Branded/Generic Settlement Agreement submitted to the FTC pursuant to Section 1112(a) of the Medicare Prescription Drug, Improvement, and Modernization Act of 2003 shall also be submitted to California within five (5) business days of submission to the FTC

C. Endo shall consent to the FTC providing California with a copy of each written report that the Monitor is required to submit to the FTC under the FTC Order within five (5) business days of submission to the FTC.

D. Endo shall consent to the FTC providing California with copies of any and all of its submissions to the FTC under the FTC Order made between February 2, 2017 and the entry of this ASO, provided that: (a) Endo shall have five (5) business days after the entry of this ASO to notify the necessary third parties of the pending disclosure; (b) such third parties shall have twenty (20) business days from the entry of this ASO to assert an objection to this Court; and (c) Endo's consent shall not be effective until, either: (i) twenty-six (26) business days from the entry of this ASO have passed without a third party having asserted an objection to this Court; or (ii) if a third party has asserted an objection, this Court has issued a ruling [*33] permitting such disclosure over any such objection(s).

E. Except as provided in Section VI.F. below, any agreements, information, or documents submitted by Endo to California pursuant to this ASO ("Endo Materials") shall be kept confidential pursuant to California Government Code sections 11180 et seq. and may be divulged or disclosed by California only to a person or entity who is California's authorized representative or retained consultant or expert, who is engaged in matters pertaining to the implementation or enforcement of this ASO, and who has agreed to be bound by the provisions of this Section VI.D. To the extent California retains private counsel to investigate or assert potential claims against Endo in matters that are not related to the implementation or enforcement of this ASO, then no Endo Materials may be disclosed or divulged to those private counsel.

F. Notwithstanding the foregoing Section VI.D,

1. Endo Materials may be disclosed in the course of a legal proceeding between Parties to this ASO to enforce or modify this ASO, provided all parties to such a proceeding take reasonable steps to prevent disclosure of such Endo Materials to persons or entities who are not Parties to this ASO and Endo is given at least ten [*34] (10) business days' advance written notice and a reasonable opportunity to preserve the confidentiality of Endo Materials sought to be disclosed;
2. California may disclose Endo Materials in response to a discovery request or other legal process in a legal proceeding to which it is a party, or as otherwise required by law (other than a grand jury proceeding), provided California shall reasonably attempt to preserve the confidentiality of such Endo Materials by proceeding under any applicable protective order and/or utilizing sealing procedures provided by law or court rule and by providing Endo with at least ten (10) business days' advance written notice and a reasonable opportunity to preserve the confidentiality of Endo Materials sought to be disclosed before disclosing such Endo Materials to a third party; and
3. Endo Materials may be disclosed to the FTC or the United States Department of Justice, provided Endo is given at least ten (10) business days' advance written notice of such disclosure,

4. Endo Materials may be disclosed to another state that has reached a similar settlement agreement with Endo with respect to Lidoderm, provided that (i) such state agrees to be bound by the [*35] confidentiality protections set forth at California Government Code sections 11180, et seq, (ii) Endo is given at least ten (10) business days written notice of such disclosure, and (iii) such disclosure shall not be made until the time period regarding notice to third parties and the opportunity to object provided for in Section VI.D. above has passed.

F. California acknowledges and agrees that (i) the production of Endo Materials to California is compelled by the terms of this ASO; (ii) Endo may mark any such Endo Materials, where appropriate, as trade secrets or otherwise exempt from public disclosure ("Confidential Endo Materials"); (iii) Endo does not waive any claimed exemption from public disclosure under any law with respect to Confidential Endo Materials, and (iv) nothing in this ASO shall prevent Endo from seeking appropriate relief under California law concerning public disclosures. In the event of a request for production of any Endo Materials pursuant to any law regarding public disclosure of documents in California's possession (a "Records Request Notice"), the Attorney General staff, to the extent not prohibited by law, shall (a) promptly provide Endo with notice and a copy of the Records Request Notice, (b) designate [*36] any Confidential Endo Materials as falling within any trade secret or similar exemptions from disclosure under California laws, and (c) notify Endo in advance of any disclosure of any Endo Materials in order to afford Endo the ability to seek appropriate relief under California law with respect to the disclosure of such Endo Materials.

G. Said documents and reports to be produced to California as specified in the preceding paragraphs shall be addressed to its Attorney General, with an electronic copy provided to the Senior Assistant Attorney General of the Antitrust Law Section at Kathleen.Foote@doj.ca.gov .

H. An enforcement action in this Court pursuant to this ASO shall be the exclusive remedy for violation of this ASO. Neither the terms of this ASO nor any reports or notices provided by Endo under this ASO shall operate as a waiver of any future claims by any third party. Further, any such reports or notices provided by Endo to California under this ASO shall not be deemed to constitute actual or constructive notice of any claims as to any third party. No provision in this ASO may be used as evidence by the Parties in a proceeding other than an enforcement action pursuant to this [*37] ASO.

VII. PROPOSED CHANGE OF CORPORATE CONTROL

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that:

A. Endo shall notify California at least thirty (30) days prior to:

1. Any proposed dissolution of Endo; or
2. Any proposed acquisition, merger, or consolidation of Endo; or
3. Any other change in Endo, including, but not limited to, assignment and the creation, sale or dissolution of subsidiaries, if such change might affect the compliance obligations arising out of this ASO.

B. Endo shall notify California within ten (10) days after any filing by Endo of a petition in bankruptcy.

C. Endo shall submit any notice required under this paragraph to California, addressed to its Attorney General, with an electronic copy provided to the Senior Assistant Attorney General of the Antitrust Law Section at Kathleen.Foote@doj.ca.gov .

VIII. ACCESS TO INFORMATION

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that:

A. For the purpose of determining or securing compliance with this ASO, subject to and without limiting any legally recognized privilege, and upon written request with reasonable advance notice, Endo shall:

1. timely respond to and cooperate with California's reasonable request for production of documents or information related to compliance, including [*38] permitting any duly authorized representative of California to access, during office hours and in the presence of counsel, all facilities and access to inspect and copy all non-privileged business records and documentary material (which may be redacted for privilege) related to compliance with this ASO, including without limitation, electronically stored information as defined in Rule 2.7(a)(1) and (2), 16 C.F.R. §2.7(a)(1), and books, ledgers, accounts, correspondence, memoranda, written justifications, economic models, and other records and documents (in whatever form such records and documents are kept) in the possession or under the control of Endo, which copying services shall be provided by Endo in a timely manner at California's request;

2. permit any duly authorized representative of California to interview officers, directors, or employees of Endo, who may have counsel present, regarding any such matters; and

3. agree to accept service of process of any motion filed with the Court hereunder and, subject to any objections Endo may assert, cooperate with any subpoenas issued by California in connection with any motion to enforce this ASO.

B. California shall to the fullest extent possible coordinate any requests for [*39] information under this Section with the FTC, Department of Justice, and any other state that has reached a similar settlement agreement with Endo with respect to Lidoderm, if involved.

IX. EFFECT OF SUBSEQUENT SETTLEMENTS WITH OTHER STATES

A. If following the filing or entry of this ASO, Endo enters into a Multistate Agreement, California will join the enforcement and reporting provisions in the Multistate Agreement. The Parties will submit an amended ASO reflecting that California's enforcement authority and each of Endo's notification and reporting obligations, including but not limited to the provisions reflected in paragraphs IV.B, IV.C, and V through VIII (with the exception of VI.F regarding confidentiality) above, have been replaced by the corresponding provisions in the Multistate Agreement.

B. If following the filing or entry of this ASO, Endo enters into a similar settlement agreement with another state, or a series of similar agreements with individual states, but has not entered into a Multistate Agreement, California shall coordinate its enforcement actions, and Endo's reporting obligations with such other state(s). The Parties will use their best efforts to negotiate an [*40] agreement among and between Endo, California and the other settling states to coordinate enforcement authority and Endo's notification and reporting obligations under the respective settlement agreement(s) with Endo and will submit any such agreement to this Court as an amendment to this ASO.

X. JURISDICTION

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that this Court shall retain jurisdiction over these matters for purposes of construction, modification, and enforcement of this ASO.

XI. TERMINATION

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that this ASO shall terminate on February 2, 2027.

XI. DISMISSAL WITH PREJUDICE

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that within five (5) days of the Effective Date, California shall file a notice of voluntary dismissal with prejudice of its Complaint against Endo. Each party to bear its own costs aside from the Settlement Amount paid to California.

SO ORDERED this 6th day of June, 2019.

[*203] MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

CASPER, J.

I. Introduction

PNE Energy Supply LLC ("PNE"), on behalf of a putative class of wholesale electricity purchasers located in New England, has filed this lawsuit against Eversource Energy ("Eversource") and Avangrid, Inc. ("Avangrid") (collectively, "Defendants"), alleging violations of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2, and various state consumer protection and antitrust laws. D. 1. Specifically, [2] PNE asserts that Defendants manipulated pipeline capacity for natural gas transmission and, as a result, artificially inflated the price of natural gas and electricity at wholesale in New England. Id. ¶ 1. PNE seeks damages and injunctive relief, including under the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 26. Id. (Request for Relief). Defendants have filed a joint motion to dismiss. D. 21. For the reasons set forth below, the Court ALLOWS Defendants' motion.

II. Standard of Review

To survive a motion to dismiss under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), a pleading must allege claims that are plausible. Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). "A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009). To satisfy this standard, the pleading must provide "for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully.'" Saldivar v. Racine, 818 F.3d 14, 18 (1st Cir. 2016) (quoting Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678). A claim must contain sufficient factual matter that, accepted as true, would allow the Court "to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678 (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556).

As with other claims, "it is not enough merely to allege a[n] [antitrust] violation in conclusory terms." E. Food Servs., Inc. v. Pontifical Catholic Univ. Servs. Ass'n, Inc., 357 F.3d 1, 9 (1st Cir. 2004). Instead, the "complaint [3] must make out the rudiments of a valid claim." Id. Therefore, "[w]hen the requisite elements are lacking, the costs of modern federal antitrust litigation and the increasing caseload of the federal courts counsel against sending the parties into discovery when there is no reasonable likelihood that the plaintiffs can construct a claim from the events related in the complaint." *In re Carbon Black Antitrust Litig., No. Civ.A.03-10191-DPW, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 660, 2005 WL 102966, at 5 (quoting Car Carriers, Inc. v. Ford Motor Co., 745 F.2d 1101, 1106 (7th Cir. 1984)). Still, the Court should dismiss a complaint "only if it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him [*204] to relief." Id. (citations and internal quotation marks omitted).

III. Factual Background

Unless otherwise noted, the following facts are drawn from complaint, D. 1, and are accepted as true for the consideration of the pending motion.

PNE is an energy supplier that purchases electricity at wholesale to be resold to retail customers in New England. D. 1 ¶ 4. The price of natural gas in New England heavily influences the price of wholesale electricity for purchasers like PNE because natural gas-fired power plants generate forty-eight percent of electricity in the region. Id. ¶¶ 97, [4] 102. Accordingly, an increase in natural gas prices due to a shortage in natural gas supply will cause the price of wholesale electricity to increase as well. Id. ¶ 102. PNE alleges that Defendants used their influence over the transmission of natural gas to New England to restrict the supply of gas available for other purchasers, inflating the commodity market price of natural gas and, in turn, resulting in higher wholesale electricity prices. See, e.g., id. ¶ 15. The Court now turns to the New England energy markets purportedly impacted by Defendants' alleged anticompetitive conduct.

A. Natural Gas and Electricity Markets

1. FERC's Authority to Regulate Certain Natural Gas and Electric Rates

As part of the Natural Gas Wellhead Decontrol Act of 1989, Congress eliminated the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission's ("FERC") authority to impose price regulations on "first sales" of natural gas at the wellhead.[1] Id. ¶ 55. The commodity price of natural gas thereafter has been determined by market forces. Id.; see E. & J. Gallo Winery v. EnCana Corp., 503 F.3d 1027, 1038 (9th Cir. 2007). In 1992, FERC issued Order No. 636, which permanently severed the sale of natural gas as a commodity from the sale of natural gas transportation as a service. D. 1 ¶ 56. By contrast [5] to the sale of gas as a commodity, FERC retains the authority to regulate the sale of natural gas transmission services. See 15 U.S.C. § 717(b).

The Federal Power Act ("FPA"), 16 U.S.C. § 791a et seq., authorizes FERC to regulate both the "transmission of electric energy in interstate commerce" and the "sale of electric energy at wholesale in interstate commerce." 16 U.S.C. § 824(b)(1). In particular, the FPA obligates FERC to "oversee all prices for those interstate transactions and all rules and practices affecting such prices." F.E.R.C. v. Elec. Power Supply Ass'n, __ U.S. __, 136 S. Ct. 760, 782, 193 L. Ed. 2d 661 (2016).

2. Natural Gas Markets

The natural gas market encompasses two transactions: (1) the purchase of natural gas; and (2) the transmission of natural gas from seller to purchaser. With respect to sales of the commodity itself, natural gas is sold to consumers either directly from gas producers via contracts called "gas futures" or in the "spot market." D. 1 ¶ 61. Futures contracts allow gas producers to sell a specific quantity of gas at some predetermined future time. Id. Purchasers with a steady natural gas demand, such as load distribution companies ("LDCs"), which distribute gas to retail customers, id. ¶ 17 n.11, typically utilize futures contracts, id. ¶ 61. Entities with variable or less predictable natural gas demand, [6] including natural gas-fired electricity [*205] generators, purchase gas on the spot market. Id. ¶ 61. LDCs and other direct purchasers often find themselves holding title to excess amounts of natural gas that can be resold to other purchasers on the spot market. Id. ¶ 62. According to PNE, the spot market price of natural gas is not regulated by FERC and is, instead, determined by supply and demand, i.e. the spot market price of natural gas increases when the amount of available natural gas decreases. Id. ¶ 63.

As mentioned, purchasers must also pay for the transmission (or transportation) of natural gas to its destination. In New England, a network of pipelines facilitates the transmission of natural gas from the wellhead to a destination determined by the purchaser. Id. ¶ 76. The Algonquin Gas Transmission Pipeline ("Algonquin Pipeline"), which is partially owned by Defendant Eversource, is a major pipeline that transmits natural gas to New England. Id. Similar to the process for purchasing natural gas as a commodity, reserving pipeline transmission capacity in New England differs depending upon the nature of the purchaser. Id. ¶¶ 78, 80. According to PNE, purchasers with long-term capacity [7] needs utilize the primary capacity market whereas short-term capacity transactions occur in the secondary capacity market. See id. ¶¶ 32, 78.

a) Primary Capacity Market

As part of the primary capacity market, LDCs have the option to enter "no-notice" transportation contracts, which give them the power to reserve transmission capacity on a pipeline for a given day and time, and to adjust that reservation "upward or downward" throughout the day without penalty. D. 1 ¶ 59. Transmission capacity reservations play an important role in determining the supply of natural gas available to gas purchasers in New England because there is a fixed amount of pipeline capacity on any given day. Id. ¶ 79. In other words, the transmission capacity reserved by one purchaser limits how much capacity is available for other purchasers' natural gas needs. See id. Even when LDCs adjust their capacity reservations downward or cancel a reservation, that capacity is not automatically released for others to use. Id. ¶ 116 (explaining that "shrinking [a capacity] reservation does not make . . . now-empty [pipeline] capacity available to be filled by others;" rather, "capacity must be affirmatively released by the [8] contract-holder" before it can be resold).

[1] First sales are sales of natural gas not preceded by a sale to an interstate pipeline, intrastate pipeline, local distribution company or retail consumer. D. 1 ¶ 55.

b) Secondary Capacity Market

Capacity release programs[2] allow LDCs and other pipeline customers who have flexibility to adjust their capacity reservations to release excess capacity into what PNE describes as the "secondary capacity market," id. ¶¶ 60, 64, and this excess capacity is then used to transport natural gas for purchasers in the spot market, including gas-fired electricity generators. Id. ¶ 64. The "secondary capacity market" includes all short-term natural gas and capacity transactions, including the spot market for natural gas and the excess capacity release market through which excess capacity holders can sell or transfer capacity along a given pipeline. Id. ¶ 1 n.3 (explaining that the "term 'secondary capacity market' refers to all short-term transactions for pipeline capacity, including the gas 'spot market' for bundled transportation and commodity transactions and the 'excess capacity release market' administered by the pipeline for gas transportation [*206] capacity, exclusive of the physical commodity"); id. ¶ 32 (explaining that the "'secondary capacity market' . . . includes the spot market for the sale of natural gas and the related [9] 'excess capacity release' market for gas transmission services"). PNE alleges that the secondary capacity market is not regulated by FERC and, instead, is subject to supply and demand. Id. ¶ 17.

3. Wholesale Electricity Market

Wholesale electricity is typically sold by electricity generators to load serving entities ("LSEs"), which then deliver electricity to retail consumers. Id. ¶ 83 n.22. Wholesale electricity is primarily purchased through auctions between electricity generators and LSEs. See id. ¶¶ 82-83. The auctions are administered and overseen by intermediaries called Independent System Operators ("ISOs") or Regional Transmission Organizations ("RTOs"), which are independent non-profit organizations that FERC has charged with facilitating an efficient market for wholesale electricity while also ensuring reliability for consumers. Id. ¶¶ 70-72.

In the six states constituting the New England region, wholesale electricity is bought and sold in auction markets administered by ISO-New England ("ISO-NE") under a tariff approved by FERC. See id. ¶ 74. The auction process is as follows. ISO-NE first obtains orders from LSEs indicating how much electric energy is needed over a given [10] period of time. Id. ¶ 85. It also obtains bids from electricity generators specifying how much electricity can be produced during the relevant time period and how much they propose to charge for it. Id. Then, ISO-NE matches the offers and bids to set the Locational Marginal Price ("LMP") to reflect the relevant market clearing price. Id. ¶ 86.

B. Alleged Anticompetitive Conduct

PNE asserts that Defendants "each coordinated the activities of their member companies to restrict the supply of natural gas, thereby driving up the prices of natural gas, with the purpose and intent of raising prices and realizing excessive profits on their sales of electricity in New England's wholesale electricity market." Id. ¶ 1. The complaint acknowledges that this alleged anticompetitive conduct "stem[s] from the same [allegations of] misconduct" considered in Breiding v. Eversource Energy et al., 344 F. Supp. 3d 433 (D. Mass. 2018), D. 1 ¶ 2, where this Court dismissed all claims, including state and federal antitrust claims, against Defendants Avangrid and Eversource. Breiding, 344 F. Supp. 3d at 460. PNE nevertheless contends that the allegations here differ from those at issue in Breiding in at least the following ways: (1) whereas the Breiding plaintiffs claimed injury as retail electricity consumers, [11] PNE is a purchaser in the wholesale electricity market allegedly targeted by Defendants' scheme, id. ¶ 3, (2) PNE alleges that Defendants' anticompetitive conduct occurred in the unregulated "secondary capacity market," which purportedly includes the spot market for natural gas and the excess capacity release market, id. ¶¶ 11-12, 32, and which was not mentioned in the Breiding complaint.[3]

[2] Capacity release programs were implemented by FERC as part of Order No. 636. Id. ¶ 58.

[3] The complaint in Breiding does not mention the "secondary capacity market" nor does it suggest that the spot market for natural gas and the process for releasing excess capacity together form a single market relevant to the Court's consideration of

1. Defendants' Alleged Market Power

PNE points to several aspects of Defendants' energy businesses to suggest that Defendants controlled New England's natural [*207] gas supply and transmission and, therefore, the secondary capacity market that allegedly impacted the price of wholesale electricity. First, New England's principal natural gas pipeline, the Algonquin Pipeline, is owned, in part, by Defendant Eversource. Id. ¶ 76. Second, Eversource and Avangrid also own and operate, through their subsidiaries, substantial "natural gas utilities" known as LDCs—which purchase natural gas directly from gas producers and, in turn, distribute natural gas to retail consumers. Id. ¶ 103. Half of the eight largest LDCs in New England are owned by Eversource or Avangrid.[4] Id. As a result of their LDC operations, [12] Eversource and Avangrid possess a large number of no-notice contracts for natural gas transmission capacity along the Algonquin Pipeline. Id. ¶ 105. These contracts allow LDCs to adjust their transmission capacity reservations upward or downward at any time and without penalty. Id.

2. Defendants' Alleged Monopolization Scheme

PNE alleges that Defendants artificially restricted natural gas supply by refusing to release excess natural gas transmission capacity into the secondary capacity market, raising wholesale natural gas prices and, in turn, increasing the clearing price of wholesale electricity. Id. ¶¶ 110-12. No-notice contracts for natural gas transmission capacity provided the method by which Defendants perpetuated the alleged scheme. See, e.g., id. ¶ 117. No-notice contracts allow LDCs to reserve natural gas transmission capacity on the Algonquin Pipeline and to adjust such reservations at any time without penalty. Id. ¶¶ 59, 79. Because there is a fixed amount of pipeline capacity on a given day, PNE asserts that the excess capacity reserved and not released by LDCs, including those owned by Defendants' subsidiary companies, restricted the pipeline transmission capacity available [13] to meet the needs of other consumers, including natural gas-fired electricity generators participating in the spot market for natural gas. Id. ¶¶ 115-17.

PNE assert that Defendants' conduct was unique. Id. ¶ 129. As compared to the utility company with the next highest "last-minute" capacity cancellations, Eversource and Avangrid cancelled 40 and 184 times more of their natural gas capacity than this other company, respectively. Id. ¶ 130. In addition, Defendants could have (but did not) release their excess capacity to be sold to other gas purchasers. Id. ¶ 140.

3. Market Advantages Stemming from Defendants' Alleged Anticompetitive Conduct

PNE alleges that Defendants artificially increased demand for, value attributed to and prices paid to non-natural gas-fired power plants, including power plants owned by Defendants, by restricting available natural gas supply and increasing the spot market price for natural gas. Id. ¶¶ 108, 136-39.

4. Plaintiffs' Alleged Injury

PNE is not a purchaser of natural gas transmission capacity. Nor does it purchase natural gas on the spot market where prices were allegedly inflated. PNE alleges, however, that it was injured by Defendants' anticompetitive conduct [14] to the extent it increased the price of wholesale electricity between eighteen and twenty percent on average. Id. ¶¶ 30, 123.

whether Eversource and Avangrid engaged in anticompetitive conduct through their use of no-notice contracts. See Amended Complaint, Breiding, 344 F. Supp. 3d 433 (No. 17-cv-12274), D. 33.

C. Class Definitions

PNE asserts federal and state law claims against Avangrid and Eversource [*208] on behalf of itself and similarly situated classes of persons pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a) and Rule 23(b)(2). Id. ¶¶ 151-57. Defendants, their parent companies, subsidiaries and affiliates and governmental entities are excluded from all classes defined below. Id.

1. Federal Injunctive Class

PNE seeks equitable and injunctive relief under federal antitrust law on behalf of itself and a class of similarly situated electricity purchasers (the "Federal Injunctive Class"). Id. ¶ 151. The Federal Injunctive Class is defined as "[a]ll persons and entities located in ISO-NE electricity market who purchased wholesale electricity in the day-ahead and real-time energy markets from December 1, 2012 through the present." Id.

2. Federal Damages Class

PNE seeks monetary damages under federal antitrust law on behalf of itself and a class of similarly situated electricity purchasers (the "Federal Damages Class"). Id. ¶ 152. The Federal Damages Class is defined as "[a]ll persons and entities located in ISO-NE electricity [15] market who purchased wholesale electricity in the day-ahead and real-time energy markets from December 1, 2012 through the present." Id.

3. Statewide Class

PNE brings claims for damages and other relief under Massachusetts law against Avangrid and Eversource on behalf of itself and a class of similarly situated wholesale electricity customers located throughout New England (the "Statewide Class"). Id. ¶ 154. The Statewide Class is defined as "[a]ll persons and entities located in the ISO-NE electricity market who purchased wholesale electricity in the day-ahead and real-time energy markets from December 1, 2012 through the present." Id.

4. State Specific Class

PNE brings claims for damages and other relief under relevant Massachusetts and New Hampshire laws against Avangrid and Eversource on behalf of itself and a class of similarly situated wholesale electricity customers located throughout New England (the "State Specific Classes"). Id. ¶ 156. The State Specific Classes are defined as "[a]ll persons and entities located in Massachusetts [or New Hampshire] who purchased wholesale electricity in the day-ahead and real-time energy markets from December 1, 2012 through the present." Id.

[16] IV. Procedural History

On August 10, 2018, PNE instituted this action against Defendants. D. 1. Defendants have now moved to dismiss. D. 21. The Court heard the parties on the pending motion and took the matter under advisement. D. 31.

V. Discussion

A. The Filed Rate Doctrine Bars PNE's Claims

This Court recently held that the filed rate doctrine bars federal and state law claims premised on the alleged abuse of Avangrid and Eversource's right to adjust and withhold excess natural gas transmission capacity pursuant to no-notice contracts approved by FERC, even where such conduct allegedly resulted in increased prices in downstream wholesale and retail electricity markets. See Breiding, 344 F. Supp. 3d at 451 (dismissing antirust and consumer protection claims against Avangrid and Eversource where the "requested relief would require the Court to determine the reasonableness of [wholesale electricity] rates and tariffs approved by FERC"). Defendants, relying on the Court's ruling in Breiding, contend [*209] that the filed rate doctrine similarly bars PNE's claims. See D. 22 at 7-8. PNE asserts that Breiding is not dispositive here because (1) the filed rate doctrine does not bar challenges to anticompetitive conduct in the allegedly [17] unregulated secondary capacity market, D. 26 at 24-25; (2) PNE's claims concern Defendants' anticompetitive business practices (as opposed to the lawful exercise of rights under contracts approved by FERC and protected under the filed rate doctrine), id. at 25-28; and (3) PNE is not asking the Court to alter wholesale electric rates; rather, it seeks to recover "fuel cost" overcharges baked into the price of wholesale electricity as a result of Defendants' anticompetitive conduct, id. at 28-31.

The filed rate doctrine requires that "utility filings with the regulatory agency prevail over . . . other claims seeking different rates or terms than those reflected in the filings with the agency." Town of Norwood, Mass. v. F.E.R.C., 217 F.3d 24, 28 (1st Cir. 2000) ("Town of Norwood II"). This doctrine is a "form of deference and preemption, which precludes interference with the rate setting authority of an administrative agency." Wah Chang v. Duke Energy Trading & Mktg., LLC, 507 F.3d 1222, 1225 (9th Cir. 2007). "The strict application of the [filed rate doctrine] is necessary to promote the congressional policy of preventing unjust discrimination in rates." Town of Norwood v. New England Power Co., 23 F. Supp. 2d 109, 115-16 (D. Mass. 1998), aff'd in part, remanded in part sub nom., Town of Norwood, Mass. v. New England Power Co., 202 F.3d 408 (1st Cir. 2000) (citations and internal quotation marks omitted) ("Town of Norwood I"). The filed rate doctrine bars federal and state antitrust claims, as well as state tort [18] actions, that require setting aside or second guessing rates approved by FERC. Wah Chang, 507 F.3d at 1225 (describing the filed rate doctrine's fortification against "direct attack" as "impenetrable;" "[i]t turns away both federal and state antitrust actions").

1. The Filed Rate Doctrine's Application to the Secondary Capacity Market

PNE argues that the filed rate doctrine does not bar the claims alleged here because the "secondary capacity market," where Defendants' anticompetitive conduct allegedly restricted natural gas supply and increased prices, is not regulated by FERC. See D. 26 at 24-25. Specifically, PNE asserts the short-term excess capacity release market, which PNE alleges is one component of the secondary capacity market, see D. 1 ¶ 32, is "explicitly unregulated," see D. 26 at 25 (emphasis in original). For support, PNE cites 18 C.F.R. § 284.8(b)(2), which states in relevant part that "no rate limitation applies to the release of capacity for a period of one year or less if the release is to take effect on or before one year from the date on which the pipeline is notified of the release." 18 C.F.R. § 284.8(b)(2). As this Court has explained, however, FERC's rendering of rate determinations to market forces is not a dispositive factor in determining [19] whether FERC retains overall authority to regulate a particular energy transaction. See Breiding, 344 F. Supp. 3d at 446 n.5 (explaining that "the Court does not distinguish between market-based rates and rates formally filed with FERC for the purpose of determining whether the filed rate doctrine bars [p]laintiffs' claims"). The Natural Gas Act ("NGA") grants FERC power to regulate "the transportation of natural gas in interstate commerce," 15 U.S.C. § 717(b), and the responsibility of ensuring that market-based rates, including those set in the excess capacity release market, are "just and reasonable," 15 U.S.C. § 717c(a) (explaining that "[a]ll rates and charges made, demanded, or received . . . [*210] in connection with the transportation or sale of natural gas subject to the jurisdiction of [FERC], and all rules and regulations affecting or pertaining to such rates or charges, shall be just and reasonable"). The filed rate doctrine applies with no less force where regulated rates have been left to the free market. Town of Norwood I, 202 F.3d at 419 (rejecting the plaintiff's assertion that the "filed rate doctrine should not apply where 'regulated' rates have been left to the free market").

The Court, however, need not decide today whether FERC's broad regulatory authority over the transportation [20] of natural gas extends to the excess capacity release market (or, by extension, the secondary capacity market). The secondary capacity market is bookended by what PNE describes as the primary capacity market, where Defendants allegedly abused no-notice contracts, and the wholesale electricity market, where PNE allegedly paid supracompetitive prices as a result of Defendants' anticompetitive conduct. There is no dispute that these markets are regulated by FERC. See D. 1 ¶ 1 n.3 (stating that "the 'primary capacity market,' which includes long-term contracts for pipeline capacity between the pipeline and a primary contract holder transacted at FERC-regulated prices"); id. ¶¶ 26, 73 (explaining that the price of wholesale electricity in New England is determined via auctions run by ISO-NE, an entity created in response to FERC Order No. 888). PNE's claims challenging rates and conduct within these markets must comport with the filed rate doctrine. See, e.g., Ark. La. Gas Co. v. Hall, 453 U.S. 571, 577-78, 101 S. Ct. 2925, 69 L. Ed. 2d 856 (1981). Accordingly, the Court turns to PNE's arguments that it challenges neither conduct approved by FERC pursuant to no-notice contracts nor wholesale electric rates within FERC's regulatory authority.

2. The Filed Rate Doctrine Bars [21] PNE's Challenge to No-Notice Contract Rights Approved by FERC

Defendants assert that PNE, like the plaintiffs in Breiding, attempts to enjoin transmission capacity reservation practices permitted under the terms of federally approved no-notice contracts. See D. 22 at 18. No-notice contracts grant Defendants and other long-term natural gas purchasers the power to reserve transmission capacity on a pipeline for a given day and time, to adjust that reservation upward or downward throughout the day without penalty and, at the contract holder's discretion, the power to affirmatively release capacity to be resold via capacity release programs. D. 1 ¶¶ 59, 79, 116-117. The Court recognized in Breiding that "the filed rate doctrine protects not only agency authority over tariffed rates but also 'ancillary conditions and terms included in the tariff,' including, for example, no-notice contracts and relevant provisions allowing LDCs to cancel capacity reservations at any time without penalty." Breiding, 344 F. Supp. 3d at 448 (quoting Town of Norwood I, 202 F.3d at 416).

PNE contends as an initial matter that no-notice contracts are not a "necessary part of the conduct comprising Defendants' alleged anticompetitive scheme." D. 26 at 26. PNE's argument is undermined [22] by numerous allegations in the complaint that suggest the success of Defendants' scheme depended upon the purported abuse of no-notice contracts. See D. 1 ¶ 105 (explaining that "[a]s a result of their LDC operations, Eversource and Avangrid possess a large number of no-notice contracts," which "give them power to reserve transmission capacity on the Pipeline for a given day and then adjust that reservation upward or downward at the last minute without penalty"); id. ¶ 107 (alleging that [*211] "[h]aving control of capacity on the Pipeline gave Eversource and Avangrid the ability to restrict supply in the secondary capacity market particularly on days when capacity was already scarce"); id. ¶ 119 (asserting that Eversource and Avangrid, "by reduc[ing] the Pipeline's daily effective capacity" and "withholding this amount of capacity from the secondary market," purportedly caused a "more than 50% increase in the spot-market price of gas and an almost 20% increase in the wholesale electricity price"). Although the Court need not accept conclusory legal conclusions in the complaint as true, it also cannot ignore the factual allegations that form a line between Defendants' alleged capacity reservation [23] practices under no-notice contracts and PNE's alleged injury in the wholesale electricity market. See id. ¶¶ 105, 107, 119; see also ¶ 102 (explaining that "[b]ecause so much of New England's electricity is generated by natural-gas-fired power plants, the unregulated spot market price of natural gas heavily influences the wholesale price of electricity" such that a shortage of natural gas supply will increase the spot market price of natural gas and wholesale electricity).

Alternatively, PNE contends that it does not question the propriety of no-notice contracts approved by FERC, instead, it asks the Court to consider whether Defendants' anticompetitive exercise of no-notice contract rights violated the operative FERC-approved tariff's mandate that service agreements be consistent with valid laws, including antitrust law. Id. For support, PNE primarily relies upon Brown v. MCI WorldCom Network Services, Inc., 277 F.3d 1166, 1171-72 (9th Cir. 2002) and Town of Norwood I.[5] In Brown, the court held that the filed rate doctrine did not bar the plaintiff's claims challenging conduct that was inconsistent with a tariff filed with the Federal Communications Commission. See Brown, 277 F.3d at 1172 (concluding that the filed rate doctrine did not preclude the plaintiff's antitrust claim since the [24] tariff at issue did not authorize an additional fee that defendants had charged him). Here, by contrast, there is no dispute that FERC authorized Defendants' capacity adjustments pursuant to no-notice contracts. See D. 1 ¶¶ 58-59 (explaining that FERC Order No. 636 authorized no-notice transportation contracts, which "give an LDC the power to reserve space, or transmission capacity on the pipeline . . . then adjust that reservation . . . at the last minute without penalty"). In lieu of enforcing a filed tariff provision or preventing conduct inconsistent with the same (as was the case in Brown), PNE appears to challenge Defendants' business choices with respect to FERC-approved no-notice contracts, including the routine "down-scheduling" of capacity reservations. D. 26 at 27. As the Brown court recognized, however, the filed rate doctrine "bars suits challenging services, billing, or other practices when such challenges, if successful, would have the effect of changing the filed tariff." Brown, 277 F.3d at 1170. The holding in Town of Norwood I also does not support PNE's position. There, the First Circuit mostly affirmed the district court's dismissal of plaintiff's antitrust claims, holding that "any meaningful [25] relief as to the [alleged anticompetitive scheme] would require the alteration of tariffs." Town of Norwood I, 202 F.3d at 420 (emphasis in original). PNE's requested relief likewise requires interfering with Defendants' right to adjust and withhold excess capacity as approved [*212] by FERC as part of the operative filed tariff. In sum, PNE "cannot escape the fact that FERC authorized the business choices that allegedly caused Plaintiffs' injury." Breiding, 344 F. Supp. 3d at 450.

PNE's claims call into question Defendants' exercise of no-notice transportation practices and, therefore, trigger the filed rate doctrine's bar on challenges to the terms and conditions of tariffs approved by FERC. In other words, "[t]o the extent [PNE] seek[s] to enjoin Defendants from exercising rights pursuant to contracts subject to a filed tariff, [PNE] ask[s] the Court do exactly what the First Circuit has declared it cannot, i.e., to alter the terms of tariffs approved by FERC." Breiding, 344 F. Supp. 3d at 448.

3. The Filed Rate Doctrine Prohibits Setting Aside Wholesale Electric Rates

Even if the filed rate doctrine did not bar PNE's claims because they require altering contracts approved by FERC, such claims are barred for the additional reason that they require the Court to second guess or set aside [26] wholesale electric rates ratified by FERC through the ISO-NE auction process. PNE alleges injuries stemming from inflated wholesale electric prices caused by the same anticompetitive conduct at the heart of the state and federal antitrust and consumer protection claims dismissed in Breiding, but nonetheless argues that it does not seek to alter FERC-approved rates. See D. 1 ¶ 8 (alleging that "[e]ven through Plaintiff's damages are based on prices in the wholesale electricity market, they do not implicate any regulatory authority or related doctrines"). According to PNE, it does not seek the adjustment of wholesale electric rates; rather, it challenges "fuel cost" overcharges that were passed on to PNE as a component of wholesale electric rates. D. 26 at 28. PNE alleges that the price of natural gas, i.e., fuel costs, factor into the bids indicating the price at which electricity generators will supply electricity to wholesale electricity purchasers in the ISO-NE auction process. D. 1 ¶ 9. Because fuel costs are a purportedly unregulated component of wholesale electric rates, PNE argues that the filed rate doctrine does not bar claims challenging such fuel costs. D. 26 at 28-29.

To [27] ascertain whether and to what extent fuel costs were artificially inflated by Defendants' alleged anticompetitive conduct, the Court would be required to determine the difference between wholesale electric rates during the class period and hypothetical rates that would have been charged but for Defendants' conduct. The filed rate doctrine prohibits this analysis. See Wah Chang, 507 F.3d at 1226; Transmission Agency of N. Cal. v. Sierra Pac. Power Co., 295 F.3d 918, 930 (9th Cir. 2002); Cnty. of Stanislaus v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co., 114 F.3d 858, 863 (9th Cir. 1997) (quoting Cost Mgmt. Servs. v. Wash. Natural Gas Co., 99 F.3d 937, 944 (9th Cir. 1996)).

The cases PNE relies on for support do not compel a different result. In Town of Norwood I, for example, the court specifically held that the filed rate doctrine bars claims challenging wholesale electric rates. See Town of Norwood I, 202 F. 3d at 419 (noting that "FERC is still responsible for ensuring 'just and reasonable' rates and, to that end, wholesale power rates continue to be filed and subject to agency review," which "triggers the filed rate doctrine") (citation omitted). PNE's reliance on Gallo does not warrant a different conclusion for the reasons articulated by Defendants. D. 29 at 7 (citing Breiding, 344 F. Supp. 3d at 447). Additionally, the Court does not share PNE's view of the facts at issue in Ice Cream Liquidation, Inc. v. Land [*213] O'Lakes, Inc., 253 F. Supp. 2d 262 (D. Conn. 2003). The plaintiffs in that case overpaid for a wholesale product that was never governed by a federal agency's rate setting authority. See Ice Cream Liquidation, 253 F. Supp. 2d at 275-76 (explaining that "plaintiff [28] is not challenging . . . the minimum milk rates set [under the USDA]" and "concede[s] . . . any claim challenging [USDA] orders or the rates themselves clearly would be barred by the filed rate doctrine"). By contrast to plaintiffs in Ice Cream Liquidation, PNE alleges here that Defendants' conduct caused wholesale electric prices to increase by at least eighteen percent. Id. ¶¶ 30, 123. FERC undoubtedly regulates the "sale of electric energy at wholesale in interstate commerce." 16 U.S.C. § 824(b)(1). Other courts have also recognized the limited applicability of Ice Cream Liquidation where "the difference between what [the plaintiff's] paid and what they would have paid absent Defendants' conduct" required the court to estimate "the difference between [a] filed rate, and the . . . rate that . . . would have [been] set had the input data . . . not been inflated by Defendants' actions." In re Dairy Farmers of Am., Inc. Cheese Antitrust Litig., 767 F. Supp. 2d 880, 895 (N.D. Ill. 2011) (distinguishing Ice Cream Litigation where "[p]laintiffs do not propose, nor can the Court conceive of, a method for calculating damages in either case that would not require the Court to engage in just the type of ratemaking that the [filed rate] doctrine precludes"). Finally, Composite Co., Inc. v. Am. Int'l Grp., Inc. [29] is inapposite because that decision did not concern a filed rate. See Composite Co., 988 F. Supp. 2d 61, 77 (D. Mass. 2013) (holding that the filed rate doctrine did not apply because "the experience-modifier at issue in this case is not a filed rate"). Here, PNE "seeks a refund of some portion of [FERC-approved] rates," but has "failed to explain how the court could calculate their damages award without first determining the natural gas rate they would have faced" given that FERC "precludes the court from making such a determination." Jacquet v. Dominion Transmission, Inc., No. CIV.A. 2:05-0548, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 137665, 2010 WL 5487248, at *9 (S.D.W. Va. Dec. 30, 2010).

At bottom, PNE requires the Court to question the reasonableness of wholesale electric rates and conduct that FERC mandated as part of no-notice contracts. The Court, therefore, holds that the doctrine bars the claims alleged in the complaint.

B. PNE Has Not Stated Cognizable Antitrust Claims

PNE's antitrust claims fail even if the filed rate doctrine did not bar them in the first instance. First, PNE lacks standing to bring its antitrust claims. Federal courts are constitutionally limited to deciding cases or controversies. Merrimon v. Unum Life Ins. Co. of Am., 758 F.3d 46, 52 (1st Cir. 2014). A plaintiff, therefore, must establish that it has standing in federal court by demonstrating that the complaint alleges [30] a case or controversy recognized under Article III of the Constitution. See Katz v. Pershing, LLC, 672 F.3d 64, 71 (1st Cir. 2012). The "plaintiff must establish . . . injury, causation, and redressability." Id. (citing Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560-61, 112 S. Ct. 2130, 119 L. Ed. 2d 351 (1992)). At the pleading stage, "[a]n antitrust plaintiff must show both constitutional standing and antitrust standing." In re Aluminum Warehousing Antitrust Litig., 833 F.3d 151, 157 (2d Cir. 2016). To determine whether a plaintiff has standing to bring an antitrust cause of action, the Court conducts "an analysis of prudential considerations aimed at preserving the effective enforcement of the antitrust laws." RSA [*214] Media, Inc. v. AK Media Grp., Inc., 260 F.3d 10, 13 (1st Cir. 2001) (quoting Serpa Corp. v. McWane, Inc., 199 F.3d 6, 10 (1st Cir. 1999)) (internal quotation marks omitted).

Of the factors the Court considers, lack of injury, in particular, will defeat standing. See Sterling Merch., Inc. v. Nestlé, S.A., 656 F.3d 112, 121 (1st Cir. 2011). A proper plaintiff for the purpose of alleging antitrust injury is generally "a customer who obtains services in the threatened market or a competitor who seeks to serve that market." SAS of P.R., Inc. v. P.R. Tel. Co., 48 F.3d 39, 44 (1st Cir. 1995). PNE argues that it is an appropriate plaintiff to bring this action because it was injured in the market targeted by Defendants' anticompetitive scheme (i.e., the wholesale electricity market). PNE alleged, however, that Defendants' unlawful conduct "involved artificially restricting supply in the secondary capacity market." D. 1 ¶ 169. PNE is not a customer or a competitor in either market that comprises [31] the secondary capacity market. PNE nonetheless claims support from Ice Cream Liquidation, where the court held that plaintiffs bringing claims under Section 1 of the Sherman Act suffered an antitrust injury despite the fact that defendants were participants in the market in which prices were allegedly fixed and plaintiffs were participants in the market that experienced artificially inflated prices as a result of the alleged price-fixing scheme. Ice Cream Liquidation, 253 F. Supp. 2d at 272-73.

Even assuming that PNE could establish antitrust injury and the remaining antitrust standing analysis,[6] PNE's failure to allege plausibly that Eversource and Avangrid each had monopoly power in the relevant market is fatal to the claims alleged here. Section 2 of the Sherman Act makes it illegal to "monopolize, or attempt to monopolize . . . any part of the trade or commerce" among several states. Díaz Aviation Corp. v. Airport Aviation Servs., Inc., 716 F.3d 256, 265 (1st Cir. 2013) (quoting 15 U.S.C. § 2) (internal quotation marks omitted). "To prove a violation of this statute, a plaintiff must demonstrate (1) that the defendant possesses 'monopoly power in the relevant market,' and (2) that the defendant has acquired or maintained that power by improper means." Town of Concord, Mass. v. Bos. Edison Co., 915 F.2d 17, 21 (1st Cir. 1990). To prove attempted monopolization, a plaintiff must demonstrate "(1) that the defendant has [32] engaged in predatory or anticompetitive conduct with (2) a specific intent to monopolize and (3) a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power." Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447, 456, 113 S. Ct. 884, 122 L. Ed. 2d 247 (1993). "Market power can be shown through two types of proof," either through "direct evidence of market power," such as "actual supracompetitive prices and restricted output," or "circumstantial evidence of market power." Coastal Fuels of P. R., Inc. v. Caribbean Petroleum Corp., 79 F.3d 182, 196-97 (1st Cir. 1996).

[*215] PNE asserts that the relevant market for assessing market power in this case is the "secondary capacity market," which includes the spot market for natural gas and the excess capacity release market, id. ¶ 32, and the wholesale electricity market, id. ¶ 33. As Defendants correctly point out, PNE has failed to allege that Eversource or Avangrid individually possess monopoly power in those markets. D. 22 at 25-26; D. 29 at 12-13. PNE instead asserts that "[t]ogether, Eversource and Avangrid" reduced natural gas supply in the secondary capacity market, causing purported supracompetitive prices in wholesale electricity market. Id. ¶ 119. Courts in the First Circuit have rejected monopolization claims based on a "shared monopoly" theory of liability. See *PSW, Inc. v. VISA U.S.A., Inc., No. C.A. 04-347T, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12157, 2006 WL 519670, at 11 (D.R.I. Feb. 28, 2006) (explaining [33] that "to state any claim under Section Two's actual or attempted monopoly clauses, a claimant is required to assert that the individual market power of a defendant is sufficient to constitute a monopoly, in this analysis, the combined monopoly power of competitors is irrelevant and insufficient") (emphasis in the original). The complaint's vague assertion that "Eversource and/or Avangrid could possess the vast majority of excess Pipeline capacity" when "capacity was already scarce," id. ¶ 107, without more, does not constitute a plausible allegation regarding the Defendants' individual monopoly power in the secondary capacity market, especially where the gravamen of PNE's complaint turns on Defendants' alleged refusal to participate in that market in the first instance.

Accordingly, PNE has not stated cognizable antitrust claims against Defendants.

C. PNE's State Law Claims Are Also Dismissed

PNE also bring claims for damages and injunctive relief under various Massachusetts and New Hampshire antitrust, consumer protection and unfair trade statutes. The filed rate doctrine applies with equal force to PNE's state law claims. See Pub. Util. Dist. No. 1 of Snohomish Cnty. v. Dynegy Power Mktg., Inc., 384 F.3d 756, 761 (9th Cir. 2004) (explaining that the filed rate [34] doctrine preempted antitrust and unfair competition claims grounded in state law where such claims required the court to determine rates that "would have been achieved in a competitive market") (internal quotation marks omitted). PNE's state law claims are also dismissed.[7]

VI. Conclusion

For the foregoing reasons, the Court ALLOWS Defendants' motion to dismiss, D. 21.

So Ordered.

Opinion

ORDER GRANTING IN PART AND DENYING IN PART TARSADIA DEFENDANTS' MOTION TO DISMISS AND GRANTING PLAYGROUND'S MOTION TO DISMISS

[Dkt. Nos. 26, 27.]

Before the Court is Defendants Tarsadia Hotels, 5th Rock LLC, MKP One, LLC, Gaslamp Holdings, LLC, Tushar Patel, B.U. Patel, and Gregory Casserly's motion to dismiss the first amended complaint. (Dkt. No. 26.) Also before the Court is Defendant Playground Destination Properties, Inc.'s motion to dismiss the first amended complaint. (Dkt. No. 27.) Plaintiff filed oppositions to both motions. (Dkt. Nos. [*2] 31, 32.) Replies were filed by all Defendants. (Dkt. Nos. 33, 34.) Based on the reasoning below, the Court GRANTS in part and DENIES in part Tarsadia Defendants' motion to dismiss with leave to amend and GRANTS Playground's motion to dismiss with leave to amend.

Procedural Background

On September 25, 2018[1], Jason Brooks, a prisoner proceeding pro se and in forma pauperis, filed the original complaint against Defendants Tarsadia Hotels, 5th Rock, LLC, MKP One, LLC, Gaslamp Holdings, LLC, Gregory Casserly, B.U. Patel, and Tushar Patel ("Tarsadia Defendants") as well as Defendant Playground Destination Properties, Inc. ("Playground") (collectively "Defendants"). (Dkt. No. 1.) On March 18, 2019, Plaintiff filed the operative first amended complaint ("FAC") against Tarsadia Defendants and Playground alleging violations of the anti-fraud provision of the Interstate Land Sales Disclosure Act ("ILSA"), 15 U.S.C. §§ 1703(a)(2)(A), (B) and (C); violations of California Corporations Code sections 25401, 25501, 25504.1 and Rule 10b of the 1934 Securities Exchange Act; fraud; negligence; and violations pursuant to California Business & Professions Codes sections 17200 et seq. (Dkt. No. 24.)

In May 2006, Plaintiff and Brian Thielen, as co-purchasers, entered into a Purchase Contract and Escrow Instruction [*3] ("Purchase Contract") with Defendants for the purchase of a newly constructed residential condominium unit called the Hard Rock Hotel & Condominium ("Hard Rock") located in San Diego. (Id. ¶¶ 17, 21.) Specifically, Plaintiff claims that under ILSA, Defendants failed to disclose and intentionally concealed that buyers had an absolute right to rescind their Purchase Contracts within two years of the date of signing and making affirmative misrepresentations to prevent Plaintiff from exercising his rescission rights. (Id.) He also asserts that Defendants' failure to disclose or affirmatively concealing his right to rescind within two year of the date of the Purchase Contract constitute violations of state and federal securities fraud statutes.

This case relates to two prior cases that were before the Court and are now concluded. In one case, Salameh v. Tarsadia Hotels, Case No. 09cv2739, the purported class plaintiffs representing purchasers of Hard Rock Hotel San Diego Investment Securities alleged inter alia, violations of federal and California securities statutes. (Case No. 09cv2739, Dkt. No. 86, SAC.) On March 22, 2011, the Court granted Defendants' motions to dismiss with prejudice. [*4] Salameh v. Tarsadia Hotels, No. 09cv2739 DMS(CAB), 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 30375, 2011 WL 1044129 (S.D. Cal. Mar. 22, 2011). The Court's ruling was affirmed on appeal. Salameh v. Tarsadia Hotel, 726 F.3d 1124 (9th Cir. 2013). Relevant to this case, the Ninth Circuit concluded that based on the plaintiffs' pleadings, the Purchase Contract and the subsequent Rental Management Agreement ("RMA") did not constitute a "security" under federal and state securities laws. Id. at 1132.

In the second case, Beaver v. Tarsadia Hotels, Case No. 11cv1842, the purported class action plaintiffs filed an action on behalf of persons who purchased units at the Hard Rock Hotel between May 2006 and December 2007 alleging Defendants failed to disclose and intentionally concealed the plaintiffs' right to rescind their purchase contracts within two years of the date of signing the Purchase Contracts and made affirmative misrepresentations to prevent Plaintiffs from exercising the right. (Case No. 11cv1842, Dkt. No. 69, TAC.) In Beaver, the Third Amended

[1] Under the prison mailbox rule, the Court deems the Complaint filed on the date Plaintiff signed the Complaint on September 25, 2018. See Houston v. Lack, 487 U.S. 266, 108 S. Ct. 2379, 101 L. Ed. 2d 245 (1988) (establishing prison mailbox rule in habeas petition context); see also Douglas v. Noelle, 567 F.3d 1103, 1107-1109 (9th Cir. 2009) (applying mailbox rule to § 1983 complaint); James v. Madison St. Jail, 122 F.3d 27, 28 (9th Cir. 1997) (per curiam) (applying mailbox rule to trust-account statements filed pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1915(a)(2)); Caldwell v. Amend, 30 F.3d 1199, 1201 (9th Cir. 1994) (mailbox rule applied to Rule 50(b) motion); Faile v. Upjohn Co., 988 F.2d 985, 989 (9th Cir. 1993) (mailbox rule applied to discovery responses).

Complaint ("TAC") alleged, inter alia, violations of the anti-fraud provisions of ILSA, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1703(a)(2)(A)-(C), fraud, negligence, and violation of California Business and Professions Code sections 17200 et seq. The Beaver case involved extensive motion practice which raised numerous novel issues. The Ninth Circuit affirmed the Court's order on reconsideration of the parties' cross-motions [*5] for summary judgment, Beaver v. Tarsadia Hotels, 29 F.Supp.3d 1294 (S.D. Cal. 2014). Beaver v. Tarsadia Hotels, 816 F.3d 1170 (9th Cir. 2016). On remand, the case settled as a class action and the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for final approval of class action settlement and judgment on September 28, 2017, Beaver v. Tarsadia Hotels, Case No. 11cv1842-GPC(KSC), 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 160214, 2017 WL 4310707 (S.D. Cal. Sept. 28, 2017). In its order, the Court noted that one member, Jason Brooks, who was a co-purchaser of Unit 1042, excluded himself from the Class. *2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 160214, [WL] at 15.

Extracting allegations from the operative complaints in the Salameh and Beaver cases, in this case, Jason Brooks alleges that around 2005 Tarsadia Defendants, through 5th Rock, began to develop a residential condominium consisting of 420 Units called the "Hard Rock Hotel & Condominium" ("Hard Rock") located at 205 Fifth Avenue in San Diego, CA. (Dkt. No. 24, FAC ¶ 16.) Defendants marketed the Units through the Internet, marketing materials, brochures and verbal statements. (Id.) Playground was the real estate broker for the Hard Rock. (Id. ¶ 20.)

Around May 18, 2006, Plaintiff and Brian Thielen, as co-purchasers, executed a pre-printed standardized Purchase Contract and Escrow Instructions that was prepared by Defendants for the purchase of Unit 1042 at the Hard Rock. (Id. ¶¶ 21, 100.) He claims he was induced to purchase [*6] the Unit because he understood that Tarsadia Defendants would manage the property through the Rental Management Agreement ("RMA"). (Id. ¶ 21.) Plaintiff was required to sign three agreements: (1) the Contract, (2) the Unit Management and Operating Agreement ("OA") and (3) the RMA. (Id. ¶ 23.) Tarsadia Defendants had Playground prepare a document entitled "Tarsadia's Optional Rental Management Program FAQ" where Defendants represented that investors were not required to participate in the RMA but that representation was false as the purchasers were mandated to participate in the RMA. (Id. ¶¶ 22-24.)

Plaintiff claims that the Contract, the OA and the RMA were in essence a single contract as they could not be separated due to what was required in the agreements but Defendants intentionally separated the offer of the OA/RMA and the Contract in order to avoid the securities law. (Id. ¶ 25.) Defendants furthered the fraudulent scheme by having Playground create closing materials that included misstatements by threatening Plaintiff with the loss of his deposit if he did not timely close. (Id. ¶ 26.) Plaintiff reluctantly closed escrow in the late summer or fall of 2007. (Id. ¶ 27.)

According [*7] to the FAC, ILSA was enacted to protect consumers from fraud and abuse in the sale of subdivided lots, including condominium units, and requires developers and their agents to comply with certain registration and disclosure requirements. (Id. ¶ 44.) Developers and their agents must comply with ILSA unless they fall within an exemption but no exemptions applied to the Hard Rock. (Id. ¶ 45.)

Specifically, ILSA requires a developer to register a project with the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development ("HUD") and to provide buyers with an ILSA property report that discloses material facts regarding the sales transaction. (Id. ¶ 46.) If a developer does not obtain an ILSA property report to be distributed to buyers before they sign the purchase contract (or in the alternative, in California, where a developer fails to provide buyers with an ILSA compliant Public Report issued by the Department of Real Estate), ILSA imposes a two-year right to rescind from the date of contract for the benefit of the buyers where the right to rescind must be disclosed in the purchase contract, 15 U.S.C. § 1703(c). (Id.)

Plaintiff claims that Defendants failed to obtain an ILSA property report from HUD and obtained a [*8] Public Report from the DRE that was not ILSA compliant. (Id. ¶ 47, 70.) The Public Report failed to provide buyers notice of any rescission rights and instead disclosed a three-day right to rescind. (Id. ¶¶ 70, 71.) Moreover, Plaintiff claims that under 15 U.S.C. § 1703(d)(2) of ILSA, a developer is required to include in the buyer default provision of the purchase contract written notice of a 20-day opportunity for the buyer to remedy default or breach of contract. (Id. ¶¶ 48, 73-76.) If such a notice is omitted, the buyer is entitled to an absolute two year right to rescind his purchase agreement from the date he signed it. (Id.) Plaintiff claims he received the "Final Subdivision Public Report, File No.

120249LA-F00" concerning the Hard Rock which was issued by the DRE on April 4, 2006 but it does not include the buyer's rescission rights under ILSA. (Id. ¶ 49.)

Because Defendants failed to comply with their disclosure requirements under ILSA and concealed the two-year rescission rights, they engaged in a scheme to defraud in violation of § 1703(a)(2)(A) of ILSA. (Id. ¶ 50.) Defendants also obtained money from Plaintiff by means of omitting the two-year rescission right in the contract and the Public Report in violation of [*9] § 1703(a)(2)(B) and otherwise engaged in a practice or course of business that operated as a fraud upon Plaintiff in violation of § 1703(a)(2)(C). Plaintiff further claims that ILSA imposed an ongoing obligation to amend the Public Report to disclose the two year right to rescind and Defendants failed to do so. (Id. ¶ 84.)

Because he was denied the right to rescind, Plaintiff was forced to quit-claim the deed of the property to his co-purchaser, Brian Theilan, in January 2008. (Id. ¶ 53.) If he had known of his right to rescind he would never have closed on the Unit and was deprived the use of his $50,000 to seek legal counsel to uncover Defendants' wrongful conduct. (Id. ¶ 114.) He also would have used the $50,000 to continue paying his attorney to prevent a default judgment of $18 million against him in June 2008. (Id. ¶116.) He claims he did not respond to that lawsuit because he ran out of money to pay his attorneys at the time. (Id.) He further claims he would never have been sent to prison and he would not be currently paying $40,800 monthly interest penalty on an "illegally induced plea". (Id.) In sum, he seeks $35 million in damages. (Id. ¶ 118.)

Plaintiff has been incarcerated in a Colorado prison since [*10] May 24, 2009 and received notice of the class action lawsuit ("Class Notice") in June 2017. (Id. ¶ 54.) Pursuant to the Class Notice, he timely opted out of the class action settlement on August 25, 2017. (Id.; Dkt. No. 17-3, Ds' RJN, Ex. D at p. 67-68.) He inadvertently filed a complaint in the District Court for the District of Colorado on December 29, 2017, and the complaint was dismissed for improper venue on September 14, 2018. (Dkt. No. 24, FAC ¶ 13; see also Dkt. No. 27-3, Tarsadia Ds' RJN[2], Ex. A.) After conducting a review of the complaint, the Colorado district court also denied the Plaintiff's motion to transfer the case to this district. (Brooks v. Tarsadia Hotels, Civ. No. 17cv3172-PAB-KMT, Dkt. Nos. 64, 68 (D. Colo.).) The Complaint in this case was filed on September 25, 2018. (Dkt. No. 1.)

Discussion

A. Legal Standard as to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6)

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure ("Rule") 12(b)(6) permits dismissal for "failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted." Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6). Dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6) is appropriate where the complaint lacks a cognizable legal theory or sufficient facts to support a cognizable legal theory. See Balistreri v. Pacifica Police Dep't., 901 F.2d 696, 699 (9th Cir. 1990). Under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a)(2), the plaintiff is required only to set forth a "short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader [*11] is entitled to relief," and "give the defendant fair notice of what the . . . claim is and the grounds upon which it rests." Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007).

A complaint may survive a motion to dismiss only if, taking all well-pleaded factual allegations as true, it contains enough facts to "state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570). "A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Id. "Threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice." Id. "In sum, for a complaint to survive a motion to dismiss, the non-conclusory factual content, and reasonable inferences from that content, must be plausibly suggestive of a claim entitling the plaintiff to relief." Moss v. U.S. Secret Serv., 572 F.3d 962, 969 (9th Cir. 2009) (quotations omitted). In reviewing a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, the Court accepts as true all facts alleged in the complaint, and draws all reasonable inferences in favor of the plaintiff. al-Kidd v. Ashcroft, 580 F.3d 949, 956 (9th Cir. 2009).

Where a motion to dismiss is granted, "leave to amend should be granted 'unless the court determines that the allegation of other facts consistent with the challenged [*12] pleading could not possibly cure the deficiency.'" DeSoto v. Yellow Freight Sys., Inc., 957 F.2d 655, 658 (9th Cir. 1992) (quoting Schreiber Distrib. Co. v. Serv-Well Furniture Co., 806 F.2d 1393, 1401 (9th Cir. 1986)). In other words, where leave to amend would be futile, the Court may deny leave to amend. See DeSoto, 957 F.2d at 658; Schreiber, 806 F.2d at 1401.

B. Legal Standard as to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 9(b)

Where a plaintiff alleges fraud in the complaint, Rule 9(b) requires a plaintiff to "state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud or mistake. Malice, intent, knowledge, and other conditions of a person's mind may be alleged generally." Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b). Rule 9(b) requires that the circumstances constituting the alleged fraud "be specific enough to give defendants notice of the particular misconduct . . . so that they can defend against the charge and not just deny that they have done anything wrong.'" Kearns v. Ford Motor Co., 567 F.3d 1120, 1124 (9th Cir. 2009) (internal quotation omitted). A party must set forth "the time, place, and specific content of the false representations as well as the identities of the parties to the misrepresentation." Odom v. Microsoft Corp., 486 F.3d 541, 553 (9th Cir. 2007) (internal quotation marks omitted). As such "[a[verments of fraud must be accompanied by 'the who, what, when, where, and how' of the misconduct charged." Kearns, 567 F.3d at 1124 (citing Vess v. Ciba-Geigy Corp. U.S.A., 317 F.3d 1097, 1106 (9th Cir. 2003)). Thus, to satisfy the specificity requirement of Rule 9(b), a plaintiff is required "to plead evidentiary facts" and the court must "consider what inferences these facts will support—despite [*13] the pitfalls and inefficiencies of such an analysis at the pleading stage . . . ." Fecht v. Price Co., 70 F.3d 1078, 1082 (9th Cir. 1995) (emphasis added).

C. Tarsadia Defendants' Motion to Dismiss

1. Statute of Limitations

On a motion to dismiss based on the statute of limitations, the Court must assess whether "the running of the statute is apparent on the face of the complaint." Huynh v. Chase Manhattan Bank, 465 F.3d 992, 997 (9th Cir. 2006) (quoting Jablon v. Dean Witter & Co., 614 F.2d 677, 682 (9th Cir. 1980) ("When a motion to dismiss is based on the running of the statute of limitations, it can be granted only if the assertions of the complaint, read with the required liberality, would not permit the plaintiff to prove that the statute was tolled.")). Because the statute of limitations is an affirmative defense, the "defendant has the burden of proving the action is time-barred." Grisham v. Philip Morris, Inc., 670 F. Supp. 2d 1014, 1020 (C.D. Cal. 2009) (citation omitted).

Tarsadia Defendants argue that the ILSA and fraud claims are barred by the three-year statute of limitations from the date of the Purchase Contract, May 18, 2006, and therefore, these causes of actions expired on May 18, 2009. They also argue that the negligence claim is barred by the Court's prior ruling in the Beaver case. Further, they claim that the securities fraud is barred by either the two year or five year limitations period under California Corporations Code section 25506. Finally, they assert [*14] the UCL claims are barred by the four-year statute of limitations. In response, Plaintiff argues that he did not discover the alleged failure to disclose rescission rights under ILSA until June 2017 when he received the Beaver Class Notice. He also contends that several tolling theories apply to his case.

a. ILSA Anti-Fraud Statute of Limitations

Plaintiff alleges violations of the anti-fraud provisions of the ILSA, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1703(a)(2)(A), (B), (C).[3] The statute of limitations for these provision accrues from "three years after discovery of the violation or after discovery should have been made by the exercise of reasonable diligence." 15 U.S.C. § 1711(a)(2).

Under the discovery [*15] rule, incorporated into ILSA, "a cause of action accrues (1) when the plaintiff did in fact discover, or (2) when a reasonably diligent plaintiff would have discovered, 'the facts constituting the violation' -- whichever comes first." Merck & Co., Inc. v. Reynolds, 559 U.S. 633, 637, 130 S. Ct. 1784, 176 L. Ed. 2d 582 (2010). The Court in Merck held that the statute of limitations does not begin to run when the plaintiff discovers facts that put the plaintiff on "inquiry notice" when the facts "would have prompted a reasonably diligent plaintiff to begin investigating." Id. at 653. Instead, the claim accrues when the plaintiff discovers or a reasonably diligent plaintiff would have discovered "the facts constituting the violation . . . irrespective of whether the actual plaintiff undertook a reasonably diligent investigation." Id. "A fact is considered 'discovered' when 'a reasonably diligent plaintiff would have sufficient information about that fact to adequately plead it in a complaint . . . with sufficient detail and particularity to survive a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss.'" Rieckborn v. Jefferies LLC, 81 F. Supp. 3d 902, 915 (N.D. Cal. 2015) (quoting City of Pontiac Gen. Employees' Ret. Sys. v. MBIA, Inc., 637 F.3d 169, 175 (2d Cir. 2011)).

Tarsadia Defendants argue that the statute of limitations on the ILSA anti-fraud claims expired on May 18, 2009 which is three years from when Plaintiff signed the purchase contract on May 18, 2006. [*16] [4] They summarily contend that May 18, 2006 is when Plaintiff knew of or should have been able to discover by reasonable diligence all the facts that constituted the alleged ILSA violations. In response, Plaintiff argues that he did not discover the alleged violations until he received the Class Notice in June 2017. Because he was forced to quit-claim his deed to the Unit to his co-purchaser in January 2008, he did not receive any reports on the property. Moreover, he explains that the ILSA is complex that even if he compared the Purchase Contract and Public Report with ILSA's requirement he would not have known that Tarsadia Defendants violated any laws.

The FAC alleges that Plaintiff had no reason to suspect any of Defendants' representations in the Contract, Public Report, Closing Notice or FAQ concerning his rescission rights to be false or misleading. (Dkt. No. 24, FAC ¶ 52.) He claims that because of his incarceration and indigence, he could never have discovered his two-year rescission rights under ILSA. (Id. ¶ 110.) He also claims due to the complexity of the ILSA and securities laws, he was unable to discover his rescission rights. (Id. ¶ 111.) He only discovered the violations [*17] when he was provided with the Class Notice in June 2017. (Id. ¶ 110.) Pursuant to that Class Notice, he opted out. (Id. ¶ 112.) He asserts that any

[3] ILSA's anti-fraud provision provides:

(a) It shall be unlawful for any developer or agent, directly or indirectly, to make use of any means or instruments of transportation or communication in interstate commerce, or of the mails— . . .

(2) with respect to the sale or lease, or offer to sell or lease, any lot not exempt under section 1702(a) of this title--

> (A) to employ any device, scheme, or artifice to defraud;
> (B) to obtain money or property by means of any untrue statement of a material fact, or any omission to state a material fact necessary in order to make the statements made (in light of the circumstances in which they were made and within the context of the overall offer and sale or lease) not misleading, with respect to any information pertinent to the lot or subdivision;
> (C) to engage in any transaction, practice, or course of business which operates or would operate as a fraud or deceit upon a purchaser

15 U.S.C. § 1703(a)(2)(A)-(C).

[4] In his opposition, Plaintiff claims that he does not know the specific date when he signed the contract, either May 18, 2006 or December 12, 2006; therefore, his FAC cannot be dismissed as untimely, (Dkt. No. 31 at 10); however, the FAC alleges he signed the contract on May 18, 2006, (Dkt. No. 24, FAC ¶ 100), and incorporates by reference the Purchase Contract he signed which is dated May 18, 2006. (See Dkt. No. 17-3, Tarsadia Ds' RJN, Ex. A at 35-49.) Therefore, the Court concludes the Plaintiff has alleged he signed the Purchase Contract on May 18, 2006.

exercise of reasonable diligence would not have lead to the discovery of Plaintiff's rescission rights due to his incarceration and involuntary act of quit-claiming the deed to his co-purchaser. (Id. ¶ 113.)

Here, Plaintiff alleges that he did not discover the alleged violations until he received the Class Notice in June 2017 and reasons why discovery would not have been possible. Tarsadia Defendants merely assert that Plaintiff knew about or should have discovered by reasonable diligence all facts that constituted the alleged ILSA violations as of May 18, 2006 but do not provide any supporting facts to support their conclusion. First, Tarsadia Defendants have not carried their burden in demonstrating that Plaintiff discovered the facts or should have discovered with reasonable diligence facts to support a cause of action under ILSA on May 18, 2006. Second, the question of when Plaintiff was on notice about Tarsadia Defendants' alleged failure to disclose and intentionally concealing the buyers' two year right to rescind for purposes of [*18] applying the discovery rule is a question of fact not amenable on a motion to dismiss. See Kramas v. Security Gas & Oil Co., Inc., 672 F.2d 766, 770 (9th Cir. 1982) (fact questions are usually involved determining when a plaintiff discovered the violation); Toombs v. Leone, 777 F.2d 465, 468 n. 4 (9th Cir. 1985) (finding that unresolved fact questions precluded disposition of the section 12(2) claim on statute of limitations grounds); see also *Rafton v. Rydex Series Funds, No. 10cv1171-LHK, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 707, 2011 WL 31114, at 9 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 5, 2011) ("the determination of inquiry notice is 'fact intensive' and is usually not appropriate at the pleading stage"). Therefore, the Court concludes it is not apparent from the allegations in the FAC that the ILSA anti-fraud claims are time barred. Accordingly, at this early stage, the Court DENIES Tarsadia Defendants' motion to dismiss the anti-fraud provisions of ILSA based on the statute of limitations.

b. Fraud and California Securities Statute of Limitations

The FAC alleges claims of fraud and violations of California Corporations Code sections 25401, 25501, 25504.1.[5] (Dkt. No. 24 FAC ¶¶ 134-137.) In California, an action for fraud has a three-year statute of limitations and is "not deemed to have accrued until the discovery, by the aggrieved party, of the facts constituting the fraud or mistake." Cal. Civ. Proc. § 338(d). On the state securities claims, the statute of limitations expires "five years [*19] after the act or transaction constituting the violation or the expiration of two years after the discovery by the plaintiff of the facts constituting the violation, whichever shall first expire." Cal. Corp. Code § 25506. Section 25506's discovery refers to inquiry notice rather than actual notice. Deveny v. Entropin, Inc., 139 Cal. App. 4th 408, 422-23, 42 Cal. Rptr. 3d 807 (2006).

Tarsadia Defendants argue that the fraud cause of action is barred by the three year statute of limitations because Plaintiff knew or should have been able to discovery by reasonable diligence all the facts that constituted the ILSA violations on May 18, 2006 when he signed the Purchase Contract, and the securities fraud claims are barred by the two and five year statute of limitations because the limitations period began to run on May 18, 2006, and expired on May 18, 2009 or May 18, 2011. Because Plaintiff filed his complaint in 2018, his claims are not timely.

Contrary to the federal discovery rule, under the California discovery rule, as it relates to the fraud causes of action, the statute of limitations begins to run when a plaintiff "suspects or should suspect that her injury was caused by wrongdoing, that someone has done something wrong to her." Jolly v. Eli Lilly & Co., 44 Cal. 3d 1103, 1110, 245 Cal. Rptr. 658, 751 P.2d 923 (1988); Norgart v. The Upjohn Co., 21 Cal. 4th 383, 397, 87 Cal. Rptr. 2d 453, 981 P.2d 79 (1999) ("the plaintiff discovers the cause of action when he at least suspects [*20] a factual basis . . . for its elements"); see also O'Connor v. Boeing N. American, Inc., 311 F.3d 1139, 1148 (9th Cir. 2002) (noting difference between California and federal discovery rule and "reject[ing] an interpretation of the federal discovery rule that would commence limitations periods upon mere suspicion of the elements of a claim."). In California, the statute of limitations begins once "the plaintiff has notice or information of circumstances to put a reasonable person on inquiry . . . ." Jolly, 44 Cal. 3d at 1110-11 (internal citation and quotation marks omitted). Once on inquiry, the plaintiff has an obligation to discover facts and cannot sit on his rights but must go find them himself. Id. at 1111.

[5] The Court notes Tarsadia Defendants do not move to dismiss the federal securities claim based on statute of limitations.

In order for the discovery rule to delay the accrual of a cause of action, a complaint must plead facts to "show (1) the time and manner of discovery and (2) the inability to have made earlier discovery despite reasonable diligence." Fox v. Ethicon Endo-Surgery, Inc., 35 Cal. 4th 797, 808, 27 Cal. Rptr. 3d 661, 110 P.3d 914 (2005) (quoting McKelvey v. Boeing N. American, Inc., 74 Cal. App. 4th 151, 160, 86 Cal. Rptr. 2d 645 (1999)). The plaintiff "must conduct a reasonable investigation of all potential causes of that injury. If such an investigation would have disclosed a factual basis for a cause of action, the statute of limitations begins to run on that cause of action when the investigation would have brought such information to light." Id. at 808-09.

As to the first factor, the [*21] FAC alleges that Plaintiff discovered the alleged violations in June 2017 when he received the Class Notice but the FAC is devoid of any allegation that he conducted any investigation of potential causes of his injury prior to that time. He claims that his incarceration is an extraordinary circumstance[6] beyond his control but provides no caselaw in support. Despite his incarceration, he has not alleged he made any diligent efforts to investigate.[7] On this basis, the Court GRANTS Tarsadia Defendants' motion to dismiss for failing to allege that California's discovery rule applies to his state law causes of action for fraud and securities fraud.

As to the five-year statute of limitations under section 25506, Plaintiff relies on California Civil Procedure Code section 352.1 that the statute of limitations is tolled for up to two years during imprisonment, Cal. Civ. Proc. Code § 352.1(a) (If a person entitled to bring an action . . . at the time the cause of action accrued, imprisoned on a criminal charge, or in execution under the sentence of a criminal court for a term less than for life, the time of that disability is not a part of the time limited for the commencement of the action, not to exceed two years.") (emphasis added), but the tolling applies only when Plaintiff was [*22] in prison at the time the cause of action accrued. Here, Plaintiff was imprisoned on May 24, 2009. If the cause of action accrued either on May 18, 2006, when the Purchase Contract was signed, as Tarsadia Defendants assert, or August 2007, when the closing documents were completed, which Plaintiff appears to assert may be the accrual date for some of his causes of action, Plaintiff was not yet incarcerated. Therefore, section 352.1 does not support Plaintiff's argument that the fraud causes of action are timely.

Furthermore, if "five years after the act or transaction constituting the violation" occurred on May 18, 2006, as Tarsadia Defendants assert, or August 2007, as Plaintiff claims, his state securities claims are barred because the five year period is a strict limit that may not be tolled. In re Verisign, Inc. v. Derivative Litig., 531 F. Supp. 2d 1173, 1221 (N.D. Cal. 2007) (citing SEC v. Seaboard Corp., 677 F.2d 1301, 1308 (9th Cir. 1982)); *KKMB, LLC v. Khader, Case No. CV 18-5170-GW(JPRx), 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 197114, 2018 WL 6012225, at 6 (C.D. Cal. Oct. 4, 2018) (referencing section 25506(b) as an absolute limitation period). Because section 25506 applies to whichever date expires first, based on Plaintiff's argument that he did not discover the cause of action until June 2017[8], the earliest expiration date for the statute of limitations would have been the five year absolute statute of limitations accruing in August 2007 and expiring in August [*23] 2012.

American Pipe would not save the state securities claims. In American Pipe, the United States Supreme Court held that commencement of a purported class action "tolls the running of the statute for all purported members of the class who make timely motions to intervene after the court has found the suit inappropriate for class action status."

[6] Extraordinary circumstance is used to demonstrate the application of equitable tolling. For equitable tolling to apply, Plaintiff must demonstrate "some extraordinary circumstance stood in his way" and prevented timely filing. Holland v. Florida, 560 U.S. 631, 130 S. Ct. 2549, 177 L. Ed. 2d 130 (2010). In the habeas context, ignorance of the law or limited legal knowledge do not constitute extraordinary circumstances. Rasberry v. Garcia, 448 F.3d 1150, 1154 (9th Cir. 2006) (an inmates "ignorance of the law" and "lack of legal sophistication" is not an extraordinary circumstance warranting equitable tolling). However, here, the Court is considering application of the discovery rule under California law, not equitable tolling.

[7] The Court notes that the FAC alleges that "Plaintiff reluctantly closed escrow in the late summer or fall of 2007." (Dkt. No. 24, FAC ¶ 27.) It is not clear why Plaintiff was reluctant to close escrow and whether his reluctance constitutes suspicion of some wrongdoing.

[8] The Court questions Plaintiff's claim that he did not discover the securities claims until June 2017 when he received Class Notice of the Beaver action. The Beaver action did not involve securities fraud claims.

414 U.S. 538, 553, 94 S. Ct. 756, 38 L. Ed. 2d 713 (1974) (class action on federal statutes of Sherman Act, Clayton Act and False Claims Act). This rule was extended in Crown, Cork to allow tolling where plaintiffs sought to file an entirely new action and the statute of limitations is tolled for all members of the class "until class certification is denied." Crown, Cork & Seal Co. v. Parker, 462 U.S. 345, 354, 103 S. Ct. 2392, 76 L. Ed. 2d 628 (1983). Similarly, when certification has been granted, the statute begins running anew from the date when the class member exercises the right to opt out because before this time, the class member is deemed to be actively prosecuting her rights. See Appleton Electric Co. v. Graves Truck Line, Inc., 635 F.2d 603, 608-10 (7th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 451 U.S. 976, 101 S. Ct. 2058, 68 L. Ed. 2d 357 (1981); Wood v. Combustion Engineering, Inc., 643 F.2d 339 (5th Cir. 1981). However, American Pipe does not apply to toll the securities causes of action when the Beaver action was filed on May 18, 2011, as these securities claims were not causes of action in that case. See Johnson v. Railway Express Agency, Inc., 421 U.S. 454, 467, 95 S. Ct. 1716, 44 L. Ed. 2d 295 (1975) (tolling in American Pipe "depended heavily on the fact that (the prior) [*24] filings involved exactly the same cause of action subsequently asserted.").

Accordingly, based on the allegations in the FAC, the Court GRANTS Tarsadia Defendants' motion to dismiss the fraud with leave to amend and GRANTS Tarsadia Defendants' motion to dismiss the state securities causes of action as time barred.

c. Negligence

The FAC alleges a negligence per se claim based on violations of the disclosure provision of ILSA and arises from § 1703(d)(2) and § 1703(a)(1)(C). (Dkt. No. 24, FAC ¶¶ 46, 48, 56 69, 72, 73, 74, 147-153). Violations of the disclosure provisions must be brought "within three years after the signing of the contract. . . ." 15 U.S.C. § 1711(a)(1) & (b).

The elements of a negligence cause of action are: (a) a legal duty to use due care; (b) a breach of such legal duty; and (c) the breach as the proximate or legal cause of the resulting injury. Ladd v. County of San Mateo, 12 Cal. 4th 913, 917, 50 Cal. Rptr. 2d 309, 911 P.2d 496 (1996). Because the negligence cause of action is based on a violation of a federal statute, the statute or regulation may be adopted as a standard of care in a negligence action. Di Rosa v. Showa Denko K.K., 44 Cal. App. 4th 799, 808, 52 Cal. Rptr. 2d 128 (1996). In this case, Plaintiffs have asserted a per se negligence theory based on Tarsadia Defendants' violation of ILSA. Plaintiffs identify three duties that were violated: (1) a duty to disclose Plaintiffs' [*25] two-year right to rescind in the Public Report; (2) a duty to replace the language in the Contract concerning the three-day right to rescind with language disclosing this two-year right, and (3) a duty to otherwise disclose to Plaintiffs their two-year right to rescind. (Dkt. No. 24, FAC ¶ 148.)

In the Court's prior order in Beaver, based on the exact same negligence allegation, it determined that the negligence per se theory of liability was dependent on an underlying statutory violation, (11cv1842, Dkt. No. 153 at 35 (the "presumption arising from the doctrine of negligence per se is dependent and requires an analysis of the underlying causes of action pursuant to 15 U.S.C. § 1703(a)(1)(C) and 15 U.S.C. § 1703(d)(2).").) Because the plaintiffs, in the Beaver action conceded that the causes of action under §§ 1703(a)(1)(C) and (d)(2) were time barred, the negligence per se cause of action necessarily failed. (See Case No. 11cv1842, Dkt. No. 20 at 5.)

In opposition, Plaintiff does not dispute Tarsadia Defendants' argument and it is not clear whether Plaintiff acknowledges that the claims under §§ 1703(a)(1)(C) and (d)(2) are time barred. In any event, to the extent Plaintiff did not oppose the argument that the negligence cause of action is time barred, the Court GRANTS Tarsadia [*26] Defendants' motion to dismiss.

d. UCL Statute of Limitations

In this case, the UCL "unlawful prong" claim is based on violations of ILSA, the state securities laws and Rule 10b of the 1934 Securities Exchange Act. (Dkt. No. 24, FAC ¶ 156.) The FAC also alleges claims under the "unfair" and "fraudulent" prongs of the UCL. (Id. ¶¶ 155, 158.)

The Tarsadia Defendants argue that claims under the "unlawful" prong of the UCL for violations of ILSA, and federal and state securities laws by failing to provide the disclosures or registering the agreements as securities are barred by the four-year statute of limitations. In Beaver, the Ninth Circuit held that the UCL cause of action has a four-year statute of limitations and is governed by common law accrual rules looking at when the harm was completed. The plaintiffs in Beaver claimed the harm was completed in the fall of 2007 when they were required to close escrow and when they suffered cognizable financial harm. Beaver, 816 F.3d at 1178.

The UCL statute of limitations provides, "[a]ny action to enforce any cause of action pursuant to this chapter shall be commenced within four years after the cause of action accrued. No cause of action barred under existing law on the effective [*27] date of this section shall be revived by its enactment." Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17208. The discovery rule applies to the UCL. See Aryeh v. Canon Bus. Solutions, Inc., 55 Cal. 4th 1185, 1198, 151 Cal. Rptr. 3d 827, 292 P.3d 871 (2013) ("the UCL is governed by common law accrual rules to the same extent as any other statute."); *Cover v. Windsor Surry Co., No. 14-cv-5262-WHO, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 94173, 2015 WL 4396215, at 3 (N.D. Cal. July 17, 2015) ("Accordingly, I am bound by Aryeh . . . and I conclude that the discovery rule is available to toll the statute of limitations on [Plaintiff's] UCL claim."); *Plumlee v. Pfizer, Inc., Case No. 13cv414 LHK, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 23172, 2014 WL 695024, at 8 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 21, 2014) ("delayed discovery rule is available to toll the statute of limitations under the . . . UCL.").

As discussed above, to allege the application of the California discovery rule, Plaintiff must allege "(1) the time and manner of discovery and (2) the inability to have made earlier discovery despite reasonable diligence." Fox, 35 Cal. 4th at 808. Because the Court concluded Plaintiff did not allege the second factor, that he made a reasonably diligent effort to investigate yet was unable to make a discovery, on this basis, the Court GRANTS Tarsadia Defendants' motion to dismiss the UCL claim.

2. Tolling Arguments

Alternatively, Plaintiff submits several tolling theories but does not differentiate which tolling argument applies to which cause of action as some tolling theories [*28] only apply to federal claims and others apply only to state law claims. Plaintiff alleges the following theories: 1) Rule 15 relation back doctrine such that his FAC relates back to the original complaint in the Beaver case on May 18, 2011; 2) imprisonment tolling under California Civil Procedure Code section 352.1; 3) the class action tolling rule under American Pipe and Crown, Cork & Seal and during the time he attempted to file the same suit against Defendants in Colorado district court; 4) the continuous violation doctrine; 5) equitable tolling; and 6) equitable estoppel.

First, the Court concludes that the relation back rule under Rule 15 does not apply in this case. Rule 15(c)(1) provides that "an amendment to a pleading relates back to the date of the original pleading" when certain conditions are met. Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(c)(1). The rule allows a party to relate an amended pleading to an original pleading in the same action. Here, Plaintiff seeks relation-back of his FAC to a complaint in a different case. The Colorado District Court that considered Plaintiff's complaint held that Rule 15 does not apply to a separately filed claim. See Brooks v. Tarsadia Hotels, District of Colorado, Case No. 17cv3172-PAB, KMT, Dkt. No. 68 at p. 9-10, Mar. 11, 2019) (citing Benge v. United States, 17 F.3d 1286, 1288 (10th Cir. 1994) (stating that a "separately [*29] filed claim, as opposed to an amendment or supplementary pleading, does not relate back to a previously filed claim")). Plaintiff does not provide any authority to the contrary.

Second, the imprisonment tolling provision under California Civil Procedure Code section 352.1 also does not appear to apply because Plaintiff must allege that he was imprisoned at the time his state law causes of action accrued. Section 352.1 allows a plaintiff to file an action if "at the time the cause of action accrued" is "imprisoned on a criminal charge, or in execution under the sentence of a criminal court for a term less than for life, the time of that disability is not a part of the time limited for the commencement of the action, not to exceed two years." Cal. Civ. Proc. Code § 352.1. Thus, Plaintiff must be incarcerated when his claims accrued. See Groce v. Claudat, 603 F. App'x 581, 582 (9th Cir. 2015) ("The district court correctly determined that all of [the plaintiff's] claims . . . were time-barred because [the plaintiff] was not incarcerated when his claims accrued."). To the extent Plaintiff's claims that the discovery rule tolls the statute of limitations until June 2017, section 352.1 is not applicable as his state law claims would be timely. To the extent the state law causes of action accrued prior to his imprisonment on May 24, 2009, section 352.1 [*30] is also not applicable. It appears that the relevant accrual dates would be either May 18, 2006, the date the Purchase Contract was signed, or August 2007, when Plaintiff closed escrow on the Unit. Based on these potential accrual dates, section 352.1 would be inapplicable.

The Court declines to dismiss based on equitable tolling and equitable estoppel as these theories often depend on matters outside the pleadings and they "[are] not generally amenable to resolution on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion." Cervantes v. City of San Diego, 5 F.3d 1273, 1276 (9th Cir. 1993); see Shropshire v. Fred Rappoport Co., 294 F. Supp. 2d 1085, 1097-98 (N.D. Cal. 2003) ("Because all of these [equitable estoppel] factors turn on disputed facts, it is improper for the Court, on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion—the purpose of which is test the sufficiency of the pleadings—to resolve this issue.").

As to the remaining tolling issues under American Pipe/Crown Cork & Seal, and the continuous violation doctrine, the Court declines to address them as not fully briefed. The Court notes that Tarsadia Defendants do not address the continuous violation doctrine in their reply. If the Court determines that the last act constituting the violation occurred in August 2007, then with the application of American Pipe/Crown Cork & Seal tolling, Plaintiff's UCL claims may be timely. Tarsadia Defendants summarily argue [*31] that American Pipe tolling does not apply to the state law causes of action; however, California court have applied American Pipe to state law causes of action under certain circumstances. See Falk v. Children's Hospital Los Angeles, 237 Cal. App. 4th 1454, 188 Cal. Rptr. 3d 686 (2015) (applying American Pipe tolling to some cause of actions and not others). Because these complex and fact specific tolling issues were not fully briefed, the Court declines to consider them at this time.

Because it is not clear that Plaintiff's allegations could not be amended to show that he is entitled to certain theories of tolling, a statute of limitations dismissal would be improper. In sum, the Court GRANTS in part and DENIES in part Tarsadia Defendants' motion to dismiss based on the statute of limitations with leave to amend.

3. Rule 12(b)(6) - ILSA and Fraud Claims

Tarsadia Defendants contend that the ILSA and fraud claims should be dismissed based on the Court's prior decision in Beaver v. Tarsadia Hotels, 978 F. Supp. 2d 1124 (S.D. Cal. 2013) where the Court determined, on summary judgment, that the evidence did not demonstrate that Tarsadia Defendants knew the representations or affirmative representations were false when made or that Tarsadia Defendants had an intent to deceive Plaintiffs. However, the Court's ruling was on summary judgment after discovery had [*32] been completed and based on the facts alleged in the TAC of Case No. 11cv1842.

Here, on a motion to dismiss on a similar but not identical complaint, the Court looks to the allegations in the FAC to determine if Plaintiff has alleged the Tarsadia Defendants knew the representations were false when they were made or had an intent to deceive Plaintiff. Tarsadia Defendants reliance on the Court's prior summary judgment ruling in another case with different named plaintiffs is without merit and cannot be the basis for dismissal of the FAC in this case. Because Tarsadia Defendants have failed to demonstrate that the allegations in the FAC are deficiently pled, the Court DENIES Tarsadia Defendants' motion to dismiss on the ILSA and fraud causes of action. While Plaintiff, with discovery, may not ultimately be able to demonstrate an issue of fact whether Tarsadia Defendants knew the representations were false at the time they were made, at this early stage of the proceeding, the Court cannot dismiss the FAC based on a summary judgment ruling in the Beaver case.

4. Rule 9(b) — Fraud, Negligence, ILSA and Securities Fraud Claims

Finally, Tarsadia Defendants argue that the claims under ILSA, securities [*33] fraud, fraud and negligence must be dismissed for failure to comply with Rule 9(b) because Plaintiff has not sufficiently pled causation, which is a necessary element of all his claims, and also justifiable reliance. Plaintiff does not address these arguments in his opposition.

Under California law, the elements of common law fraud are "misrepresentation, knowledge of its falsity, intent to defraud, justifiable reliance and resulting damage." Gil v. Bank of Am., N.A., 138 Cal. App. 4th 1371, 1381, 42 Cal. Rptr. 3d 310 (2006). For an ILSA fraud claim, courts apply California's fraud standard. *Irving v. Lennar Corp., No. Civ. S-12-290 KJM EFB, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47206, 2013 WL 1308712, at 10 (E.D. Cal. Apr. 1, 2013) (applying California fraud standard on ILSA anti-fraud claim) (citing Lazar v. Superior Ct., 12 Cal. 4th 631, 638, 49 Cal. Rptr. 2d 377, 909 P.2d 981 (1996)); *Dexter v. Lake Creek Corp., No. 7:10-cv-226-D, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 64703, 2013 WL 1898381, at 6 (May 7, 2013) (elements of state fraud cause of action applicable to ILSA's anti-fraud provision). But under ILSA, a plaintiff need not demonstrate a showing of reliance. Keanneally v. Bank of Nova Scotia, 711 F. Supp. 2d 1174, 1186 (S.D. Cal. 2010); see also *Irving, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47206, 2013 WL 1308712, at 11. Under § 10(b)[9] a plaintiff must allege "(1) a material misrepresentation or omission by the defendant; (2) scienter; (3) a connection between the misrepresentation or omission and the purchase or sale of a security; (4) reliance upon the misrepresentation or omission; (5) economic loss; and (6) loss causation." Matrixx Initiatives, Inc. v. Siracusano, 563 U.S. 27, 37-38, 131 S. Ct. 1309, 179 L. Ed. 2d 398 (2011) (internal [*34] quotation omitted). The elements of a negligence cause of action are: (a) a legal duty to use due care; (b) a breach of such legal duty; and (c) the breach as the proximate or legal cause of the resulting injury. Ladd v. County of San Mateo, 12 Cal. 4th 913, 917, 50 Cal. Rptr. 2d 309, 911 P.2d 496 (1996).

The FAC alleges that Defendant's fraudulent concealment prevented him from timely exercising rescission rights and seeking other legal options. (Dkt. No. 24, FAC ¶ 114.) He claims that if he had been allowed to rescind, he would not have closed on the property and would not have incurred damages of his loss of $50,000 which he could have used to hire an attorney to uncover Defendants' wrongful conduct or would have been able to pay his attorney to prevent a default judgment of $18 million entered against him in June 2008, would not have been sent to prison and not be currently paying $40,800 monthly interest penalty on an illegally induced plead. (Id. ¶¶ 114-116.) The Court concludes these are not conclusory allegations of causation and satisfy the particularity requirement of Rule 9(b).

As for justifiable reliance, in Beaver, the Court held that the plaintiffs sufficiently alleged reliance by claiming "they relied on Defendants' misleading representations regarding their right to [*35] rescind, which caused them to miss the opportunity to timely exercise their right to rescind under the ILSA." (Case No. 11cv 1842, Dkt. No. 34 at 7.) Here, similarly, the FAC alleges that he relied on the material misstatements or wrongful omissions and had Plaintiff been informed of his two-year rescission rights, he would not closed on the Unit or would not have quit claimed his deed to his co-purchaser in early 2008 and would have rescinded his Contracts and recovered his purchase money. (Dkt. No. 24, FAC ¶¶ 109, 115, 144.) Plaintiff sufficiently alleges justifiable reliance. The Court DENIES Defendants' motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 9(b).

In sum, the Court GRANTS in part and DENIES in part Tarsadia Defendants' motion to dismiss on the statute of limitations grounds and DENIES Tarsadia Defendants' motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) and Rule 9.[10]

D. Playground Destination's Motion to Dismiss

1. ILSA and Fraud

[9] Tarsadia Defendants do not argue that the state securities fraud claim should be dismissed under Rule 9(b). (Dkt. No. 27-1 at 22-23.)

[10] Additionally, Tarsadia Defendants argue that the federal and state securities claims are barred by the Ninth Circuit ruling in Salameh that the transactions at issue did not constitute a "security." 726 F.3d at 1132. While Tarsadia Defendants claim that the securities law claims in the Salameh and Brooks case are "identical" they have not claimed or demonstrated that the factual assertions to support the claims are identical. Accordingly, the Court declines to rely on the Salameh ruling on Tarsadia Defendants' motion to dismiss.

Playground argues that the first cause of action for ILSA fraud violations and third cause of action for fraud fail because the FAC does not sufficiently plead Playground's knowledge of the non-disclosure of the two-year rescission right relying on the Court's ruling [*36] in the Beaver case filed on May 12, 2012. (Case No. 11cv1842, Dkt. No. 34.) Plaintiff argues that the facts supporting his claims differ from those in the Beaver case.

Plaintiff alleges violations of the anti-fraud provisions of ILSA, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1703(a)(2)(A), (B), and (C). In California, a plaintiff alleging fraud must show "(1) misrepresentation (false representation, concealment, or nondisclosure); (2) knowledge of falsity (scienter); (3) intent to defraud (i.e., to induce reliance); (4) justifiable reliance; and (5) resulting damage." Ryder v. Lightstorm Entm't, Inc., 246 Cal. App. 4th 1064, 1079, 201 Cal. Rptr. 3d 110 (2016) (internal quotations omitted). California's fraud standard applies to ILSA's anti-fraud statute except there is no need to demonstrate reliance for violations of the anti-fraud provisions of the ILSA. See *Irving, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47206, 2013 WL 1308712, at 10, 11 (applying California fraud standard on ILSA anti-fraud claim); Keanneally, 711 F. Supp. 2d at 1186.

The FAC alleges that Playground failed to disclose the rescission provisions in the sales documents and misled Plaintiff about his rescission rights. Playground was the real estate broker for Hard Rock acting as an agent for the Defendants. (Dkt. No. 24, FAC ¶ 20.) Playground developed marketing materials that threatened to take Plaintiff's $50,000 deposit if he did not close on his unit to further develop Tarsadia [*37] Defendants' scheme. (Id. ¶ 43.) Playground, as a real estate broker, is well versed in ILSA's disclosure obligations and the anti-fraud provisions of state and federal laws. (Id. ¶ 68.) Tarsadia Defendants provided the standardized contract and the Public Report from the DRE to Playground, their real estate broker. (Id. ¶ 94.) Around May 5, 2006, Playground distributed to prospective buyers a "Perspectives and Prices" publication which provided drawings of the Units and the prices. (Id. ¶ 95.) Playground, in its capacity as real estate broker, had a statutory duty to disclose all facts known to it that materially affects "the value or desirability of the property that are not known to, or within the diligent attention and observation of, the parties" as provided in California Civil Code section 2079.16. (Id. ¶ 96.) A seller has a duty to disclose to buyers any material facts affecting the value or desirability of the property. (Id. ¶ 97.) According to Plaintiff, Playground has to have known of this right as well, yet failed to disclose it to Plaintiff, or "consciously chose to ignore the fact that Developer Defendants were engaged in a scheme to ensure sales of the condos at the Hard Rock could not be rescinded." (Id. [*38] ¶ 98.) Around August 2007, Playground distributed the Closing Notices that informed the purchasers that they would lose their deposits if they did not close by the end of August. (Id. ¶ 101.) Playground wrongfully mislead buyers to believe they would lose their deposits if they did not close. (Id. ¶ 108.) Playground distributed the Closing Notice with the full knowledge and consent of Tarsadia Defendants. (Id. ¶ 102.) By distributing the Closing Notice, Playground perpetuated Tarsadia Defendants' scheme and their own interest. (Id. ¶ 102.) The FAC then summarily alleges that "Defendants knowingly and willingly devised and carried out a common plan, scheme or artifice to defraud Plaintiff by purposefully omitting the two year right of rescission from the Contract and the Public Report and instead intentionally misrepresenting in the Contract that only a three-day right of rescission existed." (Id. ¶ 107.)

In its prior order in Beaver, based on almost identical allegations concerning knowledge, (Compare 11cv1842, Dkt. No. 21, SAC ¶¶ 63-65, 67-71, 73-74 with Dkt. No. 24, FAC ¶¶ 93-95; 100-105, 107-109), the Court concluded that the plaintiffs' theory of knowledge as to Playground was imputing [*39] Tarsadia Defendants' knowledge and concealment of the buyers' right to rescind onto Playground based on California Civil Code section 2332.[11] (Case No. 11cv1842, Dkt. No. 34 at 6.) However, the Court concluded that section 2332 only imputes the agent's knowledge to the principal and not the reverse. (Id.) Similarly, in this case, to the extent Plaintiff alleges Playground's knowledge is based on Tarsadia Defendants' knowledge, the Court concludes that Plaintiff has not sufficiently alleged Playground's knowledge as to his rescission rights.

In opposition, Plaintiff contends that he has asserted additional misrepresentations made by Playground that were not alleged in the Beaver case and have nothing to do with rescission rights. He alleges that Defendants had [11] "As against a principal, both principal and agent are deemed to have notice of whatever either has notice of, and ought, in good faith and the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, to communicate to the other." Cal. Civ. Code § 2332.

Plaintiff prepare a "Tarsadia's Optional Rental Management Program FAQ" where they knowingly and materially assisted each other in representing that investors were not required to participate in the RMA and that the decision was voluntary but in fact that representation was false as investors were mandated to participate in the RMA. (Dkt. No. 24, FAC ¶¶ 24, 142.) They also knowingly and materially assisted each other in misrepresenting that the Hard Rock guests would be placed [*40] in a consistent rotational system that would "rent all suites equitably" but there was no way to live up to this representation, and this representation induced Plaintiff to buy the condominium. (Id. ¶¶ 34-35, 143.) Instead, Defendants rented the rooms that generated the most income and they had no system to ensure all units would be rented equitably. (Id.) He also argues that Defendants knew that the liquidated damages provision, which allowed them to retain the $50,000 deposit, was unreasonable but they still threatened purchasers with the loss of their deposit if they did not close. (Id. ¶¶ 74, 75 101.)

First, these additional facts do not appear to be the bases of his claims under the fraud or ILSA causes of action. Therefore, Plaintiff's arguments in opposition do not bar dismissal of the FAC for the fraud causes of action for lack of knowledge. To the extent Plaintiff seeks to add additional allegations, he may do so in a Second Amended Complaint ("SAC"). Moreover, as noted by Playground, many of these additional allegations refer to "Defendants" generally without indicating which Defendant was involved in which misrepresentation. If Plaintiff files a SAC, he shall indicate which [*41] Defendant made each of the alleged misrepresentations and provide sufficient facts to support a reasonable inference that Playground had knowledge about these misrepresentations.

As currently plead, the FAC fails to allege facts to permit a reasonable inference that Playground knew of the disclosure requirements of ILSA. See Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678. Accordingly, the Court GRANTS Playground's motion to dismiss the first and third cause of action.

2. Federal and State Securities

Playground argues that because Plaintiff failed to plead knowledge of the alleged misrepresentations or omissions, he cannot state a claim under Section 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act and under California Corporations Code sections 25401, 25501, 25504.1 as these provisions require scienter as an element. Plaintiff argues that scienter is not required to plead a violation of sections 25401 and 25501.

As stated above, under § 10(b), a plaintiff must allege "(1) a material misrepresentation or omission by the defendant; (2) scienter; (3) a connection between the misrepresentation or omission and the purchase or sale of a security; (4) reliance upon the misrepresentation or omission; (5) economic loss; and (6) loss causation." Matrixx Initiatives, Inc., 563 U.S. at 37-38 (internal quotation omitted). Scienter is "the defendant's intention 'to deceive, manipulate, or defraud.'" [*42] Tellabs, Inc. v. Makor Issues & Rights, Ltd., 551 U.S. 308, 313, 127 S. Ct. 2499, 168 L. Ed. 2d 179 (2007). Corporations Code section 25504.1 also provides "any person who materially assists in any violation of Section . . . 25401, . . . with intent to deceive or defraud, is jointly and severally liable with any other person liable under this chapter for such violation." Cal. Corp. Code § 25504.1. Section 25504.1 requires a showing that the defendant had an "intent to deceive or defraud." Orloff v. Allman, 819 F.2d 904, 907 (9th Cir. 1987) overruled on other grounds by Hollinger v. Titan Capital Corp., 914 F.2d 1564, 1575 (9th Cir. 1990).

Plaintiff does not dispute that scienter must be alleged for a violation of § 10(b) and section 25504.1. Therefore, the Court GRANTS Playground's motion to dismiss for failing to sufficiently allege scienter on these claims.

Corporations Code section 25401 prohibits the sale of securities "by means of any written or oral communication which includes an untrue statement of a material fact or omits to state a material fact necessary to make the statements made, in the light of the circumstances under which the statements were made, not misleading." Cal. Corp. Code § 25401. Corporations Code section 25501 creates a private cause of action for violation of section 25401, with exceptions for instances where the plaintiff knew about the facts of the untruth or the defendant exercised reasonable care and did not know of the untruth or omission. Cal. Corp. Code § 25501.

In opposition, Plaintiff argues that scienter is not required to assert a violation of California [*43] securities law under sections 25401 and 25501. Playground does not address this argument in its reply. The Court agrees with Plaintiff that scienter is not an element of sections 25401 and 25501. See *I-Enterprise Co. LLC v. Draper Fisher Jurvetson Mgmt. Co. V, LLC, No. C-03-1561-MMC, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 39481, 2005 WL 3590984, at 27 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 30, 2005) (violations of sections 25401 and 25501 does not require proof of intent); *BayStar Capital Mgmt. LLC v. Core Pacific Yamaichi Int'l (H.K.) Ltd., CV 05-1091 ABC (CWx), 2007 WL 9711373, at 4 (C.D. Cal. Apr. 16, 2007) (reliance and scienter need not be shown for section 25501). Thus, the Court DENIES Playground's motion to dismiss the state securities claims under sections 25401 and 25501 for failing to allege scienter.

Next, Playground contends that the federal and state securities law claims also fail because the transactions do not constitute a security as the Ninth Circuit held in Salameh v. Tarsadia Hotel, 726 F.3d 1124, 1132 (9th Cir. 2013) and any claims would be barred by the relevant statutes of repose as the Court held in its order granting the defendants' motion to dismiss the state and federal securities claims filed on March 22, 2011. (Case No. 09cv2739, Dkt. No. 158 at 13-15.) However, while the SAC in Salameh may be similar to the FAC in this case, they are not identical and Playground fails to point to the deficiencies in the FAC as required on a motion to dismiss.

Section 3(a)(10) of the Securities Exchange Act defines "security" [*44] as inter alia, a "note, stock, treasury stock, bond, [or] investment contract." 15 U.S.C. § 78c(a)(10). Congress defined "security" to be "sufficiently broad to encompass virtually any instrument that might be sold as an investment" but did not "intend to provide a broad federal remedy for all fraud." Reves v. Ernst & Young, 494 U.S. 56, 61, 110 S. Ct. 945, 108 L. Ed. 2d 47 (1990) (internal quotations omitted). Courts should look not to the form but to the "economic realities of the transaction." United Hous. Fdn. v. Forman, 421 U.S. 837, 838, 95 S. Ct. 2051, 44 L. Ed. 2d 621 (1975).

In Howey, the Court defined whether an investment contract is a security under the Securities Act and held that an investment contract is "a contract, transaction or scheme whereby a person invests his money in a common enterprise and is led to expect profits solely from the efforts of the promoter or a third party." SEC v. W.J. Howey Co., 328 U.S. 293, 298-99, 66 S. Ct. 1100, 90 L. Ed. 1244 (1946). Howey's three-part test requires "(1) an investment of money (2) in a common enterprise (3) with an expectation of profits produced by the efforts of others." SEC v. Rubera, 350 F.3d 1084, 1090 (9th Cir. 2003) (internal quotation marks omitted).

In Salameh, the Ninth Circuit, relying on its en banc ruling in Hocking v. Dubois, 885 F.2d 1449 (9th Cir. 1989), held that the sale of the condos at the Hard Rock and the later RMA together did not constitute the sale of a security because the plaintiffs had not alleged that the Purchase Contracts and [*45] the RMAs were offered as a package. Id. at 1131. The Ninth Circuit noted that "Plaintiffs allege no facts showing that the Purchase Contracts and the Rental Management Agreements were offered as a package. They do not allege that the Rental Management Agreement was promoted at the time of the sale. They do not allege that Defendants told them that the Rental Management Agreement would be forthcoming. They do not allege that they were told that the Rental Management Agreement would result in investment-like profits." Id. They also did not allege when the respective agreements were signed. Id. Instead, the defendants informed the court that the RMAs were executed 8-15 months after the Purchase Contract. Id.

Taking the Ninth Circuit ruling into consideration and attempting to cure the deficiencies noted in the opinion, Plaintiff summarily alleges that the Purchase Contract, OA[12] and RMA were offered as a single package even though they were offered as independent documents. (Dkt. No. 24, FAC ¶ 25.) He claims that Defendants intentionally separated the OA and the RMA from the Purchase Contract in order to avoid the securities laws. (Id.) All three documents induced Plaintiff into buying the condominium. [*46] (Id.) Even though he read the disclaimer that the purchase of the Unit was not an investment, the economic and practical realities established the transaction was an investment and constituted a sale of a security. (Id. ¶ 22.) The FAC also asserts that whether the investors made money depended on the managerial efforts of Defendants. (Id. ¶ 32.) Despite Plaintiff's attempt to cure the deficiencies noted by the Ninth Circuit, the alleged facts are mere "threadbare recitals" of the elements of a "security" under Howey and Hocking, but no additional facts are presented to create a reasonable inference that the [12] The Ninth Circuit opinion did not address the OA as part of its ruling.

Purchase Contract, the OA, and the RMA were securities. (See Dkt. No. 24, FAC ¶¶ 21-25.) In addition, Plaintiff does not allege when he signed the RMA or OA. Plaintiff's facts are insufficient to allege a security. Accordingly, the Court GRANTS Playground's motion to dismiss the federal and state securities claims.

3. Negligence

The FAC alleges a negligence per se claim based on violations of the ILSA disclosure provisions pursuant to § 1703(d)(2) and § 1703(a)(1)(C). (Dkt. No. 24, FAC ¶¶ 46, 48, 56 69, 72, 73, 74, 147-153). These violations must be brought "within three years after the signing of the contract. [*47] . . ." 15 U.S.C. §§ 1711(a)(1) & (b).

Playground argues that because the negligence per se claim arises from the disclosure provisions of ILSA, they are time barred as the statute of limitations began to run on May 18, 2006 and expired on May 18, 2009. In response, Plaintiff does not appear to dispute Playground's argument but instead contends that his negligence per se claims are not only based on ILSA's disclosure provisions but also Defendants' negligent misrepresentation that the RMA was not a mandatory condition of ownership, knowledge that rooms would not be placed into an equitable rotational system, and understanding that the liquidated damages provision was unreasonable. However, because Plaintiff does not dispute Playground's argument and the additional allegations he claims to support his negligence cause of action are not specifically asserted in the FAC on the negligence cause of action, the Court GRANTS Playground's motion to dismiss with leave to amend.

The UCL "unlawful prong" claim is based on violations of ILSA, the state securities laws, and Rule 10b of the 1934 Securities Exchange Act. (Dkt. No. 24, FAC ¶ 156.) The FAC also alleges claims under the "unfair" and "fraudulent" prongs of the UCL. [*48] (Id. ¶¶ 155, 158-59.)

The unlawful prong of the UCL incorporates "violations of other laws and treats them as unlawful practices." Cel-Tech Comms., Inc. v. Los Angeles Cellular Tel. Co., 20 Cal. 4th 163, 180, 83 Cal. Rptr. 2d 548, 973 P.2d 527 (1999). This prong creates an "independent action when a business practice violates some other law." Walker v. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc., 98 Cal. App. 4th 1158, 1169, 121 Cal. Rptr. 2d 79 (2002). A UCL claim "stands or falls depending on the fate of antecedent substantive causes of action." Krantz v. BT Visual Images, 89 Cal. App. 4th 164, 178, 107 Cal. Rptr. 2d 209 (2001).

Playground argues that the unlawful prong based on violations of ILSA and federal and state securities laws fail to sufficiently allege its knowledge of the alleged omission in the Purchase Contract. Because the Court dismissed the ILSA and securities claims, the UCL cause of action based on these allegations necessarily fails, and the Court GRANTS Playground's motion to dismiss. See id.

Playground also argues that the unfair prong should also be dismissed because Plaintiff fails to allege facts to support "unfair" conduct. Plaintiff opposes.

A business act or practice is "unfair" when the conduct "threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition." Cel-Tech Comms., Inc. v. Los Angeles Cellular Tel. Co., 20 Cal. 4th 163, 187, 83 Cal. Rptr. 2d 548, 973 P.2d 527 & n. 12 (1999) (applying "unfair" test to [*49] anti-competitive practices and not consumer actions). As the Court explained in the Beaver case, post-Cel-Tech, California appellate courts are divided as to which test of "unfair" applies to consumer cases. 29 F. Supp. 3d at 1314; see also Hodsdon v. Mars, Inc., 891 F.3d 857, 866 (9th Cir. 2018) (recent case noting the term "unfair" is still in flux in California courts). In Lozano v. AT&T Wireless Servs., Inc., 504 F.3d 718, 736 (9th Cir. 2007), the Ninth Circuit held that two tests, "the Cel—Tech test where the unfairness is tied to a "legislatively declared" policy, or the former balancing test under South Bay,[13] which involves balancing the harm to the consumer against the utility of the defendant's practices, would apply to consumer cases. Id. at 1315. In order to be a "legislatively declared" policy, there must be a "close nexus between the challenged act and the legislative policy." Hodsdon, 891 F.3d at 866 (citing Cel-Tech, 20 Cal. 4th at 187) (holding that for an act to be "unfair," it must "threaten[ ]" a violation of law or "violate[] the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law").

In Beaver, the plaintiffs applied the tethering test arguing that its unfair claim is tied to Playground's violation of its statutory duty as a real estate agent to "disclose all facts known to the [it] materially affecting the value [*50] or desirability of the property that are not known to, or within the diligent attention and observation of, the parties pursuant to Cal. Civ. Code § 2079.16." The Court granted Playground's motion for summary judgment concluding that the plaintiffs "do not allege or show that the failure to disclose or affirmative misrepresentation is predicated on a public policy and that the conduct threatened to violate the letter, policy, or spirit of the antitrust laws or that it harms competition. . . . Plaintiffs only argue that the unfair practices are tethered to the disclosure policies, not public policy." Id. at 1315. "Moreover, Plaintiffs have not alleged or demonstrated that such acts are against public policy, immoral, unethical, oppressive, or unscrupulous." Id. Even though the Court's order was on summary judgment, it noted that the plaintiffs did not even allege that the alleged conduct was predicated on a public policy.

Similarly, in this case, Plaintiff argues that the UCL claim is tethered to California Civil Code sections 2079.16(b) & (c) which requires Playground to act in an honest, fair dealing and good faith manner as well as disclosing all facts known to the agent that materially affects the value or desirability of the property under Civil Code section 2079.16. (Dkt. [*51] No. 32 at 11.) The FAC claims that Defendants concealed information Plaintiff was entitled to receive prior to closing, including his two year right to rescind and these actions were unfair because they offended established anti-fraud statutes and the harm Plaintiff suffered greatly outweighs any benefits associated with those practices. (Dkt. No. 24, FAC ¶ 158.) California has a legislative policy requiring that real estate brokers disclose all facts materially affecting the desirability or value of the property that are not known to, or within diligent attention and observation of the parties. (Id. ¶ 159.)

As in Beaver, Plaintiff, in this case, has not sufficiently alleged that the failure to disclose or misrepresentations are predicated on "legislatively declared" policy mandating a "close nexus between the challenged act and the legislative policy." See Hodsdon, 891 F.3d at 866. Accordingly, because Plaintiff has failed to allege facts to support a claim under the "unfair" prong, the Court GRANTS Playground's motion to dismiss.

Finally, Playground contends that the FAC fails to plead a fraudulent or deceptive act because Plaintiff has not alleged Playground had a duty to disclose those undisclosed material [*52] facts. To state a claim under the fraudulent prong of the UCL, "it is necessary only to show that members of the public are likely to be deceived" by the business practice. Prakashpalan v. Engstrom, Lipscomb and Lack, 223 Cal. App. 4th 1105, 1134, 167 Cal. Rptr. 3d 832 (2014). But "a failure to disclose a fact one has no affirmative duty to disclose is [not] 'likely to deceive' anyone within the meaning of the UCL." Daugherty v. American Honda Motor Co., Inc., 144 Cal. App. 4th 824, 838, 51 Cal. Rptr. 3d 118 (2007).

The Court agrees. Plaintiff relies on the real estate broker's duties under Civil Code section 2079.16 ("A Seller's agent . . .has the following affirmative obligations: . . . (c) A duty to disclose all facts known to the agent materially affecting the value or desirability of the property that are not known to, or within the diligent attention and observation of, the parties.") which requires knowledge of the alleged failure to disclose. Here, Plaintiff must allege that Playground knew about the ILSA disclosure provisions which the Court concluded above he has not sufficiently alleged. Accordingly, the Court GRANTS Playground's motion to dismiss the fraudulent prong of the UCL.

E. Leave to Amend

[13] South Bay Chevrolet v. Gen. Motors Acceptance Corp., 72 Cal. App. 4th 861, 85 Cal. Rptr. 2d 301 (1999).

Plaintiff seeks leave to amend to correct any deficiencies in the FAC. Tarsadia Defendants and Playground ask the Court to grant their motions to dismiss with prejudice without leave to amend as [*53] Plaintiff has had a couple of attempts to file a complaint without success. The Ninth Circuit has directed that "a district court should grant the plaintiff leave to amend if the complaint can possibly be cured by additional factual allegations." Zixiang Li v. Kerry, 710 F.3d 995, 999 (9th Cir. 2013). Here, as a pro per Plaintiff, the Court liberally construes the FAC, and concludes that leave to amend would not be futile. See Schreiber Distrib. Co., 806 F.2d at 1401. The Court GRANTS Plaintiff leave to file a second amended complaint.

Conclusion

Based on the above, the Court GRANTS in part and DENIES in part Tarsadia Defendants' motion to dismiss and GRANTS Playground's motion to dismiss. Plaintiff is granted leave to file a second amended complaint and shall file it on or before July 8, 2019.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

[*501] MEMORANDUM

INTRODUCTION

In 2016, the Court granted the defense motion for summary judgment on Direct Action Plaintiffs' egg product-related claims on the grounds that they lacked standing. The DAPs successfully appealed that ruling and the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit remanded the case for further disposition. The defendants then filed joint and individual motions for summary judgment on the DAPs' egg product-related claims. This Memorandum addresses those motions.

The defendants jointly argue that the DAPs failed to demonstrate that any alleged antitrust violation caused injuries. The Court must deny this motion because the DAPs have proffered enough evidence that a reasonable jury could arguably rule in their favor.

Certain defendants also filed individual motions for summary judgment on the grounds that, given the opinion from Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, some or all of the DAPs lack standing. The Court denies these motions because under the theory being pursued by the DAPs (a theory that is permitted [2] by current applications of antitrust law) the defendants can be jointly and severally liable for damages even if certain DAPs did not directly purchase egg products from them.

This motion focuses on egg products as opposed to shell eggs. The DAPs[2] are [*502] purchasers of egg products who claim that they paid more for those egg products than they should have because of the defendants' alleged conspiracy. The discussion of the facts relevant to the pending motions proceeds in three parts: (1) information about egg products during the alleged conspiracy; (2) a review of each of the remaining defendants, and; (3) a brief summary of the expert report by Dr. Michael R. Baye as it relates to the DAPs' egg products claims.

I. Egg Products

For the most part, the facts regarding egg products are undisputed. Shell eggs are eggs that are processed by being cleaned, packaged, and sold in their shells. Egg products are eggs, either whole or separated, that have been removed from their shells and are then processed into dried, frozen, or liquid forms. The primary purchasers of egg products are food manufacturers that use the egg products as ingredients in goods ranging from frozen waffles to salad [3] dressing to mayonnaise. During the alleged conspiracy period, at least 18 companies, including 15 non-defendants, sold processed egg products. At least some of these companies do not themselves own any egg-laying hens.

Some facilities produce shell eggs, which leave the facility still in the shell and can be used for either shell eggs or be broken "off-line" for use in egg products. Other facilities, called "in-line" facilities, break the eggs in the facility and then transport the raw unpasteurized liquid egg via produce tankers. The defendants allege that eggs from in-line facilities are better for egg products because they have a lower bacterial count than liquid eggs broken off-line. This raw unpasteurized liquid egg is unfit for human consumption and cannot legally be sold to anyone in that form other than egg products manufacturers, who then process the raw egg. Not every egg products company both produces and processes raw liquid egg—some companies only produce the raw liquid egg and others only process it The latter companies have no layers of their own and must purchase the raw liquid egg they then process.

During the alleged conspiracy, the DAPS contend that overall egg production [4] increased at a slower rate than it would have had the conspiracy not been in place. However, as is allegedly important for understanding the dynamics of this case, egg production in Iowa increased at a much higher rate than it did in other parts of the country. Between 2000 and 2008, the U.S. flock size increased by about 3%, from 328 million layers to 339 million layers. During that same period, the flock size in Iowa increased by about 88%, from 28 million layers to 53 million layers. The defendants contend that this rapid growth in Iowa was particularly important for egg products because

[1] This case has been pending for a number of years, during which all the allegations and various industry terms, as well as parties, events and such, have been repeatedly discussed in a number of opinions. Accordingly, this opinion assumes familiarity with the prior pertinent material docketed generally under this action.

[2] The DAPs include the Kroger Co., Safeway Inc., Walgreen Co., Hy-Vee, Inc., Albertsons LLC, Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company, Inc., H.E. Butt Grocery Company, Conopco, Inc., Publix Super Markets, Inc., Supervalu, Inc., Giant Eagle, Inc., Kraft Foods Global, Inc., the Kellogg Company, General Mills, Inc., Nestle USA, Inc., Winn-Dixie, Inc., Roundy's Supermarkets, Inc., C&S Wholesale Grocers, Inc., and H.J. Heinz Company, L.P.

Iowa producers are well-positioned to supply eggs to egg products companies. For example, Iowa producers are advantaged by low feed costs but are at a disadvantage in supplying shell eggs to urban areas because of increased transportation costs relative to other egg-producing states such as California, Ohio, Georgia, and Pennsylvania. This leads Iowa producers to break eggs near production locations and sell liquid egg to egg products companies, such as Michael Foods.

II. Defendants

The defendants remaining in this portion of the case are Michael Foods, Rose Acre, Cal-Maine, R.W. Sauder, United Egg [5] Producers, Inc. (UEP), and United [*503] States Egg Marketers (USEM).[3] Each of these defendants, with the exception of Michael Foods, also filed an individual motion for summary judgment.

A. Michael Foods[4]

Sales of egg products by Michael Foods make up the majority of sales for most of the DAPs' damages. Most of the eggs used in Michael Foods' egg products come from outside suppliers, and of those eggs, the great majority were supplied by non-Defendants. Seventy-two percent (72%) of the eggs purchased by Michael Foods were from companies that are not UEP certified. And Michael Foods paid very different prices for eggs from different suppliers because it negotiated prices based on grain prices (in some cases) and egg market prices (in other cases). Michael Foods contends that it entered into long-term contracts based on grain prices because grain prices are historically more stable than egg prices. Michael Foods also entered into such long-term contracts with suppliers from Iowa to take advantage of the inherent advantages of that market.

B. Rose Acre

Certain DAPs also purchased egg products from Rose Acre Farms. Rose Acre produces both shell eggs and eggs for breaking into egg products, [6] and the company can move eggs between shell eggs and eggs for breaking with some ease. With that being said, Rose Acre purchased as much as 21.6% of its eggs for egg products from outside suppliers, including from non-Defendants.

Rose Acre contends that the following DAPs did not purchase any egg products directly from it: Giant Eagle, Hy-Vee, Publix, and Safeway. Although the DAPs admit that Safeway did not purchase egg products directly from Rose Acre, they dispute whether Hy-Vee, Publix, and Giant Eagle did. All parties agree that the remaining DAPs made egg product purchases from entities other than Rose Acre.

C. Cal-Maine Foods, Inc.

Cal-Maine has resolved disputes related to both shell eggs and egg products with all DAPs other than Conopco, Inc. and the four DAPs in the Kraft case (Kraft Foods Global, Inc., Nestle USA, Inc., General Mills, Inc, and the Kellogg Company). It is undisputed that the five DAPs with remaining claims against Cal-Maine did not purchase egg products directly from Cal-Maine.

[3] At the time these summary judgment motions were filed, Ohio Fresh Eggs, LLC was still a defendant in the DAPs' case. Ohio Fresh and the DAPs have since entered into a stipulation of dismissal. See Doc. No. 1861.

[4] The Kroger Co., Safeway Inc., Walgreen Co., Hy-Vee, Inc., Albertsons LLC, Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company, Inc., H.E. Butt Grocery Company, Publix Super Markets, Inc., Supervalu, Inc., Giant Eagle, Inc., Winn-Dixie, Inc., and Roundy's Supermarkets, Inc., entered into a stipulation of dismissal with Michael Foods. See Doc. Nos. 1495, 1503.

D. R.W. Sauder

R.W. Sauder alleges that none of the DAPs purchased egg products directly from the company. The DAPs contend that Supervalu purchased egg products from R.W. Sauder.

E. United [7] Egg Producers, Inc. and United States Egg Marketers

As discussed in detail in previous opinions, UEP and USEM do not produce eggs or egg products. UEP is a cooperative that provides services to its members, including lobbying and marketing, concerning principally animal welfare, food safety, and environmental [*504] issues. USEM is a cooperative involved in the export of eggs. UEP and USEM did not sell egg products in any capacity, let alone to the DAPs.

III. Dr. Baye's Expert Report as It Pertains to Egg Products

The DAPs used Dr. Michael Baye, a PhD economist and Professor of Business Economics and Public Policy at Indiana State University Kelley School of Business, to produce an expert report in this case. At the first step of his analysis, Dr. Baye used USDA data to look at the overall production of eggs during the relevant time frame. Dr. Baye conducted two separate regression analyses to determine whether the alleged conspiracy reduced the total size of the U.S. layer flock and total number of eggs produced compared to what these data points would have been without the conspiracy. Dr. Baye found that, even though egg producers increased production during the alleged conspiracy, the conspiracy [8] limited the amount of growth during that time frame to fall short of what unrestrained growth would have been.

Dr. Baye analyzed both flock size and egg production to ensure, he contends, that a decrease in flock size was not offset by an increase in the number of eggs laid per hen. In addition to the elements of the conspiracy, Dr. Baye's model allows for a number of supply and demand factors such as grain prices, electricity, diesel, and agricultural wages, real national income, population, interest rates, changes in consumer preferences over time (such as increased preferences for cage-free or other specialty eggs), and seasonal fluctuations. Dr. Baye concluded that the conspiracy—in particular, the cage-size restrictions and ban on backfilling—was statistically significant in reducing the overall flock size and egg production.

Dr. Baye then used a two-stage least squares model to isolate the effect of the supply reduction on the prices of 68 separate egg products and shell eggs. In the first stage of the analysis, Dr. Baye created a regression model that controlled for changes in supply and demand factors that affect the quantity of eggs, and used that model to determine the reduction [9] in supply caused by the conspiracy. In the second stage, Dr. Baye used the supply data from the first stage, pricing data, and econometric methods to estimate an inverse demand. Which is to say, Dr. Baye asserts that he eliminated the impact of other supply and demand factors so that he could determine the impact of the various components of the alleged conspiracy. Dr. Baye ran this model on 68 different types of eggs and egg products and found that the Urner Barry price for each type increased as a result of the reduction in the supply of eggs caused by the alleged conspiracy. In doing so, Dr. Baye quantified exactly how much each of the 68 types of shell eggs and egg products was affected by the reduction in the number of eggs. He found that, although the availability of each of the shell eggs and egg products responded differently to the conspiracy, the conspiracy impacted each one in a statistically significant manner.[5]

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

[5] For example, Dr. Baye calculated that the cage-size restrictions in place from August 2005 through January 2007 increased the price of Liquid Eggs, Whites, Pasteurized, West Coast by 55%, but raised the price of Frozen Yolk Salt 43% Solids by only 20.92%. Dr. Baye Expert Report P 199 (Ex. 20 to Dr. Baye Report).

In 2016, the Court granted summary judgment on the grounds that the DAPs lacked standing to pursue egg product-related claims. In re Processed Egg Prods. Antitrust Litig., 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 119731, 2016 WL 4670983 (E.D. [*505] Pa. Sept. 6, 2016). The Court concluded that the plaintiffs failed to distinguish between egg products made with Defendant-produced eggs [10] from egg products made with eggs produced by non-conspirators and found that recovery for the latter type of egg products was barred by the prohibition on "umbrella" damages. *2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 119731, [WL] at 4.

On appeal, the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit concluded that this litigation actually presented a case of first impression, allowing the appellate court to find that the DAPs had "antitrust standing to pursue overcharge damages from the Defendants-Appellees from whom they purchased egg products, regardless of whether those products were made with internal eggs, non-conspirator eggs, or both." In re Processed Egg Products Antitrust Litig., 881 F.3d 262, 276 (3d Cir. 2018). The court came to this conclusion because the purchasers in this case were bringing price-fixing claims against suppliers "from whom they directly purchased products that incorporate a price-fixed component." Id. at 274 ("The direct relationship between the Purchasers and their Suppliers, and the fact that the Suppliers are alleged price-fixing conspirators and not merely competitors of those conspirators, are key distinctions from the scenario we confronted in Mid-West Paper [Products Co. v. Continental Group, Inc., 596 F.2d 573 (3d Cir. 1979)].").

The court explicitly limited its holding to the issue of standing and remanded the case for this Court to decide whether the DAPs could "prove [11] 'actual causation' with 'reasonable certainty,' and provide the trier of fact enough to 'make a reasonable estimate of damages.' Id. at 276 (quoting Mid-West Paper, 596 F.2d at 584 n.43).

In light of this ruling, the defendants filed both joint and individual motions for summary judgment.

LEGAL STANDARD

Summary judgment is appropriate only when the record fails to demonstrate a genuine dispute as to material fact that would permit a reasonable jury to find for the nonmoving party. Anderson v. Liberty Lobby Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 250, 106 S. Ct. 2505, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1986); Inter Vest, Inc, v. Bloomberg, L.P., 340 F.3d 144, 159 (3d Cir. 2003) ("The movant's burden on a summary judgment motion in an antitrust case is no different than in any other case."). "The moving party may meet its burden on summary judgment by showing that the nonmoving party's evidence is insufficient to carry the burden of persuasion at trial." Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 322-23, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986). The nonmoving party must point to evidence—beyond the pleadings—showing that a genuine dispute as to an issue of material fact exists, necessitating at trial. Id at 324. "On summary judgment, the moving party need not disprove the opposing party's claim, but does have the burden to show the absence of any genuine issues of material fact." Orson, Inc. v. Miramax Film Corp., 79 F.3d 1358, 1366 (3d Cir. 1996) (citing Celotex, 477 U.S. at 322-23).

Summary judgment is not necessarily disfavored in the antitrust context, and the entry of summary judgment in favor of an antitrust defendant [12] may actually be required in order to prevent lengthy and drawn-out litigation, which itself may have a chilling effect on competitive market forces. Race Tires Am., Inc. v. Hoosier Racing Tire Corp., 614 F.3d 57, 73 (3d Cir. 2010).

Joint Motion for Summary Judgment

"The primary issue actually before us on the antitrust claims is whether the plaintiffs have proffered sufficient evidence [*506] to raise a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the defendants' alleged antitrust violations caused harm to the plaintiffs." Callahan v. A.E. V., Inc., 182 F.3d 237, 250 (3d Cir. 1999). "In other words, a plaintiff must prove a causal connection between the [antitrust violation] and actual damage suffered." Stelwagon Mfg. Co. v. Tarmac Roofing Sys., Inc., 63 F.3d 1267, 1273 (3d Cir. 1995); see also Rossi v. Standard Roofing, Inc., 156 F.3d 452, 483 (3d Cir.1998) ("To recover damages, an antitrust plaintiff must prove causation, described in our jurisprudence as 'fact of damage or injury.'') (citations omitted).

The basis for the joint summary judgment motion here rests on whether the DAPs have demonstrated that a reduction in the overall supply of eggs caused an increase in the price of egg products. The DAPs' theory has always been that there was a conspiracy to reduce the total supply of eggs, which led to an increase in the price of both shell eggs and egg products. The DAPs rely on two main areas to support their claims. First, they rely on documentary evidence that they [13] argue demonstrates that the defendants intended for the conspiracy to impact egg products prices. Second, they rely on Dr. Baye's expert report, which they contend is grounded in sound economic principles and shows hat the alleged conspiracy actually impacted egg products prices.

The defendants dispute that there is evidence that an aggregate reduction in the national flock[6] reduced the supply of liquid egg for the egg products industry. The defendants assert that the DAPs' failure to look at how liquid egg and egg products were specifically affected by the conspiracy means that the DAPs cannot prove causation.[7] The alleged misstep was caused by the fact that Dr. Baye used USDA data that encompasses nationwide egg production. According to the defendants, because "the USDA data that Dr. Baye relies upon include[s] far more than the eggs that go into egg products and far more producers than those who produce eggs destined for egg products, Dr. Baye cannot isolate the effect of the alleged conspiracy on the production of eggs available for processing into egg products [as opposed to those available for distributing shell eggs]." Defs.' Mot. for Summ. J. at 17 (Doc. No. 1812).

The defendants [14] urge the Court not to consider shell eggs and egg products together and to consider a number of factors that make them inherently different. For example, it is undisputed that producers of egg products acquired raw egg from non-defendants (who are not alleged to be co-conspirators and were not UEP certified) and also that egg products producers entered into long-term output contracts, which means those shell eggs were always designated for egg products. At least one major egg products company used long-term, grain-based contracts to ensure a reliable supply of raw egg at prices immune [*507] from volatility in the shell egg market. The defendants also contend that Dr. Baye failed to consider increased production in Iowa. During the alleged conspiracy, the flock size in Iowa increased by 88% even though the flock size in the rest of the country only increased by 3%. This growth was allegedly due to long-term contracts between egg products companies and non-UEP certified egg producers. The defendants argue that Iowa's increase would have had a much larger impact on the egg products industry because Iowa is geographically favored for producing liquid egg.

All of this may be true. Indeed, the [15] DAPs admit as much. However, the DAPs have also produced evidence that allows them to argue that an overall reduction in the supply of eggs could have affected egg products prices. There is some documentary evidence to support looking at the overall reduction in the supply of eggs and considering its impact on egg products. Furthermore, Dr. Baye accounted for many of the factors that the defendants argue would have impacted egg products when he calculated the damages as to each of the 68 types of shell eggs and egg products he tested.

I. Documentary Evidence

[6] For the purposes of this motion only, the defendants do not quarrel with the DAPs' contention that nationwide production of eggs was lower from August 2005 to December 2012, relative to Dr. Baye's benchmark period. Defendants' Mot. for Summ. J. at 14 n.4 (Doc. No. 1812).

[7] This argument is best demonstrated with a hypothetical involving 100 eggs laid. Prior to the conspiracy, 50 of these eggs were used for shell eggs and 50 were used for egg products. After the conspiracy, the number of eggs laid (hypothetically) decreased to 80. The fact that there are only 80 eggs available after the conspiracy does not necessarily mean that 40 were allotted for shell eggs and 40 for egg products. It could be that 30 became shell eggs and 50 were used in egg products, meaning that egg products might not have been affected by the alleged conspiracy at all.

Although it ought to go without saying, the DAPs resist the notion that the Court does have some appreciation for food stuffs to remind the Court that eggs are a necessary prerequisite to egg products. Thus, if there are less overall eggs available, there are inherently less eggs available for egg products.

In the past, demonstrating at least a rudimentary appreciation for recipes, this Court has noted that "it also takes more than eggs to make egg products." In re Processed Egg Prods. Antitrust Litig., 312 F.R.D. 171, 200 (E.D. Pa. 2015). There is, however, some evidence that egg producers considered eggs used for shell eggs and egg products to be somewhat fungible. Statements indicate that industry insiders [16] viewed them together, i.e., as a commodity. See Don Bell Presentation on Supply/Demand Challenges, at 2384, DAP Ex. 29 (stating "An egg is an egg is an egg" and "In one way or another, every egg produced impacts prices."); Gene Gregory Deposition Tr. 558:9-12, DAP Ex. 8 (discussing the egg market as "just one pie"). Some producers, such as Rose Acre, have the capacity to sell eggs as either shell eggs or breakers. Producers who have this capacity decide how to sell the eggs based on whether there is a surplus of shell eggs or a change in price for breakers or egg products. See DAP Ex. 29, at 2385; Marcus Rust Deposition Tr. 237:3-13, 258: 2-13, DAP Ex. 32; Don Bell December 3, 2004 e mail, DAP Ex. 33.

The defendants also appear to credit what the DAPs characterize as the conspiracy with increasing the price of both shell eggs and egg products. See Gene Gregory, An Economic Perspective, DAP Ex. 21. In a 2007 review of egg prices, Gene Gregory of UEP wrote that the industry was benefiting from "record egg prices." Jan. 3, 2008 United Voices, at 619780, DAPs Ex. 42. Mr. Gregory partially attributed those prices to the fact that the "UEP's animal welfare guidelines continued to reduce the number of hens per house." Id. He further concluded that [17] "[shell] egg prices likely were the driving force for all forms of eggs." Id. In a 2004 earnings call, Michael Foods told investors that "Urner Barry shell egg prices rose by about 35 percent year-over-year in the first-quarter, pushing certain products quite a bit higher as well," and industrial egg product profits were "enhanced by record market-driven price environment as these products are priced off of the Urner [*508] Barry markets." Michael Foods Q2 2004 Earnings Call, at 11182-83, DAP Ex. 34.

Defendant Rose Acre likewise partially attributed an increase in egg product prices to increased production costs caused by the animal welfare program. May 30, 2007 Rose Acre Letter, DAP Ex. 37. Rose Acre decision-makers were also allegedly upset before Michael Foods began participating in the UEP program because the company's representatives felt that Michael Foods was reaping the benefits of higher egg product prices without decreasing its own flock size. Marcus Rust April 21, 2006 e-mail, DAP Ex. 40.

The defendants refute the admissibility[8] of most of the documentary evidence. For example, when certain defendants credited the animal welfare program with increased prices, they did so along with [18] a multitude of other reasons, such as ethanol driving up grain prices and better management in response to changes in supply and demand. DAP Ex. 42. The defendants argue that statements like "An egg is an egg is an egg," DAP Ex. 29, or "the egg market is just one pie," DAP Ex. 8, make for pithy phrases but say almost nothing about the production of shell eggs and egg products or how they relate with one another. Furthermore, although it is possible for companies like Rose Acre to "switch hit" by moving eggs from shell eggs to egg products and vice versa, there is no evidence as to how often this happens and to what extent. The Court notes that, although the defendants may be correct that the DAPs are misinterpreting the documentary evidence, this is ultimately an issue for the factfinder, or at least for [*509] evaluation when the claim and defenses take their final shape at trial.

"Evidence submitted with a motion for summary judgment must be reducible to admissible evidence at trial." Agrizap, Inc. v. Woodstream Corp., 450 F. Supp. 2d 562, 567 (E.D. Pa. 2006) (citing Williams v. Borough of West

[8] The defendants argue that, in addition to being irrelevant, many of the exhibits that the DAPs attached to their response are inadmissible hearsay. For example, the DAPs cite to twelve UEP United Voices newsletters. See DAP Exs. 4, 5, 10, 12, 13, 14, 20, 31, 42, 43, 44, & 51. During the DPPs' trial, the Court ruled that these documents contained inadmissible hearsay as to the producer Defendants and could only be admitted for the limited purpose of notice of the statements contained in them and not the truth of the statements themselves. See *In re Processed Egg Prods. Antitrust Litig., 08-MD-2002, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 59633, 2018 WL 1725802, 2-3 (E.D. Pa. Apr. 9, 2018).

Chester, 891 F. 2d 458, 465 n.12 (3d Cir. 1989)). The Court notes that "the Federal Rules of Evidence are to be liberally construed in favor of admissibility . . ." United States v. Pelullo, 964 F.2d 193, 204 (3d Cir. 1992). In this case, the Court conditionally [19] admits the evidence for two reasons. First, unlike in the DPPs case, every document cited was authored by a current defendant, making the documents non-hearsay party admissions as to some party at least. Fed. R. Evid. 801(d)(2)(A). The Court notes that, in this regard, limiting instructions may be needed. Second, however, those statements appear, pending further evidence, to be admissible against co-defendants because they are statements of co-conspirators made in the furtherance of the conspiracy. Fed. R. Evid. 801(d)(2)(E).

Co-conspirator statements are admissible under the exemption when the district court finds by a preponderance of the evidence that: "(1) a conspiracy existed; (2) the declarant and the party against whom the statement is offered were members of the conspiracy; (3) the statement was made in the course of the conspiracy; and (4) the statement was made in furtherance of the conspiracy." United States v. Ellis, 156 F.3d 493, 496 (3d Cir. 1998); In re Flat Glass Antitrust Litig., 385 F.3d 350, 375 (3d Cir. 2004). A district court "has 'considerable discretion' to admit the statements conditionally, subject to their later being connected up." In re Domestic Drywall Antitrust Litig., 163 F. Supp. 3d 175, 201 (E.D. Pa. 2016) (quoting United States v. Mobile Materials, Inc., 881 F.2d 866, 869 (10th Cir. 1989)). This Court chooses to exercise such discretion at this juncture, though this is without prejudice for further argument should circumstances warrant.

II. Expert Report

The DAPS rely on their [20] expert, Dr. Baye, to prove that both shell eggs and egg products were affected by the alleged conspiracy.[9] There is no dispute that the types of models Dr. Baye used are considered sound if used properly. PHILLIP E. AREEDA & HERBERT HOVENKAMP, ANTIRUST LAW: AN ANALYSIS OF ANTIRUST PRINCIPLES AND THEIR APPLICATION ¶ 399c (3rd and 4th Eds. 2010-2018) (stating that multiple regression analysis has been deemed reliable so long as it is used in a reliable fashion).[10] However, the Court recognizes that regressions do not demonstrate causation in and of themselves. A regression "may suggest that one variable is related to or correlated with another, but this does not translate directly into a causal effect." Id. at ¶ 394d. "Causation must be based on some justification rooted in economic theory. Regression alone cannot satisfy the requirements for proving causality. Rather, regression analysis enables us to empirically test a hypothesis based on what economic theory would predict." Id.

Dr. Baye analyzed egg products more closely than the DPPs' expert, Dr. Rausser. See In re Processed Egg Prods. Antitrust Litig., 312 F.R.D. at 200 (concluding at the class certification consideration stage that the industry analysis of egg products in the [21] DPPs' case lacked rigor). Which is not to say he looked at them with the same depth that he considered shell eggs. He did not. The DAPs for the most part emphasize one paragraph of Dr. Baye's

[9] The defendants did not challenge Dr. Baye's expert report under Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 U.S. 579, 113 S. Ct. 2786, 125 L. Ed. 2d 469 (1993); however, this does not preclude the defendants from arguing that his opinions do not establish a genuine issue of material fact. In Daubert, the Supreme Court of the United States explicitly concluded that "conventional devices" such as directed verdict and summary judgment "are the appropriate safeguards where the basis of scientific testimony meets the standards of Rule 702." 509 U.S. at 596. "Even a theory that might meet certain Daubert factors, such as peer review and publication, testing, known or potential error rate, and general acceptance, should not be admitted if it does not apply to the specific facts of the case." Concord Boat Corp. v. Brunswick Corp., 207 F.3d 1039, 1056 (8th Cir. 2000) (citing Kumho Tire Co., Ltd. v. Carmichael, 526 U.S., 137, 154, 119 S. Ct. 1167, 143 L. Ed. 2d 238 (1999); General Elec. Co. v. Joiner, 522 U.S. 136, 146, 118 S. Ct. 512, 139 L. Ed. 2d 508 (1997)) (internal footnote omitted).

[10] Courts have found a multiple regression analysis to be useful in quantifying the relationship between a dependent variable and independent variables. In re Se. Milk Antitrust Litig., 739 F.3d 262, 285 (6th Cir. 2014) (citing Weisfeld v. Sun Chem. Corp., 84 Fed. Appx. 257, 261 n.3 (3d Cir. 2004)). "This type of model can also 'control for other independent variables so as to isolate and identify the effect of a single independent variable on the dependent variable.'" Id. (quoting Weisfeld, 84 Fed. Appx. at 261 n.3).

report that they say adequately addresses the issue of causation. Dr. Baye Expert Report P 194. There is no doubt that the DAPs could have—and perhaps will later find they should have—focused more on the ins and outs of the egg products industry. As much as the DAPs argue that the egg market is all one pie (or, perhaps, quiche), it is not clear that this is true. There are undoubtedly different realities when it comes to making egg products than there are when it comes to producing shell eggs.

With that being said, Dr. Baye looked at how producers decide which eggs remain shell eggs and which become egg products, how egg products are processed, the entire spectrum of egg producers, demand for egg products, and the substitutability of [*510] shell eggs and egg products. He found that some producers, like Rose Acre, have the ability to shift eggs between shell eggs and egg products.[11] Dr. Baye also looked at Michael Foods, a major producer of egg products, specifically.

Finally, he also considered the impact [22] of the alleged conspiracy on 68 different types of shell eggs and egg products. In doing so, he allowed, as he necessarily would have to, for the possibility that the conspiracy would not affect every product in the same way, if at all. Dr. Baye asserts that this method eliminated the impact of other supply and demand factors and it measured the precise extent to which the overall egg reduction impacted each egg product at issue. He found that each product responded differently, but that the conspiracy was statistically significant in each.

III. A Reasonable Jury Could Conclude that a Reduction in the Overall Supply of Eggs Caused an Increase in the Price of Egg Products

Based on the documentary evidence and Dr. Baye's report, the Court cannot say that a jury would be unreasonable to find in favor of the DAPs, especially considering that the DAPs must benefit from all reasonable inferences at this stage See In re Se. Milk Antitrust Litig., 739 F.3d at 283-86 (reversing grant of summary judgment and concluding that evidence of a conspiracy and a regression analysis was sufficient evidence to submit to a jury); Rozema v. Marshfield Clinic, 977 F. Supp. 1362, 1381 (W.D. Wis. 1997) (denying summary judgment even though the district court was not thoroughly convinced by the expert). The defendants direct the [23] Court to examples of cases in which courts concluded that an expert's analysis was insufficient to prove causation; however, those cases are distinguishable from the facts currently before this Court. See Stelwagon, 63 F.3d 1267; In re eBay Seller Antitrust Litig., 433 Fed. Appx. 504 (9th Cir. 2011).

In Stelwagon, the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit reversed a jury verdict awarding treble damages for failure to prove causation. 63 F.3d at 1275. The case involved a claim under the Robinson-Patman Act, which prohibits anticompetitive price discrimination. The court concluded that the plaintiff's expert's opinions were insufficient in and of themselves to support a finding of actual damage. Id. The court found that the only other evidence of causation, anecdotal testimony from the plaintiff's employees, should not have been admitted. Id. at 1274-75. In particular, the court was troubled that the expert did not consider reasons why the plaintiff may have lost sales other than the price discrimination, such as plaintiffs higher overhead costs. Id. at 1275. Furthermore, the plaintiff undisputedly experienced other business complications, such as an embezzlement scheme, during the relevant time period. Id. Notably, the court did not agree with the defendant that the district court erred in admitting the [24] expert's testimony at trial, or in failing to strike the testimony in response to a motion by the defendant at the conclusion of the direct examination. Id.

In eBay, the plaintiffs alleged that eBay charged "supracompetitive" fees for its online auction platform, which resulted in antitrust injury. *In re eBay Seller Antitrust Litig., 07-cv-1882, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19480, 2010 WL 760433, at 10 (N.D. Ca. Mar 4, 2010). The plaintiffs' expert used eBay's "take rate"—a [*511] measure of the fees that eBay collected across all of its transactions—and compared it to what eBay's take rate would have been but for the alleged overcharge in fees, which meant that the expert used the take rate as a proxy for eBay's fees. *2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19480, [WL] at 12-14. The take rate, however, was determined not only by eBay's fees but also by other factors such as the volume of goods sold on its site, the number of total listings, the number of successful listings, the features that sellers use to present their listings to potential buyers, and eBay's rate schedule. *2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19480, [WL] at 13. As such, it was undisputed that the expert's model did "not measure fees, or at the very least [did] not measure them alone" and, thus, was insufficient to present to a jury. *2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19480, [WL] at 14. The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirmed the district court's grant of [25] summary judgment because the model did "not connect the allegedly anticompetitive acts with the charging of supracompetitive fees." 433 F. App'x at 506.

This case is different because Dr. Baye's model accounted for many of the discrepancies the defendants are now raising. Although the defendants contend that many of the eggs used in egg products comes from non-certified producers, Dr. Baye concluded that non-certified producers account for a small share of egg production and that it was unlikely that non-certified producers would have been able to counteract the effects of the alleged conspiracy.[12] The DAPs also argue that, by using the USDA data for total egg production, Dr. Baye inherently included eggs produced in Iowa and those bound for in-line facilities in his calculations. Dr. Baye also controlled for factors such as grain prices and national income. If those factors had impacted the price of egg products, as opposed to the conspiracy, he contends that his model would have shown an impact of zero. According to Dr. Baye, there is a less than 1% chance his model found an effect when there was not one. It remains for the jury to decide which of these competing explanations carry the day.

Furthermore, [26] unlike in Stelwagon, the DAPs do not rely entirely on Dr. Baye's report. They also rely on the documentary evidence, which the Court is required at this time to interpret in favor of the DAPs. An expert report, in addition to other evidence, can provide enough to bolster a plaintiff's case in the face of summary judgment. Callahan, 182 F.3d at 260 (reversing a grant of summary judgment on antitrust claims because the court was satisfied that the expert report, in conjunction with other evidence, "constitutes sufficient evidence of causation"); Rossi, 156 F.3d at 485-87 (same).

There is no dispute that this Court has been troubled in the past by the relative lack of attention the DAPs have paid to the differences between shell eggs and egg products. See *In re Processed Egg Prods. Antitrust Litig., 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 119731, 2016 WL 4670983, at 3. However, the Court made these observations in the context of whether the DAPs had standing and concluded they did not. At this juncture, the Court is now tasked instead with determining whether the [*512] DAPs have presented a genuine dispute of material fact regarding causation. Although it is clear enough that the Court is not thoroughly convinced of the DAPs' case, it need not be. See Rozema, 977 F. Supp. at 1381 (denying summary judgment because the district court could not "say that a jury would be unreasonable to conclude from [the] expert report, combined with findings of a market allocation conspiracy and strong market power, that plaintiffs paid more . . . because of defendants' unlawful conduct").

This case is, undoubtedly, unique. It does not fit neatly into the mold of antitrust cases, leaving this Court to parse through a complicated set of facts and econometric models to determine whether a reasonable jury could rule in the DAPs' favor. "[O]ur jurispudence does not require the summary judgment opponent to match, item for item, each piece of evidence proffered by the movant, but rather he or she must only exceed the 'mere scintilla' standard." Rossi, 156 F.3d at 466 (citations and some quotations omitted); see also Callahan, 182 F.3d at 253. Indeed, this uniqueness, in part, makes it an excellent candidate—again—for trial and again the cause for additional development of antirust law outside the mold. The defendants make compelling arguments, but these arguments are better suited for a jury. The defendants can raise these arguments again at trial as "[v]igorous cross-examination, presentation of contrary evidence, and careful instruction on the burden of proof are the traditional and appropriate means of attacking shaky but admissible evidence." Daubert, 509 U.S. at 596.

[12] The defendants also argue that summary judgment is warranted because the DAPs cannot establish a causal link between the alleged conspiracy and higher Urner Barry prices. Dr. Baye calculated damages based on the Urner Barry price sheets, which reflect market-wide transactions, but the defendants contend that he did not look at how the pricing decisions of at least 15 non-defendants who sold processed egg products impacted Urner Barry. At most, the defendants argue that Dr. Baye's model shows a correlation between a decrease in the overall number of eggs and an increase in egg product prices. Because Dr. Baye concluded that non-certified producers would not have been able to counteract the effects of the alleged conspiracy, this creates a material dispute of fact.

INDIVIDUAL DEFENDANTS' MOTIONS FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT

Rose Acre, Cal-Maine, R.W. Sauder, UEP, and USEM also filed individual motions for summary judgment.[13] They argue that, under the opinion by the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, some or all of the DAPs lack standing to make claims against them because those DAPs did not purchase egg products from those defendants. [27] This reading plucks favorable language from the opinion, however, and is incompatible with the well-settled principle of joint and several liability in antitrust law.

In its opinion, the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit stated, "In sum, we conclude that Plaintiffs-Appellants have antitrust standing to pursue overcharge damages from the Defendants-Appellees from whom they purchased egg products, regardless of whether those egg products were made with internal eggs, non-conspirator eggs, or both." In re Processed Egg Products Antitrust Litig., 881 F.3d at 276. The defendants particularly focus on the phrase "from whom they purchased egg products" (and other similar phrasing in the opinion)[14] and argue that each DAP [*513] only has standing to bring egg product-related claims against the individual defendants they purchased egg products from directly.[15]

This interpretative reading is not in line with relevant case law. Under antitrust law, a defendant who participated in a conspiracy can be liable for damages even if the plaintiff only purchased from the defendants' co-conspirators and not from the defendant itself. See Texas Indus., Inc. v. Radcliff Materials, Inc., 451 U.S. 630, 646, 101 S. Ct. 2061, 68 L. Ed. 2d 500 (1981); Bogosian v. Gulf Oil Corp., 561 F.2d 434, 448 (3d Cir. 1977); Paper Systems Inc. v. Nippon Paper Indus. Co., Ltd., 281 F.3d 629, 632-34 (7th Cir. 2002); In re Linerboard Antitrust Litig., 203 F.R.D. 197, 208 (E.D. Pa. 2001), aff'd [28] , 205 F.3d 145 (3d Cir. 2002). "The fact that a customer has not made purchases from every co-conspirator does not prevent him from suing all for each co-conspirator contributed to the charging of the supracompetitive price paid by the purchaser." Bogosian, 561 F.2d at 448. This principle of "joint and several liability simply ensures that the plaintiffs will be able to recover the full amount of damages from some, if not all, participants." Texas Indus., 451 U.S. at 646.

In Nippon Paper, Judge Easterbrook of the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit addressed a set of facts suitably analogous to the ones at hand. In that case, the plaintiffs alleged that Nippon Paper participated in a conspiracy to reduce the output—and raise prices—of thermal facsimile paper. Nippon Paper Indus., 281 F.3d at 632. Although the companies that directly purchased from Nippon Paper opted not to participate in the lawsuit, the court concluded that the district court improperly dismissed Nippon Paper from the case. Id. The court reasoned that the plaintiffs, who purchased from co-conspirators, were entitled "to collect damages not just firm-by-firm according to the quantity each sold, but from all conspirators for all sales." Id. The Court further explained that, if "Nippon Paper participated in a cartel of thermal fax [29] paper . . . then it is jointly and severally liable for the cartel's entire overcharge. That the plaintiffs did not buy from Nippon Paper directly, or at all, does not matter." Id. at 634. The only thing that mattered was whether "Nippon Paper's direct customers [held] the exclusive right to damages for its own output," thereby satisfying "the holding and goals of Illinois Brick [Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (1977)]" by preventing double recovery. Id.

[14] See e.g. In re Processed Egg Products Antitrust Litig., 881 F.3d at 274 ("Crucially, unlike the plaintiff in Mid-West Paper, who sued price-fixing suppliers from whom it made no purchases and with whom it had no direct relationship, here the Purchasers are pressing claims against price-fixing suppliers from whom they directly purchased products that incorporate a price-fixed component.") (emphasis in original); id. ("The direct relationship between the Purchasers and their Suppliers, and the fact that the Suppliers are alleged price-fixing conspirators and not merely competitors of those conspirators, are key distinctions from the scenario we confronted in Mid-West Paper."); id. at 275 ("Here, the Purchasers are in a direct relationship with the antitrust violators and seek to recover for higher prices set by those violators, and paid by the Purchasers to those very parties.").

[15] In their individual motions, each defendant outlined which DAPs never purchased egg products directly from that defendant. Those relationships are summarized in the Background section of this Memorandum. See supra pp. 4-5.

In this case, the defendants ask the Court to ignore relevant case law and interpret the language from the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit as a "newly articulated test." Ohio Fresh Eggs & R.W. Sauder's Individual Motion for Summary Judgment, p. 3 (Doc. No. 1808). However, the court did not explicitly or implicitly state that it was creating a new test for antitrust standing. Nor did it overrule (or even address) the principle of joint and several liability in antitrust case law. As such, this Court reads the Court of Appeals' opinion for what it says: that the DAPs have antitrust standing to pursue egg products claims.[16]

[*514] Furthermore, like in Nippon Paper, this case does not present a situation in which the DAPs may potentially recover twice for their purchases of egg products. [30] The DAPs allege that the defendants conspired to reduce the supply of eggs and thereby increase the price of egg products. The individual DAPs can only recover damages for the egg products they actually purchased and they can do so only once from defendants who are found to have participated in the conspiracy. Those defendants are jointly and severally liable for damages that resulted from the conspiracy. This is true even if an individual defendant did not directly sell egg products to an individual plaintiff.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the Court will deny the outstanding joint and individual motions for summary judgment. An appropriate Order follows.

[16] Under the defendants' interpretation, UEP and USEM could never be held liable for their participation in a conspiracy because those entities do not sell eggs or egg products. It is unreasonable to think that UEP and USEM could have participated in conspiratorial conduct but are protected from contributing to any damages by what would essentially be a loophole.

ORDER

FEUERSTEIN, District Judge:

I. Introduction

On December 5, 2017, plaintiff Provepharm, Inc. ("plaintiff" or "Provepharm") commenced this action against defendant Akorn, Inc. ("defendant" or "Akorn"), seeking, inter alia, damages and injunctive relief for Akorn's allegedly false advertising of its methylene blue product in violation of Section 43(a) of the Lanham Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1125(a), and Section 350-e(3) of the New York General Business Law; unfair competition in violation of Section 43(a) of the Lanham Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1125(a), and the common law; and deceptive trade practices in violation of Section 349(h) of the New York General Business Law.[1] Issue was joined by the service of an answer on behalf of Akorn on or about February 5, 2018. On August 27, 2018, Akorn served an amended answer, inter alia, asserting two (2) counterclaims against Provepharm seeking damages and injunctive relief for Provepharm 's alleged monopolization and attempted monopolization of the methylene blue market in the United States in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2. Pending before [*3] the Court, inter alia, are Provepharm' s motion to dismiss Akorn's counterclaims in their entirety pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure for failure to state a claim for relief; and Akorn's motion pursuant to Rule 15(a)(2) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure to amend its counterclaims. For the reasons set forth below, Provepharm's motion to dismiss is denied and Akorn's motion to amend is granted.

II. Background

A. Factual Allegations[2]

This case concerns the drug methylthioninium chloride, also known as methylene blue, (Counterclaim ["Countercl."], ¶ 8; Proposed Amended Counterclaims ["PAC"], ¶ 8), which was originally developed in the nineteenth (19th) century and has been used clinically as both a dye and a medication to treat a variety of conditions, including methemoglobinemia. (Complaint ["Compl."], ¶ 14; Amended Answer ["Am. Ans."], ¶ 14; see also Countercl., ¶ 8; PAC, ¶ 8). Methemoglobinemia is a rare and life-threatening disorder in which blood cells produce an abnormal amount of methemoglobin, which is a modified form of hemoglobin. (Compl., ¶ 12; Am. Ans., ¶ 12; see also Countercl., ¶ 8; PAC, ¶ 8). Since the hemoglobin in patients with methemoglobinemia cannot effectively release oxygen to body tissues, those tissues may be deprived of an adequate [*4] oxygen supply, leading to tissue hypoxia. (Compl., ¶ 13; Am. Ans., ¶ 13). Thus, patients with methemoglobinemia can experience cardiac, pulmonary, and neurological symptoms; and, in severe cases, death. (Compl., ¶ 13; Am. Ans., ¶ 13). Patients with acquired methemoglobinemia can be treated by delivering a solution of methylene blue intravenously, thereby restoring the iron in hemoglobin to its normal oxygen-carrying state. (Compl., ¶ 14; Am. Ans., ¶ 14; see also Countercl., ¶ 8; PAC, ¶ 8).

Although the only use for methylene blue that is approved by the United States Food and Drug Administration ("FDA") is for the treatment of methemoglobinemia, "today methylene blue is used by healthcare providers for a multitude of unapproved indications, for example as an antidote for cyanide poisoning, and is often a component in other medications." (Countercl., ¶ 8; PAC, ¶ 8).

On its website, Akorn describes itself as "a niche pharmaceutical company that develops, manufactures and markets generic and branded prescription pharmaceuticals as well as animal and consumer health products[,] . . . [which] specialize[s] in difficult-to-manufacture sterile and no-sterile dosage forms including: ophthalmics, [*5] injectables, oral liquids, optics, topicals, inhalants, and nasal sprays." (Compl., ¶ 33; Am. Ans., ¶ 33). Akorn originally began marketing methylene blue in 2009. (Compl., ¶ 34; Am. Ans., ¶ 34).

[1] This case was originally assigned to the Honorable Arthur D. Spatt, United States District Judge. On October 3, 2018, Judge Spatt entered an order of recusal and the case was reassigned to the undersigned.

[2] The factual allegations in the counterclaims are assumed to be true for purposes of this motion and do not constitute findings of fact by the Court.

Provepharm is a competitor of Akorn in connection with the sale of methylene blue injection products in the United States. (Countercl., ¶ 4; PAC, ¶ 4).

Until 2016, all companies that manufactured and sold methylene blue did so under a "grandfather" status, which exempts pre-existing drugs meeting certain criteria from the requirements: (i) of having an approved New Drug Application ("NDA") under legislation enacted in 1938; and (ii) of proving effectiveness under legislation enacted in 1962. (Counterc ¶¶ 9-11; PAC, ¶¶ 9-11). Akorn sold its methylene blue products in the United States under thi "grandfather" status for decades. (Countercl., ¶¶ 11, 31; PAC, ¶¶ 11, 36).

Provepharm, whose parent companies are based in France, "developed a process to manufacture a purer form of methylene blue" that would comply with the stricter limitations for metal catalyst impurities adopted by European regulatory bodies, and "obtained several patents purportedly covering their manufacturing process for the purer [*6] form of methylene blue" (the "Methylene Blue Patents"). (Countercl., ¶ 14; PAC, ¶ 14; see also Declaration of Kathy Grant ["Grant Decl."], Ex. 6-8[3]).

In 2011, Provepharm obtained approval from the European Medicines Agency to market its methylene blue product in Europe, (Countercl., ¶ 15; PAC, ¶ 16); and sought to obtain FDA approval of an NDA to market a "drug product in which methylene blue is the active pharmaceutical ingredient ('API')" under Section 505(b)(2) of the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act ("FDCA"). (Countercl., ¶¶ 16-17; PAC, ¶¶ 16-18). Provepharm ultimately obtained FDA approval for its drug product, ProvayBlue® methylene blue injection USP ("ProvayBlue®"), on April 8, 2016. (Compl., ¶ 1; Am. Ans., ¶ 1; Countercl., ¶ 17; PAC, ¶ 18). According to Akorn, "[a]fter Provepharm obtained approval for ProvayBlue®, Akorn and others cannot market methylene blue in the United States unless they file and obtain approval of their own NDA or otherwise received exemptions from such requirements from FDA." (Countercl., ¶ 31; PAC, ¶ 36).

In approving Provepharm's NDA, the FDA also awarded ProvayBlue® Orphan Drug Exclusivity ("ODE")[4] for the treatment of pediatric and adult patients with acquired methemoglobinemia. [*7] (Countercl., ¶¶ 19, 21; PAC, ¶¶ 20, 22). ODE runs for a period of seven years, during which the FDA "will not approve any other NDAs for the same API for the sam condition." (Countercl., ¶ 19; PAC, ¶ 20). However, the FDA may "approve other NDAs for t same API if they are directed to other conditions and do not include the orphan condition." (Countercl., ¶ 19; PAC, ¶ 20). Thus, although the FDA "cannot approve any other NDAs for the use of methylene blue to treat pediatric and adult patients with acquired methemoglobinemia until April 8, 2023[,] . . . [it can] approve other NDAs for the use of methylene blue for any other indication. . . ." (Countercl., ¶¶ 21, 32; PAC, ¶¶ 22, 37).

However, according to Akorn, "[w]hile Provepharm was obtaining approval from the FDA for ProvayBlue®, it was also soliciting the United States Pharmacopeia ('USP') to revise the official monograph for the API classified as methylene blue" in order to "foreclose any others from pursuing NDAs for the use of methylene blue for other indications."[5] (Countercl., ¶ 22; PAC, ¶ 23). Specifically, "[o]n or about May 24, 2013, Provepharm requested that [4] According to Akorn, "ODE is available to new drug products for which the approved indication is a disease or condition affecting fewer than 200,000 people in the United States, or if greater than 200,000 people, then there is no reasonable expectation that costs of research and development of the drug for the indication can be recovered by sales of the drug in the United States." (Countercl., ¶ 19; PAC, ¶ 20).

[5] According to Akorn, the USP "is a scientific nonprofit organization that sets standards for identity, strength, quality, and purity of medicines, food ingredients, and dietary supplements that are manufactured, distributed and consumed worldwide[,] . . . [which] are enforceable in the United States by the FDA . . . [and] are recognized and required under federal law." (Countercl., ¶ 23; PAC, ¶ 24). "When such medicines comply with the USP-NF [United States Pharmacopeia and National Formulary] standards, the products may be marketed and labelled as USP-compliant, generally by including 'USP' after the product name." (Countercl., ¶ 24; PAC, ¶ 25). According to Akorn, "[t]hat was how [its] methylene products were labeled because they complied at all times with the then-current USP-NF until Provepharm instigated the November 2016 changes." (PAC, ¶ 25).

USP revise the criteria for methylene blue API and methylene blue [*8] injection, i.e., a sterile solution of methylene blue in water for injection, to include the pentahydrate form of methylene blue—a different hydrate form of methylene blue that purportedly results from Provepharm's manufacturing process—and to change the standardized assay for other hydrate forms." (Countercl., ¶ 22; PAC, ¶ 23; Grant Decl., Ex. 17[6]).

"As a public standards-setting organization, the USP has an express policy of impartiality and of not favoring one manufacturer over another in setting its standards." (Countercl., ¶ 25; PAC, ¶ 26; Grant Decl., Ex. 4-5[7]). According to Akorn, in order "[t]o ensure impartiality and its policy of not favoring any one manufacturer over another, and 'because USP's standards are intended to be public standards available for the use and benefit of all parties, USP requests that sponsors disclose in their Requests for Revision whether any portion of the methods or procedures submitted is subject to patent or other sponsor-held intellectual property rights.'" (Countercl., ¶ 25; PAC, ¶ 27) (quoting Submissions Guideline at Grant Decl., Ex. 4).

Akorn alleges that Provepharm: (i) "violated clear USP rules and policies when it concealed the fact that [it] [*9] owned patents for the manufacturing process necessary to produce methylene blue in the form that [it] urged USP to adopt as [the] standard for methylene blue[,]"[8] (Countercl., ¶ 28; PAC, ¶ 29); (ii) "falsely asserted that the FDA required the inclusion of Provepharm's proposed methods and specifications[,]" (Countercl., ¶ 29; PAC, ¶ 34); and (iii) "failed to inform USP that the proposed methods and specifications 'required' by the FDA were originally proposed by Provepharm[] . . . [and] that in order to meet the 'required,' proposed specifications using the proposed methods, a company would necessarily need to manufacture methylene blue API using manufacturing processes allegedly covered by [Provepharm's Methylene Blue Patents]." (Countercl., ¶ 29; PAC, ¶ 34).

On July 29, 2016, "USP posted revisions for the methylene blue monographs, which required Provepharm's proposed specifications and assay testing method, and later adopted the revised monographs[,]" as a result of which "no other drug manufacturer can file an NDA having methylene blue API without producing the API in accordance with manufacturing processes allegedly covered by [Provepharm's Methylene Blue Patents]." [*10] (Countercl., ¶ 30; PAC, ¶ 35; see also Countercl., ¶ 32; PAC, ¶ 35). Akorn alleges that "as a result of Provepharm successfully petitioning the USP to revise the monographs for methylene blue and methylene blue injection, Akorn and others cannot submit their own NDAs for approval to market methylene blue without risking being the subject of suits for patent infringement." (Countercl., ¶ 32; PAC, ¶ 37).

[6] Since the counterclaims and proposed amended counterclaims specifically refer to the documents included in plaintiff's Exhibit 17, (Countercl., ¶ 22; PAC, ¶ 23), those documents are properly considered on this motion, as set forth below.

[7] Since the counterclaims and proposed amended counterclaims specifically refer to the "USP Guideline for Submitting Requests for Revision to USP-NF, General Information for All Submissions" ("Submissions Guideline"), and the USP Code of Ethics, (Countercl., ¶ 25; PAC, ¶ 26), those documents are properly considered on this motion, as set forth below.

[8] In its proposed amended counterclaims, Akorn additionally alleges, inter alia, (i) that Provepharm's June 30, 2014 submission to USP, which "is a 151-page document in which the following sentence appears: 'Methylene Blue drug substance is manufactured by Provepharm manufacturers using the patented method licensed by the Applicant[,]'" (the "Patented Method Statement"), (PAC, ¶ 30; see Grant Decl., Ex. 1 at 2992), did not disclose the existence of the Methylene Blue Patents to USP because (A) "[t]he first of the Methylene Blue Patents did not issue until July 1, 2014," and, thus, did not exist at the time of the June 30, 2014 submission, and (B) "there was no license between Provepharm and any manufacturer of the methylene blue drug substance for the Methylene Blue Patents[,]" and, thus, the Patented Method Statement was false[,]" (PAC, ¶ 31); (ii) that the USP "did not, in fact, appreciate" the Patented Method Statement as a disclosure of the Methylene Blue Patents because (A) the Patented Method Statement "did not identify any specific patents or patent applications[,] . . . did not have enough information for USP to understand the situation with respect to the Methylene Blue Patents[,] . . . [and] was insufficient for USP to understand that the Methylene Blue Patents existed or their relevance to the proposed monograph revision[,]" and (B) "USP did not even notice the Patented Method Statement[,]" (id., ¶ 32); (iii) that "[i]f USP had noticed the Patented Method Statement, and if the Patented Method Statement contained sufficient information for USP to understand the existence of the Methylene Blue Patents and their relevant [sic] to the proposed monograph revision, USP would have taken action to prevent the Methylene Blue Patents from affecting anyone's ability to use or meet a proposed revised monograph," including (A) requiring Provepharm to either abandon the Methylene Blue Patents or license them royalty-free, or, (B) if Provepharm refused, modifying the proposed monograph "so that the Methylene Blue Patents would not affect anyone's ability to use or meet a proposed revised monograph[,]" (id., ¶ 33); and (iv) that "[b]ut for Provepharm's failure to disclose the Methylene Blue Patents to USP, the ability of anyone, including Akorn, to use or meet the proposed revised monograph would not be affected by the Methylene Blue Patents." (Id.).

According to Akorn, "[t]he net result of Provepharm's two-pronged attack," (Countercl., ¶ 31; PAC, ¶ 36), i.e., obtaining FDA approval of ProvayBlue® with ODE for the treatment of pediatric and adult patients with acquired methemoglobinemia, as well as revision of the USP official monographs for methylene blue, "was the effective monopolization of the market for methylene blue in the United States." (Countercl., ¶ 31; PAC, ¶ 36). Akorn alleges that it "was forced to exit the market for its methylene blue in October of 2016, as they no longer conformed with the revised USP monograph, leaving Provepharm as the sole source of methylene blue in the United States and thus holding a monopoly in the relevant market[,]" (Countercl., ¶ 33; PAC, ¶ 38); and, alternatively, that "Provepharm obtained [*11] a dangerous probability of monopolizing the relevant market." (Countercl., ¶ 33; PAC, ¶ 38).

Akorn alleges that as a result of the change instigated to the methylene blue USP by Provepharm, its methylene blue product was removed from the market "earlier than what would have occurred had Provepharm only obtained an approved NDA[,]" (Countercl., ¶ 34; PAC, ¶ 39), because although its "grandfather" status would typically have allowed it to continue to sell its methylene blue products during a six (6)-to twelve (12)-month "transition period" after the FDA approved Provepharm's NDA, it could no longer use "the original [USP] standard to which its grandfathered methylene products conformed" and, thus, "could not manufacture and sell additional units of methylene products." (Countercl., ¶¶ 34-36; PAC, ¶¶ 39-41). According to Akorn, "[i]t was forced to exit the market in October of 2016 and remained so until June 2017, when the FDA permitted [it] to temporarily manufacture methylene blue using the expired USP standard[;]" and Provepharm "achieved actual monopolization in fact" during that approximately eight (8)-month period. (Countercl., ¶ 36; PAC, ¶ 41).

Akorn further alleges that the FDA [*12] has temporarily permitted it "to resume manufacturing and selling methylene blue products qualified against the expired original standard, . . . and [it] has re-entered the market, but at a substantially reduced market share that is artificially lower than would have occurred had Provepharm not instigated the change to the USP monographs." (Countercl., ¶¶ 37-38; PAC, ¶¶ 42-43). Akorn further alleges that in the process of its temporary re-entry into the market, it has "exhausted its supply of the expired original standard[,]" (Countercl., ¶ 38; PAC, ¶ 43); and that "[a]s a result of Provepharm instigating the change to the USP monographs, additional quantities of the expired original standard are no longer available" and it "cannot manufacture additional methylene blue products[,]" even if the FDA continues to request it to do so. (Countercl., ¶ 38; PAC, ¶ 43). According to Akorn, once it "exhausts its on-hand supply of methylene blue products, it will once again be forced from the market, and Provepharm will have once again achieved monopolization of the methylene blue market." (Countercl., ¶ 38; PAC, ¶ 43).

B. Procedural History

On December 5, 2017, Provepharm commenced this action [*13] against Akorn seeking, inter alia, damages and injunctive relief for Akorn's allegedly false advertising of its methylene blue product in violation of Section 43(a) of the Lanham Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1125(a), and Section 350-e(3) of the New York General Business Law (Counts I and V, respectively); unfair competition in violation of Section 43(a) of the Lanham Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1125(a), and the common law (Counts II and III, respectively); and deceptive trade practices in violation of Section 349(h) of the New York General Business Law (Count IV). Issue was joined by the service of an answer on behalf of Akorn on or about February 5, 2018.

Following a pre-motion conference before Judge Spatt on May 29, 2018, the parties filed a joint letter regarding their negotiated discovery schedule, which, inter alia, set August 27, 2018 as the "[f]inal date to amend the pleadings." (Docket Entry ["DE"] 32). On August 27, 2018, Akorn served an amended answer, inter alia, asserting two (2) counterclaims against Provepharm seeking damages and injunctive relief for Provepharm's alleged monopolization and attempted monopolization of the methylene blue market in the United States in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2. With respect to its first counterclaim for actual monopolization, Akorn alleges, inter alia, that Provepharm's anticompetitive [*14] conduct excluded it from the methylene blue market in the United States, as a result of which it "was unable to sell methylene blue products for several months, and even on its return to the methylene blue market, has suffered diminished sales of methylene blue products, resulting in substantial damages." (Countercl., ¶¶ 41-42; PAC, ¶¶ 46-47). With respect to its second counterclaim for attempted monopolization, Akorn alleges, inter alia, (i) that Provepharm, through "anticompetitive and exclusionary acts," "achieved a dangerous probability of success of monopolizing the relevant market[,] . . . [and] will maintain monopoly over the methylene blue injection USP in the United States[,]" (Countercl., ¶ 47; PAC, ¶ 52); and (ii) that "[a]s a result of being blocked from selling methylene blue, Akorn will suffer antitrust injury."[9] (Countercl., ¶ 47; PAC, ¶ 52).

Provepharm now moves pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure to dismiss Akorn's counterclaims against it in their entirety for failure to state a claim for relief; and Akorn moves pursuant to Rule 15(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure to amend its counterclaims to "include additional allegations based on newly-discovered evidence and testimony[;] . . . provide further factual support for [its] counterclaims[;] [*15] . . . [and] rebut the factual arguments that Provepharm made in its motion to dismiss." (Akorn's Memorandum of Law on Motion for Leave to Amend its Counterclaims ["Akorn Mem."] at 5).

III. Discussion

A. Motion to Amend

Initially, the branch of Provepharm's motion seeking dismissal of the counterclaims based upon Akorn's purported failure to comply with Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a)(2) is denied. Where, as here, a defendant files an amended answer that includes a counterclaim without seeking court permission under Rule 15(a)(2) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the plaintiff-counterdefendant may challenge the counterclaim in several ways: "(1) by a Rule 12(b)(6) motion if relevant undisputed facts appear on the face of the pleadings or in the record, (2) by a Rule 56 motion if relevant undisputed facts can be presented by affidavit, or (3) by an answer under Rule 8(c) if relevant facts are in dispute." GEOMC Co., Ltd. v. Calmare Therapeutics Inc., 918 F.3d 92, 101 (2d Cir. 2019). "In ruling on a motion to dismiss a new counterclaim, a district court can either assess the new counterclaim's legal sufficiency or exercise the discretion the court would have been entitled to use if the counterclaimant had moved under Rule 15 to file the new counterclaim." Id.

"Leave to amend should be 'freely give[n] ... when justice so requires,' Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a)(2), but 'should generally be denied in instances [*16] of futility, undue delay, bad faith or dilatory motive, repeated failure to cure deficiencies by amendments previously allowed, or undue prejudice to the non-moving party[.]'" United States ex rel. Ladas v. Exelis, Inc., 824 F.3d 16, 28 (2d Cir. 2016) (alterations in original) (quoting Burch v. Pioneer Credit Recovery, Inc., 551 F.3d 122, 126 (2d Cir. 2008)). "A proposed amendment to a complaint is futile when it could not withstand a motion to dismiss." F5 Capital v. Pappas, 856 F.3d 61, 89 (2d Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 473, 199 L. Ed. 2d 358 (2017) (quotations and citation omitted).

Where, as here, a party seeks to amend its pleading while a motion to dismiss is pending, "the Court has a variety of ways in which it may deal with the pending motion to dismiss, from denying the motion as moot to considering the merits of the motion in light of the amended [pleading]." Kilpakis v. JPMorgan Chase Fin. Co., LLC, 229 F. Supp. 3d 133, 139 (E.D.N.Y. 2017). Where, as here, "the proposed amended [pleading] does not seek to add new claims or parties, and the [opposing party] ha[s] had a sufficient opportunity to respond to the new pleading, then, for the purposes of procedural efficiency, the merits of the pending motion to dismiss ought to be considered in light of the proposed amended [pleading]." Id. Accordingly, the Court considers the merits of Provepharm's motion to dismiss as if it were directed at Akorn's proposed amended counterclaims to determine whether the proposed amendments are futile. [*17] [10]

[9] In its proposed amended counterclaims, Akorn also alleges with respect to its second counterclaim for attempted monopolization that Provepharm "had a specific intent to monopolize the relevant market[,] . . . [and] purposefully acted to wrongfully block anyone else, including specifically Akorn, from selling methylene blue in the United States[,] . . . [because] although FDA granted seven years of exclusivity to Provepharm for the very limited use of treating acquired methemoglobinemia, Provepharm's actions with USP to revise the methylene blue monographs will prevent Akorn and others from filing NDAs for any other indications of use, including for example the numerous 'off label' uses for which Akorn's methylene blue products and Provepharm's ProvayBlue® product are purchased." (PAC, ¶ 51).

B. Sufficiency of Claims

1. Standard of Review

The standard of review on a motion made pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure is that a party plead sufficient facts "to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). "A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009). The plausibility standard requires "more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully." Id. "[W]here the well-pleaded facts do not permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct, the complaint has alleged--but it has not 'show[n]'--'that the pleader is entitled to relief.'" Id. at 679, 129 S. Ct. 1937 (brackets in original) (quoting Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2)). "Determining whether a [pleading] states a plausible claim for relief will[] . . . be a context-specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense." Id.

"A pleading that offers 'labels and conclusions' or 'a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do.'" Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937 (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555, 127 S. Ct. 1955). "Nor does a [pleading] suffice if it tenders 'naked assertion[s]' devoid of 'further factual enhancement.'" Id. (quoting [*18] Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557, 127 S. Ct. 1955). "Factual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level, . . . on the assumption that all the allegations in the [pleading] are true (even if doubtful in fact)." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555-56, 127 S. Ct. 1955 (citations omitted).

In deciding a motion pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6), the Court must liberally construe the claims, accept all factual allegations in the complaint as true, and draw all reasonable inferences in favor of the pleader. See Kim v. Kimm, 884 F.3d 98, 102-03 (2d Cir. 2018); Elias v. Rolling Stone LLC, 872 F.3d 97, 104 (2d Cir. 2017). However, this tenet "is inapplicable to legal conclusions. Threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice." Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937. "While legal conclusions can provide the framework of a [pleading], they must be supported by factual allegations." Id. at 679, 129 S. Ct. 1937. "In keeping with these principles a court considering a motion to dismiss can choose to begin by identifying pleadings that, because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to the assumption of truth." Id.; see also Ruston v. Town Bd. for Town of Skaneateles, 610 F.3d 55, 59 (2d Cir. 2010).

Nonetheless, a party is not required to plead "specific evidence or extra facts beyond what is needed to make the claim plausible." Arista Records, LLC v. Doe 3, 604 F.3d 110, 120-21 (2d Cir. 2010); accord Pension Benefit Guar. Corp. ex rel. St. Vincent Catholic Med. Ctrs. Ret. Plan v. Morgan Stanley Inv. Mgmt. Inc., 712 F.3d 705, 729-30 (2d Cir. 2013). "When there are well-pleaded factual allegations, a court should assume their veracity and then determine [*19] whether they plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief." Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 679, 129 S. Ct. 1937.

In deciding a motion pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the Court must limit itself to the facts alleged in the pleading, which are accepted as true; to any documents attached to the pleading as exhibits or incorporated by reference therein; to matters of which judicial notice may be taken; or to documents upon the terms and effect of which the pleading "relies heavily" and which are, thus, rendered "integral" thereto. Chambers v. Time Warner, Inc., 282 F.3d 147, 152-53 (2d Cir. 2002); see also Nicosia v. Amazon.com, Inc., 834 F.3d 220, 230-31 (2d Cir. 2016). "A necessary prerequisite for taking into account materials extraneous to the complaint is that the plaintiff rely on the terms and effect of the document in drafting the complaint; mere notice or possession is not enough." Nicosia, 834 F.3d at 231 (emphasis in original) (quotations and citations omitted); see also Goel v. Bunge, Ltd., 820 F.3d 554, 559 (2d Cir. 2016) ("Merely mentioning a document in the complaint will not satisfy th[e] [integral to the complaint] standard; indeed, even offering limited quotations from the document is not enough." (quotations and citation omitted)). "This generally occurs when the material considered is a contract or other legal document containing obligations upon which the plaintiff's complaint stands or falls, but which for some reason—usually because [*20] the document, read in its entirety, would undermine the legitimacy of the plaintiff's claim—was not attached to the complaint." Nicosia, 834 F.3d at 231(quotations and citation omitted); accord Goel, 820 F.3d at 559. Moreover, "even if a document is 'integral' to the complaint, it must be clear on the record that no dispute exists regarding the authenticity or accuracy of the document[,] . . . [and] that there exist no material disputed issues of fact regarding the relevance of the document." Faulkner v. Beer, 463 F.3d 130, 134 (2d Cir. 2006) (citations omitted); accord Nicosia, 834 F.3d at 231.

Other than Provepharm's patents, (Grant Decl., Ex. 6-8); the USP Code of Ethics and Submissions Guideline, (id., Ex. 4 & 5); Provepharm's submission to the USP dated June 30, 2014, including the Patented Method Statement, (id., Ex. 1); and the documents submitted as Exhibit 17 to the declaration of Kathy Grant, all of which are specifically incorporated by reference in the proposed amended counterclaims, (see PAC, ¶¶ 14, 23, 26 and 30-33), the other extrinsic evidence submitted by Provepharm is not properly considered on this motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure because, inter alia, (i) none of it is attached to, or incorporated by reference in, the pleadings, nor does it contain matters on which judicial notice may [*21] properly be taken; and (ii) the counterclaims do not rely heavily upon the terms and effect of any of those documents such that they may properly be deemed as integral thereto, nor is it clear from the record that the documents are indisputably authentic or accurate. See Chambers, 282 F.3d at 152-53. Accordingly, pursuant to Rule 12(d) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the Court excludes all such extrinsic evidence, and the arguments based thereupon, from its consideration of this motion, and considers only the factual allegations in the complaint to which there is no dispute; the factual allegations in the counterclaims, which are assumed to be true for purposes of this motion only; and the seven (7) aforementioned exhibits that are incorporated by reference in the proposed amended counterclaims.

2. Section 2 of the Sherman Act

"Section 2 of the Sherman Act makes it an offense to 'monopolize, or attempt to monopolize ... any part of the trade or commerce among the several States.'" New York ex rel. Schneiderman v. Actavis PLC, 787 F.3d 638, 651 (2d Cir. 2015) (quoting 15 U.S.C. § 2). As explained by the Supreme Court,

> "The purpose of the [Sherman] Act is not to protect businesses from the working of the market; it is to protect the public from the failure of the market. The law directs itself not against conduct which is competitive, even severely so, but against [*22] conduct which unfairly tends to destroy competition itself. It does so not out of solicitude for private concerns but out of concern for the public interest. . . . Thus, this Court and other courts have been careful to avoid constructions of § 2 which might chill competition, rather than foster it."

Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447, 458, 113 S. Ct. 884, 122 L. Ed. 2d 247 (1993) (citations omitted). Accordingly, the conduct of a single firm, governed by § 2 of the Sherman Act, is "unlawful only when it actually monopolizes or dangerously threatens to do so." Id. at 459, 113 S. Ct. 884.

However, "there is no heightened pleading standard in antitrust cases[,]" Wacker v. JP Morgan Chase & Co, 678 F. App'x 27, 29 (2d Cir. Feb. 1, 2017) (summary order) (quoting Concord Assocs., L.P. v. Entm't Props. Trust, 817 F.3d 46, 52 (2d Cir. 2016)); and on a motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the pleader "need only 'raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of illegality.'" Id. (quoting Mayor & City Council of Baltimore, Md. v. Citigroup Inc., 709 F.3d 129, 135 (2d Cir. 2013)).

"To establish monopolization in violation of § 2, a plaintiff must prove not only that the defendant possessed monopoly power in the relevant market, but that it willfully acquired or maintained that power 'as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident.'" Actavis, 787 F.3d at 651 (quoting Verizon Commc'ns Inc. v. Law Offices of Curtis V. Trinko, LLP, 540 U.S. 398, 407, 124 S. Ct. 872, 157 L. Ed. 2d 823 (2004)); accord Geneva Pharms. Tech. Corp. v. Barr Labs. Inc., 386 F.3d 485, 495 (2d Cir. 2004). In order to "demonstrate attempted monopolization a plaintiff must prove (1) that the defendant has engaged [*23] in predatory or anticompetitive conduct with (2) a specific intent to monopolize and (3) a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power." Spectrum Sports, 506 U.S. at 456, 113 S. Ct. 884. Thus, unlike actual monopolization, attempted monopolization "requires a finding of specific intent."[11] Actavis, 787 F.3d at 651; see also Aspen Skiing Co. v. Aspen Highlands Skiing Corp., 472 U.S. 585, 602, 105 S. Ct. 2847, 86 L. Ed. 2d 467 (1985) (holding that an attempted monopolization claim requires proof of "a 'specific intent' to accomplish the forbidden objective," i.e., "an intent which goes beyond the mere intent to do the act[,]" whereas on a claim for actual monopolization, "evidence of intent is merely relevant to the question whether the challenged conduct is fairly characterized as 'exclusionary' or 'anticompetitive' . . . or 'predatory.' (quotations and citations omitted)); Tops Mkts., Inc. v. Quality Mkts., Inc., 142 F.3d 90, 101 (2d Cir. 1998) ("Although the completed offense of monopolization requires only a general intent, a specific intent to destroy competition or build monopoly is essential to guilt for the mere attempt." (quotations and citation omitted)).

The latter element of an attempted monopolization claim, i.e., a dangerous probability of actual monopolization, generally requires: (i) a definition of the relevant product and geographic market and examination of the defendant's market power, Spectrum Sports, 506 U.S. at 455, 459, 113 S. Ct. 884, i.e., "the defendant's [*24] ability to lessen or destroy competition in that market[,]" id. at 456, 113 S. Ct. 884; and (ii) a showing of "more than intent alone." Id. at 457-58, 113 S. Ct. 884. Thus, "proof of unfair or predatory conduct alone is [not] sufficient to make out the offense of attempted monopolization." Id. at 457, 113 S. Ct. 884. A defendant "may not be liable for attempted monopolization under § 2 of the Sherman Act absent proof of a dangerous probability that they would monopolize a particular market and specific intent to monopolize." Id. at 459, 113 S. Ct. 884.

a. Monopoly Power

"Monopoly power is 'the power to control prices or exclude competition[,]'" Geneva, 386 F.3d at 500 (quoting United States v. E.I. Du Pont de Nemours & Co., 351 U.S. 377, 391, 76 S. Ct. 994, 100 L. Ed. 1264 (1956)), which "can be proven directly through evidence of control over prices or the exclusion of competition, or . . . inferred from a firm's large percentage share of the relevant market." Id.; see also PepsiCo., Inc. v. Coca-Cola Co., 315 F.3d 101, 108 (2d Cir. 2002) ("The pertinent inquiry in a monopolization claim . . . is whether the defendant has engaged in improper conduct that has or is likely to have the effect of controlling prices or excluding competition, thus creating or maintaining market power. In the absence of [such] direct measurements of a defendant's ability to control prices or exclude competition, however, market power necessarily must be determined by reference to the area of effective competition—which, [*25] in turn, is determined by reference to a specific, defined product market. . . . Once a relevant market is determined, the defendant's share in that market can be used as a proxy for market power." (quotations and citations omitted)). "Once the relevant market is determined, [courts] consider a variety of factors in addition to the defendant's market share, including the strength of competition, barriers to entry, and the probable development of the market, . . . in order to determine whether there is a dangerous probability that, left unchecked, the defendant will attain monopoly power, i.e., the ability (1) to price substantially above the competitive level and (2) to persist in doing so for a significant period without erosion by new entry or expansion." AD/SAT, Div. of Skylight, Inc. v. Associated Press, 181 F.3d 216, 226-27 (2d Cir. 1999) (quotations and citation omitted); see also Tops Mkts., 142 F.3d at 100 ("In considering the likelihood of achieving monopoly power, we . . . consider[] the defendant's relevant market share in light of other market characteristics, including barriers to entry[,]" as well as strength of the competition, the probable development of the industry, the nature of the anticompetitive conduct and the elasticity of consumer demand). "[A] lesser degree of market [*26] power may establish an attempted monopolization claim than that necessary to establish a completed [or actual] monopolization claim." Tops Mkts., 142 F.3d at 100.

However, "[t]o safeguard the incentive to innovate, the possession of monopoly power will not be found unlawful unless it is accompanied by an element of anticompetitive conduct." Verizon, 540 U.S. at 407, 124 S. Ct. 872 (emphasis in original); see also Actavis, 787 F.3d at 652 ("Product innovation generally benefits consumers and inflicts harm on competitors, so courts look for evidence of exclusionary or anticompetitive effects in order to distinguish between conduct that defeats a competitor because of efficiency and consumer satisfaction and conduct that impedes competition through means other than competition on the merits." "Conduct may be characterized as exclusionary if it does not further competition on the merits or does so in an unnecessarily restrictive way." Merced Irrigation Dist. v. Barclays Bank PLC, 165 F. Supp. 3d 122, 142 (S.D.N.Y. 2016) (quotations and citation omitted); see also *Aspen Skiing, 472 U.S. at 605 n. 32, 105 S. i. Anticompetitive Conduct

In this Circuit, the bar for showing that a party has engaged in unlawful anticompetitive conduct "is a low one." IQ Dental, 924 F.3d at 63. Although "product improvement alone is [not] anticompetitive[,]" Actavis, 787 F.3d at 653-54, when such conduct is combined "with some other conduct, the overall effect of which is to coerce consumers rather than persuade them on the merits, . . . and to impede [*28] competition, . . . [the] actions are anticompetitive under the Sherman Act." Id. at 654 (citations omitted).

There is no dispute that the relevant market in this case is the methylene blue market in the United States. The counterclaims and proposed amended counterclaims allege sufficient facts from which it may reasonably be inferred, inter alia, (i) that Provepharm possesses monopoly power, i.e., the power to exclude competition, in the relevant market, or at least did so for the approximately eight (8)-month period from when the USP revised the monographs in accordance with Provepharm's request until the FDA requested that Akorn temporarily re-enter the market to manufacture and sell methylene blue products qualified against the expired original standard;[12] and (ii) that Provepharm "willfully sought to maintain or attempted to maintain that monopoly in violation of § 2[,]" Actavis, 787 F.3d at 652, by, inter alia, combining its alleged improvement of its methylene blue product, for which it sought and obtained FDA approval, with its allegedly anticompetitive conduct, i.e., its solicitation of the USP to revise the official monograph for methylene blue to include the pentahydrate form, while failing to disclose its patent [*29] rights on the manufacturing process allegedly necessary to produce that hydrate form of methylene blue, and to change the standardized assay for other hydrate forms, in order to significantly heighten barriers to entry and substantially foreclose competition in the methylene blue market in the United States. See generally Broadcom Corp. v. Qualcomm Inc., 501 F.3d 297, 308, 314 (3d Cir. 2007)[13] ("[C]onduct that undermines the procompetitive benefits of private standard setting may, at least in some circumstances, be deemed anticompetitive under antitrust law. . . . We hold that (1) in a consensus-oriented private standard-setting environment, (2) a patent holder's intentionally false promise . . . [to a standard-determining organization ('SDO')], (3) coupled with [the] SDO's reliance on that [misrepresentation] when including the technology in a standard, and (4) the patent holder's subsequent breach of that promise, is actionable anticompetitive conduct. . . . Deception in a consensus-driven private standard-setting environment harms the competitive process by obscuring the costs of including proprietary technology in a standard and increasing the likelihood that patent rights will confer monopoly power on the patent holder. . . ." (quotations and citations [*30] omitted)); e.g. Amphastar Pharms., Inc. v. Momenta Pharm., Inc., 297 F. Supp. 3d 222, 230 (D. Mass. 2018) ("Intentional misrepresentations designed to deceive a standard-setting organization can constitute an antitrust violation. . . . By incorporating patented technology into a standard, the patent-holder obtains market power because adoption of the standard eliminates alternatives to the patented technology.")[14]

[12] Provepharm's assertion that "[t]he FDA's approval of ProvayBlue® led the USP to update and revise the monograph for methylene blue to mirror the FDA's approved standards for this injectable drug[,]" (Plaintiff's Reply Memorandum of Law in Further Support of its Motion to Dismiss ["Plf. Reply"] at 2), appears to be contradicted by the documents incorporated by reference in the counterclaims that are attached as exhibit 17 to the declaration of Kathy Grant. Those documents indicate, in relevant part, (i) that Provepharm commenced the process of seeking revision of the methylene blue monograph on or before May 24, 2013, i.e., approximately three (3) years before it obtained FDA approval of its NDA, because the existing monograph was "old," did not "take into account the recent knowledge on the [different] hydrate forms of the Methylene Blue," and "describe[d] the Methylene Blue as trihydrate only[;]" (ii) that since Provepharm's API "contains mainly the pentahydrate form, which is the most stable form[,] . . . it doesn't strictly conform to the USP monograph;" and (iii) that Provepharm's objective in seeking revision of the monograph was "to have a product compliant with USP" and, thus, it was "look[ing] for the most efficient process to update the monograph in the meantime of the review of [its] NDA." (Grant Decl., Ex. 17 at 628).

It may also reasonably be inferred from the factual allegations in Akorn's counterclaims and proposed amended counterclaims, including, inter alia, Provepharm's substantial share in the relevant market following the USP's revision of the methylene blue monograph, even following Akorn's limited re-entry into the market at the request of the FDA; the weakness of its competition; and the barriers to entry or re-entry into the market imposed by the revisions to the USP monograph, combined with the OED restrictions, that there is a dangerous probability that Provepharm will attain monopoly power in the methylene blue market in the United States sufficient to state a plausible claim for attempted monopolization under Section 2 of the Sherman Act. Contrary to Provepharm's contention, the vague and ambiguous Patented Method Statement buried within its approximately [*31] one hundred fifty-one (151)-page submission to USP, dated June 30, 2014, does not conclusively establish that it "actively disclosed" its patent rights to the USP during the revision process, so as to directly contradict Akorn's claim of anticompetitive conduct or render it implausible. (Plaintiff's Memorandum of Law in Support of Motion to Dismiss Counterclaims ["Plf. Mem."] at 14). At best, the Patented Method Statement may affect the weight and credibility of Akorn's counterclaims, but the factual allegations both in the original counterclaims, and as amplified by the proposed amended counterclaims, which are presumed true for purposes of this motion, are nonetheless sufficient "to raise a right to relief above the speculative level." Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S. Ct. at 1959; see generally Hogan v. Fischer, 738 F.3d 509, 514 (2d Cir. 2013) ("In ruling on a motion pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), the duty of a court is merely to assess the legal feasibility of the complaint, not to assay the weight of the evidence which might be offered in support thereof.") "The issue is not whether a [claimant] will ultimately prevail but whether the claimant is entitled to offer evidence to support the claims." Walker v. Schult, 717 F.3d 119, 124 (2d Cir. 2013).

The case Rambus Inc. v. F.T.C., 522 F.3d 456, 380 U.S. App. D.C. 431 (D.C. Cir. 2008), cited by Provepharm, is inapposite as, inter alia, it did not involve a motion [*32] to dismiss at the pleadings stage. Indeed, the court specifically distinguished the Broadcom case from the circumstances of that case on the basis that Broadcom "simply reversed a grant of dismissal" and, thus, its ruling "that deceit lured the SSO [standard-setting organization] away from non-proprietary technology" could not help the Federal Trade Commission ("FTC") in Rambus because the FTC was unable to find, after "lengthy proceedings," that the alleged monopolist's behavior caused the SSO's choice.[15] Id. at 466. In other words, Rambus involved a failure of proof, not a failure of pleading.

[13] The plaintiff in Broadcom alleged that the defendant monopolized a market by "by falsely promising to license its patents according to the fair, reasonable, and non-discriminatory ('FRAND') terms set by the European Telecommunications Standards Institute ('ETSI') and its standards-defining organizations ('SDO') counterparts in the United States, but then reneging on those promises after it succeeded in having its technology included in the standard." 501 F.3d at 306.

[14] In Amphastar, the plaintiff alleged that the defendants "wrongfully acquir[ed] monopoly power by deceiving the USP into adopting a standard which they later claimed was covered by defendants' patents." Id., 297 F. Supp. 3d at 227.

[15] Rambus alternatively held that to the extent that Broadcom's ruling "may have rested on a supposition that there is a cognizable violation of the Sherman Act when a lawful monopolist's deceit has the effect of raising prices (without an effect on

The cases Provepharm cites that were decided at the pleadings stage, CriMar Sys., Inc. v. Cisco Sys., Inc., 72 F. Supp. 3d 1012 (N.D. Cal. 2014); Apple Inc. v. Samsung Elecs. Co., Ltd., No. 11-cv-1846, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 120416, 2011 WL 4948567 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 18, 2011); and Townshend v. Rockwell Int'l Corp., No. C99-0400SBA, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5070, 2000 WL 433505 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 28, 2000), are distinguishable. Apple involved the development of technical industry standards in the wireless communications industry and, specifically, the SSOs development of a UMTS standard, designed to support increased speeds and bandwidth capacity on mobile devices, which ultimately incorporated the defendants' patented technology that the defendants had failed to disclose to the SSOs. Id., 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 120416, 2011 WL 4948567, * 1-2. There is no indication [*33] in that case that there was a pre-existing UMTS standard that had already been adopted by the SSOs which the defendants merely sought to revise. The district court, relying upon Rambus, 522 F.3d 456, 380 U.S. App. D.C. 431, held that a pleader alleging anticompetitive conduct based on a theory of failure to disclose intellectual property rights ("IPR") to an SSO during a standard-setting process, "must allege that there was an alternative technology that the SSO was considering during the standard setting process and that the SSO would have adopted an alternative standard had it known of the patent holder's intellectual property rights." Apple, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 120416, 2011 WL 4948567, at *5. The court further held that, without more, such as "factual allegations that there were other technologies considered by the SSO at the time of standard setting," Apple's conclusory allegations that "[h]ad Samsung properly disclosed the existence of its IPR, the relevant SSO would have selected a viable alternative technology or would have decided not to incorporate that proposal into the standard[,]" were insufficient to state a plausible claim for monopolization under Section 2 of the Sherman Act. 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 120416, [WL] at * 6.

Similarly, the anticompetitive conduct alleged in Townshend involved, inter alia, the counterclaim-defendants' [*34] conduct during the standards-setting process before the International Telecommunications Union ("ITU"). Specifically, the counterclaims alleged, inter alia, that the counterclaim-defendants lobbied the ITU to adopt an industry standard for the operation of 56K PCM modem chipset products incorporating their patented technology (the "V.90 standard") without disclosing that they had filed a trade secret action in state court against the counterclaim-plaintiff, or that they intended to file a patent infringement suit against the counterclaim-plaintiff. Id., 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5070, 2000 WL 433505, at * 1-2, 11. Like Apple, there is no indication in Townshend that there was a pre-existing V.90 standard that had already been adopted by the SSO which the defendants merely sought to revise or amend. Moreover, the district court in Townshend merely distinguished the case upon which the counterclaim-plaintiff relied, i.e., an FTC case finding anticompetitive conduct based upon a firm's lobbying for an industry standard incorporating its patented technology without disclosing its patent rights to the SSO during the process, from the case before it on the basis that, unlike the FTC case, the counterclaim-defendants' patents issued only after the ITU [*35] had adopted the V.90 standard; the counterclaim-defendants had informed the ITU about their pending patent applications covering the 56K chipset modem technology; and the counterclaims did not assert that the ITU "could have adopted a V.90 standard which did not encompass [their] technology," whereas in the FTC case, "the standards-setting body was choosing among options, and there was a possibility that they could have adopted a standard which did not incorporate [the firm's] patents." 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5070, [WL] at * 11. In contrast to Apple and Townshend, this case involves the revision to an existing official monograph in the USP-NF that was initiated by Provepharm, not the development of a new standard or monograph; and there is no indication that the USP would have revised the existing monograph for methylene blue but for Provepharm's request therefor. In other words, assuming the truth of the factual allegations in the counterclaims and proposed amended counterclaims, the USP had already adopted an official standard for methylene blue in the USP-NF which Provepharm sought to revise, purportedly without disclosing its patent rights on the manufacturing processes allegedly necessary to comply with the revised [*36] monograph it requested. Drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of Akorn as required on this motion, since there was an existing official monograph for methylene blue in the USP-NF, it may reasonably be inferred that had Provepharm disclosed its patent rights to USP, USP would not have revised the methylene blue monograph at all, much less as requested by Provepharm. Thus, even assuming, arguendo, that a party asserting a claim under Section 2 of the Sherman Act based upon a failure to disclose intellectual property rights to an SSO must plead that an alternative standard or technology which did not incorporate the defendant's intellectual property rights was available in order to withstand dismissal at the pleadings stage, Akorn's counterclaims plausibly state such a claim.[16]

Although ChriMar similarly involved amendments to an existing industry standard, that case is nonetheless also distinguishable from this case. In that case, the counterclaims alleged, inter alia, that the counterclaim-defendant, as a participant in the standards-setting process, was required, but failed, to disclose to the SSO, i.e., the Institute of Electrical and Electronics Engineers ("IEEE"), [*37] its belief that its patent was essential to the proposed amendments to the existing industry standard for Power over Ethernet-enabled products. ChriMar, 72 F. Supp.3d at 1015-1016. There is no indication in that case as to who sponsored the amendments ultimately adopted by the IEEE; only that the counterclaim-defendant was a participant in the standards-setting process and, as such, had a duty to disclose any patents it "believed to be infringed by the practice of the proposed standard" pursuant to the IEEE's "patent disclosure policy." Id., at 1015. In addition, there is no indication in that case as to the counterclaim-defendant's market share in the relevant market. Accordingly, the district court found, in relevant part, that the counterclaims failed "to sufficiently allege market power," i.e., that the counterclaim-defendant had acquired sufficient monopoly power, because they did not "clearly allege that the IEEE would have adopted an alternative standard had it known about" the counterclaim-defendant's patent or position with respect to its patent. 72 F. Supp. 3d at 1019.

Unlike ChriMar, the counterclaims in this case contain sufficient factual allegations from which it may reasonably be inferred that Provepharm acquired sufficient monopoly power [*38] in the relevant market based upon, inter alia, (i) its solicitation of the USP to revise the pre-existing official monograph to include a different hydrate form of methylene blue that purportedly results from Provepharm's patented manufacturing process, without disclosing its patent rights to the USP, plausibly suggesting that the USP would not have revised the existing monograph for methylene blue as requested by Provepharm had Provepharm disclosed its patent rights; (ii) the barriers to entry or re-entry into the relevant market as a result of USP's adoption of the revised monograph requested by Provepharm; and (iii) Provepharm's substantial market share in the relevant market following USP's adoption of the revised monograph it requested. *See, e.g. Actividentity Corp. v. Intercede Grp. PLC, No. C 08-4577, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 132206, 2009 WL 8674284, at * 4 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 11, 2009)* (finding that allegations that the alleged monopolist had approximately ninety percent (90%) of the relevant market and failed to disclose its intellectual property rights to the SSO before the standards it adopted had "garnered significant market acceptance;" that the SSO "would have changed the recently-adopted standard but for [the alleged monopolist's] failure to disclose"; and that as a result of the alleged monopolist's failure [*39] to disclose, it "obtained a monopoly market share as the market became 'locked in' to the standard," were sufficient to state a monopolization claim under Section 2 of the Sherman Act). Indeed, the USP Submissions Guideline reveals the importance of intellectual property rights in the standards-setting process, (see Grant Decl. 4 at 1-2, 4), and, contrary to Provepharm's contention, can be read to apply to patents on manufacturing processes, as well as on testing and assaying methods and procedures.[17] Accordingly, [16] The Court is not necessarily persuaded that this is a proper pleading standard, as opposed to an evidentiary standard. Apple relies on Rambus to hold that the pleader "must allege that there was an alternative technology that the SSO was considering during the standard setting process and that the SSO would have adopted an alternative standard had it known of the patent holder's intellectual property rights." *Apple, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 120416, 2011 WL 4948567, at 5. However, as set forth above, Rambus involved a failure of proof, not a failure of pleading. Moreover, Townshend did not set forth a pleading standard at all with respect to claims alleging anticompetitive conduct based upon alleged misconduct before an SSO; it merely distinguished two (2) cases based upon their facts. However, since Akorn's counterclaims allege sufficient facts suggesting the possibility that USP would not have revised the existing official monograph for methylene blue as requested by Provepharm had Provepharm disclosed its patent rights during the revision process, it is unnecessary to decide this issue.

[17] The Submissions Guideline provides, in pertinent part, that "because USP's standards are intended to be public standards available for the use and benefit of all parties, USP requests that sponsors disclose in their Requests for Revision whether any portion of the methods or procedures submitted is subject to patent or other sponsor-held intellectual property rights. In cases where patented methods, procedures or materials required for compendial tests and assays (such as RS or photomicrographs) are proposed, USP may seek assistance from the sponsor in in obtaining clearance or license for use by any persons seeking to use or apply a USP public standard incorporating such method, procedure or material, and may consider other approaches the counterclaims and proposed amended counterclaims contain sufficient factual allegations to state a plausible claim that Provepharm engaged in anticompetitive conduct by soliciting the USP to revise the official monograph for methylene blue without disclosing its patent rights with respect to the manufacturing process necessary to produce the methylene blue in the hydrate form incorporated in the revised standard; and that USP would not have revised its official monograph for methylene blue but for Provepharm's alleged conduct.

ii. Antitrust Injury

The Second Circuit has "established a three-part test for determining whether the plaintiff has alleged an antitrust injury: [*40] (1) the court must identify the practice complained of and the reasons such a practice is or might be anticompetitive, . . . (2) the court must identify the actual injury the plaintiff alleges [] which requires [it] to look to the ways in which the plaintiff claims it is in a worse position as a consequence of the defendant's conduct, . . . and (3) the court compares the anticompetitive effect of the specific practice at issue to the actual injury the plaintiff alleges. . . ." IQ Dental, 924 F.3d at 62-63 (quotations, alterations and citations omitted).

Akorn has sufficiently alleged that Provepharm's anticompetitive conduct, i.e., its alleged misrepresentations to the USP during the standards-revision process, affected the methylene blue market in the United States, and that Akorn's sales of its methylene blue product suffered as a result, sufficient to state a plausible claim of actual antitrust injury.[18] See, e.g. IQ Dental, 924 F.3d at 63-64 (finding that allegations that the defendants' anticompetitive conduct affected the market, and that the plaintiff's sales suffered as a result, "is the type of injury the antitrust laws were designed to prevent" because the plaintiff "is entitled to conduct its business in a market that is not infected [*41] with an anticompetitive distortion.") Moreover, assuming the truth of Akorn's allegations, inter alia, including the solicitation of other Requests for Revision that use alternative methods or procedures. USP reserves the right to indicate in a resulting monograph or general chapter whether methods or procedures are subject to such intellectual property rights." For purposes of this motion, all reasonable inferences must be construed in favor of the non-moving party, and it may reasonably be inferred from that entire provision that sponsors, such as Provepharm, are required to disclose their patents on "any portion of the methods or procedures submitted," including manufacturing processes, to the USP in their Requests for Revision.

[18] In asserting that the counterclaims fails to state a plausible claim of antitrust injury, and is barred by the Noerr-Pennington doctrine, Provepharm focuses upon its "right to obtain NDA approval for ProvayBlue®, and with it Orphan Drug Exclusivity[,]" (Plf. Mem. at 18), seemingly ignoring that the anticompetitive conduct alleged is Provepharm's purported deception in sponsoring the revised methylene blue standard before the USP without disclosing its patent applications directed to the revised standard, which, in combination with the FDA approval of its NDA, operated to reduce consumer choice, significantly heighten barriers to entry, and substantially foreclose competition in the methylene blue market in the United States. Provepharm's petitioning of the USP, a private standards-setting organization, for a revised methylene blue standard "generally does not trigger Noerr-Pennington protection." Amphastar Pharms. Inc. v. Momenta Pharms., Inc., 850 F.3d 52, 56 (1st Cir. 2017) (citing Allied Tube & Conduit Corp. v. Indian Head, Inc., 486 U.S. 492, 500, 108 S. Ct. 1931, 100 L. Ed. 2d 497 (1988)); *see also Hospital Auth. of. Metro. Gov't of Nashville v. Momenta Pharm., Inc., No. 3:15-1100, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 136004, 2016 WL 5724306, at * 15-16 (M.D. Tenn. Sept. 29, 2016)*, report and recommendation adopted in relevant part and rejected on other grounds, 244 F. Supp. 3d 705, 715-16 (M.D. Tenn. Mar. 21, 2017) (finding that since the crux of the plaintiff's antitrust claim was the defendants' alleged misconduct before the USP, a private standards-setting organization, the Noerr-Pennington doctrine was inapplicable).

Provepharm also apparently ignores the fact that the FDA's award of ODE to ProvayBlue® is for the treatment of pediatric and adult patients with acquired methemoglobinemia only; it allegedly does not prevent Akorn and others from submitting their own NDA for approval to market products having methylene blue API for any other indication or use, or from manufacturing and selling any such product under an approved NDA. Assuming the truth of the allegations in the counterclaims, it is Provepharm's alleged anticompetitive conduct, not the limited ODE protection, which restricts Akorn and other drug manufacturers from manufacturing and selling products with methylene blue API in the United States under their own NDA for any other use than that covered by the ODE, because the manufacturing process purportedly necessary to produce methylene blue in the form adopted by the USP in the revised monograph is allegedly covered by Provepharm's patents. Moreover, since the counterclaims plausibly allege that Akorn and other drug manufacturers would be subject to suits for patent infringement for their marketing of methylene blue, not merely the submission of their own NDAs for FDA approval, the safe harbor provision of the Patent Act, 35 U.S.C. § 271(e)(1), is not applicable.

that Provepharm's alleged anticompetitive conduct effectively prevents or delays any other drug manufacturer's entry or re-entry into the market because they cannot seek an NDA to market any product having methylene blue API in accordance with USP's revised monograph without producing the API in accordance with Provepharm's patented manufacturing processes and, thus, without infringing upon Provepharm's patent rights, such conduct "does not simply harm a competitor or two, but threatens to reduce competition in the [methylene blue] market, . . . [and] is precisely the type that the antitrust laws were designed to protect against."[19] Actavis, 787 F.3d at 661 (quotations and citation omitted); *see, e.g. U.S. ex rel. Krahling v. Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, Defendant's fraudulent misrepresentations about Defendant's own product, coupled with the unique facts of this case (e.g., the 100% monopoly of the market and the arguable statutory and contractual duties to disclose information) create the basis for an antitrust claim that Defendant willfully [*42] maintained monopoly power through exclusionary tactics. Plaintiffs have argued sufficient facts to sustain a claim for proximate causation, detailing the significant barriers that other companies would face to enter the Mumps vaccine market.")

Akorn's allegations that Provepharm's purportedly deceptive conduct during the standards-setting process before the USP led to the revision of the official methylene blue monograph and the subsequent exclusion of Akorn from the relevant market, at least for the period from October 2016 until June 2017, and from when Akorn's remaining product sells out; and that Akorn cannot seek an NDA to market any product having methylene blue API in accordance with USP's revised standards without producing the API in accordance with Provepharm's patented manufacturing processes and, thus, without infringing upon Provepharm's patent rights, are sufficient to state a plausible [*44] claim that Provepharm's conduct before the USP was a material cause of the antitrust injury. See, e.g. Amphastar, 297 F. Supp. 3d at 228 (finding that the plaintiff's allegations that the defendant's deceptive

[19] Provepharm's contentions regarding the merits of Akorn's patent allegations are improper on a motion to dismiss at the pleadings stage. Since Rule 8(a)(2) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure only requires a pleading to contain "a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief," Akorn's counterclaims need not provide further "analysis," "explanation" or "more of a factual basis;" nor conclusive or "self-evident" proof of any fact. (Plf. Mem. at 23). While Provepharm contends that its patents protect only "one method for purifying methylene blue, [and that] it is not self-evident that this is the only method[,]" (Plf. Mem. at 23) (emphasis omitted), "there remain fact-intensive questions about the feasibility, availability and even existence of [any] alternative[] [methods]." Amphastar, 297 F. Supp. 3d at 229. "The existence of alternatives is a factual question inappropriate for resolution on a motion to dismiss." Id.; see, e.g. In re Actos End-Payor Antitrust Litig., 848 F.3d 89, 101 (2d Cir. 2017) (rejecting the defendant's argument that the plaintiff's causation theory was implausible because it failed "to rule out a litany of alternative possible causes of [the plaintiff's] delayed market entry," because "[w]hile it [was] possible that one or more of th[o]se factors may turn out to be barriers to plaintiff's causation theory at later stages of the litigation, they do not mandate dismissing the complaint [at the pleadings stage]. . . . Dismissal at this early stage on the basis of speculation about possible and not inherently more plausible alternative causes would be premature.") conduct in front of the USP led to the approval of the [patented standard] and the subsequent exclusion of [the plaintiff] from the marketplace[;] [and that] [t]he adoption of the [patented standard] by the USP made the FDA's approval of the sale of enoxaparin by [the plaintiff] conditional on its use of an infringing procedure[,] . . . adequately pled that the defendants' conduct at the USP was a material cause of the antitrust injury.") Accordingly, Akorn's proposed amended counterclaims are not futile and Provepharm's motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure ism thus, denied in its entirety. The Second Circuit has "referred to the prejudice to the opposing party resulting from a proposed amendment as among the most important reasons to deny leave to amend." AEP Energy Servs. Gas Holding Co. v. Bank of Am., N.A., 626 F.3d 699, 725 (2d Cir. 2010) (quotations and citation omitted); see also Pasternack v. Shrader, 863 F.3d 162, 174 (2d Cir. 2017) ("The rule in this Circuit has been to allow a party to amend its pleadings in the absence of a showing by the nonmovant of prejudice or bad faith." (quotations and citation omitted)). "Amendment may be prejudicial when, [*45] among other things, it would require the opponent to expend significant additional resources to conduct discovery and prepare for trial[;] . . . significantly delay the resolution of the dispute[,]" AEP Energy, 626 F.3d at 725-26 (quotations and citation omitted); accord City of New York v. Group Health Inc., 649 F.3d 151, 158 (2d Cir. 2011), or "prevent the plaintiff from bringing a timely action in another jurisdiction." Pasternack, 863 F.3d at 174. "[M]ere delay, [] absent a showing of bad faith or undue prejudice, does not provide a basis for a district court to deny the right to amend[;] . . . [n]or can complaints of the time, effort and money [] expended in litigating the matter, without more, constitute prejudice sufficient to warrant denial of leave to amend." Id. (quotations, alterations and citations omitted).

C. Prejudice

Since the proposed amendments merely assert additional facts in support of Akorn's original counterclaims; do not require additional fact discovery; and will not significantly delay the resolution of this action, Provepharm will not be prejudiced by them. Indeed, although Provepharm indicates that fact discovery is now closed and that amendments in response to a dispositive motion are disfavored, it does not indicate that it needs any additional fact discovery as a result of the amendments; [*46] a "second motion to dismiss" will not be required since the Court has considered Provepharm's motion to dismiss as if it was directed to the proposed amended counterclaims; and neither party has yet moved for summary judgment.[20] Accordingly, Akorn's motion to amend its counterclaims is granted and the proposed amended counterclaims are accepted for filing nunc pro tunc.

IV. Conclusion

For the reasons set forth above, Provepharm's motion to dismiss Akorn's counterclaims against it pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure is denied in its entirety; Akorn's motion to amend its counterclaims pursuant to Rule 15(a)(2) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure is granted; and Akorn's proposed amended counterclaims are accepted for filing nunc pro tunc.

SO ORDERED.

[20] Even assuming, arguendo, that Akorn must establish "good cause" pursuant to Rule 16(b)(4) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure to amend its counterclaims after the deadline set forth in the parties' joint letter to the Court setting forth their negotiated discovery schedule, (DE 32), Akorn satisfied that standard by, inter alia, asserting its counterclaims by the deadline set forth in the parties' negotiated discovery schedule based upon the evidence before it at that time and then diligently seeking relevant discovery and moving to amend its counterclaims within a reasonable time after receiving the discovery sought. See generally Holmes v. Grubman, 568 F.3d 329, 335 (2d Cir. 2009) ("Whether good cause exists [under Fed. R. Civ. P. 16(b)] turns on the diligence of the moving party." (quotations and citation omitted)). Moreover, as set forth above, Provepharm will not suffer any significant prejudice as a result of the proposed amendment. [*47] See generally Kassner v. 2nd Ave. Delicatessen Inc., 496 F.3d 229, 244 (2d Cir. 2007) (holding that although "the primary consideration" for purposes of Fed. R. Civ. P. 16(b) "is whether the moving party can demonstrate diligence[,]" the district court may also "consider other relevant factors including . . . whether allowing the amendment of the pleading . . . will prejudice defendants.")

MEMORANDUM DECISION AND ORDER DENYING PLAINTIFF'S MOTION TO REMAND. (ECF NO. 6)

I. INTRODUCTION

This case concerns claims brought by Central Valley Medical Group, Inc. ("CVMG") against Independent Physician Associates Medical Group, Inc., dba AllCare ("AllCare") and Does 1 through 10. This case was originally filed in Stanislaus County Superior Court on March 19, 2019. ECF No. 1, Ex. A. On March 27, 2019, Defendant AllCare filed a notice of removal to this court. ECF No. 1. On April 5, 2019, Plaintiff CVMG filed a motion to remand, followed by an opposition from Defendant AllCare on April 22, 2019 and a reply from Plaintiff CVMG on April 29, 2019. ECF Nos. 6, 8, 9. For the following reasons, Plaintiff's motion [*2] to remand is DENIED without prejudice.

II. BACKGROUND

Plaintiff alleges that CVMG and AllCare are both corporations doing business in Stanislaus County. ECF No. 1, Ex. A at 1-2. Both CVMG and AllCare are each alleged to be an Independent Physician Association ("IPA"). Id. IPAs establish a network of independent physicians and then connect that network to health plans to provide services to members of those health plans. Id. The health plans compensate the IPA on a per member per month basis dependent on how many of the health plan's members choose to sign to that IPA. Id. The health plan member's choice of IPA is based most often on whether that plan member's physician is in that IPA. Id. The CVMG and AllCare networks are alleged to overlap and contain many of the same physicians. Id. at 2.

CVMG alleges that on or about February 2019, AllCare informed physicians in its network that certain bonuses were only available if the physician did not also contract with CVMG, and that this caused at least one physician to terminate their contract with CVMG. Id. at 3. On March 19, 2019 CVMG filed a Complaint with the Stanislaus County Superior Court. ECF No. 1, Ex. A. The first cause of action alleged interference [*3] with contract. ECF No. 1, Ex. A at 3-4. The second cause of action alleged unfair business practices in violation of California Business and Professional Code § 17200, specifically by offending the policies of three federal antitrust laws. ECF No. 1, Ex. A at 4-5.

On March 27, 2019, AllCare removed to this court, arguing that the second cause of action presented a federal question and the Court had supplemental jurisdiction over the first cause of action. ECF No. 1. CVMG moved to remand on April 5, 2019, arguing that there is no substantial federal question presented in the second cause of action and Court therefore does not have jurisdiction to hear the case. ECF No. 7. AllCare opposed the motion on April 22, 2019. ECF No. 8. CVMG filed its reply on April 29, 2019. ECF No. 9. Pursuant to Local Rule 230(g), the Court determined that this matter was suitable for decision on the papers and took it under submission on April 29, 2019. ECF No. 10.

III. LEGAL STANDARD

A defendant may remove a civil case from state court to federal court if the action presents either a federal question or the action's parties are citizens of different states and the amount in controversy is over $75,000. 28 U.S.C. §§ 1331, 1441. Subject-matter jurisdiction (in the form of either federal question [*4] or diversity jurisdiction) may be challenged at any time prior to final judgment. Grupo Dataflux v. Atlas Global Group, L.P., 541 U.S. 567, 571, 124 S. Ct. 1920, 158 L. Ed. 2d 866 (2004).

The artful pleading doctrine prevents a plaintiff from circumventing federal jurisdiction by embedding federal issues within state law causes of action. See Franchise Tax Bd. of State of Cal. v. Const. Laborers Vacation Trust for So. Cal., 463 U.S. 1, 14, 103 S. Ct. 2841, 77 L. Ed. 2d 420 (1983) ("Even though state law creates appellant's causes of action, its case might still 'arise under' the laws of the United States if a well-pleaded complaint established that its right to relief under state law requires resolution of a substantial question of federal law in dispute between the parties."); Grable & Sons Metal Prods. v. Darue Eng'g & Mfg., 545 U.S. 308, 312, 125 S. Ct. 2363, 162 L. Ed. 2d 257 (2005) ("[F]ederal question jurisdiction will lie over state-law claims that implicate significant federal issues."). The Ninth Circuit has elaborated that > the artful pleading doctrine allows federal courts to retain jurisdiction over state law claims that implicate a substantial federal question. A state law claim falls within this . . . category when: (1) "a substantial, disputed question of federal law is a necessary element of . . . the well-pleaded state claim," . . . or the claim is an "inherently federal claim" articulated in state-law terms, . . . or (2) "the right to relief depends on the resolution of a substantial, disputed federal question . [*5] . . ." A careful reading of artful pleading cases shows that no specific recipe exists for a court to alchemize a state claim into a federal claim—a court must look at a complex group of factors in any particular case to decide whether a state claim actually "arises" under federal law.

Lippitt v. Raymond James Fin. Servs., Inc., 340 F.3d 1033, 1042-43 (9th Cir. 2003), as amended (Sept. 22, 2003) (internal citations and quotation marks omitted); see also Gunn v. Minton, 568 U.S. 251, 258, 133 S. Ct. 1059, 185 L. Ed. 2d 72 (2013) (substantial federal question jurisdiction will lie "if a federal issue is: (1) necessarily raised, (2) actually disputed, (3) substantial, and (4) capable of resolution in federal court without disrupting the federal-state balance approved by Congress."); Grable, 545 U.S. at 312 (substantial federal question doctrine "captures the commonsense notion that a federal court ought to be able to hear claims recognized under state law that nonetheless turn on substantial questions of federal law").

"Courts have fashioned a number of proxies to determine whether a state claim depends on the resolution of a federal question to such an extent as to trigger subject matter jurisdiction." Lippitt, 340 F.3d at 1045. In evaluating whether jurisdiction exists, a court must determine if the federal question goes to the gravamen of a plaintiff's claims, or, in other words, "[i]s [*6] the federal question 'basic' and 'necessary' as opposed to 'collateral' and 'merely possible'? Is the federal question 'pivotal' as opposed to merely 'incidental'? Is the federal question 'direct and essential' as opposed to 'attenuated?'" Id. Nevertheless, "the mere presence of a federal issue in a state cause of action does not automatically confer federal-question jurisdiction." Lippitt, 340 F.3d at 1040.

When a court has original federal jurisdiction over one of a plaintiff's claims, the court may exercise supplemental jurisdiction over claims that share a "common nucleus of operative facts" with the federal claim. Shell Offshore, Inc. v. Greenpeace, Inc., 709 F.3d 1281, 1288 (9th Cir. 2013). "If at any time before final judgment it appears that the district court lacks subject matter jurisdiction, the case shall be remanded." 28 U.S.C. § 1447(c).

IV. DISCUSSION

A. Federal Question Jurisdiction.

The core dispute between the parties is whether a substantial federal issue is necessarily raised by Plaintiff's California Unfair Competition Law claim. See Gunn, 568 U.S. at 258; Lippitt, 340 F.3d at 1041-43.

The California Unfair Competition Law ("UCL") provides a cause of action against three different types of wrongful business practices: 1) "Unlawful" business practices; 2) "Unfair" business practices; and 3) "Fraudulent" business practices. See Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200; Hadley v. Kellogg Sales Co., 243 F. Supp. 3d 1074, 1089 (N.D. Cal. 2017). The [*7] California Supreme Court has defined an "unfair" business practice as "conduct that threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition." Cel-Tech Commc'ns, Inc. v. Los Angeles Cellular Tel. Co., 20 Cal. 4th 163, 187, 83 Cal. Rptr. 2d 548, 973 P.2d 527 (1999). When pleading under the "unfair" prong of the UCL and alleging a violation of the policy or spirit of a state or federal antitrust law, the policy must be "tethered to specific constitutional, statutory or regulatory provisions." Rheumatology Diagnostics Lab., Inc v. Aetna, Inc., No. 12-cv-05847-WHO, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 49740, 2015 WL 1744330, at *24 (N.D. Cal. Apr. 15, 2015) (quoting Bardin v. Daimlerchrysler Corp., 136 Cal. App. 4th 1255, 1271, 39 Cal. Rptr. 3d 634 (2006)); see also Cel-Tech, 20 Cal. 4th at 186-87 ("we must require that any finding of unfairness to competitors under section 17200 be tethered to some legislatively declared policy or proof of some actual or threatened impact on competition.").

The main reference in Plaintiff's complaint to any policy tethered to an antitrust law is alleged as follows:

> In taking the actions alleged herein, Defendant has unfairly competed with CVMG. Defendant's conduct, as alleged, offends the policies of free competition and free trade and commerce set forth in, inter alia, the federal Sherman Act, Clayton Act, Federal Trade [*8] Commission Act, 15 USC §12 et seq; 15 USC §§45 et seq.

ECF No. 1, Ex. A ¶ 23. Plaintiff also pleads allegations regarding AllCare's prior violations of the Federal Trade Commission Act. Id. ¶ 26. Thus, Plaintiff's sole theory of UCL unfair competition liability is that AllCare's conduct violates policies tethered to federal antitrust laws. Plaintiff does not explicitly plead in its complaint, much less argue in its opposition, that AllCare's alleged conduct violates policies tethered to California-specific constitutional, statutory, or regulatory provisions. Compare ECF No. 1, Ex. A at ¶ 23 with AT&T Mobility v. AU Optronics Corp., 707 F.3d 1106, 1110 (9th Cir. 2013) ("The Cartwright Act enumerates a relatively broad array of anticompetitive and conspiratorial conduct that constitutes a 'trust.' Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 16720. The Act declares that 'every trust is unlawful, against public policy and void,' id. §16726 . . . ."). The anticompetitive policies Plaintiff pleads that Defendant violated are only "tethered to specific" federal statutes. Indeed, if the Court were to disregard all references Plaintiff makes to federal antitrust law and policies, Plaintiff's UCL claim would fail because it was not predicated on any policies tethered to any law. [*9] *In re: National Football Leagues Sunday Ticket Antitrust Litigation, No. ML 15-02668-BRO, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 41639, 2016 WL 1192642, at 4 (C.D. Cal. Mar. 28, 2016) ("If the Court were to disregard the allegations regarding Defendants' alleged 'monopoly position' and 'supra-competitive prices,' no alternative and independent unconscionability theory would remain."). Plaintiff's unfair competition cause of action will require a Court to interpret and apply federal antitrust statutes, case law, and policies in order to determine whether AllCare's conduct constitutes unfair competition under the UCL. Thus, the federal question is "direct and essential" to Plaintiff's unfair competition claim. See Sacks v. Dietrich, 663 F.3d 1065, 1068 (9th Cir. 2011); California ex rel. Lockyer v. Dynegy, Inc., 375 F.3d 831, 839 (9th Cir. July 6, 2004); *In re: National Football Leagues, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 41639, 2016 WL 1192642, at 5; Cordon v. Wachovia Mortg., a Div. of Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 776 F. Supp. 2d 1029, 1036 (N.D. Cal. 2011). Plaintiff is the "master of [its] complaint," see Teutscher v. Woodson, 835 F.3d 936, 956-7 (9th Cir. 2016) (internal quotation marks omitted), and the Court cannot rewrite Plaintiff's complaint to include a state law theory now that Plaintiff desires remand. Therefore, Plaintiff's artfully pleaded unfair competition cause of action "necessarily" raises a substantial, disputed federal question, and federal question jurisdiction exists over this claim. See Gunn, 568 U.S. at 258; Grable, 545 U.S. at 312; Lippitt, 340 F.3d at 1041-42.

Plaintiff's remaining arguments in favor of remand do not change the result.

First, Plaintiff argues his complaint simply pleads federal statutes embodying policies that "mirror" California policies. See ECF No. 6 at 3. This is incorrect [*10] because, as discussed above, the complaint, as pleaded, raises a substantial, disputed federal question as its sole basis for the unfair competition claim. In contrast, a plaintiff may be able to defeat federal jurisdiction if an "alternative and independent" violation of state antitrust policies is offered as a basis for an unfair competition claim, even if a federal basis is also offered. See Rains v. Criterion Systems, Inc., 80 F.3d 339, 346 (9th Cir. 1996) ("When a claim can be supported by alternative and independent theories—one of which is a state law theory and one of which is a federal law theory—federal question jurisdiction does not attach because federal law is not a necessary element of the claim."). Consequently, numerous courts have found that, when a plaintiff's UCL claim could be established by reference to a state law predicate alone, there was no federal question and remand was appropriate. See Gershfeld v. Champion Aerospace LLC., No. SACV 13-1318-JVS (JEMx), 2013 WL 12123685, at *2 (C.D. Cal. Oct. 8, 2013) (ordering remand where "Plaintiff may succeed on his UCL failure-to-disclose claim with or without proving a violation of federal law.); *Peoplebrowsr, Inc. v. Twitter, Inc., No. C-12-6120-EMC, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31786, 2013 WL 843032, at 4 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 6, 2013) ("Thus, a violation of the unfair prong of the UCL does not necessarily require establishing a [*11] violation of the Sherman Act. . . . As Twitter has not demonstrated that PeopleBrowsr's unfair acts UCL claim arises under federal law, remand is appropriate."); *Caldwell v. N. Pac. Mortg. Corp., No. C10-05306-THE, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 39698, 2011 WL 1303629, at 3 (N.D. Cal. Apr. 4, 2011) ("Thus because Plaintiffs' UCL claim is supported by state-law theories of liability, the claim is not necessarily federal in character, and the Caldwells' right to relief does not depend on the resolution of a disputed federal question."); *Briggs v. First Nat. Lending Servs., No. C 10-00267-RS, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 35639, 2010 WL 962955, at 3 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 9, 2010) ("Here, since the complaint's UCL claim is supported by numerous theories of recovery under California law, the alleged violation of TILA is not considered a necessary element under Rains."); California Pinnacle Sec. CA. LP, 746 F. Supp. 2d 1129, 1131 (N.D. Cal. 2010) ("Because plaintiff is able to show defendant acted unlawfully based on these state law provisions and without any references to federal law, remand is appropriate."); Hendricks v. Dynegy Power Mktg., Inc., 160 F. Supp. 2d 1155, 1165 (S.D. Cal. 2001) ("As a result, Plaintiffs can state a violation under § 17200 in two ways, independent of the Federal Power Act: either by alleging a violation of the Cartwright Act as the predicate offense, or by alleging that the anti-competitive activity was unfair or deceptive even if not unlawful."); Castro v. Providian Nat'l Bank, No. C-00-4256-VRW, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19062, 2000 WL 1929366, at *3 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 29, 2000) (ordering remand because "plaintiffs have both pled and [*12] intend to prove that the unlawful prong of section 17200 is supported by violations of state law as well.").

And, when there is no independent state ground underlying a UCL claim, courts have ruled a federal question exists. See Nat'l Credit Reporting Ass'n, Inc. v. Experian Info. Solutions, Inc., No. C04-01661-WHA, 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17303, 2004 WL 1888769, at *3 (N.D. Cal. July 21, 2004) ("As the master of its complaint, plaintiff could have avoided any issue of federal question and, instead, could have simply borrowed state antitrust laws. But it did not. Rather, plaintiff's claim for unlawful business practices necessarily rests on questions of federal antitrust law."); In re: National Football Leagues, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 41639, 2016 WL 1192642, at *5 (ruling federal jurisdiction proper because "Plaintiff's UCL and common law claims necessarily raise federal issues."); California ex rel. Lockyer, 375 F.3d at 841 n.6 ("While California insists that the district court was obliged to remand if at least one independent state law theory of relief existed, . . . we do not discern any such claim.").

Plaintiff here does not allege two independent policy bases, one state and one federal, but insists on only explicitly pleading and arguing violations of federal antitrust policy. Plaintiff makes no effort to state what exact California policies are being "mirrored." Plaintiff's bare argument that such a policy [*13] exists—without even citing California statutes or case law or otherwise attempting to demonstrate that this policy exists—is insufficient to justify remand. The closest Plaintiff comes to identifying a state antitrust policy is in arguing that "the policies underlying the UCL and federal law are the same." ECF No. 6-1 at 4. But referencing the UCL alone is insufficient as well as circular, given Cel-Tech held that the UCL requires pleading policies "tethered" to specific predicate antitrust laws beyond the UCL. Cel-Tech, 20 Cal. 4th at 186-87. And regardless, Plaintiff's complaint does not attempt to plead that Defendants' conduct offends the state policies underlying the UCL. See ECF 1, Ex. A ¶ 23 ("Defendant's conduct, as alleged, offends the policies of free competition and free trade and commerce set forth in, inter alia, the federal Sherman Act, Clayton Act, Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 USC §12 et seq; 15 USC §§45 et seq."). Therefore, Plaintiff has not pleaded an independent state antitrust policy tethered to specific state laws such that Plaintiff's unfair competition claim must be remanded.

Second, Plaintiff argues that because it alleges an "unfair" competition claim, as opposed to "unlawful," remand is appropriate because the Court will [*14] not have to determine whether a violation of federal law occurred. This misses the point and mischaracterizes Defendants' argument. The test for whether a federal issue is "necessarily raised" is not whether a violation of federal law has been alleged or must be proven. If a federal question is "basic," "necessary," "pivotal," "direct," or "essential," then federal jurisdiction is proper. Lippitt, 340 F.3d at 1045. Thus, a substantial federal question is raised not only when the plaintiff alleges a violation of federal law, but also when the plaintiff alleges conduct that offends policy based on federal law. See In re: National Football Leagues, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 41639, 2016 WL 1192642, at *5 ("Although the Court agrees that 'a violation of the unfair prong of the UCL does not necessarily require establishing a violation of the Sherman Act,' . . . Plaintiff's UCL cause of action relies on Defendants' alleged 'abuse of its monopoly position' and charging 'supra-competitive prices,' . . . .").

Third, Plaintiff argues Cel-Tech held that the "unfair" prong of the UCL requires pleading policies that are tethered to federal antitrust laws, and thus its complaint merely follows the Cel-Tech requirements. See ECF No. 9 at 4. This is incorrect. Cel-Tech does acknowledge the relevance of section 5 of the [*15] Federal Trade Commission Act and its jurisprudence to its decision and future determinations of whether conduct is unfair, given the "similarity of language and obvious identity of purpose" of section 5 and § 17200. See Cel-Tech, 20 Cal. 4th at 185-86; see also id. at 186 n.11 ("Our notice of federal law under section 5 means only that federal cases interpreting the prohibition against 'unfair methods of competition' may assist us in determining whether a particular challenged act or practice is unfair under the test we adopt. We do not deem the federal cases controlling or determinative, merely persuasive."). But Cel-Tech's plain language refers to violation of the policies of "an antitrust law," not any specific antitrust law. See Cel-Tech, 20 Cal. 4th at 187 ("the word 'unfair' in that section means conduct that threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition.") (emphasis added). Antitrust policies tethered to state laws are an acceptable predicate for a UCL "unfair" pleading. See, e.g., Greencycle Paint, Inc. v. Paintcare, Inc., 250 F.Supp.3d 438, 451 (N.D. Cal. Apr. 11, 2017) ("Because the Court has found Plaintiff properly alleges a Cartwright Act violation, it finds Plaintiff [*16] has also sufficiently stated a UCL claim under the unlawful and unfair prongs.") (emphasis added); see also RLH Indus., Inc. v. SBC Commc'ns, Inc., 133 Cal. App. 4th 1277, 1286, 35 Cal. Rptr. 3d 469 (2005) (describing a § 17200 "unfair" claim based on threatening "an incipient violation" of the Cartwright Act). Cel-Tech does not require pleading violation of the policies underlying federal antitrust laws. The numerous cases, some of which are cited above, where plaintiffs obtained remand by pleading separate and independent state law violations shows Plaintiff is incorrect that a finding of federal question jurisdiction here would make "every unfair practices claim a federal claim." ECF No. 9 at 5.

Finally, Plaintiff submits an amended complaint, arguing that by adding two new causes of action for violation of California law, it shows that its "single reference to federal policies . . . does not raise a 'substantial' question of federal law." See ECF No. 9 at 4-5. The test for federal question jurisdiction here does not depend on whether there are more state causes of action as compared to actions raising a federal question. Even if the Court were to accept the amended complaint (which at this time it does not), there would still be a necessary federal question embedded in the UCL claim. [*17]

Therefore, Plaintiff's UCL claim necessarily raises a substantial federal question, over which this Court has jurisdiction. Remand is not proper. Nevertheless, because it appears Plaintiff could amend the complaint to allege an independent state law basis for its UCL claim, which may compel remand, the Court will deny Plaintiff's motion without prejudice.

B. Supplemental Jurisdiction

Supplemental jurisdiction is a doctrine of discretion, not of right. See City of Chicago v. Int'l College of Surgeons, 522 U.S. 156, 172, 118 S. Ct. 523, 139 L. Ed. 2d 525 (1997); United Mine Workers of Am. v. Gibbs, 383 U.S. 715, 726, 86 S. Ct. 1130, 16 L. Ed. 2d 218 (1966). Supplemental jurisdiction over state-law claims exists when a federal claim is sufficiently substantial to confer federal jurisdiction, and there is "a common nucleus of operative fact between the state and federal claims." Brady v. Brown, 51 F.3d 810, 816 (9th Cir. 1995) (quoting Gilder v. PGA Tour, Inc., 936 F.2d 417, 421 (9th Cir. 1991)); see also 28 U.S.C. § 1367. The parties do not appear to dispute that all causes of action in this case are based on the common nucleus of AllCare's conduct in contracting with independent physicians. See ECF No. 1, Ex. A ¶¶ 14, 21. Therefore, the Court finds that supplemental jurisdiction over Plaintiff's remaining claim is appropriate in this case so long as no independent state law basis for the unfair competition claim is alleged.

C. Temporary Restraining Order

Plaintiff requests in its reply that if remand is denied, [*18] the Court set a hearing date for a temporary restraining order. See ECF No. 9 at 5. The Court has not received any formal application from CVMG for a temporary restraining order, and Plaintiff's informal request in its reply does not comply with the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure or this Court's local rules. See Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 65; Local Rule 231. The Court will not consider Plaintiff's request at this time. Plaintiff may renew its request in compliance with the federal and local rules if it so desires.

V. CONCLUSION AND ORDER

For the reasons stated above, Plaintiff's motion to remand is DENIED without prejudice. Plaintiffs shall have twenty (20) days from electronic service of this Order to file an amended complaint and renew their motion to remand if they desire. Additionally, in light of the law discussed above, the Court would entertain remand by stipulation. Finally, the pending motion to dismiss will be held in abeyance until the filing of an amended pleading, or until the expiration of the amendment period, whichever is sooner.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

[*1061] ORDER RE: DEFENDANTS' MOTIONS TO DISMISS

Consumers and auto dealers have filed two related consolidated class actions against the five leading German car manufacturers—Audi AG, BMW AG, Daimler AG, Porsche AG, and Volkswagen AG ("VW AG")—and their American subsidiaries. Plaintiffs allege that since the mid-1990s, Defendants have colluded to restrain trade in ways that constitute per se violations of the Sherman Act and that violate various state laws. Defendants have moved to dismiss the claims. Finding the allegations currently insufficient to state a claim, the Court GRANTS Defendants' joint motion to dismiss, with leave to amend. The Court DENIES the German Defendants' separate motions to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction.

As alleged, U.S. consumers and auto dealers have been overpaying for Audi, BMW, Mercedes, Porsche, and Volkswagen cars for over twenty years. They have paid premiums for "German engineering," a phrase that is synonymous with innovation and exceptional performance, but they have received something less.

Plaintiffs claim that in the mid-1990s, Defendants started intentionally slowing [2] down the pace of innovation. (IPP ¶¶ 123, 139, 183; DPP ¶¶ 2, 76.) Doing so resulted in their cars having "fewer features and reduced performance." (IPP ¶ 5.) Defendants took this approach, Plaintiffs maintain, in order to "reduce production costs" and "avoid[] price and technology wars." (DPP ¶¶ 76, 81; see also IPP ¶ 92.) All the while they continued to charge premiums for cutting edge technology and engineering. (IPP ¶¶ 6, 92; DPP ¶¶ 68-69, 76.)

At least 200 employees are alleged to have participated in the agreement to reduce innovation, meeting for decades in dozens of working groups and at trade association events. (IPP ¶¶ 123, 129, 196; DPP ¶¶ 77-79.) Since 2011 alone, at least 1,000 meetings in furtherance of the agreement have purportedly taken place. (IPP ¶ 123; DPP ¶ 77.)

All sorts of vehicle components are claimed to have been covered by the agreement (e.g, brake controls, chassis, electronics, gas and diesel engines, clutches, transmissions, exhaust systems, and drivetrains (IPP ¶¶ 123, 131; DPP ¶ 86)), although only two examples are explained in any detail in the complaints.

Soft-top convertibles. Minutes from a meeting in Bad Kissingen, Germany document that Defendants [3] discussed the cost, safety, weight, and technical risks of soft-top convertibles and then collectively agreed that their soft-top convertible roofs should only be allowed to open and close at vehicle speeds below 50 kilometers (or 31 miles) per hour. (IPP ¶ 138.) In memorializing this agreement, Defendants allegedly noted that there should be "[n]o arms race when it comes to speeds for [soft-top convertibles]." (Id. (alterations in complaint).)

AdBlue tanks. As explained in the complaints, AdBlue is a substance that is used to breakdown emissions from diesel engines into less harmful compounds. (IPP ¶ 145; DPP ¶ 102.) It became popular in the early 2000s when Defendants started marketing their diesel cars as fuel-efficient alternatives to electric and hybrid cars. (IPP ¶¶ 144-45.) With the use of AdBlue burgeoning, Defendants reportedly determined that they could save up to €80 per car by agreeing on a standard tank size. (IPP ¶ 150.) They first agreed, in or around 2006, to only use AdBlue tanks that were between 17 and 23 liters. (IPP ¶¶ 149, 151.) Several years later they shifted to smaller, 8-liter tanks after their marketing departments touted the cost savings of smaller tanks [4] and the benefits of having more space in the cars for passengers, cargo, and equipment. (IPP ¶¶ 148, 152.) Eight-liter tanks were then ditched in favor of 16-liter tanks after Defendants learned in 2010 that new U.S. regulations would soon require tanks to contain enough AdBlue to last for 10,000 miles before needing to be refilled. (IPP ¶¶ 153-55.) Even the 16-liter tanks were not large enough to meet U.S. standards, according to the IPP complaint. (IPP ¶ 153.) But Plaintiffs maintain that Defendants agreed to use 16-liter tanks despite knowing this. [*1063] Documents purportedly reflect that VW AG encouraged the others to stick with the 16-liter tanks despite regulatory concerns (IPP ¶ 159) and Audi AG cautioned against a potential "arms race with regard to tank sizes," which "we should continue to avoid at all costs" (IPP ¶ 160).

The European investigation. The above allegations, like most others in the complaints, are based largely on articles that were published in the German news magazine Der Spiegel. In the summer of 2017, Der Spiegel reported that the European Commission's competition department ("ECC") and Germany's Federal Cartel Office were investigating "allegations of an antitrust [5] cartel among the Defendants." (IPP ¶¶ 119-20.) As Plaintiffs note, ECC investigations only proceed when there are "reasonable indications of a likely infringement" of competition laws. (IPP ¶ 112 (quoting Antitrust Manual of Procedures, EUROPA.EU, 102-109 (March 2012), Opening of Proceedings, Conditions for Opening of Proceedings).)

[1] Citations to "IPP ¶" and "DPP ¶" are respectively to the indirect purchaser plaintiffs' and the direct purchaser plaintiffs' complaints. (Dkt. Nos. 241, 244.) The IPPs are U.S. consumers; the DPPs are U.S. auto dealers.

VW AG and Daimler AG reportedly submitted proffers to the ECC as part of the agency's leniency program. (IPP ¶¶ 113-14, 121; DPP ¶¶ 111-12.) In VW AG's proffer, it admitted (1) that "Daimler, BMW, Volkswagen, Audi and Porsche made agreements 'for many years, at least since the 1990s, up to today' about the development of their vehicles, costs, suppliers and markets;" (2) that Defendants "discussed vehicle development, brakes, petrol and diesel engines, clutches and transmissions as well as exhaust treatment systems;" (3) that there had been an "exchange of internal, competitively sensitive technical data;" (4) that Defendants had jointly established "technical standards" and agreed to use "only certain technical solutions" in new cars; and (5) that "behavior in violation of cartel law" may have occurred. (IPP ¶ 124.)

Plaintiffs assert that by seeking leniency [6] from the ECC, VW AG and Daimler AG effectively "admitted the existence of a secret cartel." (IPP ¶ 118; see also id. ¶ 115 ("Leniency is not available for lesser anti-competitive infringements, nor is it available to a company that claims it did not participate in a cartel." (citing Commission Notice on Immunity from Fines and Reduction of Fines in Cartel Cases, OFFICIAL JOURNAL OF THE EUROPEAN UNION (Aug. 12, 2006), Introduction ¶ 1)).) In October 2017, following VW AG's and Daimler AG's proffers and in connection with the ECC's investigation, the ECC conducted "dawn raids" in Germany at several of Defendants' headquarters, including the headquarters of BMW AG, Daimler AG, and VW AG. (IPP ¶ 120; see also DPP ¶ 114.)

The investigation is narrowed. In September 2018, after Plaintiffs had filed their complaints in this action, the ECC announced in a press release that the scope of its investigation was changing.[2] The ECC explained in the press release that its investigation had not unearthed a vehicle-wide conspiracy to restrain technological development, but that it would be opening an in-depth investigation into one issue: whether Defendants "colluded, in breach of EU antitrust rules, [7] to avoid competition on the development and roll-out of technology to clean the emissions of petrol and diesel passenger cars." (Dkt. No. 377-3 at 2 (emphasis omitted).) The ECC announced [*1064] that specifically it would be examining whether Defendants colluded to limit the development and roll-out (i) of "selective catalytic reduction ('SCR') systems to reduce harmful nitrogen oxides emissions from passenger cars with diesel engines," and (ii) of "Otto particulate filters ('OPF') to reduce harmful particulate matter emissions from passenger cars with petrol engines." (Id. (emphasis omitted).)

In its press release, the ECC emphasized that its formal investigation would concern "solely the emissions control systems" just identified. (Id.) Referring to Defendants as the "circle of five," the Commission explained that although Defendants had also exchanged other technical information and had cooperated on other areas of vehicle development, there was no reason to believe that those exchanges were unlawful:

> [In addition to emissions control systems,] [n]umerous other technical topics were discussed, including common quality requirements for car parts, common quality testing procedures [8] or exchanges concerning their own car models that were already on the market. The "circle of five" also had discussions on the maximum speed at which the roofs of convertible cars can open or close, and at which the cruise control will work. Cooperation also extended to the area of crash tests and crash test dummies where the car companies pooled technical expertise and development efforts to improve testing procedures for car safety.
> At this stage the Commission does not have sufficient indications that these discussions between the "circle of five" constituted anti-competitive conduct that would merit further investigation. EU antitrust rules leave room for technical cooperation aimed at improving product quality. The Commission's indepth investigation in this case concerns specific cooperation that is suspected to have aimed at limiting the technical development or preventing the roll-out of technical devices.

(Id.)

[2] Defendants filed a copy of that press release (see Dkt. No. 377-3) and the Court takes judicial notice of its contents as information that is from a source "whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned." Fed. R. Evid. 201(b)(2). The Court will not consider Defendants' supplemental briefing on the press release (see Dkt. No. 377), as Defendants did not seek the Court's leave before filing the brief, as required. See Civil L.R. 7-3(d).

Other agreements. Plaintiffs allege that Defendants reached other anticompetitive agreements in addition to their agreement to reduce innovation.

. Price fixing. Plaintiffs claim that Defendants agreed to "artificially fix, raise, stabilize, and control prices" for their [9] cars in the United States. (E.g., IPP ¶ 261.) No specifics on this agreement are offered.

. Agreements on suppliers. Defendants allegedly agreed to use the same suppliers for certain vehicle components. Three concrete examples are offered in the complaints. In or around 2006, Defendants agreed that, if possible, AdBlue tanks should be produced by only two manufactures. (IPP ¶ 156.) In 2011, one of Defendant's managers explained to a working group that Defendants needed to select the same supplier for diesel-motor sensors. (IPP ¶ 142.) And in 2013, one of Defendants' working groups reviewed and criticized the performance of a shared supplier of suspension equipment. (IPP ¶ 141.)

. Agreement on steel purchases. Starting in the 1990s, Plaintiffs contend that Defendants and German steel manufacturers began using a shared pricing formula for steel purchases. (IPP ¶ 169.) The formula set a fixed long-term price for raw steel and a variable price, based on a selected price index, for scrap steel, precious metals and alloys—three materials that are combined with raw steel to build cars. (IPP ¶¶ 166, 169; DPP [*1065] ¶ 91.) The formula helped bridge a divide between Defendants and the steel manufacturers: [10] Defendants wanted long-term contracts with fixed, predictable costs to effectively set car model prices, while steel manufacturers wanted short-term contracts that could be adjusted to account for fluctuations in the markets for these materials. (IPP ¶¶ 167-68; DPP ¶ 90.) Defendants apparently stopped using the variable index in 2015, after European officials began investigating anticompetitive conduct in the German steel industry. (IPP ¶ 175.) But soon after that decision, Plaintiffs submit that Defendants started communicating about setting up a replacement index. (IPP ¶¶ 175-76.)

. Agreement to fund scientific studies. As alleged, Defendants sponsored now-debunked scientific studies that were aimed at promoting their diesel vehicles. (IPP ¶ 178.) Plaintiffs claim that the studies were flawed because they purported to show that new German-made diesel cars had low emissions, but at least some of those cars used emissions cheating software and were not in fact clean or safe for human health. (IPP ¶¶ 178-82.)

Both the IPPs and DPPs assert that through the conduct described above Defendants have violated § 1 of the Sherman Act. The IPPs also assert that Defendants have violated various state [11] antitrust, unfair competition, consumer protection, and unfair trade practices laws, and have triggered certain state unjust enrichment and disgorgement statutes. The IPPs and DPPs seek to bring class actions respectively on behalf of all persons and U.S.-based car dealers that, since the mid-1990s, bought or leased in the United States one or more new passenger cars manufactured or sold by Defendants. (IPP ¶¶ 4, 10, 245; DPP ¶ 129.)

After the complaints were filed, Defendants filed a joint motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6); (Dkt. No. 321). The German Defendants (Audi AG, BMW AG, Daimler AG, Porsche AG, and VW AG) also filed individual motions to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(2); (Dkt. Nos. 339, 340, 341, 345).

II. LEGAL STANDARDS

At the pleading stage, plaintiffs in civil proceedings must make "a prima facie showing" of personal jurisdictional over the defendants. CollegeSource, Inc. v. AcademyOne, Inc., 653 F.3d 1066, 1073 (9th Cir. 2011) (quoting Brayton Purcell LLP v. Recordon & Recordon, 606 F.3d 1124, 1127 (9th Cir. 2010)). They cannot rely on "bare allegations" in doing so, but "uncontroverted allegations in the complaint must be taken as true." Id. (citation omitted). If a prima facie case is made, the burden shifts to the defendants to "present a compelling case" for why the exercise of jurisdiction [12] would be unreasonable. Id. at 1079 (quoting Burger King v. Rudzewicz, 471 U.S. 462, 477-78, 105 S. Ct. 2174, 85 L. Ed. 2d 528 (1985)).

The complaints must also include factual allegations that, if true, would plausibly support a claim for relief. See Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 677-80, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009); Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 554-57, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). In the antitrust context, the Ninth Circuit has explained that the facts that count in this assessment are "evidentiary facts." Kendall v. Visa U.S.A., Inc., 518 F.3d 1042, 1047 (9th Cir. 2008). Evidentiary facts are those that can answer the questions "who, did what, to whom (or [*1066] with whom), where, and when." In re Musical Instruments & Equip. Antitrust Litig., 798 F.3d 1186, 1194, n.6 (9th Cir. 2015) (quoting Kendall, 518 F.3d at 1047).

Unlike evidentiary facts, legal conclusions and conclusory facts will not be accepted as true. See Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678 ("Threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice."). When the nonconclusory facts are accepted, they "must plausibly suggest an entitlement to relief, such that it is not unfair to require the opposing party to be subjected to the expense of discovery and continued litigation." Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202, 1216 (9th Cir. 2011).

III. PERSONAL JURISDICTION

The Court first considers the German Defendants' motions to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction. Audi AG, BMW AG, Daimler AG, Porsche AG, and VW AG are German corporations. They also allegedly made the agreements at issue in Germany. Because they are foreign companies and the challenged conduct occurred abroad, [13] they argue that this Court lacks personal jurisdiction over them.

In a federal antitrust case, a district court may not enter a binding judgment against a defendant that has insufficient contacts with the United States. See Int'l Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310, 319, 66 S. Ct. 154, 90 L. Ed. 95 (1945) (general standard); Action Embroidery Corp. v. Atl. Embroidery, Inc., 368 F.3d 1174, 1180 (9th Cir. 2004) (applied in antitrust context). Where, as here, the defendants are not "at home in the forum," Goodyear Dunlop Tires Operations, S.A. v. Brown, 564 U.S. 915, 919, 131 S. Ct. 2846, 180 L. Ed. 2d 796 (2011), personal jurisdiction will be appropriate only if they "purposefully direct[ed] [their] activities" at the forum or "purposefully avail[ed] [themselves] of the privilege of conducting activities in the forum," Schwarzenegger v. Fred Martin Motor Co., 374 F.3d 797, 802 (9th Cir. 2004).

During the relevant period, the German Defendants purposefully directed their activities at the United States. Through subsidiaries that they established in the United States, they annually sold hundreds of thousands of cars to auto dealers and consumers in this country. (DPP ¶¶ 16-18, 20-22, 25-26, 28-32, 34-36.) They designed their cars to meet federal and state motor vehicle regulations. (DPP ¶ 126; IPP ¶¶ 153-55 (alleging that Defendants chose to use larger AdBlue tanks in their U.S.-bound cars than in their Europe-bound cars because of U.S. emission standards).) Their executives publicly noted that the U.S. market was one of the "most [14] important," a "core region," a "strategic pillar," a "very high priority," and a "second home." (Opp'n, Dkt. No. 362 at 22, 26, 29-30, 32, 34 (quoting annual reports, press releases, and statements at annual meetings.)[3] Indeed, they allegedly made billions of dollars selling their cars in the United States. (DPP ¶ 55.)

The German Defendants, in short, targeted the United States as a market for their cars; and because the claims at issue are tied to the cars that they indirectly sold in the United States, personal jurisdiction over them is appropriate. Two well-known Supreme Court decisions support this conclusion.

In World-Wide Volkswagen Corp. v. Woodson, 444 U.S. 286, 100 S. Ct. 559, 62 L. Ed. 2d 490 (1980), the Court held that an [*1067] Oklahoma court could not exercise personal jurisdiction "over a nonresident automobile retailer and its wholesale distributor in a products-liability action, when the defendants' only connection with Oklahoma [was] the fact that an automobile sold in New York to New York residents became involved in an accident in Oklahoma." Id. at 287. In reaching that holding, the Court took care to distinguish the facts before it from a scenario that would have given rise to personal jurisdiction over the nonresident defendants:

[3] The Court may consider evidence presented outside the pleadings in assessing personal jurisdiction. See Dole Food Co. v. Watts, 303 F.3d 1104, 1108 (9th Cir. 2002).

> [I]f the sale of a product of a manufacturer [15] or distributor such as Audi or Volkswagen is not simply an isolated occurrence, but arises from the efforts of the manufacturer or distributor to serve directly or indirectly, the market for its product in other States, it is not unreasonable to subject it to suit in one of those States if its allegedly defective merchandise has there been the source of injury to its owner or to others.

Id. at 297.

Relying in part on World-Wide Volkswagen, a plurality of the Court in Asahi Metal Industry Co. v. Superior Court, 480 U.S. 102, 107 S. Ct. 1026, 94 L. Ed. 2d 92 (1987), concluded that a Japanese valve manufacturer's "mere awareness" that its valves would reach the forum State "in the stream of commerce" after it sold the valves to a Taiwanese tire manufacturer was insufficient to support that the valve manufacturer "purposefully avail[ed] itself of the privilege of conducting activities within the forum State." Id. at 105, 109, 112-13 (O'Connor, J.). But the plurality explained that certain "[a]dditional conduct," if present, could have established the "substantial connection between the defendant and the forum State necessary for a finding of minimum contacts":

> Additional conduct of the defendant may indicate an intent or purpose to serve the market in the forum State [and support personal jurisdiction.] [F]or example, [16] designing the product for the market in the forum State, advertising in the forum State, establishing channels for providing regular advice to customers in the forum State, or marketing the product through a distributor who has agreed to serve as the sales agent in the forum State.

Id. at 112 (citation omitted).

The facts that were absent in World-Wide Volkswagen and Asahi, but which the Supreme Court noted could support personal jurisdiction over a foreign defendant, are sufficiently alleged here. During the over 20 year conspiracy that is claimed, Plaintiffs submit that more than 20 million of the German defendants' cars were sold in the United States (DPP ¶ 54)—far from "simply an isolated occurrence." World-Wide Volkswagen, 444 U.S. at 297. And those 20 million cars didn't simply arrive in the United States through "the stream of commerce." Asahi, 480 U.S. at 112. The German defendants "establish[ed] channels for . . . marketing [their] product[s] . . . in the [United States]" (see IPP ¶¶ 53-66; DPP ¶¶ 40-43), and they "design[ed] [their] product[s] for the market in the [United States]" (see IPP ¶¶ 153-55; DPP ¶ 126). Asahi, 480 U.S. at 112.[4]

[*1068] It is an "unexceptional proposition" that when a foreign manufacturer "seek[s] to serve a given . . . market," the manufacturer may [17] be subject to the jurisdiction of courts within that market even "without entering the forum." J. McIntyre Mach., Ltd. v. Nicastro, 564 U.S. 873, 882, 131 S. Ct. 2780, 180 L. Ed. 2d 765 (2011) (plurality). Given the German Defendants' efforts to target the U.S. market (and the success they had), this Court "has the power to subject [them] to judgment concerning that conduct." Id. at 884; see also Schwarzenegger, 374 F.3d at 802 (explaining that personal jurisdiction exists when a foreign defendant directs his activities at the forum, the claim arises from that forum-directed conduct, and the exercise of jurisdiction is otherwise reasonable).

Plaintiffs have made a prima facie showing of personal jurisdiction. The burden accordingly shifts to the German Defendants to "present a compelling case" for why the exercise of jurisdiction would be unreasonable. CollegeSource, 653 F.3d at 1079 (quoting Burger King, 471 U.S. at 477); see also Asahi, 480 U.S. at 113-15. They have not met this burden.

[4] In Williams v. Yamaha Motor Co., 851 F.3d 1015 (9th Cir. 2017), a case on which the German Defendants rely, there were no allegations that the Japanese defendant, Yamaha Motor Co. Ltd., had designed the defective boat motors at issue for sale in the forum state of California. The Ninth Circuit's conclusion that personal jurisdiction was lacking over the foreign defendant there, even though its U.S. subsidiary sold the motors in California, id. at 1022-25, is thus not controlling.

Defendants first assert that the European Union and Germany have sovereign interests in adjudicating this matter, as it involves German companies, German witnesses, and conduct in Germany. They argue that the exercise of jurisdiction here would conflict with those sovereign interests. A conflict with "the sovereignty of the defendant's state" is a factor that courts consider in determining whether the exercise of personal [18] jurisdiction is reasonable. CollegeSource, 653 F.3d at 1079 (Dole Food, 303 F.3d at 1114). But Defendants have not persuaded the Court that such a conflict exists. While Germany and the European Union are investigating Defendants' actions, Plaintiffs bring their cases for violations of U.S. antitrust laws based on conduct that is tied to the United States. This Court will not interfere with the sovereign interests of Germany and the European Union by considering whether Defendants violated U.S. law and harmed U.S. consumers.

The German Defendants next note that hundreds of their employees are alleged to have been involved in the agreements in question and most (if not all) of those employees are located in Germany. If litigation in this forum continues, the German Defendants argue that the burdens will be significant, as witnesses and attorneys will need to shuttle back and forth between the United States and Europe. Inconveniences of the type asserted "will not overcome clear justifications for the exercise of jurisdiction" unless they are "so great as to constitute a deprivation of due process." Hirsch v. Blue Cross, Blue Shield of Kansas City, 800 F.2d 1474, 1481 (9th Cir. 1986). At this stage, the Court cannot conclude that the identified inconveniences are of this magnitude. If Plaintiffs' cases move forward and the travel [19] and expense burdens that are forecasted crystalize, the German Defendants may renew their inconvenience argument at a later date. See IMAPizza, LLC v. At Pizza Ltd., 334 F. Supp. 3d 95, 116 n.5 (D.D.C. 2018) (noting that "jurisdictional issues, like merits issues, are adjudicated in stages" and considering a Rule 12(b)(6) motion after determining that the plaintiffs made out a prima facie showing of personal jurisdiction).

Plaintiffs have made a prima facie showing of personal jurisdiction and the German Defendants have not presented a [*1069] compelling case for why the exercise of jurisdiction would be unreasonable. The Court thus concludes that it has personal jurisdiction over the German Defendants for Plaintiffs' Sherman Act claims. Under the doctrine of pendent personal jurisdiction, the Court also exercises jurisdiction over the German Defendants for Plaintiffs' state law claims, which are based on the same operative facts as their Sherman Act claims. See CollegeSource, 653 F.3d at 1076 (citing Action Embroidery, 368 F.3d at 1180-81). The German Defendants' motions to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction are DENIED.

IV. SHERMAN ACT CLAIMS

Section 1 of the Sherman Act forbids competitors from entering into agreements that unreasonably restrain trade. Leegin Creative Leather Prods., Inc. v. PSKS, Inc., 551 U.S. 877, 885, 127 S. Ct. 2705, 168 L. Ed. 2d 623 (2007). Multiple anticompetitive agreements are claimed here, although the principal focus is on an [20] agreement by Defendants to reduce innovation.

If Defendants agreed to what is alleged—"a de facto whole car conspiracy" to reduce innovation (Opp'n Dkt. No. 360 at 20)—that agreement plausibly would have violated § 1. Plaintiffs maintain that the innovation-reducing agreement resulted in Defendants' cars having "fewer features and reduced performance." (IPP ¶ 5.) An agreement "to make a product of inferior quality . . . count[s] as [an] output reduction," Philip E. Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law*: An Analysis of Antitrust Principles and Their Application* ¶ 1901d (3rd & 4th Eds., 2018 Cum. Supp. 2010-2017), and agreements to restrict output are per se illegal under § 1, see Nat'l Collegiate Athletic Ass'n v. Bd. of Regents of Univ. of Okla., 468 U.S. 85, 100, 104 S. Ct. 2948, 82 L. Ed. 2d 70 & n.21 (1984).

The question is whether the well-pled allegations plausibly support the output reducing agreement that is claimed. After considering that question next, the Court will later address the other agreements that are described in the complaints.

A. Agreement to Reduce Innovation

The complaints identify two instances in which Defendants reached consensus on vehicle specifications. As alleged, they agreed not to manufacture convertibles with roofs that opened when the cars were traveling above a particular speed, and [21] they agreed to use the same sized AdBlue tanks in their diesel-engine cars.

Neither of these is a compelling example of an agreement "to make a product of inferior quality." Areeda & Hovenkamp ¶ 1901d. The complaints do not suggest that consumers even want convertibles with roofs that open at speeds above 31 miles per hour, the chosen limit; and common sense suggests that there are safety reasons for why consumers would not want that feature. It's also not clear if the selected 16-liter AdBlue tanks were inferior to larger tanks. Larger tanks would have needed to be refilled less often, but they also would have taken up more space in the cars, as Defendants recognized. (IPP ¶¶ 148, 152.)

Even assuming, though, that the convertible and AdBlue tank agreements reduced innovation and resulted in inferior cars, those two examples are not enough to support a "de facto whole car conspiracy" to reduce innovation. The two examples relate to niche vehicle features that are only found in a small subset of Defendants' cars. Only two of 37 named IPPs allege that they purchased a convertible (IPP ¶¶ 34, 44), and only one alleges that he [*1070] purchased a diesel-engine car (id. ¶ 26). To maintain lawsuits [22] against Defendants on behalf of almost everyone in the United States who has purchased one of their cars (of any model type) over the past 20 years, more is needed.

To support the broader agreement that they allege, Plaintiffs rely heavily on VW AG's admissions to European antitrust authorities. To review, Plaintiffs allege that VW AG admitted to the ECC that:

1. "Daimler, BMW, Volkswagen, Audi and Porsche made agreements 'for many years, at least since the 1990s, up to today' about the development of their vehicles, costs, suppliers and markets;" that

2. Defendants "discussed vehicle development, brakes, petrol and diesel engines, clutches and transmissions as well as exhaust treatment systems;" that

3. there had been an "exchange of internal, competitively sensitive technical data;" that

a4. Defendants jointly established "technical standards" and agreed to use "only certain technical solutions" in new vehicles; and that

5. "behavior in violation of cartel law" may have occurred.

(IPP ¶ 124.)

These admissions may seem significant at first glance, but it is hard to make much of them when they are examined more closely. The first admission is vague. That Defendants made agreements for many [23] years "about the development of their vehicles, costs, suppliers and markets" says little about the scope of those agreements, and says nothing about the alleged agreement to reduce innovation.

The second admission is similar. VW AG admitted that Defendants "discussed vehicle development," but there is no indication of what those discussions entailed. More detail is needed because a discussion among competing auto manufacturers about brakes, or about any of the other identified car parts, need not be anticompetitive. See Princo Corp. v. Int'l Trade Comm'n, 616 F.3d 1318, 1335 (Fed. Cir. 2010) (explaining that collaboration among competitors can "reduce costs, facilitate innovation, eliminate duplication of efforts and assets, and share risks that no individual member would be willing to undertake alone"); FTC & Dep't of Justice, Antitrust Guidelines for Collaborations Among Competitors 1 (2000) (noting that "to compete in modern markets, competitors sometimes need to collaborate," and that collaboration may "not only [be] benign but procompetitive").

The third, fourth, and fifth admissions do a bit more for Plaintiffs. An "exchange of internal, competitively sensitive technical data" among Defendants may have been anticompetitive and, as VW AG appears to [24] have acknowledged, may have violated European cartel law. Defendants' agreement to use "'only certain technical solutions' in new vehicles" also sounds similar to an agreement to reduce innovation. Yet even these allegations lack important specificity.

For one thing, European and American antitrust laws are not uniform, so Defendants' possible violation of European cartel law does not necessarily mean that they violated the Sherman Act. See D. Daniel Sokol, Troubled Waters

Between U.S. and European Antitrust, 115 Mich. L. Rev. 955, 970 (2017) (explaining that "European case law and enforcement on information sharing [among competitors] is more aggressive than the United States").

Even more importantly, an agreement to only use certain technical solutions is not the same as an agreement to reduce [*1071] product quality. The former may be equivalent to "standard setting," which "serves many useful ends, such as protecting consumers from inferior goods, increasing compatibility among products that must be interchangeable with the products of other manufacturers, or focusing customer comparison on essential rather than nonessential differences." Areeda & Hovenkamp ¶ 2136a. For these reasons, "most instances of standard setting [25] . . . are lawful." Id. It is not appropriate to infer that Defendants reached a per se illegal agreement to reduce product quality, which is what Plaintiffs allege, simply because they agreed to exchange "competitively sensitive technical data" and to use "only certain technical solutions."

Also of significance, VW AG's admissions do not identify the specific types of competitively sensitive technical data that Defendants exchanged, or the technical solutions to which Defendants agreed. Maybe those exchanges and technical solutions touched on many different areas of vehicle development, as Plaintiffs allege. But it is also possible that the exchanges were more limited in scope. Indeed, perhaps the exchanges and technical solutions related only to the speed at which soft-top convertibles open and the size of AdBlue tanks, the two examples that Plaintiffs have identified in their complaints.

VW AG's admissions to European antitrust authorities, in short, are too general and too vague to plausibly support the broad agreement to reduce innovation that Plaintiffs allege.

Other allegations require even more speculation. For example, putting aside VW AG's admissions, Plaintiffs argue it is significant [26] that the ECC is investigating Defendants' coordinated activities. But courts in this district have explained that government antitrust investigations ordinarily carry "no weight in pleading an antitrust conspiracy," for it is "unknown whether the investigation[s] will result in indictments or nothing at all." In re Graphics Processing Units Antitrust Litig., 527 F. Supp. 2d 1011, 1024 (N.D. Cal. 2007); see also In re Capacitors Antitrust Litig., 106 F. Supp. 3d 1051, 1064 (N.D. Cal. 2015).

The ECC investigation at issue proves why this skepticism is well founded. Since Plaintiffs filed their complaints, the scope of that investigation has narrowed significantly. The ECC was initially investigating whether Defendants had unlawfully colluded on numerous areas of vehicle development. But having determined from its initial investigation that Defendants' collaboration was mostly akin to standard setting, the ECC is now only looking into whether Defendants colluded on the development of certain emissions technologies. (See Dkt. No. 377-3 at 2.) That targeted investigation into one area of vehicle development does little to support a "whole car conspiracy" to reduce innovation.

Some allegations in the complaints do support the expansive agreement to reduce innovation that is claimed, but these allegations are not well pled. For example, Plaintiffs allege that [27] the innovation-reducing agreement covered "almost all areas of automotive development." (DPP ¶ 86 (emphasis omitted); accord IPP ¶ 131.) Absent are evidentiary facts supporting this allegation. It is a conclusory factual statement and will not be accepted as true. See Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678-79.

Allegations about how Defendants used working groups and trade associations to further their "whole car conspiracy" also lack sufficient detail. Although the IPPs spend more than a dozen pages of their complaint discussing these working groups and trade associations, they almost never identify what was agreed to in these meetings and instead only vaguely refer to [*1072] "clandestine agreements to limit technological innovation." (IPP ¶ 129.) More facts are needed to plausibly support that Defendants used working groups and trade associations to reach the broad anticompetitive agreement that is alleged. See In re Musical Instruments, 798 F.3d at 1196 ("[M]ere participation in trade-organization meetings where information is exchanged and strategies are advocated does not suggest an illegal agreement.").

As the Supreme Court noted in Twombly, antitrust discovery can be "sprawling, costly, and hugely time-consuming," and can "push cost-conscious defendants to settle even [28] anemic cases." 550 U.S. at 559 & n.6.

These concerns are at play here. Plaintiffs propose two class actions that would include almost every purchaser and dealer of German cars in the United States over the past 20 years. Discovery would require Defendants to search through decades of information; and because Plaintiffs allege that Defendants' agreement covered most (if not all) areas of vehicle development, discovery would reach into almost every nook and cranny at five giant automakers.

With the potential for such a massive and expensive factual investigation, the Court "retain[s] the power to insist upon some specificity in pleading." Id. at 558 (citation omitted). Before Plaintiffs are allowed to pursue such a broad antitrust claim, they must do more than point to a European antitrust investigation (the scope of which is now much narrower than Plaintiffs' claims), two examples of agreements by Defendants to use certain technical standards, and Defendants participation in working groups and trade associations. Even when viewed together, these allegations do not plausibly support that Defendants reached a "de facto whole car conspiracy" to reduce innovation.[5]

B. The Other Agreements

While the principal focus [29] of the complaints is on the asserted agreement to restrain innovation, Plaintiffs also allege that Defendants violated § 1 by (i) fixing prices, (ii) agreeing to only use certain part suppliers, (iii) using a shared pricing formula for steel purchases, and (iv) jointly funding now-debunked scientific studies that were aimed at promoting their diesel cars. The allegations do not support these claims.

No factual allegations support price fixing. Plaintiffs simply state in the Claims for Relief sections of their complaints that Defendants "agree[d] to fix, increase, maintain and/or stabilize prices of German Automobiles sold in the United States." (DPP ¶ 153; see also IPP ¶ 261 (Defendants "entered into a continuing agreement . . . to artificially fix, raise, stabilize, and control prices for new German Passenger Vehicles in the United States"). These are conclusory statements and will not be accepted as true. See Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678.

For the other three agreements, even if they were reached it is unclear how Plaintiffs were injured by them. If, as is alleged, the five leading German car makers agreed to coordinate their purchases of car parts and steel, the prices they paid for those inputs would presumably [30] have [*1073] dropped. See, e.g., Thomas A. Piraino, Jr., A Proposed Antitrust Approach to Collaborations Among Competitors, 86 Iowa L. Rev. 1137, 1178 (2001) ("If, for example, many buyers in the relevant market participate in a purchasing joint venture, the venture is more likely to give those buyers the clout to lower their purchasing costs."); Areeda & Hovenkamp ¶ 2135b (explaining that the most common purpose of "joint purchasing arrangements" is "to obtain lower prices on more favorable terms"). Lower input prices would likely have benefited car purchasers, not harmed them. See John B. Kirkwood, Powerful Buyers and Merger Enforcement, 92 B.U. L. Rev. 1485, 1505 n.75 (2012) (noting that "[l]ower input prices generally yield lower prices and greater output of end products" (quoting Jonathan M. Jacobson & Gary J. Dorman, Joint Purchasing, Monopsony and Antitrust, 36 Antitrust Bull. 1, 4 (1991))).

Plaintiffs claim that they were harmed because any savings from the car-part and steel supplier agreements were not passed on to them. (See, e.g., DPP ¶ 87 (alleging that with respect to the steel-purchasing agreement, "Defendants pocketed the cost savings and did not pass along a single cent to the Dealer Plaintiffs").) That result would have been odd, as "[a] firm will normally pass on some portion [31] of its cost-per-unit savings to consumers even if it is a profit-maximizing monopolist." Freeman v. San Diego Ass'n of Realtors, 322 F.3d 1133, 1145 n.11 (9th Cir. 2003). But in any event, Plaintiffs do not explain why Defendants were required to pass on their cost savings. If Defendants had collectively agreed that none of them would share cost savings with consumers, [5] As the Court reads the complaints, Plaintiffs do not offer the soft-top convertible and AdBlue tank allegations in support of separate, component-level Sherman Act claims. They instead offer those allegations to support the broader "whole car conspiracy" to reduce innovation that is claimed. The Court, then, will not separately consider whether the soft-top convertible and AdBlue tank agreements would plausibly violate the Sherman Act on their own.

then perhaps that agreement would have unreasonably restrained trade and harmed consumers. But the complaints do not include any factual allegations supporting such an agreement.

As for Defendants funding of now-debunked studies on diesel emissions, Plaintiffs do not explain how they were injured or how trade was restrained by this conduct. They do not allege that these scientific studies affected the price of their cars or that they relied on these studies in purchasing their cars; nor do they dispute that the principal study discussed in the IPP complaint was never published. (See Joint Mot., Dkt. No. 321 at 41 n. 17.)

To support a Sherman Act claim, a private plaintiff must "allege some credible injury caused by the [challenged] conduct." Am. Ad Mgmt., Inc. v. Gen. Tel. Co. of California, 190 F.3d 1051, 1056 (9th Cir. 1999). The nonconclusory, evidentiary facts in the complaints do not support a credible injury to Plaintiffs resulting from Defendants' agreements regarding part suppliers, [32] steel purchases, and scientific studies.

The well-pled allegations do not plausibly support any of the anticompetitive agreements that are alleged. The Court accordingly GRANTS Defendants' joint motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' Sherman Act claims. Having reached that conclusion, the Court need not consider other arguments for dismissal of the Sherman Act claims that Defendants have raised.

V. STATE LAW CLAIMS

In addition to their Sherman Act claims, the IPPs also assert that Defendants violated various state laws. The factual bases and theories of injury for these claims are the same as those for the Sherman Act claims. Like the Sherman Act claims, then, the state law claims are not well pled. Having reached that conclusion, the Court will not consider additional claim-specific arguments that Defendants have made for dismissal of the state law claims. Their [*1074] joint motion to dismiss the state law claims is GRANTED.

VI. CONCLUSION

Plaintiffs have not stated a claim for relief. It is not a certainty, however, that they cannot allege facts sufficient to address the identified deficiencies. The Court thus grants them leave to amend their complaints. To the extent that they choose to do so, [33] they must file their amended complaints within 45 days of this Order.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

ORDER

Plaintiff—a manufacturer and distributor of metal and vinyl products, including replacement windows and doors—brought this case against three of its former sales representatives and the competitor that hired them, seeking damages and injunctive relief for alleged breach of contract, misappropriation of trade secrets, defamation, and related harms. Defendants filed four counterclaims (Doc. 41), three of which Plaintiff moves to dismiss for failure to state claims under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6). (Motion, Doc. 44.) For the reasons that follow, the Court GRANTS the Motion.

I. BACKGROUND

Plaintiff Amerimax[1] and Defendant Anlin are window vendors that sell to dealers. (Countercl. ¶ 1, Doc. 41.) This case centers on certain customer lists and confidential information that Amerimax alleges it owns but that its former employees misappropriated as they departed Amerimax to work for Anlin. (See generally Am. Compl., Doc. 38.) The facts as described below are drawn from the allegations in the counterclaim, which the Court must treat as true when considering a motion to dismiss. Wilson v. Montano, 715 F.3d 847, 850 n.1 (10th Cir. 2013) (citing Brown v. Montoya, 662 F.3d 1152, 1162 (10th Cir. 2011)).

Amerimax publishes a price book for its products, which is widely available and routinely received by dealers. (Countercl. [*3] ¶ 3.) However, Amerimax typically charges dealers less than the price published in the book—at a discount that varies per dealer based on a "Base Factor" and "Options Factor"—pursuant to an industry standard practice. (Id.) Dealers are not required to keep their individualized pricing confidential and regularly disclose such information in negotiations with competitors of Amerimax. (Id. ¶ 4.) Amerimax maintains a spreadsheet of the Base Factors for all its customers, which it calls the "Master Pricing List." (Id. ¶ 5.)

In October 2003, Amerimax hired Defendant Marie Clark, who worked as a sales representative for the company with territory in Colorado, Wyoming, and Nebraska. (Id. ¶ 21.) In July 2006, Amerimax hired Defendant John Applegate, who worked as a sales representative with territory in Colorado, New Mexico, and Texas. (Id. ¶ 6.) Neither had any supervisory responsibilities. (Id. ¶¶ 8, 23.) In May 2016, Amerimax sent Applegate and Clark an e-mail with the subject "Restrictive Covenant Agreement," stating that "effective immediately . . . [e]mployees who are eligible for any bonus or incentive must sign the agreement on an annual basis. Employees who fail to do so will not be [*4] paid any bonus or incentive payment." Amerimax sent a follow-up e-mail a few days later stating that "[i]n order for Q1 SIP bonuses to be processed and paid — these [agreements] need to be turned in today." (Id. ¶¶ 11, 26 ("Agreements").) Both Applegate and Clark were eligible for bonuses and signed the documents, but currently insist that none of the information to which they had access during their time with the company was ever identified as confidential or secret. (Id. ¶¶ 13, 27.)

Citing ineffective servicing of customers, compensation and benefits issues, unrealistic sales targets, and (in the case of Clark) offensive offhand remarks, Clark and Applegate eventually provided two weeks' notice and resigned effective May and June 2018, respectively. (Id. ¶¶ 16, 18, 27, 30.) Shortly after their departures, both went to work for Anlin. (Id. ¶¶ 17, 31.) On June 25, 2018, Anlin mailed an announcement to many window contractors, including Amerimax customers, advertising Clark's new affiliation with Anlin. (Id. ¶ 32.) On July 2, 2018, Anlin did the same regarding Applegate. (Id. ¶18.) Both employees maintain that they did not take the Master Pricing List, memorize it, or use the information [*5] contained therein with respect their employment with Anlin. (Id. ¶¶ 17, 31.) Neither directly solicited any Amerimax customers or made any disparaging comments concerning their former employer. (Id. ¶¶ 19-20, 33-34.)

In September 2009, Amerimax hired Defendant Patricia Moline as a customer service representative to handle incoming orders and inquiries. (Id. ¶ 35.) She does not recall ever being presented with or signing a "Restrictive Covenant Agreement." (Id. ¶ 38.) Citing stagnant compensation and decreasing benefits, she left Amerimax in June 2018. (Id. ¶¶ 39, 42.) Like Applegate and Clark, she maintains that none of the information to which she was privy at Amerimax was described as secret or confidential, she did not take or use the Master Pricing List, and she has never made any disparaging remarks about her former employer. (Id. ¶¶ 39, 43.)

[1] Plaintiff OmniMax International, Inc., formerly known as Euramax International, Inc., has an operating and manufacturing division called "Amerimax," which is at issue in this dispute. For ease of reference in the present Order, the Court will refer to Amerimax in place of either OmniMax or Euramax.

Amerimax brought this action for damages and injunctive relief against Defendants, alleging breaches of non-compete and non-solicitation covenants and related obligations, as well as violations of the Colorado Uniform Trade Secrets Act. Defendants asserted four counterclaims against Amerimax. Count One pursues a declaration under Colo. Rev. Stat. § 8-2-113(1)-(2) that none [*6] of the Agreements are enforceable against Applegate, Clark, or Moline. Count Two seeks damages pursuant to the same statute to compensate Applegate and Clark for the alleged threats and intimidation Amerimax employed in causing them to sign the Agreements. Count Three asserts unlawful restraint of trade in violation of Colo. Rev. Stat. § 6-4-104. Count Four claims that Amerimax's filing and prosecution of this case is an abuse of process. The instant Motion seeks dismissal of the latter three of these claims.

II. ANALYSIS

The legal sufficiency of a pleading is a question of law. Dubbs v. Head Start, Inc., 336 F.3d 1194, 1201 (10th Cir. 2003). As noted above, at this stage all allegations of material fact in support of the counterclaims must be accepted as true. Wilson v. Montano, 715 F.3d at 850 n.1. Still, "[t]o survive a motion to dismiss, a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to 'state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'" Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) (quoting Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007)). Plausibility means that the pleader set forth facts which allow "the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Id. "[L]abels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of a cause of action's elements will not do." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 545.

A. Count [*7] Two: Claim for Damages Under Colo. Rev. Stat. § 8-2-113(1)

Defendants' second claim is for damages they allege were caused by Amerimax's use of "threats and/or intimidation to cause Applegate and Clark to sign" the Agreements. (Countercl. ¶ 54, Doc. 41.) This, they argue, violates Colorado law and entitles them to sue for damages. The statute in question, dubbed "Unlawful to intimidate worker--agreement not to compete," declares it "unlawful to use force, threats, or other means of intimidation to prevent any person from engaging in any lawful occupation at any place he sees fit." Colo Rev. Stat. § 8-2-113(1). It goes on to declare that except for certain contracts, including those for the protection of trade secrets or regarding management personnel and executive staff, "any covenant not to compete . . . shall be void." Id. § 8-2-113(2). Applegate and Clark allege that they were damaged by Amerimax's "use[of] threats and/or intimidation . . . . Specifically, Amerimax threatened Applegate and Clark in emails that unless they signed [a] Restrictive Covenant Agreement, they would not receive bonuses to which they were already entitled." (Countercl. ¶¶ 54-55.) Amerimax responds that even if one assumes its behavior violated the statute, the state legislature [*8] did not intend this provision to create a private right of action for damages.

In a diversity case like this one, federal courts seek to ascertain and apply state law and must defer to the decisions of the controlling state's highest court. Kokins v. Teleflex, Inc., 621 F.3d 1290, 1295 (10th Cir. 2010). Unfortunately, no party has pointed to any Colorado decision with direct guidance on the question whether a party may seek damages for a statutorily improper threat under Section 113. And the statute itself provides no express authorization for a such a claim. So, the Court must divine whether such authorization should be inferred. In matters of statutory interpretation, Colorado's Supreme Court has declared that a court's "fundamental task must be to discern and effectuate the legislature's intent. When, as here, a claimant alleges that a statute, ordinance, or regulation implicitly creates a private right of action, the critical question is whether the legislature intended such a result." City of Arvada ex rel. Arvada Police Dep't v. Denver Health & Hosp. Auth., 403 P.3d 609, 614, 2017 CO 97 (Colo. 2017). This Court is not convinced of the practicality of that intent-based approach to statutory interpretation,[2] but if "no controlling state decision exists, the federal court must attempt to predict what the state's highest court would do." TMJ Implants, Inc. v. Aetna, Inc., 498 F.3d 1175, 1180 (10th Cir. 2007) (internal quotations and citations [*9] omitted).

Fortunately, Colorado's Supreme Court has given us more concrete guidance in how it interprets statutory text structure when it comes to allegations of implied rights of action. As an initial matter, "if the legislature includes a remedy in the statute at issue, [Colorado courts] will conclude it did not intend for the courts to create others." City of Arvada, 403 P.3d at 614-15 (quoting Allstate Ins. Co. v. Parfrey, 830 P.2d 905, 910-11 (Colo. 1992)). But if the statute "is totally silent on the matter of remedy," then the court "must determine whether a private civil remedy reasonably may be implied." This turns on three factors:

(1) "whether the plaintiff is within the class of persons intended to be benefitted by the legislative enactment";
(2) "whether the legislature intended to create, albeit implicitly, a private right of action"; and
(3) "whether an implied civil remedy would be consistent with the purposes of the legislative scheme."

Id. The statute must satisfy all of these for a court to "conclude the legislature clearly expressed its intent to create a cause of action conferring standing on the claimant." Id. Discussing these considerations, Parfrey suggests that inferring a right of action may be [*10] appropriate when doing so would incentivize compliance and failing to do so would leave the statutorily-intended beneficiary without recourse. See Parfrey, 830 P.2d at 911; City of Arvada, 403 P.3d at 615.

Applying this framework, the Court holds that Section 113 does not clearly afford the Defendants, under the circumstances presented here, a cause of action for damages. It is worth emphasizing that the Court is not deciding whether there are ever any potential circumstances in which a damages action for violation of Section 113 might succeed. But the alleged intimidation here relates entirely to threatening to withhold bonuses if Clark and Applegate did not sign the Agreements. (See Countercl. ¶¶ 45, 54-55.) The question before the Court is therefore limited to whether Colorado law provides a right to sue for damages based on such allegations where the employees entered covenants, continued their employment, and received all benefits they were due.

As Amerimax argues, the law at issue is not silent on the matter of remedy. Illegal non-competition covenants are void. Colo Rev. Stat. § 8-2-113(2). Defendants respond by pointing out that not all covenants are illegal, and that the remedy does not cover all prohibited conduct, for example where a facially acceptable covenant (e.g., one purporting [*11] to protect trade secrets) is procured by prohibited conduct (e.g., via intimidation). This is so, but it does not alter the fact that in this case, at least, any alleged damage flows from being induced to enter the Agreements. The bonuses in question were ultimately paid, and the threats and intimidation did not, as far as the counterclaim asserts, lead to any damage other than that allegedly caused by the Agreements themselves.

Moreover, the remedy here of avoiding the covenants incentivizes compliance and is consistent with existing state law. This claim is essentially one alleging that the Agreements were signed under duress, and such harms are well-guarded against by Colorado's general principles of contract law. And those principles provide the same remedies: voidability and rescission. Vail/Arrowhead, Inc. v. Dist. Court for the Fifth Judicial Dist., Eagle Cty., 954 P.2d 608, 612 (Colo. 1998) ("A contract is voidable on the grounds of duress if a party's manifestation of assent is induced by an improper threat that leaves no reasonable alternative.") (citing Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 176 (1981)). Absent any authority indicating otherwise, the Court cannot say that the Colorado legislature intended to upend these common, privately accessible equitable principles by tacitly authorizing statutory damages in circumstances [*12] where the law has dependably afforded only equitable remedies.

Finally, the language of Section 113(1)—"[t]hat it shall be unlawful to use force, threats, or other means of intimidation to prevent any person from engaging in any lawful occupation"—has been in place for a century, where it once appeared alongside codes prohibiting (and providing criminal penalties for) blacklisting, picketing, and publishing notices of boycott. See Colo. Rev. Stat. Ch. XV Sec. 400 (1908) ("Blacklisting and Boycotting"). As historically, there are today criminal penalties in place to discipline (and therefore deter) violations of the provision in questions. Colo. Rev. Stat. § 8-2-115 ("Any person, firm, or corporation violating any provisions of sections 8-2-112 to 8-2-115 is guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not less than ten dollars nor more than two hundred fifty dollars, or by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than sixty days, or by both such fine and imprisonment."). Colorado law, therefore has implemented effective deterrents and remedies in place to enforce the state's longstanding prohibition, but it imbues the state—and not private parties—with armament in non-equitable remedies.

Although the considerations [*13] laid out by Parfrey involve some overlap, the gravity of available legislative materials, existing criminal penalties, and available equitable remedies—taken together—do not permit the Court to infer that Colorado's "legislature clearly expressed its intent to create a cause of action" for damages under Section 113 in these circumstances. Defendants' second counterclaim therefore must be dismissed.

B. Claim Three: Antitrust Claim Under Colo. Rev. Stat. § 6-4-104

Under the Colorado Antitrust Act of 1992 ("Act"), "[e]very contract, combination in the form of a trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce is illegal." Colo. Rev. Stat. § 6-4-104. At this motion to dismiss stage, the debate is whether Defendants' allegations concerning the Agreements adequately invoke the Act.

As the parties agree, stating a claim under the Act is analogous to one brought under the federal Sherman Act and involves three elements: (1) the defendant entered into an agreement constituting a contract, combination in the form of a trust or otherwise, or conspiracy; (2) that constitutes an unreasonable restraint on trade; and (3) the plaintiff suffered an antitrust injury. *JTS Choice Enterprises, Inc. v. E.I. DuPont De Nemours & Co., No. 11-CV-03143-WJM-KMT, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 24332, 2014 WL 793525, at *4-5 (D. Colo. Feb. 26, 2014) [*14] ; Arapahoe Surgery Ctr., LLC v. Cigna Healthcare, Inc., 80 F. Supp. 3d 1257, 1262 (D. Colo. 2015) ("The Colorado Antitrust Act is the state law analogue to the Sherman Act. . . . [T]he courts shall use as a guide interpretations given by the federal courts to comparable federal antitrust laws." (internal citations omitted)).

Assuming for present purposes that Anlin has alleged that the Agreements restrain trade, the Motion focuses on the third element—whether the pleadings sufficiently state an antitrust injury. "An antitrust injury is defined as an injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful." Sports Racing Servs., Inc. v. Sports Car Club of Am., Inc., 131 F.3d 874, 882 (10th Cir. 1997). The thrust of this analysis is whether a particular practice is "anticompetitive," using that term with special antitrust meaning reflecting the regulations' "basic objectives, the protection of a competitive process that brings to consumers the benefits of lower prices, better products, and more efficient production methods. . . . In this lexicon, a practice ultimately judged anticompetitive is one which harms competition, not a particular competitor." SCFC ILC, Inc. v. Visa USA, Inc., 36 F.3d 958, 963 (10th Cir. 1994) (internal citations omitted); see also Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl—O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 488, 97 S. Ct. 690, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977) (holding antitrust laws were enacted to protect competition, not competitors).

For [*15] many courts, the "crucial first step," "screen," or "filter" dispositive of whether an accused's practices harm competition within the meaning of the antitrust statutes is whether that firm possesses "market power." SCFC, 36 F.3d at 963. As the Tenth Circuit explained in SCFC, "market power is the ability to raise price by restricting output. '[I]n economic terms [it] is the ability to raise price without a total loss of sales.' Without market power, consumers shop around to find a rival offering a better deal." Id. at 965 (quoting 2 P. Areeda & D. Turner, Antitrust Law ¶ 501, at 322 (1978)). The Circuit continued by quoting from one of the foremost antitrust authorities in the United States: "if we accept the notion that the point of antitrust is promoting consumer welfare, then it is clear why the concept of market power plays such a prominent role in antitrust analysis. If the structure of the market is such that there is little potential for consumers to be harmed, we need not be especially concerned with how firms behave." Id. (quoting George A. Hay, Market Power in Antitrust, 60 Antitrust L.J. 807, 808 (1992)).

Here, Anlin has failed to plausibly allege any comprehensible antitrust injury. Its threadbare, singular allegation—that the Agreements [*16] have anticompetitive effects because they tend to limit the entry of new companies into the Colorado market—is assumptive, conclusory, not colored by any facts permitting that inference, and ignores wholesale the fundamental principles of consumer protection the antitrust laws were enacted maintain. For example, the threshold market power query begins with the determination of the relevant market and involves evaluating the geographic reach of the businesses at issue and the type, price, and interchangeability of the products they sell. Id. at 966. Aside from a short conclusion that Anlin itself has suffered injury because of the Agreements with three employees, the counterclaims fail to even hypothetically plead facts to inform the Court of the relevant market, the market power of any party, or how the use of the Agreements causes that or any other antitrust injury, such as a negative impact on consumers. In all, Anlin has failed to nudge its allegations of an antitrust injury across the line from conceivable to plausible, Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570, and its third counterclaim accordingly fails.

C. Claim Four: Abuse of Process

The final claim at issue is for abuse of process. In Colorado, abuse of process requires proof [*17] of (1) an ulterior purpose in the use of judicial proceedings; (2) willful actions by a defendant in the use of process that are not proper in the regular conduct of a proceeding; and (3) damages. Hewitt v. Rice, 154 P.3d 408, 414 (Colo. 2007). "An improper use of the legal process occurs when a particular procedural tool is used in an attempt to accomplish a result which that tool, when properly used, could not provide." Gustafson v. Am. Family Mut. Ins. Co., 901 F. Supp. 2d 1289, 1305 (D. Colo. 2012). "If the action is confined to its regular and legitimate function in relation to the cause of action stated in the complaint there is no abuse, even if the plaintiff had an ulterior motive in bringing the action or if he knowingly brought suit upon an unfounded claim." James H. Moore & Assocs. Realty, Inc. v. Arrowhead at Vail, 892 P.2d 367, 373 (Colo. App. 1994). And "while the ulterior motive may be inferred from the wrongful use of the process, the wrongful use may not be inferred from the motive." Id.; see also Restatement (Second) of Torts § 682 comment b (1977) ("[T]here is no action for abuse of process when the process is used for the purpose for which it is intended, [although] there is an incidental motive of spite or an ulterior purpose.").

Here, the allegations purporting to state a claim for abuse of process are severely limited. According to the counterclaims, Amerimax had an ulterior purpose in filing this action, which was an attempt [*18] to enforce knowingly void non-compete agreements and deter Anlin's right to legitimate competition in Colorado. Even were the Court to assume the truth of that accusation, Defendants have failed to plausibly allege any legal impropriety, and an "ulterior or even nefarious motive, alone, isn't enough to constitute an abuse of process." *Parks v. Edward Dale Parrish LLC, 2019 COA 19, 2019 WL 470515, at 3 (Colo. App. 2019). Defendants have not sought to test the assertion that Amerimax's claims lack factual or legal support through a motion to dismiss, but even if they did so successfully, "filing a complaint not justified in fact or law alone is not enough to amount to an abuse of process." *GN Netcom, Inc. v. Callpod, Inc., No. 11-CV-03271-RBJ, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 132001, 2012 WL 4086530, at 2 (D. Colo. Sept. 17, 2012) (reviewing Colorado authority). Even if there is an alleged "ulterior motive," there are no allegations showing this action and its procedural tools have been used for anything other than their regular, legitimate judicial functions. Anlin's fourth counterclaim thus does not allege a prima facie case for abuse of process, and accordingly fails.

III. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, counterclaims Two, Three, and Four are DISMISSED without prejudice. Defendants may proceed on their claim for declaratory relief.

[*1080] ORDER GRANTING IN PART AND DENYING IN PART DEFENDANTS' MOTION TO DISMISS, AND DENYING WITHOUT PREJUDICE PLAINTIFF'S MOTION FOR PARTIAL SUMMARY JUDGMENT

Docket Nos. 33, 113

Plaintiff Diva Limousine ("Diva"), a licensed provider of livery services in California, brings this [2] putative class action on behalf of providers of pre-arranged ground transportation services against Uber Technologies and its subsidiaries ("Uber"). Diva alleges that Uber secures unlawful cost savings by misclassifying its drivers as independent contractors instead of employees. In doing so, Uber takes business and market share from competitors like Diva who operate their businesses in compliance with the law. Diva also alleges that Uber, armed with cash from investors, prices its services below cost in order to drive out competitors. Diva asserts that Uber's actions violate the California Unfair Competition Law ("UCL") and the California Unfair Practices Act ("UPA").

Pending before the Court are Uber's motion to dismiss Diva's First Amended Complaint and Diva's motion for partial summary judgment on the issue of driver misclassification. See Docket Nos. 33, 113. For the reasons discussed below, Uber's motion to dismiss is GRANTED in part and DENIED in part, and Diva's motion for partial summary judgment is DENIED without prejudice.

I. BACKGROUND

A. Factual Background

The First Amended Complaint alleges the following. Diva is a licensed provider of limousine and chauffeur-driven ground [3] transportation services in California. Docket. No. 106 ("FAC") ¶ 39. Diva maintains affiliate relationships with limousine companies outside of California. Id. ¶ 44. These out-of-state affiliates refer clients who are looking to book rides in California to Diva and receive a fee or commission for the referral. Id.

Uber is a company that "provides prearranged transportation services for compensation [*1081] using an online-enabled application or platform." Id. ¶ 4. According to Diva, two aspects of Uber's business unlawfully undermine competition and cause harm to Diva. First, "Uber willfully misclassifies its California drivers as independent contractors" in violation of the California Labor Code. Id. ¶ 90. Diva alleges that Uber drivers should properly be classified as employees under California law because the drivers are integral to Uber's business and Uber "controls the precise manner in which the driver delivers Uber's service." Id. ¶¶ 69, 106 (emphasis removed). By misclassifying its drivers, Uber avoids paying minimum and overtime wages and providing benefits to its drivers as employees, saving it "a massive amount of money" and allowing it to lower prices, taking market share from competitors [4] like Diva. Id. ¶¶ 90, 112, 125.

Second, Uber prices its rides "at a level that is far below the total average costs attributable to those rides with the purpose of injuring competition." Id. ¶ 129. Because Uber charges less for rides than the costs of providing the rides, it has "consistently lost massive amounts of money." Id. ¶ 131. Uber is able to continue operating at a loss because of substantial influxes of cash provided by investors. Id. ¶ 147. "The only rational purpose for Uber subsidizing rides as it has done and continues to do is to drive enough competitors out of business to be able to raise prices down the road." Id. ¶ 146.

As a result of these practices, since Uber began operating in Los Angeles, Diva has lost corporate and retail client business, and has been compelled by Uber's lower prices not to raise its own rates in line with expenses. Id. ¶¶ 41-42. It has also received fewer referrals from its out-of-state affiliates. Id. ¶ 43. Diva asserts two causes of action: a claim under the UCL, premised on Uber's alleged misclassification of its drivers, id. ¶ 127, and a claim under the UPA, premised on Uber's alleged loss-leader pricing, id. ¶¶ 162-63. Diva seeks injunctive [5] relief under the UCL and damages and injunctive relief under the UPA. Id. ¶¶ 50, 60.

Diva seeks to certify two classes of Plaintiffs. The UCL class includes "[a]ll business entities that earned revenue through the provision of pre-arranged limousine or chauffeur-driven ground transportation services for non-shared rides in California from September 10, 2014 to the present." Id. ¶ 47. The UPA class is defined identically, with the exception that the class period runs from September 10, 2015 to the present. Id. ¶ 57.

B. Procedural Background

Diva filed its class action complaint on September 10, 2018. Docket No. 1. It then filed a motion for partial summary judgment on a "single issue": whether Uber drivers are properly classified as independent contractors or employees under the California Supreme Court's recent ruling in Dynamex Operations W. v. Superior Court, 4 Cal. 5th 903, 232 Cal. Rptr. 3d 1, 416 P.3d 1 (Cal. 2018). Docket No. 33 ("PSJ Mot."). Uber requested that the pending PSJ motion "be held in abeyance subject to a further scheduling order" or "denied without prejudice as premature under the one-way intervention rule." Docket No. 48. The Court ordered briefing on the one-way intervention issue. Docket No. 98.

Uber moved to dismiss Diva's original complaint in January 2019. Docket [6] No. 100. Diva responded by filing the FAC. Docket No. 106. Uber then moved to dismiss the FAC under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(1) and 12(b)(6). Docket No. 113 ("Mot."). The motion to dismiss and the one-way intervention question on the PSJ motion are currently before the Court.

[*1082] II. LEGAL STANDARDS

Under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(1), a party may move to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. When subject matter jurisdiction is challenged, "the party seeking to invoke the court's jurisdiction bears the burden of establishing that jurisdiction exists." Scott v. Breeland, 792 F.2d 925, 927 (9th Cir. 1986). A Rule 12(b)(1) motion will be granted if the complaint, considered in its entirety, fails on its face to allege facts sufficient to establish subject matter jurisdiction. See Savage v. Glendale Union High Sch., 343 F.3d 1036, 1039 (9th Cir. 2003).

Under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6), a party may move to dismiss a complaint for failure to state a claim. To overcome a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, a plaintiff must plead "enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). "A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009). "The plausibility standard is not akin to a probability requirement, but it asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has [7] acted unlawfully." Id. (internal quotation marks omitted).

On a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, the Court "accept[s] factual allegations in the complaint as true and construe[s] the pleadings in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party." Manzarek v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 519 F.3d 1025, 1031 (9th Cir. 2008). The Court need not, however, "assume the truth of legal conclusions merely because they are cast in the form of factual allegations." Fayer v. Vaughn, 649 F.3d 1061, 1064 (9th Cir. 2011) (per curiam) (internal quotation marks omitted). Thus, "a Plaintiff's obligation to provide the 'grounds' of his 'entitlement to relief' requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555 (citing Papasan v. Allain, 478 U.S. 265, 286, 106 S. Ct. 2932, 92 L. Ed. 2d 209 (1986)).

III. UBER'S MOTION TO DISMISS

A. Subject Matter Jurisdiction

Diva asserts that this Court has subject matter jurisdiction over the claims in this case under the Class Action Fairness Act ("CAFA"), 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d). FAC ¶ 26. CAFA "vests the district court with 'original jurisdiction of any civil action in which the matter in controversy exceeds the sum or value of $5,000,000, exclusive of interest and costs, and is a class action in which' the parties satisfy, among other requirements, minimal diversity." Abrego Abrego v. The Dow Chem. Co., 443 F.3d 676, 680 (9th Cir. 2006) (quoting 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)). Minimal diversity exists where "any member of a class of plaintiffs [8] is a citizen of a State different from any defendant." 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(2)(A).

The FAC alleges that Uber is incorporated in Delaware and headquartered in San Francisco. FAC ¶¶ 17-21. For diversity purposes, then, Defendants are citizens of Delaware and California. See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c)(1) ("[A] corporation shall be deemed to be a citizen of every State and foreign state by which it has been incorporated and of the State or foreign state where it has its principal place of business . . . ."). Each of the two putative classes in this action are a combination of "limousine and chauffeur-driven ground transportation services within California" [*1083] and "business entities outside of California" that have affiliate relationships with instate Plaintiffs. FAC ¶¶

48 (UCL class), 58 (UPA class) (emphases added). The in-state Plaintiffs are not diverse from Uber; they have California citizenship in common. Thus, the CAFA minimal diversity requirement is only met if at least one out-of-state affiliate within each putative class is a citizen of a state other than Delaware or California.

Diva alleges that these affiliates are, indeed, "not citizens of California." Id. ¶ 27. The FAC recites a statistic that 84 percent of the approximately 17,300 [9] limousine and chauffeur-driven ground transportation companies in the United States have their principal place of business in states other than California, and that "the overwhelming majority of these companies . . . are also incorporated in states other than California." Id. ¶ 28. As a result, Diva submits that it can be "reasonably estimated" that there are out-of-state affiliates in each putative class that are not citizens of California. Id. ¶ 29. These allegations are insufficient to establish minimal diversity. "Absent unusual circumstances, a party seeking to invoke diversity jurisdiction should be able to allege affirmatively the actual citizenship of the relevant parties." Kanter v. Warner-Lambert Co., 265 F.3d 853, 857 (9th Cir. 2001) (citation omitted). The FAC does not identify any specific out-of-state affiliates or their states of citizenship. Nor does the FAC expressly allege that the out-of-state affiliates are not citizens of Delaware.

Diva attempts to remedy its pleading deficiency by supplying supplemental facts relevant to jurisdiction with its opposition brief. A declaration from Diva's Chairman, Bijan Zoughi, identifies at least thirteen limousine companies with which Diva has had affiliate relationships within the last four [10] years; none of the affiliates is based in California or Delaware. See Docket No. 114-2 ¶¶ 5-7. In addition, public records show that each of the thirteen affiliates is incorporated in and has its principal place of business in a state other than California or Delaware.[1] See Docket No. 114-4, Exhs. A—N. These facts, if considered, would establish minimal diversity because they demonstrate that multiple members of the putative classes are citizens of states different from Uber. Uber does not dispute this; its reply merely urges the Court to order Diva to amend its complaint to properly allege these facts instead of allowing Diva to establish them in via extrinsic submissions. See Docket No. 117 at 3.

The Ninth Circuit has articulated the general framework for determining when a court may consider extrinsic evidence to resolve a jurisdictional challenge:

> A Rule 12(b)(1) jurisdictional attack may be facial or factual. In a facial attack, the challenger asserts that the allegations contained in a complaint are insufficient on their face to invoke federal jurisdiction. By contrast, in a factual attack, the challenger disputes the truth of the allegations [*1084] that, by themselves, would otherwise invoke federal [11] jurisdiction. . . . In resolving a factual attack on jurisdiction, the district court may review evidence beyond the complaint without converting the motion to dismiss into a motion for summary judgment.

Safe Air for Everyone v. Meyer, 373 F.3d 1035, 1039 (9th Cir. 2004) (citations omitted). Under this framework, a plaintiff would ordinarily be permitted to submit evidence beyond what it alleged in its complaint when the defendant mounts a factual attack on jurisdiction. See id. Here, however, Uber is arguing that the allegations in the FAC are insufficient, even if taken as true, to establish minimal diversity—a facial attack. "[C]ourts do not consider evidence outside the pleadings when deciding a facial attack." *United Poultry Concerns v. Chabad of Irvine, No. SACV1601810ABGJSX, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 170193, 2017 WL 3000019, at 1 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 20, 2017); *MVP Asset Management (USA) LLC v. Vestbirk, No. 2:10-cv-02483-GEB-CMK, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 44822, 2011 WL 1457424, 1 (E.D. Cal. Apr. 14, 2011) (same).

[1] Diva requests judicial notice of these public records. The Court can properly take judicial notice of these documents because they are public records provided by government agencies and their authenticity is not disputed. See Fed. R. Evid. 201 (allowing a court to take judicial notice of a fact "not subject to reasonable dispute in that it is . . . capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned"); Daniels-Hall v. Nat'l Educ. Ass'n, 629 F.3d 992, 998-99 (9th Cir. 2010) ("It is appropriate to take judicial notice of this information, as it was made publicly available by government entities . . . , and neither party disputes the authenticity of the web sites or the accuracy of the information displayed therein."). The Court, however, cannot take judicial notice of the facts in the Zoughi declaration.

Because the FAC on its face does not allege sufficient facts to establish subject matter jurisdiction, Uber's Rule 12(b)(1) motion to dismiss is GRANTED. Diva may amend its complaint within 30 days of the date of this Order to incorporate the new facts establishing minimal diversity. Notwithstanding the dismissal on jurisdictional grounds, the parties agreed at the hearing that the Court must still address Uber's [12] arguments for dismissing Diva's claims on the merits, since resolution of those arguments informs the potential futility and scope of any amendment. The Court therefore proceeds to determine the viability of Diva's UPA and UCL claims.

B. UPA Claim

The UPA makes it "unlawful for any person engaged in business within this state to sell any article or product at less than the cost thereof to such vender, or to give away any article or product for the purpose of injuring competitors or destroying competition." Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17043. Diva alleges that Uber's practice of offering rides as a loss leader[2] with the intent of driving competitors out of the market violates the UPA. FAC ¶¶ 162-63. Uber argues that Diva's UPA claim fails as a matter of law because a statutory provision exempts Uber from UPA liability. The UPA expressly exempts two categories of services, articles, or products from its coverage:

> (1) To any service, article or product for which rates are established under the jurisdiction of the Public Utilities Commission of this State and sold or furnished by any public utility corporation, or installation and repair services rendered in connection with any services, articles [13] or products.
> (2) To any service, article or product sold or furnished by a publicly owned public utility and upon which the rates would have been established under the jurisdiction of the Public Utilities Commission of this State if such service, article or product had been sold or furnished by a public utility corporation, or installation and repair services rendered in connection with any services, articles or products.

Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17024.

Uber believes it falls within the first exemption. Diva disagrees. Their dispute [*1085] centers on the meaning of the phrase "for which rates are established under the jurisdiction of the Public Utilities Commission."[3] To Uber, this phrase indicates that "it does not matter who sets the rates, as long as the rates are established under the jurisdiction of the CPUC." Mot. at 11 (emphases in original). Diva, on the other hand, interprets the phrase as applying only to rates actually established by the CPUC; it is not enough that the CPUC has the authority to set rates but has not exercised it. Opp. at 8 ("The narrowly-defined exemption . . . . only exempts rates that have been established by the CPUC."). This distinction is critical because while "the parties do not dispute that the [14] CPUC has authority to regulate Uber," Diva alleges that "the CPUC has never used that authority to set Uber's rates." Id. at 14; see FAC ¶¶ 83-88 (allegations regarding the CPUC's jurisdiction over Uber).

The plain language of the statute and the case law interpreting § 17024 support Uber's position.

1. Statutory Text and Related Provisions

"[I]n all cases of statutory interpretation, we begin with the language of the governing statute." Beal Bank, SSB v. Arter & Hadden, LLP, 42 Cal. 4th 503, 507, 66 Cal. Rptr. 3d 52, 167 P.3d 666 (2007); see Satterfield v. Simon &

[2] The UPA defines "[l]oss leader" as "any article or product sold at less than cost . . . [w]here the effect is to divert trade from or otherwise injure competitors." Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17030(c).

[3] The parties are in accord that Uber is a "public utility corporation" within the meaning of § 17024(1). "'Public utility' includes every common carrier . . . where the service is performed for, or the commodity is delivered to, the public or any portion thereof." Cal. Pub. Util. Code § 216(a). A "common carrier," in turn, "means every person and corporation providing transportation for compensation to or for the public or any portion thereof." Id. § 211. "Whenever any common carrier . . . performs a service for, or delivers a commodity to, the public or any portion thereof for which any compensation or payment whatsoever is received, that common carrier . . . is a public utility subject to the jurisdiction, control, and regulation of the commission and the provisions of [the California Public Utilities Act]." Id. § 216(b).

Schuster, Inc., 569 F.3d 946, 951 (9th Cir. 2009). By its terms, the exemption in § 17024(1) covers "any service, article or product for which rates are established under the jurisdiction of the Public Utilities Commission." Notably, the statute does not say "rates established by the Public Utilities Commission." This undercuts Diva's assertion that a public utility only qualifies for the exemption if its rates are actually established by the CPUC. Rather, the lack of specificity as to who must set the rates suggests that the legislature did not intend to limit the exemption to public utilities whose rates are actually set by the CPUC. Cf. Dean v. United States, 556 U.S. 568, 572, 129 S. Ct. 1849, 173 L. Ed. 2d 785 (2009) ("The passive voice focuses on an event that occurs without respect to a specific actor . . . .").

Diva counters that "[w]ith respect to establishing rates, this provision refers [15] to no actor other than the CPUC," so it must be the CPUC that is setting the rates. Opp. at 12-13. Diva cites Coso Energy Developers v. Cty. of Inyo, 122 Cal. App. 4th 1512, 19 Cal. Rptr. 3d 669 (2004), in which the court held that one clause in a statute written in the passive voice is not ambiguous where the statute "includes no language suggesting an actor other than the State of California." Id. at 1525. But the statute in Coso differs from the statute at issue here in one critical respect—it identified the actor in the active voice in the clause immediately preceding the passive clause. In full, the statute provided:

> The State of California hereby cedes to the United States of America exclusive [*1086] jurisdiction over such piece or parcel of land as may have been or may be hereafter ceded or conveyed to the United States, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of this State and the service of civil process therein.

Id. at 1523. The appellant in Coso insisted that the second clause, "land as may have been or may be hereafter ceded or conveyed to the United States," means that "California cedes exclusive jurisdiction over 'all land ceded to the United States without limitation as to time or identity of the ceding party [16] .'" Id. (emphasis in original). The court disagreed because the first clause, "[t]he State of California hereby cedes," clearly specifies that "the subject of the sentence and lone actor" is the State of California and dispels any ambiguity that might otherwise have been created by the passive voice in the second clause. Id. at 1525 ("It is reasonable to infer that the undisclosed actor in the second clause is the same actor specified in the first; the lack of disclosure in the second instance can be attributed to the desire to avoid redundancy."). In marked contrast, § 17024(1) nowhere identifies a rate-setting actor. It is therefore not amenable to the narrow reading Diva advocates.

The applicability of § 17024(1) does not turn on whether the CPUC has actually set rates. As Uber points out, the California Public Utilities Code expressly provides that it is within the CPUC's discretion to regulate public utilities within its jurisdiction, including by setting rates, but that the CPUC is not required to do so in all instances. See Cal. Pub. Util. Code § 701 ("The commission may supervise and regulate every public utility in the State and may do all things . . . necessary and convenient in the exercise of such power and jurisdiction."); id. [17] § 728.5(a) ("The commission may establish rates or charges for the transportation of passengers and freight by railroads and other transportation companies . . . ."). Similarly, the California Constitution provides that the CPUC "may fix rates for all public utilities subject to its jurisdiction[.]" Cal. Const. Art. XII, § 6 (emphasis added); see also id., Art. XII, § 4 (CPUC "may fix rates and establish rules for the transportation of passengers"). This context lends credence to the notion that the rates established by a public utility which are merely subject to the CPUC's jurisdiction are "rates are established under the jurisdiction of" CPUC irrespective of whether the CPUC actually exercises its rate setting authority.[4]

The broader interpretation of § 17024 is supported by the fact that the statutory scheme allows the CPUC to consider anticompetitive concerns when regulating public utility corporations like Uber. As alleged, Uber is a "charter-party carrier of passengers" under the Public Utilities Code. See FAC ¶ 4; Cal. Pub. Util. Code § 5360 ("'[C]harter-party carrier of passengers' means every person engaged in the transportation of persons by motor vehicle for compensation, whether in common or contract carriage, over any public highway in this state."). [18] The CPUC is given broad authority to "supervise and regulate every charter-party carrier of passengers in the State and may do all things, whether specifically designated in this part, or in addition thereto, which are necessary and convenient in the exercise of [*1087] such power and jurisdiction." Cal. Pub. Util. Code § 5381. In particular, charter-party carriers are required to obtain "a certificate [of] public convenience and necessity" from the CPUC to operate. Id. § 5371. In granting a certificate of public convenience and necessity, the CPUC "may attach to the permit or certificate such terms and conditions as, in its judgment, are required in the public interest." Id. § 5375. Although the Public Utilities Code does not expressly require the CPUC to weigh anticompetitive concerns, courts have observed that "the PUC undoubtedly does 'take antitrust considerations into account in determining whether a [transaction] will advance the public interest.'"[5] McCaw Per. Commc'ns, Inc. v. Pac. Telesis Grp., 645 F. Supp. 1166, 1171 (N.D. Cal. 1986) (alteration in original) (quoting N. California Power Agency v. Pub. Util. Com., 5 Cal. 3d 370, 377, 96 Cal. Rptr. 18, 486 P.2d 1218 (1971)). That the CPUC retains authority to address anticompetitive behavior in regulating charter-party carriers suggests that the legislature intended to leave to the CPUC the field of regulating and monitoring prices of utilities under its jurisdiction. [19]

[4] To be sure, the statute is not without ambiguity. Section 17024 does not, for instance, refer to rates "subject to regulation by" CPUC—language which would have made the broader reach of the exemption clear.

Diva's statutory arguments to the contrary are not persuasive. First, Diva purports to rely on the plain text of the statute:

> A plain reading of Section 17024(1) shows that the exemption only applies to a service, such as an Uber ride, "for which rates are established" by the CPUC. By reading these critical words out of the statute, Uber invites the Court to violate fundamental canons of statutory interpretation.

Opp. at 11 (emphasis in original). But it is Diva who reads critical words out of the statute, ignoring the operative phrase "under the jurisdiction of" from § 17024(1) and replacing it with "by the CPUC." See Abbott Labs. v. Franchise Tax Bd., 175 Cal. App. 4th 1346, 1359, 96 Cal. Rptr. 3d 864 (2009) ("Deleting the language . . . from [the statute] rewrites the statute to give the statute a purpose quite different than the one enacted by the legislature.").

Second, Diva argues that "Uber's interpretation of Section 17024(1) cannot be harmonized with Section 17024(2)." Opp. at 11. Whereas § 17024(1) exempts privately owned public utilities from the UPA's proscriptions, § 17024(2) exempts publicly owned public utilities for which rate-setting authority belongs to municipalities rather than the CPUC. See Cty. of Inyo v. Pub. Utilities Com., 26 Cal. 3d 154, 165-66, 161 Cal. Rptr. 172, 604 P.2d 566 (1980). Diva asserts that because the two categories of exemptions are analogous, if Uber is correct that § 17024(1) applies to privately owned public utilities whose rates could [20] be set by the CPUC, then § 17024(2) would have been written to apply to publicly owned public utilities whose rates "could have been established [*1088] under the jurisdiction of" the CPUC if they had been privately owned. Opp. at 11-12. Instead, § 17024(2) applies to publicly owned public utilities whose "rates would have been established under the jurisdiction of the Public Utilities Commission of this State if such service, article or product had been sold or furnished by a public utility corporation." Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17024(2) (emphasis added).

Diva reads too much into the statute. The "would have been" language in § 17024(2) has a much simpler and logical purpose, as one court explained recently:

> The fact that the private companies are, and the publicly owned entities are not, under the jurisdiction of the PUC, explains the difference in wording in the two subsections: the "would have been" counter factual (or subjunctive) phrase is used in subsection (2) because the PUC doesn't normally have jurisdiction over the

[5] Uber has also cited examples of the CPUC considering risks of anticompetitive behavior in regulating rates for other common carriers. For instance, in 1990 the CPUC adopted a flexible rate program for the trucking industry whereby "common carriers [were] allowed rate freedom within a zone of reasonableness." Regulation of Gen. Freight Transp. by Truck, 35 C.P.U.C. 2d 307, 307 (Feb. 7, 1990). In those proceedings, the CPUC made clear that "[t]he principal reason for regulation of utility rates in general is to prevent monopoly pricing due to restriction of supply." Id. at 334. The decision to implement a flexible rate-setting mechanism was "based upon a finding that workable competition exists" within the industry, and the CPUC pledged to "continuously monitor the degree of competition and quality of service" under the new scheme. Id. at 334, 353.

> public entities. It is fair, however, to otherwise view the two subsections as creating the same immunity under essentially the same circumstances, thus placing the private utility corporations on equal footing with publicly owned utilities.

Actions v. Uber Techs., No. CJC-17-004925, 2018 Cal. Super. LEXIS 1913, at *6 (Cal. Super. Mar. 2, 2018), appeal docketed, No. A154694 (First App. Dist., Div. One).

Third, Diva points to California Public Utilities Code § 2106 as evidence that the legislature did not intent to "broadly immunize public utilities" from liability via § 17024. Opp. at 14. Section 2106 authorizes a private right of action against public utilities. Even by Diva's description, however, § 2106 only "enshrine[s] a general rule that [public utilities] are liable for violations of the law." [21] Opp. at 14. As such, it does not override an express statutory exemption, like § 17024, created by the legislature.

2. Case Law

No higher court in California has definitively construed § 17024(1), but the Court of Appeal in Hladek v. City of Merced, 69 Cal. App. 3d 585, 138 Cal. Rptr. 194 (1977) provided an analysis of § 17024(2) that also illuminates the scope of § 17024(1). In Hladek, a privately owned "dial-a-bus, dial-a-ride" service sued the City of Merced under the UPA for starting a competing transportation service that allegedly operated at a loss. Id. at 588. The City's service was a publicly owned public utility, raising the question whether was exempt from UPA liability under § 17024(2). In resolving the question, the court held that "the pivotal issue is whether the Public Utilities Commission would have the jurisdiction to establish the rates for such service if it had been sold or furnished by a privately owned public utility." Id. at 590 (emphasis added).

As Uber points out, and the Superior Court in Actions v. Uber Technologies observed, Hladek supports Uber's interpretation of § 17024(1) because "Hladek considered only whether the PUC would have had jurisdiction; it did not consider whether the PUC did in fact, or would, exercise its jurisdiction." 2018 Cal. Super. LEXIS 1913, at *6 (emphasis in original). The Superior Court in Actions accordingly concluded [22] that "[w]hen [Hladek's] analysis is applied to § 17024(1), then the immunity kicks in to the extent[] the PUC 'does have the jurisdiction to establish the rates for such service.'" Id. at *6-7.

Notably, Judge White of this Court has also cited Hladek in dismissing with prejudice UPA claims brought in two cases against Uber. In Desoto Cab Company, Inc. v. Uber Techs., Inc., No. 16-cv-06385, Docket No. 64 at 17 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 24, 2018), Judge White noted, "California courts have determined that the [*1089] section 17024(1) exception . . . applies where the CPUC has the jurisdiction to establish a utility's rates," and therefore "applies if Uber is a public utility."); see also A White and Yellow Cab, Inc. v. Uber Techs., Inc., No. 15-cv-05163, Docket No. 114 at 12 (same).

The courts that have addressed the issue have so concluded that the CPUC is not required to actually establish rates in order for § 17024(1) to apply. This Court agrees.

3. The Filed Rate Doctrine

Diva makes one final argument for construing the § 17024(1) exemption narrowly by analogizing § 17024 to the federal filed rate doctrine. Opp. at 10. The filed rate doctrine is "a judicial creation" that "bar[s] challenges under state law and federal antitrust laws to rates set by federal agencies." E. & J. Gallo Winery v. Encana Corp., 503 F.3d 1027, 1033 (9th Cir. 2007) (citation [23] omitted). There is no state-law equivalent of the filed rate doctrine in California. See Knevelbaard Dairies v. Kraft Foods, Inc., 232 F.3d 979, 992-93 (9th Cir. 2000) (citing Cellular Plus, Inc., v. Superior Court, 14 Cal. App. 4th 1224, 18 Cal. Rptr. 2d 308 (1993)). Diva asserts that the California Legislature intended for § 17024 to function as an analogous exemption to UPA liability for public utilities whose rates are actually set by the CPUC: "in the face of private litigation contesting public utilities rates, the Legislature needed to create a narrow safe-haven for rates approved by state regulators akin to the filed-rate doctrine. Section 17024 accomplishes this exact purpose." Opp. at 10. But Diva cites no authority—legislative history or otherwise—for this claim. Moreover, the same argument was made and rejected in Actions v. Uber Technologies. The Superior Court in Actions pointed out that "[t]he filed rate doctrine is judge made," and "doesn't affect the patent right of the legislature to step in and independently limit the reach of its own laws." *Actions v. Uber Techs., 2018 Cal. Super. LEXIS 1913, at 8. There is simply no support for Diva's claim that § 17024 must be construed as narrowly as the filed rate doctrine.

4. Conclusion

The plain language of § 17024(1) indicates that the exemption should be construed to apply to all public utilities over which the CPUC has rate-setting authority. Accordingly, Diva's UPA claim is DISMISSED with [24] prejudice.

C. UCL Claim

The UCL proscribes business practices that are (1) unlawful, (2) unfair, or (3) fraudulent. Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200. Each prong of the UCL provides a separate and distinct basis of liability. Here, Diva alleges that Uber's deliberate decision to misclassify its drivers as independent contractors to save costs is both "unfair" and "unlawful" under the UCL. FAC ¶ 127. The "unfair" prong creates a cause of action for a business practice that is unfair even if it is not proscribed by some other law. Korea Supply Co. v. Lockheed Martin Corp., 29 Cal. 4th 1134, 1143, 131 Cal. Rptr. 2d 29, 63 P.3d 937 (2003). The "unlawful" prong prohibits "anything that can properly be called a business practice and that at the same time is forbidden by law." Cel-Tech Commc'ns, Inc. v. Los Angeles Cellular Tel. Co., 20 Cal. 4th 163, 180, 83 Cal. Rptr. 2d 548, 973 P.2d 527 (1999) (internal quotation marks omitted).

Uber contends that Diva's claim under the "unfair" prong fails because Uber's alleged conduct does not violate antitrust laws, and that the claim under the "unlawful" prong fails because causation is not sufficiently alleged.

[*1090] 1. "Unfair" Prong

The California Supreme Court has held that "a plaintiff who claims to have suffered injury from a direct competitor's 'unfair' act or practice" must allege "conduct that threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because [25] its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise [*1091] significantly threatens or harms competition." Cel-Tech, 20 Cal. 4th at 186-87. "[A]ny finding of unfairness to competitors under section 17200 [must] be tethered to some legislatively declared policy or proof of some actual or threatened impact on competition." Id. The parties agree that Diva is a direct competitor to Uber, and thus must meet the pleading standard articulated in Cel-Tech. See Opp. at 19. Uber contends that the allegations in the FAC reveal that Uber's misclassification of drivers results in more competition and lower prices for consumers, which means that no antitrust laws were violated even if Diva lost business. Mot. at 18.

Uber is correct that "the antitrust laws' prohibitions focus on protecting the competitive process and not on the success or failure of individual competitors." Cascade Health Sols. v. PeaceHealth, 515 F.3d 883, 902 (9th Cir. 2008). Thus, "the antitrust laws do not punish economic behavior that benefits consumers and will not cause long-run injury to the competitive process," even if individual competitors may suffer. Id. at 903. But of course, economic behavior does not passes muster simply because it might result in lower prices. Courts must "distinguish robust competition from conduct with long-term [26] anticompetitive effects" and ward "against conduct which unfairly tends to destroy competition itself." Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447, 458-59, 113 S. Ct. 884, 122 L. Ed. 2d 247 (1993). Predatory pricing can harm competition in the long run.

Diva claims that Uber's conduct crossed the line from robust competition to unfair anti-competition. In particular, the FAC alleges that Uber's misclassification of drivers "violates the policy or spirit of the antitrust laws and threatens an incipient violation of antitrust law, including but not limited to monopolization and/or attempted monopolization under Section 2 of the Sherman Antitrust Act." FAC ¶ 126. However, this conclusory allegation is not accompanied by specific facts that would support a Sherman Act claim. In order to state a claim for monopolization under Section 2 of the Sherman Act, a plaintiff must prove: (1) possession of monopoly power in the relevant market; (2) willful acquisition or maintenance of that power; and (3) causal antitrust injury. SmileCare Dental Grp. v. Delta Dental Plan of California, Inc., 88 F.3d 780, 783 (9th Cir. 1996) (citation omitted). And to state a claim for attempted monopolization, the plaintiff must show: (1) specific intent to control prices or destroy competition; (2) predatory or anticompetitive conduct to accomplish the monopolization; (3) dangerous probability of success; and (4) [27] causal antitrust injury. Id. The FAC, as currently pleaded, does not speak to many of these elements, so Diva's "unfair" prong claim cannot be sustained by its bare allegations of Sherman Act violations.

However, Cel-Tech taught that it is not just conduct that threatens a violation of an actual antitrust law that supports a UCL unfairness claim. Equally actionable is conduct that "violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise [*1091] significantly threatens or harms competition." Cel-Tech, 20 Cal. 4th at 186-87. Here, Diva has alleged that Uber's misclassification of drivers allows it to shirk its legal obligations under the California Labor Code and Wage Orders issued by the California Industrial Welfare Commission to provide adequate pay and benefits to its drivers. See FAC ¶¶ 112-14, 123. The California Supreme Court recently condemned precisely this kind of misclassification practice as a form of unfair competition:

> [T]he risk that workers who should be treated as employees may be improperly misclassified as independent contractors is significant in light of the potentially substantial economic incentives that a business may [28] have in mischaracterizing some workers as independent contractors. Such incentives include the unfair competitive advantage the business may obtain over competitors that properly classify similar workers as employees and that thereby assume the fiscal and other responsibilities and burdens that an employer owes to its employees.

Dynamex Operations W. v. Superior Court, 4 Cal. 5th 903, 913, 232 Cal. Rptr. 3d 1, 416 P.3d 1 (2018) (emphasis added). Dynamex thus indicates that worker misclassification can violate the policy or spirit of antitrust laws because it significantly threatens or harms competition. Uber attempts to discount the significance of Dynamex by insisting that it "cannot be read to overrule Cel-Tech's limitation of competitor suits under the UCL to incipient violations of the antitrust laws." Docket No. 117 at 12 n.9. This misses the point because, as explained above, Cel-Tech also allows competitor suits predicated on conduct that violates the policy or spirit of antitrust laws by significantly threatening or harming competition. Dynamex affirms that worker misclassification may constitute an example of such conduct.

Further, there is no question that the prohibition on worker misclassification is "tethered to some legislatively declared policy." Cel-Tech, 20 Cal. 4th at 186-87. The California Labor [29] Code expressly declares that "[i]t is the policy of this state to vigorously enforce minimum labor standards in order . . . to protect employers who comply with the law from those who attempt to gain a competitive advantage at the expense of their workers by failing to comply with minimum labor standards." Cal. Labor Code § 90.5(a). Standards codified in the Labor Code concern, among other things, potential harm to competition. See Dynamex, 4 Cal. 5th at 952 ("California's industry-wide wage orders are also clearly intended for the benefit of those law-abiding businesses that comply with the obligations imposed by the wage orders, ensuring that such responsible companies are not hurt by unfair competition from competitor businesses that utilize substandard employment practices.") (emphasis in original).

Accordingly, Diva's "unfair" prong claim meets the requirements of Cel-Tech. Uber's motion to dismiss the UCL unfairness claim is DENIED to the extent the claim is based on violations of California labor laws. The motion is GRANTED to the extent the unfairness claim is based on Sherman Act violations. Diva may amend its complaint with specific facts that would support its claim that Uber's misclassification of drivers violates the Sherman Act. [30]

2. "Unlawful" Prong

Uber next contends that Diva lacks standing to bring a claim under the "unlawful" prong of the UCL. To establish Article III standing, a plaintiff must demonstrate: (1) injury-in-fact in the form of "concrete and particularized" and "actual [*1092] or imminent" harm to a legally protected interest; (2) a causal connection between the injury and the conduct complained of; and (3) a likelihood that a favorable decision would redress the injury-in-fact. Barnum Timber Co. v. U.S. E.P.A., 633 F.3d 894, 897 (9th Cir. 2011) (quoting Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560-61, 112 S. Ct. 2130, 119 L. Ed. 2d 351 (1992); Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 751, 104 S. Ct. 3315, 82 L. Ed. 2d 556 (1984)). Uber maintains that Diva has failed to establish the causation element.

a. Standing as to All Plaintiffs

Uber argues that Diva has not shown that Uber's driver misclassification is the cause of its unfair cost advantage over its competitors because Diva also alleges that investor subsidies allow Uber to price its rides below cost. Mot. at 19-20. Thus, Uber reasons, Diva would have suffered the same harm even if Uber had complied fully with labor laws and paid its drivers as employees. See Daro v. Superior Court, 151 Cal. App. 4th 1079, 1099, 61 Cal. Rptr. 3d 716 (2007) (holding that, to establish standing under the UCL, "there must be a causal connection between the harm suffered and the unlawful business activity," and that the "causal connection is broken when a complaining party would [31] suffer the same harm whether or not a defendant complied with the law").

The argument is meritless for several reasons. First, the dismissal of Diva's UPA claim resolves this issue. As Diva explains, the FAC pleads alternative theories of liability under the UPA and UCL. Opp. at 21-22. The UPA cause of action incorporates only the allegations that pertain to Uber's investor-funded loss-leader pricing, whereas the UCL cause of action incorporates only the allegations that pertain to Uber's driver misclassification. Now that the UPA cause of action has been dismissed, the sole remaining source of Uber's cost advantage is its alleged misclassification practices. Causation is thus simplified.

Second, even if Diva's harm is caused by both Uber's driver misclassification and predatory pricing subsidized by investor financing, Diva has still established standing by asserting that the misclassification is a substantial cause of the harm. Opp. at 22-23. It does not appear that the UCL requires the unlawful conduct be the sole factor in causing harm in order to support UCL standing and thus a contributing cause may satisfy standing. Admittedly, the courts have not definitively decided this question. See Law Offices of Mathew Higbee v. Expungement Assistance Servs., 214 Cal. App. 4th 544, 562, 153 Cal. Rptr. 3d 865 (2013) ("[C]ourts have not yet defined [32] the contours of the causation element under the 'unlawful' prong of the UCL.") (citing Kwikset Corp. v. Superior Court, 51 Cal. 4th 310, 326 n.9, 120 Cal. Rptr. 3d 741, 246 P.3d 877 (2011)). However, the language of the UCL evinces no "sole factor" requirement. The statute authorizes any "person who has suffered injury in fact and has lost money or property as a result of the unfair competition" to bring suit under the UCL. Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17204.

Notably, the California Court of Appeal has suggested in dicta that a "substantial factor" standard of causation would suffice for UCL standing. In Troyk v. Farmers Grp., Inc., 171 Cal. App. 4th 1305, 90 Cal. Rptr. 3d 589 (2009), the court stated that it "discern[ed] no legislative intent from [§ 17024]'s language that would require a standard of causation more stringent than the 'a substantial factor' standard that applies to negligence actions . . . for a plaintiff to have UCL standing." Id. at 1350 n.33. As Troyk set forth, "a substantial [*1093] factor in causing harm is a factor that a reasonable person would consider to have contributed to the harm. It must be more than a remote or trivial factor. It does not have to be the only cause of the harm." Id. (citation and alteration omitted). It is well-established that the "substantial factor" standard of causation applies to claims under the "fraudulent" prong of the UCL. See In re Tobacco II Cases, 46 Cal. 4th at 326. It is noteworthy that the substantial factor [33] test for causation applies in many contexts. See, e.g., Nat'l Ass'n of African Am.-Owned Media v. Charter Commc'ns, Inc., 915 F.3d 617, 623 (9th Cir. 2019) (disparate treatment claims under Title VII); Nuveen Mun. High Income Opportunity Fund v. City of Alameda, Cal., 730 F.3d 1111, 1119 (9th Cir. 2013) (securities fraud actions under Section 10(b) of the Securities and Exchange Act); BladeRoom Grp. Ltd. v. Emerson Elec. Co., 331 F. Supp. 3d 977, 987 (N.D. Cal. 2018) (breach of contract and tort actions).

Assuming the "substantial factor" standard for causation applies here—and Uber has not contended that it does not—Diva's allegations are sufficient to establish that Uber's misclassification practices alone have been a substantial factor in causing Diva's economic harm. The FAC alleges that Diva must pay its drivers at least minimum wage ($13 per hour or more in major cities) because they are employees. FAC ¶ 69. Diva must also bear the cost of overtime wages, work breaks, unemployment insurance, workers' compensation insurance premiums, social security tax, and Medicare tax. Id. ¶¶ 70-74. Uber, by misclassifying its drivers as independent contractors, avoids these obligations. Id. ¶ 114. Diva estimates that "Uber avoids an average of $9.07 an hour in business expenses and employee benefits that it would have to pay if it properly classified drivers as employees. As a result, Uber pays costs for the average driver that are equivalent to what an employer would bear if they [34] (illegally) paid their W-2 employees $7.48 per hour," i.e., approximately half of the minimum wage. Id. ¶ 118. Given that "Uber pays over 75 percent of gross bookings to drivers," it can reasonably inferred that by paying its drivers effectively half the hourly wage that would be required if they were treated as employees, Uber is able to significantly undercut its competitors on price. Thus, Uber's driver misclassification as alleged is a "substantial factor" in causing Diva's harm, and not merely a "remote or trivial factor." Troyk, 171 Cal. App. 4th at 1350 n.33.

The three cases cited by Uber do not suggest otherwise. In Overton v. Uber Techs., Inc., 333 F. Supp. 3d 927 (N.D. Cal. 2018), this Court found that the plaintiffs did not establish a causal link between Uber's failure to register as a motor carrier under federal law and its gaining of an unfair competitive advantage over plaintiffs. Id. at 946-47. Causation was "highly speculative" in Overton because the plaintiffs did not show "what Uber's increased costs would be if it registered, how those increased costs would be born as between Uber and its drivers, [and] how much, if at all, Uber's pricing of rides will be affected." Id. Here, in contrast, Diva has detailed the per-driver cost savings Uber attains through misclassification. In [35] Haynish v. Bank of Am., N.A., 284 F. Supp. 3d 1037 (N.D. Cal. 2018), the plaintiffs did not establish that the defendant's unlawful conduct caused the foreclosure of their home because the foreclosure was independently triggered by the plaintiffs' default on their home loan. Id. at 1052. Diva's allegations support the inference that Uber could not have undercut market prices to the same degree without misclassifying its drivers to skirt significant costs. [*1094] Finally, unlike Diva, the plaintiff in Rooney v. Sierra Pac. Windows, No. 10-CV-00905-LHK, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 117294, 2011 WL 5034675 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 11, 2011) "failed to allege any causal connection" between the defendant's alleged violations of law and the plaintiff's injury. *2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 117294, [WL] at 11 (emphasis in original).

Diva has adequately alleged a causal link between Uber's misclassification practices and Diva's UCL injury.

b. Standing as to Out-of-State Plaintiffs

Uber next argues that there is a causation problem specific to the out-of-state affiliates, because the alleged harm to those affiliates arises from Uber's extraterritorial conduct. It is well-established that the UCL does not apply extraterritorially. Sullivan v. Oracle Corp., 51 Cal. 4th 1191, 1207, 127 Cal. Rptr. 3d 185, 254 P.3d 237 (2011). Thus, the UCL does not reach "claims of non-California residents injured by conduct occurring beyond California's borders." Norwest Mortgage, Inc. v. Superior Court, 72 Cal. App. 4th 214, 222, 85 Cal. Rptr. 2d 18 (1999). It does, however, apply where the "relevant conduct occur[s] [36] in California." Sullivan, 51 Cal. 4th at 1208. Uber asserts that the out-of-state affiliates cannot be losing business because of Uber's practices in California; rather, "the only plausible, non-speculative reason is due to competition from Uber . . . in those other states." Mot. at 22 (emphasis in original).

Uber's argument appears to be grounded in a misunderstanding about how the affiliate system allegedly works. Uber repeatedly focuses on the fact that the out-of-state affiliates are booking rides for out-of-state clients. See id.; Docket No. 117 at 15. However, the FAC states that when out-of-state clients want to book rides in California, they do so through out-of-state affiliates who refer the clients to companies (like Diva) in California who provide the rides in California. FAC ¶¶ 44-45. The California company and the out-of-state affiliate split the revenue for the ride. Id. ¶ 45. Thus, when Uber undercuts its competitors' prices in California, fewer clients book rides with California limousine companies through out-of-state affiliates. Id. Uber's pricing practices outside of California do not affect clients' booking decision for rides in California under this model. In short, there is a direct causal [37] link between Uber's alleged misconduct in California and the out-of-state affiliates' loss of revenue. That meets the requirement for standing under for the UCL to apply. See Sullivan, 51 Cal. 4th at 1208.

Accordingly, Uber's motion to dismiss Diva's claim under the unlawful prong of the UCL is DENIED.

D. Jurisdiction under CAFA

Uber finally argues that if the Court dismisses the claims of the out-of-state affiliates, it should dismiss the entire action under CAFA's home-state controversy exception. Mot. at 22-23. The home-state controversy exception to CAFA jurisdiction provides that a "district court shall decline to exercise jurisdiction" if "two-thirds or more of the members of all proposed plaintiff classes in the aggregate, and the primary defendants, are citizens of the State in which the action was originally filed." 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(4)(B). Here, the only putative class members that are not citizens of California are the out-of-state affiliates. See FAC ¶ 29. Uber therefore contends that if the out-of-states affiliates are removed from the suit for lack of standing, all of the remaining class members would be California citizens and CAFA jurisdiction would be destroyed. However, as explained above, there is no basis to dismiss [38] the claims of the out-of-state affiliates, which comprise "approximately [*1095] half of the members of each of the putative classes." Id. Uber's home-state controversy argument accordingly fails.

IV. DIVA'S MOTION FOR PARTIAL SUMMARY JUDGMENT

Uber contends that it would be premature to litigate Diva's PSJ motion at this stage because its motion to dismiss presents threshold jurisdictional issues and because the one-way intervention rule prevents adjudication of merits issues prior to class certification. Docket No. 99 at 1. As discussed above, the threshold issues Uber raises (minimal diversity and standing) are not fatal to Diva's case. Therefore, the Court addresses whether the one-way intervention rule bars consideration of the PSJ motion.

The one-way intervention rule exists to "protect defendants from unfair 'one-way intervention,' where the members of a class not yet certified can wait for the court's ruling on summary judgment and either opt in to a favorable ruling or avoid being bound by an unfavorable one." Villa v. San Francisco Forty-Niners, Ltd., 104 F. Supp. 3d 1017, 1021 (N.D. Cal. 2015) (citing American Pipe & Constr. Co. v. Utah, 414 U.S. 538, 547, 94 S. Ct. 756, 38 L. Ed. 2d 713 (1974)). "The doctrine is 'one-way' because a plaintiff would not be bound by a decision that favors the defendant but could decide to benefit from a decision favoring the class." [39] Id. Courts have applied this rule to "deny putative lead plaintiffs' pre-certification motions for summary judgment because" those motions, "if unsuccessful, would not prevent putative class members from filing their own suits with hope for a more favorable ruling.'" Magadia v. Wal-Mart Assocs., Inc., 319 F. Supp. 3d 1180, 1186 (N.D. Cal. 2018) (citing cases).

As an initial matter, Diva asserts that one-way intervention only becomes a problem when a plaintiff seeks a final judgment on the merits prior to class certification, and the rule is therefore not implicated by a partial summary judgment motion like Diva's. Docket No. 103. This contention is meritless. The one-way intervention rule applies in the context of merits rulings, not just final merits judgments. See, e.g., Gooch, 672 F.3d at 432 ("The rule against one-way intervention prevents potential plaintiffs from awaiting merits rulings in a class action before deciding whether to intervene in that class action."). This makes sense, given that the underlying rationale of the rule is to "protect defendants from unfair 'one-way intervention,' where the members of a class not yet certified can wait for the court's ruling on summary judgment and either opt in to a favorable ruling or avoid being bound by an unfavorable one." Villa, 104 F. Supp. 3d at 1021. A [40] merits ruling, even if not a final judgment, can still affect putative class members' decisions whether or not to opt in. Accordingly, courts have applied the one-way intervention rule to motions for partial summary judgment. See, e.g., id. In particular, one court has rejected the precise argument Diva makes here:

> Plaintiffs assert that because they seek only partial summary judgment and not a final judgment on the merits, which could have a res judicata effect on class members, the problem of "one-way intervention" is not implicated. However, the Court does not find Plaintiffs' proposed limitation to be appropriate when—as is the case here—a motion for partial summary judgment would reach the merits of the case. Although Plaintiffs are correct that in the abstract, class members may always judge whether to opt-out or not based on how well the litigation is going so far, here, allowing absent plaintiffs to make that determination after the Court adjudicates issues [*1096] of liability in the underlying case would unfairly prejudice Defendants.

Diva's second argument has more merit. It [41] contends that the one-way intervention rule does not apply here because the misclassification question raised in its PSJ motion pertains to its UCL class claim, which seeks only injunctive relief as a Rule 23(b)(2) class. See FAC ¶ 50; Docket No. 103 at 2. In contrast to Rule 23(b)(3) classes, which permit class members to out-out of an unfavorable decision and require "the best notice that is practicable" to class members, Rule 23(b)(2) class members may not opt out and are only entitled to "appropriate notice" directed in the court's discretion. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(c)(2)(A)-(B). Therefore, some courts have declined to "apply[] the prohibition on one-way intervention to Rule 23(b)(2) class certifications, in which class members may not opt out and therefore make no decision about whether to intervene." Gooch v. Life Inv'rs Ins. Co. of Am., 672 F.3d 402, 433 (6th Cir. 2012); see Paxton v. Union Nat. Bank, 688 F.2d 552, 558-59 (8th Cir. 1982); Williams v. Lane, 129 F.R.D. 636, 642 (N.D. Ill. 1990).

Nevertheless, the Court concludes that it would be inappropriate to address the PSJ motion at this stage of the litigation. While there is less concern that putative class members can engage in one-way intervention in the context of a Rule 23(b)(2) class, asymmetrical risks remain because the named plaintiffs can still hedge their bets by opting not to seek class certification if they receive an unfavorable pre-certification merits ruling. The Court therefore exercises [42] its case management authority to DENY without prejudice Diva's PSJ motion. See Ahanchian v. Xenon Pictures, Inc., 624 F.3d 1253, 1254-55 (9th Cir. 2010). The Court would be amenable to hearing Diva's class certification and PSJ motions on the same schedule.

V. CONCLUSION

Uber's motion to dismiss is GRANTED in part and DENIED in part. Specifically, (1) Diva's complaint is dismissed under Rule 12(b)(1) for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, with leave for Diva to amend within 30 days of the date of this Order to cure the jurisdictional defects; (2) Diva's UPA claim is dismissed with prejudice; and (3) Diva's claim under the "unfair" prong of the UCL unfairness claim is dismissed to the extent it is predicated on Sherman Act violations, with leave for Diva to amend within 30 days. Diva's motion for partial summary judgment is DENIED without prejudice.

This order disposes of Docket Nos. 33 and 113.

I. Introduction

In this multi-district antitrust putative class action, plaintiffs[1] allege defendants,[2] their employers, violated the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, by entering into unlawful "nopoach" agreements pursuant to which defendants agreed to not hire or solicit each other's employees. Defendants, who are railway equipment suppliers and their subsidiaries, filed a joint motion to (a) dismiss the consolidated class action complaint under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6), and (b) strike the class action allegations under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(f) (ECF No. 124). Plaintiffs oppose the motion. (ECF No. 152.)

The parties dispute whether the rule of reason or per se violation analysis should be applied to defendants' alleged "no-poach" agreements and whether the factual allegations in the consolidated complaint are sufficient to show

[1] Plaintiffs Stephen Baldassano ("Baldassano"), John Brand ("Brand"), David Escalera ("Escalera"), Brian Lara ("Lara"), and Patricia Lonergan ("Lonergan") in this opinion will be collectively be referred to as "plaintiffs."

[2] Defendants Westinghouse Air Brake Technologies Corporation ("Wabtec"), Wabtec Railway Electronics, Inc., Ricon Corporation ("Ricon"), Railroad Controls, L.P., Xorail Inc., Faiveley Transport, S.A. ("Faiveley"), Faiveley Transport North America Inc. ("Faiveley N.A."), Knorr-Bremse AG ("Knorr"), Knorr Brake Company LLC ("Knorr Brake"), New York Air Brake LLC ("NY Air Brake"), and Bendix Commercial Vehicle Systems LLC ("Bendix") in this opinion will be collectively referred to as "defendants."

plausibly that beginning at least in in 2009 all defendants were engaged in a conspiracy in violation of the antitrust laws. The parties also dispute whether the allegations in the consolidated class action complaint [12] are sufficient to show that it is possible for plaintiffs to satisfy their burden at the class certification stage with respect to the Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23 requirements of typicality and predominance.

For the reasons set forth in this opinion, the motion to dismiss will be granted in part and denied in part. The court agrees with plaintiffs that the no-poach agreements as plead in the consolidated complaint, i.e., plead as market allocation agreements that were not ancillary to any other agreements with proper business purposes, may be considered per se violations of § 1. Thus, plaintiffs were not required to set forth factual allegations sufficient to show plausibly the relevant market in which the antitrust impact occurred. The motion to dismiss will be denied without prejudice with respect to this issue.

The court, however, agrees with defendants that plaintiffs failed to set forth factual allegations to show plausibly that all defendants were engaged in an overarching "no-poach" conspiracy from 2009. At best, plaintiffs plead three bilateral conspiracies, which plausibly culminated in an overarching conspiracy among all defendants beginning at the earliest in 2014 when Wabtec and Faiveley N.A. entered [13] into the third bilateral no-poach agreement. Plaintiffs did not set forth factual allegations sufficient plausibly to show that Ricon or Bendix were participants in the overarching conspiracy or any of the bilateral conspiracies. The motion to dismiss will, therefore, be granted without prejudice with respect to plaintiffs' allegations that beginning in at least 2009 all defendants were engaged in a "no-poach" conspiracy in violation of the antitrust laws [*472] and with respect to all allegations against Ricon and Bendix.

With respect to defendants' motion to strike class allegations, plaintiffs in the consolidated class action complaint did not allege sufficient facts to make a prima facie showing that the predominance requirement of Rule 23 is satisfied or that discovery is likely to produce substantiation of plaintiffs' allegations with respect to predominance. Plaintiffs in the consolidated class action complaint allege that defendants conspired to restrict the hiring and soliciting of all their employees. Plaintiffs, however, did not set forth factual allegations sufficient to make a prima facie showing that defendants' agreements caused all employees of defendants harm (antitrust impact) that [14] can be proven on a class-wide basis or that discovery will likely substantiate plaintiffs' conclusory allegations that the common issues in this case will predominate over the individual questions raised by plaintiffs' proposed class of all employees. Even if plaintiffs satisfied their burden at this stage with respect to the Rule 23 requirement of predominance, their class definition is overbroad and lacks precision. The motion to strike class allegations will, therefore, be granted without prejudice to plaintiffs filing a motion for leave to file an amended consolidated class action complaint.

II. Procedural History

On October 12, 2018, plaintiffs filed a one-count consolidated class action complaint against defendants. (ECF No. 88.) On November 27, 2018, all defendants filed a joint motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim and to strike class action allegations and a brief in support of the motion. (ECF Nos. 124, 129.) On January 11, 2019, plaintiffs filed a response in opposition to the motion to dismiss. (ECF No. 152.) On January 25, 2019, the United States Department of Justice ("DOJ" or the "government") filed a "Notice of Intent to File a Statement of Interest." (ECF No. 155.) [15] On February 8, 2019, the government filed its statement of interest. (ECF No. 158.) On February 13, 2019, defendants file a reply brief in support of their motion. (ECF No. 165.) On February 22, 2019, plaintiffs filed a notice of supplemental authority. (ECF No. 172.)

On February 25, 2019, the court held a hearing on the joint motion to dismiss and strike class action allegations. (Hearing Transcript ("H.T.") 2/25/2019 (ECF No. 176).) The government with leave of court participated in the hearing. (Id.; ECF Nos. 168, 171.) The court heard from the parties and the government, ordered the transcript at the joint cost of the parties, and took the matter under advisement.

On June 3, 2019, plaintiffs filed a second notice of supplemental authority. (ECF No. 189.) On June 5, 2019, defendants filed a response to plaintiffs' notice of supplemental authority. (ECF No. 190.)

III. Factual Allegations in the Consolidated Class Action Complaint which are Accepted as True for the Purpose of Resolving the Motion to Dismiss

A. General Allegations

The named plaintiffs are former employees of defendants. (ECF No. 88 ¶ 1.) Plaintiffs allege that defendants were "among the world's dominant rail equipment suppliers" [16] and members of a conspiracy "to restrain competition and reduce compensation for railway industry employees." (Id.) Wabtec, Knorr, and their respective co-defendant subsidiaries "are the largest suppliers of rail equipment used in freight and passenger rail applications." (Id. ¶ 2.)

[*473] B. Plaintiffs

Baldassano was employed by defendant Knorr Brake from approximately March 1998 to December 2012, and from approximately January 2017 to October 2017. (ECF No. 88 ¶ 12.) Baldassano performed his duties as a Project Manager and Manager of Systems and Sales for Knorr Brake in Maryland. (Id.)

Brand was employed by defendant NY Air Brake, a wholly-owned subsidiary of Knorr, as a Senior Manager of Systems and Software Engineering from approximately May 2013 to August 2016. (Id. ¶¶ 13, 26.) Brand performed his duties as a NY Air Brake employee in Texas. (Id.)

Escalera was employed by Wabtec as a Field Service Technician from approximately July 2011 to January 2015, in California. (Id. ¶ 14.)

Lara was employed by Wabtec as a Machinist from approximately November 2011 to January 2017. (ECF No. 88 ¶ 15.) Lara performed his duties as a Wabtec employee in Pennsylvania. (Id.)

Longergan was employed by Wabtec [17] as a Positive Train Control Manager from approximately October 2013 to April 2015. (Id. ¶ 16.) Lonergan performed her duties as a Wabtec employee in Colorado. (Id.)

C. The Wabtec Defendants

Wabtec has more than 100 subsidiaries and more than 18,000 employees. It is the world's largest provider of rail equipment and services with global sales of $3.9 billion in 2017. (ECF No. 88 ¶ 17.) Wabtec Passenger Transit is a business unit of Wabtec that develops, manufactures, and sells rail equipment and services for passenger rail applications. (Id.) Wabtec Global Services is a business unit of Wabtec that offers maintenance, repair, and support services. (Id.)

Wabtec Railway Electronics, Inc. is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Wabtec that designs, develops, manufactures, and repairs electronic products used to improve railroad operations and safety. (ECF No. 88 ¶ 18.)

Ricon is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Wabtec that designs and manufactures wheelchair lifts and ramps for commercial, paratransit, transit, motorcoach, and passenger rail vehicles. (Id. ¶ 19.)

Railroad Controls, L.P. is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Wabtec and one of the largest railroad signal construction companies in the United States. [18] (Id. ¶ 20.)

Xorail Inc. is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Wabtec and provides railroad signal engineering and design services. (Id. ¶ 21.)

On November 30, 2016, Faiveley was acquired as a wholly-owned subsidiary of Wabtec. (ECF No. 88 ¶ 22.) Before the acquisition, Faiveley was the world's third-largest rail equipment supplier behind Wabtec and Knorr. (Id.)

Faiveley had employees in twenty-four countries, including at six locations in the United States. (Id.) It developed, manufactured, and sold passenger and freight rail equipment to customers in Europe, Asia, and North America, including the United States, with revenues of approximately €1.2 billion in 2016. (Id.)

Faiveley N.A. was a wholly-owned subsidiary of Faiveley prior to Faiveley's acquisition by Wabtec. (ECF No. 88 ¶ 23.) Prior to Wabtec's acquisition of Faiveley, Faiveley conducted business in the United States primarily through Faiveley N.A. (Id.) Faiveley N.A. is now a wholly-owned subsidiary of Wabtec. (Id.)

D. The Knorr Defendants

Knorr is a privately-owned German company and the world's second largest provider of rail and commercial vehicle equipment. (ECF No. 88 ¶ 24.) In 2017, Knorr had annual revenues of approximately [*474] $7.7 [19] billion. (Id.) Knorr has several wholly-owned subsidiaries in the United States. (Id.)

Knorr Brake is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Knorr and manufactures train control, braking, and door equipment used on passenger rail vehicles. (ECF No. 88 ¶ 25.)

NY Air Brake is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Knorr and manufactures railway air brakes and other rail equipment used on freight trains. (Id. ¶ 26.)

Bendix is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Knorr and develops and supplies active safety technologies, air brake charging and control systems, and components for commercial vehicles. (ECF No. 88 ¶ 27.) Bendix served as a recruiter for Knorr. (Id.)

E. Competition for Employees Among Rail Equipment Suppliers

Wabtec and Knorr, top rivals in the development, manufacture, and sale of equipment used in freight and passenger rail applications, are some of the largest employers[3] in the rail industry. (ECF No. 88 ¶¶ 29-30.) They compete with each other to hire and retain employees throughout the United States, i.e., lateral hiring is a key form of competition between Wabtec and Knorr. (Id. ¶¶ 2, 35.) There is high demand for and limited supply of skilled employees who have rail industry experience. (Id. ¶ 31.) [20] Critical jobs in the rail industry can remain vacant for months while firms try to recruit and hire individuals with the requisite skills, training, and experience for a job opening. (Id.) Employees within the rail industry are key sources of potential talent to fill these openings. (Id.)

Defendants employ a variety of recruiting techniques, including using internal and external recruiters and staffing agencies to identify, solicit, recruit, and otherwise help hire employees. (ECF No. 88 ¶ 32.) Defendants also receive direct applications from individuals interested in employment opportunities. (Id.) Directly soliciting employees from other rail industry employers is a particularly efficient and effective method of competing for qualified employees. (Id. ¶ 33.) Soliciting involves communicating directly—whether by phone, e-mail, social or electronic networking, or in person—with another firm's employee who has not otherwise applied for a job opening. (Id.) Direct solicitation can be performed by individuals of the company seeking to fill the position or by outside recruiters retained to identify potential employees on the company's behalf. (Id.) Firms in the rail industry rely [21] on direct solicitation of employees of other rail companies because those individuals have the specialized skills necessary and may be unresponsive to other methods of recruiting. (ECF No. 88 ¶ 33.)

In a properly functioning and lawfully competitive labor market, rail industry employers compete with one another to attract highly-skilled talent for their employment needs. (Id. ¶ 34.) The competition benefits employees because it

[3] For example, by the end of 2017, Wabtec and its subsidiaries employed approximately 18,000 full-time employees worldwide. (ECF No. 88 ¶ 30.) In 2016, Wabtec added approximately 5,700 employees through the acquisition of Faiveley. (Id.) By the end of 2017, Knorr and its subsidiaries employed approximately 27,700 employees worldwide, including approximately 5,000 employees in the Americas. (Id.)

increases the available job opportunities and improves an employee's ability to negotiate for a better salary and other terms of employment. (Id.) By soliciting and hiring employees from other rail industry employers, a company is able to take advantage of the efforts its rival has expended in identifying and training the employees, while simultaneously inflicting a cost on [*475] the rival by removing an employee on whom the rival may depend. (ECF No. 88 ¶ 35.) By contrast, hiring employees directly out of a training program comes with none of those benefits, and the hiring institution must invest significant resources in identifying, assessing, and training new employees. (Id.)

Plaintiffs allege that the competition between employers, e.g., Wabtec and Knorr and their [22] subsidiaries, for employees provides significant benefits to the employees. Plaintiffs explain:

> Competition for workers via lateral hiring has a significant impact on compensation in a variety of ways. First, when employers become aware of attractive outside opportunities for their employees, the threat of losing employees to competitors encourages employers to preemptively increase compensation to increase morale, productivity, and retention. If employers do not react to competition, their employees may seek positions that offer more generous compensation and benefits elsewhere, be receptive to recruiting by a rival employer, and/or reduce their productivity and morale. Once an employee has received an offer from a rival, retaining the employee may require a disruptive increase in compensation for one individual, if retention is possible at all, and cascading (and unplanned) pressures on compensation of other employees where internal equity and fair pay analysis would demand similar raises. Employers therefore have an incentive to preempt lateral departures by paying all employees well enough that they are unlikely to seek or pursue outside opportunities. Preemptive retention measures [23] thus lead to increased compensation for all employees.
> The availability of desirable positions at competing employers also forces employers to reactively increase compensation to retain employees who are likely to join a competitor. This can occur both when a particular employee or group of employees becomes interested in switching employers and the current employer responds by offering a compensation increase to retain them, or when an employer responds to overall attrition rates among its employees by increasing compensation levels. In the former case, even a targeted increase designed to retain specific employees may put upward pressure on the entire compensation structure.
> Because many rail industry workers are highly specialized and integrated into teams tied to specific functions, some workers who move to positions at different companies may bring with them others from their teams. Just as competition forces employers to preemptively or reactively raise compensation to retain employees who might otherwise seek employment elsewhere, it also encourages increased compensation for related workers. Thus, increased movement of one category of employee not only increases the compensation [24] for those employees, but also for the categories of employees who are likely to also seek parallel lateral positions, with similar higher compensation and benefits.
> The positive compensation effects of hiring employees from competitors are not limited to the particular individuals who are solicited or who seek new employment. Instead, the effects of hiring from competitors (and the effects of eliminating lateral hiring, pursuant to agreement) [*476] commonly impact all employees of the participating companies.

(ECF No. 88 ¶¶ 39-36.)

F. Defendants' No-Poach Agreements[4]

[4] The descriptions of the agreements and their import are taken from the consolidated class action complaint. The court expresses no opinion about the merits of those allegations.

Beginning at least in 2009, Wabtec and Knorr allegedly entered into a no-poach agreement (ECF No. 88 ¶ 43.) No later than 2011, Knorr and Faiveley (prior to Faiveley's acquisition by Wabtec) allegedly entered into a no-poach agreement. (Id. ¶ 49.) Finally, no later than January 2014, Wabtec and Faiveley N.A. (prior to Faiveley's acquisition in 2016 by Wabtec) allegedly entered into a no-poach agreement. (Id. ¶ 53.) The agreements were executed and enforced by the companies' senior executives and included the companies' subsidiaries in the United States. (Id. ¶ 41.) According to plaintiffs, the companies agreed to refrain from [25] soliciting or hiring each other's employees without the consent of the current employer in order to: (a) fix compensation of plaintiffs at artificially low levels; and (b) substantially eliminate competition among defendants for rail industry employees. (Id. ¶¶ 3, 77.) According to plaintiffs, the agreements are per se violations of antitrust law. (Id. ¶ 79.)

The agreements spanned several years and were monitored and enforced by executives of defendants. (ECF No. 88 ¶ 3.) The agreements substantially affected interstate commerce for employee services by causing: competition to be reduced for employees; suppressed employee compensation below competitive levels; employees to be denied access to better job opportunities; employee mobility to be restricted; and employees to be deprived of information they could use to negotiate for better terms of employment. (Id. ¶¶ 5-6, 58.) Plaintiffs allege that defendants concealed[5] their conspiracy and anti-competitive conduct. (ECF No. 88 ¶¶ 59-64.) On April 3, 2018, however, the conspiracy was publicly revealed with an announced action and proposed stipulated judgment by the DOJ. (Id. ¶ 7.)

G. Class Allegations

The proposed class is defined as follows:

> All natural persons employed by, or hired through staffing agencies or vendors to work for, Defendants or their wholly owned subsidiaries, in the United States, at any time from the start of the conspiracy (no later than 2009) to the present. Excluded from the class are senior executives and personnel in the human resources, recruiting, and legal departments of the Defendants, and employees hired outside of the United States to [27] work outside of the United States.

(ECF No. 88 ¶ 65.)

Plaintiffs allege:

> [*477] - there are "thousands of Class members;"
> - the class is ascertainable from defendants' records;

[5] Plaintiffs allege:

> Knowledge of the agreements was closely held by senior executives [26] and recruiters of the Defendant companies who relied on direct and non-public communications with one another to manage and enforce the no-poach agreements, including in-person discussions and private email communications.
> Defendants devised internal procedures by which implicated applicants could be discreetly flagged. Once flagged, the company President decided whether to seek permission from the rival company to hire the individual. The applicant was not told, much less consulted, about this process.
> Knorr's policies stated that it was committed to fair competition.
> ...
> Wabtec's policies provided that it was committed to respecting its employees and the fair and equitable treatment of employees.

(ECF No. 88 ¶¶ 60-63.)

- their claims are typical of the claims of the proposed class;
- they will fairly and adequately represent the interests of the proposed class and have no conflict with the interests of the proposed class;
- the counsel has experience in antitrust, employment, and class action litigation; and
- class action is superior to any other form for resolving this litigation.

(ECF No. 88 ¶¶ 66-70, 74.)

Plaintiffs identify the following questions of law and fact that are common to the members of the proposed class and predominate over any questions affecting only individual members of the proposed class:

- whether Defendants agreed not to solicit or hire each other's employees;
- whether such agreements were per se violations of the Sherman Act;
- whether Defendants fraudulently concealed their misconduct;
- whether and the extent to which Defendants' conduct suppressed compensation below competitive levels for railway employees;
- whether Plaintiffs and the Proposed Class suffered antitrust injury as a result of Defendants' agreements;
- [28] the type and measure of damages suffered by Plaintiffs and the Proposed Class; and
- the nature and scope of injunctive relief necessary to restore a competitive market.

(ECF No. 88 ¶ 71.)

H. Damages

Plaintiffs in the consolidated class action complaint seek the following relief:

- threefold the damages determined to have been sustained by them as a result of the conduct of defendants;
- the costs of suit, including reasonable attorneys' fees and expenses, prejudgment interest, and post-judgment interest;
- injunctive relief, declaring the no-hire agreement among Defendants unlawful and enjoining defendants from enforcing the agreement or entering into similar agreements going forward; and
- all other relief to which plaintiffs and the class may be entitled at law or in equity.

(ECF No. 88 at 20-21 ¶¶ A-F.)

IV. Discussion

A. Motion to Dismiss

1. Standard of Review

A motion to dismiss filed pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) tests the legal sufficiency of the complaint. Kost v. Kozakiewicz, 1 F.3d 176, 183 (3d Cir. 1993). In deciding a motion to dismiss, the court is not opining on whether the plaintiff will be likely to prevail on the merits; rather, when considering a motion to dismiss, the court accepts as true all well-pled factual allegations in the complaint and [29] views them in a light most favorable to the plaintiff. U.S. Express Lines Ltd. v. Higgins, 281 F.3d 383, 388 (3d Cir. 2002). While a complaint does not need detailed factual allegations to survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, a complaint must provide more than labels and conclusions. Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). A "formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do." Id. (citing Papasan v. Allain, 478 U.S. 265, 286, [*478] 106 S. Ct. 2932, 92 L. Ed. 2d 209 (1986)). "Factual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level" and "sufficient to state a claim for relief that is plausible on its face." Id. "A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556).

> The plausibility standard is not akin to a "probability requirement," but it asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully.. . . Where a complaint pleads facts that are "merely consistent with" a defendant's liability, it "stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility of 'entitlement to relief.'"

(Id.) (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556) (internal citations omitted).

The Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit has instructed that "a court reviewing the sufficiency of a complaint must take three steps." Connelly v. Lane Constr. Corp., 809 F.3d 780, 787 (3d Cir. 2016). [30] The court of appeals explained:

> First, it must "tak[e] note of the elements [the] plaintiff must plead to state a claim." Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 675. Second, it should identify allegations that, "because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to the assumption of truth." Id. at 679. See also Burtch v. Milberg Factors, Inc., 662 F.3d 212, 224 (3d Cir.2011) ("Mere restatements of the elements of a claim are not entitled to the assumption of truth."(citation and editorial marks omitted)). Finally, "[w]hen there are well-pleaded factual allegations, [the] court should assume their veracity and then determine whether they plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief." Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 679.

Id. "Determining whether a complaint states a plausible claim for relief will...be a context-specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense." Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 679 (citing Iqbal v. Hasty, 490 F.3d 143, 157-58 (2d Cir. 2007)). A plaintiff must set forth "sufficient factual allegations to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence" of the elements of the claim for relief. Connelly, 809 F.3d at 789; Trzaska v. L'Oreal USA, Inc., 865 F.3d 155, 162 (3d Cir. 2017).

2. Plausibility of claim for a per se violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act "To establish an actionable antitrust violation, a plaintiff must show concerted action by the defendants, that this concerted action resulted in a restraint on trade, [31] and that this restraint was unreasonable." In re [*479] Processed Egg Prods. Antitrust Litig., 206 F. Supp. 3d 1033, 1043 (E.D. Pa. 2016) (citing 15 U.S.C. § 1; Santana Prods. v. Bobrick Washroom Equip., Inc., 401 F.3d 123, 131 (3d Cir. 2005)). "'To sufficiently plead an unreasonable restraint, a plaintiff must include allegations showing that the restraint will fail under one of three rules of analysis: the rule of reason, per se, or quick look.'" *Aya Healthcare Servs. v. AMN Healthcare, Inc., Civ. Action No. 17-205, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 102582, 2018 WL 3032552, at 8 (S.D. Cal. June 19, 2018) (quoting United States v. eBay, Inc., 968 F. Supp. 2d 1030, 1037 (N.D. Cal. 2013)).

a. Rule of Reason

"The 'rule of reason' standard is more than a default rule that the courts will apply when evaluating the lawfulness of a challenged business practice." In re Processed Egg, 206 F.Supp.3d at 1044 (citing Broad. Music, Inc. v. Columbia Broad. Sys., Inc., 441 U.S. 1, 8, 99 S. Ct. 1551, 60 L. Ed. 2d 1 (1979)). In a rule of reason case, the plaintiff must prove:

> "(1) that the defendants contracted, combined or conspired among each other; (2) that the combination or conspiracy produced adverse, anti-competitive effects within the relevant product and geographic markets; (3) that the objects of and the conduct pursuant to that contract or conspiracy were illegal; and (4) that the plaintiffs were injured as a proximate result of that conspiracy."

Rossi v. Standard Roofing, Inc., 156 F.3d 452, 464-65 (3d Cir. 1998) (quoting Tunis Bros. Co., Inc. v. Ford Motor Co., 763 F.2d 1482, 1489 (3d Cir. 1985)) (emphasis added). Thus, to state plausibly a rule of reason claim under the antitrust laws, the plaintiff must plausibly plead, among other things, a definition of the relevant market. *Int'l Constr. Prod. LLC v. Caterpillar Inc., No. CV 15-108-RGA, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 111174, 2016 WL 4445232, at 4

b. Per Se

"[C]ertain agreements [32] or practices are so 'plainly anticompetitive' and so often lack any redeeming virtue that they are conclusively presumed anticompetitive per se, without need for further examination." In re Processed Egg, 206 F.Supp.3d at 1044 (quoting Broad. Music, Inc. v. Columbia Broad. Sys., Inc., 441 U.S. 1, 8, 99 S. Ct. 1551, 60 L. Ed. 2d 1 (1979)). The Third Circuit Court of Appeals has explained:

> A restraint among competitors—called "horizontal," as opposed to "vertical" restraints on market participants at different points in a product's supply chain—is more rigorously scrutinized for an antitrust violation because it could more easily facilitate competitive harms, such as the exclusion of rivals, price fixing, or the consolidation of market power. c. Quick Look

A horizontal restraint may "facilitate the creation of new products, improve efficiencies, or lead to lower consumer costs[,]" and, thus, may not be "clearly harmful to competition." Lifewatch, 902 F.3d at 336. Id. Under those circumstances, the horizontal restraint is not per se unreasonable and would be "analyzed under some form...of a 'rule of reason' burden-shifting framework, which seeks to determine whether the restraint's harmful effects are outweighed by any procompetitive justifications and, if so, whether there are less restrictive alternatives." Id. A complete rule of reason analysis in those circumstances is not always [34] warranted; rather, a "quick look" analysis may be conducted. The Third Circuit Court of Appeals has explained:

> A quick look "presum[es] competitive harm without detailed market analysis" because "the anticompetitive effects on markets and consumers are obvious." Deutscher Tennis Bund, 610 F.3d at 832. It is inappropriate if "'the contours of the market' ... are not 'sufficiently well-known or defined to permit the court to ascertain without the aid of extensive market analysis whether the challenged practice impairs competition ....'" d. Application of Per Se Analysis

Here, defendants argue that plaintiffs' claim should be dismissed because the claim is subject to a rule of reason analysis and plaintiffs did not allege the relevant market in the consolidated class action complaint. (ECF No. 124-1 at 9.) Plaintiffs respond that they adequately alleged a per se violation of the antitrust laws, and, therefore, they are not required to plead a relevant market. (ECF No. 152 at 13-19.) At this stage of the proceedings, plaintiffs have the better view on this issue.

One treatise has recognized that a growing number [35] of courts are using a two-step analysis to determine whether an alleged antitrust violation is per se unreasonable and explained:

> [T]he court first asks whether the challenged conduct truly involves a "horizontal" restraint between actual or potential competitors allocating markets or customers, reducing output, or otherwise restricting competition between them, and, if so, whether the restraint is devoid of plausible procompetitive justification (i.e., is "naked") or is instead plausibly ancillary and necessary to some larger, procompetitive integrative activity.
> If the answer to the first question is "no," then the restraint is assessed under the rule of reason as a vertical nonprice restraint. If the answer to the first question is "yes," and the restraint is naked (either because no justification is put forth, or because the one presented is simply not credible), then the per se rule is applied.
> If, however, it appears plausible that the restraint is ancillary and necessary to achieve some larger procompetitive activity or other legally protected objective, such that the restraint cannot be said to be manifestly anticompetitive, then the more flexible rule of reason (or at least the [36] quick look) is applied.

[*481] William Homes & Melissa Mangiaracina, Antitrust Law Handbook § 2:13 (2018-2019 ed.) (footnotes omitted).

In this case, based upon the allegations in the consolidated class action complaint, the answer to the first question, i.e., whether the challenged conduct truly involves a "horizontal" restraint between actual or potential competitors allocating markets or customers, reducing output, or otherwise restricting competition between them, would be "yes." The Supreme Court of the United States has explained: "One of the classic examples of a per se violation of § 1 is an agreement between competitors at the same level of the market structure to allocate territories in order to minimize competition." United States v. Topco Assocs., Inc., 405 U.S. 596, 608, 92 S. Ct. 1126, 31 L. Ed. 2d 515 (1972). "Antitrust law does not treat employment markets differently from other markets." eBay, 968 F.Supp.2d at 1039. Indeed, one treatise has explained: "An agreement among employers that they will not compete against each other for the services of a particular employee or prospective employee is, in fact, a service division agreement, analogous to a product division agreement." XII Phillip E. Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law ¶ 2013b at 148 (3d ed. 2012).

Here, plaintiffs allege that Wabtec, [37] Knorr, and Faiveley N.A. along with their subsidiaries were the largest railroad industry suppliers, i.e., they were at the same level of the market, and they agreed to not hire each other's employees, i.e., they entered into an agreement to allocate their employees to minimize competition for the employees. Thus, plaintiffs plausibly alleged that defendants' agreements constituted horizontal restraints of competition with respect to defendants' employees.

Plaintiffs also plausibly alleged that defendants' horizontal product division agreements are "naked agreements." A naked agreement is an agreement "among competitors with no plausible efficiency justifications." 1 John J. Miles, Health Care & Antitrust Law § 3:2 (2018). Plaintiffs in the consolidated class action complaint do not allege any basis upon which the court could reasonably infer that the agreements had any procompetitive results or were somehow ancillary to a proper business dealing or purpose. Under those circumstances, plaintiffs plausibly alleged that the "no-poach" agreements described in the consolidated class action complaint were horizontal service division agreements, which, like product division agreements would be, [38] are per se unlawful under the antitrust laws. Plaintiffs, therefore, are not required to plead the requirements of a rule of reason analysis, e.g., relevant market.

The court's decision that the agreements alleged by plaintiff are plausibly per se violations of the antitrust laws is supported by the case law and the position of the DOJ, which was articulated by the government at the hearing on the motion to dismiss. Other courts[6] that have considered [*482] similar "no-poach" agreements have held that the agreements may be per se violative of the antitrust laws. For example, in United States v. Kemp & Assocs., Crim. Action No. 16-403, 2019 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28231, 2019 WL 763796 (D. Utah Feb. 21, 2019), the defendant was charged in a criminal indictment with criminal conspiracy in violation of § 1 for entering into a horizontal customer allocation agreement. The district court held that the agreement in issue should be subject to a rule of reason analysis and dismissed the indictment as barred by the statute of limitations. The government appealed. The Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit held that: (1) the indictment was not barred by the statute of limitations; and (2) it did not have interlocutory appellate jurisdiction to review the district's court's decision to apply the rule of reason analysis to the charge [39] in the indictment and mandamus was not warranted with respect to that issue. United States v. Kemp & Assocs., Inc., 907 F.3d 1264, 1272, 1276 (10th Cir. 2018). The court of appeals, however, cautioned the district court:

> To be sure, were the merits of the rule of reason order before us we might very well reach a different conclusion than did the district court. After all, "an agreement to allocate or divide customers between competitors within the same horizontal market, constitutes a per se violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act," Suntar Roofing, Inc., 897 F.2d at 473 (10th Cir. 1990), and Defendants' efforts to distinguish their agreement from a traditional customer allocation agreement are mostly unpersuasive. Despite Defendants' arguments otherwise, it is immaterial whether a customer allocation agreement applies to new or existing customers, Palmer v. BRG of Georgia, Inc., 498 U.S. 46, 49-50, 111 S.Ct. 401, 112 L.Ed.2d 349 (1990), and there is no rule that allocation agreements are only subject to the per se rule if customers are divided geographically, see United States v. Cadillac Overall Supply Co., 568 F.2d 1078, 1088 (5th Cir. 1978). Nor does it matter that the alleged agreement [*483] would only affect a small number of potential customers, cf. United States v. Reicher, 983 F.2d 168, 170 (10th Cir. 1992) (holding that a conspiracy to rig a single bid, and therefore affect only a single

[6] Plaintiffs in the notice of supplemental authority cite Conrad v. Jimmy John's Franchise, LLC, Case No. 3:18-cv-00133-NJR-RJD, 2019 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 94411 (S.D. Ill. May 21, 2019) (ECF No. 189-1), [40] and Blanton v. Domino's Pizza Franchising LLC, Case No. 2:18-cv-13207-VARDRG, 2019 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 87737 (E.D. Mich. May 24, 2019) (ECF No. 198-2). Plaintiffs attached the Conrad and Blanton decisions to their notice of supplemental authority. The court will, therefore, use this case's ECF docket citation when discussing each of those decisions.

In Conrad, the plaintiff sued the defendants under the Sherman Act for their alleged "practice of including no-poach clauses in its franchise contracts." (ECF No. 189-1 at 2.) The defendants filed a motion to dismiss, which was denied with respect to the plaintiff's Sherman Act claim. (Id. at 3.) The judge presiding over the case at the time held that plaintiff stated a plausible Sherman Act claim and the court could not decide at the pleading stage of the litigation which analysis would apply to the case, i.e., the rule of reason, the per se approach, or the quick look analysis. (Id. at 3-4.) The judge then retired and the case was reassigned. The defendants filed another motion to dismiss that was "extremely similar to the one that the prior judge already adjudicated." (Id. at 2.) The newly assigned judge applied the law of the case doctrine and denied the defendant's motion to dismiss the complaint. (Id. at 6.)

In Blanton, the plaintiff alleged that the defendants "violated the Sherman Antitrust Act by orchestrating an employee no-hire agreement among their nationwide network of franchisees." (ECF No. 189-2 at 2.) The defendant filed a motion to dismiss and argued that the plaintiff failed to state a § 1 claim under the rule of reason. The court disagreed; it held that plaintiff stated a plausible § 1 claim and that the plaintiff's failure to apply the rule of reason was not fatal to his claim. The court explained that "[m]ore factual development...[was] necessary[,]" and at that stage the plaintiff set forth factual allegations sufficient to show plausibly he was entitled to relief under § 1. (Id. at 10.)

Defendants argue that the court should disregard plaintiffs' notice of supplemental authority because the courts in the foregoing decisions did not hold that horizontal no-poach agreements are always subject to the per se rule. (ECF No. 190 at 1.) The court finds Conrad and Blanton persuasive to the extent the courts in those decisions held that the plaintiffs set forth factual allegations sufficient from which the court could plausibly infer that the per se rule would apply, and, therefore, the plaintiffs were not required to plead a rule of reason analysis in their complaints. The court agrees with defendants that the courts in those decisions did not hold that all horizontal no-poach agreements will be per se violative of the antitrust laws.

> customer, is subject to per se analysis), and any lack of judicial familiarity with the Heir Location Services industry is largely irrelevant, Arizona v. Maricopa Cty. Med. Soc'y, 457 U.S. 332, 346, 102 S.Ct. 2466, 73 L.Ed.2d 48 (1982).

Id. at 1277.

After the case was remanded, the government filed a motion for reconsideration of the district court's decision to dismiss the indictment because of the rule of reason analysis. *Kemp, 2019 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28231, 2019 WL 763796, at 1. The court granted the motion for reconsideration and held that the per se approach was applicable in the case. The court explained that the agreement in issue was a horizontal customer allocation agreement, which is subject to the per se approach, and it could not discern any basis upon which to find the per se approach inapplicable to the case. *2019 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28231, [WL] at 2-3.

In Aya Healthcare Servs. v. AMN Healthcare, Inc., Civ. Action No. 17-205-MMA, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 102582, 2018 WL 3032552 (S.D. Cal. June 19, 2018), the plaintiffs sued the defendants under § 1. The plaintiffs and the defendants sold medical-traveler services to hospitals, i.e., they provided nurses to understaffed hospitals around the United States. The defendants were the dominate providers of the nurses in the country and employed other providers as subcontractors. The plaintiffs sued defendants because the defendants required the subcontractor-providers "to accept unilateral no-poaching agreements[,]" which forbade the defendants' rivals, i.e., the subcontractor [41] providers, from initiating job offers or otherwise soliciting the nurses employed by defendants. *2019 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28231, [WL] at 2. The defendants filed a motion to dismiss arguing, among other things, that the plaintiffs failed to state a claim under § 1 under all three rules of analysis, i.e., per se, quick look, and rule of reason.

The court found that the agreements alleged were horizontal market allocation agreements, which typically constitute a per se violation of § 1. *2019 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28231, [WL] at 12. The court determined that the plaintiffs plausibly alleged that the agreements were not reasonably ancillary to the subcontractor agreements because, among other reasons, the agreements lasted beyond the subcontractor relationship had ended and the defendants were not subject to the same restrictions. Under those circumstances, the plaintiffs' allegations were sufficient to allege a type of restraint subject to per se treatment. The motion to dismiss was denied on that basis with respect to that issue. *2019 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28231, [WL] at 12-13.

In United States v. eBay, Inc., 968 F.Supp.2d 1030 (N.D. Cal. 2013), the government asserted a § 1 claim against eBay, Inc. ("eBay") and alleged that eBay entered into an agreement with Intuit, Inc. ("Intuit"), "which restricted eBay and Inuit's ability to recruit or hire candidates from one [42] another." Id. at 1032. eBay filed a motion to dismiss and argued, among other things, that the government "failed to state an unreasonable restraint of trade because it fails to include any allegations sufficient to state a rule of reason claim." Id. at 1037. The government admitted that it did not include in the complaint any allegations with respect to the rule of reason, but argued that it was not required to do so because it only intended to pursue claims under the per se and quick look rules. Id.

The court recognized that the government set forth factual allegations sufficient to show plausibly that eBay and Intuit entered into a horizontal market allocation [*484] agreement. Id. at 1039. The court explained that a horizontal "market allocation agreement or any other restraint traditionally subject to per se treatment will only be found to be per se illegal if it 'facially appears to be one that would almost always tend to restrict competition and decrease output[.]'" eBay, 968 F.Supp.2d at 1039 (quoting Nat'l Collegiate Athletic Ass'n v. Bd. of Regents of Univ. of Oklahoma, 468 U.S. 85, 100, 104 S. Ct. 2948, 82 L. Ed. 2d 70 (1984)). Under those circumstances, the court was charged with considering "factual evidence relating to the agreement's formation and character" to determine "whether the alleged no-solicitation/no hire agreement...[was] ancillary to a procompetitive [43] business purpose." Id. At the pleading stage of the litigation, however, the court could not "determine with certainty the nature of the restraint, and by extension, the level of analysis to apply." Id. at 1040. In other words, "taking the allegations in the Complaint as true, the court...[could not] determine as a matter of law that per se treatment...[would] be inappropriate." Id. The court denied the motion to dismiss with respect to that issue on that basis. Id.

Defendant relied on decisions[7] which do not warrant the application of the rule of reason in this case. In Eichorn v. AT & T Corp., 248 F.3d 131, 143 (3d Cir. 2001), the court of appeals held that the district court properly applied the rule of reason to analyze the "no-hire agreement" at issue in the case because the "no-hire agreement" was a covenant not to compete, i.e., a legitimate ancillary restraint on trade executed upon the legitimate transfer of ownership of a business. Here, at this stage of the proceedings, the court cannot discern that the alleged "no-poach" agreements would be legitimate ancillary restraints on trade executed with some other proper business purpose.

In Weisfeld v. Sun Chemical Corp., 210 F.R.D. 136, 143 (D.N.J. 2002), the court relied upon Eichorn to conclude that the rule of reason applied to a § 1 claim based upon [44] the three largest manufacturers in the ink printing industry conspiring not to hire each other's employees for a period of four years. On appeal, the Third Circuit Court of Appeals in dicta explained that Eichorn was distinguishable from the facts of Weisfeld:

> As we have recognized, the "Supreme Court has been cautious in extending the per se approach to claims that fall outside certain previously enumerated categories of liability." Eichorn, 248 F.3d at 143 (citations omitted). In Eichorn, we held that the no hire agreement at issue did not constitute a per se violation and, in fact, did not constitute an unreasonable restraint of trade at all. Id. at 144, 145-146. But the facts in Eichorn are different than those here. In Eichorn, AT & T adopted a policy not to allow employees of Paradyne Corp., an AT & T affiliate, to transfer to other divisions of AT & T. The purpose of the policy was to make Paradyne more attractive to potential buyers. Shortly thereafter, Paradyne was sold, and AT & T entered into a post-closing agreement in which it agreed not to hire, solicit or rehire any Paradyne employee or consultant whose compensation exceeded $50,000 for a period of 245 days (8 months). Id. at 136-37. In this case, however, Weisfeld alleges [45] that the three largest manufacturers in [*485] the ink printing industry conspired not to hire each others' employees for a period of four years.

Weisfeld v. Sun Chem. Corp., 84 F. App'x 257, 260 n.2 (3d Cir. 2004). The court of appeals, however, did not directly decide the issue. In any event, defendants' citations to Eichorn and Weisfeld do not persuade the court to conclude that the rule of reason would apply to this case; rather, the dictum in Weisfeld supports plaintiffs' argument that a conspiracy to not hire or solicit employees between employers who compete with one another may be a per se violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act.

The court's decision in this respect is supported by the government's explanation in its statement of interest and at the hearing on the motion to dismiss. It explained that the federal agencies charged with enforcing the antitrust laws consider naked no-poach agreements per se violations of the Sherman Act and the DOJ will proceed criminally against those who enter into those kinds of agreements. (ECF No. 158 at 9, 11, 13 (citing Federal Trade

[7] Defendant cites the following decisions from courts outside the Third Circuit in support of its argument that the rule of reason should be applied to the alleged horizontal restraints in this case. Those decisions, however, are easily distinguishable from this case. See *Deslandes v. McDonald's USA, LLC, Civ. Action No. 17-4857, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 105260, 2018 WL 3105955, at 7 (N.D. Ill. Cal. 2012) (acknowledging that the "horizontal agreements between competitors in restraint of trade" were "either per se unlawful...or...prima facie anticompetitive under the rule of reason analysis" but not deciding the issue because the plaintiffs plead their claim under the rule of reason); Bogan v. Hodgkins, 166 F.3d 509, 515 (2d Cir. 1999) (holding the agreement in issue did not trigger per se treatment because "while the Agreement may constrain General Agents to some degree, it does not allocate the market for agents to any meaningful extent"); Phillips v. Vandygriff, 711 F.2d 1217 (5th Cir. 1983) (holding the agreement in issue was not subject to per se analysis because it was "at least potentially reasonably ancillary" to a proper business purpose); UARCO Inc. v. Lam, 18 F.Supp.2d 1116 (D. Haw. 1998) (analyzing an "unclean hands" defense in deciding a motion for preliminary injunction and holding that companies' agreements to not hire each other's employees must be analyzed under the rule of reason without recognizing that no-hire agreements are horizontal market allocation agreements which receive per se treatment under the antitrust laws); Coleman v. Gen. Elec. Co., 643 F. Supp. 1229 (E.D. Tenn. 1986) (holding the per se analysis did not apply to the agreement in issue because "there was no stifling of competition for the services of these employees" and the impact of the agreement on the employment market was nothing more than "incidental").

The motion to dismiss will, therefore, be denied without prejudice with respect to this issue. Defendants may raise this issue if warranted [46] in a motion for summary judgment.

3. Plausibility of Claim for Antitrust Conspiracy

Section 1 of the Sherman Act provides, in pertinent part:

> Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal.

15 U.S.C. § 1. "To state a Section 1 claim, then, a plaintiff must allege (1) an agreement (2) to restrain trade unreasonably." Lifewatch, 902 F.3d at 331 (quoting In re Ins. Brokerage Antitrust Litig., 618 F.3d 300, 315 (3d Cir. 2010)). "A private plaintiff suing under the Clayton Act must also allege antitrust standing, including that its 'injury [is] of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and ... flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful.'" Lifewatch, 902 F.3d at 331 (quoting In re Ins. Brokerage Antitrust Litig., 618 F.3d at 331 n.9).

[*486] The prohibition in § 1 on "every contract, combination..., or conspiracy" that unreasonably restrains trade is a prohibition on an "agreement" that unreasonably restrains trade. Lifewatch, 902 F.3d at 332-33. "An agreement may be shown by either direct or circumstantial evidence." Id. at 333 (citing W. Penn Allegheny Health Sys., Inc. v. UPMC, 627 F.3d 85, 99 (3d Cir. 2010)). "'Unilateral activity by a defendant, no matter the motivation, cannot give rise to a [S]ection 1 violation.'" Id. at 332-33 (quoting InterVest, Inc. v. Bloomberg, L.P., 340 F.3d 144, 159 (3d Cir. 2003)). To show plausibly the defendants made an "agreement," "a plaintiff must plead 'some form of concerted action ..., in other words, [47] a unity of purpose or a common design and understanding or a meeting of minds or a conscious commitment to a common scheme ....'" Id. (quoting Ins. Brokerage, 618 F.3d at 315)). The Third Circuit Court of Appeals has explained:

> For circumstantial evidence of an agreement, then, a plaintiff must allege both parallel conduct and something "more," which we have sometimes called a "plus factor." Ins. Brokerage, 618 F.3d at 321. This "more" could include evidence (1) "that the defendant had a motive to enter into a ... conspiracy," (2) "that the defendant acted contrary to its interests," or (3) "implying a traditional conspiracy." Id. at 321-22 (quoting In re Flat Glass Antitrust Litig., 385 F.3d 350, 360 (3d Cir. 2004)).

Lifewatch, 902 F.3d at 333.

The Supreme Court of the United States has explained:

> In applying these general standards to a § 1 claim, we hold that stating such a claim requires a complaint with enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest that an agreement was made. Asking for plausible grounds to infer an agreement does not impose a probability requirement at the pleading stage; it simply calls for enough fact to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of illegal agreement.

Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556.

Defendants in their joint motion to dismiss the consolidated class action complaint argue plaintiffs did not set forth factual allegations [48] to show plausibly the "three distinct bilateral agreements are part of a single, overarching conspiracy among the Defendants." (ECF No. 124-1 at 14.) Plaintiffs respond that "[t]he Complaint never refers to a 'single' or 'overarching conspiracy[;]'" rather, plaintiffs plausibly alleged that "each Defendant participated in bilateral combinations to restrain competition in the market for employees." (ECF No. 152 at 19-20.) According to plaintiffs, each member of the proposed class was harmed by each bilateral agreement because each bilateral agreement "disrupted the normal bargaining and price-setting mechanisms that apply in the labor market...[which] suppress[ed] compensation levels generally." (Id. at 20.) Plaintiffs also argue that "it is certainly plausible that Defendants acted in concert with knowledge of, and in reliance on, the other express agreements to further the purposes of the [overarching] conspiracy." (Id. at 21.)

Here, plaintiffs allege that the defendants entered into three bilateral agreements:

> (1) beginning no later than 2009 and lasting at least until 2016, Wabtec's and Knorr's senior executives entered into an express no-poach agreement and then actively managed it with each other [49] through direct communications;
> (2) beginning no later than 2011 and lasting until at least 2015, senior executives at Knorr and Faiveley [*487] N.A. reached an express no-poach agreement that included a commitment to contact one another before pursuing an employee of the other company and actively managed the agreement through direct communications; and
> (3) beginning no later than 2014 and lasting at least until the companies merged in 2016, senior executives at Wabtec and Faiveley N.A. entered into a no-poach agreement in which the companies agreed not to hire each other's employees without approval from the other company and actively managed and enforced the agreement through direct communications.

The foregoing allegations plausibly show that there existed three bilateral agreements to restrain competition for employees in the railway equipment supplier industry. Issues remain, however, about: (1) whether plaintiffs set forth factual allegations to show plausibly that Wabtec, Knorr, and Faiveley N.A. were members of an overarching conspiracy; and (2) if so, when the overarching conspiracy began.

Plaintiffs plausibly alleged that by 2014 Wabtec, Knorr, and Faiveley N.A. were engaged in three [50] separate bilateral conspiracies. Plaintiffs, however, did not set forth factual allegations from which the court could conclude it is plausible that Wabtec in 2009 up until 2014 knew about Knorr and Faiveley N.A.'s agreement, Knorr knew about Wabtec and Faiveley N.A.'s agreement, or Faiveley N.A. knew about Wabtec and Knorr's agreement. Plaintiffs, however, may prove the existence of an overarching conspiracy via circumstantial evidence. Plaintiffs' allegations are sufficient to support a reasonable inference that at least by 2014 when all three competitors had entered into no-poach agreements they were engaged in conduct that would limit competition for the employees of each company, i.e., it is plausible they each entered into an overarching agreement to refrain from competing for employees with their top rivals.

Plaintiffs also plausibly alleged "something more" from which a reasonable inference can be drawn that by 2014, Wabtec, Knorr, and Faiveley N.A. were members of an overarching conspiracy to refrain from competing against each other with respect to employees. First, plaintiffs assert that Wabtec, Knorr, and Faiveley N.A. each had a motive to enter into an overarching agreement. [51] Plaintiffs allege:

- Wabtec, Knorr, and Faiveley N.A. were the three largest rail equipment suppliers and some of the largest employers in the rail industry;
- there is a high demand for and limited supply of skilled employees who have rail industry experience;
- directly soliciting employees from other rail industry employers is a particularly efficient and effective method of competing for qualified employees;
- in a properly functioning and lawfully competitive labor market, rail industry employers compete with one another to attract highly-skilled talent for their employment needs; and
- the competition benefits employees because it increases the available job opportunities and improves an employee's ability to negotiate for a better salary and other terms of employment.

Based upon the foregoing allegations, it is plausible to infer that by 2014, Wabtec, Knorr, and Faiveley N.A. each had a motive to join an overarching conspiracy because: (1) they were each other's biggest competitors for skilled employees; and (2) they each entered into bilateral agreements [*488] with their two largest competitors. An overarching agreement among all three of the largest rail equipment suppliers would place [52] Wabtec, Knorr, and Faiveley N.A. on equal footing with respect to competition for employees from their largest competitors. In any event, the 2016 acquisition of Faiveley by Wabtec resulted in Faiveley N.A. becoming part of the bilateral conspiracy between Wabtec and Knorr.

Plaintiffs set forth factual allegations sufficient to show plausibly that the entry into the bilateral agreements was contrary to the competitive interests of Wabtec, Knorr, and Faiveley N.A.: "By soliciting and hiring employees from other rail industry employers, a company is able to take advantage of the efforts its rival has expended in identifying and training the employees, while simultaneously inflicting a cost on the rival by removing an employee on whom the rival may depend." (ECF No. 88 ¶ 35.) By entering into the bilateral agreements, Wabtec, Knorr, and Faiveley N.A. forfeited the advantages gained from soliciting and hiring their competitors' employees. A reasonable inference is that they would enter into such agreements in exchange for promises that their top competitors would not solicit or hire each other's employees. Thus, the top rivals would be on equal footing in the competition for employees.

[53] Plaintiffs set forth sufficient factual allegations to show plausibly that there were similarities between the three bilateral agreements from which a reasonable inference may be drawn that the three bilateral agreements evolved into to an overarching agreement when Wabtec and Faiveley N.A. (no later than 2014) entered into the third bilateral agreement described in the consolidated class action complaint. Plaintiff alleges:

- the three bilateral agreements were entered into within a six-year time period and by the time Wabtec and Faiveley N.A. entered into their agreement in 2014, the other two bilateral agreements between Wabtec & Knorr and Knorr & Faiveley N.A. were effective and being enforced;
- the three bilateral agreements were executed and enforced by the companies' senior executives;
- the parties to each of the bilateral agreements agreed to not poach each other's employees and to not hire each other's employees prior to receiving approval from the other party to the agreement; and
- the executives of Wabtec, Knorr, and Faiveley N.A. managed and enforced the bilateral agreements via direct communication with each other.

Based upon the foregoing, plaintiffs set forth factual allegations [54] to show plausibly four conspiracies to restrain competition for employees in the railway equipment supplier industry: (1) beginning no later than 2009, Wabtec and Knorr; (2) beginning no later than 2011, Knorr and Faiveley N.A.; (3) beginning no later than 2014, Wabtec and Faiveley N.A.; and (4) beginning at the earliest 2014, the overarching conspiracy among Wabtec, Knorr, and Faiveley.

Plaintiffs and defendants cite to three decisions in support of their positions with respect to whether the allegations in the consolidated complaint are sufficient to plausibly show an overarching conspiracy among Wabtec, Knorr, and Faiveley: In re Insurance Brokerage Antitrust Litigation, 618 F.3d 300 (3d Cir. 2010); In re High-Tech Employee Antitrust Litigation, 856 F. Supp. 2d 1103 (N.D. Cal. 2012); and In re Iowa Ready-Mix Concrete Antitrust Litigation, 768 F.Supp.2d 961, 972 (N.D. Iowa 2011).

[*489] Defendants argue that this case "is like In re Insurance Brokerage Antitrust Litig.,, in which the Third Circuit Held that alleged parallel kickback conspiracies among defendants, although not necessarily 'praiseworthy—or even lawful,' did not plausibly suggest a 'global conspiracy' among the defendants." (ECF No. 124-1 at 15.) In Insurance Brokerage, the plaintiffs, who were "purchasers of commercial and employee benefit insurance," sued the defendants, who were "insurers and insurance brokers that deal[t] in those lines of insurance." Insurance Brokerage, 618 F.3d at 308. The plaintiffs [55] sued the defendants alleging the defendants "entered into unlawful, deceptive schemes to allocate purchasers among particular groups of defendant insurers." Id. The plaintiffs explained: "conspiring brokers funneled unwitting clients to their co-conspirator insurers, which were insulated from competition; in return, the insurers awarded the brokers contingent commission payments—concealed from the insurance purchasers and surreptitiously priced into insurance premiums—based on the volume of premium dollars steered their way." Id. The agreements between brokers and insurers at issue in Insurance Brokerage were vertical agreements. Id. The plaintiffs also alleged that a "global conspiracy" existed among the brokers to conceal the existence of the alleged conspiracy and commission agreements. Id. at 313. The plaintiffs labeled the global conspiracy as a "horizontal restraint." Id. at 348.

The defendants filed a motion to dismiss arguing, among other things, that the plaintiffs failed to set forth factual allegations sufficient to show plausibly a global, horizontal conspiracy existed among the brokers or among the insurers. The plaintiffs in response explained that in a normal market, a broker would explain [56] to customers that another broker's rates are too high. Because of the conspiracy, however, a broker could not explain to a potential client that another broker's rates were too high without exposing himself or herself and his or her participation in the conspiracy and commission agreements. The plaintiffs in support of the global conspiracy theory pointed to parallel conduct by the brokers and insurers, i.e., "the similar nature of each broker-centered conspiracy, as well as the allegedly similar confidentiality agreements the brokers inserted into the vertical contracts with each of their partner insurers." Id. at 350-51.

The district court granted the motion to dismiss with respect to the global conspiracy and held that the "complaints' factual allegations fail[ed] to plausibly imply horizontal non-disclosure agreements among the defendant brokers or the defendant insurers." Insurance Brokerage, 618 F.3d at 348. The district court explained: "While Plaintiffs present facts to support the possibility of inadequate disclosures by the brokers to the insureds, the Complaints are bereft of allegations to demonstrate that this was more than brokers adopting sub-par disclosure methods to protect their own, lucrative agreements." Id. at 351.

The court [57] of appeals relied upon Twombly to affirm the decision of the district court. The court of appeals explained:

> Twombly makes clear that a claim of conspiracy predicated on parallel conduct should be dismissed if "common economic experience," or the facts alleged in the complaint itself, show that independent self-interest is an "obvious alternative explanation" for defendants' common behavior. For our present purposes, we find this guidance sufficient.

Insurance Brokerage, 618 F.3d at 325. The court found that although the plaintiffs alleged parallel conduct, i.e., the brokers used industry-standard disclosure language in their agreements with customers [*490] and did not disclose their participation in the vertical agreements with insurers to their customers, the brokers' independent self-interest provided an obvious alternative explanation for their failure to disclose the vertical agreements to customers. The court of appeals explained: "Reaping 'enormous profits' from their own furtive use of contingent commission agreements, the brokers had no desire to upset the apple cart." Id. at 349.

The court of appeals found that the plaintiffs did not otherwise set forth factual allegations, i.e., "plus factors," to "plausibly imply a horizontal [58] agreement among the brokers." Id. at 349-50. For example, the brokers' use of industry standard disclosure practices was not a "plus factor" from which a horizontal conspiracy could be reasonably inferred. Id. The court of appeals explained:

> Plaintiffs' attack on the pervasive use of contingent commissions to exploit insurance brokers' power over their clients—and the use of similar techniques to disguise this activity—may allege a "pernicious industry practice," but they do not plausibly imply an industry-wide conspiracy.

Id. at 350.

Insurance Brokerage is distinguishable from this case. First, plaintiffs allege members of three horizontal bilateral agreements to not poach each other's employees were members of one overarching horizontal agreement to not poach each other's employees, i.e., the members and subject-matter of the agreements were the same. In Insurance Brokerage, however, the plaintiffs argued that vertical agreements between brokers and insurers were evidence of horizontal agreements between brokers and between insurers to not disclose the contents of the vertical agreements. In other words, the parties to the horizontal agreements were different than the parties to the vertical agreements and [59] the subject-matters of the agreements were related but not the same.

Second, the plaintiffs in Insurance Brokerage heavily relied upon the industry-standard disclosure language to show that the brokers were engaged in horizontal agreements to not disclose their vertical agreements with insurers. The court of appeals rejected that argument because although the reliance on the industry-standard language may be evidence of a "pernicious industry practice," it did not show that the brokers were engaged in a horizontal agreement to violate the antitrust laws. Id. at 351. Here, however, there is no evidence that the alleged agreements by Wabtec, Knorr, and Faiveley to not poach each other's employees were industry practice. As discussed above, plaintiffs set forth factual allegations that constitute "plus factors" and circumstantially support that by at least 2014, Wabtec, Knorr, and Faiveley were members of an overarching conspiracy to not poach each other's employees.

The parties also cite to In re High-Tech Employee Antirust Litigation, 856 F.Supp.2d 1103 (N.D. Cal. 2012). In High-Tech, the plaintiff-employees alleged the defendant-companies, who were all high-tech companies with a principal place of business in Silicon Valley, conspired to fix and suppress employee compensation [60] to restrict employee mobility. Id. at 1108. The plaintiffs alleged that the conspiracy consisted of six bilateral agreements among the defendants to not poach each other's employees. Id. at 1110-11. The plaintiffs also alleged that all defendants were members of an "overarching conspiracy." Id. at 1115. The defendants argued that the plaintiffs failed to set forth factual allegations sufficient to show plausibly there was an overarching conspiracy among all defendants. Id.

[*491] The district court determined the factual allegations in the complaint plausibly showed the defendants were a part of the overarching conspiracy because the plaintiffs "alleged facts beyond mere parallel conduct[,]" which "tend...to exclude the possibility of independent action." Id. at 1117. The court explained the plaintiffs alleged: (1) the six bilateral agreements were negotiated by senior executives; (2) "at all relevant times, at least one of three [senior] executives 'had significant influence over at least one party to each of the six bilateral agreements[;]" (3) the six bilateral agreements, which were reached in secrecy over a span of two years, were identical; and (4) one of the senior executives (Steve Jobs) "exerted significant influence over companies [61] involved in four of the bilateral" agreements. Id. at 1116-17. The court concluded: "The fact that all six identical bilateral agreements were reached in secrecy among seven Defendants in a span of two years suggests that these agreements resulted from collusion, and not from coincidence." Id. at 1120.

The factual allegations in support of an overarching conspiracy in this case are not as strong as the factual allegations in High-Tech; indeed, plaintiffs in this case do not allege that a) Wabtec, Knorr, or Faiveley N.A. shared senior executives or board members b) senior executives or board members had influence over another party to the bilateral agreements, c) the agreements were reached within a span of two years (here it was approximately 5 years), or d) the agreements were identical. Plaintiffs do allege, however, that beginning in 2014, the three largest railroad equipment suppliers were all engaged with each other in bilateral agreements to not poach each other's employees. The agreements, like the agreement in High-Tech, were company-wide in the United States and included the same essential terms. Wabtec, Knorr, and Faiveley N.A. would have been motivated to enter into an overarching agreement to ensure [62] that the other two companies also agreed to not poach each other's employees and obtain any advantage in the marketplace. Under those circumstances, there is a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence that at least beginning in 2014 (when Wabtec and Faiveley N.A. entered into their no poach agreement) there was an overarching conspiracy among Wabtec, Knorr, and Faiveley N.A. to not poach each other's employees. Like the plaintiffs in High-Tech, plaintiffs in this case set forth factual allegations sufficient to show parallel conduct and something "more" to show defendants were acting pursuant to an overarching conspiracy.

Defendants also cite to In re Iowa Ready-Mix Concrete Antitrust Litigation, 768 F.Supp.2d 961, 972 (N.D. Iowa 2011), in support of their argument that plaintiffs failed to set forth factual allegations sufficient to show plausibly Wabtec, Knorr, and Faiveley N.A. were members of an overarching conspiracy. In Ready-Mix, the plaintiffs, purchasers of ready-mix concrete, sued the defendants, producers and sellers of ready-mix concrete and certain of their officers, directors, owners, and employees, "alleging an antitrust conspiracy to suppress and eliminate competition by fixing the price of ready-mix concrete in the 'Iowa region.'" Id. at 963. According [63] to the plaintiffs, "the defendants and their co-conspirators conspired to set and reached agreements to set agreed-upon prices, to set agreed-upon price increases, and to submit non-competitive and rigged bids for ready-mix concrete sold in the Northern District of Iowa and elsewhere." Id. at 965-66. The defendants filed a motion to dismiss in which they argued that "the plaintiffs...alleged no facts to support a direct agreement among any of the defendants other than the three separate and [*492] discrete agreements admitted in the individual defendant's plea agreements to criminal antitrust charges[.]" Id. at 971. More specifically, the defendants argued: "defendants contend that the allegations of an industry-wide conspiracy in the entire (and undefined) 'Iowa region' over a four-plus year period are inconsistent with the discrete agreements admitted in the plea agreements and, thus, must be disregarded." Id. at 972.

The court agreed with the defendants and held that the plaintiffs included in the complaint only conclusory allegations about the defendants allegedly entering into an industry-wide conspiracy in the Iowa region. Id. at 974. The court explained:

> Here, as the defendants contend, the Amended Consolidated Complaint does [64] not even allege parallel conduct, but skips straight to conclusory allegations of an agreement among the defendants. See Amended Consolidated Complaint at ¶¶ 42-51. Such "a naked assertion of conspiracy in a § 1 complaint ... gets the complaint close to stating a claim, but without some further factual enhancement it stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility of 'entitle[ment] to relief.'" Bell Atlantic, 550 U.S. at 557, 127 S.Ct. 1955 (citing DM Research, Inc. v. College of Am. Pathologists, 170 F.3d 53, 56 (1st Cir.1999), as stating, "[T]erms like 'conspiracy,' or even 'agreement,' are border-line: they might well be sufficient in conjunction with a more specific allegation-for example, identifying a written agreement or even a basis for inferring a tacit agreement, ... but a court is not required to accept such terms as a sufficient basis for a complaint"). There is no "further factual enhancement" in the Amended Consolidated Complaint to push the allegations of an antitrust conspiracy across the line between possible and plausible. Indeed, allegations that, for the purpose of forming and effectuating their combination and conspiracy, the defendants and their co-conspirators "did those things which they combined and conspired to do, including, among other things, discussing, forming and [65] implementing agreements to raise and maintain at artificially high levels the prices for Ready-Mix Concrete," Amended Consolidated Complaint at ¶ 44, is, as the defendants contend, merely a tautology, not an allegation of additional facts. Even the plaintiffs' allegations that, throughout the class period, the defendants and their co-conspirators conspired to set and reached agreements to set agreed-upon prices, to set agreed-upon price increases, and to submit non-competitive and rigged bids for ready-mix concrete sold in the Northern District of Iowa and elsewhere, id. at ¶¶ 51-52, are merely conclusory allegations of an agreement, not allegations of facts from which an agreement can reasonably be inferred. Similarly, allegations that the defendants concealed their agreement through secret meetings, id. at 56-57, are merely conclusory allegations providing no factual enhancement.
> The defendants are correct that the only facts about the nature and operation of the alleged conspiracy to be gleaned from the Amended Consolidated Complaint are the facts in the plea agreements of the individual defendants. Even then, it is only by recourse to the plea agreements referenced in the Amended Consolidated [66] Complaint that one can learn any factual details of antitrust conspiracies, and then only as to certain bilateral agreements.
> On the other hand, the plaintiffs are correct that the Packaged Ice decision on which the defendants rely held that civil antitrust litigation cannot be "circumscribed [*493] or defined by the boundaries of the criminal investigation or plea agreements" of some of the alleged participants in the civil antitrust conspiracy. 723 F.Supp.2d at 1011-12. That decision also held that "taken as part of the larger picture, and considering the parallel internal investigations that have resulted in the suspension of key executives, these guilty pleas [of certain alleged participants in the civil conspiracy] do enhance the expectation that discovery might lead to evidence of a nationwide illegal agreement among these same actors, one of whom is under active government investigation and admittedly does not sell product in southeastern Michigan." Id. at 1011. What is missing in this case, however, is the "larger picture" from which inferences of a wider conspiracy can be drawn from guilty pleas to separate bilateral conspiracies.

Id.

The court: (1) rejected the application of a "hub and spoke" conspiracy to the case [67] because the plaintiffs did not allege a vertical conspiracy, which is a requirement of a "hub and spoke" conspiracy; (2) recognized the plaintiffs did not set forth any "allegation of facts supporting the existence of an overall plan to fix prices or that each defendant had knowledge that others were involved in the conspiracy[;]" and (3) found the allegations about the geographical area of the conspiracy, i.e., an undefined "Iowa region," implausible because "[a]s alleged, ready-mix concrete must be produced and delivered within a limited geographical area, such that it is not clear how all of the defendants could compete within an entire undefined 'Iowa region[.]'" Id. at 975-76.

Defendants rely upon Ready-Mix and argue that like the plaintiffs in Ready-Mix, the "[p]laintiffs [in this case] do not offer any factual allegations that would connect the separate bilateral agreements." (ECF No. 124-1 at 15.) Plaintiffs' allegations in this case, however, rise above the conclusory and implausible allegations set forth by the plaintiffs in Ready-Mix. As discussed above, by 2014, the three largest railroad equipment suppliers had all entered into bilateral agreements to not poach each other's employees. [68] Those agreements were reached and managed by the senior executives of the three largest railroad equipment suppliers and the agreements applied company-wide throughout the United States. Under those circumstances, there is a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence that beginning no later than 2014, Wabtec, Knorr, and Faiveley N.A. were members of an overarching conspiracy to restrain competition for employees.

Based upon the foregoing, plaintiffs set forth factual allegations sufficient to show plausibly that: (1) Wabtec, Knorr, and Faiveley N.A. entered into three bilateral no-poach agreements to not poach each other's employees; and (2) beginning in at least 2014, the three bilateral no-poach agreements were part of an overarching conspiracy among Wabtec, Knorr, and Faiveley N.A. to not poach each other's employees. Defendants' motion to dismiss will be denied on that basis.

4. Ricon and Bendix will be dismissed without prejudice from the consolidated class action complaint.

Defendants argue that the complaint filed by the DOJ in the underlying criminal action did not name Bendix or Ricon as defendants and the factual allegations with respect to Bendix (a subsidiary [69] of Knorr) and Ricon (a subsidiary of Wabtec) "are particularly sparse[.]" (ECF No. 124-1 at 16.) With respect to Ricon, defendants argue that "[t]he single reference to Ricon in the Complaint comes in the paragraph in which Plaintiffs describe Ricon as [*494] a defendant." (Id. at 17.) "Plaintiffs make no allegation that Ricon's products are principally for the 'railway industry.'" (Id.) Plaintiffs "do not oppose Defendants' request to dismiss the claims against Ricon." (ECF No. 152 at 24 n.7.) Plaintiffs request the court dismiss the claims against Ricon without prejudice "to Plaintiffs' ability to request leave to amend in the future." (Id.) The motion to dismiss will be granted without prejudice with respect to Ricon, and Ricon will be dismissed without prejudice as a defendant.

With respect to Bendix, defendants explain that plaintiffs "allege a no-poach conspiracy restraining competition for 'railway industry employees[,]" but Bendix is a manufacturer of braking systems for trucks, i.e., tractor trailers and similar commercial vehicles, and not rail cars. (ECF No. 124-1 at 16.) In other words, plaintiffs do not allege that Bendix had any railway employees, who are in issue in this case. (Id. at 17.) Plaintiffs [70] in the consolidated class action complaint set forth the following allegations against Bendix:

> Defendant Bendix Commercial Vehicle Systems LLC ("Bendix") is a Delaware corporation with its headquarters in Elyria, Ohio. Bendix develops and supplies active safety technologies, air brake charging and control systems, and components for commercial vehicles. Bendix is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Knorr-Bremse. Bendix served as a recruiter for Knorr Brake for certain employment needs.
> In furtherance of their agreement, Wabtec and Knorr informed their outside recruiters not to solicit employees from the other company. For example, Knorr Brake used Bendix, a Knorr subsidiary and Knorr Brake sister company, as a recruiter for certain employment needs. Knorr Brake directed the Bendix recruiters to refrain from soliciting employees from Wabtec.

(ECF No. 88 ¶¶ 27, 45).

To state a § 1 claim against Bendix, plaintiffs must set forth factual allegations sufficient to plausibly show that Bendix had "unity of purpose or a common design and understanding or a meeting of minds or a conscious commitment to a common scheme" with Wabtec to divide the market in the employee rail equipment supplier industry. [71] Insurance Brokerage, 618 F.3d at 315. Plaintiffs, however, are not required to show that Bendix "knew of or participated in every transaction in furtherance of or related to the alleged conspiracy." *In re Magnesium Oxide Antitrust Litig., No. CIV. 10-5943 DRD, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 121373, 2011 WL 5008090, at 17 (D.N.J. Oct. 20, 2011) (citing decisions). Allegations that Bendix knew about the conspiracy—without more—are insufficient to show plausibly that Bendix was a member of an alleged conspiracy in this case. Id. Plaintiffs must set forth factual allegations to show plausibly: (1) Bendix had knowledge of the agreement between Wabtec and Knorr; and (2) Bendix intended to join the agreement. Id. (citing In re Vitamins Antitrust Litig., 320 F.Supp.2d 1, 15 (D.D.C. 2004)). "'[A] party progresses form mere knowledge of an endeavor to intent to join it when there is 'informed and interested cooperation, stimulation, instigation. And there is also a stake in the venture which, even if it may not be essential, is not irrelevant to the question of conspiracy.'" Id. (quoting Direct Sales Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 703, 713, 63 S. Ct. 1265, 87 L. Ed. 1674 (1943)).

Here, plaintiffs allege Bendix, a wholly-owned subsidiary of Knorr, acted as Knorr's recruiter for "certain employment needs" and that Knorr directed Bendix to refrain from soliciting employees from Wabtec. (ECF No. 88 ¶¶ 27, 45.) [*495] Those allegations, [72] however, are not sufficient to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence that Bendix knew Knorr agreed with Wabtec to restrict competition for employees and that Bendix intended to join the agreement. Plaintiffs' allegations against Bendix amount to no more than allegations that Bendix aided and abetted Knorr in violating the antitrust laws. The Sherman Act, however, does not establish liability for a wholly-owned subsidiary who aids and abets its parent-corporation in violating the antitrust laws; rather, "to state a valid antitrust claim against...[a wholly-owned subsidiary], the...[plaintiff] must assert conduct by [the wholly-owned subsidiary] that is directly forbidden by the Sherman Act." MCI Telecommunications Corp. v. Graphnet, Inc., 881 F. Supp. 126, 130 (D.N.J. 1995). In other words, "aiding and abetting is not an independent theory of civil liability under the Sherman Act." *Top Rank, Inc. v. Haymon, No. CV154961JFWMRWX, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 164676, 2015 WL 9948936, at 16 (C.D. Cal. Oct. 16, 2015) (citing MCI Telecommunications, 881 F.Supp. at 129). The motion to dismiss with respect to Bendix will, therefore, be granted, and Bendix will be dismissed without prejudice[8] as a defendant.

B. Motion to Strike Class Allegations

1. Applicable Law

Here, defendants argue the class allegations should be stricken from the consolidated class action complaint under [73] Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(f). (ECF No. 129 at 7.) Defendants also acknowledge that Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23(c)(1)(A) and (d)(1)(D) provides "statutory authority for Defendants' pleading-stage motion to strike." (ECF No. 129 at 19.) Courts have reached different conclusions about whether Rule 12(f), Rule 23, or both[9] Rule 12(f) and Rule 23 provide a court the authority to strike class allegations from the complaint. For the reasons explained below, defendants' motion to strike class allegations will be considered and analyzed under Rule 23(d)(1)(D).

a. Rule 12(f)

[8] In the alternative to plaintiffs' argument that the allegations against Bendix are sufficient, they request leave to amend the consolidated class action complaint to set forth additional factual allegations against Bendix. (ECF No. 152 at 26 n.9.) To the extent plaintiffs want to amend their consolidated class action complaint, they should do so in accordance with Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15.

[9] For example, in *Luppe v. Cheswick Generating Station, Civ. Action No. 12-929, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9791, 2015 WL 401443, at 2 (W.D. Pa. Jan. 28, 2015), the court explained that Rule 12(f) and Rule 23(c)(1)(A) "together, provide authority for the Court to strike the class allegations from Plaintiffs' Complaint, if appropriate, even before Plaintiffs move for class certification."

Rule 12(f) provides, in pertinent part, that "[t]he court may strike from a pleading an insufficient defense or any redundant, immaterial, impertinent, or scandalous matter." Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(f). The moving party bears the burden to show allegations should be stricken from a pleading. Staro Asset Mgmt., LLC v. Soose, No. CIV.A. 02-886, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 32320, 2005 WL 2179781, at *3 (W.D. Pa. Aug. 17, 2005). "'The purpose of a motion to strike is to clean up the pleadings, streamline litigation, and avoid unnecessary forays into immaterial matters.'" Landau v. Lamas, Civ. Action No. 15-1327, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 106052, 2018 WL 3126396, at *2 (M.D. Pa. June 26, 2018) (quoting McInerney v. Moyer Lumber and Hardware, Inc., 244 F.Supp.2d 393, 402 (E.D. Pa. 2002). "While courts possess considerable discretion in weighing Rule 12(f) motions, such motions are not favored and [*496] will generally be denied unless the material bears no possible relation to the matter at issue and may result in prejudice to the moving party." Miller v. Group Voyagers, Inc., 912 F.Supp. 164, 168 (E.D. Pa. 1996). "Motions to strike factual allegations will be denied [74] when, although the averments state no independently actionable claim, they 'are so connected with the subject matter of the suit that it might be deemed to present a question of law or fact that the court ought to hear.'" In re Westinghouse Sec. Litig., No. CIV. A. 91-354, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3033, 1998 WL 119554, at *2 (W.D. Pa. Mar. 12, 1998) (quoting River Rd. Dev. Corp. v. Carlson Corp.-Ne., No. CIV. A. 89-7037, 1990 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6201, 1990 WL 69085, at *1 (E.D. Pa. May 23, 1990)).

It is unlikely that a defendant can show the class allegations constitute "an insufficient defense or any redundant, immaterial, impertinent, or scandalous matter[,]"[10] Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(f), that should be stricken from the complaint. See Timothy A. Daniels, Challenging Class Certification at the Pleading Stage: What Rule Should Govern and What Standard Should Apply?, 56 S. Tex. L. Rev. 241, 264 (2014) ("A complaint seeking class certification certainly does not raise an 'insufficient defense,' nor does it typically contain 'redundant,' 'impertinent,' or 'scandalous' matters."). It is recognized, however, that "[a]n order granting a motion to strike class allegations is tantamount to a denial of class certification after a motion to certify.'" Smith v. Merial Ltd., No. 10-cv-439, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 78220, 2012 WL 2020361, at *6 (D.N.J. June 5, 2012) (quoting 1 JOSEPH M. MCLAUGHLIN, MCLAUGHLIN ON CLASS ACTIONS § 3:4 (15th ed. 2018)); Richardson v. Verde Energy USA, Inc., 354 F.Supp.3d 639, 654 (E.D. Pa. 2018) ("[A] motion to strike is 'for all [75] practical purposes, identical to an opposition to a motion for class certification.") (quoting Korman v. The Walking Co., 503 F.Supp.2d 755, 762-63 (E.D. Pa. 2007)); Scott v. Family Dollar Stores, Inc., 733 F.3d 105, 110 n.2 (4th Cir. 2013) ("[W]e have jurisdiction to review the district court's grant of Family Dollar's motion to dismiss or strike the class allegations because the district court's ruling is the functional equivalent of denying a motion to certify the case as a class action.") (citing In re Bemis Co., Inc., 279 F.3d 419, 421 (7th Cir. 2002) (holding the rejection of a position in an answer with respect to whether class treatment was suitable in a case was the "functional equivalent" of denying a motion for class certification)). Thus, a court's consideration of a motion to strike class allegations should not be analyzed under Rule 12(f) under which the movant the burden of proof; rather, a court should consider a motion to strike class allegations under the pertinent provisions of Rule 23, which governs class certification.

b. Rule 23

[10] One court in this district defined the relevant terms of Rule 12(f) as follows:

> "Redundant"—The statement of facts which are wholly foreign to the issue intended to be denied or the needless repetition of material averments.
> "Immaterial"—having no essential or important relationship to the averment intended to be denied. A statement of unnecessary particulars in connection with, and as descriptive of, what is material.
> "Impertinent"—A statement [76] of matters applied to facts which do not belong to the matter in question, and which is not necessary to the matter in question.
> "Scandalous"—Unnecessary matter or facts criminatory of a party referred to in the pleading.

Burke v. Mesta Mach. Co., 5 F.R.D. 134, 138 (W.D.Pa.1946) (cited by DirecTV, Inc. v. Weikel, No. CIV. 03-5300 (JBS), 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9902, 2005 WL 1243378, at *2 (D.N.J. May 25, 2005)).

Rule 23(c)(1)(A) provides that "[a]t an early practicable time...the court must determine by order whether to certify the [*497] action as a class action[,]" Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(c)(1)(A), and Rule 23(d)(1)(D) provides that "the court may issue orders that...require that the pleadings be amended to eliminate allegations about representation of absent persons and that the action proceed accordingly[,]" Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(d)(1)(D). The Supreme Court of the United States has recognized that "[s]ometimes the issues are plain enough from the pleadings to determine whether" class certification is appropriate in a given case. Gen. Tel. Co. of the Sw. v. Falcon, 457 U.S. 147, 160, 102 S. Ct. 2364, 72 L. Ed. 2d 740 (1982). The Third Circuit Court of Appeals has acknowledged that in a "rare few" cases "the complaint itself demonstrates that the requirements for maintaining a class action cannot be met" and a court may strike class allegations contained in a complaint. Landsman & Funk PC v. Skinder-Strauss Assocs., 640 F.3d 72, 93 n.30 (3d Cir. 2011) (citing Rios v. State Farm Fire & Cas. Co., 469 F. Supp. 2d 727, 740 (S.D. Iowa 2007)). In Landsman, the court noted, however, that in all other cases (the majority of cases) "[t]o determine if the requirements of Rule 23 have been satisfied, a district court must conduct a 'rigorous [77] analysis.'" Landsman, 640 F.3d at 93 (quoting In re Hydrogen Peroxide Antitrust Litig., 552 F.3d 305, 309 (3d Cir. 2008)). The court of appeals explained:

> In [conducting a rigorous analysis], a "court may 'delve beyond the pleadings to determine whether the requirements for class certification are satisfied.'" In re Hydrogen Peroxide, 552 F.3d at 316 (quoting Newton v. Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc., 259 F.3d 154, 167 (3d Cir.2001)). . . . In most cases, some level of discovery is essential to such an evaluation. In Weiss v. Regal Collections, 385 F.3d 337 (3d Cir.2004), we emphasized the importance of discovery as part of the class certification process. "It seems appropriate," we said, "that the class action process should be able to 'play out' according to the directives of Rule 23 and should permit due deliberation by the parties and the court on the class certification issues." Weiss, 385 F.3d at 347-48 (footnote omitted). Accordingly, "[a]llowing time for limited discovery supporting certification motions may . . . be necessary for sound judicial administration." Id. at 347 n. 17. These concerns were the basis for setting down a "rigorous analysis" requirement in Hydrogen Peroxide, where we recognized that changes in Rule 23 reflected the need "for a thorough evaluation of the Rule 23 factors." In re Hydrogen Peroxide, 552 F.3d at 318.

With respect to certification of a class, the proponent of the class bears the burden of proof to show by a preponderance of the evidence that the four requirements of Rule 23(a) are satisfied and that the class fits [78] in one of the three categories listed in Rule 23(b)(1)-(3). In re Hydrogen Peroxide, 552 F.3d at 309 n.6. Here, the parties dispute which party has the burden of proof with respect to defendants' motion to strike class allegations. According to plaintiffs, defendants must "satisfy the very heavy burden of establishing that class certification is a 'clear impossibility.'" (ECF No. 152 at 8 (quoting Dieter v. Aldi, Inc., No. 18-cv-846, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 201119, 2018 WL 6191586, at *6 (W.D. Pa. Nov. 28, 2018).) According to defendants, however, "[o]n a motion to strike, the burden remains with the plaintiff to show that they can meet the Rule 23 requirements." (H.T. 2/25/2019 (ECF No. 176) at 17.) Defendants' motion to strike the class allegations is based upon only the allegations contained in the consolidated class action complaint, i.e., neither party offered any evidence in support of their positions. Thus, the court's [*498] consideration of defendants' argument that class certification is impossible as a matter of law is constrained by the applicable law and the allegations in the consolidated class action complaint.

Courts have recognized that with respect to whether class allegations should be stricken "'the plaintiff bears the burden of advancing a prima facie showing that the class action requirements of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 are satisfied or [79] that discovery is likely to produce substantiation of the class allegations.'" Trunzo v. CitiMortgage, Civ. Action No. 11-1124, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19625, 2018 WL 741422, at * 4 (W.D. Pa. Feb. 7, 2018) (quoting Mantolete v. Bolger, 767 F.2d 1416, 1424 (9th Cir. 1985)); Noye v. Yale Assocs., No. 1:15-CV-2253, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 101295, 2017 WL 2813293, at *3 (M.D. Pa. June 29, 2017); Swank v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., No. 2:13-CV-01185, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 41789, 2015 WL 1508403, at *2 (W.D. Pa. Mar. 31, 2015); Bell v. Cheswick Generating Station, Genon Power Midwest, L.P., Civ. Action No. 12-929, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9791, 2015 WL 401443, at *3 (W.D. Pa. Jan. 28, 2015) ("accelerating the class certification question does not alter the traditional Rule 23 burdens...."). "Absent such a showing, a trial court's refusal to allow class discovery is not an abuse of discretion." Trunzo, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19625, 2018 WL 741422, at *4 (citing Mantolete, 767 F.2d at 1424). Stated another way, "courts grant motions to strike under Rule 23(d)(1)(D) before class discovery only in 'the rare few [cases] where the complaint itself demonstrates that the requirements for maintaining a class action cannot be met[.]'" Id. (quoting Goode v. LexisNexis Risk & Info. Analytics Grp., Inc., 284 F.R.D. 238, 246 (E.D.Pa. 2012)). Thus, plaintiffs have the burden to allege sufficient facts in the consolidated class action complaint to make a prima facie showing that the requirements of Rule 23 are satisfied or that at least discovery is likely to produce substantiation of the class allegations.

"The class action is 'an exception to the usual rule that litigation is conducted by and on behalf of the individual named parties only.'" Comcast Corp. v. Behrend, 569 U.S. 27, 33, 133 S. Ct. 1426, 185 L. Ed. 2d 515 (2013). In order to become certified, a class must satisfy the four requirements of Rule 23(a): (1) numerosity; (2) commonality; (3) typicality; and (4) adequacy of representation. [80] Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a). In addition to satisfying the four requirements set forth in Rule 23(a), the class must fit within one of the three types of class actions set forth in Rule 23(b). Mielo v. Steak 'n Shake Operations, Inc., 897 F.3d 467, 482 (3d Cir. 2018). Plaintiffs' consolidated class action complaint pleads the class claims pursuant to Rule 23(a), 23(b)(2) and 23(b)(3). (ECF No. 88 ¶ 65). Defendants argue that the consolidated class action complaint shows that plaintiffs will not be able to satisfy the Rule 23(a)(3) requirement of typicality and the Rule 23(b) requirement of predominance and they challenge plaintiffs' class definition as overbroad. Each of the arguments will be addressed below.

2. Rule 23(a)(3) Typicality Analysis

Typicality[11] is designed to "'screen out class actions in which the [*499] legal or factual position of the representatives is markedly different from that of other members of the class even though common issues of law or fact are present.'" Marcus v. BMW of N. Am., LLC, 687 F.3d 583, 598 (3d Cir. 2012) (quoting 7A CHARLES ALAN WRIGHT, ARTHUR R. MILLER, MARY KAY KANE, RICHARD L. MARCUS, A. BENJAMIN SPENCER & ADAM N. STEINMAN, FEDERAL PRACTICE & PROCEDURE § 1764 (3d ed. 2005)). "The criterion acts as a bar to class certification only when 'the legal theories of the named representatives potentially conflict with those of the absentees.'" Newton v. Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc., 259 F.3d 154, 183 (3d Cir. 2001), as amended (Oct. 16, 2001) (quoting Georgine v. Amchem Products, Inc., 83 F.3d 610, 631 (3d Cir. 1996)). Typicality "ensur[es] [81] that the class representatives are sufficiently similar to the rest of the class—in terms of their legal claims, factual circumstances, and stake in the litigation--so that certifying those individuals to represent the class will be fair to the rest of the proposed class." In re Schering Plough Corp. ERISA Litig., 589 F.3d 585, 597 (3d Cir. 2009).

[11] One treatise has recognized that "[t]he typicality inquiry assumes an added dimension of complexity when multiple parties are named as defendants." 1 WILLIAM B. RUBENSTEIN, ALBA CONTE, HERBERT NEWBERG, NEWBERG ON CLASS ACTIONS § 3:48 (5th ed. 2012). "The question is whether a plaintiff who has been affected by the conduct of one of the defendants may name all those who engaged in the challenged conduct as the defendants—and thereby represent a class of all those affected by any single defendant—even though the named plaintiff has had no contact with some of those defendants." Id. The Third Circuit Court of Appeals has explained that "where no nominal plaintiff has standing on any issue against one of multiple defendants, a suit for damages may not be maintained as a class action against that defendant." Haas v. Pittsburgh Nat'l Bank, 526 F.2d 1083 (3d Cir. 1975). The court of appeals acknowledged two exceptions to that general rule:

> (1) situations in which the injuries are the result of "a conspiracy or concerted schemes between the defendants at whose hands the class suffered injury," or (2) instances in which all defendants are juridically related and a single disposition of the entire dispute would be expeditious.

Id. at 1095 n.15 (quoting La Mar v. H & B Novelty & Loan Co., 489 F.2d 461 (9th Cir. 1973)).

Here, plaintiffs, who are employees of Knorr, Wabtec, and certain of their respective wholly-owned subsidiaries, seek to represent a class of employees of Knorr, Wabtec, and certain of their respective wholly-owned subsidiaries. Plaintiffs set forth factual allegations to show plausibly that their injuries are the result of conspiracies entered into by Knorr, Wabtec, and Faiveley N.A. Thus, the first Haas exception to the general rule that a plaintiff cannot assert claims on behalf of a class against a defendant with whom the plaintiff has had no contact is applicable to this case.

There exists a "low threshold for satisfying" the requirement of typicality. Newton, 259 F.3d at 183. The factual and legal bases of each class members' claim may differ. Id. "If the claims of the named plaintiffs and putative class members involve the same conduct by the defendant, typicality is established regardless of factual differences." Id. at 183-84 (citing Barnes v. Am. Tobacco Co., 161 F.3d 127, 141 (3d Cir. 1998)). "[E]ven relatively pronounced factual differences will generally not preclude a finding of typicality where there is a strong similarity of legal theories." Baby Neal for and by Kanter v. Casey, 43 F.3d 48, 58 (3d Cir. 1994). "If a plaintiff's claim arises from the same event, practice [82] or course of conduct that gives rise to the claims of the class members, factual differences will not render that claim atypical if it is based on the same legal theory as the claims of the class." Marcus, 687 F.3d at 598 (citing Hoxworth v. Blinder, Robinson & Co., 980 F.2d 912, 923 (3d Cir.1992)).

"Where an action challenges a policy or practice, the named plaintiffs suffering one specific injury from the practice can represent a class suffering other injuries, so long as all the injuries are shown to result from the practice." Baby Neal, 43 F.3d at 58. The Third Circuit Court of Appeals has explained:

> Our jurisprudence "assures that a claim framed as a violative practice can [*500] support a class action embracing a variety of injuries so long as those injuries can all be linked to the practice." Baby Neal, 43 F.3d at 63 (discussing Falcon, 457 U.S. 147, 102 S.Ct. 2364, 72 L. Ed. 2d 740). As a result, we have concluded that the requirement "does not mandate that all putative class members share identical claims," Barnes, 161 F.3d at 141, because "'even relatively pronounced factual differences will generally not preclude a finding of typicality where there is a strong similarity of legal theories' or where the claim arises from the same practice or course of conduct." Prudential, 148 F.3d at 311 (quoting Baby Neal, 43 F.3d at 58); Hoxworth II, 980 F.2d at 923.

To determine whether a named plaintiff's claims are typical of the claims of the proposed class members, courts focus on [83] three concerns:

> (1) The claims of the class representative must be generally the same as those of the class in terms of both (a) the legal theory advanced and (b) the factual circumstances underlying that theory; (2) the class representative must not be subject to a defense that is both inapplicable to many members of the class and likely to become a major focus of the litigation; and (3) the interests and incentives of the representative must be sufficiently aligned with those of the class.

In re Schering Plough, 589 F.3d at 599.

The parties' arguments with respect to typicality raise only the first issue[12] whether the claims of the named plaintiffs are generally the same in legal theory and fact. Defendants conceded that the "underlying legal theory of Plaintiffs' claims may apply class-wide." (ECF No. 124-1 at 23.) Defendants argue, however, that the factual underpinnings of the claims, e.g., terms of employment, would be individually-negotiated or employee-specific with respect to an employee who has special skills in the industry as opposed to an employee without skills specific to the industry. (Id.) Plaintiffs' claims and the claims of the proposed class are all based upon Knorr, Wabtec, and Faiveley N.A. agreeing to [84] restrain competition for all levels of employees, which allegedly caused the suppression of their employees' compensation and deprived the employees of free and fair competition in the market for their services (ECF No. 88 ¶ 78.) A fair reading of the consolidated class action complaint is that the agreements by Knorr, Wabtec, and Faiveley N.A. applied to all defendants' employees, whether highly skilled in the railway equipment supply industry or without skills specific to that industry.

[12] All defenses that might be raised appear to be applicable to many members of the class. Defendants do not argue that the interests or incentives of the representative plaintiffs are not sufficiently aligned with those of the class. Plaintiffs and proposed members of the class were all employees of defendants or their wholly-owned subsidiaries. restrain competition for all their employees, which resulted in the suppression of compensation for all members of the proposed class. The legal [*501] theory for plaintiffs and the proposed classes and the factual basis for those claims are generally the same. The factual differences about each plaintiff cited by defendant do not defeat a finding of typicality at this stage of the case. See Id.

The Third Circuit Court of Appeals has explained: "If a plaintiff's claim arises from the same event, practice or course of conduct that gives rise...to the claims of the class members, factual differences will not render that claim atypical if it is based on the same legal theory as the claims of the class." Marcus, 687 F.3d at 598. Plaintiffs allege that defendant's antitrust violation was the same for all members of the proposed classes, i.e., defendants entered into three bilateral agreements and one overarching conspiracy to

In Marcus, the defendants argued the plaintiff's claims were not typical of the class because the plaintiff purchased only one kind of product that was at issue in the case and the proposed [85] class included purchasers of a variety of different products. Marcus, 687 F.3d at 599. The court rejected the defendants' argument and explained: "When a class includes purchasers of a variety of different products, a named plaintiff that purchases only one type of product satisfies the typicality requirement if the alleged misrepresentations or omissions apply uniformly across the different product types." Id. The named plaintiff's allegations about the defendants' conduct in the case with respect to the products in issue was the same for all products purchased by the members of the proposed class. Id. The court of appeals affirmed the district court's conclusion that typicality was satisfied on that basis. Id.

Defendants cite Semenko v. Wendy's International, Inc., Civ. Action No. 12-0836, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52582, 2013 WL 1568407 (W.D. Pa. Apr. 12, 2013), in support of their argument that typicality is not satisfied in this case. Semenko, however, is distinguishable from this case. In Semenko, the plaintiff sued her former employer, Wendy's, for, among other things, failing to accommodate her under the American with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. § 12101, et seq. (the "ADA"). The plaintiff also sought to represent a class of individuals. The court found that the plaintiff's claims were not typical of the class because "the facts and evidence needed to prove the [86] claims of each member of the proposed class...[would] be unique to each claimant." *Id. at 9. For example, a determination whether each member of the proposed class was entitled to recovery under the ADA would be a "highly individualized inquiry" and proof of the plaintiff's claims would "not prove the claims of other class members." Id. The court explained: "'If proof of the representatives' claims could not necessarily prove all of the proposed class members' claims, the representatives are not typical of the proposed members' claims.'" Id. (quoting Liberty Lincoln Mercury v. Ford Mktg. Corp., 149 F.R.D. 65, 77 (D.N.J. 1996)).

The district court in Semenko, however, read too narrowly the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit's jurisprudence with respect to typicality. The court of appeals has instructed that "[t]he typicality requirement is intended to preclude certification of those cases where the legal theories of the named plaintiffs potentially conflict with those of absentees." Georgine, 83 F.3d at 631. The correct inquiry is "whether the named plaintiffs have incentives that align with those of absent class members so that the absentees' interests will be fairly represented." Id. Typicality does not require that "all putative class members share identical claims." Barnes v. Am. Tobacco Co., 161 F.3d 127, 141 (3d Cir. 1998). Factual differences, [87] even "'relatively pronounced'" factual differences, between the named plaintiff's claims and the claims of the putative class are acceptable so long as "'there is a strong similarity of legal theories.'" Id. (quoting Baby Neal, 43 F.3d at 58). The Third Circuit Court of Appeals in its assessment of typicality does not require proof of the named plaintiffs' claims to prove the claims of the putative class. In this case, the factual differences between the named plaintiffs and the members of the putative class may be "relatively pronounced" but defendants do not argue that those factual differences create a conflict between the interests of the named plaintiffs and the interests of [*502] the putative class members. The factual differences, therefore, do not render the named plaintiffs' claims atypical of the claims of the proposed class members.

Plaintiffs in the consolidated class action complaint rely upon the same factual allegations to show the named plaintiffs and the proposed class were injured by defendants' three bilateral agreements and one overarching agreement, which are per se violative of § 1 of the Sherman Act. Here, based upon the factual allegations in the consolidated class action complaint, plaintiffs' [88] claims arise "from the same event, practice or course of conduct that gives rise to the claims of the class members[.]" Marcus, 687 F.3d at 598. The factual differences emphasized by defendants, e.g., employees highly skilled in the railway equipment supply industry versus employees without skills specific to that industry, do "not render...[plaintiffs' claims] atypical" because the claims are "based on the same legal theory as the claims of the class[,]" i.e., a violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act. Id. In Semenko, however, Wendy's conduct in failing to provide reasonable accommodations would necessarily be different with respect to each member of the class because of the individualized inquiry required with respect to a person's disability and his or her need for accommodation. The court, therefore, is not persuaded by defendants' citation to Semenko because the individualized inquiries in an ADA claim are not present in this case.

Defendants also cite to dictum from Todd v. Exxon Corp., 275 F.3d 191 (2d. Cir. 2001), in support of their argument that plaintiffs cannot satisfy the typicality requirement of Rule 23. In Todd, a former employee of Exxon on behalf of herself and a proposed class sued Exxon and thirteen other "major companies in the integrated oil and [89] petrochemical industry" alleging that they "violated § 1 of the Sherman Act by regularly sharing detailed information regarding compensation paid to nonunion managerial, professional, and technical...employees and using this information in setting the salaries of these employees at artificially low levels." Id. at 195. The members of the plaintiff's proposed class included, among others, accountants, lawyers, and chemical engineers. Id. at 201. The defendants filed a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6). The district court granted the motion and the plaintiff appealed. Id. at 198.

The court of appeals recognized that the plaintiff did not assert a claim alleging "an actual agreement among defendants to fix salaries[,]" which would be a per se violation of the antitrust laws; rather, the plaintiff set forth a claim alleging the defendants unlawfully exchanged information, which is subject to the rule of reason analysis. Id. at 199. The court explained that the "basic framework for the rule of reason" for an information-exchange claim under § 1 was as follows: "'A number of factors including most prominently the structure of the industry involved and the nature of the information exchanged are generally considered in divining the procompetitive [90] or anticompetitive effects of this type of interseller communication.'" Todd, 275 F.3d at 199 (quoting United States v. United States Gypsum, Co., 438 U.S. 422, 441 n.16, 98 S. Ct. 2864, 57 L. Ed. 2d 854 (1978)). The court of appeals explained that under Gypsum, an important factor to consider in a "data exchange" case was the market power of the defendants, which may include defining the relevant market and showing the defendants' percentage share of that market. Id. The district court found that the plaintiff did not plead a plausible market because she did not show that the products at issue, i.e., the employees, were "reasonably interchangeable or that there...[was] a [*503] cross-elasticity of demand for potential substitutes." Id. at 201.

The court of appeals disagreed with the district court because the relevant inquiry in a case involving a buyer-side conspiracy is the market power of the buyers, i.e., the defendant companies in Todd, and not the interchangeability of the sellers' products, i.e., the plaintiff-employees in Todd. Id. at 201-02 (agreeing with the plaintiff that "the proper focus is...the commonality and interchangeability of the buyers, not the commonality or interchangeability of the sellers."). The court of appeals explained:

> The question is not the interchangeability of, for example, lawyers with engineers. At issue is [91] the interchangeability of, from the perspective of an...employee, of a job opportunity in the oil industry with, for example, one in the pharmaceutical industry.

Todd, 275 F.3d at 202. On that basis and for other reasons explained in the opinion that are not relevant to this case, the court of appeals found that the plaintiff set forth factual allegations sufficient to plead a plausible product market. Id. at 206.

In a footnote the Todd court explained that the district court's conclusions about the interchangeability of the prospective jobs may have implications in whether the plaintiff could satisfy her burden under Rule 23 to show typicality and predominance. The court of appeals commented:

> The observation by the district court and defendants about the large differences among the various MPT jobs is better understood not as speaking to interchangeability, but as indicating that not all MPT employees are affected by the conspiracy in the same way—thus creating potential difficulties with class certification. While interchangeability of the different types of employees is not an element of market definition in an oligopsony, the different types of employees will differ in how they must prove the interchangeability among [92] employers. For example, as the district court and defendants point out, oil industry employers may not be interchangeable with pharmaceutical industry employers from the standpoint of a petroleum geologist, but the two may be more interchangeable from the standpoint of a labor lawyer. More importantly, the means of proof > may be quite different; at trial the geologists must present evidence of the relative job prospects for geologists outside the oil industry, while the lawyers must explore the legal job market. That this large class might have difficulty meeting the predominance and typicality requirements for Rule 23 certification, however, does not indicate that plaintiff fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted.

Todd, 275 F.3d at 202 n.5. First, the foregoing passage is dictum. Second, the court noted that the named plaintiffs "might have difficulty meeting the...typicality" requirement but did not foreclose the possibility that the named plaintiffs could establish that their claims were typical of the putative class members' claims. Id. Third, the foregoing passage is consistent with the law set forth by this court in this opinion. As explained above, the existence of factual differences between [93] the claims of the named plaintiff and the claims of the members of the putative class is relevant to the court's assessment of typicality. If the claims of the named plaintiffs and the claims of the putative class are based upon the same course of conduct by the defendant, however, the factual differences between the named plaintiffs' claims and the claims of the putative class members might not render the named plaintiff's claims atypical unless the factual differences [*504] create a conflict of interest between the named plaintiff and members of the putative class. The footnote from Todd cited above, therefore, is not inconsistent with this court's understanding of the typicality requirement under Rule 23.

At this stage, plaintiffs allege that defendants violated § 1 of the Sherman Act when they entered into three bilateral agreements and one overarching agreement to not poach each other's employees, which included all employees of the defendants and their wholly-owned subsidiaries. Plaintiffs allege that those agreements impacted the compensation of all employees of defendants and their wholly-owned subsidiaries. There may be factual differences among the various kinds of employees in the putative [94] class, but, at this stage, the court cannot conclude that those differences create a conflict of interest between the named plaintiffs and the members of the putative class that render the claims of the named plaintiffs atypical compared to the claims of the putative class. 7A CHARLES ALAN WRIGHT, ARTHUR R. MILLER, MARY KAY KANE, FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 1764 (3d ed. 2005) ("In general, the requirement [of typicality] may be satisfied even though varying fact patterns support the claims or defenses of individual class members...or there is a disparity in the damages claimed by the representative parties and the other class members.") (citing, e.g., In re Orthopedic Bone Screw Prod. Liab. Litig., 176 F.R.D. 158, 175 (E.D. Pa. 1997) ("[T]he fact that individual class members may recover varying amounts from the settlement fund does not defeat typicality.")).

Based upon the foregoing, the court is satisfied that the factual allegations in the consolidated class action complaint show that it is likely that discovery will reveal evidence that the claims of the named plaintiffs are typical of the claims of the putative class.

3. Rule 23(b) Predominance Requirement

"The predominance inquiry tests whether the proposed class is sufficiently cohesive to warrant adjudication by representation." [95] In re Cmty. Bank of N. Virginia, 418 F.3d 277, 308-09 (3d Cir. 2005). One court has explained:

> "Issues common to the class must predominate over individual issues." Hydrogen Peroxide, 552 F.3d at 311. "Individual questions need not be absent.... [Rule 23(b)(3)] requires only that those questions not predominate over the common questions affecting the class as a whole." Messner v. Northshore Univ. HealthSystem, 669 F.3d 802, 815 (7th Cir.2012). "Because the nature of the evidence that will suffice to resolve a question determines whether the question is common or individual, a district court must formulate some prediction as to how specific issues will play out in order to determine whether common or individual issues predominate in a given case." Hydrogen Peroxide, 552 F.3d at 311 (internal quotation marks and citation omitted). "If proof of the essential elements of the cause of action requires individual treatment, then class certification is unsuitable." Id. (citing Newton v. Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc., 259 F.3d 154, 172 (3d Cir.2001)).

In re Flonase Antitrust Litig., 284 F.R.D. 207, 219 (E.D. Pa. 2012). "An individual question is one where 'members of a proposed class will need to present evidence that varies from member to member,' while a common question is one where 'the same evidence will suffice for each member to make a prima facie showing [or] the issue is susceptible to generalized, class-wide proof.'" Tyson Foods, Inc. v. Bouaphakeo, 136 S.Ct. 1036, [*505] 1045, 194 L. Ed. 2d 124 (2016) (quoting 2 WILLIAM B. RUBENSTEIN, ALBA CONTE, HERBERT NEWBERG, NEWBERG ON CLASS ACTIONS § 4:50 (5th ed. [96] 2012)).

"The analysis of whether questions of law or fact common to class members predominate begins with the elements of the underlying cause of action." In re Lithium Ion Batteries Antitrust Litig., No. 13-MD-2420 YGR, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 57340, 2017 WL 1391491, at *8 (N.D. Cal. Apr. 12, 2017) (citing Erica P. John Fund, Inc. v. Halliburton Co., 563 U.S. 804, 131 S. Ct. 2179, 180 L. Ed. 2d 24 (2011)). "The three relevant elements of an antitrust claim that must be capable of common proof for the class to be certified under Rule 23(b)(3) are: (1) violation of antitrust laws, (2) antitrust impact, and (3) measurable damages." In re: Domestic Drywall Antitrust Litig., 322 F.R.D. 188, 201 (E.D. Pa. 2017) (citing Hydrogen Peroxide, 552 F.3d at 311-12). As discussed above, plaintiffs set forth factual allegations sufficient to show plausibly that the defendants engaged in three bilateral agreements and an overarching conspiracy to not poach each other's employees, which means there could be an antitrust violation which might be common to all members of a properly defined class who were employees of defendants or their wholly-owned subsidiaries. The issue whether there was a violation of the antitrust laws could be, therefore, common to the class.

With respect to the second element, i.e., antitrust impact, one court explained:

> Antitrust impact refers to injury—that is, each plaintiff must show that it suffered injury as a result of the defendants' unlawful behavior. Id. (citing Bogosian v. Gulf Oil Corp., 561 F.2d 434, 454 (3d Cir. 1977)). Though plaintiffs [97] need not prove the element of antitrust impact at the class certification stage, they must "demonstrate that the element of antitrust impact is capable of proof at trial through evidence that is common to the class rather than individual to its members." Id.

Domestic Drywall, 322 F.R.D. at 201. Antitrust impact refers to the "fact of damage...as opposed to the extent of damage." In re Flonase Antitrust Litig., 284 F.R.D. 207, 220 (E.D. Pa. 2012). The Third Circuit Court of Appeals has explained: "In antitrust cases, impact often is critically important for the purpose of evaluating Rule 23(b)(3)'s predominance requirement because it is an element of the claim that may call for individual, as opposed to common, proof." Hydrogen Peroxide, 552 F.3d at 311. "[F]or cases involving antitrust violations, common issues do not predominate unless the issue of impact is also susceptible to class-wide proof." In re High-Tech Employee Antitrust Litig., 289 F.R.D. 555, 566 (N.D. Cal. 2013) ("High-Tech I") (collecting decisions).

Here, defendants argue that plaintiffs will not be able to satisfy their burden to show predominance with respect to antitrust impact because the "expansive class definition will require the Court to consider each employee's contract, salary history, professional qualifications, geographic location and willingness to relocate, and fungibility within labor markets, when determining proof of both antitrust [98] injury and damages." (ECF No. 124-1 at 26.) Plaintiffs argue in opposition that defendants failed to satisfy their burden to show that it is a "'clear impossibility'...that predominance requirements can be met in the instant case." (ECF No. 152 at 30 (quoting Dieter, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 201119, 2018 WL 6191586, at *6.)

As discussed above, however, plaintiffs in the first instance have the "'burden of advancing a prima facie showing that the class action requirements of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 are satisfied or that discovery is likely to produce substantiation of the class allegations.'" Trunzo, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19625, 2018 WL [*506] 741422, at *4 (quoting Mantolete, 767 F.2d at 1424). Plaintiffs point out that in the consolidated class action complaint they alleged that defendants' agreements applied to all employees regardless of title, position, or status and that each agreement harmed each plaintiff regardless of his or her employer because every agreement "'disrupted the normal bargaining and price-setting mechanisms that apply in the labor market,' causing 'suppressed compensation levels generally.'" (ECF No. 152 at 20, 27.) Plaintiffs' allegations in this respect are mostly conclusory but may show plausibly that all defendants' employees were subject at some point in time to the overarching conspiracy and the bilateral agreements entered into [99] by Wabtec, Knorr, and Faiveley N.A., and that employees may have been harmed by those agreements. Plaintiffs, however, do not set forth sufficient factual allegations to advance a prima facie showing that antitrust impact is capable of proof on a class-wide basis for a class comprised of all employees or that at the least discovery is likely to produce evidence to substantiate plaintiffs' conclusory allegations with respect to predominance.

The Third Circuit Court of Appeals has rejected "the notion that antitrust injury in an employee boycott or no hire context can never be proven by common evidence." Weisfeld v. Sun Chem. Corp., 84 F. App'x 257, 263 (3d Cir. 2004). The court of appeals recognized that evidence showing that compensation of the class members was correlated over time may be evidence to show that antitrust injury in a wage suppression case may be proven on a classwide basis. Id. at 264. Other courts in wage suppression or no-hire cases have certified classes and found antitrust impact could be proven on a class-wide basis when there is evidence that the class members' wages were correlated and the defendant-employers emphasized internal or external equality, which ensured "individuals performing similar jobs are compensated on a similar level." [100] Nitsch v. Dreamworks Animation SKG, Inc., 315 F.R.D. 270, 293 (N.D. Cal. 2016); *Seaman v. Duke Univ., No. 1:15-CV-462, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16136, 2018 WL 671239, at 8 (M.D.N.C. Feb. 1, 2018); In re: High-Tech Employee Antitrust Litigation, 985 F.Supp.2d 1167 (N.D. Cal. 2013) ("High-Tech II"). Plaintiffs in this case, however, failed to set forth any factual allegations about defendants' compensation structures to make prima facie showing that antitrust impact is capable of proof on a class-wide basis for all employees or that at least it is likely that discovery will reveal evidence that antitrust impact is capable of proof on a class-wide basis for all employees.

In Nitsch, former employees of animation and visual effects studios on their own behalf and on behalf of a proposed class sued the studios alleging they conspired to fix and suppress employee compensation and to restrict employee mobility under § 1 of the Sherman Act. Nitsch, 315 F.R.D. at 274. The named plaintiffs were "artists and engineers who were previously employed by four of the name Defendants." Id. at 275. The plaintiffs defined the proposed class as follows:

> All animation and visual effects employees employed by defendants in the United States who held any of the jobs listed in Ashenfelter Report Appendix C during the following time periods: Pixar (2001-2010), Lucasfilm Ltd., LLC (2001-2010), DreamWorks Animation SKG, Inc. (2003-2010), The Walt Disney Company (2004-2010), Sony Pictures [101] Animation, Inc. and Sony Pictures Imageworks, Inc. (2004-2010), Blue Sky Studios, Inc. (2005-2010) and Two Pic MC LLC f/k/a ImageMovers Digital LLC (2007-2010). Excluded from the Class are senior executives, members of the board of directors, and persons employed [*507] to perform office operations or administrative tasks.

Id. at 281. The plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification. Id. at 274. The court addressed, among other things, whether common questions would dominate with respect to antitrust impact, i.e., "whether Plaintiffs have presented a sufficiently reliable theory to demonstrate that common evidence can be used to demonstrate impact." Id. at 292. The court—after a review of the "extensive documentary evidence, economic theory, data, and expert statistical modeling"—found the plaintiffs satisfied their burden to prove predominance. Id.

The court provided the following summary with respect to the plaintiffs' evidence of class-wide antitrust impact:

> First, Plaintiffs present evidence that Defendants' anti-solicitation agreements and collusion over compensation policies would have had the effect of directly suppressing compensation for some class members. Second, Plaintiffs present evidence that because of [102] the ways in which Defendants determined compensation for employees generally, including the use of formal compensation structures that are not inherently collusive, the collusive suppression of compensation for certain class members would have spread throughout the class and suppressed compensation to anti competitive levels classwide.

Nitsch, 315 F.R.D. at 292. The plaintiffs alleged that the defendant-employers' agreement to stop cold-calling each other's employees and collusion with respect to compensation suppressed the compensation of class members. The plaintiffs in support of those allegations presented documentary and expert evidence to show that:

- "cold-calling" was a "recruitment tool that Defendants viewed as likely to yield the most valuable recruits" and caused the dissemination of information about salaries and benefits of one defendant-employer to the employees' of another defendant-employer;
- the defendant-employers' agreement to stop cold-calling each other's employees restricted the dissemination of the information with respect to salaries and benefits; and
- the defendant-employers colluded to suppress compensation by exchanging compensation information.

Id. at 292-93. The plaintiffs also presented evidence [103] to the court to show that the compensation suppression "spread throughout the class" because the defendant-employers had "compensation structures that prioritized 'internal' and 'external' equity." Id. at 293. The compensation structures "organize[d] employees by job titles whose compensation ranges were evaluated by reference to all other job titles within each company." Id. Thus, the "upward pressure" placed on the salaries of the employees who received the cold-calls would impact all other salaries of each defendant. Nitsch, 315 F.R.D. at 293. Because the defendant-employees shared compensation information, the suppression of one employee's salary would impact the salaries of employees in a similar position and employed by all defendants. Id.

The court in Nitsch explained:

> Plaintiffs argue that Defendants' alleged antitrust violations would have directly suppressed compensation for some class members. Then, as a result of Defendants' emphasis on internal equity, compensation suppression would have spread beyond the employees directly affected by the antitrust violations to impact all class members within each Defendant. At the same time, Defendants' goal of maintaining external equity [*508] would have spread the effects [104] of compensation suppression between Defendants. This is the same approach to showing classwide antitrust impact approved by this Court in High-Tech. See High-Tech, 985 F.Supp.2d at 1206 (describing the approach to demonstrating classwide antitrust impact by showing direct impact to some class members combined with evidence of internal and external equity).

Nitsch, 315 F.R.D. at 293. The court held that based upon the foregoing, the plaintiffs satisfied their burden to show that the common questions predominated over individualized questions with respect to the issue of antitrust impact. Id. at 303-04.

In High-Tech, the plaintiffs sued their employers who were seven high-tech companies. High-Tech II, 985 F.Supp.2d at 1171. The plaintiffs alleged that the defendants "conspired to suppress, and actually did suppress, employee compensation to artificially low levels by agreeing not to solicit each other's employees" in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act. Id. The plaintiffs had filed a motion to certify a class, which the court in a previous decision (High-Tech I) denied because the plaintiffs did not satisfy their burden to show that common issues predominated over individualized issues with respect to antitrust impact. High-Tech I, 289 F.R.D. at 583. The court in High-Tech I held, however, that common issues predominated [105] over individualized issues with respect to the antitrust violation and damages. Id. The plaintiffs in their first motion to certify the class proposed a class definition that covered all the defendants' employees and a second class definition that covered only technical employees. Id. The plaintiffs' evidence heavily focused on the proposed class of all employees. Id.

The plaintiffs in High-Tech I offered an expert to opine about whether antitrust impact could be proven on a class-wide basis. The district court held that the plaintiffs' expert's theories showed that common proof could be used to show that the defendants' "anti-solicitation agreements suppressed compensation broadly[,]" i.e., across the class. High-Tech I, 289 F.R.D. at 570. The court explained the expert's theories as follows:

> Essentially, Dr. Leamer opines that, by virtue of the interplay between information economics and considerations of internal equity, cold-calls would have transmitted information to, and put competitive pressure on, [Redacted]. See Reply at 16; see also Leamer Rep. ¶ 104. Dr. Leamer further hypothesizes that, by virtue of entering into the anti-solicitation agreements, firms are able to be more relaxed in maintaining competitive [106] compensation packages because such agreements: (1) "suppress competition directly;" (2) "reduce the risk of employees becoming aware of pay practices elsewhere;" and (3) "otherwise eliminate competition for 'passive' employees." Leamer Rep. ¶ 106.

Id. at 569 (redactions in original). "A key component" of the plaintiffs' expert's opinion was that the wage structure of the defendants was rigid, i.e., "compensation for employees with entirely different titles would necessarily move together through time such that a detrimental impact to an employee with one job title would necessarily result in an impact to other employees in entirely different jobs (i.e., that any impact would ripple across the entire salary structure)." Id. at 577-78. The court explained that while the plaintiffs' expert's theory showed that antitrust impact was susceptible to common proof, that "theory" is not sufficient to satisfy the predominance requirements of Rule 23. The court had to consider the "reliable evidence" upon which the plaintiffs' expert relied to [*509] arrive at his theory. Id. at 570 ("Plaintiff must provide 'properly analyzed, reliable evidence' that a common method of proof exists to prove impact on a class-wide basis'") (quoting In re Graphics Processing Units Antitrust Litig., 253 F.R.D. 478 (N.D. Cal. 2008)).

The court [107] determined that the evidence available to the plaintiffs at the time they filed the motion for class certification did not support the plaintiffs' expert's theory that antitrust impact could be proven on a class-wide basis, and, therefore, common issues with respect to the impact of antitrust violation on all employees or all technical employees would predominate under Rule 23. For example, the evidence did not show that the wage structures of the defendants were sufficiently rigid so that an impact on the wages of one member of the class would "ripple across the entire salary structure." Id. at 577-78 ("Thus, these charts shed little light on whether compensation for more disparate title (e.g., a custodian at an Intel office in Texas and an engineer at an Intel office in California) moved together over time."). The court did find, however, that the plaintiffs' expert's opinion that damages could be proven on a class-wide basis was supported by reliable evidence. Id. at 582. The court explained:

> The Court is generally persuaded that the Conduct Regression is capable of: (1) showing that, while the anti-solicitation agreements were in effect, Defendants' total expenditures on compensation were less than they should [108] have been, and (2) providing an estimate of the net amount by which Defendants were under-compensating their employees (class-wide damages).
> [T]he Conduct Regression does provide a method of estimating the aggregate undercompensation to Defendants' employees on a year-by year and defendant-by-defendant basis.

High-Tech I, 289 F.R.D. at 579, 582. The court concluded that the plaintiffs' expert's method of calculating damages was consistent with the plaintiffs' theory of liability, and the plaintiffs established a plausible method for providing an estimate of damages for the all-employee proposed class and the technical proposed class. Id. at 582. The court held that under those circumstances, plaintiffs satisfied their burden to show predominance with respect to damages. Id. at 582-83.

The court, however, explained that it would deny the motion for certification because it had "concerns": (1) about "whether the evidence will be able to show that Defendants maintained such rigid compensation structures that a suppression of wages to some employees would have affected all or nearly all Class members[;]" and (2) that "Plaintiffs' proposed classes may be defined so broadly as to include large numbers of people who were not necessarily harmed by [109] Defendants' allegedly unlawful conduct." Id. at 583.

Underlying the court's opinion in High-Tech I, however, were issues with respect to discovery. After the hearing on the motion for class certification, the defendants "produce[d] significant amounts of discovery" (over ten thousand documents) and "[made] key witnesses available for depositions" (fifty high-ranking employees) Id. at 584. Additionally, the defendants' response to the motion for class certification "relied heavily on declarations from Defendants' current employees, some of whom were not timely disclosed and whose documents were not produced to Plaintiffs." High-Tech I, 289 F.R.D. at 584. On that basis, the court concluded that "some of the recently produced discovery may affect Plaintiffs' ability to satisfy the predominance requirement for one or both of their [*510] proposed Classes." Id. Specifically, the court explained its "belief" that "with the benefit of the discovery that has occurred since the hearing on this motion, Plaintiffs may be able to offer further proof to demonstrate how common evidence will be able to show class-wide impact to demonstrate why common issues predominate over individual ones." Id. at 583.

The plaintiffs in High-Tech I filed a supplemental motion for [110] class certification, which was addressed in High-Tech II. High-Tech II, 985 F.Supp.2d at 1171. The plaintiffs in the supplemental motion "moved to certify only the Technical Class[,]" which consisted of: "salaried technical, creative, and research and development employees who worked for any Defendant while that Defendant participated in at least one anti-solicitation agreement with another Defendant." Id. at 1177 n.5. The plaintiffs excluded from their class definition "retail employees" among others. Id. at 1177. The members of the proposed class consisted of fourteen different job titles of technical employees. Id. at 1177-78.

The court in its discussion of predominance and antitrust impact in High-Tech II recognized that the plaintiffs set forth "substantial evidence, including documentary evidence and expert reports using statistical modeling, economic theory, and data, to demonstrate that common questions will predominate over individual questions in determining the impact of the antitrust violations." Id. at 1192. The court found that the evidence "paint[ed] a picture of Defendants' business practices and the market in which Defendants operate that suggests that common proof could be used to demonstrate the impact of Defendants' actions on Technical Class members." Id. Under [111] those circumstances and after a "rigorous" review of the evidence, the court concluded that plaintiffs' proposed methodology satisfied the predominance standard. Id. The court explained:

> Specifically, the record suggests that all technical employees—not just those who would have received cold calls but for the anti-solicitation agreements—may have been impacted by the agreements. Plaintiffs note that cold calling, a recruitment tool that Defendants viewed favorably, has the effect of spreading information about salaries and benefits from recruiters of one firm to employees of another. Leamer Rep. ¶ 71-76. Such information could then spread to other employees within a firm and beyond, leading to widespread increases in employee compensation across the labor market due to increased access to information. Id.
> Further, Plaintiffs contend that Defendants had company-wide compensation structures, which organized employees into job groups, levels, and families that were evaluated and paid in relationship to all other groups. Suppl. Mot. at 15-22. In addition, Defendants valued internal equity (the idea that similarly situated employees should be compensated similarly) within their firms. Id. [112] Because of a desire to maintain equity between employees, the upward pressure that cold calls placed on the salaries of individual employees who would have received the calls would have also affected other employees who were part of the same salary structure. As such, variances in individual employees' salaries would affect other employees who were in a similar position. Each Defendant's compensation structure could then have been influenced by the other Defendants' structures as Defendants saw each other as competitors for the same labor pool.
> Finally, Plaintiffs point to the fact that Defendants were motivated to retain their employees. This, Plaintiffs contend, [*511] would have motivated each Defendant to provide financial incentives to employees to respond to and to prevent poaching by other Defendants. Leamer Rep. ¶ 105. Yet, because of the anti-solicitation agreements, Defendants did not need to initiate such measures, which would have benefitted the entire Technical Class.

High-Tech II, 985 F.Supp.2d at 1192. The court concluded that "the extensive documentary evidence, economic theory, data, and expert statistical modeling" supported the plaintiffs' expert's theory of proving common impact. Id. Under those circumstances, [113] the class was certified because, among other things, the plaintiffs satisfied their burden to show that common issues with respect to antitrust impact predominated in the case. Id.

In Seaman, the plaintiff, who was an assistant professor of radiology at Duke University ("Duke"), on behalf of herself and a putative class sued Duke and the University of North Carolina ("UNC") under § 1 of the Sherman Act. *Seaman, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16136, 2018 WL 671239, at 1. The plaintiff alleged that Duke entered into an agreement with UNC "not to permit lateral moves of faculty between Duke and UNC." Id. The plaintiff and UNC settled the case. *2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16136, [WL] at 2. The plaintiff sought to certify "a class of faculty, physicians, nurses, and skilled medical staff that worked for the defendants." Id. Duke opposed the motion for class certification arguing that the plaintiff could not satisfy the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b). Id. The court found that the parties' evidence with respect to the "antitrust violation" element of a § 1 claim was a "common question that...[would] be addressed with common proof for all proposed class members." Seaman, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16136, 2018 WL 671239, at *4.

The plaintiff alleged that the UNC and Duke no-poach agreement suppressed compensation in two ways: (1) UNC and Duke did not have to provide faculty [114] "preemptive compensation increases...to ensure employee retention[;]" and (2) the "internal equity structures[13] ...spread the individual harm of decreased lateral offers and corresponding lack of retention offers to all faculty, thus suppressing compensation faculty-wide." 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16136, [WL] at *4. Although the plaintiff proposed a class comprised of faculty and non-faculty members, the evidence she presented in support of her motion for class certification was different for faculty than it was for non-faculty. The court, therefore, court addressed separately the plaintiff's evidence to prove antitrust impact and damages for faculty and non-faculty.

With respect to the faculty, the court held the plaintiff's evidence, which included testimony, expert reports, and documentation, supported her argument that the defendants' agreement caused the suppression of compensation for faculty, which could be proven on a class-wide basis. 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16136, [WL] at *4. [*512] The court held that the plaintiff's "preemptive compensation" theory as applied to the faculty-only class was a "class-wide theory supported with class-wide proof." Id. The court explained that the evidence showed that the medical schools of Duke and UNC were each other's main competitors [115] for faculty and the expert evidence showed that "lateral hiring affects compensation generally and...encourage[d] the defendants to preemptively increase compensation to retain faculty." 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16136, [WL] at *5.

The court held that the plaintiff's "internal equity structures" theory as applied to faculty, was also a "class-wide theory supported by class-wide proof." Seaman, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16136, 2018 WL 671239, at *6. The court explained that the expert evidence showed that UNC and Duke would "reactively increase compensation in response to a competing offer or to address overall attrition rates[,]" and "the lack of competing offers and corresponding individual compensation suppressed was spread to all faculty members through the defendants' internal equity structures." 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16136, [WL] at *5. The evidence also showed that the suppression of a faculty member's compensation caused by the lack of competing offers of employment was "spread" to all members of the faculty-only class via the defendants' internal equity structures. Id. The court explained:

> [The plaintiffs' experts] explain the general economic theory of how lateral hiring increases compensation for employees throughout an organization when that organization manages employee compensation to maintain parity within employment [116] categories or to achieve compensation relationships between employee categories (e.g., Associate Professors to Assistant Professors).

2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16136, [WL] at *5. The court described the evidence with respect to the defendants' internal equity structures as follows:

> Dr. Seaman provides documentary and testimonial evidence that Duke and UNC maintain internal equity structures for faculty. The evidence shows that the UNC defendants have policies that "set[ ] out identical salary ceilings across 18 departments by professor level" and expects departments "to work towards or maintain average salary profiles by academic rank ...; enable recruitment and retention ...; [ ] promote a good morale and sense of fair treatment amongst the faculty;" and consider "internal equity among groups of otherwise similarly-situated individuals in the [medical school] department." Doc. 151 at ¶¶ 33-39 (summarizing evidence). The UNC defendants also perform annual "Salary Equity Review[s]" to "identify[ ] instances of potential salary inequity amongst like subsets of faculty" and requires an explanation or remedial plan for any inequality that is discovered. Id. at ¶ 39.
> While the evidence at Duke is less direct, it shows that the Dean [117] of the School of Medicine "signs off" on all department head compensation decisions. See, e.g., Doc. 151 at ¶¶ 46, 49. For both new faculty and > adjustments to current faculty's compensation, there is documentary evidence and testimony to support the assertion that internal equity is considered in setting and adjusting compensation, particularly within each department. See, e.g., Doc. 151 at ¶¶ 46-51, 54; Doc. 150 at ¶¶ 31, 33, 44-48; Doc. 94 at ¶¶ 91, 93, 97-98, 100; Doc. 95 at ¶¶ 54, 58(d), (e).

*Seaman, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16136, 2018 WL 671239, at 5. One of the plaintiff's experts performed a regression analysis to show that "an individual faculty member's compensation moved in relationship to other faculty compensation." Id. With respect to damages for faculty, the court found the regression analysis proffered by the plaintiff's expert also satisfied the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b). Id.

With respect to the evidence about non-faculty, the court held that the plaintiff's theory that the suppression of compensation to faculty caused the suppression of compensation for non-faculty presented common questions for the putative class of nonfaculty "because proving the theory for a single non-faculty class member would prove it for all." *2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16136, [WL] at 6. The [118] court explained that the plaintiff's evidence with [*513] respect to the non-faculty theory of proving antitrust impact, i.e., a regression analysis analyzing compensation metrics for non-faculty and a regression analysis analyzing the relationship between the compensation of faculty and non-faculty, showed that antitrust impact could be proven on a class-wide basis for the non-faculty class.[14] Id. The court also found that the plaintiff's expert's calculation of damages for the non-faculty class were based upon a theory and evidence that was common to the class. *2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16136, [WL] at 7.

The court after discussing the other pertinent requirements of Rule 23, however, held it would certify a class comprised of only faculty. 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16136, [WL] at 8. The court rejected the plaintiff's invitation to certify a class comprised of faculty and non-faculty. Id. The court explained:

> Dr. Seaman's theories and evidence differ between faculty and non-faculty class members. It is apparent from the briefing on this motion and on the plaintiff's motion to exclude defendants' experts that the inclusion of faculty and non-faculty in the same class is likely to cause significant confusion. Disputes already have arisen as to whether witnesses are talking only [119] about faculty, only about non-faculty, or both. See Doc. 163 at 22-23. And there are extra steps required for a finding of anti-trust impact and damages as to non-faculty as compared to faculty; these are not minor steps, but include detailed and complicated expert statistical analyses and additional fact witnesses. Moreover, the evidence as to non-faculty is substantially weaker, at least on this record, since it is based on several inferences-on-inferences; this gives rise to the possibility that the strength of the faculty claim or the weakness of the non-faculty claim might tend to bleed over to the other claim in the jury's mind. Finally, the plaintiff has put forth one theory as to non-faculty that seems to be driven by individualized evidence.
> Collectively these problems—different evidence, the likelihood of substantial confusion, potential for unfairness at trial, and the possibility of individual issues as to non-faculty—will make it very difficult to manage the class. Trial of the relatively straightforward faculty claims would be unduly complicated and there is a real potential for unfairness to both the class members and the defendant. For these reasons the Court finds that [120] including non-faculty in the class would defeat predominance and superiority....Reiter, 442 U.S. at 345 (recognizing the district court's discretionary authority to refuse to certify potentially cumbersome class actions with manageability issues).

[14] The court found that the plaintiff's theory that that "the no-hire agreement affected a subset of non-faculty more directly because they missed out on compensation increases associated with lateral moves undertaken in connection with a faculty-lead team" was not supported by any evidence. *Seaman, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16136, 2018 WL 671239, at 7 n.8. The court explained that the evidence did not "provide any indication or confirmation that faculty seek compensation increases for non-faculty during lateral moves." Id. The court also found that the plaintiff did not set forth a theory or evidence to calculate damages based upon that theory. Id.

*Seaman, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16136, 2018 WL 671239, at 8. The court explained that the "[n]on-faculty class members...[could] pursue a separate class action and obtain the corresponding economics of time, effort, and expense, and uniformity of decision." *2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16136, [WL] at 8 n.11.

As discussed above, the Third Circuit Court of Appeals has not foreclosed the possibility that a class maybe certified in a no-poach wage suppression case. [*514] Weisfeld, 84 F. App'x at 259. The foregoing discussion, however, shows that in order for a plaintiff in a no-poach wage suppression case to satisfy the requirement of predominance with respect to antitrust impact, there must be evidence that the compensation structures of the defendants in the pertinent industry were so rigid that the compensations of all class members were tethered together.[15] This case, unlike those just discussed, is not yet at the certification stage. Here, at the motion to strike stage, the burden on plaintiffs is less than at the certification stage. The court must determine only whether plaintiffs satisfied their burden [121] to set forth factual allegations to advance a prima facie showing of predominance or that at least it is likely that discovery will reveal evidence that antitrust impact may be proven on a class-wide basis for all employees, e.g., evidence that the compensation structures for all defendants were so rigid that the compensation of all class members, including employees with skills specific to the railway equipment supply industry and employees without skills specific to that industry, were tethered together. Based upon the factual allegations in the consolidated class action complaint, plaintiffs failed to satisfy their burden with respect to predominance for a class of all defendants' employees. The allegations for a class of all employees are conclusory in that respect and the court cannot discern from the allegations anything about the compensation structures of defendants.

The motion to strike class allegations will be granted on that basis without prejudice. If plaintiffs are able to plead sufficient facts about the likelihood that discovery will reveal structured compensation schedules that affected all employees, plaintiff may seek to amend the consolidated class action complaint [122] to include those allegations or to plead a class for which predominance may be shown.

4. Whether Plaintiffs' Class Definition is Overbroad

Even if defendants satisfied their burden at this stage with respect to predominance, their class definition is overbroad and the court would require it to be replead. "An order that certifies a class action must define the class...." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23. The definition of the class is a matter within the broad discretion of the district court." Clarke v. Lane, 267 F.R.D. 180, 194 (E.D. Pa. 2010) (citing Battle v. Commw. of Pa., 629 F.2d 269, 271 n.1 (3d Cir. 1980)). "Defining the class is of critical importance because it identifies the persons (1) entitled to relief, (2) bound by a final judgment, and (3) entitled under Rule 23(c)(2) to the 'best notice practicable' in a Rule 23(b)(3) action." MANUAL FOR COMPLEX LITIGATION (FOURTH) § 21.222 (2004) (quoting Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(c)(2)(B)). Rule 23 is "silent" with respect to the sufficiency of a class definition, Jackson v. Se. Pa. Transp. Auth., 260 F.R.D. 168, 182 (E.D. Pa. 2009) (citing 5 JAMES W. MOORE, MOORE'S FEDERAL PRACTICE § 23.21[1] (3d ed. 2019), but the court has a "responsibility to 'protect absentees by blocking unwarranted or overbroad class definitions[,]" Sullivan v. CB Investments, Inc., 667 F.3d 273, 291 (3d Cir. 2011) (quoting In re Cmty. Bank of N. Va., 622 F.3d 275, 291 (3d Cir. 2010)). "The definition must be precise, objective, and presently ascertainable." [*515] MANUAL FOR COMPLEX LITIGATION (FOURTH) § 21.222 (2004). "All class certification orders are conditional and 'the court retains the authority to re-define or decertify the class until the entry of final judgment on the merits.'" Clarke, 267 F.R.D. at 194 [123] (quoting In re Gen. Motors Corp. Pick-Up Truck Fuel Tank Prod. Liab. Litig., 55 F.3d 768, 793 n.14 (3d Cir. 1995)).

Plaintiffs in the consolidated class action complaint define the putative class as follows:

[15] Satisfying the predominance requirement in a no-poach case, i.e., proving antitrust impact is capable of proof on a class-wide basis, may be an easier task when the putative class is comprised of a narrow, well-defined subset of employees. Here, plaintiffs' task is more difficult because they seek to represent an expansive class of all defendants' employees, which includes employees highly skilled in the railway equipment supply industry and employees without skills specific to that industry.

> All natural persons employed by, or hired through staffing agencies or vendors to work for, Defendants or their wholly owned subsidiaries, in the United States, at any time from the start of the conspiracy (no later than 2009) to the present. Excluded from the class are senior executives and personnel in the human resources, recruiting, and legal departments of the Defendants, and employees hired outside of the United States to work outside of the United States.

(ECF No. 88 ¶ 65.) Plaintiffs intend to represent one class comprised of all persons employed by any defendant beginning in 2009. The court finds this class definition lacks precision based upon the allegations of the consolidated class action complaint. Duffy v. Massinari, 202 F.R.D. 437, 440 (E.D. Pa. 2001) ("At this stage in the litigation, the Court also agrees that the proposed class definition is an appropriate one given the allegations and claims contained in the Amended Complaint.").

The reasonable inference drawn from the allegations of the consolidated class action complaint shows plausibly that the overarching conspiracy among Knorr, Wabtec, and Faiveley N.A. commenced [124] in 2014 (at the earliest) when Wabtec and Faiveley N.A. formed the third bilateral conspiracy. Prior to 2014, there existed only two bilateral conspiracies: (1) between Knorr and Wabtec, formed no later than 2009; and (2) between Knorr and Faiveley N.A., formed no later than 2011. Based upon the allegations in the consolidated class action complaint, persons employed by Faiveley N.A. did not enter into a conspiracy until approximately 2011. Thus, plaintiffs' class definition that includes all defendants' employees from 2009 to the present is overbroad and lacks precision. Even if plaintiffs had satisfied their burden with respect to predominance, the court would require the class definition to be amended. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(d)(1)(D) ("[T]he court may issue orders that...require that the pleadings be amended to eliminate allegations about representation of absent persons and that the action proceed accordingly.").

Plaintiffs' failure to set forth a precise class definition, however, is not fatal to their class action. The Third Circuit Court of Appeals has explained:

> Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23(c)(5) states that "[w]hen appropriate, a class action may be divided into subclasses that are each treated as a class under this rule." An advisory [125] committee note for Rule 23(c) indicates that subclasses are appropriate "[w]here a class is found to include subclasses divergent in interest." Accordingly, "[a] district court hearing a class action has the discretion to divide the class into subclasses and certify each subclass separately." In re Cendant Corp. Sec. Litig., 404 F.3d 173, 202 (3d Cir.2005). We have explained that the option to utilize subclasses "is designed to prevent conflicts of interest in class representation." Id.

In re Ins. Brokerage Antitrust Litig., 579 F.3d 241, 271 (3d Cir. 2009). Plaintiffs may seek to file an amended consolidated class action complaint in accordance with Rule 15. Plaintiffs may include additional factual allegations to make a prima facie showing [*516] that the class allegations are sufficient, i.e., factual allegations from which the court could reasonably infer that all defendants were engaged in an overarching conspiracy by at least 2009 or to define a class corresponding to the overarching conspiracy beginning at the earliest in 2014 and three subclasses corresponding to the three bilateral conspiracies.[16]

5. Summary

For the reasons set forth above, defendants' motion to strike must be granted without prejudice to plaintiffs in accordance with Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15 being able to file an amended consolidated class action complaint setting forth amended class allegations [126] sufficient to show it is likely discovery will substantiate that antitrust impact on a class-wide basis can be shown by a common method of proof and to amend the class definition.

[16] The predominance issue may also impact the breadth of the class, i.e., all employees or only certain kinds of employees. See *Seaman, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16136, 2018 WL 671239, at 8 (granting class certification for a faculty class but denying class certification for a class including faculty and non-faculty).

V. Conclusion

The motion to dismiss (ECF No. 124) will be denied with respect to defendants' arguments that the horizontal market allocation agreements alleged in the consolidated class action complaint must be plead under the rule of reason. The motion to dismiss is granted without prejudice with respect to Bendix and Ricon.

The motion to strike (ECF No. 124) is granted without prejudice with respect to striking the class allegations because plaintiffs did not make a prima facie showing in the consolidated class action complaint that discovery is likely to substantiate that the common issues of the proposed class of all employees predominate over the individual questions. The motion to strike is also granted to the extent plaintiffs will be required to amend the class definition, which is overbroad and lacks precision.

An appropriate order will be entered.

I. Background

A. Factual Background

FashionPass, Inc. ("FashionPass" or "Plaintiff") sues Rent the Runway, Inc. ("RTR" or "Defendant") for: (1) violations of the Cartwright Act; (2) unfair competition; (3) intentional interference with contract; and (4) intentional interference with prospective economic advantage. See generally Notice of Removal, Ex. A, Complaint ("Complaint"), Docket No. 1-1. Plaintiff alleges the following relevant facts:

Plaintiff and Defendant [*2] are businesses that provide women's clothing and accessory rentals. See id. ¶ 8. Both are involved in extensive e-commerce, providing the majority of their clothing and accessory rentals through online internet sites. See id. "Fashion rental companies" ("FRCs"), such as Plaintiff and Defendant, allow customers to rent clothing and accessories for special events, work and casual, through subscriptions that permit the customer to rent designer and sought-after brand clothing, and to then return the items to the FRCs who professionally clean the items and make them available for others to rent. See id. ¶ 9. FRCs are generally distinguished amongst one another by the kinds of fashion offered, the brands they carry, the terms of rental, exchange and return of items, and cost. See id. ¶ 12. Plaintiff and Defendant are direct competitors with regard to the clothing and accessories that appeal to women in their 20s and 30s. See id. ¶ 15.

Plaintiff was founded in 2016 and conducts its business exclusively through its online site. See id. ¶¶ 13, 17. Defendant began its business in 2009 and conducts its business through its online site and through physical stores in five locations, two of which [*3] are located in California. See id. ¶¶ 14, 19. FRCs purchase merchandise at wholesale from clothing and accessory manufacturers three to four months ahead of each season, publicize the availability of merchandise on their websites, hold those items in inventory for rental, and supply the items to customers in accordance with the customers' selection of items from the website. See id. ¶¶ 16, 21. At the appropriate time prior to each season, FRCs review the season's offerings from manufacturers in person, with the assistance of the manufacturer's employees or representatives. See id. ¶ 22. The manufacturer's employees or representatives take notes, reflecting the FRCs tentative purchasing intentions, and these notes are turned in a purchase order, which is provided to the FRCs for revision and final submission. See id.

Prior to 2019, Plaintiff had been regularly buying from Yumi Kim, since no later than August 2016; from The Jetset Diaries, since no later than September 2016; from ASTR the Label, since no later than October 2016; from LIKELY, since no later than May 2017; from Show Me Your Mumu and Saylor, since no later than June 2017; from Amanda Uprichard, since no later than August [*4] 2017; from Dress the Population, since no later than October 2017; from Flynn Skye, since no later than February 2018; from Sanctuary Clothing, since no later than April 2018; from Blank NYC and Finders Keepers, since no later than August 2018; and from Elliatt, since no later than September 2018. See id. ¶ 29. Beginning in October and November 2018, Plaintiff sought to purchase merchandise in Los Angeles, California, from each of the following businesses: The Jetset Diaries, Show Me Your Mumu, Saylor, Blank NYC, Flynn Skye, ASTR the Label, Dress the Population, Elliatt, Finders Keepers, Yumi Kim, AGOLDE, Citizens of Humanity, Keepsake, CIMEO, Fifth Label, Cleobella, Sanctuary Clothing, LIKELY, Amanda Uprichard, and Fame and Partners. See id. ¶ 30. In each instance, Plaintiff's request to purchase merchandise was rejected upon the stated ground that the manufacturer had granted Defendant an exclusive right to purchase merchandise in the Fashion Rental Business. See id.

Between August and October of 2018, FashionPass entered into contracts to purchase merchandise from Blank NYC, Elliatt, Flynn Skye, ASTR the Label, and Yumi Kim. See id. ¶¶ 40-44. Plaintiff is informed and believes that [*5] RTR had knowledge of, and intended to cause the manufacturers to breach and cancel each of their contracts by and through their insistence that each of the above listed labels refuse to sell merchandise to FashionPass. See id. ¶¶ 45-46. As a result of RTR's demands, Blank NYC, Elliatt, Flynn Skye, ASTR the Label, and Yumi Kim breached and cancelled each of their contracts with FashionPass. See id. ¶ 47. FashionPass suffered injury and damages and will continue to suffer injury and damages based upon the cancellation of said contracts. See id. ¶ 48.

Furthermore, FashionPass and each of The Jetset Diaries, Show Me Your Mumu, Saylor, Blank NYC, Flynn Skye, ASTR the Label, Dress the Population, Elliatt, Finders Keepers, Yumi Kim, Sanctuary Clothing, LIKELY, Amanda Uprichard, and Fame and Partners were in an economic relationship that would have resulted in a significant economic benefit to FashionPass. See id. ¶ 51. RTR had full knowledge of FashionPass's economic relationship with each of the brands and intentionally interfered with those relationships. See id. ¶ 52-53. FashionPass has suffered and will continue to suffer economic damages as a result of RTR's interference. See id. ¶ 55. [*6]

B. Procedural Background

Now before the Court is Defendant's motion to dismiss. See Defendant Rent the Runway, Inc.'s Notice of Motion to Dismiss for Failure to State a Claim ("MTD"), Docket No. 13. Plaintiff filed an opposition. See Plaintiff FashionPass, Inc.'s Memorandum of Points and Authorities in Opposition to Defendant's Motion to Dismiss ("Pl. Opp."), Docket No. 20. Defendant filed a reply. See Defendant Rent the Runways, Inc.'s Reply in Support of its Motion to Dismiss for Failure to State a Claim ("Reply"), Docket No. 26.

II. Legal Standard

Under Rule 12(b)(6), a defendant may move to dismiss for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6). A complaint may be dismissed for failure to state a claim for one of two reasons: (1) lack of a cognizable legal theory; or (2) insufficient facts under a cognizable legal theory. Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007); see also Mendiondo v. Centinela Hosp. Med. Ctr., 521 F.3d 1097, 1104 (9th Cir. 2008) ("Dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6) is appropriate only where the complaint lacks a cognizable legal theory or sufficient facts to support a cognizable legal theory.").

In deciding a 12(b)(6) motion, a court "may generally consider only allegations contained in the pleadings, exhibits attached to the complaint, and matters properly subject to judicial notice." Swartz v. KPMG LLP, 476 F.3d 756, 763 (9th Cir. 2007); see [*7] also Marder v. Lopez, 450 F.3d 445, 448 (9th Cir. 2006) (indicating that a court may consider a document "on which the complaint 'necessarily relies' if: (1) the complaint refers to the document; (2) the document is central to the plaintiff's claim; and (3) no party questions the authenticity of the copy attached to the 12(b)(6) motion"). The court must construe the complaint in the light most favorable to the plaintiff; accept all allegations of material fact as true; and draw all reasonable inferences from well-pleaded factual allegations. Gompper v. VISX, Inc., 298 F.3d 893, 896 (9th Cir. 2002); Sprewell v. Golden State Warriors, 266 F.3d 979, 988 (9th Cir. 2001), amended on denial of reh'g, 275 F.3d 1187 (9th Cir. 2001); Cahill v. Liberty Mutual Ins. Co., 80 F.3d 336, 337-38 (9th Cir. 1996). The court is not required to accept as true legal conclusions couched as factual allegations. Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009). Where a plaintiff facing a 12(b)(6) motion has pled "factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged," the motion should be denied. Id.; Sylvia Landfield Trust v. City of Los Angeles, 729 F.3d 1189, 1191 (9th Cir. 2013). But if "the well-pleaded facts do not permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct, the complaint has alleged — but it has not show[n] . . . the pleader is entitled to relief." Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 679 (citations omitted).

III. Analysis

A. Cartwright Act Claim

Defendant moves to dismiss Plaintiff's Cartwright Act claim on two grounds: (1) that FashionPass [*8] failed to allege harm to competition; and (2) that FashionPass failed to allege foreclosure of the relevant market. See MTD at 7-14. Defendant also asserts that FashionPass failed to allege that RTR devised a boycott, or any other per se antitrust violation and therefore, the complaint must be analyzed under the rule of reason. See id. at 14.

The Cartwright Act makes unlawful a "trust," defined as "a combination of capital, skill, or acts by two or more persons" for the purposes of restraining commerce and preventing market competition in the variety of ways listed in the statute. Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 16720. See also Lowell v. Mother's Cake & Cookie Co., 79 Cal.App.3d 13, 22, 144 Cal. Rptr. 664 (1978) (citing Bondi v. Jewels by Edwar, Ltd., 267 Cal.App.2d 672, 678, 73 Cal. Rptr. 494 (1968)). The Cartwright Act generally codifies the common law prohibition against the restraint of trade. Kolling v. Dow Jones & Co., 137 Cal.App.3d 709, 717, 187 Cal. Rptr. 797 (1982). The Cartwright Act is patterned after the Sherman Act and consequently, "federal cases interpreting the Sherman Act are applicable problems arising under the Cartwright Act." Redwood Theatres, Inc. v. Festival Enterprises, Inc., 908 F.2d 477, 482 n.3 (9th Cir. 1990) (citing Redwood Theatres, Inc. v. Festival Enterprises, Inc., 200 Cal.App.3d 687, 694, 248 Cal. Rptr. 189 (1988)).

Plaintiffs allege that RTR pressured manufacturers to grant RTR "an exclusive right to buy" and to refuse to sell merchandise to FashionPass. See Complaint ¶ 25. As an initial matter, the Court would agree with Defendant that Plaintiff's allegations do not rise to the level of a boycott, and therefore Plaintiff has not alleged [*9] a per se violation of the Cartwright Act. California courts have found that "vertical restraints of trade, such as exclusive dealing arrangements, can violate the Cartwright Act, though they are not illegal per se." Pecover v. Electronics Arts Inc., 633 F.Supp.2d 976, 983 (N.D. Cal. 2009) (citing Fisherman's Wharf Bay Cruise Corp. v. Superior Court, 114 Cal.App.4th 309, 334-35, 7 Cal. Rptr. 3d 628 (2004). "The law conclusively presumes manifestly anticompetitive restraints of trade to be unreasonable and unlawful, and evaluates other restraints under the rule of reason." Id. Vertical restraints, including exclusive dealing arrangements, are proscribed when it is probable that performance of the arrangements will foreclose competition in a substantial share of the affected line of commerce. Id.

The rule of reason analysis requires a factual analysis of the line of commerce, the market area, and the affected share of the relevant market. See Id. Typically, such a factual inquiry is improper at the motion to dismiss stage. See Pecover, 633 F.Supp.2d at 984. However, here, Defendant argues that Plaintiff has failed to allege any harm to competition. See MTD at 7. The Court would agree. Although Plaintiff alleges economic harm to itself, the Court finds no allegations of harm to the market, or competition generally, in the complaint. Therefore, the Court would find that Plaintiff has failed to state a [*10] claim for antitrust injury under the Cartwright Act. See NorthBay HealthCare Group, Inc. v. Kaiser Foundation Health Plan, Inc., 305 F.Supp.3d 1065, 1073 (N.D. Cal. 2018) (finding that plaintiff's antitrust claims failed where plaintiff did "not allege any antitrust injury or harm to competition generally. It alleges injury only to itself.") (internal quotations and citations omitted).

The Court would not, however, find that Plaintiff has failed to "plausibly define the relevant market" as alleged by Defendant in the MTD. See MTD at 9. Plaintiff defines the relevant market as the "fashion rental business" in which companies such as FashionPass and RTR "allow customers to rent clothing and accessories for special events, work, and casual, through subscriptions that allow the customer to rent designer and sought-after brand clothing, and to then return the items to the Fashion Rental Company, which professionally cleans the items and makes them available for others to rent." See Complaint ¶ 9. Defendant argues that this market definition is "facially unsustainable." Defendants seem to focus on the assertion that traditional retail sellers should be included in the market definition, because they are "reasonably interchangeable." See MTD at 10 (citing Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 325, 82 S. Ct. 1502, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1962)).

At this stage of the proceedings, without any evidence before [*11] the Court, it is impossible for the Court to determine the appropriate market definition. All Plaintiff must allege to state a valid claim is that a relevant market exists and that defendant has market power in said area. See Newcal Industries, Inc. v. Ikon Office Solution, 513 F.3d 1038, 1044 (9th Cir. 2008). "There is no requirement that these elements be pled with specificity." See id. at 1045. Plaintiff has alleged a plausible market definition, and has alleged that RTR is "the dominant player" in that market. See Complaint at 1. Therefore, failure to plausibly define the market is not a basis upon which the Court would dismiss the claim.

However, given that Plaintiff has failed to sufficiently allege harm to competition, the Court would dismiss Plaintiff's first claim for relief. To the extent Plaintiff can amend the complaint to allege harm to the competition in general, the Court would allow Plaintiff leave to amend its Cartwright Act claim.

B. Unfair Competition Claim

Plaintiff alleges a violation of California's Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"), Cal Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200. Defendant argues that because Plaintiff does not sufficiently allege a claim for a violation of antitrust law, it cannot properly allege a claim under the UCL. See MTD at 15. Plaintiff admits in its Opp. that its UCL claim is derivative [*12] of its claim under the Cartwright Act. See Opp. at 8. Given that the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's first claim for relief, its second claim for relief also fails. To the extent Plaintiff is able to amend its complaint to plead a Cartwright Act claim, it may also reallege a claim under the UCL.

C. Intentional Interference with Contract Claim

Plaintiff asserts its claim for intentional interference with contract, based on five alleged contracts FashionPass entered into with five different clothing manufacturers, prior to the alleged anticompetitive conduct of RTR. See Complaint ¶¶ 40-47. Defendant argues that Plaintiff fails to "allege existing contractual relationships" with the manufacturers named, and therefore RTR "could not possibly have known of any order requests." See MTD at 17.

To state a claim for intentional interference with contractual relations, Plaintiff must allege: "(1) a valid contract between plaintiff and a third party; (2) defendant's knowledge of this contract; (3) defendant's intentional acts designed to induce a breach or disruption of the contractual relationship; (4) actual breach or disruption of the contractual relationship; and (5) resulting damage." [*13] United National Maintenance, Inc. v. San Diego Convention Center, Inc., 766 F.3d 1002, 1006 (9th Cir. 2014) (quoting Pacific Gas &Elec. Co. v. Bear Stearns & Co., 50 Cal.3d 1118, 1126, 270 Cal. Rptr. 1, 791 P.2d 587 (1990)).

Defendant claims that Plaintiff's allegations that it submitted purchase orders which were accepted is insufficient, as Plaintiff does not allege "facts to support that the order requests were actually accepted." At this stage, Plaintiff's allegations that it submitted purchase orders, (with specific dates and order numbers) which were accepted by the specific named manufacturers is sufficient. See Complaint ¶¶ 40-44. If Defendant wishes to dispute this fact, it may do so at later stages of the proceeding, but it may not depend on factual disputes to support its MTD.

However, Defendant also claims that aside from a single conclusory allegation, Plaintiff fails to allege "any facts establishing that RTR knew of any contract between FashionPass and the Purchase Order Manufacturers." See MTD at 20. The Court would tentatively agree with Defendant. Plaintiff's only allegation as to Defendant's knowledge of the contracts states: "FashionPass is informed and believes, and upon such information and belief alleges, that RTR and Does 1 through 100, and each of them, had actual knowledge of each of the contracts." See Complaint ¶ 45. Although Plaintiff need not plead facts with specificity [*14] at the motion to dismiss stage, mere conclusory allegations will not suffice. See Swipe & Bite, Inc. v. Chow, 147 F.Supp. 3d 924, 935 (N.D. Cal. 2015) (finding dismissal appropriate where Plaintiff merely alleged knowledge of agreements without any facts showing knowledge). Therefore, the Court would dismiss Plaintiff's claim for intentional interference with contract. The Court would grant Plaintiff leave to amend to the extent it can allege facts showing RTR's knowledge of the contracts at issue.

D. Intentional Interference with Prospective Economic Advantage

Plaintiff's claim for intentional interference with prospective economic advantage is deficient for similar reasons as its first three claims. To state a claim for intentional interference with economic advantage the Plaintiff must plead: (1) an economic relationship between the plaintiff and some third party, with the probability of future economic benefit to the plaintiff; (2) the defendant's knowledge of the relationship; (4) intentional acts on the part of the defendant designed to disrupt the relationship; (4) actual disruption of the relationship; and (5) economic harm to the plaintiff proximately caused by the acts of the defendant." See CRST Van Expedited, Inc. v. Werner Enterprises, Inc., 479 F.3d 1099, 1108 (9th Cir. 2007). Additionally, interference with prospective economic [*15] advantage "requires a plaintiff to allege an act that is wrongful independent of the interference itself." Id.

Plaintiff has not sufficiently pled its antitrust claim and has not alleged a separate basis upon which Defendant's actions would be legally wrongful. See Complaint ¶¶ 50-56. Therefore, Plaintiff cannot allege that the act constituting interference was independently wrongful.

However, unlike Plaintiff's claim for intentional interference with contract, the intentional interference with prospective economic advantage does not require knowledge of any specific contract that would be adversely impacted by Defendant's conduct. Rather, it only necessitates that Defendant be aware of an existing business relationship between the Plaintiff and the third-party vendor. As to this element, the Court would find that Plaintiff has sufficiently plead knowledge on the part of RTR. In paragraph 25 of the complaint, Plaintiff avers that "in or around October and November 2018, and continuing thereafter to the present date, RTR . . . communicated RTR's demand to various manufacturers that unless the manufacturers grant 'an exclusive right to buy' to RTR, and refuse to sell merchandise to FashionPass, [*16] RTR would not purchase any merchandise from those manufacturers." See Complaint ¶ 25.

The Court would grant Plaintiff leave to amend to the extent Plaintiff is able to successfully amend its Cartwright Act claims to establish a legally wrongful act, as well as allege facts showing Defendant's knowledge of the alleged contracts.

IV. Conclusion

The Court would GRANT Defendant's MTD on all counts without prejudice.

Opinion

FINDINGS OF FACT, CONCLUSIONS OF LAW, AND ORDER.

This matter came before the Honorable Troy G. Timmerman on April 16, 2019, for a Hearing on the Defendants' motion for summary judgment. Plaintiffs were represented by J. Robert Keena. Farmers State Bank of Trimont ("FSB") and Michael Mulder were represented by Dustan Cross.

The Court, having considered the arguments of counsel, and all of the files, records and proceedings herein, makes the following:

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

1. On October 8, 2018, an order was filed in this case in which the Court dismissed all counts alleged in the amended complaint and denied the requested amendments to the complaint except for the Plaintiffs' antitrust claim and related factual averments.

2. In denying Defendant's motion to dismiss the antitrust cause of action, the Court noted that Plaintiffs had made a prima facie case that FSB and Michael Mulder violated Minn. Stat. § 325D.53.

3. Following the filing of the Court's order, Plaintiffs filed a second amended complaint containing the single remaining count.

FINDINGS OF FACT

1. Pursuant to Rabbe Farms' bankruptcy, grain elevators owned by the Plaintiffs in Sherburn, Minnesota [*2] and Trimont, Minnesota were transferred to FSB.

2. Seeking to liquidate the elevators it acquired in the Rabbe Farms bankruptcy, FSB consulted Kevin Kahler, Ryan Kahler, and Dustyn Hartung, employees of Land Services Unlimited, Inc., about various ways the elevators could be sold.

3. After receiving interest from a number of potential buyers, FSB decided to dispose of the elevators through a private sale.

4. Neither Land Services Unlimited nor Kevin Kahler (hereinafter "Kahler") was retained to sell or market the elevators.

5. Prior to decision to conduct a private sale, Joel Rabbe (hereinafter "Rabbe") discussed his interest in reacquiring the Trimont elevator with Michael Mulder.[1]

6. Both Michael Mulder (hereinafter "Mulder") and Robert Connors (hereinafter "Connors") testified that they had little interest in dealing with the Plaintiffs given the history between the parties. Nonetheless, both admitted that, had Plaintiffs made a competitive offer for any of the elevators, they would have considered it. Neither Mulder nor Connors believed that Rabbe would make an offer.

7. Rabbe inquired with Mulder about the value of the Trimont elevator and was directed to Kahler, whom Mulder testified [*3] was able to provide information about the elevator's value. Kahler did not know why Mulder referred Rabbe to him.

8. No other potential buyer was directed to Kahler.

9. Kahler and Rabbe discussed the value of the Trimont elevator. When Rabbe attempted to reach Kahler afterward, Kahler informed Rabbe that FSB was conducting the sale of the elevators itself.[2] Kahler testified that Rabbe never communicated an intention to buy the Trimont elevator.

10. According to Mulder, Rabbe never asked how he could put in a bid on the Trimont elevator. However, Rabbe testified that Mulder directed him to Kahler if he wished to purchase the elevator.

11. At no time did FSB attempt to solicit an offer for any of the elevators from Plaintiffs, and at no point did Rabbe make an offer for either the Trimont or the Sherburn elevator.

12. Rabbe testified that he never considered making an unsolicited offer as he did not know how FSB was planning to sell the elevators.

13. The Trimont elevator was sold on July 11, 2017 and the Sherburn elevator was sold on July 6, 2017. The limited-liability company which purchased a portion of the Sherburn elevator was part-owned by Kahler.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

[1] Rabbe testified that he discussed his interest in both the Trimont and Sherburn elevators with Mulder while Mulder only remembered discussing the Trimont elevator.

[2] This was memorialized in a text message between Rabbe and Kahler.

1. Minnesota Rule of Civil Procedure 56.01 provides that "[t]he [*4] court shall grant summary judgment if the movant shows that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law." The Minnesota Supreme Court has defined a material fact as "one of such a nature as will affect the result or outcome of the case depending on its resolution." Zappa v. Fahey, 310 Minn. 555, 245 N.W.2d 258, 259-60 (Minn. 1976). A genuine issue of material fact exists if a rational trier of fact, considering the record as a whole, could find for the party against whom summary judgment was granted. See Frieler v. Carlson Mktg. Grp., Inc., 751 N.W.2d 558, 564 (Minn. 2008). Where summary judgment is sought, the moving party has the burden of proving that there is no genuine issue of material fact and that it is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. See Sauter v. Sauter, 244 Minn. 482, 70 N.W.2d 351, 353 (Minn. 1955).

2. Minn. Stat. § 325D.53 prohibits any "contract, combination, or conspiracy between two or more persons refusing to deal with another person."[3] This statute mirrors section 1 of the Sherman Act. See 15 U.S.C. § 1 ("Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal.") Given these similarities, Minnesota antitrust law is generally interpreted in accordance with its federal counterpart. See Lorix v. Crompton Corp., 736 N.W.2d 619, 626 (Minn. 2007).

3. Federal courts [*5] have recognized that "[a] demand and refusal is a prerequisite to a claim of concerted refusal to deal" and that "[a] plaintiff can have no relief when his failure to obtain a desired product is attributable to his own failure to make a request." Cleary v. National Distillers & Chemical Corp., 505 F.2d 695, 697 (9th Cir. 1974).

4. Even where a refusal to deal exists, it is not dispositive of an antitrust violation. It is a long-standing principle of antitrust law that a private business may refuse to deal with another provided that it does so independently. See United States v. Colgate & Co., 250 U.S. 300, 307, 39 S. Ct. 465, 63 L. Ed. 992, 1919 Dec. Comm'r Pat. 460 (1919) ("the [Sherman] act does not restrict the long recognized right of trader or manufacturer engaged in an entirely private business, freely to exercise his own independent discretion as to parties with whom he will deal"); Fed. Trade Comm'n v. Beech Nut Packing Co., 257 U.S. 441, 453, 42 S. Ct. 150, 66 L. Ed. 307, 4 F.T.C. 583, 19 Ohio L. Rep. 586 (1922) (noting that the Colgate rule does not extend to "contracts or combinations" that "unduly hinder or obstruct... trade").

5. Indeed, in order to survive a judgment against them, an antitrust plaintiff must present evidence which "reasonably tends to prove mat [defendants] had a conscious commitment to a common scheme designed to achieve an unlawful objective," Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Service Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 768, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775 (1984), and, conversely, "tends to exclude the possibility that the alleged conspirators acted independently." Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., Ltd., 475 U.S. 574, 588, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986).

6. Here, the evidence indicates [*6] that Plaintiffs' antitrust claim is futile. First, Plaintiffs admit that no offer was made on either me Trimont or Sherburn elevators.[4] While Plaintiffs have attempted to argue that the absence of an offer is not fatal where there is evidence mat the antitrust plaintiff was denied the product due to some concerted action by the defendants, such is not the case here, as there is no evidence of a refusal to deal.[5] Both Michael

[3] "Person" is broadly denned as "any individual, corporation, firm, partnership, incorporated and unincorporated association, or any other legal or commercial entity." Minn. Stat. § 325D.50, subd. 5.

[4] Although Rabbe testified that Mulder directed him to Kahler if he wished to purchase the Trimont elevator, there is no indication in the record that Rabbe made any firm demand or offer to purchase any of the elevators. It appears that, at most, Rabbe expressed an interest in purchasing the elevators. However, such expressions are insufficient to constitute a demand or offer to deal. See Cleary, 505 F.2d at 696-97.

[5] Plaintiffs cite to Continental Ore Co. v. Union Carbide & Carbon Corp., 370 U.S. 690, 82 S. Ct. 1404, 8 L. Ed. 2d 777 (1962) in support of the proposition that this rule is not to be rigidly applied. While it is true that the United State Supreme Court declined to enforce this rule in Continental Ore, its rationale for doing so appears to be based on the peculiar facts of that case in which Mulder and Robert Connors admitted that they were not inclined to do business with the Plaintiffs but testified that they would have entertained an offer for the elevators had it been in the best interest of FSB. Plaintiffs only evidence to the contrary is that Rabbe, unlike the other potential buyers, was directed by Defendants to Kahler to discuss the elevators' value and that the elevators were sold pending that discussion. However, this supposed "run around" is insufficient to create antitrust liability. See Cleary, 505 F.2d at 697. Absent the referral to Kahler, there is nothing in the record to indicate that Rabbe stood in any position substantively different from the purchasers of the elevators.

7. Second, Plaintiffs have failed to submit evidence [*7] reasonably tending to prove that Defendants and Kahler were colluding.[6] Kahler testified that he was "baffled" as to why Mulder had referred Rabbe to him. Kahler also informed Rabbe, prior to the sale of the Trimont and Sherburn elevators, that FSB was handling the sale itself. This undercuts any allegation that Kahler and Defendants were working in concert. If anything, the "run around" alleged by Plaintiffs was conducted by Defendants alone.[7] As there is insufficient evidence of a contract, combination, or conspiracy between FSB and Kahler, no antitrust action can be maintained.

Based on the above Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law, IT IS HEREBY ORDERED:

1. Defendants' motion for summary judgment is GRANTED and the Plaintiffs' complaint is DISMISSED in its entirety.

LET JUDGMENT BE ENTERED ACCORDINGLY.

respondents had effectively monopolized the supply of vanadium oxide though conduct which appeared to violate both sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act (the Court's analysis does not distinguish between the two). As no much similar conduct exists in this case, the Court believes that Continental Ore is of limited applicability.

[6] It is unclear whether FSB and Kahler could have engaged in any type of prohibited collusive conduct given that Kahler's role appeared to be either as a de facto selling agent or a competitive purchaser. The former has been held to be immune from antitrust liability, see Howard v. Minnesota Timberwolves Basketball Ltd. Partnership, 636 N.W.2d 551, 557 (Minn. App. 2001) (agent or representative cannot incur antitrust liability) while the latter, in this context, invariably precludes other competitors from acquiring the sought-after product.

[7] Defendants have noted, rightfully so, that the allegation of collusive action on the part of Kahler and FSB is facially absurd given that FSB did not require Kahler's assistance in preventing Rabbe from purchasing the elevators.

HN1[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) provides for dismissal of a complaint for failure to state a claim when a plaintiff's plain statement lacks enough substance to show that it is entitled to relief. On a motion to dismiss, the court considers plausibility, not probability. A claim is plausible when the facts pled allow the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged. Plaintiffs are not required to plead facts that, if true, definitely rule out all possible innocent explanations. But there is a difference between allegations that stand on well-pleaded facts and allegations that stand on nothing more than supposition. Judging the sufficiency of a pleading is a context-dependent exercise. In the antitrust context, a complaint must contain enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest that an agreement was made.

HN3[] Sherman Act, Claims

A 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 claim will not be considered adequately pled because of the bare possibility that discovery might unearth direct evidence of an agreement. The moving party must state enough facts to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of illegal agreement, even if the court believes such proof is improbable. An agreement may be shown by alleging direct or circumstantial evidence, or a combination of the two.

A Sherman Act claim based on parallel — even consciously parallel — conduct alone would be insufficient to survive dismissal. For circumstantial evidence of an agreement, a plaintiff must allege both parallel conduct and something more. Opinion

[*480] Rufe, J.

In this multidistrict litigation, [5] Plaintiffs allege that Defendants engaged in an antitrust conspiracy by allocating the market for and fixing the prices of certain generic pharmaceutical products. In this Opinion, the Court considers a motion by Defendants McKesson Corporation and McKesson Medical Surgical, Inc. (collectively, "McKesson")[1] to dismiss the claims brought against them by Plaintiffs Marion Diagnostic Center, LLC and Marion Healthcare, LLC (collectively "Marion"). For the reasons that follow, Marion's claims against McKesson will be dismissed.

I. BACKGROUND

"Marion Diagnostic Center LLC is a limited liability company formed under the laws of the State of Illinois, with its principal place of business in Marion. Illinois."[2] It "operates a multidisciplinary healthcare facility including an outpatient surgery practice, a diagnostic center, and a walk-in clinic."[3] "Marion HealthCare, LLC" also has its principal place of business in Marion, Illinois — a multi-specialty surgery center.[4] It is an LLC formed under Illinois law.[5]

In its second amended complaint, Marion asserts a claim under Section 1 of the Sherman Act against a number of generic drug manufacturers and against McKesson, "one of the four largest distributors [6] of generic drugs in the United States."[6] Marion alleges it "directly purchased" a variety of generic drugs "through" McKesson[7] and brings its Sherman Act claim on behalf of a putative class of "[a]ll persons or entities that have directly purchased generic drugs from conspirator McKesson in the United States from September 25, 2014 though the present . . . ."[8] Marion also asserts claims against McKesson "in the alternative" under various state laws on behalf of a putative class of indirect purchasers encompassing "[a]ll United States healthcare providers purchasing the generic drugs of Defendant manufacturers through distributors and wholesalers from September 25, 2014 through the present."[9]

[*481] Marion contends that there are "compelling indications that the largest Defendant [generic drug] manufacturers . . . have enlisted tacitly or explicitly distributor McKesson as a cooperating co-conspirator (and possibly other unnamed distributors) to aid and conceal their price fixing and market allocation across the generic drug industry."[10] It asserts that members of its proposed class "have paid above-competitive prices" as a result of the alleged industry-wide conspiracy.[11] Marion contends [7] that there is "strong circumstantial evidence of McKesson's cooperation" in the alleged conspiracy.[12] In support of its claims, Marion alleges that

> [n]umerous, sophisticated McKesson purchasing personnel can hardly have failed to notice that, for a number of years, bidding for McKesson's high-volume, attractive business for numerous generic drugs has been much less than robust and fully-competitive (because its business has been allocated to one of the Defendant manufacturers so that the manufacturer could obtain its agreed "fair share" of a particular drug).[13]

It also alleges that "McKesson's buying personnel can hardly have failed to notice . . . the radical . . . price spikes paid by McKesson in 2013 and 2014 for more than 1,200 generic medications (where prices increased on average 448 percent between July 2013 and July 2014)."[14] Marion alleges that McKesson "must have been [or] become aware that the only plausible explanation was anticompetitive conduct by Defendant manufacturers . . . ."[15] It contends that Defendant drug manufacturer Heritage "centrally coordinated" the alleged price-fixing and market allocation conspiracy, Heritage "claims to be closely 'strategically-aligned' with McKesson" [8] and, as a result, "McKesson has a ready, close source of intelligence to confirm any suspicions of anticompetitive activity . . . ."[16] Marion also alleges that "the movement of officers between McKesson and additional central conspirators [drug manufacturers] Mylan and Teva has further facilitated its cooperation with, and concealment of, the overarching conspiracy."[17] It alleges that two former employees of Mylan Pharmaceuticals now work at McKesson and two now work at McKesson Canada.[18] Marion also alleges that five former McKesson employees now work for Defendants

Mylan and Teva in various capacities.[19] Marion contends that McKesson's "collusion is also highly probable if one follows the money."[20] It asserts that "McKesson has made each year (since at least 2013) billions of dollars of additional margins on its resale of generic drugs due to i[t]s routine percentage mark-up of the conspiracy's above-competitive pricing."[21] Marion alleges that "[t]hese additional billions realized by McKesson annually are powerful reasons why it has cooperated with, and concealed, several years of conspiracy . . . ."[22]

[*482] II. STANDARD OF REVIEW

McKesson moves to dismiss Marion's [9] claims against it pursuant to HN1[] Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) which provides for dismissal of a complaint for failure to state a claim when a plaintiff's "plain statement" lacks enough substance to show that it is entitled to relief.[23] On a motion to dismiss, the Court "consider[s] plausibility, not probability . . . ."[24] A claim is plausible when the facts pled "allow the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged."[25] Plaintiffs are not required "to plead facts that, if true, definitely rule out all possible innocent explanations."[26] "But there is a difference between allegations that stand on well-pleaded facts and allegations that stand on nothing more than supposition."[27] "[J]udging the sufficiency of a pleading is a context-dependent exercise."[28] In the antitrust context, a complaint must contain "enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest that an agreement was made."[29]

III. DISCUSSION

A. FAILURE TO STATE A SHERMAN ACT CLAIM

McKesson argues that Marion cannot state a Sherman Act claim against it merely by alleging that McKesson "should have known about the conspiracy and . . . did not do enough to counteract it."[30] Indeed, to state a Section 1 claim against McKesson, Marion [10] must allege "some form of concerted action . . ., in other words, a unity of purpose or a common design and understanding or a meeting of minds or a conscious commitment to a common scheme . . . ."[31] "[T]he issue is whether the pleading delineates to some sufficiently specific degree that a defendant purposefully joined and participated in the conspiracy."[32] HN3[] A Section 1 claim will not be "considered adequately pled because of the bare possibility that discovery might unearth direct evidence of an agreement."[33] Marion must "state enough facts to 'raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of illegal agreement,' even if the court believes such proof is improbable."[34]

[*483] An agreement may be shown "by alleging direct or circumstantial evidence, or a combination of the two."[35] Marion's claims against McKessson do not rest on direct evidence of an agreement.[36] In its second amended complaint, Marion asserts that "circumstantial evidence of tacit McKesson cooperation and concealment is sufficient as a matter of law plausibly to allege McKesson as a co-conspirator."[37] Marion maintains that it has plausibly alleged that McKesson "tacitly or expressly worked in parallel with [the manufacturer-level [11] conspiracy] to provide the concealment essential for the conspiracy's continuance . . . ."[38]

McKesson argues that Marion has not met its obligation to plead parallel conduct because McKesson is "a distributor . . . situated at a different level of the supply chain from the manufacturers and fulfills a wholly different function from the manufacturers . . . ."[39] Indeed, in its second amended complaint, Marion makes no explicit allegations of parallel conduct by McKesson. Marion alleges only that McKesson, like the manufacturer Defendants, saw increased profits because of McKesson's "routine percentage mark ups of above-competitive pricing" and "unlawful inflation of pricing across the generic drug industry."[40] However, Marion has not directed the Court to any authority that would support the proposition that McKesson's conduct — pricing generic drugs for resale after purchase from the manufacturer Defendants — was parallel to the manufacturer Defendants' conduct simply because each are alleged to have seen increased profits. Marion has not plausibly alleged that McKesson engaged in parallel conduct.

Even if Marion's allegations were enough to plead parallel conduct, its second [12] amended complaint would still fall short of stating a Sherman Act claim against McKesson. "[HN5[] A] claim based on parallel — even consciously parallel — conduct alone would be insufficient to survive dismissal . . . ."[41] Marion's "allegations of parallel conduct . . . must be placed in a context that raises a suggestion of a preceding agreement, not merely parallel conduct that could just as well be independent action."[42]

> For circumstantial evidence of an agreement, . . . a plaintiff must allege both parallel conduct and something "more" . . . . This "more" could include evidence (1) "that the defendant had a motive to enter into a . . . conspiracy," (2) "that the defendant acted contrary to its interests," [*484] or (3) "implying a traditional conspiracy."[43]

Although Marion alleges that "[m]ultiple plus factors plausibly suggest" a "meeting of the minds" between McKesson and manufacturer Defendants,[44] the requisite "more" is missing from Marion's second amended complaint. Marion alleges in conclusory manner that "the largest Defendant manufacturers . . . have enlisted tacitly or explicitly distributor McKesson as a cooperating co-conspirator . . . ."[45] But Marion does not allege how McKesson was "enlisted" [13] to cooperate in the alleged conspiracy. The second amended complaint includes no factual allegations that would give substance to McKesson's purported role in the alleged conspiracy. "HN6[] [S]prinkling a complaint with conclusory assertions that a party was a 'participant in coordinated conduct' or a 'conspirator' or acted in 'concert' with others does not make the requisite showing of entitlement to relief mandated by Rule 8(a)(2)."[46]

Marion asserts that McKesson "facilitated its cooperation with, and concealment of, the overarching conspiracy" through "the movement of officers between McKesson and additional central conspirators Mylan and Teva . . . ."[47] Marion alleges that it was "likely" that a former Mylan employee "carried his intimate knowledge of the overarching conspiracy with him to McKesson"[48] and that a second former Mylan employee hired by McKesson "likely had knowledge of the [Mylan's] pricing of" certain Mylan products.[49] Marion alleges that a third former Mylan employee hired by non-Defendant McKesson Canada "provides . . . another ready window into Mylan's participation in the overarching conspiracy"[50] and that another former Mylan employee hired by McKesson Canada "was likely aware of his [14] employer's collusion."[51] However, Marion offers no facts to show how the "likely" knowledge of these former Mylan employees creates a reasonable inference that McKesson agreed to participate in the alleged conspiracy to allocate the market for and fix the prices of certain generic pharmaceutical products. Nor has Marion shown how the individuals alleged to have previously worked for McKesson and who now work for manufacturer Defendants[52] make McKesson's participation in the manufacturer Defendants' alleged conspiracy any more likely.[53]

[*485] The allegations of employee movement between McKesson and certain manufacturer Defendants are insufficiently specific to sustain Marion's Section 1 claim against McKesson.

Marion alleges that it is "plausible" that McKesson cooperated with the alleged conspiracy because of "its close relationship with co-conspirators Heritage" and two Heritage executives who have pled guilty to engaging in price fixing and market allocation.[54] Marion contends that Heritage told another manufacturer Defendant not to bid for McKesson's business.[55] McKesson responds that "there is nothing suspicious" about a relationship between a distributor and a manufacturer.[56] [15] Marion has not pleaded sufficient facts regarding McKesson's alleged relationship with Heritage to render plausible its claim that McKesson was cooperating in the alleged conspiracy with the manufacturer Defendants.[57]

Responding to McKesson's motion, Marion also argues that McKesson had an "exceptionally strong motive" to conspire,[58] echoing its allegation that "McKesson is certainly strongly financially motivated to cooperate with, and conceal, the conspiracy."[59] Marion's second amended complaint cites "billions of dollars of additional . . . margin[s]" McKesson has made each year since at least 2013 due to "its routine percentage mark-up" of the manufacturer Defendants' generic drug prices.[60] But "[p]rofit is a legitimate motive in pricing decisions, and something more is required before a court can conclude that competitors conspired to fix pric[es]."[61] Without more, McKesson's pricing structure is not enough to plead a plus factor suggestive of McKesson's participation in the alleged manufacturer conspiracy.

Marion also alleges that McKesson has "acted contrary to its independent, rational economic self-interest . . . by continually accepting large, unlawful price increases [16] and submitting to reduced bidding . . . ."[62] The Third Circuit has recognized that a company's actions against its self-interest can constitute a plus factor.[63] But Marion' contention that McKesson acted against its own economic interest is contrary to the above-cited allegation that McKesson profited from the alleged increase in generic drug prices. Further, Marion has not alleged facts to show how it was irrational for McKesson to continue purchasing from the manufacturer Defendants or that McKesson had available alternative suppliers.[64] Absent such allegations, Marion has [*486] not shown McKesson's actions were so contrary to its own interests that they allow Marion's Section 1 claim against McKesson to withstand dismissal.

Marion also suggests that McKesson had an opportunity to conspire with manufacturer Defendants because McKesson sponsored and attended trade association events.[65] However, the second amended complaint alleges only that "some of" the trade shows "were sponsored all or in part by McKesson" and that "any McKesson inquiries at the many 'cozy' trade shows . . . used to facilitate the overarching conspiracy . . . plausibly are sources of intelligence as to anticompetitive conduct."[66] McKesson [17] argues these allegations are insufficient to permit Marion's claims against it to withstand dismissal because "Marion's complaint does not actually put McKesson in the room where the encounters allegedly happened . . . ."[67] The Court agrees. Marion does not identify any specific trade association meeting with McKesson's sponsorship or any McKesson employee with relevant authority who attended a trade association meeting alongside any manufacturer Defendant's representative. Marion's allegations are nothing more than impermissible supposition.

Marion's second amended complaint also alleges that an "industry intelligence-gathering firm" has reported that the Department of Justice "is investigating the extent to which trade associations and industry conferences have been used as forums for collusion among competitors."[68] Marion's allegations that McKesson is "reportedly" under investigation for participation in the alleged conspiracy[69] fall short of supporting a claim that McKesson purposefully joined and participated in the alleged conspiracy. "[I]n the right circumstances, 'government investigations may be used to bolster the plausibility of § 1 claims,'"[70] but those circumstances are not present [18] where Marion has alleged only that McKesson could be the subject of an investigation. Here too, Marion's allegations amount only to impermissible supposition.

In sum, Marion has not sufficiently alleged any plus factor that would make plausible a claim that McKesson's conduct was the result of an agreement with the manufacturer Defendants "and not the result of independent business decisions . . . ."[71] Marion's Section 1 claim rests only on McKesson's "likely" awareness of the manufacturer Defendants' alleged conspiracy. This is not enough to permit the Court to infer that McKesson agreed to participate. Indeed, without more, even "[k]nowledge of the existence of an agreement" amongst the manufacturing defendants to restrain competition is not enough to support an inference that McKesson was a co-conspirator.[72] HN7[] "[A] district court must retain the power to insist upon some specificity in pleading before allowing a potentially massive factual controversy to [*487] proceed."[73] The Court will dismiss Marion's Section 1 claim against McKesson.

B. ANTITRUST STANDING

Even if Marion's allegations were sufficiently specific to plead a Section 1 claim against McKesson — and they are not — the Court would still dismiss the claim because [19] Marion has not plausibly alleged that it is a direct purchaser with statutory standing to recover antitrust damages. Pursuant to Illinois Brick Co. v. Illinois,[74] HN8[] there is a "general rule that only direct purchasers from antitrust violators may recover damages in antitrust suits."[75] Although Marion characterizes itself as a direct purchaser,[76] the mechanics of the purchasing relationship set forth in the second amended complaint show otherwise. Marion alleges that it purchased generic drugs "through" McKesson. But Marion's use of the word through in the second amended complaint does not convert it into a direct purchaser from the manufacturer Defendants who are alleged to have fixed the prices and allocated the market for the drugs Marion purchased. Under the allegations in the second amended complaint, Marion is "the second purchaser in the chain of distribution" and is thus an indirect purchaser barred from seeking damages under the Clayton Act.[77]

Further, Marion's allegations do not permit it to take advantage of the co-conspirator exception to the Illinois Brick direct purchaser rule. As the Court of Appeals has explained,

> HN10[] [T]he limited co-conspirator exception [20] to the direct purchaser rule . . . allows an entity to sue its supplier and its supplier's supplier if (1) it sues both at once, and (2) the immediate supplier (i.e., the middleman) was so wrapped up in the conspiracy that it would be barred from seeking antitrust relief against the top-level supplier in a suit of its own.[78]

Marion has not alleged that McKesson's involvement in the alleged conspiracy "was so truly complete" that McKesson would be barred as a matter of law from bringing its own suit.[79] Marion's allegation that McKesson "must have known" about the alleged conspiracy is not enough to plead that McKesson is a co-conspirator, so as to exempt Marion from the Illinois Brick bar against indirect purchaser claims. Marion's Section 1 claim against McKesson will be dismissed.

C. STATE LAW CLAIMS

Marion's second amended complaint asserts claims in the alternative under various state laws seeking to recover on behalf of itself and a putative indirect purchaser class.[80] However, Marion seeks to recover [*488] under Illinois law on behalf of itself alone, and not on behalf of a class.[81] Although the Illinois Antitrust Act permits Marion to seek to recover on its own behalf,[82] it cannot proceed with its Illinois [21] Antitrust Act claim as an individual for the same reasons that it cannot proceed under the Sherman Act.[83] The Illinois antitrust claim, like the federal one, fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. Thus, Marion's Illinois Antitrust Act claim against McKesson will be dismissed.

In addition, because Marion does not (and cannot) pursue its Illinois Antitrust Act claim on behalf of a class and because Marion has not alleged that it suffered an injury anywhere else, McKesson argues that Marion lacks standing to bring class claims against McKesson under the laws of any other state.[84] Responding to McKesson's motion, Marion does not dispute that it has not alleged that it operates in or was injured in a state other than Illinois.[85] Rather, Marion argues that it may proceed with its class claims under other state laws because it "indisputably may seek damages for itself under Illinois law" and because it "would also have standing to seek injunctive relief under its federal claims."[86] Marion contends that whether it "may serve as a representative of classes of healthcare providers who have suffered damages in states other than Illinois is a . . . question[ ] which [22] must be decided . . . in the context of the class certification analysis required under Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure."[87]

The Court is faced once again with the "surprisingly difficult question" presented by "[t]he interplay between Article III standing and class standing . . . ."[88] When the Court in this multidistrict litigation was previously confronted with this question, the relevant defendants did not dispute that the relevant plaintiffs had standing to pursue class claims under the laws of jurisdictions where they had paid for generic drugs.[89] Under those circumstances, [*489] the Court declined to dismiss the relevant plaintiffs' claims on behalf of absent class members for lack of Article III standing. The Court held that it was "both proper and more efficient to consider whether" the named plaintiffs could pursue their state law claims on behalf of the unnamed class members in the context of the Rule 23 class certification analysis because their state law claims were largely parallel to those of the putative class members.[90] The plaintiffs had alleged enough "to demonstrate a substantial and shared interest in proving that [the relevant]

Defendants' alleged unlawful conduct resulted in overpayments for the [relevant] drugs, [23] injuries redressable by an award of damages under the state antitrust, consumer protection and unjust enrichment laws cited in the [relevant plaintiffs'] complaints."[91]

The difference this time is that Marion has not alleged that it has standing for any state law claim that it may bring against McKesson on behalf of a class. Marion has not alleged that it suffered an injury in any state other than Illinois and would be able to assert only an individual claim under Illinois law (although it has not successfully done so in the second amended complaint). Because Marion may only proceed as a plaintiff under Illinois law on behalf of itself and because Marion's federal antitrust claim is not sufficiently pled to withstand dismissal, it is appropriate to dismiss Marion's other state law claims as against McKesson.

D. LEAVE TO AMEND

Because Marion has already amended its complaint, it may further amend its complaint "only with the opposing party's written consent or the court's leave."[92] In response to McKesson's motion to dismiss, Marion does not expressly seek leave to amend its Section 1 claim against McKesson. Marion does ask that the Court [24] grant it "leave to amend to add an additional class representative to allow the [state-law] claims to proceed for states other than Illinois."[93] HN13[] Rule 15(a)(2) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure directs the Court to "freely give leave [to amend] when justice so requires."[94] Denial "is justified on the grounds of "undue delay, bad faith, prejudice to the opposing party, or futility."[95] So instructed, the Court will not preclude Marion from seeking leave to file a further amended complaint in the event that it is able to allege sufficient facts to state a claim against McKesson consistent with this Opinion.[96] Marion must file a [*490] motion for leave to amend prior to filing any amended complaint.

An appropriate Order follows.

ORDER

AND NOW, this 26th day of June 2019, upon consideration of the Motion to Dismiss by Defendants McKesson Corporation and McKesson Medical Surgical, Inc. (collectively, "McKesson") [Doc. No. 44] and the opposition of Plaintiff Marion Diagnostic Center, LLC and Marion Healthcare, LLC (collectively "Marion"), and for the reasons set forth in the accompanying Opinion, it is hereby ORDERED that the Motion is GRANTED. Counts I through XXX of Marion's Second Amended Complaint are DISMISSED as against McKesson.

McKesson Mem. in Support of Mot. to Dismiss Marion Pls.' Second Am. Compl. at 20. The Court's February 15 decision addressed the sufficiency of certain state antitrust claims asserted in other complaints in this multidistrict litigation. Because the Court has found that Marion has not sufficiently alleged that it has standing to pursue state antitrust claims on behalf of a class, it will not reach the substance of the other state law claims alleged in Marion's second amended complaint. If Marion decides to file a further amended complaint, it should review the Court's previous decision prior to reasserting any state antitrust claims. See 368 F. Supp. 3d 814.

It is further [25] ORDERED that if Marion can allege sufficient facts to state a claim against McKesson, Marion may seek leave to amend its claims against McKesson by filing a motion for leave within 30 days of the Court's disposition of the last of the remaining motions to dismiss that are now pending in Civil Action No. 18-4137.

It is so ORDERED.

ORDER AND OPINION ON PLAINTIFF'S OPPOSITION TO DESIGNATION

1. THIS MATTER is before the Court on Plaintiff UNOX, Inc.'s ("UNOX") Opposition to Mandatory Complex Business Case Designation and Motion to Vacate Order of Designation ("Opposition"). (Pl. UNOX, Inc.'s Opp'n Mandatory Complex Business Case Designation & Mot. Vacate Order Designation [hereinafter "Opp'n"], ECF No. 9; see also Pl. UNOX, Inc.'s Br. Opp'n Mandatory Complex Business Case Designation & Supp. Mot. Vacate Order Designation [hereinafter "Opp'n Br."], ECF No. 10.) For the reasons set forth below, the Court ALLOWS the Opposition.

Bledsoe, Chief Judge.

2. This case arises out of a dispute between UNOX and its former employees, Michael Conway ("Conway") and James Emmerson ("Emmerson"). UNOX supplies ovens for the food service industry. [*2] In late 2018, Conway and Emmerson defected and opened an American subsidiary of UNOX's Italian competitor, Tecnoeka, S.R.L., known as Tecnoeka, Inc. (together, the "Tecnoeka Defendants"). UNOX now believes that Conway and Emmerson took its confidential information in breach of non-disclosure agreements and gave that information to their new employer to gain an unfair competitive advantage.

3. UNOX initiated this action on April 3, 2019, asserting claims for breach of contract, breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, breach of fiduciary duty, constructive fraud, and fraud against Conway and Emmerson; for tortious interference with contract against the Tecnoeka Defendants; and for tortious interference with prospective economic advantage, violation of the North Carolina Unfair and Deceptive Trade Practices Act, civil conspiracy and facilitating fraud, aiding and abetting, and punitive damages against all Defendants. The Complaint also requests preliminary and permanent injunctive relief. (See Compl., ECF No. 3.)

4. The Tecnoeka Defendants timely filed a Notice of Designation on May 2, 2019. (Notice Designation Mandatory Complex Business Case [hereinafter "NOD"], [*3] ECF No. 7.) They asserted that designation as a mandatory complex business case would be proper because this action raises material issues related to disputes involving antitrust law and trade secrets under N.C. Gen. Stat. §§ 7A-45.4(a)(3) and (8). (NOD 1-2.)

5. Based on the Notice of Designation, this case was designated as a complex business case by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of North Carolina on May 3, 2019, (Designation Order, ECF No. 1), and assigned by the undersigned to the Honorable Adam M. Conrad on the same day, (Assignment Order, ECF No. 2).

6. UNOX timely filed the Opposition on May 31, 2019, contending that the designation was not proper because its claims do not involve antitrust law or trade secrets. (Opp'n 2.) The Tecnoeka Defendants filed their Response to the Opposition on June 5, 2019. (Defs.' Resp. Pl.'s Opp'n Mandatory Complex Business Case Designation [hereinafter "Resp."], ECF No. 15.) This matter is now ripe for determination.

7. "For a case to be [designated] as a mandatory complex business case, the pleading upon which designation is based must raise a material issue that falls within one of the categories specified in section 7A-45.4." *Composite Fabrics of Am., LLC v. Edge Structural Composites, Inc., 2016 NCBC LEXIS 11, at 25 (N.C. Super. Ct. Feb. 5, 2016). "The inquiry of whether a case involves the requisite disputes [*4] falling with[in] the statutory requirements has not been historically confined to the actual causes of action asserted in a complaint[] but has also examined the underlying factual allegations." *Cornerstone Health Care, P.A. v. Moore, 2015 NCBC LEXIS 65, at 7 (N.C. Super. Ct. June 22, 2015).

8. The Court begins with section 7A-45.4(a)(8), which permits designation of cases raising a material issue related to "[d]isputes involving trade secrets, including disputes arising under Article 24 of Chapter 66 of the General Statutes." The classic example of a dispute involving trade secrets is one for misappropriation of trade secrets. See N.C. Gen. Stat. § 66-153. On occasion, this Court has held that section 7A-45.4(a)(8) also reaches other types of claims, including contract claims, when the complaint puts the existence, ownership, or misuse of alleged trade secrets squarely in dispute. See Union Corrugating Co. v. Viechnicki, No. 14 CVS 6240, Order Opp'n Designation Action Mandatory Complex Business Case (N.C. Super. Ct. Sept. 9, 2014) (unpublished). But the Court has never construed the statute so broadly as to permit "designation of an action as a mandatory complex business case based on claims involving generalized confidential or proprietary information"—a fitting description of many claims for breach of restrictive covenants in employment agreements. *Cornerstone Health Care, 2015 NCBC LEXIS 65, at 6.

9. UNOX's claims fall into this final [*5] category. UNOX alleges that Conway and Emmerson were subject to contractual restrictions not to misuse or disclose confidential and proprietary information and that they breached those restrictions by taking and using "product designs and materials, customer lists, techniques, business plans, strategic plans, marketing information and other business and financial information." (Compl. ¶ 26; see also Compl. ¶ 13.) UNOX further alleges that all Defendants engaged in unfair or deceptive trade practices by using the unlawfully obtained confidential information to gain a competitive advantage. (Compl. ¶ 84.)

10. Although the nondisclosure agreements include "trade secrets" as a category within the larger definition of UNOX's confidential or proprietary information, (Compl. ¶ 7), the Complaint does not purport to assert a claim for trade-secret misappropriation, nor does it allege that any of UNOX's information at issue in this action is subject to trade-secret protection. In the absence of such allegations, the asserted claims appear to be based on the misuse of generalized confidential or proprietary information. Thus, nothing in the Complaint "suggest[s] that the dispute will require the [*6] Court to resolve material issues involving trade secrets[.]" Stay Alert Safety Servs., Inc. v. Pratt, 2017 NCBC LEXIS 101, at *5-6 (N.C. Super. Ct. Nov. 1, 2017).

11. The Tecnoeka Defendants insist that this is not a garden-variety dispute about a restrictive covenant in an employment agreement. They contend that UNOX drafted its claim under N.C. Gen. Stat. § 75-1.1 to include a freestanding claim for misappropriation of confidential information that is identical to a claim for misappropriation of trade secrets, other than carefully replacing "trade secrets" with "confidential and proprietary information." (Resp. 1.) In their view, "there is no way to prosecute or defend this case without treating [it] as a trade secret dispute." (Resp. 5.)

12. The Court disagrees. The plaintiff is the master of its complaint and free to choose which causes of action it will bring. Here, UNOX chose to allege the misuse of confidential information without also alleging or seeking to establish that the information qualifies as a trade secret. Perhaps UNOX could have pressed for trade-secret protection for some or all of the alleged confidential information at issue, but it did not, and this Court will not designate a case under section 7A-45.4 "merely because the pleadings include factual allegations that arguably touch upon facts that, when [*7] read together with other allegations, might have been a basis for a claim that the plaintiff chose not to allege." Market Am., Inc. v. Doyle, No. 15 CVS 9658, Order at 3 (N.C. Super. Ct. Feb. 29, 2016) (unpublished).

13. In reaching this decision, two points bear emphasis. First, the Court does not hold that designation under section 7A-45.4(a)(8) depends on the appearance or absence of magic words—such as "trade secret"—in the complaint. Rather, the question is whether the complaint puts the existence, ownership, or misuse of alleged trade secrets at issue. As discussed, even though "trade secrets" are included within the nondisclosure agreements' definition of "confidential or proprietary information," UNOX's claims in this case do not require or rely on a showing that its confidential information qualifies as a trade secret. See Stay Alert, 2017 NCBC LEXIS 101, at *5-6; see also Cornerstone Health Care, 2015 NCBC LEXIS 65, at *3-5.

14. Second, this is not an invitation to gamesmanship. The decision to assert one cause of action and to leave out another is one that carries with it meaningful and lasting consequences, affecting the elements of proof and the scope of available remedies, among other things. It may even be true, as the Tecnoeka Defendants argue, that "misappropriation of confidential [*8] information is not a recognized claim under North Carolina law." (Resp. 5 n.3.)[1] Put simply, having made the strategic choice to avoid application of trade secret laws, UNOX must now take the good with the bad.

15. Accordingly, the Court concludes that this action does not involve a material issue related to a dispute involving trade secrets. See Stay Alert, 2017 NCBC LEXIS 101, at *6; COECO Office Sys., Inc. v. Rowland, No. 16 CVS 9021, Order Regarding Designation at 1-2 (N.C. Super. Ct. Aug. 26, 2016) (unpublished); Market Am., No. 15 CVS 9658, Order at 3-4.

16. Next, the Court turns to N.C. Gen. Stat. § 7A-45.4(a)(3), which permits designation of actions involving a material issue related to "[d]isputes involving antitrust law, including disputes arising under Chapter 75 of the General Statutes that do not arise solely under G.S. 75-1.1 or Article 2 of Chapter 75 of the General Statutes." The Tecnoeka Defendants argue that UNOX's claims for "anti-competitive conduct and activities, as well as an anticompetitive conspiracy," support designation under section 7A-45.4(a)(3). (NOD 4.) UNOX argues that designation under section 7A-45.4(a)(3) is improper because neither common law unfair competition claims nor claims arising under Chapter 75 trigger designation, and the Complaint does not otherwise implicate antitrust law. (Opp'n Br. 3-7.)

[1] The Court need not and does not opine on whether there is a cause of action for misappropriation of confidential information that is not subject to trade-secret protection. See Edgewater Servs., Inc. v. Epic Logistics, Inc., 217 N.C. App. 399, 720 S.E.2d 30, 2011 N.C. App. LEXIS 2494, at *8 n.2 (N.C. Ct. App. Dec. 6, 2011) (unpublished) (questioning the existence of such a claim). If the Tecnoeka Defendants are correct on that point, they may have a basis for a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim. Regardless, this Court may not convert the claim actually alleged by UNOX into a claim for misappropriation of trade secrets either to save it or to shoehorn it into section 7A-45.4(a)(8).

17. UNOX is correct. This Court has not historically [*9] designated cases based on restrictive covenants in the employment context under section 7A-45.4(a)(3) unless "they included additional claims of trade-secret misappropriation or . . . they asserted claims of unfair competition before unfair-competition claims were excluded by amendments to section 7A-45.4." *Van Gilder v. Novus Techs., Inc., 2017 NCBC LEXIS 46, at 2-3 (N.C. Super. Ct. May 24, 2017) (citing *Cornerstone Health Care, 2015 NCBC LEXIS 65, at 6-7). Having decided that this action does not involve a dispute regarding trade secrets, the Court concludes that designation under section 7A-45.4(a)(3) is improper.

18. WHEREFORE, the Court concludes, having considered the NOD, the Complaint, and the arguments of counsel in support of and in opposition to designation, that this action does not qualify as a mandatory complex business case under either section 7A-45.4(a)(3) or section 7A-45.4(a)(8), and the Opposition is therefore ALLOWED. This action should proceed on the regular civil docket of the Gaston County Superior Court.

19. The Court's ruling is without prejudice to the right of any party other than the Tecnoeka Defendants, if timely, to seek designation of this matter as a mandatory complex business case as provided under section 7A-45.4.

This Court has not historically [*9] designated cases based on restrictive covenants in the employment context under section 7A-45.4(a)(3) unless "they included additional claims of trade-secret misappropriation or . . . they asserted claims of unfair competition before unfair-competition claims were excluded by amendments to section 7A-45.4." *Van Gilder v. Novus Techs., Inc., 2017 NCBC LEXIS 46, at 2-3 (N.C. Super. Ct. May 24, 2017) (citing *Cornerstone Health Care, 2015 NCBC LEXIS 65, at 6-7). Having decided that this action does not involve a dispute regarding trade secrets, the Court concludes that designation under section 7A-45.4(a)(3) is improper.

18. WHEREFORE, the Court concludes, having considered the NOD, the Complaint, and the arguments of counsel in support of and in opposition to designation, that this action does not qualify as a mandatory complex business case under either section 7A-45.4(a)(3) or section 7A-45.4(a)(8), and the Opposition is therefore ALLOWED. This action should proceed on the regular civil docket of the Gaston County Superior Court.

19. The Court's ruling is without prejudice to the right of any party other than the Tecnoeka Defendants, if timely, to seek designation of this matter as a mandatory complex business case as provided under section 7A-45.4.

SO ORDERED, this the 28th day of June, 2019.

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Evidence > Admissibility > Expert Witnesses

HN1[] Admissibility, Expert Witnesses

The court serves as the gatekeeper for expert testimony by ensuring that it both rests on a reliable foundation and is relevant to the task at hand. The evidence's proponent has the burden of establishing both its reliability and its relevance.

Evidence > Admissibility > Expert Witnesses > Daubert Standard

HN2[] Expert Witnesses, Daubert Standard

Daubert neither requires nor empowers trial courts to determine which of several competing scientific theories has the best provenance. Instead, it demands only that the proponent of the evidence show that the expert's conclusion has been arrived at in a scientifically sound and methodologically reliable fashion.

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Damages

HN3[] Remedies, Damages

The use of aggregate damages calculations is well established in federal court and implied by the very existence of the class action mechanism itself.

Evidence > Types of Evidence > Testimony > Expert Witnesses

Evidence > Weight & Sufficiency

HN4[] Testimony, Expert Witnesses

Objections to the factual underpinnings of an expert's investigation often go to the weight of the proffered testimony, not to its admissibility.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Purchasers > Direct Purchasers

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > Remedies

HN5[] Purchasers, Direct Purchasers

Purchasers are injured at the point in time they incur the overcharge. Thus, even if generic bypass may have occurred in a but-for world, this does not negate injury. Direct purchasers may recover the full amount of overcharges. Overcharges are the principal measure of damages for plaintiffs injured as customers.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > Remedies

HN6[] Private Actions, Remedies

Industry manufacturers have a lot of interest in maintaining the accuracy of their forecasts, and such forecasts reflect their own study of the market and analogous experiences of other drugs. The use of defendants' own forecasts to model a but-for world has been held to be a sound economic methodology.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > Remedies

HN7[] Private Actions, Remedies

Damages award should not be offset by the amount of any purchases that would not have been made in a "but for" world.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Adequacy of Representation

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Numerosity

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Commonality

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Typicality

HN8[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Adequacy of Representation

To certify a class, the court must undertake a rigorous analysis to determine whether the putative class satisfies each of the four prerequisites set forth in Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a): numerosity, commonality, typicality, and adequacy of representation. In addition, the putative class must also demonstrate that it satisfies one of the requirements set forth in Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b), that the questions of law or fact common to class members predominate over any questions affecting only individual members, and that a class action is superior to other available methods for fairly and efficiently adjudicating the controversy. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3). To meet this requirement, the putative class must demonstrate that the fact of antitrust impact can be established through common proof and that any resulting damages would likewise be established by sufficiently common proof.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action

HN9[] Class Actions, Prerequisites for Class Action

Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 does not set forth a mere pleading standard but rather, a plaintiff must affirmatively demonstrate its compliance with the Rule. To do so, a plaintiff has the burden to demonstrate by a preponderance of the evidence that Rule 23's prerequisites to class certification are satisfied. Merits questions may be considered to the extent — but only to the extent — that they are relevant to determining whether the Rule 23 prerequisites for class certification are satisfied. The court must determine whether the plaintiff's burden is satisfied under Rule 23 even when that requires inquiry into the merits of the claim.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Numerosity

HN10[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Numerosity

Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(1), to certify a class, a court must determine that the class is so numerous that joinder of all members is impracticable. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(1). While there is no strict minimum number of plaintiffs required to demonstrate impracticability, there is a general presumption that if the named plaintiff demonstrates that the potential number of plaintiffs exceeds 40, the first prong of Rule 23(a) has been met.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Numerosity

HN11[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Numerosity

In determining whether joinder would be impracticable, district courts may consider the following non-exhaustive factors, in addition to the size of the class: judicial economy, the claimants' ability and motivation to litigate as joined plaintiffs, the financial resources of class members, the geographic dispersion of class members, the ability to identify future claimants, and whether the claims are for injunctive relief or for damages. The court may also take into account such subjective factors as the geographic location of proposed class members, the nature of the action, and matters of judicial economy. Courts have certified smaller classes in generic suppression cases where judicial economy favors proceeding as a class action.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Requirements

HN12[] Standing, Requirements

The considerations for establishing antitrust standing are: (1) the causal connection between the alleged antitrust violation and harm to the plaintiff; (2) an improper motive; (3) the nature of the plaintiff's alleged injury and whether the injury was of a type that Congress sought to redress with the antitrust laws; (4) the directness with which the alleged market restraint caused the asserted injury; (5) the speculative nature of the damages; and (6) the risk of duplicative recovery or complex apportionment of damages.

HN13[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Commonality

Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(2), commonality requires a plaintiff to demonstrate that the class members have suffered the same injury. A plaintiff's claims must depend upon a common contention. And, that common contention must be of such a nature that it is capable of classwide resolution — which means that determination of its truth or falsity will resolve an issue that is central to the validity of each one of the claims in one stroke.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Typicality

HN14[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Typicality

Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(3), a court may certify a class only where the claims or defenses of the representative parties are typical of the claims or defenses of the class. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(3). Many courts have found typicality if the claims or defenses of the representatives and the members of the class stem from a single event or a unitary course of conduct, or if they are based on the same legal or remedial theory. Other courts have used Rule 23(a)(3) to screen out class actions in which the legal or factual position of the representatives is markedly different from that of other members of the class even though common issues of law or fact are present. Moreover, Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(4) provides for certification only where the representative parties will fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(4). The moving party is tasked with demonstrating that the interests of the representative party will not conflict with the interests of any of the class members. But interests need not be identical; only fundamental conflicts that go to the heart of the litigation prevent a plaintiff from meeting the Rule 23(a)(4) adequacy requirement.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > Remedies

HN15[] Private Actions, Remedies

An assignee stands in the shoes of his assignor, deriving the same but no greater rights and remedies than the assignor then possessed.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Predominance

HN16[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Predominance

Certification under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3), requires a putative class to demonstrate that the questions of law or fact common to class members predominate over any questions affecting only individual members. Fed. R. Civ. P.

23(b)(3). This inquiry tests whether proposed classes are sufficiently cohesive to warrant adjudication by representation. To meet this requirement, the putative class must demonstrate that the fact of antitrust impact can be established through common proof and that any resulting damages would likewise be established by sufficiently common proof. An individual question is one where members of a proposed class will need to present evidence that varies from member to member, while a common question is one where the same evidence will suffice for each member to make a prima facie showing or the issue is susceptible to generalized, class-wide proof.

HN17[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Predominance

In order to satisfy Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3)'s predominance requirement, the plaintiffs must include some means of determining that each member of the class was in fact injured. Proof of injury, also called injury-in-fact, is a required element of a plaintiff's case in a class action. At the class-certification stage, plaintiffs must only show that antitrust impact is capable of proof at trial through evidence that is common to the class rather than individual members.

HN18[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

Whether a product hop led the plaintiffs to purchase more of the expensive brand product over the cheaper generic product is a fact question for the jury, not to be determined on class certification.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

HN19[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

The prospect that a handful of identifiable class members may be uninjured is not a barrier to class certification.

HN20[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3) carries with it the additional requirement that a putative class demonstrate that damages can be calculated on a class-wide basis. The damages model must be consistent with the putative class's liability case, that is, the defendants cannot be held liable for damages beyond the injury they caused. It is well-established that the individuation of damages in consumer class actions is rarely determinative under Rule 23(b)(3). Rather, where common questions predominate regarding liability, courts generally find the predominance requirement to be satisfied even if individual damages issues remain.

HN21[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

Damages may be demonstrated by a common methodology applicable to the class as a whole.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Superiority

HN22[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

To earn certification, a putative class must establish that a class action is superior to other available methods for fairly and efficiently adjudicating the controversy. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3). In undertaking this analysis, the court examines four factors: (A) The class members' interests in individually controlling the prosecution or defense of separate actions; (B) the extent and nature of any litigation concerning the controversy already begun by or against class members; (C) the desirability or undesirability of concentrating the litigation of the claims in the particular forum; and (D) the likely difficulties in managing a class action.

OPINION AND ORDER

WILLIAM E. SMITH, Chief Judge.

In this putative class action, the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs ("DPPs") allege that Defendants Warner Chilcott (US), LLC, Warner Chilcott Sales (US), LLC, Warner Chilcott Company LLC, Warner Chilcott plc, and Warner Chilcott Limited (collectively, "Warner Chilcott") and Defendants Watson Pharmaceuticals, Inc. and Watson Laboratories, Inc. (together, "Watson"[1] and collectively, with Warner Chilcott, "Defendants") violated federal law through a series of actions intended to delay and suppress generic competition for the oral contraceptive Loestrin 24 Fe ("Loestrin 24").[2] This decision resolves the DPPs' pending Motion for Class Certification.[3] See generally Direct Purchaser [*10] Class Pls.' Mot. for Class Certification, ECF No. 513. For the reasons discussed below, the DPPs'

[1] Warner Chilcott and Watson are part of the multinational corporation, Allergan plc. See Direct Purchaser Class Pls.' Third Am. Consolidated Class Action Compl. and Jury Demand ("DPP Compl.") ¶¶ 18-28, ECF No. 380.

[2] Loestrin 24 is an oral contraceptive with 24 tablets containing 1 mg norethindrone acetate and 20 mcg ethinyl estradiol and 4 placebo tablets with iron. DPP Compl. ¶ 109.

[3] A separate decision on the End-Payor Plaintiffs' Motion for Class Certification, ECF No. 526, is forthcoming.

Motion for Class Certification is GRANTED, and Defendants' Motion to Exclude the Opinions and Testimony of Dr. Leitzinger, ECF No. 570, is DENIED.

I. Background

The Court constrains its recitation to the factual and procedural background relevant to the Motion for Class Certification.[4]

The DPPs are corporate entities that purchased brand and/or generic Loestrin 24 directly from Warner Chilcott or a non-defendant generic manufacturer. Direct Purchaser Class Pls.' Third Am. Consolidated Class Action Compl. and Jury Demand ("DPP Compl.") ¶¶ 16-18. They allege that Warner Chilcott committed fraud on the Patent and Trademark Office in securing the patent for Loestrin 24 and proceeded to file sham litigation to enforce its patent against potential generic competitors. Loestrin, 261 F. Supp. 3d at 318-21. Plaintiffs further allege that Warner Chilcott then settled its sham patent lawsuits against Watson and Lupin Pharmaceutical, Inc. and/or Lupin Ltd. ("Lupin") by making large and unjustified payments in exchange for their agreement to stay out of the Loestrin 24 market. Id. at 321-23. Right before generic entry was set [*11] to occur, Warner Chilcott introduced a drug, Minastrin 24 (a chewable version of Loestrin 24 with added sweetener on the reminder days), to erode the brand Loestrin 24 prescription base. Id. at 323-24. This product hop allowed Warner Chilcott to retain branded sales (in Minastrin 24) once generic Loestrin 24 entered and state automatic-substitution laws kicked in. Id.

This order of events has consequences for the Court's ability to determine — as antitrust law requires — what the world would have looked like but for Defendants' alleged anticompetitive conduct.[5] Because Defendants executed the product hop and pulled brand Loestrin 24 from the market before automatic substitution laws could take hold, there is a dearth of evidence reflecting how the market would have responded to generic entry in a but-for world. See Feb. 11, 2019 DPPs' Mot. for Class Certification Hr'g Tr. ("DPP Hr'g Tr.") 18-20, ECF No. 806. This dearth of evidence means that the DPPs and Defendants, and their respective experts, do not agree on the best methodology to use to construct the contours of the but-for world.

II. Defendants' Motion to Exclude Dr. Leitzinger

Defendants have moved to exclude the opinions and testimony of the [*12] DPPs' proposed expert, Jeffrey J. Leitzinger, Ph.D.[6] They argue that (1) Dr. Leitzinger's opinions are based on "unsupported assumptions provided to him by counsel" rather than scientific method; (2) he improperly assumes that generic drug prices decrease with additional generic entrants, ignoring evidence specific to Loestrin 24 suggesting otherwise; and (3) his methodology for calculating the alleged aggregate overcharge due to generic delay and related calculations is unreliable. Defs.' Mem. of Law in Supp. of Mot. to Exclude the Opinions and Testimony of DPPs' Expert Jeffrey J. Leitzinger ("Defs.' Mot. to Exclude Leitzinger") 1-3, ECF No. 581.

Before dealing with the DPPs' Rule 23 Motion for Class Certification, the Court must address Defendants' challenge to some of the expert analysis that underpins the DPPs' claims regarding what the but for world would look like, who was damaged, and to what extent.

[4] The curious reader may refer to In re Loestrin 24 Fe Antitrust Litig., 261 F. Supp. 3d 307, 314-25 (D.R.I. 2017) ("Loestrin"), to put more flesh on the bones of the following summary.

[5] Reference to the "but-for world" throughout this decision connotes a hypothetical world in which Defendants did not engage in any of the anticompetitive conduct alleged by the DPPs.

[6] Dr. Leitzinger has worked as an economist for over forty years and is the president of Econ One Research, Inc., an economic research and consulting firm. He holds master's and doctoral degrees in economics from the University of California Los Angeles and a bachelor's degree in economics from Santa Clara University. Decl. of Jeffrey J. Leitzinger, Ph.D. ("Leitzinger Report") ¶¶ 1-2, ECF No. 518-3. He has testified in many pharmaceutical antitrust cases in federal court, id. ¶ 2 & n.2, and the Court gleans no dispute over his qualifications to provide an opinion in this matter.

Rule 702 of the Federal Rules of Evidence sets forth the criteria a party must satisfy in order to proffer expert opinion. Rule 702 provides:

> A witness who is qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education may testify in the form of an opinion or otherwise if:
> (a) the expert's scientific, technical, or other [*13] specialized knowledge will help the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue;
> (b) the testimony is based on sufficient facts or data;
> (c) the testimony is the product of reliable principles and methods; and
> (d) the expert has reliably applied the principles and methods to the facts of the case.

Fed. R. Evid. 702.

Counsel for the DPPs provided Dr. Leitzinger four baseline scenarios to consider. They assume that: two generic Loestrin 24 products (one manufactured by Watson, the other an authorized generic manufactured [*14] by Warner Chilcott) enter the market in September 2009; Minastrin either enters the market in July 2013 (which it did in the actual world) or never enters at all; and Lupin launches its generic Loestrin 24 in either July 2013 or, as it did in the real world, January 2016. See Decl. of Jeffrey J. Leitzinger, Ph.D. ¶ 26 (July 30, 2018) ("Leitzinger Report"), ECF No. 518-3. He made sixteen additional calculations applying his damages model to the four baseline scenarios but assuming later generic entry dates. Ex. 7 to Leitzinger Report, ECF No. 518-3. Dr. Leitzinger did not independently verify the scenarios provided by counsel. Leitzinger Dep. 48:6-50:1, 56:12-63:23 (Aug. 30, 2018), ECF No. 621-34.

In his report, Dr. Leitzinger concludes that there is evidence common to the proposed class that demonstrates "with high likelihood" that all DPP class members were injured by Defendants' alleged wrongdoing. Leitzinger Report ¶¶ 9(b), 27, 50. This common evidence includes: literature showing that generic competition converts upwards of 90% of the brand prescription base to generics at prices substantially below the brand price, and increasingly so as more generics enter; Defendants' and generic [*15] manufacturers' forecasts predicting that Loestrin 24 generic competition would lead to high rates of generic substitution at well below the brand price; evidence of the actual market following generic entry in 2014; and that DPP class members serve a wide range of prescription needs. Id. ¶ 27.

The DPPs can be broken into three subgroups of direct purchasers: (1) brand Loestrin 24 purchasers that later bought generic Loestrin 24 once it entered the market ("Brand-Generic Purchasers"); (2) brand Loestrin 24 purchasers that never ultimately purchased generic Loestrin 24 during the class period, even after it became available ("Brand-Only Purchasers"); and (3) generic Loestrin 24 purchasers that never purchased brand Loestrin 24 from Defendants during the class period, and made all their relevant purchases from generic-manufacturer Amneal[7] ("Generic-Only Purchasers"). With respect to Brand-Generic Purchasers, Dr. Leitzinger concludes that the high rate of generic penetration that would have taken hold if generic Loestrin 24 had entered earlier, coupled with the discount on the wholesale acquisition cost ("WAC")[8] that generic purchasers enjoy, would have led Brand-Generic Purchasers to substitute [*16] more of their brand purchases with lower-priced generic Loestrin 24. Leitzinger Report ¶ 50. As a result, Defendants' anticompetitive conduct caused them to incur overcharges. Id.

Mot. for Class Certification ("Defs.' Opp'n to Class Cert.") 14, ECF No. 582. As a result, Amneal agreed to delayed entry of generic Loestrin 24 per Watson's alleged unlawful reverse payment to Warner Chilcott. See Reply in Further Supp. of Direct Purchaser Class Pls.' Mot. for Class Certification ("DPPs' Further Supp. for Class Cert.") Ex. 14 ¶ 2.4, ECF No. 621-3.

Dr. Leitzinger similarly concludes that the Brand-Only Purchasers were injured. In his view, they suffered antitrust injury because, had there been sustained, robust generic competition in the Loestrin 24 market, these purchasers would have responded to their customers' demands and substituted some of their brand Loestrin purchases for cheaper generic Loestrin. Id. ¶¶ 28-32, 50-51; Rebuttal Decl. of Jeffrey J. Leitzinger, Ph.D. ("Leitzinger Rebuttal Report") ¶¶ 28-29, ECF No. 621-1.

Generic-Only Purchasers, in Dr. Leitzinger's view, also suffered antitrust injury at Defendants' hands. In forming this opinion, he uses the benchmark experiences of Minastrin and Ovcon-35 (another oral contraceptive) to demonstrate that as the number of generic competitors increase, the generic discount off the brand WAC increases over time as the market starts to operate more effectively. Leitzinger Rebuttal Report ¶¶ 8, 15, 27; DPP Hr'g Tr. 118-19. Dr. Leitzinger concludes that, in the but-for world, generic [*17] Loestrin would have cost less and thus its purchasers were injured by overcharges caused by Defendants' unlawful conduct. Leitzinger Rebuttal Report ¶¶ 25-27; DPP Hr'g Tr. 118-19. In reaching this conclusion, he determines the brand WAC at each point in time along with the generic discount expected based on forecasts, actual experience, and the number of generic competitors presumed to have been in the market at the time. DPP Hr'g Tr. 118-20; Dr. Jeffrey Leitzinger Slides from DPP Hr'g 9-13, ECF No. 987-3.

A. Dr. Leitzinger's Methodology and Reliance on DPP Counsel's Scenarios

The First Circuit has held that HN3[] "[t]he use of aggregate damages calculations is well established in federal court and implied by the very existence of the class action mechanism itself." In re Pharm. Indus. Average Wholesale Price Litig., 582 F.3d 156, 197 (1st Cir. 2009). Indeed, Dr. Leitzinger's proffered methodology has been accepted as reliable for proving class-wide impact by many courts. See Leitzinger Report ¶ 53 (citing his extensive past work analyzing aggregate overcharges associated with delayed generic entry for direct purchaser plaintiff classes); see also Direct Purchaser Class Pls.' Opp'n to Defs.' Mot. to Exclude the Opinions & Testimony of Jeffrey J. Leitzinger, Ph.D. ("DPPs' Opp'n") [*18] 1 n.3, ECF No. 620 (listing cases in which Dr. Leitzinger provided expert opinion). The Court is satisfied that here, as in other cases, Dr. Leitzinger's methodology calculates damages using common evidence and analysis that does not vary by class member, and leaves room for a range of jury findings. See infra Part III.E.2.

Nor is the Court troubled by Dr. Leitzinger's reliance on but-for scenarios provided by counsel. HN4[] "Objections [to] the factual underpinnings of an expert's investigation[] often go to the weight of the proffered testimony, not to its admissibility." Crowe v. Marchand, 506 F.3d 13, 18 (1st Cir. 2007) (citing Microfinancial, Inc. v. Premier Holidays Int'l., Inc., 385 F.3d 72, 81 (1st Cir. 2004); Int'l Adhesive Coating Co. v. Bolton Emerson Int'l, Inc., 851 F.2d 540, 545 (1st Cir. 1988)). Dr. Leitzinger opines that the DPPs were all impacted by Defendants' alleged anticompetitive conduct, that this impact resulted in antitrust damages, and that both may be proven with evidence common to the class. Leitzinger Report ¶¶ 9, 50. In reaching that opinion, Dr. Leitzinger relied upon class counsel's but-for scenarios, which in turn, class counsel will venture to establish at trial with their fact witnesses and merit experts' reports and testimony. See DPPs' Opp'n 7 ("Dr. Leitzinger concludes that if the jury finds that Defendants unlawfully delayed and suppressed generic competition as Plaintiffs [*19] allege, then there is a high likelihood that all Class members suffered antitrust injury in the form of overcharges."). The Court discerns no reason to throw out Dr.

[8] The wholesale acquisition cost ("WAC") of a prescription drug refers to the list price of the branded drug. Leitzinger Report 28 n.83; see also DPP Hr'g Tr. 16. As discussed below, Dr. Leitzinger conceptualizes generic drug price in terms of its discount from the brand's WAC. See Leitzinger Rebuttal Report ¶ 15 ("While generic suppliers compete with one another, they are also engaged collectively in competing with and diverting sales from the brand. The key metric in this regard is the level of the generic price relative to brand prices, often summarized as the generic discount from brand WAC."); see also Expert Report of Pierre-Yves Cremieux ("Cremieux Report") ¶ 32 n.41, ECF No. 582-1 ("The WAC is the manufacturer's list price to wholesalers before considering discounts, rebates, and other price concessions.").

Leitzinger's opinion and testimony on the basis that he has relied upon scenarios based upon facts and opinions elicited from other witnesses; it is common for experts to rely on such in formulating their opinions, and Defendants may probe their quality and reliability on cross-examination.

What is more, Dr. Leitzinger's model can be adjusted to account for a variety of jury findings during the liability phase — for example, a jury determination that Warner Chilcott would have launched Minastrin 24 earlier in the but-for world can be incorporated into the model and reflected in the damages calculation. See Leitzinger Rebuttal Report ¶ 56 (explaining that his models may be adjusted to respond to various findings by a jury). At this juncture, however, Defendants have not demonstrated that any of Dr. Leitzinger's assumptions are sufficiently problematic to render his opinions and testimony unreliable. Defendants' criticisms, instead, go to the weight of the evidence. See Crowe, 506 F.3d at 18.

B. Dr. Leitzinger's Impact Analysis

Defendants take [*20] issue with Dr. Leitzinger's conclusion that additional generic entrants would have driven down prices because, in their words, Dr. Leitzinger "relies on generalized evidence and averages" and his opinion "is not grounded in the facts of the case." Defs.' Mot. to Exclude Leitzinger 11. Defendants contend that the Generic-Only and Brand-Only Purchasers were not injured by Defendants' alleged unlawful actions. Id. at 10-16.

In pressing this argument as to the Generic-Only Purchasers, Defendants say there "is no proof that Amneal's generic would have had a lower price in a but-for world where generic competitors entered earlier." Id. at 13 (quoting Cremieux Report ¶ 11). Indeed, the analysis of Defendants' rebuttal expert, Dr. Pierre-Yves Cremieux, suggests that the Generic-Only Purchasers experienced flat prices in the actual world after generic entry, and the actual prices paid by many Generic-Only Purchasers did not decline with additional generic entrants. Cremieux Report ¶¶ 11, 53. Because of this, he says, one must look at individualized evidence (the underlying contract, for example) to determine how each purchaser's price reacts to generic entry in the oral contraceptive space where branded generics [*21] abound. DPP Hr'g Tr. 221, 245 (testimony of Dr. Cremieux); Defs.' Mot to Exclude Leitzinger 12.

With respect to the Brand-Only Purchasers, Defendants argue that Dr. Leitzinger's opinion that common evidence can be used to demonstrate injury is "fundamentally flawed." Defs.' Mot. to Exclude Leitzinger 14. They reason that, in the actual world, none of the six[9] Brand-Only Purchasers in fact purchased generic Loestrin 24 — or any other Loestrin product - after it became available in January 2014. Id. at 14-15. At least in part, this can be attributed to wholesalers choosing not to carry generic drugs because many of their retailer customers purchase generics directly from the generic manufacturers.[10] Id. at 14 (citing Cremieux Report ¶ 69 n.92).

In response, the DPPs marshal Dr. Leitzinger's analysis to argue that Dr. Cremieux, along with other missteps, "ignores that, in the but-for world, more generics would have been on the market earlier, and the years of robust

[9] One of the six Brand-Only Purchasers, King Drug Company of Florence, Inc., went out of business in November 2010, and has submitted a declaration stating that, considering its business model, it would have purchased generic Loestrin 24 had it been available earlier. Leitzinger Rebuttal Report ¶¶ 28-29; Decl. of Keith Elmore (Nov. 23, 2018), ECF No. 621-25.

[10] This phenomenon is referred to as "generic bypass". Following generic entry, some wholesalers' customers shift their buying practices to purchase the generic drug directly from generic manufacturers, thereby "bypassing" the wholesaler. Leitzinger Report ¶ 68. As a result, wholesalers may lose volume in their sales. Id. ¶¶ 68-70.

HN5[] The weight of the authority on this issue sides with the DPPs, and the Court adopts those courts' reasoning that, consistent with Hanover Shoe, Inc. v. United Shoe Mach. Corp., 392 U.S. 481, 88 S. Ct. 2224, 20 L. Ed. 2d 1231 (1968), purchasers are injured at the point in time they incur the overcharge. Thus, even if generic bypass may have occurred in a but-for world, this does not negate injury. See Illinois Brick v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 724, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (1977) (holding that direct purchasers may recover the full amount of overcharges (citing Hanover Shoe, 392 U.S. at 494)); see also In re Nexium (Esomeprazole) Antitrust Litig., 296 F.R.D. 47, 55 (D. Mass. 2013) ("Nexium II")("The Supreme Court has 'long recognized [overcharges] as the principal measure of damages for plaintiffs injured as customers.'") (quoting In re Relafen Antitrust Litig., 218 F.R.D. 337, 344 (D. Mass. 2003)).

competition would have driven prices down." DPPs' Opp'n 14. Also, they contend, even if a jury determines there are some uninjured class members, Dr. Leitzinger's model allows for the exclusion of those class members from the [*22] aggregate damages calculation. See Leitzinger Rebuttal Report ¶ 56.

The DPPs, through Dr. Leitzinger, have set forth sufficient, reliable evidence supporting the conclusion that Generic-Only and Brand-Only Purchasers would have purchased cheaper generic Loestrin 24 in a but-for world with sustained and robust generic competition. See id. ¶¶ 28-29. While Defendants fashion a colorable argument on this score, the DPPs have satisfied their burden to produce a "scientifically sound and methodologically reliable" opinion. Ruiz-Troche, 161 F.3d at 85. It will be up to the jury to determine which party's theory wins the day.

C. Dr. Leitzinger's Damages Analysis

Defendants argue that aggregate damages cannot be accurately and readily calculated without reliance on individualized inquiry as to each class member. Specifically, they take issue with Dr. Leitzinger's reliance on unreliable forecasts; failure to account for the effects of generic bypass; inclusion of uninjured purchasers in his calculation of damages; and disregard for what Defendants term "key facts." Defs.' Mot. to Exclude Leitzinger 16.

Dr. Leitzinger's reliance on pre-launch forecasts of generic manufacturers does not render his damages analysis unreliable. [*23] Dr. Leitzinger determined that the forecasts were reliable because the "internal documents were used, among other things, for strategic planning and budgeting, and for production planning[,]" and, additionally, because they "predicted the same type of market-wide impact from AB-rated generic competition described in the literature." Leitzinger Report ¶ 33. It goes without saying that HN6[] industry manufacturers have a lot of interest in maintaining the accuracy of their forecasts, and such forecasts reflect their "own study of the . . . market and analogous experiences of other drugs." In re Namenda Direct Purchaser Antitrust Litig., 331 F. Supp. 3d 152, 181-82 (S.D.N.Y 2018) ("Namenda"); see also id. at 182 ("The use of Defendants' own forecasts to model a but-for world has been held to be a sound economic methodology."); *In re Solodyn (Minocycline Hydrochloride) Antitrust Litig., No. CV 14-MD-02503, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 170676, 2017 WL 4621777, at 8-9 (D. Mass. Oct. 16, 2017) ("Solodyn") (rejecting Daubert challenge to Dr. Leitzinger's reliance on forecasts in an antitrust pharmaceutical case). Moreover, Dr. Cremieux acknowledged that he has no reason to believe that the twenty-two forecasts Dr. Leitzinger considered were cherry-picked to skew the analysis in the DPPs' favor. See DPPs' Opp'n Ex. 5 at 94-95, ECF No. 620-5.

As discussed above, consistent with the [*24] Supreme Court's pronouncement in Hanover Shoe, generic bypass does not affect the DPPs' damages award. See *In re Niaspan Antitrust Litig., No. 13-MD-2460, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92534, 2015 WL 4197590, at 1 (E.D. Pa. Jul. 9, 2015) (holding thatHN7[] damages award should not be "offset by the amount of any purchases . . . that would not have been made in a 'but for' world"); *In re Lidoderm Antitrust Litig., No. 14-MD-02521-WHO, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 24097, 2017 WL 679367, at 14 n.21 (Feb. 21, 2017) ("Courts have also rejected attempts to decrease damages under [a generic bypass] theory."); *In re Prograf Antitrust Litig., No. 11-md-2242-RZW, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 180899, 2014 WL 7641156, at 4 (D. Mass. Dec. 23, 2014) (holding that "reducing damages to plaintiff wholesalers under a bypass defense is inconsistent with Hanover Shoe"); *In re Skelaxin (Metaxalone) Antitrust Litig., No. 12-md-2343, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 66707, 2014 WL 2002887, at 4-5 (E.D. Tenn. May 15, 2014) ("Skelaxin") (rejecting generic bypass theory for offsetting damages).

As discussed above, that Dr. Leitzinger's damages model may include a purchaser that was uninjured does not render his analysis unsound. It is for the jury to determine whether the Generic-Only and Brand-Only Purchasers were injured, and if so, to what extent; and if the jury concludes they were not, these subgroups will be extracted from Dr. Leitzinger's damages model. See Leitzinger Rebuttal Report ¶ 56 (explaining that his models may be adjusted to respond to various [*25] findings by the jury); see also Leitzinger Report ¶ 67 (noting that, to the extent the Court or jury renders legal or factual determinations inconsistent with the assumptions underlying his calculations, an "adjustment can be readily incorporated within the class-wide overcharge formulas, and such an adjustment will be class-wide in nature").

Finally, the key facts with which Defendants take issue are all within the realm of facts the jury may or may not accept during trial and, accordingly, Defendants' criticisms go to the weight, and not the admissibility, of Dr.

Leitzinger's opinion. However, the jury is free to accept, based on Dr. Leitzinger's robust analysis based on sound methodology, that the actual world was too tainted by Defendants' unlawful conduct to give credence to how prices in this market responded to generic entry. See DPPs' Opp'n 14.

Plaintiffs have satisfied their burden by demonstrating that Dr. Leitzinger's opinions and testimony "rest[] on a reliable foundation and [are] relevant to the task at hand." Milward, 820 F.3d at 473 (quoting Daubert, 509 U.S. at 597). Now it is for the trier of fact to weigh the DPPs' evidence, with the aid of cross-examination and Defendants' rebuttal expert evidence. Accordingly, [*26] the Court DENIES Defendants' Motion to Exclude the Opinions and Testimony of Dr. Leitzinger, ECF No. 570.

III. DPPs' Motion for Class Certification

A. Legal Standard for Class Certification

HN8[] To certify a class, the Court "must undertake a 'rigorous analysis' to determine whether" the putative class satisfies each of the four prerequisites set forth in Rule 23(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure: numerosity, commonality, typicality, and adequacy of representation. In re Nexium Antitrust Litig., 777 F.3d 9, 17 (1st Cir. 2015) ("Nexium III") (quoting Comcast Corp. v. Behrend, 569 U.S. 27, 33, 133 S. Ct. 1426, 185 L. Ed. 2d 515 (2013); Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, 564 U.S. 338, 351, 131 S. Ct. 2541, 180 L. Ed. 2d 374 (2011); Gen. Tel. Co. of Sw. v. Falcon, 457 U.S. 147, 161, 102 S. Ct. 2364, 72 L. Ed. 2d 740 (1982)). In addition, the putative class must also demonstrate that it satisfies one of the requirements set forth in Rule 23(b), Nexium III, 777 F.3d at 18; in this case, the putative class argues that "the questions of law or fact common to class members predominate over any questions affecting only individual members, and that a class action is superior to other available methods for fairly and efficiently adjudicating the controversy." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3). To meet this requirement, the putative class must demonstrate "that 'the fact of antitrust impact can[] be established through common proof' and that 'any resulting damages would likewise be established by sufficiently common proof.'" Nexium III, 777 F.3d at 18 (quoting In re New Motor Vehicles Can. Exp. Antitrust Litig., 522 F.3d 6, 20 (1st Cir. 2008) ("New Motor Vehicles")).

HN9[] The Supreme Court has explained that "Rule 23 does not set forth a mere pleading standard" [*27] but rather, a plaintiff "must affirmatively demonstrate [its] compliance with the Rule." Dukes, 564 U.S. at 350. To do so, a plaintiff has the burden to demonstrate by a preponderance of the evidence that Rule 23's prerequisites to class certification are satisfied. Nexium III, 777 F.3d at 27. "Merits questions may be considered to the extent — but only to the extent — that they are relevant to determining whether the Rule 23 prerequisites for class certification are satisfied." Amgen Inc. v. Conn. Ret. Plans and Tr. Funds, 568 U.S. 455, 133 S. Ct. 1184, 1195, 185 L. Ed. 2d 308 (2013); see also Comcast, 569 U.S. at 35 (stating that the Court must determine whether the plaintiff's burden is satisfied under Rule 23 "even when that requires inquiry into the merits of the claim").

The DPPs move to certify a class of 47 members,[11] as defined as:

> All persons or entities in the United States and its territories who purchased brand or generic Loestrin 24 directly from Warner [Chilcott] or Amneal at any time during the period from September 1, 2009, through and until June 3, 2015, and all persons or entities in the United States and its territories who purchased brand Minastrin 24 directly from Warner at any time during the period from September 1, 2009, through and until March 14, 2017 (the "Class Period").
> Excluded from the Class are defendants, and their officers, directors, management, [*28] employees, subsidiaries, or affiliates, and, all federal governmental entities. Also excluded from the class are educational institutions such as universities and colleges.

DPPs' Mem. of Law in Supp. of Mot. for Class Certification ("DPPs' Mot. for Class Cert.") 4, ECF No. 518-1.

B. Numerosity

[11] In the DPPs' Further Support for Class Certification Memorandum, they adjust the putative class from comprising 48 to 47 members. DPPs' Further Supp. for Class Cert. 3 & n.7, ECF No. 621.

HN10[] Under Rule 23(a)(1), to certify a class, a court must determine that "the class is so numerous that joinder of all members is impracticable." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(1). While there is no strict minimum number of plaintiffs required to demonstrate impracticability, there is a general presumption that "if the named plaintiff demonstrates that the potential number of plaintiffs exceeds 40, the first prong of Rule 23(a) has been met." Garcia-Rubiera v. Calderon, 570 F.3d 443, 460 (1st Cir. 2009) (quoting Stewart v. Abraham, 275 F.3d 220, 226-27 (3d Cir. 2001)); see also In re Relafen Antitrust Litig., 218 F.R.D. 337, 342 (D. Mass. 2003) ("Relafen"); *Solodyn, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 170676, 2017 WL 4621777, at 4.[12]

HN11[] In determining whether joinder would be impracticable, district courts may consider the following non-exhaustive factors, in addition to the size of the class: "judicial economy, the claimants' ability and motivation to litigate as joined plaintiffs, the financial resources of class members, the geographic dispersion of class members, the ability to identify future claimants, and whether the claims are for injunctive relief or for damages." In re Modafinil Antitrust Litig., 837 F.3d 238, 253 (3d Cir. 2016), as amended Sept. 29, 2016 ("Modafinil [*29] ") (citing 5 Moore's Federal Practice § 23.22; 5 Newberg on Class Actions § 3.12); accord *Solodyn, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 170676, 2017 WL 4621777, at 4 ("The Court may also take into account such 'subjective factors' as the 'geographic location of proposed class members, the nature of the action, and matters of judicial economy.'" (quoting In re Nexium (Esomeprazole) Antitrust Litig., 296 F.R.D. 47, 52 (D. Mass. 2013) ("Nexium II")). Moreover, "courts have certified smaller classes in generic suppression cases where judicial economy favors proceeding as a class action." *Solodyn, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 170676, 2017 WL 4621777, at 4 (citing Nexium II, 296 F.R.D. at 53 (certifying class of twenty-four or twenty-nine); Dale Electronics, Inc. v. R. C. L. Electronics, Inc., 53 F.R.D. 531, 535-36 (D.N.H. 1971) (certifying class of thirteen)).

The DPPs contend they satisfy the numerosity requirement under Rule 23, arguing that their proposed class comprises forty-seven members, for which they have adduced common evidence of injury, and that joinder would be impractical. DPPs' Mot. for Class Cert. 20-21; Reply in Further Supp. of Direct Purchaser Class Pls.' Mot. for Class Certification ("DPPs' Further Supp. for Class Cert.") 3 & n.7. Defendants counter that, at most, the DPPs' class is made up of 16 members. Defs.' Opp'n to Class Cert. 11-12. First, they argue that 27 members of the proposed class (viz., the Brand-Only and Generic-Only Purchasers) must be excluded because they lack standing and/or a plausible claim of injury-in-fact. Id. at 12. Second, they argue that nine putative class members (or five more[13] must be consolidated because they are no longer stand-alone companies, but rather corporate affiliates of other class members. Id.

1. Generic-Only and Brand-Only Purchasers

Defendants argue that the Generic-Only Purchasers lack antitrust standing under Illinois Brick v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 724, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (1977), and its progeny, because they never directly purchased brand or generic Loestrin 24 and/or Minastrin [*30] from Defendants during the class period. Defs.' Opp'n to Class Cert. 13-17. Illinois Brick, however, is inapposite. See Phillip E. Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law: An Analysis of Antitrust Principles and Their Application ¶ 347 (3d & 4th eds. 2019 Cum. Supp.). Illinois Brick holds that an indirect purchaser - one who purchases product from a defendant's customer rather than the defendant itself (like an End-Payor Plaintiff in this case) - may not recover antitrust damages under federal antitrust law. 431 U.S. at 724. But these Generic-Only Purchasers did not purchase indirectly - or otherwise - from Defendants.[14] [12] As a general matter, a class of 20 or fewer tends to carry the presumption that it is not sufficiently numerous; a class of 41 or more carries a presumption that it is sufficiently numerous; and "[c]lasses with between 21 and 40 members are given varying treatment," depending on the facts of the specific case. Modafinil, 837 F.3d at 250 (quoting 5 James Wm. Moore, et al., Moore's Federal Practice § 23.22)).

[13] Four of these overlap with parties that Defendants allege have no direct injury. Defs.' Opp'n to Class Cert. 19.

[14] Indeed, but for the no-authorized-generic agreement between Warner Chilcott and Watson, the DPPs' theory posits, Generic-Only Purchasers would have made their generic purchases directly from Warner Chilcott. Only because Warner Chilcott had agreed not to market an authorized generic did generic purchasers need to look elsewhere. DPPs' Further Supp. for Class Cert. 13, 15-16.

Instead, the DPPs' theory of injury for the Generic-Only Purchasers is that Defendants, by delaying and suppressing generic competition, caused the Generic-Only Purchasers to pay more for generic Loestrin from non-Defendant Amneal than they would have absent Defendants' anticompetitive conduct. Leitzinger Rebuttal Report ¶ 25. To this point, the DPPs offer evidence of class-wide injury, including: studies observing that generic prices decline after generic entry; business planning documents of Defendants and Loestrin 24 generic manufactures predicting that inter-generic competition [*31] would lower prices; and the actual experience of class savings once the first generic entered the market, with additional savings as competition increased. Leitzinger Report ¶¶ 9(a), 29, 39, 49, 60.

HN12[] The Generic-Only Purchasers also have established that they have antitrust standing under the considerations set forth by the Supreme Court and enumerated by the First Circuit as:

> (1) the causal connection between the alleged antitrust violation and harm to the plaintiff; (2) an improper motive; (3) the nature of the plaintiff's alleged injury and whether the injury was of a type that Congress sought to redress with the antitrust laws . . .; (4) the directness with which the alleged market restraint caused the asserted injury; (5) the speculative nature of the damages; and (6) the risk of duplicative recovery or complex apportionment of damages.

Sullivan v. Tagliabue, 25 F.3d 43, 46 (1st Cir. 1994) (citing Assoc. Gen. Contractors of Cal., Inc. v. Cal. State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 537-45, 103 S. Ct. 897, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723 (1983)). As to the first three factors, Dr. Leitzinger's analysis plainly demonstrates that the overcharges incurred by the Generic-Only Purchasers were the result of Defendants' unlawful conduct aimed at suppressing generic competition; an inference can readily be drawn that Defendants intended both to suppress generic competition and to cause prices [*32] to increase market-wide; and the Generic-Only Purchasers' injury (overcharges from an anticompetitive scheme) is the type the Sherman Act intends to redress.

The crux of Defendants' argument is that their alleged conduct did not directly cause the Generic-Only Purchasers' injury and, therefore, the damages calculation would be too speculative. But the Court is unconvinced. Defendants' alleged unlawful conduct is plainly the proximate cause of the Generic-Only Purchasers' alleged antitrust injury. While Amneal could have charged less for generic Loestrin 24 than the market would have dictated absent robust and sustained generic competition, where Defendants have foreclosed an entire market from additional generic competition, this purported break in causation is not sufficient to save Defendants from liability. See Areeda & Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law ¶ 347 ("[W]e should allow recovery by the umbrella plaintiff purchasing the 'self-same' product the defendants sold in the same clearly defined . . . market."). The Generic-Only Purchasers' alleged injuries are "the direct result of the asserted antitrust violation - they allege they paid higher prices for generic [Loestrin 24] because Defendants [*33] intentionally restricted and manipulated generic competition." See Namenda, 331 F. Supp. 3d at 213; see also In re Lower Lake Erie Iron Ore Antitrust Litig., 998 F.2d 1144, 1168-69 (3d Cir. 1993) (stating, in a market-exclusion case, where there are "no missing links in the causation chain," plaintiffs have standing); Modafinil, 837 F.3d at 264-65 (permitting recovery in a pharmaceutical antitrust case where defendants have engaged in "market exclusion, as it concerns conduct that prevents a competitive market from forming at all"); *Solodyn, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 170676, 2017 WL 4621777, at 10 (certifying a class in a reverse payment and product hop case that included generic purchasers). But see Mid-West Paper Products Co. v. Continental Group, Inc., 596 F.2d 573, 583-84 (3d Cir. 1979) (holding that a non-conspiring competitor of a defendant supplier did not have antitrust standing because of the "tenuous line of causation between [the] defendants' price-fixing and the prices paid by [the plaintiff]").

And, finally, as to the sixth consideration, the Generic-Only Purchasers, as direct purchasers vis-à-vis Amneal, do not present issues of "apportionment" or "burdens of duplicative recovery," in the way indirect purchasers may. Areeda & Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law ¶ 347.[15] The Generic-Only Purchasers are the only purchasers in a position

[15] This Court respectfully disagrees with the conclusion reached on this issue in *Skelaxin, 2014 U.S. DCist. LEXIS 66707, 2014 WL 2002887, at 11. There, the court held that the plaintiffs did not have standing to pursue antitrust damages for "generic overcharges". *2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 66707, [WL] at 1, 11. It reasoned that the causal connection between the defendant's to prove injury and recover damages for the alleged overcharges on their purchases of generic Loestrin 24 from Amneal during the class period under [*34] federal antitrust law.

2. Corporate Subsidiaries

Defendants also argue that nine putative class members should not be treated as separate entities for purposes of the numerosity analysis because other members of their corporate families are also direct purchasers. Defs.' Opp'n to Class Cert. 19-20. This argument gets no traction. The entities are separately incorporated companies, are separately listed in Warner Chilcott's transactional sales data, and are distinct from their corporate affiliates. DPPs' Further Supp. for Class Cert. Exs. 37-44. Because they each suffered independent injury, as reflected in their separately tracked purchases of brand and/or generic Loestrin 24, they are separate for purposes of this analysis. See *Solodyn, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 170676, 2017 WL 4621777, at 4; Namenda, 331 F. Supp. 3d at 207; *Am. Sales Co., LLC, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 137222, 2017 WL 3669604, at 8.

Defendants' remaining attempts to exclude the Generic-Only Purchasers and the Brand-Only Purchasers[16] are intertwined with their attacks on Dr. Leitzinger's methodology and analysis, as well as on whether the DPPs have established that common issues predominate under Rule 23(b). As discussed in more detail above and below, the Court concludes that all forty-seven members are properly included in this class, and thus, the class presumptively satisfies Rule 23(a)(1)'s numerosity [*35] requirement. Garcia-Rubiera, 570 F.3d at 460. Moreover, the Court is further satisfied that joinder is impracticable after considering the non-exhaustive list of considerations, especially judicial economy; the class members' incentives to bring suit individually against their supplier(s); and the geographic dispersion of class members. See *Solodyn, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 170676, 2017 WL 4621777, at 4 (citing Nexium II, 296 F.R.D. at 52). Thus, Rule 23(a)(1) is satisfied.

C. Commonality

HN13[] Under Rule 23(a)(2), "[c]ommonality requires the plaintiff to demonstrate that the class members 'have suffered the same injury[.]'" Dukes, 564 U.S. at 349-50 (quoting Falcon, 457 U.S. at 157). A plaintiff's "claims must depend upon a common contention . . . ." Id. at 350. And, "that common contention . . . must be of such a nature that it is capable of classwide resolution — which means that determination of its truth or falsity will resolve an issue that is central to the validity of each one of the claims in one stroke." Id. The Court concludes that commonality under Rule 23(a)(2) is easily met for this putative class. Each putative class member alleges that Defendants caused overcharges by engaging in an anticompetitive scheme to delay and suppress generic competition.

D. Typicality and Adequacy

HN14[] Under Rule 23(a)(3), a court may certify a class only where "the claims or defenses of the representative parties are [*36] typical of the claims or defenses of the class[.]" Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(3). Courts have noted some uncertainty as to the independent significance of Rule 23's typicality requirement. See 7A Charles Alan Wright & Arthur R. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1764 (rev. 4th ed. 2018). "[M]any courts have found typicality if the claims or defenses of the representatives and the members of the class stem from a single event or a unitary course of conduct, or if they are based on the same legal or remedial theory." Id. (citations omitted). Other courts have used Rule 23(a)(3) "to screen out class actions in which the legal or factual position of the representatives is alleged antitrust violation and the plaintiff-generic purchaser's harm was too attenuated. See *2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 66707, [WL] at 11 (citing *In re Vitamins Antitrust Litig., No. 99CIV5134, 2001 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12114, 2001 WL 855463, at 4 (D.D.C. July 2, 2001)). Moreover, the Court reasoned that, because it was satisfied that the defendants did not intend the plaintiff's harm, they had not satisfied the standing inquiry set forth by the Supreme Court in Assoc. Gen. Contractors of Cal., Inc., 459 U.S. at 537-45. Skelaxin, 2014 U.S. DCist. LEXIS 66707, 2014 WL 2002887, at 8-9. The Court, consistent with its reading of Areeda & Hovenkamp, concludes that in a market exclusion case like the one at bar, as opposed to a price fixing case, intervening pricing decisions of the non-defendant manufacturer do not require the same level of searching inquiry into causation.

[16] Defendants argue that the Brand-Only Purchasers should be excluded from the class because there is no proof that they would have purchased generic Loestrin had it been available. See Defs.' Opp'n to Class Cert. 17-18. For the reasons stated above, see supra Part II.B. (discussing this argument in connection with Defendants' Motion to Exclude Dr. Leitzinger's Expert Report), this argument fails.

markedly different from that of other members of the class even though common issues of law or fact are present." Id. (citations omitted).

Moreover, Rule 23(a)(4) provides for certification only where "the representative parties will fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(4). The moving party is tasked with demonstrating that "the interests of the representative party will not conflict with the interests of any of the class members . . . ." Andrews v. Bechtel Power Corp., 780 F.2d 124, 130 (1st Cir. 1985). But interests need not be identical; only fundamental conflicts that "go to the heart of the litigation prevent a plaintiff [*37] from meeting the Rule 23(a)(4) adequacy requirement." Matamoros v. Starbucks Corp., 699 F.3d 129, 138 (1st Cir. 2012).

Defendants argue that the DPPs do not satisfy Rule 23's typicality and adequacy of representation prerequisites. Defs.' Opp'n to Class Cert. 27-34. Specifically, Defendants challenge the DPPs' class representative Ahold USA, Inc.'s ("Ahold") typicality and ability to adequately represent the class on the basis that: Ahold has no stake in the product hop allegations; Ahold's partial assignment from McKesson only gives it an interest in proving a generic entry date back to March 2011, while other class members' interest reaches back to September 2009; Ahold's purchasing habits are affected differently by the entry of generic products because it is a retailer and not a wholesaler; and Ahold is the only member of the class with an assignment. Id. at 27-29.

Here, as noted above, the putative class members' claims plainly stem from a unitary course of conduct. Ahold's status as a retailer with an assignment does not render its interest in pursuing these claims "markedly different." See Modafinil, 837 F.3d at 251 (holding that, "no matter how intuitively appealing this argument may be, it lacks legal support" and "partial assignees are appropriately considered to be members of a class"); Meijer, Inc. v. Warner Chilcott Holdings Co. III, 246 F.R.D. 293, 296 (D.D.C. 2007) (noting [*38] that the defendants, including Warner Chilcott, admitted that HN15[] "an assignee stands in the shoes of his assignor, deriving the same but no greater rights and remedies than the assignor then possessed." (quoting Fox-Greenwald Sheet Metal Co. v. Markowitz Bros., 452 F.2d 1346, 1358 n.69, 147 U.S. App. D.C. 14 (D.C. Cir. 1971)). Moreover, the assignment gives Ahold a stake in the product hop allegations and purchases of Minastrin 24, as it encompasses "claims [that] relate to those acts alleged against Warner Chilcott in" litigation "to recover allegedly illegal overcharges imposed on purchasers of Loestrin 24." Defs.' Opp'n to Class Cert. Ex. 4; see also DPPs' Further Supp. for Class Cert. 64; DPP Compl. ¶¶ 257-96 (setting forth product hop allegations).

Establishing an earlier generic entry date is also plainly in Ahold's interest: the earlier the entry date for generic Loestrin, "the longer the delay period established, the sooner generic competition ensues, and the lower prices would have been at the start of Ahold's assignment and at the time of Ahold's direct purchases of generic Loestrin 24." DPPs' Further Supp. for Class Cert. 68. Ahold has already filed a Third Amended Complaint that covers the full class period (back to 2009), see DPP Compl. ¶ 297, and it has filed expert reports addressing [*39] and seeking damages for the full class period. See Leitzinger Report ¶ 5 n.4. In blunt, strategic terms, counsel for the DPPs explained that it is in Ahold's individual interest to pursue the whole claim period "[b]ecause the bigger the claim, the bigger the leverage on [Defendants] and hopefully the bigger the settlement [the DPPs will] try to get out of them before we go to trial or while we're in trial". DPP Hr'g Tr. 95:8-12. The Court sees how this would be motivating.

In sum, the Court concludes that Ahold's claims and defenses are typical of the class and is confident Ahold will fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class. Its status as a retailer pursuing claims with an assignment does not render it "markedly different" from the other class members, does not create a conflict with the class, and does not impair its ability to adequately represent the putative class. Indeed, Ahold has been named class representative in many pharmaceutical antitrust class actions, and no court has ever found Ahold to be atypical or inadequate due to its status as an assignee or for any other reason. See, e.g., Solodyn, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 170676, 2017 WL 4621777; Nexium II, 296 F.R.D. 47; Meijer, Inc., 246 F.R.D. 293. Ahold satisfies Rule 23's typicality and adequacy requirements.

HN16[] As stated [*40] above, the DPPs seek certification under Rule 23(b)(3), which requires a putative class to demonstrate that "the questions of law or fact common to class members predominate over any questions affecting only individual members . . . ." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3). This "inquiry tests whether proposed classes are sufficiently cohesive to warrant adjudication by representation." Amchem Prods. Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 623, 117 S. Ct. 2231, 138 L. Ed. 2d 689 (1997). To meet this requirement, the putative class must demonstrate "that 'the fact of antitrust impact can[] be established through common proof' and that 'any resulting damages would likewise be established by sufficiently common proof.'" Nexium III, 777 F.3d at 18 (quoting New Motor Vehicles, 522 F.3d at 20)). "An individual question is one where members of a proposed class will need to present evidence that varies from member to member, while a common question is one where the same evidence will suffice for each member to make a prima facie showing [or] the issue is susceptible to generalized, class-wide proof." Tyson Foods, Inc. v. Bouaphakeo, 136 S. Ct. 1036, 1045, 194 L. Ed. 2d 124 (2016) (internal quotation marks omitted).

1. Predominance: Common Proof of Injury-in-Fact

HN17[] In order to satisfy Rule 23(b)(3)'s predominance requirement, the DPPs must "include some means of determining that each member of the class was in fact injured." New Motor Vehicles, 522 F.3d at 28; see also In re Asacol Antitrust Litig., 907 F.3d 42, 51 (1st Cir. 2018) ("Asacol") ("Proof of injury, also called 'injury-in-fact,' [*41] is a required element of a plaintiff's case in an action such as this one." (quoting New Motor Vehicles, 522 F.3d at 19 n.18). At this stage, "plaintiffs must only show that 'antitrust impact is capable of proof at trial through evidence that is common to the class rather than individual members." Nexium III, 777 F.3d at 24 n.20 (quoting In re Hydrogen Peroxide Antitrust Litig., 552 F.3d 305, 311 (3d Cir. 2008)).

DPPs' common theory of injury is that "every Class member would have purchased at least some lower-priced generic Loestrin [24] instead of higher-priced branded Loestrin 24, Minastrin 24 or generic Loestrin 24 that it did buy." DPPs' Mot. for Class Cert. 16 (quoting Leitzinger Report ¶ 50). Accordingly, in order to prevail on their motion for class certification, the DPPs must satisfy the Court that Dr. Leitzinger's model demonstrates, using common evidence, that each of the DPPs would have substituted some of their purchases of brand Loestrin 24 or Minastrin from Warner Chilcott, or generic Loestrin 24 from Amneal, for cheaper generic Loestrin 24 but for Defendants' allegedly unlawful generic suppression efforts.

Defendants, in turn, argue that individualized inquiry is required for twenty-seven of the forty-eight members of the proposed class to determine injury-in-fact. Defs.' Opp'n to Class Cert. 3. They take issue, [*42] specifically, with Dr. Leitzinger's model establishing injury-in-fact for the Generic-Only and Brand-Only Purchasers. Id. at 3-4. They say that Dr. Leitzinger improperly relies on aggregate trends and averages that do not account properly for the facts of this case and hide the need for individualized inquiry. Id. at 36.

a. Assumptions Regarding Early Minastrin Entry and an Authorized Generic

Defendants challenge Dr. Leitzinger's assumptions relating to whether Warner Chilcot would have launched Minastrin 24 earlier and/or an authorized generic in the but-for world. Defs.' Opp'n to Class Cert. 37-39; Cremieux Report ¶¶ 101-04.[17] But as discussed above, Dr. Leitzinger's sound methodology and analysis cannot be otherwise faulted for accepting reasonable assumptions supported by Plaintiffs' other experts and fact witnesses. See supra Part II.A. Whether Warner Chilcott would have launched Minastrin earlier and/or whether Warner Chilcott would have launched an authorized generic if generics had entered earlier goes to the heart of the merits of this case and is a classic fact question best suited for decision by a jury. See *Solodyn, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 170676, 2017 WL 4621777, at 10 (holding that HN18[] whether the product hop led the plaintiffs to purchase more of the expensive [*43] brand product over the cheaper generic product was a fact question for the jury, not to be determined on class certification).

b. Brand-Only Purchasers

Defendants argue that the DPPs cannot demonstrate that the Brand-Only Purchasers incurred overcharges, because they did not purchase generic Loestrin 24, even after it became available. Defs.' Opp'n to Class Cert. 17-

[17] For what it's worth, as the kids say, Dr. Leitzinger has now performed, in response to Defendants' criticisms, the calculations necessary for jury findings that the product hop was lawful, that the product hop was unlawful, and that the product hop occurred six months before a non-delayed Watson generic entry. See Leitzinger Report ¶¶ 62-65; Leitzinger Rebuttal Report ¶¶ 35-41.

18. The DPPs counter that Dr. Leitzinger's analysis clearly demonstrates that most brand purchases would have been converted to generic Loestrin 24 purchases after generic entry. This, coupled with evidence that the Brand-Only Purchasers are wholesalers in the business of responding to their retail customers' demands, is strong evidence that most Brand-Only Purchasers would have converted at least one brand prescription into a generic prescription in the but-for world. See DPPs' Further Supp. for Class Cert. 33; Leitzinger Rebuttal Report ¶ 29.

The Court acknowledges that the Brand-Only Purchasers' failure to purchase generic Loestrin 24 once it was available "casts doubt on the fact that these entities would have purchased the generic earlier had it been available to them[;]" however, Defendants have not earned "the benefit [*44] of the doubt when the very reason we cannot know the answer to that question is because of their alleged wrongdoing." Namenda, 331 F. Supp. 3d at 209 (citing In re DDAVP Direct Purchaser Antitrust Litig., 585 F.3d 677, 689 (2d Cir. 2009)). The Court reiterates the discussion on this score in relation to Defendants' Motion to Exclude Dr. Leitzinger's Report. See supra Part II.B. The Court is fully satisfied that Dr. Leitzinger's report and testimony establish that the Brand-Only Purchasers each likely would have purchased at least a single prescription of generic Loestrin 24 during the class period in a market with robust, sustained generic competition, given their business interests in meeting their customers' demand. As noted above, it will be for the jury to decide whether Dr. Leitzinger's theory wins the day, in whole or in part; but for present purposes - class certification - his theory more than suffices.

c. Generic-Only Purchasers

Defendants further argue that there is no common proof of injury for the Generic-Only Purchasers, and thus, individual issues predominate. Defs.' Opp'n to Class Cert. 39. Twenty-one of the putative class members purchased generic Loestrin 24 from non-defendant generic manufacturer Amneal and made no brand Loestrin 24 purchases from Defendants. Defs.' Opp'n to [*45] Class Cert. 13, 39. The DPPs allege that Defendants' conduct created market conditions that allowed other sellers, like generic-manufacturer Amneal, to charge higher prices than the market would have allowed absent the unlawful conduct. Leitzinger Report ¶ 49. Dr. Leitzinger's model demonstrates that purchasers obtained greater discounts relative to brand WAC as more generics entered the market. Leitzinger Rebuttal Report ¶¶ 25-27. In reaching this conclusion, Leitzinger relies upon economic literature regarding sustained generic entry; Defendants' and generic manufactures' own forecasts; market-wide sales data showing that prices fell substantially when generic entry finally occurred; and evidence that class members supply brand and generic Loestrin 24 to a broad cross-section of customers. DPPs' Further Supp. for Class Cert. 19-20 (citing Leitzinger Report ¶¶ 28-52).

Defendants retort that branded generics compete differently than generics generally and the actual data demonstrate "meaningful variation in generic prices and no common injury-in-fact/impact as to" the Generic-Only Purchasers. Defs.' Opp'n to Class Cert. 39-42. First, Defendants argue that the price for generic Loestrin [*46] 24 did not uniformly decline as additional generics entered the market. Instead, "the average prices paid for the generic products continued to vary" as generic competition became more robust later in the class period. Id. at 40 (quoting Cremieux Report ¶ 41 & Ex. 5).

But the DPPs do not dispute that the generic Loestrin 24 market did not respond in unison as additional generics entered. To the contrary, Dr. Leitzinger's methodology incorporates the "variation across Class members in the actual prices they paid and in the prices they would have paid", providing averages that "correctly summarize the combined effects of all of these Class members in a single classwide overcharge measure." Leitzinger Rebuttal Report ¶ 45. As discussed throughout, aggregating damages in this way is well accepted.

Second, Defendants argue that the data reveal that generic purchasers showed brand loyalty to their branded generics and did not just shift to the cheapest option. Defs.' Opp'n to Class Cert. 41. But this does not undercut DPPs' allegation that Generic-Only Purchasers would have paid less for the generics they were purchasing. Dr. Leitzinger's model demonstrates that Generic-Only Purchasers would have paid [*47] less for their purchases in a but-for world with robust, sustained generic competition; it does not purport to show that they shifted to the cheapest generic available. Leitzinger Rebuttal Report ¶¶ 25-27.

Third, Defendants point to individual data suggesting that some purchasers that bought generic Loestrin 24 from Amneal did not pay less once additional generic manufactures entered. Defs.' Opp'n to Class Cert. 42. Defendants' analysis, however, focuses in on the actual price a few months following generic entry with two and three generic competitors on the market, thereby failing to consider the effect of sustained, robust generic competition. Leitzinger Rebuttal Report ¶¶ 9-12. In particular, Dr. Leitzinger explains, the effects of manufacturer price concessions (viz., chargebacks and rebates) are often recorded in the data later than the original sale transitions. Id. As a result, Dr. Cremieux's data arguably overstates generic prices by understating the generic discounts. Id.; see also id. ¶ 13 (noting that some of the pricing data used by Dr. Cremieux did not provide any data on manufacturer price concessions). To combat this concern, Dr. Leitzinger uses a combination of transactional [*48] data and manufacturers' forecasts to predict prices in the but-for world. Leitzinger Report ¶ 27; see also id. ¶ 61; Table 1, Leitzinger Rebuttal Report (calculating discount off WAC with one through five generic entrants in the market). At trial, the jury will sort out the details, but for now, the Court is satisfied that the DPPs have evidence common to the class that the Generic-Only Purchasers sustained injury-in-fact.

HN19[] In sum, the DPPs have sufficiently shown that damages may be "demonstrated by a 'common methodology' applicable to the class as a whole." In re Nexium (Esomeprazole) Antitrust Litig., 297 F.R.D. 168, 182 (D. Mass. 2013) ("Nexium I"), aff'd sub nom. Nexium III, 777 F.3d 9 (quoting Comcast 569 U.S. at 30)). While it may be borne out through the evidence at trial that there are a couple uninjured members of the DPP class, it would be a "very small absolute number of class members . . . picked off in a manageable, individualized process at or before trial." Asacol, 907 F.3d at 53-54. The prospect that a handful of identifiable class members may be uninjured is not a barrier to class certification. Cf. id. (holding that class should not be certified in pharmaceutical antitrust case where "any class member may be uninjured, and there are apparently thousands who in fact suffered no injury").

2. Predominance: Common Proof [*49] of Damages

HN20[] Rule 23(b)(3) carries with it the additional requirement that a putative class demonstrate that damages can be calculated on a class-wide basis. Comcast, 569 U.S. at 35. The damages model must be "consistent with [the putative class's] liability case," id.; that is, "the defendants cannot be held liable for damages beyond the injury they caused." Nexium III, 777 F.3d at 18. That said, "it is well-established that '[t]he individuation of damages in consumer class actions is rarely determinative under Rule 23(b)(3).'" Id. at 21 (quoting Smilow v. Sw. Bell Mobile Sys., Inc., 323 F.3d 32, 40 (1st Cir. 2003)). Rather, "where . . . common questions predominate regarding liability, . . . courts generally find the predominance requirement to be satisfied even if individual damages issues remain." Id. (quoting Smilow, 323 F.3d at 40).

In his Declaration and Rebuttal Report, Dr. Leitzinger establishes a "formulaic approach to class-wide overcharges [that] does not require individualized analysis for each Class member." Leitzinger Report ¶ 67. Dr. Leitzinger develops a benchmark demonstrating (1) the prices that direct purchasers would have paid in a but-for world, and (2) the number of Loestrin 24 and Minastrin 24 purchases that would have instead been generic Loestrin 24 purchases in a but-for world. Id. ¶¶ 54, 57, 62. This allows him to calculate overcharges [*50] or, the "difference between the amounts actually paid for [generic and brand] Loestrin 24 . . . and Minastrin 24, and the amounts that would have been paid absent illegal conduct." Leitzinger Report ¶ 57.

Dr. Leitzinger's approach to calculating class-wide overcharges using evidence common to the class involves: (1) using generic manufacturers' own forecasts predicting the effect of genetic Loestrin 24 entry, along with the literature on the pharmaceutical industry, to calculate a generic entry rate, id. ¶¶ 58-59; (2) using pricing data from the actual experience of generic Loestrin 24 entry, coupled with the forecasts from generic Loestrin 24 manufacturers to calculate the discount off the brand price (i.e., discount off WAC) that would have been available in a but-for world, id. ¶¶ 60-61; (3) calculating the but-for volumes of Loestrin 24, Minastrin 24, and generic Loestrin 24 using generic penetration rates over time applied to actual purchase volumes over time, id. ¶¶ 62-64; and (4) multiplying the per unit overcharge by the actual sales volume to determine the aggregate class-wide overcharges incurred by the DPPs, id. ¶ 66, Table 1. Importantly, Dr. Leitzinger's calculations can [*51] be adjusted to account for whichever (if any) anticompetitive conduct the jury finds Defendants liable for, as well as when and how many generic competitors would have entered earlier in the but-for world. Id. ¶¶ 26, 66, 71-72. He further notes that additional adjustments could be made to account for additional or different determinations altering the calculations used in his model (e.g., generic entry dates). Id. ¶ 67.

Defendants contend that the DPPs, using Dr. Leitzinger's methodology and analysis, fail to establish that "damages are capable of measurement on a classwide basis." Defs.' Opp'n to Class Cert. 43 (quoting Comcast, 569 U.S. at 34-35). They argue that Dr. Leitzinger's model is "highly aggregated" and thus inaccurate and unreliable; it ignores Brand-Only and/or Generic-Only Purchasers that may not be injured; and it fails to separate out overcharges from the alleged generic delay and the alleged product hop. Id. at 43-45. In addition, they continue to take issue with Dr. Leitzinger's assumptions regarding Minastrin entry and his failure to account for decreased volume caused by generic bypass in his damages calculation. Id. at 45-47.

Most of these arguments have been addressed above at length. As stated, the DPPs have satisfied [*52] the Court that Dr. Leitzinger's analysis is based on sound and reliable methodology. For this reason, the Court is satisfied that Dr. Leitzinger's damages model does not ignore uninjured purchasers, nor does it improperly assume facts about the Minastrin entry. Moreover, as discussed, see supra Part II.C., the Court sides with the weight of authority in holding that a direct purchasers' damages model need not — and, indeed, should not — offset its damages calculation with any anticipated decrease in volume that may have occurred in a but-for world due to changes in buying practices.

Moreover, the Court rejects Defendants' plaint that Dr. Leitzinger's aggregated model of damages is unreliable. In an attempt to undermine Dr. Leitzinger's model, Dr. Cremieux disaggregated Dr. Leitzinger's calculations and determined that it yielded purchases of Minastrin for class members that never purchased Minastrin and, when the disaggregated overcharges were added back together for one but-for scenario, the result was $56 million less than Dr. Leitzinger's class-wide estimate of $625.2 million. Defs.' Opp'n to Class Cert. 44; see also Leitzinger Rebuttal Report ¶ 43. Dr. Leitzinger's methodology, [*53] as discussed above, involves calculating class-wide averages (including those of actual prices paid, but-for generic penetration rates, but-for brand prices, and but-for generic prices) and plugging them into his aggregate overcharge model. The output is a "single classwide overcharge measure." Id. ¶ 45. This methodology is widely accepted and does not purport to calculate individual damages for any one purchaser. See, e.g., *Solodyn, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 170676, 2017 WL 4621777, 9-10 (certifying a class of direct purchasers based upon Dr. Leitzinger's aggregated damages model). But it is nonsensical to disaggregate the model by taking the class-wide averages for certain measures and applying them to each class member.

This is easily illustrated by considering the application of the average generic penetration rate to Generic-Only Purchasers. By definition, Generic-Only Purchasers should have a one-hundred-percent generic penetration rate in the actual and but-for worlds. Leitzinger Rebuttal Report ¶ 47. If one were to disaggregate Dr. Leitzinger's model and apply the average generic penetration rate to the Generic-Only Purchasers, it results in the assignment of Minastrin 24 purchases to class members who never purchased a brand product. Id. [*54] The Court remains confident in Dr. Leitzinger's model sufficient to send it to a jury — indeed, Dr. Cremieux's alternative calculation, even with its weaknesses, produced a total overcharge damages number that is only 9% lower than Dr. Leitzinger's. Id. ¶ 44.

The DPPs have satisfied the Court that "HN21[] damages may be demonstrated by a 'common methodology' applicable to the class as a whole." See *Solodyn, 017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 170676, 2017 WL 4621777, at 10 (quoting Nexium I, 297 F.R.D. at 182) (internal quotation omitted).

3. Superiority

HN22[] To earn certification, a putative class must establish that a class action is "superior to other available methods for fairly and efficiently adjudicating the controversy." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3). In undertaking this analysis, the Court examines four factors:

> (A) The class members' interests in individually controlling the prosecution or defense of separate actions; (B) the extent and nature of any litigation concerning the controversy already begun by or against class members; (C) the desirability or undesirability of concentrating the litigation of the claims in the particular forum; and (D) the likely difficulties in managing a class action.

Id.

Defendants do not seriously dispute that superiority is met here, but rather regurgitate their arguments that joinder is [*55] not impracticable and common issue do not predominate. See Defs.' Opp'n to Class Cert. 48-50. The Court disagrees, for the reasons stated above, and concludes that a class action is the superior method for fairly and efficiently adjudicating this matter. With that, the DPPs have carried their burden in establishing that their proposed class should be certified under Rule 23(a)(1) and (b)(3) under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

IV. Conclusion

For the reasons stated above, the DPPs' Motion for Class Certification (ECF No. 513) is GRANTED and Defendants' Motion to Exclude (ECF No. 570) is DENIED. The Court further APPOINTS as class representative Ahold USA, Inc., and APPOINTS Hagens Berman Sobol Shapiro LLP, Berger & Montague, P.C., Faruqi & Faruqi LLP, and Kessler Topaz Meltzer & Check LLP as Co-Lead Counsel for the DPP Class.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

[*1000] ORDER GRANTING DEFENDANTS' MOTIONS TO DISMISS

Docket Nos. 34, 36

Plaintiffs are Brian and Alison Sheahan (collectively, the "Sheahans"), Douglas Pope, and Neil and Sandra Wylie (collectively, the "Wylies"). They have filed [2] a class action against State Farm General Insurance Company

("State Farm") as well as three additional companies that are affiliated with one another, namely, Verisk Analytics, Inc.; Insurance Services Office, Inc.; and Xactware Solutions, Inc. (collectively, the "Verisk Defendants").[1] The gist of the operative class action complaint is [*1001] that (1) Plaintiffs and others similarly situated purchased homeowners insurance policies from State Farm and that (2) State Farm, using software developed by the Verisk Defendants, undervalued the replacement cost of Plaintiffs' homes when issuing the policies. After Plaintiffs' homes were destroyed during the October 2017 Northern California wildfires, they did not have enough money from the policies to rebuild their homes. Currently pending before the Court are two motions to dismiss: one filed by State Farm and the other filed by the Verisk Defendants.

Having considered the parties' briefs and accompanying submissions, as well as the oral argument of counsel, the Court hereby GRANTS both State Farm and the Verisk Defendants' motions to dismiss; however, Plaintiffs have leave to amend as to certain claims, as discussed below.

I. FACTUAL & PROCEDURAL [3] BACKGROUND

In the operative second amended complaint ("SAC"), Plaintiffs allege as follows.

"State Farm is the largest property and casualty insurance provider in the United States." SAC ¶ 28. Plaintiffs all purchased homeowners insurance policies from State Farm. See SAC ¶¶ 43-44. State Farm uses software provided by the Verisk Defendants in conjunction with its homeowners insurance policies. See SAC ¶ 23. More specifically, the Verisk Defendants provide two software products to State Farm:

(1) 360 Value, which is a zip code calculator used to determine the initial insurance policy value, and
(2) Xactimate, which is used to determine the cost to rebuild or repair property after a loss.

See SAC ¶¶ 23, 45.

According to Plaintiffs, "with detailed inventory and input, including a site visit to document the insured property . . . , 360 Value can deliver an accurate result," but, "without detailed input[,] it gives [only] a generic, tract-home type cost valuation." SAC ¶ 49. The latter generally leads to an underinsured home. See SAC ¶ 49.

Xactimate is used after a loss to calculate the cost of rebuilding or repairing a home. Similar to above, Xactimate "may be used . . . to arrive at a valuation [4] within a 10% margin of error for construction estimation." SAC ¶ 52. However, "Xactimate is based on manufactured home data, such as trailers and prefabricated homes, to price houses like a kit of parts"; therefore, unless used correctly, Xactimate "does not represent the true cost to rebuild homes in Northern California." SAC ¶ 50.

Plaintiffs allege that State Farm used 360 Value to determine their initial insurance policy limits. See SAC ¶ 57. But because Plaintiffs "were never specifically interviewed about the qualities of their [homes]," 360 Value did not yield an accurate result; accordingly, Plaintiffs' homes were underinsured and, after the wildfires, the policies did not give Plaintiffs enough money to rebuild their homes. SAC ¶ 84. "By underinsuring homeowners [such as Plaintiffs], State Farm has been able to lower the rates on their policy premiums [and] attract a greater volume of business . . . ." SAC ¶ 21; see also SAC ¶ 27.

According to Plaintiffs, State Farm represents that 360 Value is a tool that can accurately and reliably be used in setting insurance policy value. For example:

- In its website, State Farm states: "The most appropriate way to estimate the replacement [5] cost of your home is to hire a building contractor or other building professional to produce [*1002] a detailed replacement cost estimate. Or your State Farm agent can utilize an estimating tool from Xactware Solutions [i.e., a Verisk

[1] See SAC ¶ 39 (alleging that "Insurance Services Office, Inc. and Xactware Solutions, Inc. are subsidiaries of Verisk Analytics, Inc.").

Defendant] to assist you with an estimate." SAC ¶ 55. Plaintiffs suggest that the second sentence above indicates that the 360 Value estimate is just as reliable as an estimate provided by a building contractor.

• Plaintiffs also assert that the "behavior" of State Farm agents indicates that 360 Value "is accurate and can be relied upon to determine policy limits." SAC ¶ 58. No specifics, however, are given on what this alleged "behavior" is.

Based on, inter alia, the above allegations, Plaintiffs have asserted the following claims for relief (against both State Farm and the Verisk Defendants, unless otherwise noted):

(1) Breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing (State Farm only).
(2) Fraud — intentional misrepresentation.
(3) Fraud — false promise.
(4) Negligent misrepresentation.
(5) Negligence.
(6) Reformation of insurance policies (State Farm only).

(7) Violation of California Business & Professions Code § 17200.

(8) Violation of the California Cartwright Act.

(9) Violation of California Insurance Code § 790.03.

(10) Violation [6] of the federal Sherman Act — "Cartel."
(11) Violation of the federal Sherman Act — "Monopoly."
(12) Violation of the federal Sherman Act — "Conspiracy."
(13) Violation of California Products Liability Act.

II. DISCUSSION

A. Legal Standard

> To survive a [12(b)(6)] motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim after the Supreme Court's decisions in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) and Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007), [a plaintiff's] factual allegations [in the complaint] "must . . . suggest that the claim has at least a plausible chance of success." In other words, [the] complaint "must allege 'factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.'"
> . . . . [The Ninth Circuit has] settled on a two-step process for evaluating pleadings:
>> First, to be entitled to the presumption of truth, allegations in a complaint or counterclaim may not simply recite the elements of a cause of action, but must contain sufficient allegations of underlying facts to give fair notice and to enable the opposing party to defend itself effectively. Second, the factual allegations that are taken as true must plausibly suggest an entitlement to relief, such that it is not unfair to require the opposing party [7] to be subjected to the expense of discovery and continued litigation.

Levitt v. Yelp! Inc., 765 F.3d 1123, 1134-35 (9th Cir. 2014).

Notably,

> [t]he plausibility standard is not akin to a "probability requirement," but it asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully. Where a [*1003] complaint pleads facts that are "merely consistent with" a defendant's liability, it "stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility 'of entitlement to relief.'"

Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678.

B. First Cause of Action: Breach of the Implied Covenant of Good Faith and Fair Dealing

The first cause of action — for breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing — has been asserted against State Farm only. Plaintiffs allege that State Farm breached the implied 4 covenant because: (1) "Plaintiffs contracted with State Farm [to] obtain[] coverage sufficient to cover the total replacement and/or rebuild cost of [their] homes to pre-loss condition in the event of loss," SAC ¶ 93; (2) "State Farm promised to use its zip code calculator software [i.e., 360 Value] to calculate replacement costs in such a way as they would be reasonably accurate," SAC ¶ 94; and (3) "State Farm has failed to pay out amounts sufficient to cover the total rebuild costs of Plaintiffs' [8] homes, which is akin to denying [them] the benefit of their bargain." SAC ¶ 98.

In its motion, State Farm argues that the claim should be dismissed because the duty of good faith and fair dealing does not extend beyond the terms of an insurance contract and, here, Plaintiffs have not alleged that State Farm frustrated their right to receive the benefits of their insurance contracts; instead, Plaintiffs' theory is that "State Farm failed to pay more than [the] policy limits." Reply at 7 (emphasis in original).

State Farm is correct. The California Supreme Court has rejected the argument that > the implied covenant [of good faith and fair dealing] can impose substantive terms and conditions beyond those to which the contract parties actually agreed. . . The covenant of good faith and fair dealing, implied by law in every contract, exists merely to prevent one contracting party from unfairly frustrating the other party's right to receive the benefits of the agreement actually made. The covenant thus cannot "'be endowed with an existence independent of its contractual underpinnings.'" It cannot impose substantive duties or limits on the contracting parties beyond those incorporated in the specific [9] terms of their agreement.

Guz v. Bechtel Nat'l, Inc., 24 Cal. 4th 317, 349-50, 100 Cal. Rptr. 2d 352, 8 P.3d 1089 (2000) (emphasis added).

The above principle, although articulated in an employment case, applies equally to an insurance case. That is, the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing does not "'extend[] beyond the terms of the insurance contract in force between the parties. . . . The carrier's duty is to deal in good faith and fairly in discharging duties under the contract.'" Hellinger v. Farmers Grp., 91 Cal. App. 4th 1049, 1068, 111 Cal. Rptr. 2d 268 (2001); see also Tilbury Constructors, Inc. v. State Comp. Ins. Fund, 137 Cal. App. 4th 466, 474, 40 Cal. Rptr. 3d 392 (2006). In the insurance context, "where no benefits are withheld or delayed, there is no cause of action for the breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing." Progressive W. Ins. Co. v. Superior Court, 135 Cal. App. 4th 263, 278, 37 Cal. Rptr. 3d 434 (2005); see also Brehm v. 21st Century Ins. Co., 166 Cal. App. 4th 1225, 1235-36, 83 Cal. Rptr. 3d 410 (2008) (stating that "there can be no breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing if no benefits are due under the policy"; but adding that "'an insurer that pays the full limits of its policy may be liable for breach of the implied covenant[] if improper claims handling [*1004] causes detriment to the insured'" — e.g., delayed payment).

As State Farm argues, in the instant case, Plaintiffs have not alleged that they have been denied any benefits as provided for under the insurance contracts or that benefits have been delayed. Rather, Plaintiffs' complaint is that State Farm represented [10] that it would give them "true" replacement coverage but failed to do so, with the insurance contracts leaving them in an underinsured position. The shortfall stems from the express terms of contract, not from the implementation of its terms. While Plaintiffs may have a claim for fraud or negligence as a result, they have not stated a claim for breach of the implied covenant.

In their opposition, Plaintiffs claim that they have alleged that they were underpaid under the terms of their insurance contracts. See Opp'n at 8. But tellingly, Plaintiffs have not cited any paragraph from the SAC to support their position.

Accordingly, Plaintiffs' claim for breach of the implied covenant is dismissed. The Court, however, shall give Plaintiffs leave to amend, if they can do so in good faith, given Plaintiffs' representation that they can provide specific examples of alleged underpayment inconsistent with the terms of the contract.

C. Second, Third, Fourth, and Sixth Causes of Action: Fraud/Intentional Misrepresentation, Fraud/False Promise, Negligent Misrepresentation, and Reformation of Insurance Policies

The second, third, fourth, and sixth causes of action are all predicated on misrepresentations, [11] either fraudulent or negligent. The basic thrust of these claims is that State Farm misrepresented that 360 Value and/or Xactimate could provide accurate calculations (for determining insurance policy value and replacement cost, respectively). See, e.g., SAC ¶¶ 104-05 (second cause of action for fraud/intentional misrepresentation); SAC ¶ 161 (sixth cause of action for reformation of insurance policies). All of the misrepresentation claims, except for the sixth (reformation of insurance policies), have been asserted against both State Farm and the Verisk Defendants. Both State Farm and the Verisk Defendants have moved to dismiss the misrepresentation claims.

1. State Farm

In its motion to dismiss, State Farm challenges the misrepresentation claims on multiple grounds. One of State Farm's main arguments is that Plaintiffs have failed to allege actual reliance (i.e., on the representation that 360 Value could accurately and reliably determine insurance policy value).[2] State Farm notes, for example, that Plaintiffs have not alleged that they ever saw the statement on State Farm's website that

> "[t]he most appropriate way to estimate the replacement cost of your home is to hire a building contractor [12] or other building professional to produce a detailed replacement cost estimate. Or your State Farm agent can utilize an estimating tool from Xactware Solutions [i.e., a Verisk Defendant] to assist you with an estimate."

SAC ¶ 55 (emphasis added). State Farm also points out that, although Plaintiffs indicated that the "behavior" of State Farm agents suggests 360 Value "is accurate and can be relied upon to determine policy limits," SAC ¶ 58, Plaintiffs never specified what that behavior was, as required [*1005] by Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 9(b).

Confronted with this problem, Plaintiffs have tried to recast their SAC. In their opposition brief, Plaintiffs assert that > they have never allege[d] that they relied on a 360 Value report, nor did they ever see one. Rather, Plaintiffs allege that [State Farm's] agents were either not trained or were trained (poorly) to create and rely on these zip code calculators in issuing policies. Plaintiffs requested copies of initial values and 360 Value reports after realizing their situation. Although Agents failed to disclose the reports or discuss any of the data entry upon which they were based at the beginning, they asserted that the policy underwriting was sound and based upon solid data [13] . This intentional misrepresentation is what Plaintiffs relied upon in entering the policy.

Opp'n at 10 (emphasis added; discussing claim for fraud/intentional misrepresentation). The problem for Plaintiffs is that the SAC as pled does not allege what Plaintiffs assert in the excerpt from the opposition brief. Moreover, even if the Court were to credit Plaintiffs' opposition brief, it is too conclusory for Plaintiffs to claim that each of them was told by a State Farm agent that "the policy underwriting was sound and based upon solid data." Opp'n at 10. Plaintiffs need to allege with specificity what was told as to each of them in order to comply with Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 9(b). See Cafasso v. Gen. Dynamics C4 Sys., 637 F.3d 1047, 1055 (9th Cir. 2011) (stating that, "[t]o satisfy Rule 9(b), a pleading must identify 'the who, what, when, where, and how of the misconduct charged,' as well as 'what is false or misleading about [the purportedly fraudulent] statement, and why it is false'").

The Court therefore dismisses Plaintiffs' misrepresentation claims but with leave to amend. The Court acknowledges that State Farm has also challenged the misrepresentation claims based on disclaimers contained in Plaintiffs' insurance policies (or required by the California Insurance [14] Code) and based on integration clauses contained in the insurance policies. However, the Court cannot assess these defenses without first having an understanding as to what the alleged misrepresentations were in the first place.

2. Verisk Defendants

[2] The parties agree that reliance is an element of each of the causes of action at issue.

Like State Farm, the Verisk Defendants make multiple arguments in support of dismissal of the misrepresentation claims. For purposes of this order, however, the Court need only address one specific argument — i.e., that Plaintiffs have failed to allege that the Verisk Defendants (as opposed to State Farm) made any misrepresentation to Plaintiffs. This argument has merit and nothing in Plaintiffs' opposition specifically addresses the argument.

At best, Plaintiffs suggest that State Farm and the Verisk Defendants have conspired or colluded to defraud Plaintiffs and other policyholders. See AREI II Cases, 216 Cal. App. 4th 1004, 1021, 157 Cal. Rptr. 3d 368 (2013) (stating that "'[c]onspiracy is not a cause of action, but a legal doctrine that imposes liability on persons who, although not actually committing a tort themselves, share with the immediate tortfeasors a common plan or design in its perpetration'[;] [a] civil conspiracy 'must be activated by the commission of an actual tort'"). But Plaintiffs have only [15] asserted in conclusory terms that State Farm and the Verisk Defendants engaged in some kind of conspiracy. There are no concrete factual allegations to support the claim. In fact, it is notable that Plaintiffs have conceded in their SAC that 360 Value and Xactimate can be used to yield accurate results. There is nothing to suggest that [*1006] State Farm and the Verisk Defendants had an agreement pursuant to which State Farm would use the software in a manner that would predictably yield inaccurate results. Indeed, nothing in the SAC even suggests that the Verisk Defendants knew (or should have known) that State Farm used 360 Value or Xactimate in such a way as to yield inaccurate results and encouraged State Farm to use the software in such a way.

Accordingly, the Court dismisses the misrepresentation claims against the Verisk Defendants. The dismissal is with leave to amend; however, Plaintiffs are admonished that, if they are going to allege a conspiracy, the allegations must satisfy the specificity requisites of Twombly/Iqbal and must be supported by good faith as required by Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 11.

D. Fifth Cause of Action: Negligence

In the fifth cause of action for negligence, Plaintiffs allege that "Defendants [16] represented to Plaintiffs that they had a software tool that could produce an estimate equal to that of a contractor that could be relied upon to accurately calculate the costs of replacing or reconstructing Plaintiffs' homes following a loss event." SAC ¶ 148. Given this allegation, the negligence claim is duplicative of the claim for negligent misrepresentation and the Court need not entertain any additional arguments made by State Farm and the Verisk Defendants (e.g., that they owed no duty to Plaintiffs).

As above, Plaintiffs are given leave to amend.

E. Seventh Cause of Action: Violation of California Business & Professions Code § 17200

In the seventh cause of action, Plaintiffs allege a violation of California Business & Professions Code § 17200. Plaintiffs invoke all three prongs of § 17200 — i.e., fraudulent, unlawful, and unfair conduct.

To the extent Plaintiffs claim fraudulent conduct, the analysis above for the misrepresentation claims is applicable here.

To the extent Plaintiffs assert unlawful conduct, the SAC fails to state a claim for relief. Plaintiffs claim that Defendants violated 10 California Code of Regulations § 2695.183 (titled "Standards for Estimates of Replacement Value") but that regulation has no applicability to the Verisk Defendants because they are not insurance companies and, further, is not applicable [17] to State Farm because the regulation did not go into effect until June 2011 and Plaintiffs have not alleged that there was a noncompliant estimate after the regulation went into effect.

To the extent Plaintiffs allege unfair conduct because State Farm did not include certain expenses in its estimate (i.e., regardless of what § 2695.183 requires), that claim is not facially implausible but is viable against State Farm only.

Accordingly, the bulk of Plaintiffs' § 17200 claim, as currently pled, is problematic. Moreover, some of the remedies Plaintiffs' seek for the § 17200 claim are problematic. For example, Plaintiffs ask that their insurance claims be "adjust[ed] . . . without respect to the policy limits set forth in their homeowners insurance policies." SAC ¶ 178. This request for an adjustment amounts to a request for monetary damages, which is not cognizable for a violation of § 17200. See, e.g., Tucker v. Pac. Bell Mobile Servs., 208 Cal. App. 4th 201, 226, 145 Cal. Rptr. 3d 340 (2012) (stating that "[t]he scope of the remedies available under the UCL . . . is limited"; because "[a] UCL action is equitable in nature . . . [,] damages cannot be recovered" and a plaintiff is "generally limited [*1007] to injunctive relief and restitution") (internal quotation marks omitted); see also [18] *Saitsky v. DirecTV, Inc., No. CV 08-7918 AHM (CWx), 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 134817, at 5 (C.D. Cal. Sep. 22, 2009) (stating that "[r]emedies for private individuals bringing suit under the UCL are limited to restitution and injunctive relief" and that, "[i]n the context of the UCL, restitution is limited to the return of property or funds which the plaintiff has an ownership interest (or is claiming through someone with an ownership interest)") (internal quotation marks omitted). Also, to the extent Plaintiffs ask for an order "compelling State Farm to provide 'Truth in Insurance' disclosures at policy issuance, so that insureds understand the basis of the policy, the level of insurance and the maximum coverage afforded by the policy," SAC, Prayer for Relief ¶ 8(e), the relief is inappropriate for two reasons: (1) the request invades areas that are more appropriate for the California legislature, cf. Crusader Ins. Co. v. Scottsdale Ins. Co., 54 Cal. App. 4th 121, 138, 62 Cal. Rptr. 2d 620 (1997) (stating that "[t]he question of what type or level of [insurance] regulation is adequate or appropriate is uniquely a question for executive or legislative policy choice"; adding that plaintiff's "complaints are . . . properly directed either to the Department of Insurance or to the Legislature"), and (2) the request is largely unnecessary or moot because California law already provides [19] for such relief through California Insurance Code § 10101 et seq. See Cal. Ins. Code § 10101 (providing that "no policy of residential property insurance may be first issued or . . . . initially renewed in this state by any insurer unless the named insured is provided a copy of the California Residential Property Insurance disclosure statement as contained in Section 10102").

F. Ninth Cause of Action: Violation of California Insurance Code § 790.03

In the ninth cause of action, Plaintiffs assert a violation of California Insurance Code § 790.03, which provides that certain conduct constitutes "unfair methods of competition and unfair and deceptive acts or practices in the business of insurance." Cal. Ins. Code § 790.03. According to Plaintiffs, State Farm has violated § 790.03(a), (b), (c), and (h). See id. § 790.03(a) (referring to the making of "any estimate . . . or statement misrepresenting the terms of any policy issued or to be issued or the benefits or advantages promised thereby"); id. § 790.03(b) (referring to the making or dissemination of "any statement . . . with respect to the business of insurance . . . which is untrue, deceptive, or misleading, and which is known, or which by the exercise of reasonable care should be known, to be untrue, deceptive, or misleading"); id. § 790.03(c) (referring to the entering of "any agreement to commit . . . any act of boycott, coercion, or intimidation [20] resulting in or tending to result in unreasonable restraint of, or monopoly in, the business of insurance"); id. § 790.03(h) (referring to "a general business practice [of] any of the following unfair claims settlement practices: (1) Misrepresenting to claimants pertinent facts or insurance policy provisions relating to any coverages at issue," etc.).

In their motions, Defendants argue that the § 790.03 claim should be dismissed because § 790.03 does not give rise to a private cause of action. Defendants are correct. See Moradi-Shalal v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Cos., 46 Cal. 3d 287, 305, 250 Cal. Rptr. 116, 758 P.2d 58 (1988) (stating that "nothing we hold herein would prevent the Legislature from creating additional civil or administrative remedies, including, of course, creation of a private cause of action for violation of [*1008] section 790.03" but "thus far the Legislature has not manifested an intent to create such a private cause of action"); see also Copelan v. Infinity Ins. Co., 728 F. App'x 724, 726 (9th Cir. 2018) (stating that § 790.03 "does not authorize a private cause of action"); Zhang v. Superior Court, 57 Cal. 4th 364, 384, 159 Cal. Rptr. 3d 672, 304 P.3d 163 (2013) (stating that, "[w]hen the Legislature enacted the [Unfair Insurance Practices Act, § 790 et seq.], it contemplated only administrative enforcement by the Insurance Commissioner").

In their opposition, Plaintiffs do not directly address the above authority, simply stating that they > are in communication with various politicians, local[,] [21] state, and national representatives, and the Attorney General for California and another state to discuss these issues. [They] ask for additional time to complete diligence with these officials, to September 1, 2019, to get a final answer whether the Attorney General of California will join in this action.

State Farm Opp'n at 22. That request is denied. If the state or the Insurance Commissioner wishes to take action against State Farm, then it or he/she may do so but Plaintiffs have no private right of action and there is no reason to delay dismissing their claim.

G. Thirteenth Cause of Action: Violation of California Products Liability Act

In the thirteenth cause of action, Plaintiffs assert a violation of the so-called "California Products Liability Act." Plaintiffs claim both defective design and a failure to warn. According to Plaintiffs, "State Farm designed and sold a defective insurance product, which was inherently a defective product, at the time that the insurance policy was issued, because it used [the Verisk Defendants'] defective data and software." SAC ¶ 214; see also State Farm Opp'n at 24 (arguing that the software is "defective" because it do[es] not and cannot provide [22] consistent and reliable data"). In addition, State Farm "failed to warn [of] the potential risk of not covering the policyholder's actual cost to rebuild following a total loss of home." SAC ¶ 217.

As an initial matter, the Court dismisses the claim because there is no "California Products Liability Act." Moreover, even if the Court were to construe the claim as one under the common law, the claim is still not viable. As alleged, 360 Value and Xactimate are, in and of themselves, not defective. The SAC concedes these tools can yield accurate results if properly employed. Plaintiffs' criticism concerns how State Farm uses the software to achieve underinsurance. In addition, "a products liability action may be brought only by one who has already suffered a physical injury to his or her person of property, and the plaintiff in a products liability action is limited to recovering damages for such physical injuries." Cty. of Santa Clara v. Atl. Richfield Co., 137 Cal. App. 4th 292, 310, 40 Cal. Rptr. 3d 313 (2006). Here, Plaintiffs are not claiming physical injuries to themselves or to their properties, but rather are asserting economic loss. See Jimenez v. Superior Court, 29 Cal. 4th 473, 482, 127 Cal. Rptr. 2d 614, 58 P.3d 450 (2002) (stating that "[d]amages available under strict products liability do not include economic loss, which includes damages for inadequate value, [23] costs of repair and replacement of the defective product or consequent loss of profits — without any claim of personal injury or damages to other property") (internal quotation marks omitted); Sacramento Reg'l Transit Dist. v. Grumman Flxible, 158 Cal. App. 3d 289, 293, 204 Cal. Rptr. 736 (1984) (stating that, "where damage consists solely of 'economic losses,' recovery on a theory of products liability is precluded"). [*1009] Given the above, the Court need not address Defendants' arguments that products liability law does not apply to insurance and/or software. The claim is dismissed with prejudice.

H. Eighth, Tenth, Eleventh, and Twelfth Causes of Action: Violation of the California Cartwright Act and the Federal Sherman Act (Cartel, Monopoly, and Conspiracy)

The eighth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth causes of action are antitrust claims brought pursuant to state and federal law — respectively, the Cartwright Act and the Sherman Act. Plaintiffs label the three Sherman Act claims as "cartel," "monopoly," and "conspiracy," although it is not clear why; the Sherman Act provides for two causes of action, one under 15 U.S.C. § 1 and the other under § 2. See 15 U.S.C. § 1 (providing that that "[e]very contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, [24] or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal"); id. § 2 (imposing liability on "[e]very person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations").

1. Allegations in the SAC

The allegations in the SAC with respect to the antitrust claims are far from a model of clarity. However, Plaintiffs' position seems to be as follows: State Farm has engaged in predatory pricing, which is part of a conspiracy with the Verisk Defendants. State Farm deliberately sells inadequate homeowners insurance (i.e., not enough to cover "true" replacement cost) so that it can offer a product cheaper than that offered by the competition. Because the insurance is cheaper, State Farm can sell at a greater volume. Although Plaintiffs make reference to State Farm selling insurance "below cost," see, e.g., SAC ¶¶ 182-83, it does not appear that Plaintiffs are using that phrase in its ordinary sense — i.e., State Farm selling insurance at a price cheaper than what it actually costs. Rather, Plaintiffs seem to be using "below cost" to refer to State Farm's [25] alleged practice of selling inadequate insurance, which allows it to sell insurance at a cheaper price compared to insurance offered by other companies (which presumably offer "true" replacement cost at a higher price).

If the Court considers only those allegations in the SAC, then there are various reasons why the antitrust claims are deficient. For example, for the Cartwright Act claim:

• Plaintiffs indicate that the Cartwright Act claim is based on California Business & Professions Code § 16727. Section 16727 provides in relevant part that "[i]t shall be unlawful for any person . . . to fix a price charged [for goods], or discount from . . . such price, on the condition, agreement or understanding that the . . . purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods . . . or services of a competitor or competitors of the . . . seller, where the effect of such . . . sale . . . or such condition, agreement or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of trade or commerce in any section of the State." Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 16727. Given the text of the statute, the statute does not appear to have any application to the instant case. For example, Plaintiffs have not alleged in the SAC that State Farm is fixing a [*1010] price [26] for its insurance on the condition that a homeowner not use or deal in the goods or services of a competitor. Nor have Plaintiffs alleged that the Verisk Defendants are fixing a price for their software on the condition that State Farm or another insurance company not use or deal in the goods or services of a competitor. See also Feitelson v. Google Inc., 80 F. Supp. 3d 1019, 1033 (N.D. Cal. 2015) (noting that "Section 16727 of the Cartwright Act is based on § 3 of the Clayton Act and has a similar scope," and "Section 3 of the Clayton Act prohibits tying and exclusive dealings in the lease, sale, or contract for sale of 'goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities'").

• Plaintiffs have suggested a Cartwright Act claim based on a statute that is not part of the Act — namely, California Business & Professions Code which provides that "[i]t is unlawful for any person engaged in business within this State to sell any article or product at less than the cost thereof to such vendor, or to give away any article or product, for the purpose of injuring competitors or destroying competition." Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17043. Aside from this problem, the claim is flawed because, as noted above, it does not appear that Plaintiffs are using "below cost" in its ordinary sense — i.e., State Farm [27] selling insurance at a price cheaper than what it actually costs. Rather, Plaintiffs seem to be using "below cost" to refer to State Farm's alleged practice of selling inadequate insurance, which allows it to sell insurance at a cheaper price compared to insurance offered by other companies (which presumably offer "true" replacement cost at a higher price).

Similarly, the §§ 1 and 2 Sherman Act claims are deficient[3]:

• For the §§ 1 and 2 claims, Plaintiffs have not clearly alleged what the relevant market is (e.g., insurance, data analytics, some combination of both?), nor have Plaintiffs clearly alleged market power. See Newcal Indus. v. Ikon Office Sol., 513 F.3d 1038, 1044 (9th Cir. 2008) (stating that, "[i]n order to state a valid claim under the Sherman Act, a plaintiff must allege that the defendant has market power within a 'relevant market'[;] [t]hat is, the plaintiff must allege both that a 'relevant market' exists and that the defendant has power within that market"). "Market power is the ability to raise price profitability by restricting output.'" DocMagic, Inc. v. Ellie Mae, Inc., 745 F. Supp. 2d 1119, 1136 (N.D. Cal. 2010). "A plaintiff can show market power directly, by establishing that the defendant, by actually reducing its own output, raised market prices[] or indirectly, by showing that the defendant has a dominant share [28] of the market, that there are significant barriers to entry into that market, and that existing competitors cannot increase their production in the short run." Id.

• For the §§ 1 and 2 claims, it is not clear that Plaintiffs' assertion of predatory price fixing is viable given that they are not making an argument [*1011] of "below cost" in the ordinary sense.

• For the §§ 1 and 2 claims, the SAC does not adequately allege a conspiracy between State Farm and the Verisk Defendants. As noted above, the allegations of conspiracy are too conclusory.

• For the § 2 claim, Plaintiffs have not made any substantive allegations on the possession of monopoly power or the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power. See Allied Orthopedic Appliances Inc. v. Tyco Health

[3] The Court does not address the Verisk Defendants' contention that the McCarran-Ferguson Act bars the Sherman Act claims because, even assuming the Act is not a bar, Plaintiffs' claims fail.

> Care Grp. LP, 592 F.3d 991, 998 (9th Cir. 2010) (stating that "[t]here are three essential elements to a successful claim of Section 2 monopolization: (a) the possession of monopoly power in the relevant market; (b) the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power; and (c) causal antitrust injury") (internal quotation marks omitted). Monopoly power is "when a party has sufficient market power to exclude competition or control prices." DocMagic, 745 F. Supp. 2d at 1136.

Finally, as to all the antitrust claims, Plaintiffs fail to allege any antitrust injury. "Antitrust injury is 'injury [29] of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes the [antitrust] defendants' acts unlawful.'" Chip-Mender, Inc. v. Sherwin-Williams Co., No. C 05-3465 PJH, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2176, at *14 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 3, 2006). In the SAC as pled, Plaintiffs suggest that State Farm's conduct has "disadvantag[ed] . . . other insurance companies not using [the Verisk Defendants'] software, methods and data," SAC ¶ 181, but, elsewhere in the pleading, Plaintiffs indicate that the Verisk Defendants do not limit distribution of their software tools to State Farm only. See SAC ¶ 45 (alleging that the Verisk Defendants "have two software products which they provide to State Farm and other national insurers"); SAC ¶ 201 (alleging that "the Xactware construction cost estimating software has become ubiquitous in the home insurance market"). At oral argument, Plaintiffs reaffirmed that, because of the Verisk Defendants' domination of the software tools market for insurance companies, virtually all insurance companies are using their tools and causing consumers throughout the marketplace to suffer underinsurance. If so, as noted below, there is no injury to competitors [30] of State Farm; the other insurers are similarly situated.

Moreover, antitrust injury is injury that is suffered by competitors or consumers as a result from anti-competitive monopolistic practices. Here, Plaintiffs are neither. They are not competitors of State Farm or the Verisk Defendants. They are not direct consumers of the Verisk Defendants; any claim Plaintiffs might conceivably have as indirect purchasers of 360 Value and Xactimate (factually a stretch) would be barred by Illinois Brick Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 729-30, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (1977) (indicating that only direct purchasers, and not indirect purchasers, are injured by an antitrust violation; indirect purchasers cannot claim antitrust injury on a theory that an overcharge was passed on to them by the direct purchasers). See also Apple Inc. v. Pepper, 139 S. Ct. 1514, 203 L. Ed. 2d 802 (2019) (where iPhone owners sued Apple for unlawful monopolization of the aftermarket for iPhone apps, holding that iPhone owners were direct purchasers from Apple under Illinois Brick). The harm Plaintiffs (and other consumers) have suffered is not the anti-competitive result (such as paying higher prices), of, e.g., unlawful monopolistic power. Rather, [*1012] it stems from the misuse of software and alleged misrepresentations by State Farm. While this may constitute harm resulting [31] from, e.g., breach of contract, misrepresentation, or negligence, it is not antitrust injury.

Accordingly, based on the allegations in the SAC, Plaintiffs have failed to state any antitrust claim.

2. Allegations in Opposition

Implicitly recognizing that the antitrust claims as pled are problematic, Plaintiffs have in their opposition dramatically overhauled the factual predicate for their antitrust claims, and who is harmed as a result. Plaintiffs have effectively abandoned a Cartwright Act claim and tried instead to assert Sherman Act claims only. As discussed below, the overhauled Sherman Act claims — as characterized in the opposition — are still deficient.

a. Section 1 Claim

Plaintiffs now assert as the factual predicate for their § 1 claim that the Verisk Defendants and "the insurance industry in general," including State Farm, have an agreement "to restrain trade by falsely estimating construction in a manner that affects domestic commerce." Opp'n (Verisk) at 13. In other words, no longer are the Verisk Defendants and State Farm conspiring to the detriment of State Farm's competition (i.e., other insurance companies). Under their revised theory, all of the insurance companies are conspiring with [32] the Verisk Defendants to the harm of, e.g., contractors who lost business because they could not rebuild based on the limited insurance proceeds available under the policies. See Opp'n (Verisk) at 13 (stating that "Sheahan's contractor is available to testify that he engaged and then lost over $10-20 million in business when clients could not afford to build due to insurance undervaluation and claims process challenges").

Plaintiffs describe the conspiracy as a hub-and-spoke cartel. See Opp'n (Verisk) at 13-14; see also Howard Hess Dental Labs. Inc. v. Dentsply Int'l, Inc., 602 F.3d 237, 255 (3d Cir. 2010) (explaining that a hub-and-spoke conspiracy "'involves a hub, generally the dominant purchaser or supplier in the relevant market, and the spokes, made up of the distributors involved in the conspiracy. The rim of the wheel is the connecting agreements among the horizontal competitors (distributors) that form the spokes'"). An example of a hub-and-spoke conspiracy is where "a vertical player participates in and facilitates a horizontal conspiracy" — e.g., to fix prices. See United States v. Apple Inc., 952 F. Supp. 2d 638, 690 (S.D.N.Y. 2013). According to Plaintiffs, in the instant case, "Verisk is the hub of the cartel"; State Farm and other insurance companies are spokes, i.e., competing entities that have entered into vertical agreements [33] with Verisk"; and "all insurers utilizing Verisk tools are the rim of the cartel" who have horizontal agreements with one another. Opp'n (Verisk) at 14.

The basic problem with Plaintiffs' hub-and-spoke conspiracy theory is that Plaintiffs' assertion of a conspiracy — both vertical and horizontal — is entirely conclusory. See Howard Hess Dental, 602 F.3d at 255 (stating that, "even assuming the Plaintiffs have adequately identified the hub (Dentsply) as well as the spokes (the Dealers), we conclude that the amended complaint lacks any allegation of an agreement among the Dealers themselves[;] [t]he amended complaint states only in a conclusory manner that all of the defendants — Dentsply and all the Dealers included — conspired and knew about the alleged plan to maintain Dentsply's market position"). Plaintiffs suggest that a conspiracy may be inferred [*1013] because (1) the Verisk Defendants require each insurance company who contracts with them to provide its construction and claim cost information which the Verisk Defendants then share with all contracting insurance companies, see Opp'n (Verisk) at 16 and (2) the contracting insurance companies are all able to pay out less if they use 360 Value to underinsure. See Opp'n (Verisk) [34] at 15. But it is entirely speculative to assert there is an agreement among insurers to share information to their collective benefit with the purposes of harming the consuming public. Indeed, at oral argument, Plaintiffs' counsel stated that different insurers use different algorithms to determine insurance value with some being more generous than others. This is not emblematic of a conspiratorial agreement amongst insurers. At most, Plaintiffs assert allegations consistent with conspiracy but, as the Supreme Court has made clear, that does not mean that a conspiracy is plausible under Twombly. See In re Animation Workers Antitrust Litig., 123 F. Supp. 3d 1175, 1208-09 (N.D. Cal. 2015) (noting that, per Twombly, "[a]t the pleading stage, a complaint claiming conspiracy, to be plausible, must plead 'enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest that an agreement was made,' i.e., it must provide 'some factual context suggesting [that the parties reached an] agreement,' not facts that would be 'merely consistent' with an agreement").

Moreover, even if Plaintiffs did adequately allege a conspiracy, it is far from clear what the purported restraint of trade is. See 15 U.S.C. § 1 (providing that that "[e]very contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in [35] restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal"). And even if these deficiencies could be overcome, for the reasons stated above, it is not clear what the antitrust injury would be.

b. Section 2 Claim

For the § 2 claim, Plaintiffs now suggest that they have a claim for illegal monopoly against the Verisk Defendants and a claim for attempted monopolization against State Farm. See Verisk Opp'n at 16. Presumably, Plaintiffs assert illegal monopoly against the Verisk Defendants because they have ">85% market share," Opp'n (Verisk) at 16, but assert only attempted monopolization against State Farm because it has only "10.05% market share," although that is "nearly double that of Berkshire Hathaway Group at 5.95% in the number two slot." Opp'n (Verisk) at 18.

"There are three essential elements to a successful claim of Section 2 monopolization: (a) the possession of monopoly power in the relevant market; (b) the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power; and (c) causal antitrust injury." Allied Orthopedic, 592 F.3d at 998 (internal quotation marks omitted). At the very least, the monopolization claim against the Verisk Defendants is not viable because, inter alia, Plaintiffs have not explained how they [36] acquired or maintained monopoly power in an illegal way. The fact that the Verisk Defendants have been growing over the years in and of itself is not in and of itself an antitrust problem. See Verizon Communs., Inc. v. Law Offices of Curtis V. Trinko, LLP, 540 U.S. 398, 407, 124 S. Ct. 872, 879, 157 L. Ed. 2d 823 (2004) (noting that the willful acquisition or maintenance of monopoly power must be "'distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident'"; also stating that, "[t]o safeguard the incentive to innovate, the possession of monopoly power will not be found unlawful unless it is accompanied by an element of anticompetitive conduct") (emphasis omitted). Moreover, as discussed [*1014] above, Plaintiffs would not appear to have standing given they are not direct purchasers of the Verisk Defendants' products.

As for attempted monopolization, there are also three elements: "'(1) that the defendant has engaged in predatory or anticompetitive conduct with (2) a specific intent to monopolize and (3) a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power.'" Cascade Health Solutions v. PeaceHealth, 515 F.3d 883, 893 (9th Cir. 2008). The claim against State Farm for attempted monopolization fails, inter alia, because Plaintiffs have not explained how there is a dangerous probability that State Farm will achieve monopoly power, especially [37] given what appears to be on its face limited market power. Moreover, the claim for attempted monopolization seems highly problematic given that virtually all insurance companies (as indicated by Plaintiffs' SAC and as conceded at the hearing) use the Verisk Defendants' software tools.

Finally, there continues to be the problem of the failure to allege antitrust injury.

3. Summary

For the foregoing reasons, the Court dismisses the antitrust claims as pled in the SAC and further finds the new "allegations" in Plaintiffs' opposition brief insufficient to support any antitrust claim. The Court, however, shall give Plaintiffs leave to amend their antitrust claims, provided that they satisfy the specificity requisites of Twombly/Iqbal and the substantive requirements of antitrust law, and their allegations are based on facts and made in good faith as required by Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 11.

III. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the Court rules as follows:

- Claim for breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing (against State Farm only). The claim is dismissed but with leave to amend.
- Misrepresentation claims (fraudulent and negligent). The claims against both State Farm and the Verisk Defendants [38] are dismissed with leave to amend.
- Negligence claim. The claim is dismissed as duplicative of the claim for negligent misrepresentation. Plaintiffs have leave to amend.
- Section 17200 claim. The claim based on fraudulent conduct is dismissed with leave to amend. The claim based on unlawful conduct is dismissed with prejudice. The claim based on unfair conduct is viable but, based on the factual predicate, is sustainable as to State Farm only. Plaintiffs have leave to amend the unfair conduct claim as to the Verisk Defendants. Certain remedies sought by Plaintiffs for the alleged violation of § 17200 are not cognizable and are dismissed without leave to amend; but Plaintiffs are not barred at this juncture from seeking an order "enjoining Defendants from continuing" their alleged illegal conduct. SAC ¶ 178.
- Claim for violation of § 790.03. The claim is dismissed with prejudice.
- Product liability claim. The claim is dismissed with prejudice, if only because of the economic loss rule.
- Antitrust claims. The claims are dismissed with leave to amend.

In short, at this juncture, the only viable claim Plaintiffs have is a claim for unfair conduct pursuant to § 17200, which is asserted against State Farm only. Plaintiffs [39] shall file their amended complaint by August 1, 2019. The only amendments permitted [*1015] at this juncture are those specified above.

This order disposes of Docket Nos. 34 and 36.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

Summary:

CATCHWORDS:

Trade and competition - unlawful competition - Competition Act 89 of 1998 - prohibited practices - abuse of a dominant position - prohibition against engaging in exclusionary acts as listed in section 8(d) of the Competition Act - predatory pricing - appropriate benchmark to determine whether prices are predatory - issue raised but not determined decisively - in application for leave to appeal to the Constitutional Court, members of court dividing and producing four separate judgments - ultimate result effectively a decision by a majority that leave to appeal should be granted but that the appeal should be dismissed.

Editor's Summary Predatory pricing is conduct in which a dominant firm sets prices for goods or services at such a low level that it incurs losses in the short term and by means of that sacrifice eliminates, or improves the chances of eliminating, one or more of the firm's actual or potential competitors, and so has the further effect of strengthening or maintaining the firm's market power, thereby causing consumer harm. Predatory pricing is prohibited in two provisions contained in the Competition Act 89 of 1998. Section 8(d)(iv) creates a specific prohibition against pricing below two specific cost standards. It prohibits a dominant firm from engaging in an exclusionary act of "selling goods or services below their marginal or average variable cost" unless it can show technological, efficiency or other pro-competitive gains which outweigh the anti-competitive effect of that act. Section 8(c) contains a general prohibition against anti-competitive behaviour. It provides that "[i]t is prohibited for a dominant firm to engage in an exclusionary act, other than an act listed in paragraph (d), if the anti-competitive effect of that act outweighs its technological, efficiency or other pro-competitive, gain". The Competition Tribunal had held that Respondent, Media 24 (Pty) Ltd ("Media 24"), was guilty of predatory pricing in terms of section 8(c). Media 24 appealed to the Competition Appeal Court which held that it could not be established that Media 24 had violated section 8(d)(iv) or 8(c). The Competition Commission sought leave to appeal to the Constitutional Court against the Competition Appeal Court's judgment. There are different cost standards that can be used to determine whether prices are predatory. What the appropriate standard would be in a particular case was an issue both in the court a quo and in the Constitutional Court hearing. Four different judgments were written by members of the Constitutional Court. The first judgment (per Goliath AJ with Mogoeng CJ and Dlodlo AJ concurring) held that the matter did raise a constitutional issue and an arguable point of law of general public importance so that the Court had jurisdiction to deal with it. It further held that leave to appeal should be granted and, for reasons set out in the judgment, that the appeal should succeed. The second judgment (per Cameron, Froneman and Khampepe JJ with Petse AJ concurring) held that it was not in the interests of justice to grant leave to appeal and that the application for leave should be dismissed. The third judgment (per Theron J with Basson AJ concurring) agreed with the first judgment to the extent that it held that the application raised an arguable point of law of general public importance within the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction and that leave to appeal should be granted. However, Theron J held that the appeal should be dismissed. A fourth judgment (per Mhlantla J) agreed with the third judgment to the extent that it held that the application raised an arguable point of law of general public importance within the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction and that leave to appeal should be granted. In respect of the merits Mhlantla J concurred in the first judgment and concluded that the appeal should succeed. The effect of these four judgments was that six members of the Court considered that the application raised an arguable point of law of general public importance within the Court's jurisdiction and that leave to appeal against the judgment and order of the Competition Appeal Court should be granted; and six members of the Court did not consider that the appeal should be upheld. There was thus effectively a majority decision that leave to appeal should be granted and that the appeal should be dismissed.

Judgment

BY The Court

[1]The first judgment in this matter was written by Goliath AJ and concurred in by Mogoeng CJ and Dlodlo AJ. The first judgment held that this application raises a constitutional issue and an arguable point of law of general public importance within this Court's jurisdiction. The first judgment further held that leave to appeal should be granted and the appeal must succeed.

[2]The second judgment in this matter was written by Cameron J, Froneman J and Khampepe J, and concurred in by Petse AJ. The second judgment held that it is not in the interests of justice to grant leave to appeal and that the application should be dismissed with costs, including the costs of two Counsel.

[3]Theron J wrote a judgment ("third judgment") concurring in the first judgment to the extent that this application raises an arguable point of law of general public importance within this Court's jurisdiction and that leave to appeal should be granted. Theron J held that the appeal must be dismissed with costs, including the costs of two Counsel. Basson AJ concurred in the judgment penned by Theron J. Mhlantla J wrote a judgment in which she concurred in the third judgment to the extent that this application raises an arguable point of law of general public importance within this Court's jurisdiction and that leave to appeal should be granted. Mhlantla J concurred in the first judgment in respect of the merits and that the appeal must succeed.

[4]The effect of these four judgments is that six members of the Court held that this application raises an arguable point of law of general public importance within this Court's jurisdiction and granted leave to appeal against the judgment and order of the Competition Appeal Court. Six members of the Court did not uphold the appeal. There is thus a majority decision that this application raises an arguable point of law of general public importance within this Court's jurisdiction, that leave to appeal should be granted and that the appeal must be dismissed with costs, including the costs of two Counsel.

Introduction

"Predatory pricing is a paradoxical offense. Although antitrust law values low prices and abhors high ones, the 'predator' stands accused of charging too low of a price - of doing too much of a good thing. Society considers predation socially harmful because the artificially low prices of today drive out competitors and allow the high prices of tomorrow." [1]

[5]This matter is the first of its kind dealing with South African law prohibiting predatory pricing. Predatory pricing is conduct that involves a dominant firm setting prices for goods or services at such a low level that (a) the firm incurs losses relative to alternative non-predatory conduct in the short term (referred to as "sacrifice"); (b) the pricing has the effect of eliminating, or being likely to eliminate, one or more of the firm's actual or potential competitors; and, in turn, (c) the pricing has the further effect of strengthening or maintaining the firm's market power, thereby causing consumer harm.

[6]The principles underpinning the paradox of predatory pricing must be carefully balanced. An accurate test for predation must be capable of balancing the fine line between over-enforcing the prohibition, with the possibility of higher prices for goods and services, and under-enforcing it to the benefit of large firms aiming to monopolise the market.

[7]This case enjoins the Court to grapple with legal elements of the economic concept of predatory pricing. This involves establishing what must be proven when predatory pricing is alleged to have occurred. In making this evaluation, the Court is required to deal with two aspects. The first is whether it is in the interests of justice to grant the applicant leave to appeal to this Court. The second relates to the legal test for establishing predatory pricing.

Parties

[8]The applicant is the Competition Commission of South Africa, established in terms of section 19 of the Competition Act. [2] The respondent is Media24 (Pty) Limited ("Media24"), a company which acts as the print media arm of the South African media company Naspers Limited.

Background

[9]In 1971 and 1983, two community newspapers called Vista and Forum were established respectively. These two papers were fierce competitors in the Welkom community newspaper market. Both papers were acquired by

S 19 of the Competition Act, concerning the establishment and constitution of the Competition Commission, states:"(1)There is hereby established a body to be known as the Competition Commission, which -(a)has jurisdiction throughout the Republic;(b)is a juristic person; and(c)must exercise its functions in accordance with this Act.(2)The Competition Commission consists of the Commissioner and one or more Deputy Commissioners, appointed by the Minister in terms of this Act."

Media24 which, by doing so, acquired a monopoly in the community newspaper market in Welkom. When Media24 took over Vista, some staff chose to leave. One of these staff members was Ms Leda Joubert, who went on to establish Gold Net News ("GNN"). Ms Joubert appointed veteran Welkom newspaper editor, Mr Hans Steyl to run GNN. While GNN started strongly with loyal advertising support, it ended up struggling to attract advertising and eventually closed down in April 2009. Nine months later, in January 2010, Media24 closed down Forum.

[10]Shortly before GNN closed, Mr Steyl filed a complaint on behalf of GNN with the Competition Commission that Media24, through Vista and Forum, had abused its dominant position in the Welkom area by drastically cutting the rates that it charged advertisers for the period between 2004 and 2009. It was alleged that the rates were so low that they were below market price. Mr Steyl asserted that this anti-competitive behaviour forced GNN to close as it could not compete with the low prices and continue to meet the profit margins it needed to survive. In 2011, the Competition Commission, after investigating the complaint, referred a case of predatory pricing on the part of Media24 to the Competition Tribunal ("Tribunal"). The Tribunal's decision [3] and the subsequent decision on appeal to the Competition Appeal Court [4] are the foundation of the case before us.

Predatory pricing

[11]Because low prices are generally encouraged by competition law, costs standards have been developed to indicate the line between competitive price cutting and unreasonably low prices that are predatory. Predatory pricing is prohibited in two provisions in the Competition Act. Section 8(d)(iv) creates a specific prohibition against pricing below two specific cost standards. This section provides:

"It is prohibited for a dominant firm to:

(d)engage in any of the following exclusionary acts, unless the firm concerned can show technological, efficiency or other pro-competitive, gains which outweigh the anti-competitive effect of its act:

(iv)selling goods or services below their marginal or average variable cost."

[12]Section 8(c) of the Competition Act contains a general prohibition against anti-competitive behaviour and is considered the "catch-all" provision to protect against abuses of dominance. The section provides:

"It is prohibited for a dominant firm to:

(c)engage in an exclusionary act, other than an act listed in paragraph (d), if the anti-competitive effect of that act outweighs its technological, efficiency or other pro-competitive, gain."

[13]An "exclusionary act" is defined by the Competition Act as "an act that impedes or prevents a firm from entering into, or expanding within, a market." [5]

[14]Section 8(c) should be read to prohibit pricing that is below other appropriate cost standards besides the two listed in section 8(d)(iv). There are five cost standards that are important to understand for the determination of this case. They are the cost standards that are used in various foreign jurisdictions to determine whether prices are predatory, and they are the standards pleaded in this case. These are: marginal cost; average variable cost; average avoidable cost; long run average incremental cost; and average total cost. The first two are the standards applicable to complaints brought under section 8(d)(iv), while the latter three are of relevance to complaints brought under section 8(c).

[15]The various standards are defined as follows: Marginal cost refers to a comparison between the cost of producing an additional unit of output and the price that the firm is charging per unit of output. If the price exceeds marginal cost, then it makes sense to produce an additional unit. If it costs more to produce a unit of output than the firm can charge, then the rational firm would not produce that unit. Consequently, if a firm prices below marginal cost it is presumed to be participating in predatory pricing. Establishing marginal cost is extremely difficult; therefore, a second and similar test was created. [6]

[16]Average variable cost is this second test. It is referred to as the Areeda-Turner test in various local judgments and foreign commentaries. [7] This is the sum of the firm's variable costs (labour, electricity, etc) divided by the number of units produced. [8] Variable costs are costs that vary as output increases, as opposed to fixed costs, which do not. If a firm charges a price which does not cover its variable costs, it intentionally suffers a loss on every sale and is presumed to be participating in predatory pricing. [9]

[17]Average avoidable cost refers to the average costs that the firm could have avoided if it had not produced particular units of output. This includes variable costs and any fixed costs that are specifically incurred in the production of the particular product being examined. Average avoidable cost is generally equal to average variable cost plus product-specific fixed costs. [10]

[18]Average total cost is equal to the total cost of producing a product divided by the number of units produced. This number includes the costs associated with average variable cost, the product-specific fixed costs, and a proportion of the common costs of the company that have been apportioned to the particular product if the firm produces multiple products. Common costs are costs that the firm incurs regardless of how many different products are produced.

[19]Long-run average incremental cost refers to the total value of costs that are needed to enter and start supplying a specific product, represented as an average over output. This test is generally used in industries which have high barriers to entry but low operating costs, as it allows companies to average out the high sunk costs [11] that they must recover with the low operation costs. [12]

Litigation history

Competition Tribunal

[20]The case referred to the Tribunal was based firstly on a contravention of section 8(d)(iv), and in the alternative on a violation of section 8(c). The Tribunal found that Media24 had not priced its advertising below its average avoidable cost, and thus the Competition Commission failed to establish that Media24 priced below the lower standards of average variable cost or marginal cost. [13] As a result, the Tribunal made its determination using section 8(c) and not section 8(d)(iv). The case presented by the Competition Commission was that Media24 had used Forum as a fighting brand. This means that it was kept in the market with the express purpose of charging prices that were lower than its competitors, who were then forced to leave the market. Once this task was completed, the fighting brand was closed down. The Tribunal held that the Competition Commission had established that the average total cost was an appropriate cost standard to use to evaluate predation in this case; [14] that Media24 had charged advertising prices for Forum below its average total cost; that it had intended to predate GNN; that Media24 had the ability to recoup what it had lost during this predation period and that GNN had not been excluded due to its relative inefficiency. It found that Media24's actions had an anti-competitive effect and that there was no evidence of pro-competitive gain which outweighed this effect. [15] Consequently, it held that Media24 had contravened section 8(c) of the Competition Act.

Additional evidence

[21]The Tribunal held that average total cost could be an appropriate costs standard for a finding under section 8(c) of the Competition Act when accompanied by additional evidence of predation. [16] The Tribunal evaluated the additional evidence under the following four headings: direct intention to predate, indirect intention to predate, recoupment, and the equally efficient competitor test.

Direct intention

[22]Direct intention relates to the subjective intention of Media24 as evidenced by witness statements. The Tribunal examined the factual evidence that was placed before it which consisted of oral and written testimony by persons who had been employed by Media24 during the complaint period. The evidence pointed to the fact that internal communication had taken place in terms of which employees had stated that they were attempting to undercut GNN, and that they intended to use Forum as a stopper in the market to keep business away from GNN. A similar sentiment was expressed at a Media24 strategy meeting. The Tribunal found that this constituted more than merely fighting words and indicated a direct intention to predate GNN. [17] Moreover, it held that Media24 had not done enough to rebut the evidence that had been put forward. It thus accepted that Media24 had acted with predatory intent and moved on to evaluate this finding in the light of other evidence of exclusion. [18]

Indirect intention

[23]Indirect intention is inferred from objective evidence and involves drawing economically pertinent inferences from certain behaviour. [19] The Tribunal examined three areas of evidence. These were: firstly, evidence that Forum was consistently making a loss for nine years before it eventually closed down. Secondly, the Tribunal examined the circumstances around the closing down of Forum such as the fact that Media24 closed Forum nine months after GNN left the market. It concluded that Media24 had intended to close Forum as soon as GNN had left the market but retained it to make them look less suspicious and ensure that they were not brought before the Commission. Finally, the Tribunal examined the cannibalism factor. This relates to the fact that during the period that Forum was maintained, it prevented some advertisers from advertising in Vista. Generally, allowing a product to draw customers away from another in the same firm would not be rational. The Tribunal held that this points to a separate strategic reason for maintaining Forum. The strategic value was that Forum was able to predate GNN.

Recoupment

[24]The Tribunal accepted that since GNN's exit from the market, Vista had increased its prices by 17%. This, it held, was substantial when compared to the price increases of previous years. Moreover, because no other competitors had entered the market after GNN and Forum exited, Vista was able to continue charging high prices to the detriment of consumers in an unchecked fashion. These factors taken together amount to strong evidence of recoupment.

Equally efficient competitor test

[25]Media 24 contended that the reason for GNN's exit from the market was because it was not an equally efficient competitor [20] and so could not survive in a true competitive market. The Commission contested this. The Tribunal held that it was unlikely that GNN left the market simply because it was inefficient. It based this finding on the fact that it was run by a veteran of the Welkom newspaper market who knew how to run a profitable business. Moreover, the fact that GNN was able to break into the market and gain market share pointed to the fact that it was efficiently run. [21]

[26]All of this evidence, taken together with the fact that Media24 priced below average total cost, led the Tribunal to hold that Media24 was guilty of predatory pricing in terms of section 8(c) of the Competition Act. [22]

Competition Appeal Court

[27]The Competition Appeal Court summarised the Commission's case as:

"(a)Appellant operated Forum solely as a 'fighting brand' in order to exclude GNN from the market;

(b)Forum's average revenues did not cover the average total costs of producing and publishing the paper;

(c)Forum's average revenues did not cover its average variable costs over a 12 month period (where all costs were considered variable and thus could have been avoided if Forum had ceased publication at this point); and/or

(d)Forum's incremental costs (calculated as Forum's total revenues reduced by the proportion of its revenues which would have been diverted to Vista if Forum had exited the market) did not cover its incremental costs, calculated as the total costs that were incremental to the operation of Forum based on two definitions:

(i)all costs that could have been eliminated over a period of one year; and

(ii)all Forum's costs." [23]

[28]The Competition Appeal Court held that the test envisaged in section 8(c) determines whether specific conduct amounts to an exclusionary act as defined in the Competition Act. This, it held, is an objective test. The court held that subjective evidence of intent should not be examined in proving predatory pricing and that, once this evidence was disregarded, average total cost was not an appropriate cost standard to illustrate that predatory pricing occurred. The Competition Appeal Court concluded that:

"[T]here is no escaping the conclusion that predation must focus on the likely economic effect of pricing below a particular cost measure to determine whether the low prices are due to a lawful competitive response to rivals or to predation and unlawful behaviour rather than on the intention with which a pricing strategy is adopted." [24]

[29]Having rejected average total cost plus intention, the Competition Appeal Court concluded that the only appropriate benchmark that had been relied upon by the Commission in their pleadings was average avoidable cost. This does not mean that it is the only appropriate benchmark to apply to section 8(c) in all cases, but rather that in this particular case it is the only appropriate test that remains. In the light of its rejection of the average total cost plus intent test, the Competition Appeal Court did not have to consider the balance of the evidence concerning the intention of Media24. In the result, the appeal by Media24 was upheld as it could not be established that Media24 had violated section 8(d)(iv) or 8(c).

Leave to appeal

[30]Both the Competition Commission and Media24 contend that this case raises a constitutional issue. This is because the Competition Act was enacted as transformative legislation. Section 2(e) and (f) of the Competition Act states that part of the purpose of the Competition Act is to ensure that small and medium sized businesses have equitable opportunities to participate in the economy and to promote a greater spread of ownership in the economy by those who were disadvantaged by apartheid. These purposes implicate the right of equality contained in section 9 of the Constitution. Section 9(2) enjoins the State to take legislative and other measures to advance the equality of previously disadvantaged people and section 2(e) and (f) of the Competition Act is a legislative measure of this kind.

[31]Section 8 of the Competition Act is an important component for the achievement of the purposes contained in section 2(e) and (f). Section 8 prohibits dominant firms from abusing their power to the detriment of the market and consumers. Consumer welfare lies at the heart of the matter before us. The prohibition of abuses of dominance is recognition of the fact that dominant firms attained this status due to our exclusionary history. The protection section 8 provides applies specifically to small and medium sized firms which are at the greatest risk of being excluded from the market by abuses of dominance or monopolies. Consequently, when a Court interprets the extent of the protection contained in section 8, it must do so in line with the purpose of the Competition Act and the Constitution as abuses of dominance and the resultant monopolies have the potential to perpetuate historic patterns of exclusion and inequality.

[32]Beyond this, this Court held in SOS and Hosken, that the ambit of the Commission's investigatory powers, in terms of section 21(1)(c) of the Competition Act, is an inherently constitutional issue. [25] This section empowers the Commission to investigate alleged violations of Chapter 2 of the Competition Act. The case before us involves an interpretation of the extent of the powers held by the Commission to prosecute alleged violations subsequent to an investigation. The effect of the Competition Appeal Court judgment is to limit the tools that the Commission has at its disposal to prove a violation of section 8(c).

[33]This is because on the test it applied, it was unnecessary to examine certain evidence regarding predation. While evaluations under section 8(c) are economic in nature, a limitation of the investigative and prosecutorial powers of the Commission may have adverse consequences. Surely, if the ambit of the Commission's investigatory powers raises a constitutional issue, the ambit of its ability to bring prosecutions based on findings made during investigation is, by parity of reasoning, similarly constitutional. What would be the purpose of the strong investigatory powers of the Commission if it cannot present all of the evidence that it has gathered in order to prosecute an offence?

[34]Aside from raising a constitutional issue, this matter engages the Court's jurisdiction because it raises an arguable point of law of general public importance which this Court ought to consider. The question whether pricing above average avoidable cost but below average total cost amounts to predation requires the interpretation of the law relating to exclusionary acts and the consideration of which tests can be used to equitably establish predation. This is unquestionably an arguable point of law, especially when the contradicting views in foreign jurisprudence, and between the Tribunal and Competition Appeal Court are considered. Moreover, given the impact that this determination will have on the interpretation and implementation of section 8(c) of the Competition Act going forward, it is certainly of general public importance and this Court ought to consider it. One problem exists in this regard, however: the Competition Act in section 62 states that for all matters, aside from those that raise constitutional issues, the Competition Appeal Court has exclusive and final appeal jurisdiction.

[35]Can this Court then hear competition cases which raise arguable points of law of general public importance? The answer must be yes. Section 62 was enacted prior to the seventeenth amendment of the Constitution, which imbued the Court with the power to hear arguable points of law of general public importance, and as such could not have predicted that the Court would one day have the jurisdiction to decide such cases. Section 62 of the Competition Act must be read in the context of section 167 of the Constitution. Section 167(3)(b)(ii) establishes that this Court can hear arguable points of law of general public importance and section 167(3)(c) states that this Court makes the final decision as to whether a matter falls within its jurisdiction. [26] If the Competition Act was read to finally exclude arguable points of law of general public importance from the jurisdiction of this Court, it would then be in conflict with the Constitution. Legislation should not be read to derogate from the constitutionally enshrined powers of this Court, instead a reading which aligns with the Constitution should be favoured. A contextual reading of the Competition Act therefore leads to the conclusion that the Competition Appeal Court has exclusive jurisdiction to hear appeals on all matters except those which fall into the constitutionally protected jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court. Resultantly, this Court has jurisdiction to hear this matter as it raises a constitutional issue, and in any event raises an arguable point of law of general public importance which this Court ought to consider.

Failure to approach the Competition Appeal Court

[36]Appellate jurisdiction in competition law matters is regulated by section 62 of the Competition Act. Section 62(1) stipulates which matters fall within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Tribunal and the Competition Appeal Court. [27] Section 62(3) of the Competition Act states that the Competition Appeal Court is the final court of appeal on all matters regulated by section 62(1). However, the appellate jurisdiction of the Competition Appeal Court is not final in competition matters which raise constitutional issues. [28] Resultantly, and crucial to this case, the appellate jurisdiction of the Competition Appeal Court is only final when the interpretation of Chapter 2 does not raise a constitutional issue.

[37]The Competition Act states that where a constitutional issue is raised, both the Supreme Court of Appeal and this Court have the jurisdiction to hear it. [29] An application for leave to appeal from the Competition Appeal Court to either of these courts is regulated by section 63(2) of the Competition Act. However, the right to appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeal and this Court is made conditional on a party first applying to the Competition Appeal Court for leave to appeal. Section 63(2) reads:

[26] S 167 of the Constitution states:"(3)The Constitutional Court: . . . (b)may decide - . . . (ii)any other matter, if the Constitutional Court grants leave to appeal on the grounds that the matter raises an arguable point of law of general public importance which ought to be considered by that Court."

[27] The matters that fall within the exclusive jurisdiction include the interpretation of Ch 2 of the Competition Act. S 8(c) is located in Ch 2.

[28] S 62(3)(b) of the Competition Act.

[29] Id at s 62(4) which states:"An appeal from a decision of the Competition Appeal Court in respect of a matter within its jurisdiction in terms of sub-section (2) lies to the Supreme Court of Appeal or Constitutional Court, subject to s 63 and their respective rules."

"An appeal in terms of section 62(4) may be brought to the Supreme Court of Appeal or, if it concerns a constitutional matter, to the Constitutional Court, only:

(a)with leave of the Competition Appeal Court; or

(b)if the Competition Appeal Court refuses leave, with leave of the Supreme Court of Appeal or the Constitutional Court, as the case may be." (Emphasis added.)

[38]The interpretation of section 63(2) has been the subject of extensive debate. The question is whether the use of the word "only" bars an applicant from applying to either the Supreme Court of Appeal or this Court without first approaching the Competition Appeal Court for leave, or whether the failure to approach the Competition Appeal Court is merely an obstacle that can be overcome in certain circumstances. This dichotomy was set out in the majority decisions in both Loungefoam and Yara. [30] However, this Court in those cases did not make a final pronouncement on whether a bar or an obstacle is created. [31]

[39]It has become necessary to decide this issue. In doing so, the judgments in Loungefoam and Yara, which I fully endorse, are instructive. These judgments both hold that the failure to seek leave to appeal from the Competition Appeal Court before appealing to the Supreme Court of Appeal and this Court creates an obstacle to the application which can be overcome if it is in the interests of justice for this Court to grant a direct appeal. [32]

[40]The restriction contained in section 63(2) of the Competition Act, and the right to appeal in section 62(4) are both qualified by section 63(1)(a). [33] Section 167(6) of the Constitution establishes that:

"National legislation or the rules of the Constitutional Court must allow a person, when it is in the interests of justice and with leave of the Constitutional Court:

(a)to bring a matter directly to the Constitutional Court; or

(b)to appeal directly to the Constitutional Court from any other court."

[41]With regard to this, Cameron J in Yara noted the following:

"[T]he right of appeal is expressly subject to 'any law' that 'specifically grants' a right of appeal. Plainly, section 167(6) of the Constitution is a law of this kind. It provides that national legislation or the rules of this Court 'must allow' a litigant, 'when it is in the interests of justice and with leave of the Constitutional Court', to bring an appeal directly to this Court." [34] (Footnotes omitted.)

[42]The provisions of section 63 of the Competition Act must be interpreted so that they comply with the Constitution [35] . It appears that the section itself, by providing that the right of appeal is subject to any law that specifically grants a right of appeal, subordinates its requirements to the right of direct appeal to this Court contained in section 167(6) of the Constitution. [36] In light of the provisions of section 167(6) of the Constitution, section 63(2) read with section 63(1)(a)(ii) cannot be said to create an absolute bar. As the minority in Yara held:

"[T]he fact that a litigant has not sought the leave of the Competition Appeal Court would be pertinent to its application to this Court, but will not disable it. This Court is at liberty to grant direct access, as the Constitution requires, and nothing in the legislation need be read to detract from its power." [37]

[43]The word "only" should be interpreted to mean that litigants are barred from approaching this Court directly only when the interests of justice do not warrant the granting of a direct appeal. [38] In such cases, leave of the Competition Appeal Court must first be obtained. Furthermore, on whether the interests of justice warrant the granting of leave to appeal directly to this Court appears later in this judgment.

Failure to approach the Supreme Court of Appeal

[44]It must be established whether the Supreme Court of Appeal can still be approached to hear appeals relating to competition law. If it retains its appellate jurisdiction in such matters, this creates difficulties for the Commission as it failed to approach the Supreme Court of Appeal before appealing to this Court. The seventeenth amendment to the Constitution amended section 168(3)(a) of the Constitution to read:

"The Supreme Court of Appeal may decide appeals in any matter arising from the High Court of South Africa or a court of a status similar to the High Court of South Africa, except in respect of labour or competition matters to such an extent as may be determined by an Act of Parliament." [39] (Own emphasis.)

[45]The question is how to interpret the express wording of the Constitution. The Commission contends that it should be interpreted to mean that the Supreme Court of Appeal's appellate jurisdiction has been excluded by this amendment, while Media24 contends that until an Act of Parliament is enacted limiting the Supreme Court's jurisdiction in these matters, it should continue to hear competition matters.

[46]Brand JA in Computicket [40] embraces the conclusion by Froneman J in National Lotteries Board which states:

"As a result of the Constitution Seventeenth Amendment Act of 2012, this right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeal no longer exists." [41]

[47]In Democratic Alliance, Zondo J, stated that the phrase "to such extent as may be determined by an Act of Parliament" in section 168(3), qualifies the words "except in respect of labour or competition matters" and not "the High Court of South Africa or a court of a status similar to that of the High Court". Resultantly, Zondo J held that appeals concerning all matters except competition and labour matters still lie with the Supreme Court of Appeal. [42] By implication, it appears that the seventeenth amendment did indeed remove the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Appeal in respect of labour and competition matters. It may be that further Acts of Parliament will qualify this exclusion. However, the amendment itself constitutes an Act of Parliament and its express wording must be respected. Consequently, it was not necessary for the Competition Commission to approach the Supreme Court of Appeal before appealing to this Court.

[48]Even if this was not the case, there are instances where it is unnecessary for litigants to approach the Supreme Court of Appeal before approaching this Court. As Cameron J and Yacoob J held in Yara:

"The Act envisages appeals directly from the Competition Appeal Court to this Court. In matters involving the constitutionality of the Commission's interpretation and exercise of its statutory powers, this Court is necessarily the final Court. The questions at issue here are so important that it is nearly inevitable that, whoever succeeds in the Supreme Court of Appeal, this Court will be asked to have the last word. The issues do not involve matters of common law, on which this Court particularly values the views and experience of the Supreme Court of Appeal. It is true that even where common law matters are not at issue, this Court values the views of the Supreme Court of Appeal. Nevertheless, the largely statutory and constitutional nature of the questions at issue counts against requiring an appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeal first." [43] (Footnotes omitted.)

[49]The matter before us is an important one involving largely statutory interpretation and constitutional questions. This weighs against it being necessary for the Competition Commission to first approach the Supreme Court of Appeal.

[50]Besides, a proper reading of that excerpt from Yara relied on by the second judgment would reveal that Yara is no authority for the proposition that this Court ought to defer to the Supreme Court of Appeal in relation to the common law or to the Competition Appeal Court as a specialist court. Yara does no more than recognise that obvious benefit that this Court generally stands to derive from allowing courts with general jurisdiction and specialist courts to first express themselves on issues that fall within their jurisdiction before we deal with a matter. The apex court of the Republic of South Africa ought never to abdicate its constitutional responsibility of providing guidance to all courts in this country regardless of how complex or specialised the area of law under consideration might be. To do so could be misunderstood as a confession by this Court, of its incompetence and would probably undermine the jurisdiction and authority of this Court in relation to matters of a specialist nature. As a matter of fact, many complex issues that require speciality in certain areas of the law have served before this Court, but we have never deemed it appropriate to defer to any of the lower courts, for good reason.

Interests of justice

[51]The fact that this Court has jurisdiction to hear the matter is, however, not decisive and leave may still be refused if it is not in the interests of justice to hear the appeal. There are a number of elements to this case that indicate that it would be in the interests of justice for this Court to hear a direct appeal to it.

[52]First, the Commission pointed out that this matter involves statutory interpretation which ought to be developed in the legal framework of the Constitution and not parallel to it. This Court regularly undertakes interpretative exercises such as this in relation to the Labour Relations Act. [44] The analogy between the two areas of law, Media24 submits, is misplaced because this case seems to raise more specialised economic issues which require expert evaluation. This may be true, but this Court has the benefit of the expert opinions of both the Tribunal and the Competition Appeal Court in making its decision. Were this matter to confront the Court with a factual question, it might then be in the interests of justice to defer to the specialist courts but as the third judgment points out that, "this question entails critically examining the policy and normative implications of the various standards for predatory pricing" [45] , this Court is in a position to reach the best determinable conclusion in line with the interests of the public.

[45] Third judgment at (144).

[53]Davis JP, in the introductory paragraph of the Competition Appeal Court judgment, places great emphasis on the fact that this matter is the first of its kind. [46] As a result, in interpreting the Competition Act's prohibition of predatory pricing, this Court must establish how the prohibition aligns with, and fulfils, the imperatives of the Constitution. Competition matters impact on the interests of the public, especially considering South Africa's evolving and transforming market economy. The need to provide the country with free and fair guidelines for an equitable competitive market is crucial, and something that this Court is qualified to do.

[54]Second, the implications of this case will be far-reaching. Media24 contested this by arguing that the Competition Act is being amended and amendments minimise the importance of this Court's decision. While it is true that the Competition Act is being amended and that the new sections may limit the implications of this judgment, section 8(c) will still remain in the amended version of the Competition Act. The question of what kind of evidence can be used to prove a violation of that section will continue to affect parties beyond those before us. The potential amendment of the Competition Act does not negate or counteract the importance of the issues raised in this matter.

[55]Third, the Competition Commission has reasonable prospects of success on appeal. Both the Tribunal and the Competition Appeal Court are specialist bodies, and in this case they have arrived at opposite conclusions. Ngcobo J in NEHAWU states that:

"[A]n important factor in considering the prospects of success in this application is the fact that members of the Labour Appeal Court and the Labour Court are divided on the proper construction of section 197. This factor alone suggests, at least prima facie, that there are prospects of success. It is true that the Labour Appeal Court, like all courts, is bound by the doctrine of precedent, and should not depart from its own decisions unless it is satisfied that they are clearly wrong. Nevertheless, given the clear division amongst the labour Judges, it is desirable for this Court to consider the issue." [47] (Footnotes omitted.)

[56]The division between the specialist Judges at these bodies, indicates that interference with the decision of the Competition Appeal Court may be warranted. In these circumstances, as is the case with labour law matters, this Court will not shy away from intervening and interpreting the law in a way that best caters for the interests of justice and the public at large.

[57]Consequently, it is in the interests of justice that leave to appeal directly to this Court from the Competition Appeal Court be granted. What must be decided now is whether the appeal should be upheld.

Aims and purpose of the Competition Act

[58]It is a fundamental principle of competition law that competition between firms is desirable. Competition generally encourages efficiency, innovation and the charging of lower prices by firms. [48] Competition on the merits [49] includes price competition which involves firms lowering their prices to attract business away from their competitors. However, competition law also acknowledges that exceptionally low prices may be harmful to competition and thus, in the long run, consumers. This is because below-cost pricing has the effect of forcing competitors out of the market which increases the likelihood of the formation of monopolies. [50] Monopolies are harmful to consumer welfare and should therefore be regulated. [51]

[59]The South African Competition Act acknowledges that the unjust distribution of wealth during apartheid has led to concentrations of power and capital in the market. One way of combatting this concentration is through the regulation of firms which hold dominant shares in the market. The Competition Act specifically regulates the behaviour of these firms to ensure that they are not abusing their dominant positions to the detriment of competition and consumers. [52] Section 8 of the Competition Act prohibits two forms of abusive behaviour by dominant firms: exploitative abuse and exclusionary abuse. Exploitative abuses result in direct harm to consumers. [53] Exclusionary abuse, on the other hand, is conduct that attacks the dominant firm's competitors and as a result, indirectly harms consumers. [54]

[60]The prohibition of predatory pricing contained in section 8(c) and (d)(iv) of the Competition Act is an example of the regulation of exclusionary abuse. This regulation is not an easy task. Approaches to evaluating whether predation has occurred are often criticised as being over-inclusive, in that they implicate innocent firms in predation, or under-inclusive, in that they fail to identify firms which are genuinely participating in predation, to the detriment of competition. [55] Any approach taken to prevent predatory pricing must strike a balance between over and under enforcement, while simultaneously fulfilling the purpose of the Competition Act. This case therefore requires a careful balancing act.

[61]Section 2 of the Competition Act sets out the purpose for which it was enacted. It states:

"The purpose of this Act is to promote and maintain competition in the Republic in order:

(a)to promote the efficiency, adaptability and development of the economy;

(b)to provide consumers with competitive prices and product choices;

(c)to promote employment and advance the social and economic welfare of South Africans;

(d)to expand opportunities for South African participation in world markets and recognise the role of foreign competition in the Republic;

(e)to ensure that small and medium-sized enterprises have an equitable opportunity to participate in the economy; and

(f)to promote a greater spread of ownership, in particular to increase the ownership stakes of historically disadvantaged persons."

[62]This provision seemingly envisages the desired balance mentioned above. While competitive prices and product choices are important, so is the protection of small and medium-sized businesses. Therefore, any approach to prohibiting predatory pricing must avoid over-inclusion as this will harm the ability of firms to set competitive prices, while simultaneously not being under-inclusive as this makes it easy for dominant firms to force small and medium-sized competitors to exit the market.

Examining predatory pricing in the Competition Act

[63]Predatory pricing is prohibited by sections 8(c) and 8(d)(iv) of the Competition Act. Section 8(d)(iv) contains a specific prohibition against predatory pricing. It presumes that prices which are below a firm's marginal cost or average variable cost will have exclusionary effects and are not motivated by a rational business rationale beyond the gains that a dominant firm makes by excluding competitors. Section 8(c), on the other hand, is a catch-all provision which prohibits unjustified exclusionary acts not listed in section 8(d)(iv). This appeal requires this Court to determine how best to interpret section 8(c) to ensure that predatory pricing that falls outside of section 8(d)(iv) is prohibited.

[64]The approach to evaluating claims in terms of section 8(c) was established by this Court in Senwes. Here the Court held:

"Plainly the section requires the presence of three conditions in order to establish that an abuse of dominance has occurred. First, the act in which the dominant firm was engaged must be an 'exclusionary act' as defined in the empowering legislation. . . .

Second, the act in which the dominant firm was engaged must fall outside the scope of section 8(d). Third, the anti-competitive effect of that act must outweigh its technological, efficiency or other pro-competitive gain." [56]

[65]However, when examining section 8(c), both parties before us argued that the section creates a two-stage test. This is likely because it is common cause that the exclusionary act falls outside of section 8(d). The Commission contends that first, it must be determined whether an exclusionary act had occurred, and second, whether the anti-competitive effect of that act outweighs some form of gain listed in the section. Media24 characterised the test for predation as pricing which is low enough to exclude an equally efficient competitor, which is done without a rational business justification. There is not much difference between the tests that the parties each propose. Moreover, while there are two stages to each test, they appear to be interrelated. This is because an act that leads to the exclusion of a competitor but does not have an anti-competitive effect, or has a rational business justification, will not be predatory and conversely an act that has anti-competitive effects but does not result in the exclusion of a competitor is not prohibited by section 8(c).

[66]Both stages of the test are effect-based and objective. [57] Whether an act excludes competitors is a question of factual causation. Once it has been determined that an act excluded a competitor, the extent of the anti-competitive effect of this exclusion is established by examining whether there has been actual harm to consumers or a foreclosing effect on the market. [58] Actual harm to consumers occurs when, upon a competing firm's exit from the market, the dominant firm raises the price that it charges for goods and services in order to recoup the losses that it made while charging below-cost prices. This is known as recoupment. It is often difficult to prove that recoupment has taken place. [59] Consequently, anti-competitive effect can also be proven by showing that there has been a substantial effect on the structure of the market and that this is likely to indirectly harm consumers. The exit of a firm from the market, where this exit results in the elimination or reduction of competition, is the kind of structural change that is envisaged.

Proving predatory pricing

[67]There is a debate about whether predatory pricing even exists. Some commentators suggest that pricing below-cost, even in the short term, is irrational as it runs contrary to the principle of profit maximisation. [60] However, it is now settled that predation is a tactic used by some dominant firms to cement their ability to maximise profits in the future. [61] This is because by making short term losses which drive a competitor from the market, the dominant firm is able to set the higher price at which they can recoup their losses and continue to charge in the medium to long term. [62] The principle of short term profit maximisation still underpins market strategy. Consequently, a determination that a firm is purposefully loss-making, and thus sacrificing some of the money it could have been earning, may be indicative that greater scrutiny of its pricing model is required. [63]

[68]The cost standards that are central to the dispute before this Court become relevant here. Costs standards identify the various expenses in creating a product and running a firm. Pricing below a particular cost standard indicates that a firm is not recovering all of the costs incurred in producing a product. [64] This means these standards are useful to establish whether predation has taken place because they point to profit sacrifice on the part of the dominant firm. [65]

[69]However, all costs measures have short-comings. Marginal cost is criticised as being too difficult to calculate. [66] Average variable cost, which was developed to supplement these difficulties, is difficult to determine when the line between fixed and variable costs is blurred. [67] Average avoidable cost, which is generally considered to be the most readily ascertainable and calculable cost standard, still encounters problems where predation has occurred over a long period of time and it is difficult to determine which costs are avoidable and which are not. [68] Long run average incremental cost is accused of being biased against firms that produce only one product, as the calculation will not include common or joint costs. [69] With regard to average total cost, there are often rational business justifications for pricing below this standard and determining the costs included in it is practically difficult due to the element of discretion present in the allocation of common costs to products in multi-product firms. [70]

[70]This case requires the Court to evaluate the merits of two of these cost standards which were pleaded to illustrate that Media24 was participating in predatory pricing. The Competition Commission contends that pricing below average total cost could amount to predatory pricing if it is accompanied by additional evidence of intention to predate or a predatory scheme. Media24, on the other hand, submits that relying on average total cost plus additional evidence is an unreliable way of evaluating whether predation has occurred. Instead, Media24 proposes that average avoidable cost be used as the appropriate costs standard below, which prices charged indicate a violation of section 8(c). The Tribunal found in favour of the Competition Commission, while the Competition Appeal Tribunal agreed with Media24 and excluded average total cost plus additional evidence as a relevant cost measure.

[71]However, because of the difficulties inherent in all cost standards, it would not be wise for this Court to tie itself too closely to any particular cost standard. The ultimate concern in cases such as these should be whether pricing below a cost standard could lead, or led, to the exclusion of a competitor, which exclusion had anti-competitive effects that are not outweighed by the gains listed in section 8(c).

Profit sacrifice

[72]One of the crucial indicators of predatory pricing is profit sacrifice. This refers to a dominant firm deliberately incurring losses relative to alternative non-predatory conduct in the short-term by pricing its products too low. The profit sacrifice test assumes that a firm would not rationally engage in exclusionary conduct unless it considers the short-term loss of profits to be less than any expected gains achieved as a result of excluding or discouraging rivals. [71] When a firm prices below average avoidable cost (or average variable cost), sacrifice is easily established because the firm is actively making a loss on a particular product line. This is because the product-specific costs incurred are not being covered by the price that is charged for the product. It is presumed that there can be no rational justification for making such a loss and thus, the pricing is predatory. However, a firm that prices below average total cost is still participating in profit sacrifice even if it is not actively loss-making. Common costs are allocated to product-lines in multi-product firms on some rational accounting basis. However, management makes the conscious decision to sacrifice part of the contribution that the firm could, and in accounting terms, should be making to common costs in favour of charging lower prices.

[73]While profit sacrifice is relied upon in many cases of predatory pricing, criticism of the test does exist. Academics question whether the profit sacrifice test requires a firm to opt for the most profitable business strategy to avoid a finding of exclusionary conduct. It is also unclear what degree of sacrifice is required to establish exclusionary conduct, or whether the rule is strict in that any profit sacrifice indicates abuse. [72] In response to these criticisms, some jurisdictions, such as the United States, have adopted a variant of the test called the "no economic sense" test. [73] This test establishes that conduct is not exclusionary unless it would not make economic sense for a dominant firm to pursue this behaviour save for its tendency to eliminate or lessen competition. [74]

[74]By combining the usual test for profit sacrifice with the "no economic sense" test, other jurisdictions have been able to develop an approach to predatory pricing that ensures that only profit sacrifice which is undertaken exclusively to eliminate competitors is prohibited. This is essentially the same approach which the parties before us argue section 8(c) requires. It is clear from the discussion above that there is no one cost standard that best illustrates profit sacrifice in all cases. Instead, the circumstances of each case must be considered to determine which cost standard is most appropriate to prove that sacrifice has occurred.

Anti-competitive effects

[75]Once profit sacrifice is established, it must be determined whether the sacrifice excluded or could exclude a competitor with anti-competitive effects. [75] The anti-competitive effect element can be determined based on whether the below-cost pricing was for a legitimate business reason, or whether the only rationale was to drive competitors out of the market.

[76]In SAA, the Competition Tribunal held:

"If the conduct meets the requirements of the definition, we then enquire whether the exclusionary act has an anti-competitive effect. This question will be answered in the affirmative if there is (i) evidence of actual harm to consumer welfare or (ii) if the exclusionary act is substantial or significant in terms of its effect in foreclosing the market to rivals. This latter conclusion is partly factual and partly based on reasonable inferences drawn from proven facts. If the answer to that question is yes, we conclude that the conduct will have an anti-competitive effect. Whichever species of anti-competitive effect we have, consumer welfare or likely foreclosure, we have evidence of a quantitative nature and hence we can return to the scales with a concept capable of being measured against the alleged efficiency gain." [76]

[77]There are many legitimate business reasons why a firm might choose to price a product below average total cost. Two such examples come immediately to mind. First, the levels of competition in particular markets fluctuate over time. It may be, therefore, that new entrants can afford to charge lower prices and the dominant firm is forced to decrease its prices in the short-term to meet the prices that competitors are charging. [77] Second, when dominant firms want to encourage customers to become familiar with a product, they will drop the price of the product in the short-term as a promotion. [78] Neither of these price reductions are predatory because they are done with the intention of attracting customers and not of excluding competitors from the market. [79]

[78]Because of the multiple justifications that exist, pricing below average total cost is considered lawful in some jurisdictions, but competitors may adduce evidence to prove that, in the circumstances of the specific case, the pricing was predatory. The Tribunal relied on the decision of the European Court of Justice in AKZO, which is the seminal European authority for the contention that pricing below average total cost must be regarded as abusive if it is determined to be part of a plan for eliminating a competitor. [80] In terms of the rule established in AKZO, prices that are above average variable cost (or average avoidable cost) but below average total cost are only abusive when they are part of such an eliminatory plan, meaning that in all other instances, below average total cost pricing is considered to be lawful. [81] In terms of this decision, a plan is usually shown first through direct evidence of intent arising from the dominant firm's documents, and second through indirect factors which, taken together, show an anti-competitive intention underlying the price-cutting. [82]

[79]Europe is not the only jurisdiction that relies on the presumption that pricing below average total cost is lawful, but can be shown to be otherwise with additional evidence. The United States has not endorsed any particular cost standard and instead holds that predatory pricing must be shown to be below some measure of incremental cost. [83] This rule was articulated by the Supreme Court of the United States in Brooke Group, where the Court held that only below-cost pricing may be predatory. [84] In defining below-cost pricing, the Court held that this referred to pricing that was below the average total cost of producing a product. [85] Notably, the Court did not endorse average total cost but rather held that pricing anywhere below average total cost, including below the lower cost standards of marginal cost and average variable cost, may be predatory. Pricing below a measure of incremental cost is only the first stage of the inquiry used by the Court. The second stage requires that the competitor alleging that a dominant firm is engaged in predatory pricing show that there is a reasonable prospect or dangerous probability of the dominant firm recouping more than the losses incurred through below-cost pricing. [86]

[80]While the requirement of recoupment has made successful prosecution of predatory pricing in the United States nearly impossible, the above is confirmation of the fact that other jurisdictions accept that pricing below average total cost may be predatory if it is accompanied by other evidence of a predatory scheme or predatory effects.

Average avoidable cost or average total cost plus intent

[81]This case neither requires the Court to determine the correct test to prove predatory pricing nor to create a new test to be applied to section 8(c). Instead, this Court is called upon to decide whether the Competition Appeal Court's decision to exclude a cost standard from the section is correct. If there are instances where the use of average total cost plus additional evidence may be the best test for the Competition Commission to rely upon to prove predation, then the appeal must succeed.

[82]Average avoidable cost has gained prominence in the past few decades as a reliable standard to determine whether predatory pricing has occurred. Both American and European academics recommend it as the cost standard of choice, and EU Guidance states that average avoidable cost should be used as the starting point in investigations into predatory pricing. [87] It is true that average avoidable cost is generally accepted as the most readily ascertainable and reliable cost measure. [88] However, as discussed above, it is not without its problems. The most pressing of these exists in multi-product firms where assets are transferred or redeployed from one operation to another. It is not clear in those instances which costs are avoidable and which are not. [89] The Competition Commission asserted that average avoidable cost may be difficult to determine as it is inherently uncertain. Resultantly, average avoidable cost should not be used dogmatically as the test for predation in all alleged cases of predatory pricing.

[83]Media24 characterises average avoidable cost as never considering non-avoidable common costs. Non-avoidable common costs refer to non-product specific fixed and sunk costs. It also appears that average avoidable costs are calculated from the dominant firm's perspective and not from the perspective of the firm that is the victim of predation. However, pricing below the cost of recovering fixed costs or sunk costs may, in some instances, exclude competitors.

Multi-product firms

[84]The Competition Commission points to a few instances where fixed and sunk costs may contribute to the exclusion of a competitor. The first is where a multi-product firm is competing with an equally efficient single-product firm. Multi-product firms are firms which produce multiple product lines. The firm incurs product-specific fixed and variable costs for each product line but also has unavoidable costs that would be incurred regardless of how many different product lines the firm produced. These unavoidable costs are also referred to as common costs. The multi-product firm can spread out its common costs, with each product line contributing something to the recovery of these costs, while the single-product firm must incur and recover all of its costs from money made by one product. In order to compete with the multi-product firm which spreads out its common costs, the single-product firm would consistently be making a loss as it is not covering its fixed and sunk costs. In this situation the Competition Commission contends that average total cost may be the appropriate standard to use to evaluate whether predation has occurred because average total cost is the only standard which considers a portion of the company's common costs.

[85]The length of the period over which predatory prices were charged is relevant to determining whether pricing above average avoidable cost but below fixed and sunk costs had exclusionary effects. Alleged predatory prices that last only one month may not cause an equally efficient rival to lose any money by not exiting the market unless those prices are lower than the short-run costs incurred by operating on a month-to-month basis. [90] However, fixed and sunk costs become very relevant when low pricing occurs over a long period of time. Pricing that lasts for one or ten years will cause an equally efficient rival to lose money, relative to exiting the market, if the price does not allow it to cover the fixed costs of producing anything, like its overhead costs, the following year. Moreover, the longer a dominant firm prices at a low price, the less likely competitors would be able to make future capital payments for sunk costs like long-term property rent or maintenance of facilities. [91] In these cases, it would be cheaper for the competitor to exit the market than remain in it and attempt to compete with the dominant firm's prices.

[86]Some academics, including Elhauge, believe that the difficulties associated with average avoidable cost stemming from its exclusion of fixed and sunk costs can be rectified by simply changing the perspective from which costs are examined when calculating average avoidable cost. They contend that the common costs faced by the dominant firm should be viewed from the perspective of the competitor and would thus be avoidable. [92] When deciding whether to sign a new long-term lease or exit the market, the lease has yet to be signed and is thus avoidable to the competitor. Therefore, the cost of rent could be factored into the average variable cost below which the dominant firm cannot price.

[87]This approach, while intuitively appealing, faces a few obstacles. The first is that other commentators contend that it would be nonsensical to accuse a dominant firm of predatory pricing every time a competitor finds itself unable to make a profit. [93] Moreover, expecting a dominant firm to price above the average avoidable cost of its competitors is inherently uncertain as to which costs are avoidable as it depends on the circumstances that the competing firm finds itself in. It is unclear how a dominant firm would ascertain a competitor's average avoidable cost to ensure that pricing is above it. Due to this uncertainty, a cautious firm would price its goods based on the assumption that the firm that will accuse it of predation is a competitor who is yet to enter the market. This prospective competitor's average avoidable cost would be equal to its average total cost as it has yet to incur any fixed or sunk costs, making all costs avoidable. Media24 argues that it is dangerous to require firms to price above their average total cost as it will harm the economy in the long run. It is unclear, however, why the criticisms that Media24 level against average total cost would not equally apply to the situation described here. The final problem with this approach stems from the fact that Media24 pleaded average avoidable cost based on the costs incurred by the dominant firm, and not those from the perspective of the competitor. This approach was not challenged by the Competition Commission or criticised by either the Tribunal or the Competition Appeal Court. It appears therefore that, at least in the context of the present case, it is common cause that average avoidable cost is examined from the dominant firm's perspective.

[88]Average total cost is the one cost standard that allows regulators to look at fixed and sunk costs in order to determine whether pricing below these costs resulted in the exclusion of a competitor. In his scathing critique of the average total cost standard, Baumol argues that there is, in reality, no such thing as a single-product firm. [94] And as a result, the reliance on average total cost in instances where a single-product firm competes with a multi-product firm is only ever hypothetical. Even if single-product firms are indeed rare, it is far too much of a generalisation to assume that they do not exist outside of the pages of textbooks. Indeed, in the case before us, GNN was running a single-product firm for the duration of the alleged predation period even if it initially started out as a multi-product firm.

[89]The generally difficult task of calculating fixed and variable costs becomes more complex when a firm produces multiple products. [95] This is because the firm may have fixed and variable costs that are incurred jointly between the various products. [96] There is no unambiguous way of calculating what proportion of these common costs are incurred by any particular product. [97] There appears to be two approaches to the problem created by common costs in multi-product firms. The first is to ignore these costs altogether, while the second is to undertake the complicated task of allocating the costs between products. [98]

[90]The first approach essentially is to exclude common costs from all considerations of cost standards. [99] This approach is the one that is favoured by Media24 in that they argue that average avoidable cost, the cost measure which excludes common costs, is the most appropriate one to prove predation. This means that the only relevant concern is whether a price enables a firm to recover the product-specific costs of producing it, and not whether it is able to cover these costs and make a contribution towards common costs. [100] The problem with this approach is that it disadvantages competitors who produce only a single-product. Even if the firm is as efficient as the dominant firm, it may still be forced to exit the market as it must recover all of its costs from one product without the luxury of recovering common costs from different product lines. [101] This is the problem that the case before us presents.

[91]The second approach is to undertake to allocate the common costs between product lines in order to determine the average total cost of a particular product. [102] It is true that the calculation of this amount is complicated and cumbersome but other jurisdictions have developed guidelines for the allocation. In Claymore Dairies, the UK Competition Appeal Tribunal set out general guidance for the allocation of common costs. [103] The Tribunal held that:

"[t]here are conventional accounting methods for making such allocations (eg by volume, value, time, etc.) but the most appropriate yardstick to use may be debateable. One approach, shared by the expert witnesses in the present case, is to seek to identify "the cost drivers", ie to determine the factors that cause the costs to be incurred and then make allocations appropriately.

So far as possible, cost allocations should reflect the underlying business reality. A reasonably detailed understanding of the nature of the business, and how costs arise, is generally necessary when determining how particular costs should be allocated. Similarly, how the business itself treats the costs in its internal management accounts will normally be an invaluable source of information.

However the allocations are ultimately to be made, it is important in our view that the investigation is grounded on a firm and reliable assessment of what the total costs are, cross-checked as far as possible against the dominant undertaking's statutory and management accounts." [104]

[92]The above shows that while there may be difficulties with the allocation of common costs, it is neither an impossible task nor one that courts in other parts of the world are unwilling to undertake. Importantly, the use of any specific cost measure is motivated by the facts of the case. [105] For instance, where a multi-product dominant firm is operating in a market which has high barriers to entry, the long-run average incremental cost standard would likely be most appropriate and thus be used instead of average total cost. [106]

[93]In cases where a multi-product firm is predating an equally efficient single-product firm, it is the fact that the multi-product firm can spread out its common costs that contributes to the exclusion of the competitor. It would make sense therefore to consider common costs, and thus use average total cost, when evaluating whether predation has occurred in multi-product firms.

[94]The second example provided by the Competition Commission of a situation where fixed and sunk costs might lead to the exclusion of a competitor is where a less efficient competitor is the only firm competing with a dominant firm which would, but for that competitor, hold a monopoly in the market. As the firm is less efficient, it will not be able to compete with the prices levied by the dominant firm. While competition law is generally not concerned with protecting less efficient competitors, for the sake of protecting the market from monopoly, pricing below total costs should be considered as possibly exclusionary in this case. [107]

[95]The above illustrates that there are instances where it is possible to have profit-sacrificial conduct below average total cost which excludes an equally efficient competitor and thus, while pricing below average total cost should not be determinative of predation, it should be available to competition authorities. While the Competition Appeal Court is an expert body, the categorical exclusion of average total cost plus additional evidence of predation as a standard of proof is incorrect as it unduly limits the prosecutorial powers of the Competition Commission. This finding does not lay down a new standard, but rather makes the determination of the appropriate standard for predation dependent on the specific facts of each case.

Evidence of predation before the Tribunal

[96]Because there are often legitimate business justifications for pricing above average avoidable cost or average variable cost but below average total cost, the Tribunal held that pricing below average total cost alone was not sufficient to justify a finding of predation. [108] The Tribunal held that average total cost plus intent was an appropriate cost standard to examine in this case to establish whether predation occurred. While the test that it used has been colloquially referred to as "average total cost plus intent", it would be more accurate to describe it as "average total cost plus additional evidence including evidence of intent". This is because the Tribunal did not only examine evidence of subjective intention to predate. It relied on direct, subjective evidence of intention to predate, indirect and objective evidence of predation, evidence of recoupment and the equally efficient competitor test to show that the pricing below average total cost was executed for the purpose of eliminating GNN from the market. Tribunal specified the meaning and content of both subjective intention [110] and objective intention. [111] This judgment endorses the Tribunal's interpretation of these terms. [112]

Intent

[97]The Competition Commission argues that evidence of subjective intention to predate is not determinative of predatory pricing, but rather that this evidence has probative value when coupled with other evidence, including objective evidence that corroborates the subjective evidence of intention. This argument is a considerable departure from the arguments that the Competition Commission presented before the Tribunal and the Competition Appeal Court. Before those bodies, the Commission contended that average total cost plus evidence of subjective intention was definitive proof of predation.

[98]The angle that the Commission's argument before us takes in terms of subjective intent is in line with the manner that this form of intent is treated in other jurisdictions. The European Court of Justice has examined what constitutes direct evidence of intention to predate. In AKZO, the Court relied on documentary evidence of a detailed plan to eliminate the competitor. [113] In Tetra Pak II, the Court relied on a report by the company's board of directors indicating that financial sacrifices should be made to fight competition. [114] In Wanadoo, the Court held that subjective intent could be proven by looking at both formal presentations by management and informal remarks made by staff members but that the former had higher evidential value. [115]

[99]The European Courts do recognise the difficulties with direct or subjective evidence of intention to predate. In AKZO, the Commission noted that it does not consider an intention to prevail over competitors as unlawful. [116] Moreover, commentators suggest that the enforcement of competition law should not be dependent on whether a firm uses "commercially correct" language in its correspondence. [117] Resultantly, evidence of subjective intent is treated with caution even in Europe, being the jurisdiction which relies most heavily on intent as an element of predation.

[100]In response to these problems, reliance has been placed on indirect evidence of intent, which is really just objective evidence that assists a court to make inferences about the explanation for the below-cost pricing. [118] This encompasses evidence of a plausible predatory strategy in a particular market. [119] Examples of indirect evidence include the actual or likely exclusion of a competitor, whether certain customers are selectively targeted, the scale, duration, continuity of the low pricing, the possibility of the dominant firm off-setting its losses with profits earned on other sales and the possibility of recoupment of losses through a future return to high prices. [120] This approach was endorsed both in AKZO and Tetra Pak II. [121] However, when reliance is placed on indirect evidence, there must be a strong evidential basis for alleging that the below-cost pricing had no rational business justification. [122] If pricing below average total cost only makes commercial sense as part of a predatory strategy and there are no other reasonable explanations, indirect evidence will be sufficient to show that predation has occurred.

[112] n112 The Tribunal decision above fn 3 at paras (260)-(261) held that:"Direct intent is the type of intent that we have discussed up until now - that which emanates from the documents of the accused firm and statements by its employees. Indirect intent has a greater economic basis. Examples cited would be reputational reasons for predation, targeting of specific customers and competitors reliant on external funding.As the name suggests, indirect intention is not reliant on direct intention as expressed by the impugned firm but circumstantial economic evidence that may give rise to an inference that conduct is predatory. Indirect intention received more attention in a document that preceded the Guidance, which is referred to as the Discussion Paper, yet the approach to analysing indirect intention still forms part of the present Guidance."

[101]The European approach to pricing below average total cost appears to be in line with the only South African authority on predatory pricing in terms of section 8(c) - the Competition Tribunal decision in Nationwide. [123] The Tribunal held:

"[I]f a complainant, relying on section 8(c), can show that a respondent's costs are below some other appropriate measure of costs not mentioned in [section 8(d)(iv)] it may prevail provided it adduces additional evidence of predation beyond mere evidence of costs." [124]

[102]While the decision of the Competition Tribunal in Nationwide is obviously not binding on this Court, both the Competition Tribunal and the Competition Appeal Court referred to the extract approvingly, despite their disagreement over what additional evidence should entail. [125] Nationwide has therefore been accepted as a useful starting point by both of the specialist bodies on matters of competition law. In my view, average total cost may be an appropriate cost standard in some instances and courts should be given the power to investigate pricing that is below average total cost, including examining the additional evidence that is adduced to illustrate predation.

[103]The critiques of subjective evidence are compelling and justify an approach that illustrates that the management of a firm had the subjective intention to predate does not mean that this conduct had exclusionary effects. It appears that section 8(c) focuses on the effects that conduct has on competition and there is no reason why objective evidence cannot be presented to prove that pricing that excluded a competitor had anti- competitive effects that outweighed pro-competitive gains. This evidence would include objective, indirect evidence.

[104]Media24 raised a number of potential harms that a finding endorsing average total cost plus additional evidence as an appropriate cost standard would have on the South African economy. Most notably, they argued that dominant firms would, because of fear of allegations of predation, primarily charge prices above average total cost and that this would harm consumers because they would have to pay high prices for products. The second concern was that multi-product firms would be discouraged from growing their firms and running different product lines because those lines would be less profitable. This, it was submitted, would harm consumers as it would limit their product choices.

[105]Both of these eventualities are extremely undesirable. It is important, therefore, that the approach taken strikes an appropriate balance between under and over-enforcement. Pricing below average total cost that is to the benefit of consumers and competition in general should not be discouraged. As a result, pricing below average total cost should be considered lawful. However, competitors may raise additional evidence to prove that the profit sacrifice undertaken by the dominant firm was only beneficial to the dominant firm insofar as it excluded competitors. This is a high evidential burden. If pricing behaviour only makes commercial sense as part of a predatory strategy, and there are no other reasonable explanations, this will meet the burden.

[106]The Competition Commission presented various pieces of evidence to the Competition Appeal Court, all of which potentially pointed towards proving that predation had occurred. Some of the evidence proves the intention to predate. However, the balance of the evidence was objective and allegedly pointed towards predation being the only rational reason for the low prices charged and towards the anti-competitive effect of these prices. The Competition Appeal Court dismissed all of the additional evidence out of hand on the basis that intention has no role to play in the interpretation of section 8(c). This meant that it failed to examine any of the other evidence that, while framed as indirect evidence of intent, is in actual fact objective evidence to establish the purpose for which the below cost prices were charged.

Equally efficient competitor test

[107]Media24 alleged before the Tribunal that the reason for GNN's exit from the market was not related to Forum's pricing but instead occurred because GNN was a less efficient competitor that was unable to survive in a volatile market. [126] It was contended that average avoidable cost and not average total cost is the appropriate cost standard to use in cases involving section 8(c) because pricing above average avoidable cost will not lead to the exclusion of an equally efficient competitor. It is a fundamental principle of competition law that firms should be allowed to maximise their profits by charging prices that are lower than those charged by their competitors. [127] In general, "less efficient firms should not receive any protection from aggressive competition since consumers are best served by more efficient firms". [128] This is because competition law is concerned with protecting competition and not competitors. [129]

[108]It should be noted that the second example that the Competition Commission points to in respect of which average total cost may be an appropriate cost standard to rely upon is where a less efficient competitor is the only competitor preventing a dominant firm from becoming a monopoly. The Tribunal held that GNN and Forum were equally efficient but even if that was not the case, this may not be fatal to the Competition Commission's case. [130]

[109]There are concerns in academia about the equally efficient competitor test. The first concern is that less efficient competitors can increase consumer welfare if the increased competition that their presence in the market creates outweighs their relative inefficiency. [131] In Europe this has led to an acceptance that the duty to protect firms from predation is not limited to protecting equally efficient firms, but also, in exceptional circumstances, less efficient firms. [132]

[110]The second concern with the equally efficient competitor test arises in cases where economies of scope and scale dominate the market and competitors only compete for a limited portion of the market. [133] The European courts seek to overcome this obstacle by putting aside the advantages that the dominant firm derives from being an unavoidable competitor for a portion of the market and focusing instead on equal efficiency only for that portion of the market that is contestable. [134]

[111]It is important that economies of scale exist and that we do not prohibit legitimate competition on the merits. The protection of equally efficient firms only does not appear to be a hard-and-fast rule that must be applied in all investigations into potentially abusive pricing conduct. In terms of the definition of an "exclusionary act" in the Competition Act, [135] there is no textual basis which mandates the protection of equally efficient competitors only. The definition speaks merely of "a firm" being actually or potentially impeded or prevented and not an equally efficient firm. [136] Moreover, as discussed above, there are instances where the benefit that a competitor brings to the market through enhancing competition outweighs its inefficiency. The clearest example of this is where a dominant firm would be a monopoly but for the existence of one smaller, less efficient firm. The less efficient firm's existence protects consumers from monopoly pricing and thus benefits them greatly. International authorities appear to support the relaxing of the equally efficient competitor test in these circumstances. [137] This is the very instance that the Competition Commission relies upon to illustrate that pricing below average total cost may lead to exclusion in some cases.

[112]Further, in many industries the variable costs of large-scale production are cheaper than those associated with small-scale production. Here, new entrants are easily driven out of the market before they have had the opportunity to expand and reach their potential as an equally efficient competitor. [138] In markets which are already dominated by one or a few firms, new entry by firms is desirable, as is their allowance to blossom into large scale producers. [139] Given that the aims of the Competition Act include giving small- and medium-sized enterprises an equitable opportunity to participate in the economy, it would be inappropriate to rule that pricing below average total cost can never be predatory simply because it would not exclude an equally efficient competitor.

Recoupment

[113]The Tribunal found that there was evidence of recoupment by Media24. [140] Recoupment refers to the raising of prices by the dominant firm once the competitor has left the market. [141] The Commission alleged that once GNN had left the market, Media24 raised the prices that it was charging advertisers for advertising space in Vista.

[114]O'Donoghue and Padilla suggest that recoupment can be tested using two methods: either by examining the conduct itself or by looking at the structure of the market. [142] The examination of conduct refers to determining whether the predation has paid off in that it has enabled the dominant firm to raise its prices. Such an increase must be to a level that enables the firm to recoup the losses that it made previously. [143] To show that the structure of the market has changed, a number of factors can be examined. If the market share of a predator has grown, post predation, then it has gained power over a greater share of the market than it had before the predation period; in that sense there has been recoupment. [144] Other factors which indicate changes to the market structure include examining what barriers of entry have been created and whether there are significant constraints on the capacity of competitors to enter and survive in the market. [145]

[115]The Tribunal held that there was evidence of conduct of predation in that Media24 had raised its prices and there had been changes in the market structure as a result of GNN exiting the market. [146]

Treatment of evidence by the Competition Appeal Court

[116]The Competition Appeal Court held that average total cost plus intent was not an appropriate test to use to determine whether a violation of section 8(c) had occurred. It held that the test in section 8(c) for an exclusionary act is an objective one that examines the effect of conduct and not the intention behind it. [147] Moreover, the Court held that because all firms competing with one another on the merits intend to harm their competitors, with the potential result of their exit from the market, it is difficult to distinguish predatory intent from the intention to compete. [148] These criticisms are valid. However, they are largely directed at the subjective evidence of intent, and do not address the rest of the evidence which was objectively presented and aimed to show that the conduct had exclusionary effects.

[117]The Competition Appeal Court held that once the subjective evidence had been excluded, average total cost alone was not appropriate to illustrate that predation occurred. [149] The Court was correct to hold that unsupported evidence of subjective intention should be excluded from investigations into predatory pricing. However, the exclusion of this evidence does not require reliance on costing below average total cost alone as it is still supported by indirect, objective evidence of exclusionary effects, objective evidence of efficiency and objective evidence of recoupment.

[118]The failure to examine this evidence, particularly the evidence of recoupment is noteworthy, as many jurisdictions treat it as crucial to the establishment of predation. While the Competition Appeal Court may have concluded that there was insufficient evidence to prove recoupment, or that the indirect evidence and evidence of efficiency did not exclude all explanations for the below cost pricing, it was important for the Court to scrutinise the evidence to ensure the protection of consumer welfare. By failing to examine this evidence and excluding the average total cost standard altogether, the Competition Appeal Court impermissibly limited the ability of the Competition Commission to investigate, prosecute and present evidence of violations of section 8(c).

Remittal

[119]The Competition Appeal Court made no finding as to whether Media24 had participated in predatory pricing based on the average total cost plus additional evidence test. The court dismissed the evidence of intention and found that average total cost alone is not sufficient to ever prove predation. It is true that average total cost alone is not sufficient to prove predation but this Court has now held that, where below average total cost pricing is alleged, a complaint may be found to have statutory warrant if there is significant additional evidence that the pricing was purely to predate and had anti-competitive effects. The question whether Media24 participated in predatory pricing remains open and the parties requested that it be remitted to the Competition Appeal Court to make a final decision on this in the event that average total cost plus additional evidence was found to be an appropriate test.

[120]This Court has previously ordered that matters be remitted to lower courts when it would be just and equitable to do so. [150] The question whether Media24 engaged in predatory pricing based on the test that this Court has formulated is a question of fact combined with a question of economics. The Competition Appeal Court heard extensive arguments about the additional evidence proffered by the Competition Commission despite opting not to make findings based on it. The Court has had the advantage of oral testimony and cross-examination that will best allow it to assess the expert evidence that was presented. Moreover, this Court does not have jurisdiction to determine pure questions of fact. The examination of evidence and a subsequent finding on the validity of the predation complaint would require this Court to investigate factual questions without having properly tested the evidence.

[121]The remittal of this matter to the Competition Appeal Court does not mean that Media24 will necessarily be found guilty of predation. As discussed above, the evidentiary burden placed upon a complainant alleging that predation has occurred due to pricing below average total cost is high. However, the remittal will compel the Competition Appeal Court to scrutinise the evidence presented and then come to a decision about whether predation has taken place. This is an additional accountability mechanism to ensure that dominant firms do not abuse their power and monopolise markets. This mechanism is important given that the Competition Act envisages the empowerment of small and medium-sized businesses and a more equitable share in the market by previously disadvantaged persons. [151]

Conclusion

[122]The Competition Commission has wide investigatory powers. This Court has recently held that the protection of these powers is paramount as it empowers the Commission to fulfil its envisaged role. [152] However, the decision of the Competition Appeal Court limits its prosecutorial powers arising from investigations which concluded that abuses of dominance had occurred. The Competition Appeal Court has dismissed all evidence of intention as irrelevant, even where that evidence is objective and points towards the effects of conduct rather than the motivation behind it. The Court's failure to look past the subjective evidence and consider the objective evidence relating to recoupment and efficiency has severely hamstrung the ability of the Commission to prosecute cases where the fixed and sunk costs included in average total cost have contributed to the exclusion of a competitor. The Commission should be empowered to plead whatever costs benchmark best suits the facts of the case. This should include allowing the Commission to plead average total cost when there is sufficient additional evidence to illustrate that the pricing was lowered for no rational reason besides to force the exit of a competitor.

[123]In the result, I would have made the following order:

1.Leave to appeal is granted.

2.The appeal is upheld to the extent that the finding by the Competition Appeal Court, that pricing below average total cost plus additional evidence is an inappropriate standard to establish a violation of section 8(c) of the Competition Act 89 of 1998, is set aside.

3.The matter is remitted to the Competition Appeal Court to determine whether Media24 engaged in predatory pricing.

4.Media24 is ordered to pay costs of the applicant, which costs shall include the costs of two Counsel.

(Mogoeng CJ and Dlodlo AJ concurred in the judgment of Goliath AJ.)

Cameron, Froneman and Khampepe JJ:

[124]We have had the privilege of reading the judgments of Goliath AJ ("first judgment") and Theron J ("third judgment"). Whilst we admire the breadth of the first judgment's treatment of predatory pricing benchmarks and recognise the added justification for doing so in the third judgment, we do not think it is in the interests of justice for this Court to embark on an exercise of that kind. In short, we doubt whether we have jurisdiction to entertain the application for leave to appeal and, even if we have, we do not consider it to be in the interests of justice to grant leave. We would therefore dismiss the application for leave to appeal.

[125]The first judgment considerably extends the constitutional jurisdiction of this Court in respect of the workings of the Competition Act. [153] Previous cases have found constitutional jurisdiction in determining the boundaries of the powers and functions of the public bodies of the competition institutions created by the Competition Act, a legality issue. [154] This is not the starting point for finding constitutional jurisdiction in the first judgment. Understandably so, because section 8 of the Competition Act is not a provision that purports to delineate those boundaries. So the first judgment seeks the constitutional jurisdictional links elsewhere.

[126]The first purported link is equality:

"Section 2(e) and (f) of the Act states that part of the purpose of the Competition Act is to ensure that small and medium-sized business have equitable opportunities to participate in the economy and to promote a greater spread of ownership in the economy by those who were disadvantaged by apartheid. These purposes implicate the right of equality contained in section 9 of the Constitution. Section 9(2) enjoins the State to take legislative and other measures to advance the equality of previously disadvantaged people and section 2(e) and (f) of the Competition Act is a legislative measure of this kind." [155]

[127]The effect of this is to make the interpretation and application of the entire Competition Act a constitutional matter for purposes of the jurisdiction of this Court. This would mimic the way that the interpretation and application of the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act ("PAJA") [156] and the Labour Relations Act ("LRA") [157] are innately constitutional matters because they give legislative expression to fundamental rights in the Constitution. [158] But the PAJA and the LRA templates are not appropriate.

[128]First, the analogy is inapt. The Competition Act is not the legislation the Constitution mandated to give effect to the right to equality in the way that PAJA and the LRA are statutes specifically mandated by the Constitution in terms of, respectively, the rights to just administrative action [159] and fair labour rights. [160] The Competition Act is just legislation. It has no elite constitutional allure. All legislation must conform to the constitutional imperative of equality.

[129]Second, this roundabout way of seeking a legislative link in the Constitution's equality clause is unnecessary. If the interpretation and application of the provisions of the Competition Act do infringe the equality clause, this Court would have constitutional jurisdiction in any event, by virtue of that infringement alone. But this was not the basis on which the Commission brought its application. And notably and rightly, the first judgment does not dispose of the merits of the matter on equality grounds.

[130]The next link is said to reside in the indirect impact on the investigatory powers of the competition authorities:

"The effect of the Competition Appeal Court judgment is to limit the tools that the Commission has at its disposal to prove a violation of section 8(c).

This is because on the test it applied, it was unnecessary to examine certain evidence regarding predation. While evaluations under section 8(c) are economic in nature, a limitation of the investigative and prosecutorial powers of the Commission may have adverse consequences. Surely, if the ambit of the Commission's investigatory powers raises a constitutional issue, the ambit of its ability to bring prosecutions based on findings made during investigation is, by parity of reasoning, similarly constitutional. What would be the purpose of the strong investigatory powers of the Competition Commission if it cannot present all of the evidence that it has gathered in order to prosecute an offence?" [161]

[131]Apart from the objection that this is a "tail wagging the dog" argument, in that the tools to prove a violation and not the violation itself become the issue, it also entails that any wrongful exclusion of evidence in proceedings before the Tribunal and Competition Appeal Court will necessarily have a constitutionally significant impact on the investigatory powers of the Commission. As a general proposition this has attraction, but closer examination reveals that it has nothing to do with the legality issue relating to the nature and extent of the Commission's investigatory powers, which is a constitutional issue.

[132]Those investigatory powers are set out in section 21(1)(c) of the Competition Act. This section empowers the Competition Commission to investigate alleged violations of Chapter 2 of the Competition Act. A finding by the Tribunal or the Competition Appeal Court on what evidence may be led at a hearing into violations of Chapter 2 does not in any way diminish the legal competence of the Commission to investigate these violations. To hold that it does would be tantamount to saying, in other settings, that any ruling on excluding the admissibility of evidence in a criminal matter necessarily impacts on the powers of the South African Police Service to investigate crime. Any evidential matter then becomes a constitutional legality issue. That is not correct.

[133]This Court's decisions in SOS and Hosken offer no support for the proposition. They both dealt with the competence of the Commission to investigate specified aspects of merger activity under the Competition Act, not the manner in which the investigations should be executed. Whether the Commission has the competence to investigate particular subject matter under the Competition Act raises legality issues; what evidence it may legally present before the adjudicative bodies established under the Competition Act after its investigation does not.

[134]The first judgment finds final jurisdictional solace on the ground that the Commission's case raises an arguable point of law of general public importance, namely "whether pricing above average avoidable cost but below average total cost amounts to predation [which] requires the interpretation of the law relating to exclusionary acts and the consideration of which tests can be used to equitably establish predation". [162] The third judgment adds further justification for this jurisdictional ground. This does not, however, establish any persuasive basis for this Court to exercise its jurisdiction. It is only in those rare instances where purely legal issues of interpretation arise in the work of the Tribunal and the Competition Appeal Court that this Court should intervene. This is not one of those rare cases, because it does not raise a purely legal issue, but a mixed one of fact and law.

[135]And that is where the problem lies and remains, because mixed questions of fact and law require evaluative assessments, [163] and it is precisely those assessments that it is not the function of this Court to tread into.

[136]The adjudicative institutions under the Competition Act are expert bodies and due recognition must be given to this, also in determining the proper constitutional competence of this Court in relation to competition matters. In addition to the accepted deference given to other courts in relation to factual findings, [164] this means a similar deference to the competition authorities as better qualified to determine economic issues. In Yara, Cameron J stated:

"In considering whether it is in the interests of justice to allow an appeal directly to this Court, the nature of the matter is relevant. In the same way as the views of the Supreme Court of Appeal are particularly pertinent in common law matters, so are the views of the Competition Appeal Court, as a specialist body, important in competition matters that lie at the complex intersection of law and economics." [165]

[137]Determining the appropriate benchmark for predatory pricing under section 8(c) of the Competition Act inevitably depends on an assessment of the relative merits of expert evidence in that regard. That does not fall within the functional competence of this Court. [166] It is not a purely legal interpretative exercise. Section 167(3)(b)(ii) requires that this Court "ought to" consider the legal point. As Paulsen trenchantly explained:

"[i]f - for whatever reason - it is not in the interests of justice for this Court to entertain what is otherwise an arguable point of law of general public importance, then that point is not one that 'ought to be considered by [this] Court'." [167]

And even if one clothes it as an assessment of the reasonableness of the Competition Appeal Court's assessment, one cannot escape that, in reality, it involves second-guessing the relative merits of different expert views.

[138]The final proof of this is in the remedy favoured in the first judgment: referral back to the Competition Appeal Court. What option does the Competition Appeal Court have other than to allow evidence of intention now? And how can we avoid the blunt reality that by compelling the Competition Appeal Court to allow evidence of intention this Court is itself setting the appropriate benchmark - in specialist territory that the statute specifically entrusts to that Court?

[139]For these reasons we would dismiss the application for leave to appeal with costs, including the costs of two Counsel.

(Petse AJ concurred in the judgment of Cameron, Froneman and Khampepe JJ.)

[140]I have had the pleasure of reading the well-crafted judgments of my colleagues Goliath AJ ("first judgment") and Cameron J, Froneman J and Khampepe J ("second judgment"). I concur in the first judgment that we have jurisdiction to adjudicate the appeal as it raises an arguable point of law of general public importance. I also concur that it would be in the interests of justice to grant leave to appeal. [168]

[141]I, however, part ways with the first judgment and find that the Competition Appeal Court was correct in holding that the adoption of a test for predatory pricing under section 8(c) of the Competition Act that is based on the average total cost standard and the intention of a dominant firm is inappropriate. In this regard, I am of the view that the interpretation adopted by the first judgment of section 8(c) of the Competition Act is contrary to the objectives of the Competition Act and may serve to severely undermine price competition and in so doing harm consumer welfare.

Jurisdiction

[142]In my view, and for the reasons given in the second judgment, this case does not raise a constitutional matter. It does, however, raise an arguable point of law of general public importance that ought to be considered by this Court.

[143]In Paulsen, this Court explained that a point of law is one that is not factual. [169] In K, this Court held (in the context of vicarious liability) that what renders an issue legal (and, in that context, potentially constitutional) as opposed to purely factual, is an enquiry into the social policy and normative content behind a rule. [170] When this Court is called upon to examine the otherwise inarticulate premises in the normative implications of a rule that is, in my view, a legal enquiry. [171] To view this examination, even in the context of where a common law rule is imbued with social norms as in K, as a factual enquiry over which this Court has no jurisdiction will "sterilise" the law and "purge it from any normative, social or economic considerations". [172]

[144]In this case, there is clearly a point of law: is it appropriate to determine whether prices are predatory in terms of section 8(c) of the Competition Act by considering the average total cost standard and the intention of a dominant firm to predate? Answering this question entails critically examining the policy and normative implications of the various standards for predatory pricing. There is nothing factual about this. On the contrary, the facts in this case are common cause: all parties agree that Media24 was pricing below average total cost (but above the standard of average avoidable cost). The question in this matter is legal. No facts are evaluated by this Court. [173]

[145]I also agree with the first judgment's argument that the Competition Act should not be read to deprive this Court of jurisdiction over arguable points of law of general public importance. [174] In this regard, section 62(2)(b) and (3)(b) of the Competition Act states that the Competition Appeal Court does not have exclusive and final appeal jurisdiction for those matters that raise constitutional issues. In Soda Ash, albeit in a slightly different context, the

If one looks at the principle of vicarious liability through the prism of s 39(2) of the Constitution, one realises that characterising the application of the common-law principles of vicarious liability as a matter of fact untrammelled by any considerations of law or normative principle cannot be correct. Such an approach appears to be seeking to sterilise the common law test for vicarious liability and purge it of any normative or social or economic considerations. Given the clear policy basis of the rule as well as the fact that it is a rule developed and applied by the courts themselves, such an approach cannot be sustained under our new constitutional order. This is not to say that there are no circumstances where rules may be applied without consideration of their normative content or social impact. Such circumstances may exist. What is clear, however, is that as a matter of law and social regulation, the principles of vicarious liability are principles which are imbued with social policy and normative content."

Supreme Court of Appeal similarly interpreted the Competition Act to be consonant with the appellate jurisdiction that was conferred on the Supreme Court of Appeal by the Constitution (prior to the 17th Amendment). [175] The approach adopted in Soda Ash is equally apposite in this context: where it would not be unduly strained, as in this case, section 62(2) of the Competition Act must be interpreted to accord with section 167(3)(b)(ii) of the Constitution which founds this Court's jurisdiction. Our jurisdiction is accordingly engaged.

Leave to appeal

[146]Though this matter raises an arguable point of law of general public importance, it does not follow that it "ought to be considered" by this Court. In Paulsen, this Court explained that an arguable point should only be considered by this Court if it would be in the interests of justice to do so. This enquiry is identical to that employed by this Court in establishing whether leave to appeal should be granted in respect of a constitutional matter. [176]

[147]Media24 posited two reasons why leave to appeal should not be granted. First, it argued that the Commission should have approached the Competition Appeal Court for leave to appeal before approaching this Court. Second, it argued that the Commission should have also first approached the Supreme Court of Appeal before appealing to this Court.

Approaching the Competition Appeal Court for leave to appeal

[148]Media24 argued that section 63(2) of the Competition Act always requires the Commission to apply to the Competition Appeal Court for leave to appeal to this Court against a decision of that Court. [177] It contended that the Commission's failure to do so was fatal with the result that this Court cannot hear the Commission's appeal.

[149]Section 63(2) of the Competition Act provides:

"An appeal in terms of section 62(4) may be brought to the Supreme Court of Appeal or, if it concerns a constitutional matter, to the Constitutional Court, only -

(a)with leave of the Competition Appeal Court; or

(b)if the Competition Appeal Court refuses leave, with leave of the Supreme Court of Appeal or the Constitutional Court, as the case may be." [178]

[150]Media24 submitted that:

(a)the word "only" in section 63(2) implies that an application for leave to appeal in the Competition Appeal Court is a necessary condition for approaching this Court;

(b)the purpose of a prior approach to the Competition Appeal Court for leave to appeal ensures that this Court enjoys the views of that specialist Court; and [176] n176 Paulsen above fn 167 at paras (29)-(31).

[177] n177 Such matters are listed in s 62(2) read with s 62(3)(b) and this Court's finding that s 62(2) must include appeals concerning "arguable points of law of general public importance".

[178] n178 S 62(4) reads that "(a)n appeal from a decision of the Competition Appeal Court in respect of a matter within its (non-exclusive) jurisdiction in terms of (s 62(2)) lies to the Supreme Court of Appeal or Constitutional Court, subject to s 63 and their respective rules".

(c)section 167(6)(b) of the Constitution envisages the promulgation of national legislation to allow for a direct appeal from any other court, [179] and the Competition Act is consistent with this. The Competition Act allows for a direct appeal to be made to this Court only after the procedural step of applying to the Competition Appeal Court for leave to appeal has been complied with.

[151]The challenge for Media24 is that the third leg of its argument cannot be accepted. This is for the reasons given by Cameron J and Yacoob J in their dissenting judgments in Yara [180] and Loungefoam. [181] Their reasoning in Yara is that the right to appeal to this Court under section 62(4) of the Competition Act is made subject to any law that specifically grants any right of appeal. [182] Section 167(6)(b) of the Constitution requires that national legislation or the Rules of this Court "must" allow a person to bring a matter directly to this Court when it is in the interests of justice to do so. [183] Section 167(6)(b) specifically grants a right of direct appeal to this Court. It follows that the right to appeal provided for in section 62(4) of the Competition Act must be subject to section 167(6)(b) of the Constitution, which gives persons the right of a direct appeal to this Court if the interests of justice require. [184]

[152]If a right to appeal in section 62(4) of the Competition Act is subject to section 167(6)(b) of the Constitution, then an applicant is entitled to rely on the pre-existing right to appeal directly to this Court in terms of rule 19 of this Court's Rules. This pre-existing right does not require that an applicant first obtain leave to appeal from the Court below. Moreover, an applicant need not rely on the right in section 62(4) of the Competition Act, which is subjected to the restriction in section 63(2)(a) (that leave of the Competition Appeal Court to appeal against its judgment must be applied for). An applicant is empowered to appeal directly to this Court without first seeking the leave of the Competition Appeal Court.

[153]However, where the leave of the Competition Appeal Court is not sought, and the procedure in rule 19(2) of this Court's Rules is invoked by an applicant, the matter is a direct appeal. In these circumstances, this Court must assess whether it is in the interests of justice to entertain the appeal without the Competition Appeal Court having had an opportunity to consider the application for leave to appeal. [185] Factors which will influence this assessment include the nature of the matter, the prospects of success of the appeal, the significance of the issues raised, whether the views of the Competition Appeal Court are useful or necessary to determine the appeal, and whether the subject matter of the appeal implicates complex questions of economics and law. [186]

[154]Both Yara and Loungefoam were handed down on the same day by this Court, but were heard in different terms and have slightly different quorums. It is worth mentioning that the minority's reasoning in Yara, while not endorsed by the majority in that matter, was considered to be "appealing" and assumed to be correct in the partial concurrence of Froneman J (with Skweyiya J and Van der Westhuizen J concurring) in Yara. [187] The issue whether the Competition Appeal Court must first be approached for leave to appeal was left open in the judgment of Zondo AJ (with Jafta J and Nkabinde J concurring). [188] It follows that no Justice of this Court has objected to the minority's reasoning in Yara and a majority found it to be, at the very least, "appealing".

[155]As in Yara, the majority in Loungefoam, per Maya AJ did not consider it necessary to decide the issue regarding section 63(2) and approaching this Court without the leave of the Competition Appeal Court. [189] The minority invoked their reasoning in Yara for why, in Loungefoam, the Commission did not need to approach the Competition Appeal Court for leave to appeal before this Court could consider the appeal. [190]

[156]On the facts of this case, do the interests of justice permit the Commission to approach this Court directly? It is true that this matter involves complex questions of law and economics. This suggests that the Commission should be required to first approach the Competition Appeal Court for leave to appeal. On the other hand, this Court has had the benefit of comprehensive argument. In addition, it has access to two judgments of the Tribunal and the Competition Appeal Court; these judgments each reach divergent conclusions on the relevant issues, which, along with reasons that will become apparent, indicate that there may be prospects of success; [191] the matter primarily concerns statutory interpretation; and the determination of the proper legal test for predatory pricing is of immense significance. For these reasons, leave to appeal ought to be granted notwithstanding the Commission's failure to approach the Competition Appeal Court for leave to appeal.

Failure to approach the Supreme Court of Appeal

[157]Media24 argued that even if the Commission was not required to approach the Competition Appeal Court for leave to appeal, the Commission should first have appealed to the Supreme Court of Appeal before coming to this Court. Their argument was that section 168(3)(a) of the Constitution anticipates that legislation may limit the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Appeal in competition matters; [192] Loungefoam held that sections 62 and 63 of the Competition Act confer appellate jurisdiction on the Supreme Court of Appeal in respect of matters mentioned in section 62(2) of the Competition Act; [193] therefore sections 62 and 63 of the Competition Act confer on the Supreme Court of Appeal jurisdiction in competition matters falling within section 62(2) of the Competition Act. It follows that the Commission could have applied to the Supreme Court of Appeal. There is then no reason why it would be in the interests of justice to allow it to bypass that Court.

[158]The Commission agreed that section 168(3)(a) removes the Supreme Court of Appeal's jurisdiction to hear appeals in respect of competition matters. The extent of such removal may be determined by an Act of Parliament. However, the Commission argued that sections 62 and 63(2), properly interpreted, do not give the Supreme Court of Appeal jurisdiction to hear appeals arising from the Competition Appeal Court that concerned constitutional matters under section 62(2)(b). Section 63(2) provides that an appeal "may be brought to the Supreme Court of Appeal or, if it concerns a constitutional matter, to the Constitutional Court".

[189] n189 Loungefoam above fn 30 at para (24).

[190] n190 Id at para (32).

[191] n191 Similarly, this makes the point of law "arguable" as envisaged in Paulsen above fn 167 at para (23). It is also trite that prospects of success are an important factor in determining leave to appeal. See S v Boesak (2000) ZACC 25; 2001 (1) SA 912 (CC); 2001 (1) BCLR 36 (CC) at para (12).

[192] n192 The section was amended in 2012 by the 17th Amendment to the Constitution to read:"The Supreme Court of Appeal may decide appeals in any matter arising from the High Court of South Africa or a court of a status similar to the High Court of South Africa, except in respect of labour or competition matters to such extent as may be determined by an Act of Parliament."

[193] n193 Once again, s 62(2)(b) is now to be read as including arguable points of law.

[159]In support of its argument, the Commission invoked the Supreme Court of Appeal's decision in Computicket. [194] In that matter, that Court held that section 63(2) of the Competition Act excludes the Supreme Court of Appeal from hearing an appeal which raises a constitutional matter as envisaged in section 62(2)(b). The Supreme Court of Appeal read section 61(2)(b) to mean that appeals concerning constitutional matters must be determined by this Court; they cannot "also" be entertained by the Supreme Court of Appeal. [195] This approach would prevent a case which had already gone through two courts (the Tribunal and the Competition Appeal Court) from being considered by two further courts (the Supreme Court of Appeal and this Court) ostensibly without justification. [196]

[160]On the face of it, Computicket appears to contradict Loungefoam. In Loungefoam this Court held that the Competition Act confers "appellate jurisdiction on both the Supreme Court of Appeal and this Court from the Competition Appeal Court in respect of constitutional and other matters listed in section 62(2)" and that this "is evident from the plain wording of sections 62 and 63". [197] This Court also held that the Commission had not demonstrated why the Supreme Court of Appeal should be bypassed - a finding that presupposes that the Supreme Court of Appeal was vested with jurisdiction to adjudicate the appeal in question. [198] This Court could not have been clearer about its interpretation of the Competition Act:

"Further, until the Legislature decides otherwise, the Supreme Court of Appeal also serves as a further filter in the appellate hierarchy, even in matters that do not explicitly involve the development of the common law." [199]

[161]The first judgment appears to pronounce on this question in favour of the Commission by finding that the Supreme Court of Appeal no longer has jurisdiction over matters envisaged in section 62(2)(b) of the Competition Act as contemplated in Computicket. Its terse reasoning is that the 17th Amendment clearly removes the Supreme Court of Appeal's jurisdiction. [200] It does not deal with this Court's finding in Loungefoam that appellate jurisdiction is also conferred on the Supreme Court of Appeal from the Competition Appeal Court. It also fails to deal with whether section 63(2) nonetheless gives the Supreme Court of Appeal jurisdiction over section 62(2) matters as envisaged by the 17th Amendment. [201] It also does not have regard to the further complication flowing from its finding that arguable points of law are also appealable under section 62(2)(b). This finding might imply that the Supreme Court of Appeal can no longer adjudicate appeals from the Competition Appeal Court concerning an arguable point of law. This approach could severely restrict the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Appeal in competition matters.

[162]At the same time, the first judgment considers whether it is in the interests of justice to hear the appeal without the Supreme Court of Appeal having adjudicated it first. [202] It is accordingly unclear whether the first judgment's finding that the Supreme Court of Appeal lacks jurisdiction is obiter.

[163]In my view, the issue is best left open. I am prepared to assume in Media24's favour that the Commission could have approached the Supreme Court of Appeal. Even then, this is not fatal to the Commission's case. The interests of justice permit this Court to decide a matter without the Supreme Court of Appeal having heard it first.

This is for the same reasons why it was not necessary for the Commission to seek the leave of the Competition Appeal Court to appeal the judgment. [203]

Functional competence

[164]The second judgment suggests that this matter falls outside the functional competence of this Court as it entails an evaluative assessment of economic policy issues. I agree that the first judgment's interpretation of the Competition Act implicates economic policy considerations. This Court has, however, repeatedly adjudicated over complex questions of public policy. In my opinion, there is no sound reason why public policy considerations of an economic nature suddenly swing the interests of justice in the opposite direction. The matter is properly before us and we should not shy away from our duty to determine the policy-laden issue of general public importance that it raises. [204]

[165]For these reasons, leave to appeal should be granted.

Merits

[166]On the merits, the first judgment reaches two conclusions:

(a)A firm can be guilty of predatory pricing if it charges prices above average avoidable cost; [205] and

(b)A firm can be guilty of predatory pricing if it charges prices below average total cost [206] and has an intention to predate.

[167]I agree with the first judgment on its first finding. [207] There may be instances where a firm charges above average avoidable cost but it is still guilty of predatory pricing. There is no need to spell out these circumstances in any detail. The Commission before us has pinned its case on one circumstance in which a firm would be guilty of predatory pricing even though it charged prices above its average avoidable cost. The Commission argued that where a firm with an intention to predate prices between average total cost and above average avoidable cost, then that firm is guilty of predatory pricing. I disagree that either average total cost or an intention to predate can ever be relevant to determining predatory pricing. This is borne out from a proper interpretation of section 8(c) of the Competition Act. For the reasons that follow, the Commission's appeal should be dismissed.

Proper approach to predatory pricing under section 8(c) of the Competition Act

[168]To determine the proper approach to prohibited predatory pricing under section 8(c) of the Competition Act, we are enjoined to interpret section 8(c) purposively, within its proper context, and in accordance with the ordinary grammatical meaning of its words. [208]

[205] n205 This standard is based on the costs a firm could have avoided by not engaging in a predatory strategy. The costs standard includes an element of fixed costs known as product-specific fixed costs. These are the fixed costs associated with the product or service that would not be incurred by the firm if it were to avoid producing the product or providing the service. See Competition Appeal Court judgment above fn 4 at para (19).

[206] n206 The average total cost standard advocated for by the Commission is calculated by dividing the total costs incurred by Forum in the production of its product by the number of units of the product that Forum produces. In this regard, Forum's total costs include both its variable and fixed costs.

[207] n207 To the extent that the Competition Appeal Court found otherwise, it must be overturned.

[208] n208 Road Traffic Management Corporation v Waymark (Pty) Limited (2019) ZACC 12 at para (29).

[169]A key objective of the Competition Act is to provide consumers with competitive prices. [209] A dominant firm may adopt a strategy of reducing its prices to exclude competitors from the market. This strategy may have short term pro-competitive effects for the economy in that prices for the goods or services in question are reduced. In the long term, however, the adoption of such a predatory pricing strategy may empower the firm to further abuse its position of dominance with exclusionary anti-competitive effects. The adoption of this predatory pricing strategy would not only lead to the undermining of competitive prices, but would violate the Competition Act's objective of reducing "excessive concentrations of ownership and control within the national economy". [210]

[170]The regulation of predatory pricing poses significant challenges. The Competition Act recognises that firms have a right to compete on price. In this regard, the adequate protection of the competitive process between firms is essential to the achievement of the Competition Act's objective of providing consumers with competitive prices. [211]

[171]This inherent tension that is associated with predatory pricing implies that the approach adopted to determine the existence of exclusionary abuses of dominance under section 8(c) of the Competition Act should be carefully developed to avoid two types of errors, (commonly referred to as type 1 and 2 errors, respectively):

(a)first, errors in which there is false condemnation of a dominant firm's pricing behaviour as constituting prohibited predatory pricing; [212] and

(b)second, errors in which there is a failure to condemn predatory pricing by a dominant firm.

[172]In Nationwide, the Tribunal held that section 8(c) requires the use of an appropriate measure of costs to assess the prices that are charged by a firm accused of adopting a prohibited predatory pricing strategy. [213] This must be correct because section 8(c) of the Competition Act, when interpreted in line with the object of the Competition Act to provide consumers with competitive prices, requires that a firm should not be penalised for merely reducing its prices. Additional evidence would also be required to demonstrate that the general requirements for prohibited exclusionary abuses of dominance in section 8(c) are met.

[173]Section 8(c) of the Competition Act does not prescribe the application of a specific test to determine whether a dominant firm has engaged in prohibited predatory pricing. Section 8(d)(iv) of the Competition Act, however, states that the selling of goods or services by a dominant firm below the marginal or average variable costs is a prohibited exclusionary act unless the firm is able to show that the technological, efficiency or other pro-competitive gains associated with the act outweigh its anti-competitive effect. In Senwes, we held that an exclusionary act must fall outside the scope of section 8(d) for it to be prohibited by section 8(c). [214] It follows that a complaint of predatory pricing brought in terms of section 8(c) of the Competition Act may not be founded on the cost formulas prescribed in section 8(d)(iv).

[174]I intend to demonstrate that the consideration of either average total cost or predatory intent under section 8(c) will lead to the type 1 and 2 errors referred to and consequently undermine the objectives of the Competition Act.

Is average total cost an appropriate standard to measure alleged unlawful predatory pricing?

[209] n209 S 2(b) of the Competition Act.

[211] n211 See the Competition Appeal Court judgment above fn 4 at para (27).

[212] n212 For example, where a firm might have low prices (and is competing on the price) but is still labelled as predatory by the regulation in question.

[213] n213 Nationwide above fn 123 at 10.

[214] n214 Senwes above fn 56 at para (28).

[175]The key question raised in this case is whether it is appropriate to measure prices against the standard of average total cost. The answer is no. This is for four reasons.

[176]First, a firm could be pricing below average total cost, which includes fixed costs, but still be engaging in legitimate competition. For example, where the price is sufficient to cover the avoidable cost for producing the unit, the firm may still be acting competitively by producing that unit even if the price is less than the average total cost. To hold otherwise would prevent firms from producing new products in circumstances where they would be deriving more benefits than costs from such production.

[177]Second, the use of a dominant firm's average total cost in the determination of whether it has engaged in prohibited predatory pricing may operate as a price floor. This is because, if the average total cost standard is endorsed, a dominant firm that wishes to avoid being found to have engaged in a prohibited exclusionary abuse under section 8(c) may seek to avoid pricing its goods or services below its average total cost. This might encourage firms to raise their prices, especially in light of the potentially severe sanctions which they face under the Competition Act for engaging in prohibited exclusionary abuses of dominance. This price floor would undermine the objective of the Competition Act by inhibiting the achievement of competitive prices.

[178]Third, the average total cost standard without more can easily be manipulated by multi-product firms (which the respondent clearly is in this case, and which many dominant firms will be). [215] This is because in multi-product firms, there are fixed costs that are shared across different products. For example, the fixed cost of renting a factory may be common to all the different products produced by the firm in that factory. The issue is that there are multiple ways of apportioning these common costs to the various products. The Commission accepts that under their approach, it is up to the dominant firm to decide how to rationally apportion the common costs. Without additional guidance, this makes the standard susceptible to manipulation: a firm can account for common costs through one product and not another in order to avoid regulation aimed at preventing anti-competitive conduct. [216]

[179]Finally, the average total cost standard is inappropriate because it forces multi-product firms to ignore economies of scale. [217] In practice, firms can add new products to their lines of production and set prices close to or at marginal or avoidable cost because other products are funding fixed costs. This may be for the benefit of the consumer: it allows the lowering of prices.

[180]Given the finding that a dominant firm's average total cost is an inappropriate benchmark for predatory pricing under section 8(c), the Commission has failed to demonstrate that the prices charged by Forum violated section 8(c). This is because the only standard against which the Commission tests Forum's prices in this application is its average total cost.

Is the intention of a dominant firm a relevant consideration?

[181]Section 8(c) of the Competition Act prohibits a dominant firm from engaging in an exclusionary act in the form of predatory pricing if the anti-competitive effect of that act outweighs its technological efficiency or other pro-competitive gain. [218] An act is exclusionary if it impedes or prevents a firm from entering into, or expanding within, a market. [219] The determination of whether a dominant firm has engaged in prohibited predatory pricing under section 8(c) of the Competition Act accordingly involves:

[215] n215 Baumol above fn 94 at 59.

[216] n216 As the Competition Appeal Court put it in its judgment above fn 4 at para (53), the average total cost of a firm is "a figure that is undefinable and unmeasurable in a multi-product firm and must therefore be rejected as part of any legitimate test of predatory pricing". See further Bolton, Brodley and Riordan above fn 60 at 2272.

[217] n217 Elhauge above fn 90 at 718.

[218] n218 Senwes above fn 56 at paras (27)-(28).

[219] n219 S 1 definition of "exclusionary act" in the Competition Act.

(a)assessing whether a dominant firm's pricing of its goods or services operates to prevent another firm from entering into or expanding within the market; and

(b)weighing up the anti-competitive and pro-competitive effects of a dominant firm's pricing of its goods or services.

[182]I endorse the finding by the Competition Appeal Court that these tests are objective in that they are outcome based. [220] A dominant firm alleged to have engaged in predatory pricing under section 8(c) will only commit a prohibited exclusionary act where its pricing decisions operate to exclude competitors, and the associated anti-competitive effects outweigh the associated pro-competitive effects. In this regard, the meaning of section 8(c) conveys the Legislature's chosen approach to the regulation of predatory pricing by dominant firms. As noted by the Competition Appeal Court in Mittal, a court "may not eschew the text to promote its own theory, however attractive the latter may appear to be. In the event that the language of the text is unable plausibly to support the advocated theory, then it is for Parliament, if it so wishes, to reconsider the text". [221]

[183]I also endorse the Competition Appeal Court's finding that when a competitive firm reduces its prices, it is possible that it intends to:

"increase its market share by taking away customers from its rivals. In a real sense, such a firm intends to 'harm' its rivals but in a way permitted by competition policy. The firm may even hope that a prolonged price war may drive its rival from the marketplace." [222]

[184]It follows that the consideration of a dominant firm's intent when assessing whether it has engaged in prohibited predatory pricing under section 8(c) is inappropriate. A firm's intention is an "unreliable guide to proving predation" that does not assist in the evaluation of the likely economic effects of a dominant firm's decision to price below a particular cost measure. [223]

[185]I am unpersuaded by the Commission's reliance on European jurisprudence in support of the use of predatory intent as a requirement for predatory pricing. This requirement was adopted by the European Court of Justice in AKZO [224] in relation to allegations that a firm had violated Article 102 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union by cutting its prices below average total cost (but above average avoidable cost). [225] Although Article 102 was held to be capable of incorporating a consideration of a dominant firm's intent to predate, it does not resemble section 8(c) of the Competition Act. As warned by Kriegler J in Du Plessis, our Constitution does not "warrant the wholesale importation of foreign doctrines or precedents". [226] We may, of course, have regard to foreign law when interpreting section 8(c), but this should not displace the express meaning of the legislation regarding the appropriate test to be applied under the section.

Such abuse may, in particular, consist in -(a)directly or indirectly imposing unfair purchase or selling prices or other unfair trading conditions."

[186]Unlike in respect of a complaint of prohibited predatory pricing pursued against a dominant firm under section 8(d)(iv), the Commission bears the onus under section 8(c) of demonstrating that a dominant firm has engaged in an exclusionary act by implementing a predatory pricing strategy. The Commission is, however, afforded significant scope under this catch-all section to advance an appropriate cost standard against which to measure a dominant firm's pricing practices. In the present matter, the Commission has failed to advance such a test.

[187]For these reasons I would grant leave to appeal but dismiss the appeal with costs, including the costs of two Counsel.

(Basson AJ concurred in the judgment of Theron J.)

BY Mhlantla J

[188]I have had the benefit and pleasure of reading the judgments of my colleagues Goliath AJ ("first judgment"), Cameron J, Froneman J and Khampepe J ("second judgment"), and Theron J ("third judgment"). After due consideration, I find myself in the difficult position of agreeing with the third judgment on the issue of jurisdiction and leave to appeal only, and with the first judgment on the merits.

[189]I too am of the view that this matter does not raise a constitutional matter, but rather raises an arguable point of law. The first judgment notes that "[t]he case before us involves an interpretation of the extent of the powers held by the Competition Commission to prosecute alleged violations subsequent to an investigation", [227] which the first judgment notes is - amongst other reasons - indicative of the issue before us being a constitutional issue. I disagree with this. I wholly support the third judgment's formulation of the point of law at issue. [228]

[190]Further, I commend and support the third judgment's excursus of the issue of leave to appeal, as well as its conclusion that it is in the interests of justice to permit the Commission to appeal directly to this Court without seeking leave to appeal from the Competition Appeal Court. Finally, I agree that whether the Commission could have approached the Supreme Court of Appeal should have been left open. [229] I do not believe that this matter renders it necessary to decide whether or not the Supreme Court of Appeal's jurisdiction in competition matters should be restricted.

[191]However, I am unable to agree with the third judgment's conclusion and reasoning on the merits. [230]

[192]I agree with the approach of the first judgment to the issue of the merits. In my view, the first judgment correctly recognises that this Court should be hesitant to tie itself to a cost standard to show predatory pricing pursuant to section 8(c) and recognises the dangers in doing so. [231] However, it also recognises the dangers in not allowing various costs standards to be employed to determine predatory pricing pursuant to section 8(c). [232] In doing so, in my view, it does not commit to average total cost being used as a cost measure, but restricts it to instances where it is necessitated by the facts of each case. I agree with this approach.

[193]For these reasons and subject to the qualifications set out, I concur in the order made by the first judgment.

MEMORANDUM RE: MOTION FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT (CHOICE-OF-LAW)

I. Introduction

In this multidistrict litigation, Plaintiffs, [3] twelve large homebuilders who purchased gypsum wallboard (drywall) (collectively, "Plaintiffs"),[1] allege that Defendants, drywall manufacturers, conspired to eliminate job quotes and fix prices for the calendar years 2012 and 2013. Only three Defendants remain in this case: PABCO Building Products, LLC ("PABCO"); the United States Gypsum Company ("USG") and the United States Gypsum Corporation ("USG Corp.") (together, "USG"); and USG Corp.'s wholly-owned subsidiary, L&W Supply Corporation ("L&W"). The Third Amended Complaint (ECF 110, "TAC")-the operative Complaint in this action—alleges four Counts:

1. Count I: Violation of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, by all Plaintiffs against all Defendants, seeking declaratory and injunctive relief, pre- and post-judgment interest, and costs, including attorneys' and expert fees;

2. Count II: Violation of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1 by Plaintiffs Ashton Woods and D.R. Horton against all Defendants, seeking declaratory and injunctive relief, pre- and post-judgment interest, and costs, including attorneys' and expert fees;

3. Count III: Violations of the California Business & Professions Code §§ 16750(a), et seq. ("Cartwright Act") and, in the alternative, state antitrust and restraint of trade laws in Illinois, North Carolina, [4] Arizona, District of Columbia, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Nevada, New Mexico, New York, Oregon, Tennessee, West Virginia, and Wisconsin by all Plaintiffs against all Defendants, seeking damages, pre- [*284] and post-judgment interest, and costs, including attorneys' and expert fees;

4. Count IV: Violations of state consumer protection and unfair competition laws of California, Colorado, Florida, Nevada, New Mexico, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia by all Plaintiffs against all Defendants, seeking damages and/or restitution, pre- and post-judgment interest, and costs, including attorneys' and expert fees.

[1] Plaintiffs are Ashton Woods Holdings, L.L.C. ("Ashton Woods"); Beazer Homes Holdings Corp. ("Beazer Homes"); CalAtlantic Group, Inc. ("CalAtlantic"); D.R. Horton Los Angeles Holding Company, Inc. ("D.R. Horton"); Hovnanian Enterprises, Inc.; KB Home; Meritage Homes Corporation; M/I Homes, Inc.; Pulte Home Corporation; The Drees Company; Toll Brothers, Inc.; and Tri Pointe Homes, Inc. ("Tri Pointe").

Currently before this Court is Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment on Choice-of-Law (ECF 316, "MSJ"). At issue is Plaintiffs' allegation that they may pursue all of their state antitrust claims in Count III under California's Cartwright Act. (TAC ¶ 273.) Defendants seek dismissal of state antitrust claims made by Plaintiffs' purchasing entities that are headquartered in states that have not repealed Illinois Brick Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (1977) ("non-repealer states"). Non-repealer states do not allow indirect purchasers to seek recovery from antitrust violators, unlike California, a "repealer state."[2] The parties [5] agree that Alabama, Delaware, Georgia, Indiana, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, New Jersey, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Texas, and Washington are non-repealer states. (See MSJ at 23.)[3]

For the reasons discussed below, Defendants' Motion is DENIED IN PART.

II. Background

A. Procedural History

As the Court has provided a thorough summary of the procedural history in this multidistrict litigation in several prior opinions, the Court includes only the procedural history relevant to the instant Motion. (See, e.g., ECF 351 ("February 2016 MSJ Opinion") (granting in part and denying in part manufacturers' motions for summary judgment in the direct and indirect purchaser actions)[4]; ECF 101 ("Homebuilder MTD Opinion") (granting in part and denying in part Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' state law and Sherman Act § 1 claims in the Second Amended Complaint))[5].)

Plaintiffs filed the TAC on August 12, 2016 against Defendants USG; L&W; New NGC, Inc.; Continental Building Products, Inc. ("Continental")[6]; CertainTeed Gypsum, Inc. ("CertainTeed"); American [*285] Gypsum Company LLC ("American Gypsum"); and PABCO. (ECF 110.) Defendants New [6] NGC, Inc., USG, L&W, and CertainTeed filed Answers to the TAC on August 26, 2016. (ECF 121 (Answer by New NGC, Inc.); ECF 123 (Answer by PABCO); ECF 124 (Answer by USG Entities: L&W and USG); ECF 125 (Answer by CertainTeed).) On the same date, all Defendants filed a Partial Motion to Dismiss the state consumer protection and unfair competition law claims—Count IV of the TAC—which the Court denied (ECF 122, 163).

On September 8, 2016, the Court approved the parties' Joint Stipulation dismissing all claims in the TAC against Defendant Continental with prejudice (ECF 129). The following year, on February 6, 2017, the Court granted Plaintiffs' unopposed Motion for Dismissal of CertainTeed, dismissing all claims against CertainTeed with prejudice

[2] Throughout this Homebuilder action, Plaintiffs have disputed whether they are direct or indirect purchasers of drywall. The Court does not reach any conclusions as to whether Plaintiffs qualify as indirect purchasers in ruling on the instant Motion.

[3] As discussed at oral argument on the Motion for Summary Judgment, the parties dispute whether three states-Colorado, Virginia, and South Carolina—are repealer or non-repealer states. (See ECF 380, "Oral Arg. Tr." at 32:24-33:7.) The amicus brief in Stromberg v. Qualcomm Inc., which Defendants submitted to this Court, reveals that there is no genuine dispute that Colorado and Virginia are non-repealer states, and that South Carolina is a repealer state. (See ECF 387 Ex. A at 20.)

[4] The February 2016 MSJ Opinion is available on the MDL docket (No. 13-MD-2437) and at In re Domestic Drywall Antitrust Litigation, 163 F. Supp. 3d 175 (E.D. Pa. 2016) (Baylson, J.).

[5] The Homebuilder MTD Opinion is available on the Homebuilder action docket (No. 15-cv-01712) and at In re: Domestic Drywall Antitrust Litigation Civil Action, No. 15-cv-1712, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 90619, 2016 WL 3769680 (E.D. Pa. July 13, 2016) (Baylson, J.).

[6] Before the TAC was filed, on June 22, 2016, the Court dismissed Continental from the action (ECF 93, 94). Plaintiffs named Continental as a Defendant in the TAC to preserve all rights on appeal. (TAC at 1 n.2.)

(ECF 178). On May 21, 2018, the Court approved the parties' Joint Stipulation voluntarily dismissing all claims against American Gypsum (ECF 300).

On July 2, 2018, Defendants USG, L&W, New NGC, Inc., and PABCO moved for summary judgment with respect to claims arising from purchases made by Plaintiffs in non-repealer states, which do not allow indirect purchasers to recover damages for antitrust violations (ECF 316). On July 31, 2018, the parties [7] filed a Joint Stipulation, which the Court approved, voluntarily dismissing all claims against Defendant New NGC, Inc. with prejudice, leaving Defendants USG, L&W, and PABCO in the action (ECF 331).

The following month, on August 27, 2018, Plaintiffs filed a Response in opposition to the Motion for Summary Judgment, arguing that summary judgment should be denied because Defendants failed to rebut the presumption that California law applies to all of Plaintiffs' claims, including those claims arising from purchases in non-repealer states that do not allow indirect purchaser claims (ECF 340, "Resp."). Plaintiffs attached to the Response a Separate Statement of Material Facts (ECF 781, "Pls. Supp. SOF").[7]

Defendants filed a Reply on September 17, 2018, reiterating that California law should not apply to all of Plaintiffs' claims, but rather, that the law of the states where purchases occurred should govern (ECF 350, "Rep."). Defendants also filed a Response to the Separate Statement of Material Facts (ECF 351, "Defs. Resp. SOF").

On February 19, 2019, Plaintiffs filed a Request for Judicial Notice of the then-pending Apple, Inc. v. Pepper case before the Supreme Court (ECF 375). According [8] to Plaintiffs, an amicus brief filed by non-repealer states in that case, attached as Exhibit A to the Request for Judicial Notice, confirmed that there was no "true conflict" between the interests of California and non-repealer states and, therefore, California law should be applied to all of Plaintiffs' state antitrust claims (ECF 375 at 3; id. Ex. A). Defendants filed a Response on March 5, 2019, arguing that the amicus brief was irrelevant to the choice-of-law issue and seeking to refute Plaintiffs' contention that the amicus brief revealed that non-repealer states have no interest in preventing indirect purchaser recoveries under their states' laws (ECF 377 at 2-3).

On March 12, 2019, the Court held oral argument on the Motion for Summary Judgment (ECF 378-81). Following oral argument, on June 3, 2019, both parties filed Notices regarding the Supreme [*286] Court's decision in Apple, Inc. v. Pepper, 139 S.Ct. 1514, 203 L. Ed. 2d 802 (2019) (ECF 385, 386). On June 21, 2019, Defendants filed a Request for Judicial Notice of an amicus brief filed by the states of Louisiana, Ohio, Texas, and the Department of Justice in the pending Ninth Circuit case of Stromberg v. Qualcomm Inc., No. 19-15159 (9th Cir. 2019) (ECF 387). Plaintiffs filed a Response on [9] June 28, 2019 (ECF 389).

B. UNDISPUTED FACTS

The following is a fair account of the factual assertions relevant to the instant Motion, as taken from both parties' Statements of Facts, and are not genuinely disputed.

i. Parties

1. Plaintiffs

Plaintiffs allege that during the relevant time period—January 1, 2012 through December 31, 2015-they purchased drywall in Alabama, Arizona, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, the District of Columbia, Florida, Georgia, Hawaii, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Nevada, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, and [7] Plaintiffs' Statements of Facts can be found on the MDL docket.

Wisconsin that was manufactured by Defendants. (TAC ¶ 4.) During the relevant period, three Plaintiffs were headquartered or had their principal places of business in California: CalAtlantic, KB Home, and TRI Pointe. (Pls. Supp. SOF ¶¶ 45-47). The states where Plaintiffs have their headquarters and/or principal places of business are as follows:[8]

1. Ashton Woods, the named Plaintiff in this action, is a Georgia limited [10] liability company with its principal place of business in Georgia. (MSJ Ex. 2, "DSOF" ¶ 1; ECF 781, "PSOF" ¶ 1.) None of the eight Ashton Woods entities that purchased drywall were incorporated in or have their principal places of business in California. (DSOF ¶ 2.)

2. Beazer Homes was incorporated in Delaware and has its principal place of business in Georgia. (Id. ¶ 3.) None of its three entities[9] that purchased drywall were incorporated or have their principal places of business in California. (Id. ¶ 4.)[10]

3. CalAtlantic was incorporated in Delaware and has its principal place of [*287] business in California. (Id. ¶ 5.) Two of its purchasing entities, Standard Pacific Corp. and Ryland Group, Inc., both have their principal places of business in California and purchased drywall during the relevant time period. (Id. ¶ 6.)[11] In total, CalAtlantic Group, Inc.'s purchasing entities purchased 103,725 millions of square feet ("msf") of drywall in California during the relevant time period. (Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 45). (DSOF Ex. 16.)[12]

4. D.R. Horton was incorporated in California and has its principal place of business in Texas. (DSOF ¶ 7.) Of its 27 entities that purchased drywall, seven were incorporated [11] in or have their principal places of business in California: Continental Residential, Inc., which was incorporated in and has its principal place of business in California and purchased 437.15 msf; D.R. Horton BAY, Inc., which has its principal place of business in California and purchased 26,430.75 msf; D.R. Horton Ven, Inc., which was incorporated in and has its principal place of business in California and purchased 4,130.92 msf; D.R. Horton, Inc.-Sacramento, which was incorporated in and has its principal place of business in California and purchased 2,238.91 msf; DRH Cambridge Homes, Inc., which was incorporated in California and purchased 21,075.53 msf; DRH Southwest Construction, Inc., which was incorporated in California and purchased 32.41 msf; and Western Pacific Housing, Inc., which has its principal place of business in California and purchased 15,174 msf. (Id. ¶ 8; id.

[8] Appendix A to Defendants' Motion is a chart of each Plaintiff's state of incorporation/organization, headquarters, and the amount of drywall each Plaintiff purchased. (MSJ App. A.)

[9] Plaintiffs dispute Defendants' use of the term "separately-organized entity" to the extent that it implies that the entities did not function with the unified purpose of building and selling homes under the same Beazer Homes Holding Corp. name. (See PSOF ¶ 4.) Plaintiffs raise the same argument with respect to D.R. Horton; The Drees Company; Hovnanian Enterprises, Inc.; and KB Home. (Id. ¶¶ 4, 10, 12, 14.)

[10] The parties dispute whether any Beazer entities purchased drywall in California during the relevant time period. (Compare Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 48 (stating that from January 1, 2012 through December 31, 2015, Beazer Homes purchased drywall in California "through its subsidiaries and affiliates"), with Defs. Resp. SOF ¶ 48 (stating that because no Beazer Homes Holdings Corp. entities were located in California, they did not make purchases in California during the relevant time period).) Defendants also argue that purchases by Beazer Homes are governed by Georgia law pursuant to Beazer Homes's purchase agreement. (Defs. Resp. SOF ¶ 48; id. Ex. 122.)

[11] It is undisputed that several of Standard Pacific Corp. and Ryland Group, Inc.'s California divisions purchased drywall. (See Defs. SOF Ex. 16.)

[12] Defendants contend that CalAtlantic did not purchase any drywall, but that Standard Pacific Corp. and Ryland Group, Inc., CalAtlantic's purchasing entities, did. (Defs. Resp. SOF ¶ 45.) Plaintiffs admit that CalAtlantic's purchasing entities "technically purchased the wallboard upon which Cal Atlantic Asserts its claims," but contend that Standard Pacific Corp. and Ryland Group, Inc. purchased drywall on behalf of CalAtlantic Group, Inc. (PSOF ¶ 6; Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 45.)

App. A.) In total, from January 1, 2012 through December 31, 2015, D.R. Horton and/or its purchasing entities purchased 71,986 msf of drywall in California. (Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 49.)[13]

5. The Drees Company was incorporated in and has its principal place of business in Kentucky. (DSOF ¶ 9.) Of its four entities [12] that purchased drywall, none were incorporated in or have their principal places of business in California. (Id. ¶ 10.)

6. Hovnanian Enterprises, Inc. is a Delaware corporation with its principal place of business in New Jersey. (Id. ¶ 11.) Of its 15 entities that purchased drywall, two were incorporated in or have their principal places of business in California: K. Hovnanian Companies of California, Inc., which was incorporated and has its principal place of business in California and purchased 27,928 msf of drywall, and K. Hovnanian JV Services Company, L.L.C., a California limited liability company with its principal place of business in Florida that purchased 5,070 msf of drywall. [*288] (Id. ¶ 12; id. App. A.) In sum, Hovnanian Enterprises, Inc. and/or its entities purchased 27,928 msf of drywall in California from January 1, 2012 through December 31, 2015. (Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 50.)[14]

7. KB Home was incorporated in Delaware and has its principal place of business in California. (DSOF ¶ 13.) Three of its nine entities that purchased drywall during the relevant tie period were incorporated in or have their principal places of business in California: Fremont Pat Ranch, LLC, which purchased 35 [13] msf of drywall; KB Home Arroyo Vista, LLC, which purchased 1,865 msf; and KB Home South Bay Inc., which is both incorporated and headquartered in California and purchased 21,628 msf. (Id. ¶ 14; id. App. A.)[15]

8. Meritage Homes Corporation was incorporated in Maryland and has its principal place of business in Arizona. (DSOF ¶ 15.)[16]

9. M/I Homes, Inc. was incorporated in and has its principal place of business in Ohio. (Id. ¶ 17.) None of its 14 entities that purchased drywall were incorporated or have their principal places of business in California. (Id. ¶ 18.)

10. Pulte Home Corporation was incorporated in Michigan and has its principal place of business in Georgia. (Id. ¶ 19.)[17]

11. Toll Brothers, Inc. was incorporated in Delaware and has its principal place of business in Pennsylvania. (Id. ¶ 21.) Three of its four purchasing entities that bought drywall were formed in or have their principal places

---

[13] The parties dispute whether these purchases may be attributed to D.R. Horton or only to its purchasing entities. (See Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 49; Defs. Resp. SOF ¶ 49.)

[14] Defendants deny that Hovnanian Enterprises, Inc., which has its principal place of business in New Jersey, purchased drywall. (Defs. Resp. SOF ¶ 50.)

[15] The parties dispute whether KB Home or its purchasing entities purchased drywall in California. (See Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 46; Defs. Resp. SOF ¶ 46.)

[16] The parties dispute whether Meritage Homes Corporation purchased 49,764 msf of drywall in California. (Compare Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 51 ("From January 1, 2012 through December 31, 2015, . . . Meritage Homes Corporation purchased 49,764 msf of drywall in the State of California."), with Defs. Resp. SOF ¶ 51 ("Meritage Homes . . . has its principal place of business of Arizona. Meritage has no separately organized entities which purchased [drywall]. As a result, Meritage had no purchases in California during the relevant time period.").) Defendants also argue that Meritage's claims are governed Arizona law pursuant to the purchase agreement. (Defs. Resp. SOF ¶ 51; id. Ex. 123.)

[17] The parties dispute whether Pulte Home Corporation purchased drywall in California. (Compare Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 52 ("From January 1, 2012 through December 31, 2015, Plaintiff Pulte Home Corporation purchased 51,881 msf of drywall in the State of California."), with Defs. Resp. SOF ¶ 52 ("Pulte Home Corporation has its principal place of business in Georgia. Pulte has no separately-organized entities which purchased [drywall]. As a result, Pule had no purchases in California during the relevant time period.").)

of business in California: Plum Canyon Master LLC, a Delaware limited liability company with its principal place of business in California, which purchased 1,177 msf of drywall; Porter Ranch Development Co., a California joint venture with its principal place of business in California that purchased [14] 2,209 msf; and Shapell Industries, Inc., which was incorporated in Delaware and has its principal place of business in California and purchased 8,566 msf. (Id. ¶ 22.) From January 1, 2012 through December 31, 2015, Toll Brothers, Inc. [*289] and/or its purchasing entities purchased 47,089 msf of drywall in California. (Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 53.)[18]

12. TRI Pointe was incorporated in Delaware and has its principal place of business in California. (DSOF ¶ 23.) Of its seven entities that bought drywall, two were incorporated in or have their principal places of business in California: Pardee Homes, which was incorporated in and has its principal place of business in California and purchased 32,258 msf of drywall, and TRI Pointe Contractors, LP, a Delaware limited partnership with its principal place of business in California that purchased 33,355 msf. (Id. ¶ 24.) From January 1, 2012 through December 31, 2015, TRI Pointe and/or its purchasing entities bought 65,100 msf of drywall in California. (Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 47.)[19]

ii. Defendants

Defendant USG, which is headquartered in Illinois, a repealer state, operates a gypsum mine and manufactures [15] drywall in California. (Pls. Supp. SOF ¶¶ 5-6.) USG also operates 14 drywall "plants" in Alabama, Florida, Indiana, Iowa, Maryland, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Texas, Utah, and Virginia. (Defs. Resp. SOF ¶ 5.) Further, USG operates gypsum rock mines and quarries in eight cities, including in Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, Oklahoma, Texas, and Utah. (Id. ¶ 5.) USG manufactures paper for drywall in four cities, including in Michigan, Missouri, New York, and Texas. (Id.)

Defendant L&W was the largest distributor of drywall and related building products in the United States during the relevant time period. (Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 8.) During this time period, L&W, a wholly-owned subsidiary of USG, sold drywall manufactured by USG, PABCO, and American Gypsum. (Defs. Resp. SOF ¶ 9.) Until L&W was acquired by ABC Supply Co., Inc. in 2016, L&W purchased 90% of its drywall from USG. (Pls. Supp. SOF ¶¶ 7, 9.) L&W was also one of PABCO's largest customers; its purchasers comprised 10% of PABCO's sales and 6% of L&W's business. (Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 12; Defs. Resp. SOF ¶¶ 11, 12.) Of the 6% of L&W's business that consisted of purchases from PABCO, the majority of that business was conducted in California. (Pls. Supp. [16] SOF ¶ 12; Defs. Resp. SOF ¶ 12.)

PABCO, the smallest manufacturer among Defendants with a 4% national market share, is a limited liability company organized under the laws of Nevada and headquartered in California. (Defs. Resp. SOF ¶ 1.) PABCO began manufacturing and shipping drywall from its California facility in 1972, and it operates one paper mill in California that supplies to drywall production facilities. (Pls. Supp. SOF ¶¶ 1-3.) PABCO, which operates in 75 locations across the United States and Canada and employs individuals in 11 states, is the only [*290] remaining Defendant that is headquartered in California. (Defs. Resp. SOF ¶¶ 1, 4.) PABCO and USG have been operating in California for nearly fifty years. (Pls. Supp. SOF ¶¶ 4, 5.)

[18] Defendants contend that purchases by Toll Brothers, Inc. were governed by Pennsylvania law pursuant to the purchase agreement. (Defs. Resp. SOF ¶ 53; id. Ex. 124.)

[19] Plaintiffs' Statement of Facts "admit[s] that the [] seven entities (majority of which were acquired by TRI Pointe in 2014) technically purchased the drywall upon which TRI Pointe asserts its claims." (PSOF ¶ 24.) However, in Plaintiffs' Separate Statement of Facts, Plaintiffs attribute these drywall purchases to TRI Pointe, which Defendants dispute. (Compare Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 47 (averring that TRI Pointe Homes, Inc. purchased drywall), with Defs. Resp. SOF ¶ 47 ("Defendants deny that TRI Pointe Homes, Inc. purchased any drywall during the relevant time period. Instead, seven separately-organized entities purchased wallboard.").)

C. Alleged Conspiratorial Conduct in California

The parties do not dispute the following chronology of material facts. The Court considered the February 2016 MSJ Opinion to determine which facts were material and, where applicable, the Court provides the same description of events. The Court limits its analysis to material facts pertinent to the instant Motion but includes relevant background for context.[20]

1. 5/15/2011: PABCO and L&W internal reports [17] confirm communications regarding PABCO and L&W price increases as well as USG's plans.

Mark Burkhammer (PABCO's Director of Sales) emailed Ryan Lucchetti (President of PABCO), Foster Duval (PABCO's Southern California Sales Manager), and Todd Thomas (PABCO) and stated, "Just spoke to Marty Brand [(L&W)] and he informed me that USG is still planning on going up at the end of the month . . . hasn't heard about others . . . just FYI." (Id. ¶ 25 n.26.)

Mr. Burkhammer, who was responsible for all drywall sales made by PABCO in California during the relevant time period, works out of his home in Tracy, California and in PABCO's offices in both Newark and Rancho Cordova, California. (Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 15; Defs. Resp. SOF ¶ 15.) Mr. Lucchetti was also based in California. (Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 30.) Mr. Duval, who was also based in California, testified that he was tasked with meeting with customers to discuss product availability, pricing, "programs in place," and contractors that preferred to use PABCO's product line. (Defs. Resp. SOF ¶ 19; id. Ex. Q, Duval Dep. Tr. at 67:5-69:25.)

2. 9/19/2011: Dave Powers (President of American Gypsum) called Mr. Duval (PABCO).

The call lasted 19 minutes. (February [18] 2016 MSJ Opinion at 57.) In his deposition testimony, Mr. Powers explained that he "seriously debated" whether to place the call because he knew that American Gypsum was about to release its price increase announcement that would eliminate job quotes, create calendar-year pricing, and impose a 35% price increase for January 1, 2012. (Id.) However, Mr. Powers decided to call Mr. Duval because Mr. Duval was a personal friend who had just had open-heart surgery. (Id.) Mr. Powers testified that they "mostly discussed Mr. Duvall's [sic] health and family, but that they ended the call as they always did by slamming their former employer, USG, which involved talking about a lack of leadership in the industry." (Id.) Mr. Duval does not remember the call or what was discussed, but he did not contest that it occurred. (Id. at 58.)

[*291] 3. 9/20/2011: American Gypsum circulated an announcement to customers that it would implement a 35% price increase and end job quotes effective January 1, 2012. (Id.)

4. 9/20/2011-9/21/2011: PABCO's President commented on the American Gypsum announcement.

The day after Mr. Powers and Mr. Duval's phone call, a customer forwarded American Gypsum's price increase announcement to [19] Mr. Lucchetti (PABCO). (Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 30.) Mr. Lucchetti forwarded the announcement to Mr. Duval and wrote, "Well here is the 1st." (Id.) Mr. Duval responded, "Dave [Powers] gave me a call yesterday and mentioned his frustration with the lack of leadership in the industry. Eliminating job quotes would be a great start for the price improvement." (Id. ¶ 31.) The next day, Mr. Lucchetti replied, "Dave Powers is my new hero." (Id.)

Mr. Burkhammer (PABCO) also received Mr. Lucchetti's email forwarding the announcement and stating, "Well here is the 1st." (February 2016 MSJ Opinion at 59.) Mr. Burkhammer forwarded the email to Marty Brand, Vice [20] In addition to the facts summarized above, Plaintiffs allege that Defendants facilitated and maintained the conspiracy by participating in trade association meetings and a retirement dinner in California during the relevant time period. (See Pls. Supp. SOF ¶¶ 41-44.) As Defendants recognize, when these meetings were identified by the Class Plaintiffs in support of their motion for summary judgment, the Court stated that it "w[ould] not give weight to any evidence that shows a bare opportunity to conspire, without more." (Defs. Resp. SOF ¶¶ 41-44 (quoting February 2016 MSJ Opinion at 37).) The Court maintains the same position in the instant Motion and does not consider the trade association meetings or dinner in its analysis.

President of Sales and Operations at L&W, and wrote, "Hope this works." (Id.) Mr. Brand responded, "Interesting idea. I hope this does fly. I like the way they put it out there 2-1/2 months ahead of time!" (Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 21.) Mr. Burkhammer responded by stating, "probably not legal but what the heck." (Id. ¶ 22.)

Both Mr. Burkhammer and Mr. Brand worked in California. (Id. ¶¶ 14-17; Defs. Resp. SOF ¶¶ 14-17.) Mr. Brand worked out of his home in Yorba Linda, California, and in L&W's office in Orange, California. (Pls. Supp. SOF ¶¶ 16-17.) During [20] at least part of the relevant time period, Mr. Brand and his supervisor, Rob Waterhouse, made decisions on pricing. (Defs. Resp. SOF ¶ 18.)

5. 9/27/2011: PABCO and L&W employees based in California discussed the elimination of job quotes.

One week later, on September 27, 2011, after only American Gypsum announced the 35% price increase to take effect in January 2012, Mr. Burkhammer (PABCO) invited Mr. Brand (L&W) to dinner in an email. (February 2016 MSJ Opinion at 63.) In the email, Mr. Burkhammer wrote:

> Look forward to seeing you and sharing some tales...maybe talk a little strategy if all the announcements are out by then. Even though we haven't officially stated our intention I sent an email to the troops getting them ready. No more job quotes and 30 days to close any open quotes getting our system down to secured work through our distributors with footage and address's [sic]. I am suggesting, wherever and to whoever [sic] will listen, that the manufacturers have to police. . . .
> . . . . Other distributors have not pushed back as anticipated...the small independents are uptight. I did quote a job in northern Cal that starts in Feb....2mmsft....ends in July....with the support [21] of the distributor...even tho we haven't announced yet...we quoted up 40 dollars on 1-1-12. I don't know how this will all work out but it has some people thinking...but getting something done by seven manufacturers for the good of the industry is like being in the house of reps in DC.

(Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 20.) Mr. Brand testified that he had no advance notice of USG's pricing plans before he received USG's [*292] September 28, 2011 letter. (Defs. Resp. SOF ¶ 20.)

6. 9/28/2011: USG sent letter announcing elimination of job quotes and a shift to calendar-year pricing, but not announcing the specific amount of the January 1, 2012 increase. (February 2016 MSJ Opinion at 63.)

7. 10/12/2011: PABCO announced elimination of job quotes and implementation of calendar-year pricing with a 35% increase. (Id. at 66.)

8. 10/12/2011: Phil Kohl, Vice President of Sales & Marketing at PABCO, sent a memo to PABCO leadership based in California indicating that unanimous manufacturer action would be required to achieve price improvement.

Mr. Kohl sent a memo titled "July 2011 Market Condition Report" to Mr. Lucchetti (PABCO), copying Mr. Burkhammer (PABCO), Mr. Duval (PABCO), and Todd Thomas (PABCO), among others. (Pls. Supp. [22] SOF ¶ 34.) The "General Market Conditions" section states, in relevant part:

> All wallboard manufacturers need this [$35 increase for calendar year 2012] to become profitable again. As stated last month, a $35 increase can happen if all players maintain a unanimous resolve to tighten pricing and strictly police all existing quotes with no exceptions. Just allowing one customer to abuse one quote could be the catalyst for the collapse of the hoped for increase.

(Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 34; id. Ex. JJ.)[21] Both Mr. Kohl and Mr. Lucchetti were based in California. (Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 34.)

9. 12/2011: Internal L&W communications allegedly demonstrated the need for pricing discipline. (See Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 33.)

---

[21] Defendants contend that this email does not reflect illegal activity, but rather is evidence of legal, conscious parallelism. (Defs. Resp. SOF ¶ 34 (citing Valspar Corp. v. E.I. Du Pont De Nemours & Co., 873 F.3d 185, 200 (3d Cir. 2017)).)

In a December 15, 2011 email from Mr. Brand (L&W) to several L&W Regional Mangers, Mr. Brand wrote:

> I just got off a conference call concerning drywall pricing discipline going forward. I need all of you to make sure that we are firm in our pricing;
> 1) Every customer (no exceptions) are [sic] going up at least $40/msf on 1-2-12. . . .
> 3) Whatever the market number is now, we MUST hold to at least +$40/msf on all quoting going forward, no matter what our competitors are doing. Rob Waterhouse and I are [23] the only ones who will be making decisions coming off that direction. . . .
> There will be a lot of contractors that will lie about what our competitors are doing on price. Some contractors will switch business in an attempt to get us to move our number down. We are willing to lose business to hold firm on this increase. Please get back to me asap with your low (pre-increase) market sell price on wallboard. In So Cal, it is $165/msf and +$40/msf = $205/msf. This is the number that I want you to make sure we do not quote below without talking to me. Also, no reductions in every day price to any customers without discussing with me. It is extremely important that everyone understands this in each of your regions. There is so much riding on this increase, anything less than this compliance will not be tolerated.

[*293] (Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 33; id. Ex. P.) As noted above, Mr. Brand was working in California. Chad Popma, the Northwest Regional Manager at L&W, who was located in Oregon, responded with the "NW low market number" prior to the increase. (Pls. Supp. SOF Ex. P.)[22]

Later that month, in an internal L&W email between Mr. Brand and Gerald Killian, Regional Manager of the Mountain West Region [24] of L&W, Mr. Brand declined a request for a lower priced bid and stated, "[T]his would be viewed by . . . distributors and manufacturers as us not supporting the increase. We cannot send that message to the market place [sic]." (Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 35; id. Ex. KK.)

10. 1/2012: PABCO and L&W employees based in California communicated about supporting price increases.

On January 20, 2012, Mr. Burkhammer (PABCO) again emailed Mr. Brand (L&W) and wrote, "Our message to the market is that we will pull any deviated payers, (quotes or deviations) if they are not used in the manner they were intended. We believe it is our role to do everything possible to maintain transparency and signal support for the increase we all need so desperately." (Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 23; id. Ex. T.)

Also in January 2012, Mr. Burkhammer communicated the need for manufacturers to support the price increases to Mr. Brand. (Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 24.) For example, on January 5, 2012, Mr. Burkhammer forwarded an email to Mr. Brand stating, "I hope they know we are up [in price] and support this increase." (Id.; id. Ex. T.)[23]

11. 6/26/2012: Mr. Burkhammer (PABCO), who was based in California, emailed PABCO employees stating, "I [25] would be very careful about stepping into other markets and dropping competitive numbers."

Mr. Burkhammer emailed Mr. Kohl (PABCO) and Mr. Thomas (PABCO) and warned them about "stepping into other markets and dropping competitive numbers. We don't need that kind of press." (Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 38; id. Ex. NN.)[24]

[22] Defendants state that this email exchange "at most reflects the legal process of setting pricing in anticipation of competitor actions in an oligopolistic industry." (Defs. Resp. SOF ¶ 33.)

[23] (See also Pls. Supp. SOF Ex. V (August 15, 2011 email from Mr. Burkhammer to Mr. Brand and others ("I wanted to confirm that Pabco is going to support the upcoming increase and the number being tossed around is ten dollars.")); Pls. Supp. SOF Ex. W (October 25, 2012 email thread between Mr. Burkhammer and Mr. Brand (discussing PABCO's increase letter and confirming that PABCO would not be issuing job quotes in 2013)).)

[24] According to Defendants, earlier emails in this chain reflect that PABCO's "policy" is to not take on "new business until the needs of current customers [are] met" because this "endear[s] PABCO to current customers and [gives] competitor's customers the desire to join the PABCO team ASAP." (Defs. Resp. SOF ¶ 38) (citation omitted).)

12. 8/6/2012: PABCO and L&W employees communicated, through their offices in California, about going on "allocation" to maintain the alleged conspiracy.

On August 6, 2012, Mr. Burkhammer (PABCO) sent an internal memo to Mr. Lucchetti (PABCO) indicating that Mr. Burkhammer had been informed by Mr. Brand (L&W) of USG's intention to go on allocation to protect the next round of price increases. (Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 40 n.59; id. Ex. PP); (see also id. (citing id. Ex. QQ) (August 3, 2012 email from Mr. Burkhammer (PABCO) to Mr. Thomas (PABCO) and Mr. Duval (PABCO) discussing preparations [*294] to go on allocation)).)[25]

13. 10/24/2012: PABCO issued its price increase letter reflecting a 30% increase for 2013. (February 2016 MSJ Opinion at 88.)

14. 11/30/2012: L&W noted that it could not accommodate a lower price for any customers because to do so "would show our competition that we are protecting work [26] and that would have the potential to harm the chances of this increase sticking." (Id.)

Mr. Brand (L&W) rejected a regional sales manager's request for a lower bid, stating, "I'm sorry but we cannot accommodate this request. There have been many similar requests across the country and the company's decision is to not make any of these type[s] [of] exceptions to our price increase at the present time. The reason, it would show our competition that we are protecting work and that would have the potential to harm the chances of this increase sticking." (Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 36; id. Ex. LL.) Mr. Brand closed by writing, "Hold firm and keep me informed if you hear what the competition is doing in your markets." (February 2016 MSJ Opinion at 88.)

15. 12/11/2012: Mr. Kohl (PABCO) sent an internal memo to Mr. Lucchetti (PABCO) regarding how to maintain increased prices.

In a November 2012 "Market Condition Report," Mr. Kohl explained: "With the higher prices, we should expect to see a stronger presence of board from both American Gypsum and the Temple-Inland plants . . . in the West. As long as we all ignore American's and Inland's effort to take a small share, the price will hold." (Pls. Supp. SOF [27] ¶ 37; id. Ex. MM.)[26]

16. 1/9/2013: PABCO employees based in California rejected a request to "hold pricing" because of "the need to support the increase."

At 7:58AM, Steve Benasso (Sales at PABCO), who was based in California, emailed Joe Burke (PABCO), and stated:

> After speaking with Mark we will not be able to hold any pricing for TFK due to the need to support the increase. We also had a customer with a similar situation in San Francisco with over 3 million feet of board that we gave the same answer, if we were to start making moves now it would send mixed messages to the market that contractors would try to leverage with distributors and manufacturers.

(Pls. Supp. SOF ¶ 39; id. Ex. OO.) At 4:09PM, Mr. Benasso forwarded the email to Mr. Burkhammer, who was also based in California, and wrote, "FYI...just in case Joe or Clint give you a call. They wanted us to hold pricing on 150k feet for TFK and I said no." (Pls. Supp. SOF Ex. OO.)

[25] Defendants argue that Exhibits PP and QQ "at most, reflect that drywall manufacturers instituted the same policy of controlled distribution that they had done in advance of many prior price increases, in order to ensure that all customers received the wallboard they needed." (Defs. Resp. SOF ¶ 40.)

[26] Defendants argue that this report only "reveals that American Gypsum and Temple Inland were increasing delivery of wallboard and attempting to recapture market share during the alleged conspiratorial period." (Defs. Resp. SOF ¶ 37.)

A district court should grant a motion for summary judgment if the movant can show "that there is no genuine dispute as to any material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(a). A dispute is "genuine" [*295] if "the evidence [28] is such that a reasonable jury could return a verdict for the nonmoving party." Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 248, 106 S. Ct. 2505, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1986). A factual dispute is "material" if it "might affect the outcome of the suit under the governing law." Id. Under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 56, the Court must view the evidence presented on the motion in the light most favorable to the opposing party. Id. at 255.

A party seeking summary judgment always bears the initial responsibility for informing the district court of the basis for its motion and identifying those portions of the record that it believes demonstrate the absence of a genuine issue of material fact. Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 322, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986). Where the non-moving party bears the burden of proof on a particular issue at trial, the moving party's initial burden can be met simply by "pointing out to the district court that there is an absence of evidence to support the non-moving party's case." Id. at 325.

After the moving party has met its initial burden, the adverse party's response must, "by affidavits or as otherwise provided in this rule, [] set forth specific facts showing a genuine issue for trial." *Stell v. PMC Techs., Inc., No. 04-5739, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 62183, 2006 WL 2540776, at 1 (E.D. Pa. Aug. 29, 2006) (Baylson, J.) (citing Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(e)); Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 586-87, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986) (The nonmoving party "must do more than simply show that there is some metaphysical dispute as so the material facts."). Summary judgment is appropriate [29] if the adverse party fails to rebut by making a factual showing "sufficient to establish the existence of an essential element to that party's case, and on which that party will bear the burden of proof at trial." Celotex, 477 U.S. at 322.

IV. DISCUSSION

A. Parties' Contentions

i. Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment

Defendants contend that the law of the state where Plaintiffs' purchasing entities are located should apply to each of Plaintiffs' state antitrust claims under California choice-of-law principles and the United States Constitution. (MSJ at 22-23.) As to California choice-of-law principles, Defendants argue that California's three-step governmental interest analysis, which both parties agree is applicable, requires that the law of the state where each Plaintiff was headquartered during the relevant period should govern each claim.[27] In other words, Defendants contend that California law should only apply to claims arising from purchases made in California. Defendants reach the following conclusions at each step of the governmental interest analysis:

> (1) Under the first step, Defendants contend, and Plaintiffs concede, that there are material differences between the antitrust laws of California, a repealer state, and the laws of non-repealer [30] states. (Id. at 11, 15.) Defendants also argue that there are several material differences between the antitrust laws of California and other repealer states, including that many states prohibit Plaintiffs from recovering to the extent that they passed [*296] through any drywall overcharge to customers, that Plaintiffs lack antitrust standing in many states, and that the availability of both treble damages and prejudgment interest varies state-to-state. (Id. at 16-17.)

[27] At oral argument, Defendants specifically argued that the laws of the states where the purchasing entities are headquartered govern for choice-of-law purposes. (Oral Arg. Tr. at 35:6-8.)

(2) Under the second step, Defendants argue that each non-repealer state has a strong interest in applying local law to purchases made within its borders. (Id. at 12.) With respect to other repealer states, Defendants contend that California law recognizes that it would defeat the purpose of Illinois Brick to allow one state's law to replace the law of every state that permits indirect purchaser claims. (Id. at 17.)

(3) Finally, under the third step, Defendants argue that the interest of each state of purchase in applying local law outweighs California's interest. (Id. at 12-15, 18.)

Next, Defendants contend that nationwide applicable of California law would violate the Due Process and Commerce Clauses of the Constitution. Defendants argue that the Due Process Clause requires that the law of each state of purchase apply because California [31] lacks significant contacts with purchases made in other states. (Id. at 19-20.) Defendants next argue that nationwide application of California law would violate the Commerce Clause by allowing Plaintiffs to recover for purchases made "wholly outside" of California's borders; namely, in states that have not repealed Illinois Brick. (Id. at 22.) As discussed in detail at oral argument, it is Defendants' position that if the Court determines that California law should not apply nationwide under California's governmental interest test, then the Court need not address Defendants' constitutional arguments. (See Oral Arg. Tr. at 31:11-22.)

ii. Plaintiffs' Response

Plaintiffs, on the other hand, argue that the Court must consider whether application of California law satisfies due process before conducting a choice-of-law analysis. According to Plaintiffs, there is a presumption that California law applies nationwide under the Due Process Clause, and because Defendants have failed to meet their burden of overcoming that presumption, California law applies to all of Plaintiffs' state antitrust claims. (Resp. at 17-18.) Plaintiffs argue that Defendants have more than "de minimis" contacts with California, as required to satisfy due process. (Id. at 18 (citation [32] omitted).) Plaintiffs also argue that Defendants engaged in a nationwide conspiracy directed, at least in part, from California, and therefore, the application of California law does not violate the Commerce Clause. (Id. at 34-35.)

Plaintiffs then seek to refute Defendants' contention that California's three-step governmental interest analysis requires the application of the law of the state of purchase, as follows:

(1) Under the first step, Plaintiffs concede that there are material differences between the laws of repealer states, such as California, and non-repealer states. (Id. at 22-23.) However, Plaintiffs contend that Defendants cannot show that there are material differences between laws of California and other repealer states that would give rise to a "true conflict." (Id. at 23.)

(2) As to the second step, Plaintiffs argue that Defendants have failed to show that any non-repealer state has an interest in applying its laws to purchases within its borders. (Id. at 24.)

(3) Lastly, under the third step, Plaintiffs contend that Defendants have [*297] not demonstrated that non-repealer states' interests in applying their states' antitrust laws to this case trump California's interest. (Id. at 29.)

iii. Defendants' Reply

In the Reply, Defendants reiterate [33] their position that the law of the state of purchase applies to indirect purchaser claims in antitrust actions, such as this case. (Rep. at 1.) Defendants seek to undermine Plaintiffs' arguments that once due process is satisfied, the Court must presume that the law of the forum state (California) applies, and that Defendants have failed to meet their "substantial burden" to overcome that presumption. (Id.) Defendants argue that they have met this burden by demonstrating that California's choice-of-law rules require application of the law of the state of purchase, not California law, to purchases made outside of California. (Id.)

According to Defendants, under California's governmental interest test, the states of purchase have the greatest interests in applying their antitrust laws to this matter. (Id. at 1-2.)

Further, Defendants contend that even if California's choice-of-law rules permitted nationwide application of California law, application of California law would violate the Due Process Clause because California lacks "significant contact or significant aggregation of contacts" to Plaintiffs' claims. (Id. at 2.) Specifically, Defendants argue that Plaintiffs have manipulated the record to suggest that three of Defendants' [34] regional employees who work in California—Mr. Brand (L&W), Mr. Burkhammer (PABCO), and Mr. Duval (PABCO)-were "ringleaders" of the conspiracy. (Id. at 13.) In reality, Defendants argue that the facts cited by Plaintiffs demonstrate that lawful "conscious parallelism," not illegal conspiratorial conduct, took place in California. (Id. at 15.)

B. Analysis

i. Governing Law: Third Circuit Law Governs Issues of Federal Law, and California Law Governs the Choice-of-Law Analysis.

Plaintiffs originally filed their action in the Northern District of California, and the action was transferred to this Court on April 2, 2015 by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1407. (ECF 1.) Throughout their briefing, both parties rely on Ninth Circuit law.

Before this Court addresses the challenges levied by Defendants, the Court must determine which law is binding and which is persuasive. As the Court has previously concluded, Third Circuit law is binding in this case on issues of federal law. (See Homebuilder MTD Opinion at 3-5); see also Oil Field Cases, 673 F. Supp. 2d 358, 362-63 (E.D. Pa. 2009) (Robreno, J.) ("In matters requiring the interpretation of the Constitution, a federal law or a federal rule of procedure, a transferee court applies the law of the circuit [35] where it sits. Therefore, in cases where jurisdiction is based on federal question, . . . the transferee court[] will apply federal law as interpreted by the Third Circuit."). Though this Court previously concluded that Third Circuit law is binding on issues of federal law in this action, the Court stated that it would "give special consideration to Ninth Circuit law in the Homebuilder action" and that the Court would "do its best to prevent a scenario in which the California district court [would] be bound by law that is contradictory to Ninth Circuit law" if the action were transferred back to the Northern District of California for trial. (Homebuilder MTD Opinion at 5.)

[*298] With respect to issues of state substantive law, including choice-of-law rules, California law is binding on this Court because this case was transferred from the district court in California under § 1407. See Marshall Invs. Corp. v. Krones A.G., 572 F. App'x 149, 152 n.4 (3d Cir. 2014) ("When a case is transferred under 28 U.S.C. § 1407 for consolidated pretrial proceedings, the transferee court must 'apply the same state substantive law, including choice-of-law rules, that would have been applied by a state court in the jurisdiction in which a case was filed.'") (citation omitted); see also In re Sony Gaming Networks & Customer Data Sec. Breach Litig., 996 F. Supp. 2d 942, 977 (S.D. Cal. 2014) ("[B]ecause the JPML [36] transferred the instant litigation to this Court pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 1407, the Court must apply the choice-of-law rules of each state where the individual actions were originally filed."). In sum, Third Circuit law is binding, and Ninth Circuit law is persuasive, on this Court's assessment of constitutional issues. California law, as enumerated by the California Supreme Court and interpreted by the Ninth Circuit, is binding on this Court's choice-of-law analysis.

ii. The Court Considers Defendants' Constitutional Arguments Before Conducting the Choice-of-Law Analysis.

As an initial matter, the parties dispute whether the Constitution provides an independent bar to the nationwide application of California law to Plaintiffs' state antitrust claims. Defendants contend that the Court need not address their constitutional arguments if the Court concludes, under California choice-of-law rules, that California law cannot apply nationwide. (See MSJ at 18; Oral Arg. Tr. at 31:11-22.) Plaintiffs, by contrast, argue that it is "widely recognized" that before the Court conducts a choice-of-law analysis, it must determine if Defendants have met their "substantial burden" to overcome the presumption that application of [37] California law comports with due process. (Resp. at 1 (quoting Keilholtz v. Lennox Hearth Prods. Inc., 268 F.R.D. 330, 340 (N.D. Cal. 2010)).) Plaintiffs do not cite any judicial authority demonstrating that this proposition is "widely recognized." The parties also do not reference, nor is this Court aware of, any precedential, binding judicial decisions that address both constitutional and choice-of-law challenges to the application of state antitrust law.

Under California law, the Court must consider Defendants' due process challenges prior to conducting a choice-of-law analysis. The Ninth Circuit has stated, in the context of class certification, "[u]nder California's choice of law rules, the class action proponent bears the initial burden to show that California has 'significant contact or significant aggregation of contacts' to the claims of each class member." Mazza v. Am. Honda Motor Co., 666 F.3d 581, 589 (9th Cir. 2012) (quoting Wash. Mut. Bank v. Superior Court, 24 Cal. 4th 906, 103 Cal. Rptr. 2d 320, 15 P.3d 1071, 1080 (Cal. 2001)); see also AT&T Mobility LLC v. AU Optronics Corp., 707 F.3d 1106, 1111 (9th Cir. 2013) ("The Due Process Clause . . . requires a court to invalidate the application of a state's law only where the state has 'no significant contact or significant aggregation of contacts, creating state interests, with the parties and the occurrence or transaction.'" (quoting Allstate Ins. Co. v. Hague, 449 U.S. at 308, 320 (1981) (plurality opinion)).

After the proponent demonstrates that the requisite "significant contact or significant aggregation [38] of contacts" exist, "the burden shifts to the other side to demonstrate 'that foreign law, rather than [*299] California law, should apply to class claims.'" Mazza, 666 F.3d at 589 (quoting Wash. Mut. Bank, 15 P.3d at 1081); see also *Pecover v. Elec. Arts Inc., No. C 08-2820 VRW, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 140632, 2010 WL 8742757, at 17 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 21, 2010) ("If th[e] due process test is satisfied, the presumption under California choice-of-law rules is that California law applies . . . . The court first addresses the due process issue before considering whether [the defendant], which seeks application of foreign law to plaintiffs' claims, has met its burden under California law.") (citation omitted).

Following California federal and state jurisprudence, this Court first determines whether Plaintiffs have shown that application of California law to their state antitrust claims is constitutional. Second, this Court considers whether Defendants have demonstrated that the law of the state of purchase applies to Plaintiffs' state antitrust claims under California's choice-of-law rules.

1. Application of California Law Does Not Violate the Due Process Clause.

The crux of the parties' due process dispute is whether application of California law to all of Plaintiffs' state law antitrust claims in [39] Count III of the TAC violates the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, as interpreted by the Supreme Court in Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts, 472 U.S. 797, 105 S. Ct. 2965, 86 L. Ed. 2d 628 (1985).

a. Relevant Law

The Court previously directed the parties to "carefully consider [Shutts] when it comes time to address the consumer protection choice-of-law issues." (Homebuilder MTD Opinion at 12 n.11.) Though the present Motion involves Plaintiffs' state antitrust claims, not its consumer protection claims, the Court considers Shutts in its Due Process analysis. See AT&T Mobility, 707 F.3d at 1107 n.1 (stating that the Ninth Circuit's due process analysis with respect to the plaintiffs' claims under California's Cartwright Act "appl[ied] equally" to the plaintiffs' unfair competition claims).

Shutts stands for the proposition that a forum state's substantive law may apply to claims of a nationwide class under the Due Process Clause if the state has a "significant contact or significant aggregation of contacts" to the claims asserted by each class member. See 472 U.S. at 821-22. As Defendants point out, this Court stated in its opinion denying class certification to the indirect purchasers, "Under the Supreme Court's decision in Shutts . . ., this Court would likely be required to apply the laws of each individual state which creates each particular cause of action." (ECF 632 [40] at 31.)[28]

However, the Court's note at the class certification stage does not end the Court's due process analysis on summary judgment, particularly because Defendants' due process rights are at issue in this individual action, unlike in Shutts, which involved the plaintiffs' rights in a class action. See Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. v. Superior Court of Calif., 137 S.Ct. 1773, 1782-83, 198 L. Ed. 2d 395 (2017) (cited by Defendants) (stating that Shutts, which "concerned the due process rights of plaintiffs," "ha[d] no bearing on the question" of whether the exercise of jurisdiction in California over nonresident plaintiffs' claims violated a non-resident defendant's due process rights).

Rather than rely on Shutts, Plaintiffs contend that the Ninth Circuit's opinion in [*300] AT&T Mobility permits this Court to apply California law to all of Plaintiffs' state antitrust claims. (See TAC ¶ 273.) In AT&T Mobility, direct and indirect purchasers of liquid crystal display ("LCD") panels alleged that the defendants, manufacturers and distributors of LCD panels, violated the Clayton Act, the Sherman Act, California's Cartwright Act, California's Unfair Competition Law, and, in the alternative, a number of other states' laws. 707 F.3d at 1108. The plaintiffs did business in California, [41] but only one plaintiff's principal place of business was in California. Id. The defendants' principal places of business were located throughout Asia and United States, including in California. Id. Though none of the purchases at issue were made in California, the plaintiffs alleged that conspiratorial conduct took place in California, including that specific employees of particular defendants, operating in California offices, illegally obtained and shared co-conspirators' pricing information. Id. at 1109. The district court dismissed the plaintiffs' California law claims, concluding that the application of California law to claims involving purchases made outside of California violated the defendants' due process rights. Id.

On appeal, the Ninth Circuit reversed, rejecting the district court's focus on the place of purchase in its due process analysis. Id. at 1110, 1114. The Ninth Circuit held that anticompetitive conduct within a state that is related to a plaintiff's alleged injuries and is not "slight and casual" is sufficient to establish the "significant aggregation of contacts" necessary to satisfy due process. Id. at 1113. Specifically, the Ninth Circuit held that application of California's Cartwright Act did not [42] violate the defendants' due process rights because more than a "de minimis" amount of the defendants' alleged conspiratorial conduct leading up the plaintiffs' purchases took place in California. Id.

In its analysis, the Ninth Circuit applied the Supreme Court's plurality opinion in Allstate, which imposed "modest restrictions on the application of forum law." Shutts, 472 U.S. at 818 (citing Allstate, 449 U.S. at 312-13). In Allstate, the Supreme Court upheld the application of Minnesota insurance law even though the insurance policy at issue was delivered in Wisconsin, the automobile accident took place in Wisconsin, and all persons involved were Wisconsin residents at the time of the accident. 449 U.S. at 302. The decedent, who had lived in Wisconsin, had been employed in Minnesota. Id. After the accident, the decedent's wife moved to Minnesota and brought an action against the insurer, Allstate, seeking a declaration that Minnesota law applied to the insurance policy. Id. at 305-06. The Supreme Court held that Minnesota had a "significant aggregation of contacts" with the parties and the accident because the decedent was employed in Minnesota, Allstate was at all times present and doing business in Minnesota, and the decedent's wife became a Minnesota resident [43] before initiating litigation. Id. at 313-20.

When applying Allstate, the Ninth Circuit in AT&T Mobility explained that unlike in Allstate, where neither the delivery of the insurance policy nor the automobile accident took place in Minnesota, in AT&T Mobility, the plaintiffs alleged that "some portion of Defendants' alleged illegal price-fixing conduct took place in California." 707 F.3d at 1111. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit stated, "Wherever the outer limit of due process constraints may lie, it is clear to us that Defendants' alleged illegal activity within California created more significant contacts with California than the contacts described in Allstate created with Minnesota." Id.

[28] This opinion is available on the MDL docket and at In re Domestic Drywall Antitrust Litig., No. 13-MD-2437, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 135758, 2017 WL 3700999 (E.D. Pa. Aug. 24, 2017) (Baylson, J.).

[*301] b. Application

Defendants argue that Plaintiffs' reliance on AT&T Mobility is misplaced because "[c]ases in the Third Circuit hold that even if a product is manufactured in one state by a resident defendant, when the purchase occurs outside [of] that state, its law cannot be applied consistent[ly] with Due Process." (MSJ at 20.) Though Defendants are correct that the Third Circuit's interpretation of the Due Process Clause is binding on this Court, Defendants do not cite, nor has this Court located, any Supreme Court or precedential Third Circuit opinions [44] rejecting AT&T Mobility or holding that the place of purchase exclusively governs for purposes of due process in the antitrust context.[29] As the Court has previously stated that it would give "special consideration" to Ninth Circuit law, the Court finds AT&T Mobility instructive. Further, because there is no dispute that this Court is bound by Supreme Court precedent, the Supreme Court's opinion in Allstate is also particularly helpful.

Defendants contend that even if AT&T Mobility were binding on this Court, Plaintiffs have failed to demonstrate that Defendants' conduct in California amounted to more than de minimis contacts with California. (MSJ at 20-21.) Put another way, Defendants argue that Plaintiffs' state antitrust claims lack "significant contact or significant aggregation of contacts" with California, as required to satisfy due process. (See Rep. at 13-17.) The Court disagrees.

The record reflects that California has a "significant aggregation of contacts" with Plaintiffs' state antitrust claims. Unlike in Allstate, where Minnesota law applied even though the individuals involved in the accident were [45] not residents of Minnesota, the delivery of the insurance policy did not take place in Minnesota, and the accident did not occur in Minnesota, here, it is undisputed that during the relevant period, three Plaintiffs were headquartered in California, one Defendant was headquartered in California, and some portion Plaintiffs' purchasing entities headquartered in California purchased drywall. (See Pls. Supp. SOF ¶¶ 48-53.) Further, as the record evidence shows that the "alleged conspiracy took place, at least in part, in California[,]" Defendants "cannot reasonably complain that the application of California law is arbitrary or unfair[.]" See AT&T Mobility, 707 F.3d at 1113. Moreover, PABCO and USG were doing business in California during the relevant time period, as it is undisputed that they have had a business presence in California for nearly fifty years. See Shutts, 472 U.S. at 822 ("When considering fairness in this context, an important element is the expectation of the parties."); Allstate, 449 U.S. at 317-18 ("By virtue of its presence [in Minnesota], Allstate can hardly claim unfamiliarity with the laws of the host jurisdiction and surprise that the [*302] . . . courts might apply forum law to litigation in which the company is involved.").

While Defendants argue [46] that Plaintiffs have cherry-picked from the 663 relevant facts identified by the class plaintiffs to manufacture a significant contact with California, the record reflects that "some portion" of Defendants' alleged conspiratorial conduct took place in California during the relevant time period. See AT&T Mobility, 707 F.3d at 1111. As the parties' contacts with California exceed those in Allstate, the Court need not reach any conclusions as to whether the facts cited amount to unlawful conspiratorial conduct to conclude that application of California law comports with the "modest restrictions" imposed by the Due Process Clause. See Shutts, 472 U.S. at 818.

2. Application of California Law Does Not Violate the Commerce Clause.

[29] Defendants also argue the AT&T Mobility is of "minimal value" because it preceded the Supreme Court's decision in Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., which "re-emphasized" the "theme" that a state that permits indirect purchasers to recover for purchases made within the state cannot dictate recovery for purchases made in other states. (MSJ at 19-20.) The Court is not persuaded by Defendants' attempt to draw connections between Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. and the instant case. Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., which involved a state's exercise of personal jurisdiction over an out-of-state defendant, is factually inapposite to this case, which involves the application of a state's substantive law to out-of-state plaintiffs. Further, Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. does not affect the Court's choice-of-law analysis because, as the Supreme Court recognized in Shutts, "[t]he issue of personal jurisdiction over plaintiffs in a class action is entirely different from the question of the constitutional limitations on choice of law." Shutts, 472 U.S. at 821.

Defendants further argue that application of California law violates the Commerce Clause of the Constitution, which "precludes the application of a state statute to commerce that takes place wholly outside of the State's borders, whether or not the commerce has effects with the State." (MSJ at 21 (quoting Healy v. Beer Inst., Inc., 491 U.S. 324, 336-40, 109 S. Ct. 2491, 105 L. Ed. 2d 275 (1989)).)

In Healy, an association of brewers and importers of beer sought declaratory judgment that a Connecticut statute violated the Commerce Clause. Id. at 326. The statute required out-of-state shippers of beer to affirm that their prices for beer sold to Connecticut wholesalers were no higher than prices in bordering [47] states. Id. The Supreme Court held that the Connecticut statute violated the Commerce Clause because the interaction of the Connecticut statute with beer-pricing statutes of bordering states had the "practical effect" of controlling prices "wholly outside" of Connecticut's borders. Id. at 336-37.

Plaintiffs contend that Defendants "stretch Healy beyond its breaking point," and the Court agrees. (See Resp. at 34.) Unlike in Healy, where the plaintiff challenged the constitutionality of a state statute that regulated out-of-state conduct, in this case, Defendants challenge the application of a state law to out-of-state plaintiffs. Defendants are not arguing that California's Cartwright Act is unconstitutional. Further, whereas in Healy, where the statute at issue regulated prices "wholly outside" of the state's borders, here, it is undisputed that Plaintiffs and/or their purchasing entities headquartered in California purchased wallboard during the relevant time period.

In support of their position, Defendants cite only one Third Circuit decision: A.S. Goldmen & Co. v. New Jersey Bureau of Securities, 163 F.3d 780 (3d Cir. 1999). (See MSJ at 22; Rep. at 12 n.5.) Defendants' reliance on this factually inapposite case is misplaced. A.S. Goldmen, similar to Healy, involved an action for declaratory judgment to invalidate [48] a state law. 163 F.3d at 781, 789. A.S. Goldmen also fails to demonstrate, as Defendants posit, that Commerce Clause jurisprudence is applicable to this Court's choice-of-law analysis. In fact, the only mention of choice-of-law in A.S. Goldmen is in Judge McKee's dissent, which underscores the distinction between a challenge to a state law as violating the Commerce Clause and a challenge to the application of a forum state's law under choice-of-law principles. See id. at 790 (McKee, J., dissenting) ("The approach the majority uses would be helpful to resolving a choice of law dispute, but it is only of limited assistance in adjudicating under the Commerce Clause.").

[*303] In sum, Plaintiffs have shown that application of California law to Plaintiffs' state antitrust claims violates the Commerce Clause, and Defendants have failed to support a finding to the contrary. Therefore, the Court proceeds to determine whether Defendants have met their burden of demonstrating that the laws of the states of purchase should apply to this matter under California's choice-of-law rules.

iii. Choice-of-Law Analysis

As noted above, the parties dispute whether the law of each state of purchase should apply to purchases made outside of California pursuant to California's choice-of-law rules. Even where [49] California law may be constitutionally applied, "California follows a three-step 'governmental interest analysis' to . . . ascertain the most appropriate law applicable to the issues where there is no effective choice-of-law agreement." Wash. Mut. Bank, 15 P.3d at 1080; see also Paulsen v. CNF, Inc., 559 F.3d 1061, 1080 (9th Cir. 2009) ("California will apply its own rule of decision unless a party invokes a law of a foreign state that 'will further the interest of the foreign state and therefore that it is an appropriate one for the forum to apply to the case before it.'" (quoting Hurtado v. Superior Court, 11 Cal. 3d 574, 114 Cal. Rptr. 106, 522 P.2d 666, 670 (Cal. 1974))). California's "governmental interest analysis" involves three steps.

Under the first step, "the foreign law proponent must identify the applicable rule of law in each potentially concerned state and must show it materially differs from the law of California." Wash. Mut. Bank, 15 P.3d at 1080. "If . . . the trial court finds the laws are materially different, it must proceed to the second step and determine what interest, if any, each state has in having its own law applied to the case." Id. at 1080-81. "Only if the trial court determines that the laws are materially different and that each state has an interest in having its own law applied, thus reflecting an actual conflict, must the court take the final step and select the laws of the [50] state whose interests would be 'more impaired' if its law were not applied." Id. at 1081 (citation omitted). In the third step, "the trial court must determine 'the relative commitment of the respective states to the laws involved' and consider 'the history and current status of the states' laws' and 'the function and purpose of those laws.'" Id. (citation omitted).

1. Step One: Whether California Law Materially Differs from the Laws of Each "Potentially Concerned State"

Differences between California law and foreign law are "material" "when they 'spell the difference between the success and failure of a claim' or determine availability of remedies." *Van Mourik v. Big Heart Pet Brands, Inc., No. 3:17-cv-03889-JD, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34796, 2018 WL 1116715, at 3 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 1, 2018) (quoting Mazza, 666 F.3d at 591) (concluding that the differences between Texas consumer protection law, which did not target unfair conduct and permitted only economic and treble damages, and California law, which prohibited unfair conduct and provided for actual damages, injunctive relief, restitution, punitive damages, and other relief, were material); see also Mazza, 666 F.3d at 591-92 ("'Any differences in [the states'] laws must have a significant effect on the outcome of trial in order to present an actual conflict in terms of [51] choice of law.'" (alteration in original) (quoting In re Complaint of Bankers Trust Co., 752 F.2d 874, 882 (3d Cir. 1984))).

The parties do not dispute that there are material differences between the antitrust laws of California, a repealer state, and the [*304] laws of non-repealer states. (See MSJ at 11; Resp. at 22); see also In re Packaged Seafood Prods. Antitrust Litig., 242 F. Supp. 3d 1033, 1066-67 (S.D. Cal. 2017) (identifying the availability of indirect purchaser recovery as a material difference creating a true conflict between the laws of repealer and non-repealer states); In re Qualcomm Antitrust Litig., 292 F. Supp. 3d 948, 979 (N.D. Cal. 2017) (concluding that the differences between California's Cartwright Act and the antitrust statutes of states that did not allow damages suits by indirect purchasers suits were material); *In re TFT-LCD (Flat Panel) Antitrust Litig., No. 10-05625 SI, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 173319, 2013 WL 6327490, at 3 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 3, 2013) (hereinafter, "TFT-LCD (Flat Panel) II") (noting, on partial summary judgment on choice-of-law grounds, that the parties did not dispute that the law of Virginia, a non-repealer state, was "materially different from California or Illinois law with respect to indirect purchaser actions").

Defendants also contend that there are four material differences between the antitrust laws of California and other repealer states. First, Defendants contend that unlike California, "many" repealer states, including New Mexico, Illinois, and Minnesota, prohibit Plaintiffs [52] from recovering for wallboard overcharges passed to their customers. (MSJ at 16.)[30] Second, Defendants argue that Plaintiffs "may not" have antitrust standing under the laws of many states because they have failed to provide "reliable evidence" of whom they purchased from, the amount of wallboard purchased, the percentage of turnkey purchases allocated to wallboard, and the amounts of overcharges. (Id.) Third, Defendants argue that treble damages are unavailable in "at least" Florida and New Mexico, and they are limited in Arizona. (Id. at 17.) Finally, Defendant contends that the availability of pre-judgment interest varies state-to-state. For example, whereas prejudgment interest is available in California upon a showing of bad faith, Arizona may allow for pre-judgment interest on liquidated damages, and Nevada does not consider whether the judgment is for a liquidated or unliquidated sum in awarding pre-judgment interest. (Id.) Defendants do not cite any binding judicial authority indicating that these differences are "material."

While Defendants have identified differences between California law and the laws of a few other repealer states, as Plaintiffs note, Defendants do not explain how these [53] differences are "material" to Plaintiffs' state antitrust claims. Without any analysis, the Court cannot conclude that Defendants have demonstrated that a true conflict would exist if California law were applied to claims arising from purchases in other repealer states. Cf. Mazza, 666 F.3d at 591 (holding that "at least some differences" identified by the defendant, the foreign law proponent, were material where the defendant "exhaustively detailed the ways in which California law differ[ed] from the laws of the 43 other jurisdictions in which class members reside[d]").

[30] Defendants contend that the availability of the pass-through defense is a material difference between California and other repealer states even though they dispute that California prohibits this defense. (Id.)

The Court also notes that in the class certification context, judges in the Northern District of California have certified classes in repealer states under the Cartwright Act after applying California's governmental interest analysis. See, e.g., *In re Korean Ramen Antitrust Litig., No. 13-cv-04115-WHO, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7756, 2017 WL 235052, at 22 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 19, 2017); *In re Optical Disk Drive Antitrust Litig., No. 3:10-md-2143 RS, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 15899, 2016 WL 467444, at 14 (N.D. Cal. [*305] Feb. 8, 2016), appeal filed, No. 19-15538 (9th Cir. Mar. 25, 2019).

As the Court concludes that Defendants have failed to meet their burden of demonstrating that the antitrust laws of California and other repealer states are materially different, the [54] Court need not proceed to the second step of the governmental interest analysis as to repealer states. See In re Hyundai & Kia Fuel Econ. Litig., 926 F.3d 539, 562 (9th Cir. 2019) (en banc) ("If the [foreign law proponents] fail to meet their burden at any step in the [choice-of-law] analysis, the district court 'may properly find California law applicable without proceeding' to the rest of the analysis." (quoting Pokorny v. Quixtar, Inc., 601 F.3d 987, 995 (9th Cir. 2010)). Therefore, the Court concludes that California law will govern as to state antitrust claims made by Plaintiffs who were headquartered in repealer states during the relevant period. The Court turns to the second step of the governmental interest analysis to assess the interests of only the non-repealer states.

2. Step Two: Each State's Interest in Having its Own Law Applied

In step two, "the court must determine whether a true conflict exists; that is, whether both states have a legitimate interest in having their state law applied to the case." *TFT-LCD (Flat Panel) II, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 173319, 2013 WL 6327490, at 3. Defendants argue that each state of purchase has a legitimate interest in applying its own law to commercial activity within its borders. (See MSJ at 11-12.)

"The second step of the governmental interest analysis requires [this Court] to examine each jurisdiction's interest in the application of its own law in the [55] circumstances of the particular case to determine whether a true conflict exists." McCann v. Foster Wheeler LLC, 48 Cal. 4th 68, 105 Cal. Rptr. 3d 378, 225 P.3d 516, 529 (Cal. 2010) (citation and internal quotation marks omitted). The Ninth Circuit has stated that "every state has an interest in having its law applied to its resident claimants." Mazza, 666 F.3d at 591-92 (quoting Zinser v. Accufix Research Inst., Inc., 253 F.3d 1180, 1187 (9th Cir. 2001)). "California law also acknowledges that 'a jurisdiction has 'the predominant interest' in regulating conduct that occurs within its borders[.]'" Mazza, 666 F.3d at 592 (quoting McCann, 225 P.3d at 516); see, e.g. *TFT-LCD (Flat Panel) II, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 173319, 2013 WL 6327490, at 3 (denying motion for summary judgment on choice-of-law as to claims under the Cartwright Act after considering, in detail, California and Virginia's interest in applying their antitrust laws to the matter).

California has a well-documented, articulated interest in applying the Cartwright Act. See *TFT-LCD (Flat Panel) II, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 173319, 2013 WL 6327490, at 4 ("California has repeatedly demonstrated its commitment to the application and enforcement of the Cartwright Act. . . . The California Supreme Court has held that the purposes of the Cartwright Act are better served by overcompensating plaintiffs than by failing to adequately deter anticompetitive behavior." (citing Clayworth v. Pfizer, 49 Cal. 4th 758, 111 Cal. Rptr. 3d 666, 233 P.3d 1066, 1081, 1083 (Cal. 2010))). The Cartwright Act's objectives include "deterrence and full disgorgement of ill-gotten gains, especially in the context of price fixing cartels; that deterrence [56] and full disgorgement include[] extending state-created remedies to out-of-state parties harmed by wrongful conduct occurring in California." *In re TFT-LCD (Flat Panel) Antitrust Litig., No. 10-cv-4945, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 97825, 2013 WL 4175253, at 2 (N.D. Cal. July 11, 2013) (hereinafter "TFT-LCD (Flat Panel) I"); see also AT&T Mobility, 707 F.3d at 1112-13 ("Applying California law to anticompetitive [*306] conduct undertaken within California advances the Cartwright Act's 'overarching goals of maximizing effective deterrence of antitrust violations, enforcing the state's antitrust laws against those violations that do occur, and ensuring disgorgement of any ill-gotten proceeds'" (quoting Clayworth, 233 P.3d at 1070)).

In contrast, there is disagreement amongst district judges in California regarding whether non-repealer states are interested in denying their citizens recovery for antitrust violations committed by out-of-state defendants. Compare Korean Ramen, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7756, 2017 WL 235052, at *22 (certifying a class of indirect purchasers under the Cartwright Act only in repealer states, not in non-repealer states, because "'[g]iven that the action simply could not go forward in non-repealer states, . . . it is too much of a stretch to employ California law as an end run around the limitations those states have elected to impose on standing'") (alteration in original) [57] (citation omitted), and TFT-LCD (Flat Panel) I, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 97825, 2013 WL 4175253, at *2 (on a motion in limine to determine whether California or Texas law applied to indirect purchasers' claims, disagreeing with the plaintiffs' argument that Texas, a non-repealer state, had no interest in ensuring that out-of-state defendants were shielded from damages for antitrust violations) (citing Mazza, 666 F.3d at 592-93), and TFT-LCD (Flat Panel) II, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 173319, 2013 WL 6327490, at *3 (on a motion for partial summary judgment on choice-of-law, concluding that Virginia, a non-repealer state, had an interest in the application of its antitrust law where some of the impact of the alleged price fixing took place at the plaintiff's headquarters in Virginia, from which it placed purchased orders and generated payments), with Qualcomm, 292 F. Supp. 3d at 979-80 (where the sole defendant was a resident of California, a repealer state, the court concluded that applying non-repealer states' antitrust laws to bar recovery "would paradoxically disadvantage the other states' own citizens for injuries caused by a California defendant's unlawful activities that took place primarily in California").

Here, Defendants, without discussing the interests of specific non-repealer states, argue that states of purchase have legitimate interests in regulating commercial activities within their [58] borders. Defendants' analysis cites only one precedential judicial decision in the Ninth Circuit, Mazza, and, in a conclusory fashion, contends that non-repealer states have interests in prohibiting antitrust suits arising from indirect purchases. (See Rep. at 4-6.) That is not sufficient for Defendants to satisfy their burden of demonstrating that a "true conflict" exists, as Defendants have failed to show that "each state has an interest in the application of its own law to 'the circumstances of the particular case[.]'" Hyundai & Kia Fuel Econ. Litig., 926 F.3d at 562 (quoting Kearney v. Salomon Smith Barney, Inc., 39 Cal. 4th 95, 45 Cal. Rptr. 3d 730, 137 P.3d 914, 922 (Cal. 2006)).

Though it is Defendants burden to demonstrate that there is a "true conflict," the Court also considers Plaintiffs' argument that no "true conflict" exists. According to Plaintiffs, non-repealer states have no interest in preventing indirect purchasers from recovering from Defendants, corporate citizens of repealer states. (See Resp. at 23-29.) In support of this position, Plaintiffs rely almost exclusively on Qualcomm. As Defendants note, the choice-of-law analysis in a subsequent opinion in the Qualcomm matter is currently on appeal to the Ninth Circuit. See Qualcomm, 292 F. Supp. 3d at 979-81 (cited by Plaintiffs) (denying the defendant's motion to strike indirect purchasers' nationwide class allegations [59] under the Cartwright Act because [*307] non-repealer states had no interest in preventing their citizens from recovering for antitrust violations committed by a corporation in California, a repealer state); In re Qualcomm Antitrust Litig., 328 F.R.D. 280, 313-15 (N.D. Cal. 2018) (not cited by Plaintiffs) (applying the same choice-of-law analysis when granting the plaintiffs' motion for class certification), appeal filed sub nom. Stromberg v. Qualcomm Inc., No. 18-80135 (9th Cir. Oct. 11, 2018). Further, the only federal judicial decision cited by Defendants that applied Mazza in the context of a motion for summary judgment in an antitrust action, TFT-LCD (Flat Panel) II, took a contrary position to Qualcomm. See 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 173319, 2013 WL 6327490, at *3-4 (concluding that both California and Virginia, a non-repealer state, had an interest in the application of its antitrust law to the matter).

Though the Court is not inclined to postpone ruling on Defendants' Motion until the Ninth Circuit issues an opinion in Qualcomm, the Court cannot conclude, as a matter of law, that California law applies to state antitrust claims brought by Plaintiffs located in non-repealer states based on the current record. Cf. Forcellati v. Hyland's, Inc., No. 12-1983-GHK (MRWx), 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 50600, 2014 WL 1410264, at *4 (C.D. Cal. Apr. 9, 2014) (concluding that California law applied to the plaintiffs' [60] proposed nationwide class "because [the] [p]laintiffs [ ] made a sufficient initial showing for application of California law, and [the] [d]efendants have failed to show otherwise").

In short, the parties have not adequately briefed the interests of non-repealer states in which Plaintiffs were headquartered, as required for the Court to draw any conclusions about the existence of a "true conflict." Therefore, the Court will require counsel for Plaintiffs and Defendants to confer as to future briefing on this issue, particularly in light of the Ninth Circuit's recent en banc ruling in Hyundai & Kia Fuel Economy Litigation, 926 F.3d 539. See id. at 562 n.6 (noting that a district court is not obligated to conduct a "comprehensive survey of every state's law" when the foreign law proponent has failed to do so) (citation and internal quotation marks omitted). Within ten (10) days, counsel shall file either a joint statement or individual statements, limited to five (5) pages, addressing whether supplemental briefing will be required. Any supplemental briefing must be filed by August 15, 2019 and is limited to twenty (20) pages.

As Defendants have not met their burden as to the second step of the governmental interest analysis, the Court need not proceed [61] to the third step. See Hyundai & Kia Fuel Econ. Litig., 926 F.3d at 562 ("If the [foreign law proponents] fail to meet their burden at any step in the [choice-of-law] analysis, the district court 'may properly find California law applicable without proceeding' to the rest of the analysis.") (citation omitted). Though the Court does not reach the third step, the Court notes that if the parties submit supplemental briefing, the briefs must address the degree to which non-repealer states' interests would be impaired by application of California law to Plaintiffs' state antitrust claims. In the absence of such briefing, the Court would be unable to "carefully evaluate[] and compare[] the nature and strength of the interest of each jurisdiction in the application of its own law," as the third step of California's governmental interest analysis requires. See McCann, 225 P.3d at 527.

V. Conclusion

For the foregoing reasons, Defendants' Motion will be denied as to repealer states. California law will apply to state antitrust claims in Count III brought by Plaintiffs located in repealer states. As to non-repealer [*308] states, the Court withholds judgment pending resolution by the parties or, if necessary, the Court's review of supplemental briefing.

ORDER RE: MOTION FOR [62] SUMMARY JUDGMENT (CHOICE-OF-LAW)

AND NOW, this 8th day of July, 2019, for the reasons stated in the foregoing memorandum, upon consideration of Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment on Choice-of-law (ECF 316), the response and reply thereto, and oral argument, it is hereby ORDERED as follows:

1. Defendant's Motion is DENIED, and California law will apply, as to claims brought by Plaintiffs in "repealer" states; and
2. Further briefing will be necessary for the Court to rule as to claims brought by Plaintiffs in "non-repealer" states.

HN1[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Adequacy of Representation

Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 governs the certification of class actions in federal court. Rule 23(a) sets out the four prerequisites for any class action: (1) the class is so numerous that joinder of all members is impracticable; (2) there are questions of law or fact common to the class; (3) the claims or defenses of the representative parties are typical of the claims or defenses of the class; and (4) the representative parties will fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class. These four threshold requirements are referred to as numerosity, commonality, typicality, and adequacy of representation.

HN2[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Commonality

Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b) provides that a class action may be maintained if Rule 23(a) is satisfied and the action meets the requirements of either Rule 23(b)(1), (b)(2), or (b)(3). Rule 23(b)(3) permits a class action if the court finds that the questions of law or fact common to class members predominate over any questions affecting only individual members, and that a class action is superior to other available methods for fairly and efficiently adjudicating the controversy. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(2). The first part of this criterion is known as predominance; the second part as superiority.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Adequacy of Representation

HN3[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Adequacy of Representation

A party seeking to maintain a class action must affirmatively demonstrate his compliance with Fed. R. Civ. P. 23. Rule 23 does not set forth a mere pleading standard. Rather, a party must not only be prepared to prove that there are in fact sufficiently numerous parties, common questions of law or fact, typicality of claims or defenses, and adequacy of representation, as required by Rule 23(a), but must also satisfy through evidentiary proof at least one of the provisions of Rule 23(b).

HN4[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

A court presented with a motion for class certification must engage in a rigorous analysis to be certain that the requirements of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a) and (b) are satisfied, which will frequently necessitate looking behind the pleadings and giving some consideration to the merits of the plaintiffs' underlying claims. While a court's class-certification analysis must be rigorous and may entail some overlap with the merits of the plaintiff's underlying claim, Rule 23 grants courts no license to engage in free-ranging merits inquiries at the certification stage. Merits questions may be considered to the extent—but only to the extent—that they are relevant to determining whether the Rule 23 prerequisites for class certification are satisfied. Ultimately, a district court exercises broad discretion in deciding whether to permit a case to proceed as a class action.

HN5[] Venue, Multidistrict Litigation

In a multidistrict litigation (MDL), the MDL transferee court must apply the law of its own circuit when analyzing questions of federal law. This principle extends to interpretations of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23. However, in the absence of controlling precedent, the law of a transferor forum on a federal question merits close consideration, but it does not have stare decisis effect in a transferee forum situated in another circuit.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Predominance

HN6[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

The predominance prong of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3) permits a class action if the court finds that the questions of law or fact common to class members predominate over any questions affecting only individual members. To satisfy this requirement for a proposed multi-state class, the movants must creditably demonstrate, through an extensive analysis of state law variances, that class certification does not present insuperable obstacles. Or, in other words, claims arising under different states' laws can be grouped into a single class only if they contain materially identical legal standards. The burden of showing groupability rests squarely with the plaintiffs. The crucial inquiry is not whether the laws of multiple jurisdictions are implicated, but whether those laws differ in a material manner that precludes the predominance of common issues. Courts can allow subclassing on motion or sua sponte, but are under no obligation to do so, and the burden remains on the party seeking certification.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

HN7[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

In considering whether to certify a multi-state class, it is the trial court's job to critically consider variations in state law. The inquiry begins, of course, with the elements of the underlying cause of action. Any variations in state courts' interpretations of facially similar elements also is relevant. The absence of any clear interpretation of an element may also be material because each state must decide for itself how to resolve unanswered questions about the scope and evidentiary requirements needed to establish that element. Whether variations in elements or interpretations are material depends on the extent and nature of any variations, the plaintiffs' theory of liability, and the factual record.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

Governments > Courts > Authority to Adjudicate

HN8[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

A single difference among the state laws governing the plaintiffs' claims is not necessarily a substantial difference, but courts must exercise care in order to determine whether any conflicts in governing law will overwhelm the ability of the trier of fact meaningfully to advance the litigation through class-wide proof. Even differences in state laws that amount to nuances may suffice to make multistate classes inappropriate.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

Evidence > Burdens of Proof > Allocation

HN9[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

Plaintiffs seeking certification of a multi-state class bear the burden of demonstrating a suitable and realistic plan for trial of the class claims. If more than a few of the state laws differ, a court would face an impossible task of instructing a jury on relevant law.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

HN10[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

Certifying multistate or nationwide classes is not categorically prohibited, but class certification analysis is necessarily contextual. The ultimate test for multi-state class certification is whether the relevant states establish a large number of different legal standards governing a particular claim.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

HN11[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

An important caveat to the general principle that multi-state class certification depends on whether the relevant states establish a large number of different legal standards is that courts tend to be more receptive to certification of multistate settlement classes.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

HN12[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

Differences in scienter are generally material because in cases where a defendant acted without scienter, a scienter requirement will spell the difference between the success and failure of a claim.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

HN13[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

Although every state's consumer protection statute prohibits deceptive acts, they do not utilize a uniform definition of deception. Some states require that the deceptive act be material, while others only require that the deceptive act have the capacity or tendency to deceive.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

Evidence > Burdens of Proof > Allocation

HN14[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

Consumer protection statutes do not use identical language when describing what is required in terms of causation and injury to recover damages in a private suit. The variations in statutory language would not matter if they had been interpreted to have the same meaning, but they have not. Rather, judicial interpretations of these statutes have confirmed that there are clear differences in what a plaintiff must show to prove causation and injury. Suggesting that proximate cause is required in all jurisdictions is not accurate. As for injury, several states have concluded that a legally cognizable injury must be distinct from the deception itself.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

Contracts Law > Remedies > Equitable Relief > Quantum Meruit

HN15[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

As to each proposed unjust enrichment class, the court must decide whether the covered jurisdictions have materially identical legal standards. Courts frequently refuse to certify multi-state unjust enrichment classes.

Contracts Law > Remedies > Equitable Relief > Quantum Meruit

HN16[] Equitable Relief, Quantum Meruit

To prevail on a claim for unjust enrichment, the plaintiffs must prove that the defendants' retention of the benefit is unjust. The specific language used to define unjustness varies by jurisdiction. The question of whether it would be unfair for the defendant to retain the benefit is a fact-intensive inquiry that focuses on the totality of the circumstances, not just the defendant's conduct.

Civil Procedure > Preliminary Considerations > Equity > Adequate Remedy at Law

Contracts Law > Remedies > Equitable Relief > Quantum Meruit

HN17[] Equity, Adequate Remedy at Law

The unjust enrichment laws of many jurisdictions vary in terms of whether they have a "no adequate remedy at law" requirement and, if so, how that requirement is defined. There are states that have a "no adequate remedy at law" requirement and states that do not. In those states with a "no adequate remedy at law" requirement, its meaning varies. Courts applying the law of some states consistently dismiss unjust enrichment claims (including slack-fill cases), since the same underlying conduct would constitute a claim under the state's consumer protection statute. In other states, the requirement appears to have been interpreted as not barring an unjust enrichment claim for damages.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

Civil Procedure > Preliminary Considerations > Venue > Multidistrict Litigation

HN18[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

Plaintiffs bear the burden of proving that the Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a) requirements are met and showing that Rule 23(b)(3) is satisfied through evidentiary proof. And, in multidistrict litigation, the D.C. Circuit's interpretations of Rule 23 provide the controlling law, but where the D.C. Circuit has not addressed an issue, and there is a divergence among the circuits, a district court must apply the interpretation of Rule 23 it finds most persuasive.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Numerosity

HN19[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Numerosity

Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(1) requires that the proposed class be so numerous that joinder of all members is impracticable. Impracticable means difficult or inconvenient rather than impossible. The numerosity requirement requires examination of the specific facts of each case and imposes no absolute limitations. The plaintiffs must provide some evidence that a class is numerous, but courts may draw reasonable inferences from the facts presented to find the requisite numerosity. As a rule of thumb, a class of over 40 members satisfies the numerosity requirement.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Commonality

HN20[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Commonality

The requirement of commonality is satisfied when there are questions of law or fact common to the class. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(2). If the class members claims involve no common question of law or fact, there will be no cause to believe that all their claims can productively be litigated at once. Even a single common question will do. But the common contention must be of such a nature that it is capable of classwide resolution—which means that the determination of its truth or falsity will resolve an issue that is central to the validity of each one of the claims in one stroke. What matters to class certification is not the raising of common questions—even in droves—but, rather the capacity of a classwide proceeding to generate common answers apt to drive the resolution of the litigation.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Commonality

HN21[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Commonality

To satisfy the requirement of commonality, class action plaintiffs need not show that a common question will be answered in their favor. Rather, they need only show that the common question is capable of generating a common answer even if that answer defeats their claim.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive Labeling & Packaging > State Regulation

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

HN22[] Deceptive Labeling & Packaging, State Regulation

A claim concerning alleged misrepresentations on packaging to which all consumers were exposed is sufficient to satisfy the commonality requirement for class actions because it raises the common question of whether the packaging would mislead a reasonable consumer.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Commonality

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Typicality

HN23[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Commonality

Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(3) requires that the claims or defenses of the representative parties be typical of the claims or defenses of the class. Typicality differs from commonality in that typicality concerns the relationship between the representative's individual claims and the class's claims rather than the relatedness of the entire class's claims. Yet they both serve as guideposts for determining whether under the particular circumstances maintenance of a class action is economical. The purpose of the typicality requirement is to assess whether the action can be efficiently maintained as a class action and whether the named plaintiffs have incentives that align with those of the absent class members so as to assure that the absentees' interests will be fairly represented.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Typicality

HN24[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Typicality

The typicality requirement is liberally construed. To destroy typicality, a distinction must differentiate the claims or defenses of the representatives from those of the class. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(3). As a result, typicality is ordinarily met if the claims or defenses of the representatives and the members of the class stem from a single event or a unitary course of conduct, or if they are based on the same legal or remedial theory.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Adequacy of Representation

HN25[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Adequacy of Representation

Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(4) requires plaintiffs to show that the representative parties will fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class. The adequacy requirement aims to ensure that absent class members will not be bound by the outcome of a suit in which they were not competently and fairly represented. Two criteria for determining the adequacy of representation are generally recognized: (1) the named representative must not have antagonistic or conflicting interests with the unnamed members of the class, and (2) the representative must appear able to vigorously prosecute the interests of the class through qualified counsel. Among the many factors governing the district court's decision that the class members are adequately represented are the quality of class counsel, any disparity in interest between class representatives and members of a would-be subclass, communication between class counsel and the class, and the overall context of the litigation.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

HN26[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 does not expressly require that a class be ascertainable, and the D.C. Circuit has not addressed whether Rule 23 contains an ascertainability requirement for class certification. Most federal circuits (unlike the D.C. Circuit) have held that ascertainability is an implied requirement under Rule 23. However, the circuits diverge as to the meaning of ascertainability.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

HN27[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

As a baseline, courts generally agree that ascertainability means that a class definition must render potential class members identifiable according to objective criteria. The Third Circuit has added the additional requirement that the method of determining whether someone is in the class must be administratively feasible, while the Seventh and Ninth Circuits have expressly rejected that interpretation.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action

HN28[] Class Actions, Prerequisites for Class Action

The reasoning of courts that have rejected a requirement of administrative feasibility as part of ascertainability is persuasive. As those courts have noted, nothing in Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 mentions or implies this heightened requirement.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Commonality

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Predominance

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Maintainability

HN29[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Commonality

To authorize a class action under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3), a court must find that the questions of law or fact common to class members predominate over any questions affecting only individual members.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Maintainability

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Predominance

HN30[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Maintainability

The predominance requirement of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3) is more demanding than the commonality requirement of Rule 23(a). It tests whether proposed classes are sufficiently cohesive to warrant adjudication by representation, by asking whether the common, aggregation-enabling, issues in the case are more prevalent or important than the non-common, aggregation-defeating, individual issues. Thus, the predominance inquiry calls upon courts to give careful scrutiny to the relation between common and individual questions in a case. An individual question is one where members of a proposed class will need to present evidence that varies from member to member, while a common question is one where the same evidence will suffice for each member to make a prima facie showing or the issue is susceptible to generalized, class-wide proof. When one or more of the central issues in the action are common to the class and can be said to predominate, the action may be considered proper under Rule 23(b)(3) even though other important matters will have to be tried separately, such as damages or some affirmative defenses peculiar to individual class members.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Predominance

HN31[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

In determining whether class or individual issues predominate in a putative class action suit, courts must take into account the claims, defenses, relevant facts, and applicable substantive law, to assess the degree to which resolution of the classwide issues will further each individual class member's claim against the defendant.

HN32[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

Plaintiffs bear the burden of satisfying Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3) through evidentiary proof, which includes establishing that damages are capable of measurement on a classwide basis.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

HN33[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

The consumer protection laws of California, Florida, Illinois, and Missouri require proof of an unfair or deceptive act. Although the states vary in how they define deception, proof of deception in each is judged by an objective, reasonable consumer standard and can be satisfied in each state without any individualized proof of reliance.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Predominance

HN34[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

In order to prove predominance, plaintiffs have to establish that damages are capable of measurement on a classwide basis. Calculations need not be exact, but any model supporting a plaintiff's damages case must be consistent with its liability case.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

HN35[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

Plaintiffs at the class certification stage are not required to prove damages by calculating specific damages figures for each member of the class, but rather they must show that a reliable method is available to prove damages on a classwide basis. The mere fact that damage awards will ultimately require individualized fact determinations is insufficient by itself to preclude class certification.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

HN36[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

To gain certification under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3), plaintiffs need not establish that they will win the fray because the office of a Rule 23(b)(3) certification ruling is not to adjudicate the case; rather, it is to select the method best suited to adjudication of the controversy fairly and efficiently.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

HN37[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

A party seeking class certification must satisfy Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3) through evidentiary proof. Only a few courts have grappled with the question of what evidentiary proof is needed to satisfy Rule 23(b)(3). Several California cases, including a decision by the Ninth Circuit, have held that in light of the objective standard for materiality under California law, extrinsic evidence of materiality is not required. But a Seventh Circuit decision and several subsequent district court cases in Illinois strongly suggest that even when materiality is judged by an objective standard, extrinsic evidence of materiality may be necessary for class certification of a consumer protection claim where there may be several explanations for consumers' behavior and motivations.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

HN38[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

To prevail on a claim under California's Consumer Legal Remedies Act, Cal. Civ. Code § 1770 et seq., plaintiffs must prove a deceptive act, causation of injury and reliance on the deceptive practice. However, in a class action causation, on a classwide basis, may be established by materiality, and if material misrepresentations have been made to the entire class, an inference of reliance arises as to the class. To prove materiality, a plaintiff must establish that a reasonable person would attach importance to the misrepresentation's existence or nonexistence in determining his choice of action. Thus, materiality is judged by an objective reasonable person standard.

HN39[] State Regulation, Claims

Causation is a required element under California's Unfair Competition Law, Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200 et seq. However, to establish causation in a class action, only the class representatives must establish reliance on the alleged misrepresentation, unnamed class members need not.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

HN40[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

A growing number of cases in California have concluded that when a case presents specific alleged misrepresentations common to the class, materiality is necessarily a common question for purposes of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3) because it is judged by an objective reasonable person standard and, therefore, no evidence of materiality is necessary for purposes of class certification. The Ninth Circuit has also held that claims under California's Consumer Legal Remedies Act, Cal. Civ. Code § 1770 et seq., are ideal for class certification because they do not require the court to investigate class members' individual interaction with the product. As a result, there is no risk whatever that a failure of proof on the common questions of deception and materiality will result in individual questions predominating. Instead, the failure of proof on the elements of deception and materiality would end the case for one and for all; no claim would remain in which individual issues could potentially predominate.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Maintainability

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Predominance

HN41[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

The Ninth Circuit has held (albeit in an unpublished opinion) that it is an error of law for courts at class certification to require extrinsic evidence of materiality to prove predominance. Neither Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 nor California law requires plaintiffs to proffer a certain type of evidence at class certification. There is nothing in the United States Supreme Court's decisions to suggest that evidentiary proof of predominance must take a certain form. In addition, that court is disinclined to interpret Rule 23 as requiring plaintiffs to proffer a particular type of evidence when such evidence is not required under state law for plaintiffs to prevail on the merits of their claims.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

HN42[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

It is clear under California law that not only is materiality judged by an objective standard, but also materiality to a reasonable consumer does not mean it has to be material to every consumer. Thus, the case law has rejected the argument that predominance is not met where the evidence shows that people buy the defendant's products for reasons other than the challenged claim, such as taste, price, brand loyalty, nostalgia, and convenience. A defendant's argument that consumers have a variety of reasons for purchasing the product is a merits dispute as to materiality, and is therefore a dispute that can be resolved classwide.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

HN43[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

Under California law, materiality is generally a question of fact unless the fact misrepresented is so obviously unimportant that the jury could not reasonably find that a reasonable man would have been influenced by it.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

HN44[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

Prohibitions under state law are not dispositive of the issue of materiality in a consumer protection case, but federal and state courts in California have concluded that laws prohibiting certain conduct can be evidence of materiality.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

HN45[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

To recover damages under the Illinois Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Practices Act (ICFA), 815 ILCS 505/1 et seq., a plaintiff must prove (1) a deceptive act or practice by the defendant, (2) the defendant's intent that the plaintiff rely on the deception, (3) the occurrence of the deception in a course of conduct involving trade or commerce, and (4) actual damage to the plaintiff that is (5) a result of the deception. That the plaintiff must prove that actual damages were suffered as a result of the deceptive act imposes an obligation on the plaintiff to prove the deceptive act proximately caused any damages. In addition, to be actionable under the ICFA, a representation must be material, which is established by applying an objective standard. A material fact exists where a buyer would have acted differently knowing the information, or if it concerned the type of information upon which a buyer would be expected to rely in making a decision whether to purchase.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

HN46[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

Although materiality under the Illinois Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Practices Act, 815 ILCS 505/1 et seq., is judged on an objective, reasonable person standard, proximate causation and actual damages are individualized inquiries, and require proof that the plaintiff was deceived in some manner and damaged by the deception. As such, absent proof as to why a particular plaintiff purchased a particular product, the plaintiff cannot establish that the defendants' conduct caused him or her to make that purchase. In addition, in a class action in Illinois plaintiffs must prove proximate causation and actual damages as to each class member.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

The mere presence of individualized issues does not require denial of certification of an Illinois Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Practices Act, 815 ILCS 505/1 et seq., class. Under the Illinois Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Practices Act, 815 ILCS 505/1 et seq., at class certification it is necessary to proffer common evidentiary proof as to the reasons behind class member's purchasing decisions if the issues of proximate causation and actual damages are not straightforward.

While not necessarily required in every case under the Illinois Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Practices Act, 815 ILCS 505/1 et seq., evidence of materiality in the form of a consumer survey, market research, or an expert opinion has played an important role in Illinois in establishing the cohesiveness of a proposed class.

HN50[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

In a state such as Illinois, where the individual reasons for purchasing a product are relevant under the consumer protection statute, there needs to be evidence of classwide materiality so that a court can have confidence that class members share the plaintiffs' grievance and that the individualized inquiries necessary to prove causation and injury will be relatively simple and straightforward. Where such evidence is lacking, a court must decide, based on the nature of plaintiffs' claim and evidence before it, whether such individualized inquiries predominate.

To prevail on a claim for damages under the Florida Deceptive and Unfair Trade Practices Act, Fla. Stat. § 501.201 et seq., a plaintiff must prove (1) a deceptive act or unfair practice; (2) causation; and (3) actual damages. (A party asserting a deceptive trade practice claim need not show actual reliance on the representation or omission at issue.

In Florida, both causation and actual damages are judged by objective standards. To prove causation under the Florida Deceptive and Unfair Trade Practices Act, Fla. Stat. § 501.201 et seq., a plaintiff must simply prove that an objectively reasonable person would have been deceived. The mental state of each class member is irrelevant. Actual damages are incurred if the plaintiff does not receive the benefit of the bargain, which is measured according to the difference in the market value of the product or service in the condition in which it was delivered and its market value in the condition in which it should have been delivered according to the contract of the parties.

HN53[] Trade Practices & Unfair Competition, State Regulation

Causation under the Florida Deceptive and Unfair Trade Practices Act (FDUTPA), Fla. Stat. § 501.201 et seq., is a common question for purposes of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3). It is judged by an objective, reasonable person standard and a failure of proof on that element will lead to the failure of all claims. Causation under the FDUTPA does not even require proof of materiality to the reasonable consumer; it only requires proof that a reasonable consumer would have been deceived. In addition, state courts, applying a similar standard, have concluded that issues pertaining to the proof of the alleged deceptive practice and issues relating to causation and damages are common to all members of the class. And, there is a long line of similar cases involving allegedly deceptive marketing of a consumer good where courts have certified FDUTPA classes without any evidentiary proof of causation.

HN54[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

If a putative class has not all been exposed to the same representations, it is not possible to determine on a classwide basis whether an objectively reasonable consumer would have been deceived.

To prevail on a claim under the Missouri Merchandising Practices Act, Mo. Ann. Stat. § 407.010 et seq., a plaintiff must plead and prove he or she (1) purchased merchandise (which includes services) from the defendants; (2) for personal, family or household purposes; and (3) suffered an ascertainable loss of money or property; (4) as a result of an act declared unlawful under the Merchandising Practices Act.

Causation under the Missouri Merchandising Practices Act, *Mo. Ann. Thus, class members are not individually required to show what they would or would not have done had the product not been misrepresented and the risks known.

As for the element of ascertainable loss, Missouri courts apply the benefit of the bargain rule when determining if a plaintiff has suffered an ascertainable loss under the Missouri Merchandising Practices Act, *Mo. An unjust enrichment claim does not depend solely on the defendant's conduct in California, Connecticut, the District of Columbia, Illinois, Maryland, Missouri, or Pennsylvania. When confronted by motions for class certification of unjust enrichment claims under the laws of California, Connecticut, the District of Columbia, Illinois, Maryland, Missouri, and Pennsylvania, courts have denied such motions, concluding that the need for individualized inquiries into purchasers' knowledge and motivations precluded a finding of predominance.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Superiority

HN60[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Maintainability

The superiority requirement asks whether a class action is superior to other available methods for fairly and efficiently adjudicating the controversy. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3). It aims to achieve economies of time, effort, and expense, and promote uniformity of decision as to persons similarly situated, without sacrificing procedural fairness or bringing about other undesirable results. The matters pertinent to a finding of superiority include: (A) the class members' interests in individually controlling the prosecution of separate actions; (B) the extent and nature of any litigation concerning the controversy already begun by or against class members; (C) the desirability or undesirability of concentrating the litigation of the claims in the particular forum; and (D) the likely difficulties in managing a class action.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

HN61[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

Class actions often involve an aggregation of small individual claims, where a large number of claims are required to make it economical to bring suit. The plaintiff's claim may be so small, or the plaintiff so unfamiliar with the law, that he would not file suit individually. This consideration supports class certification in cases where the total amount sought by each individual plaintiff is small in absolute terms. It also applies in situations where the amounts in controversy would make it unlikely that most of the plaintiffs, or attorneys working on a contingency fee basis, would be willing to pursue the claims individually.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Maintainability

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Superiority

HN62[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Maintainability

Manageability is only one of the elements that goes into the balance to determine the superiority of a class action in a particular case. Other factors must also be considered, as must the purposes of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23, including: conserving time, effort, and expense; providing a forum for small claimants; and deterring illegal activities.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Adequacy of Representation

HN63[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Adequacy of Representation

Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(g) requires that a court that certifies a class must appoint class counsel. Rule 23(g)(1). In appointing class counsel, the court must consider four factors: (i) the work counsel has done in identifying or investigating potential claims in the action; (ii) counsel's experience in handling class actions, other complex litigation and the types of claims asserted in the action; (iii) counsel's knowledge of the applicable law; and (iv) the resources that counsel will commit to representing the class. Rule 23(g)(1)(A)(i)-(iv). Moreover, the Court may also consider any other matter pertinent to counsel's ability to fairly and adequately represent the interests of the class. Rule 23(g)(1)(B).

MEMORANDUM OPINION

TABLE OF CONTENTS

This multidistrict consumer litigation against McCormick & Co. and Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., arises from the sales of black pepper in tins and grinders allegedly containing "nonfunctional slack-fill" not visible to purchasers (the "Slack-Filled Pepper Products"). The Slack-Filled Pepper Products were sold between March 2015 and mid-2016. They include both McCormick-branded products and McCormick-filled private-label brands, such as Wal-Mart's Great Value products. Named plaintiffs are purchasers who claim that the sale [6] of these products violated various state consumer protection statutes and unjust enrichment laws.[1]

Before the Court is plaintiffs' motion pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23 for class certification and appointment of counsel. (Pls.' Mot. for Class Certification, ECF No. 156 ("Class Cert. Mot.").) With respect to their statutory consumer protection claims, plaintiffs seek certification of a multi-state class covering purchasers in 20 jurisdictions (the "Consumer Protection Multi-State Class") or, in the alternative, four single-state classes covering purchasers in California, Florida, Illinois, and Missouri. With respect to their unjust enrichment claims, plaintiffs seek certification of two multi-state classes, covering purchasers in a total of 29 jurisdictions (the "Unjust Enrichment (Restatement) Multi-State Class" and the "Unjust Enrichment (Appreciation) Multi-State Class") or, in the alternative, seven single-state unjust enrichment classes covering purchasers in California, Connecticut, the District of Columbia, Illinois, Maryland, Missouri, and Pennsylvania. In addition to opposing class certification, defendants [*207] have filed a joint motion to exclude the expert report and opinions of Dr. Armando [7] Levy, plaintiffs' damages expert. (Defs.' Joint Mot. to Exclude the Report and Opinions of Dr. Armando Levy, Aug. 28, 2017, ECF No. 164 ("Defs.' Expert Mot.").)

For the reasons stated herein, plaintiffs' motion for class certification is granted in part and denied in part. Defendants' motion to exclude plaintiffs' damages expert is denied.

BACKGROUND

I. WHAT IS "NONFUNCTIONAL SLACK-FILL"?

A. Federal Law

Although plaintiffs' legal claims arise under state law, they rely on the federal definition and prohibition of "nonfunctional slack-fill." "Slack-fill" is defined as "the difference between the actual capacity of a container and the volume of product contained therein." 21 C.F.R. § 100.100(a). "Nonfunctional slack-fill" is defined as "the empty space in a package that is filled to less than its capacity for reasons other than:"

(1) Protection of the contents of the package;
(2) The requirements of the machines used for enclosing the contents in such package;
(3) Unavoidable product settling during shipping and handling;

[1] Plaintiffs also brought antitrust claims, but those claims have been dismissed. See In re McCormick, 217 F. Supp. 3d 124, 131 (D.D.C. 2016).

> (4) The need for the package to perform a specific function (e.g., where packaging plays a role in the preparation or consumption of a food), where such function is inherent to the nature of the [8] food and is clearly communicated to consumers;
> (5) The fact that the product consists of a food packaged in a reusable container where the container is part of the presentation of the food and has value which is both significant in proportion to the value of the product and independent of its function to hold the food, e.g., a gift product consisting of a food or foods combined with a container that is intended for further use after the food is consumed; or durable commemorative or promotional packages; or
> (6) Inability to increase level of fill or to further reduce the size of the package (e.g., where some minimum package size is necessary to accommodate required food labeling (excluding any vignettes or other nonmandatory designs or label information), discourage pilfering, facilitate handling, or accommodate tamper-resistant devices).

21 C.F.R. § 100.100(a) (emphasis added); see also Misleading Containers; Nonfunctional Slack-Fill, 58 Fed. Reg. 64123-01, 64126 (Dec. 6, 1993) ("[T]he exceptions in §100.100(a) provide only for that amount of slack-fill that is necessary to accomplish a specific function."). Federal law deems "non-functional slack-fill" in "[a] container that does not allow the consumer to fully view its contents" "to be filled as to be misleading," 21 C.F.R. § 100.100(a), which is a violation [9] of the federal law prohibiting the "misbranding" of foods. See 21 U.S.C. § 343(d) ("[a] food shall be deemed to be misbranded— . . . [i]f its container is so made, formed, or filled as to be misleading.").[2]

[*208] B. State Laws

Although only a few of the states at issue in this litigation have laws or regulations that expressly prohibit or limit nonfunctional slack-fil1,[3] the remaining states either incorporate or mirror the defmition of "misbranding" in 21 U.S.C. § 343(d),[4] or define "misbranding" to include misleading or deceptive packaging.[5] In addition, a number of

[2] In 1993, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration ("FDA") concluded that the "filled as to be misleading" portion of § 343(d) had not been "adequately implemented." See Misleading Containers; Nonfunctional Slack-Fill, 58 Fed. Reg. 2957-01, 2960 (Jan. 6, 1993). It thus proposed, see 58 Fed. Reg. at 2960, and ultimately adopted a regulation, see 21 C.F.R. § 100.100(a), to define when "slack-fill" is "nonfunctional" and when "nonfunctional slack-fill" is "misleading." See 58 Fed. Reg. 64123. The FDA noted that it had "decided not to elaborate on ways in which a container may be "made" or "formed" as to be misleading," finding those terms to be "straightforward" and to "require little elaboration." 58 Fed. Reg. at 2960.

[3] California has adopted verbatim the federal definition of nonfunctional slack-fill, and it similarly provides that "[a] container that does not allow the consumer to fully view its contents shall be considered to be filled as to be misleading if it contains nonfunctional slack-fill." See Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 12606.2(c). New Jersey law provides that "nonfunctionally slack-filled" means "a container which is filled to substantially less than its capacity for reasons other than (a) protection of the contents of the container or (b) the requirements of machines used for enclosing the contents in the container" and that "[n]o container shall be so nonfunctionally slack-filled as to constitute deception." N.J. Stat. Ann. § 51:1-29(c)(2). Colorado has adopted the same definition and its Department of Public Health and Environment is charged with enacting regulations, as necessary, to prevent "deception of consumers" by "preventing the nonfunctional slack-fill of packages containing consumer commodities." Colo. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 25-5-419(4).

C. Slack-Fill Litigation

While there is no private right of action to enforce the federal regulations on nonfunctional slack-fill, consumers in recent years have filed numerous lawsuits seeking to hold manufacturers liable under state [*209] law for the sale of products allegedly containing nonfunctional slack-fill. For example, cases have been brought alleging nonfunctional slack-fill in the packaging of candy in cardboard boxes,[7] chips,[8] cerea1, [10] [9] pretzels,[10] pasta,[11] risotto mix,[12] canned tuna,[13] gum,[14] protein powder,[15] ice cream,[16] cake mix,[17] dried fruit,[18] and a variety of other food[19] and non-food products.[20] The present litigation is the first challenge to allegedly nonfunctional slack-fill in spice tins and grinders.

Despite the volume of slack-fill litigation, all of which has been filed as putative class actions, very few have reached the stage of class certification. Many cases have been dismissed for failing to plausibly allege nonfunctional slack-fill or failing to plausibly allege that reasonable consumers would have been misled by the packaging even if there was nonfunctional slack-fill.[21] [*210] Slack-fill claims have also been dismissed on other grounds,[22] remanded to state court,[23] stayed,[24] [11] or resolved on summary judgment,[25] or plaintiffs have decided not to pursue them.[26]

II. THE PRESENT LITIGATION

A. Factual Background

Black pepper is the most widely traded spice in the international market, both in terms of quantity [12] and value, and McCormick is the largest manufacturer and leading seller of black pepper products in the [*211] United States. (See Second Am. Cons. Class Action Compl. ¶ 3, ECF No. 128 ("2d Am. Compl."); Declaration of Elizabeth Fegan ¶¶ 10, 12, ECF No. 188-1 ("Fegan Decl."); Expert Report of Dr. Armando Levy ¶¶ 19, 20, ECF No. 188-3 ("Levy Rep.").) It buys black pepper from all over the world and transports it to its processing plants in the United States. (2d Am. Compl. ¶ 28; Levy Rep. ¶ 19 (citing McCormick 2014 Annual Report).) McCormick's processing plants produce both McCormick-branded pepper products and private-label pepper products for major retail chains, including Wal-Mart's Great Value brand. (2d Am. Compl. ¶¶ 3, 46; McCormick's Am. Answer to 2d Am. Compl. ¶ 3, ECF No. 151; Wal-Mart's Am. Answer to 2d Am. Compl. ¶¶ 3, 46, ECF No. 155; Levy Rep. ¶ 20.) In 2015, McCormick-branded pepper products represented 47% of the U.S. black pepper market, while the private-label pepper products produced by McCormick represented another 18.8% of the market. (See Fegan Decl. In 13, 16; Levy Rep. ¶ 20.)

Global consumption of black pepper has been growing rapidly since the 1990's. (2d Am. Compl. [13] ¶ 29; Levy Rep. ¶ 17.) This rapid increase in demand, coupled with relatively stable world production, resulted in significant increases in the price of black pepper. (2d Am. Compl. ¶ 29; Levy Rep. ¶ 18; see also McCormick's Am. Answer ¶ 31.) For example, between 2005 and 2015, the spot price of black pepper in New York increased more than six-fold, from $0.75 per pound to more than $5.00 per pound. (Levy Rep. ¶ 18.) As the cost of pepper increased, McCormick repeatedly raised the retail prices for its black pepper products. At the same time, the gap between the retail price for McCormick-branded products and private-label brands grew, while McCormick's overall market share declined. (See Pls.' Exs. 101, 102.[31])[32]

On May 30, 2014, McCormick embarked on a "Black Pepper Net Weight Reduction" Project. (See Fegan Decl. ¶ 22; Pls.' Ex. 103.) The project's "objective" was "to mitigate commodity cost increases expected on black pepper through a net weight reduction across branded and private label metal cans" and thus avoid any further price increases for its own products. (See Fegan Decl. ¶ 24; Pls.' Ex. 103; see also Pls.' Exs. 104-106, 118, 121.) McCormick recognized that reducing [14] the net weight in a container without changing the "absolute price" was effectively a price increase because the cost per ounce would increase. (See Fegan Decl. In 29, 39; Pls.' Exs. 107, 114.) McCormick sought to avoid an absolute price increase on products on the shelves, since it believed that such a price increase would lead to a decline in sales. (See Fegan Decl. ¶ 36; Pls.' Exs. 112-113.)

Over the next few months the final details of McCormick's net weight reduction [*212] project were decided. (See Fegan Decl. ¶¶ 25-34, 58-59, 77; Pls.' Ex. 104, 109.) Although McCormick had initially contemplated a 10% net weight reduction, due to the continued increase in the cost of black pepper, it ultimately decided on a larger reduction, reducing the weight of ground pepper in its tins by 25% and the weight of peppercorn in its grinders by 19%. (See 2d Am. Compl. ¶ 5; Fegan Decl. ¶¶ 24, 31, 33; Pls.' Exs. 103, 108-110.) Plaintiffs claim that "McCormick contemplated it would receive a monetary benefit in the form of a cost savings increase from $4.6MM with 10% reduction to $11.1MM with a 25% reduction." (Fegan Decl. ¶ 34 (citing Pls.' Ex. 110).)

During this time, McCormick employees discussed the [15] impact of a net weight reduction on "visual fill" levels, specifically the need to make sure that the reduced-weight products would meet McCormick's internal visual fill requirement of 75%, a level it believed complied with the federal regulation prohibiting nonfunctional slack-fill. (See Fegan Decl. ¶¶ 52, 70, 73, 74, 77, 79, 81, 82; Pls.' Exs. 100, 103, 109, 111, 119-121, 124, 125, 131, 133, 137-138, 142-143.) Several possibilities to avoid any "fill" problem were discussed, including using less dense (bulkier) pepper[33] or reducing McCormick's internal visual fill requirements. (See Fegan Decl. ¶¶ 76, 77; Pls.' Exs. 101, 109, 111, 119-120, 124, 137.)

McCormick employees also discussed what to do about the McCormick-produced private-label brands, which were in identically-sized containers. (See Fegan Decl. ¶¶ 24, 25, 35 59; Pls.' Ex. 116.) McCormick documents indicate that employees were concerned that if the private-label brands did not also reduce the weights in their comparable products, they might advertise the difference in quantity and price and that McCormick would appear to be "deceptive" for reducing weights while maintaining the same size containers. (See Fegan Decl. ¶ 37; [16] Pls.' Ex. 113.) Ultimately, the majority (59%) of the private-label brands supplied by McCormick, including Wal-Mart, agreed to follow McCormick and reduce weights by the same amounts without changing container sizes. (See (See ECF No. 158 (exhibits 1-34); ECF No. 157-5 to 157-48 (exhibits 100-144).) Exhibits 101-144 have been filed under seal, so the Court will cite where appropriate but will not disclose the substance of these documents unless revealed in an unsealed filing. "Pls.' Reply Ex." will be used to refer to exhibits attached to the Supplemental Declaration of Elizabeth Fegan. (See Supp. Fegan Decl., ECF No. 171.) "Pls.' [32] McCormick's retail prices increased by [TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT]% between 2010 and November 10, 2014. The price gap for a 4-ounce tin of black pepper grew from approximately [TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT]% to [TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT]% (McCormick's price increased from $[TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT] to $[TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT] while the private label price went from $[TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT] to $[TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT]). McCormick's share of the market of the 4-ounce tin declined by [TEXT REDACTED BY THE COURT] percentage points. See Pls.' Exs. 101, 102.)

[33] According to McCormick's Materials Manager, James Michael Hester, "[d]epending on the type of black pepper, the climate conditions, the age of the black pepper, the maturity of the plants and other factors, there can be wide variation in the density of the product, both before and after it is ground." (Hester Decl. ¶ 2, ECF No. 188-2.)

Fegan Decl. ¶¶ 58-59; Pls.' Exs. 132, 134.) But several private-label brands did not reduce weights, opting instead to take a wholesale price increase. (See Fegan Decl. ¶ 59.)

In its final executed form, the Net Weight Reduction Project resulted in the following changes: (1) for both McCormick and participating private-label brands, including Wal-Mart, the net weights of the 2-, 4-, and 8-ounce metal tins of ground black pepper were reduced by 25% to 1.5, 3, and 6 ounces, with no changes in container size or price; and (2) for McCormick, the net weights of the 1.24-ounce and 3.1-ounce black peppercorn grinders were reduced to 1.00 ounce and 2.5 ounces, again with no change in container size or price. (See Fegan Decl. ¶¶ 62 68; Pls.' Ex. 122; McCormick's Am. Answer If 34, 35, 40, 41; Wal-Mart's Am. Answer If 5; 2d Am. Compl. ¶¶ 5, 36-38, 42-45.) New Universal Product Codes ("UPC") were assigned to all new products. (See Fegan Decl. ¶ 71.) The "net weight decreases" [17] were "effective with all shipments on February 23, 2015." (See Fegan Decl. ¶ 69; Pls.' Ex. 135.) As discussed in greater detail infra, McCormick claims that even though it reduced the label weights on these products, the fill levels did not decrease because it "overfill[ed]" when necessary to meet a new [*213] internal minimum fill level of 80%. (See Hester Decl. ¶¶ 11-12, ECF 188-2.)

The reduced-weight products began to reach store shelves in March 2015. Consumers looking at any of these products on store shelves saw the same containers they had always seen. The label on the container stated the new weight in the same size print and location as the prior weight had appeared. Consumers could not see the fill levels in any of the products; the metal tins were opaque and the fill level of the grinders was obscured by an opaque label. (See Fegan Decl. ¶¶ 62-68; 2d Am. Compl. ¶¶ 2, 33, 35-46.) Nor were fill levels necessarily observable even after the products were opened. (See Fegan Decl. ¶ 81 (internal McCormick email dated 8/7/2014 states "keep in mind consumers do not really know the fill level right now" (quoting Pls.' Ex. 110).) Below are pictures (copied from the Second Amended Complaint [18] ¶¶ 36, 43, 44) showing (1) the reduced-weight 1.5-ounce tin and the original-weight 2-ounce tin; and (2) the reduced-weight 1-ounce grinder with the label on; and (3) the reduced-weight 1-ounce grinder with the label removed next to the original-weight 1.24-ounce grinder with the label removed.

Until retailers sold out of the original weight products, both the original and the reduced-weight product could have been on store shelves at the same time. In addition, in some locations there would also have been pepper products from other [*215] pepper producers and/or private-label brands produced by McCormick where the weights had not been reduced.

In May 2015, Wal-Mart told McCormick that it was concerned that the new tins had "too much air space." (See Fegan Decl. ¶ 77 n.2; Pls.' Exs. 139-40.) On June 9, 2015, Watkins Inc., another pepper producer and a McCormick competitor, filed a lawsuit in Minnesota complaining that the new McCormick products were deceiving consumers and causing Watkins to lose sales. See Watkins Inc. v. McCormick & Co., No. 15-cv-02688 (D. Minn. filed June 9, 2015). That same day, the Minneapolis Star Tribune newspaper published a story about the [19] Watkins lawsuit. See Mike Hughlett, Watkins sues spice giant McCormick & Co. over pepper tins, Minneapolis Star Tribune, June 9, 2015 ("Watkins Inc., a small player in the pepper business, filed a lawsuit Tuesday claiming that the nation's largest spice company has 'deceived' consumers by stealthily slashing the amount of black pepper in its tins, without shrinking the container or lowering the price."). Several other news articles followed, including one in the Wall Street Journal. See Paul Ziobro, Same Package, Same Price, Less Product—It's Called a 'Weight-Our in the Business—a Less Direct Way to Raise Prices for Consumers, Wall Street Journal, June 12, 2015, at B 1; see also Mike Hughlett, McCormick Says It Is Not Deceiving Customers with Product Labeling, Minneapolis Star Tribune, June 10, 2015.

On June 15, 2015, a pepper consumer filed in federal court in New York the first putative class action against McCormick. See Dupler v. McCormick & Co., No. 2:15-cv-6760 (S.D.N.Y.). Other consumer cases, filed in federal district courts throughout the country, followed.[34] Only one of the cases also named Wal-Mart as a defendant. See Vladimirsky v. McCormick & Co., No. 1:15-cv-08102 (N.D. [20] Ill. filed Sept. 15, 2015). These consumer cases alleged that, by reducing the weight of black pepper in a container without changing the container size or price, so that the products contained "nonfunctional slack-fill" that was not visible to consumers, McCormick had deceived consumers into believing that they were buying more pepper than they actually received.

In the spring of 2016, McCormick discontinued production of the reduced-weight, same container-sized products, replacing them with reduced-size containers. The reduced-weight products remained on store shelves until they were sold out, which was no later than June 2016. (See Hr'g Tr. at 81, July 10, 2018, ECF No. 196 ("7/10/18 Tr.").)

B. Procedural History of the Multi-District Litigation

In December 2015, the United States Judicial Panel [21] on Multidistrict Litigation [*216] transferred all pending black pepper "slack-fill" cases against McCormick to this Court for coordinated or consolidated pretrial proceedings. See In re McCormick & Co., Inc., Pepper Prods. Mktg. & Sales Practices Litig., 148 F. Supp. 3d 1364, 1365 (J.P.M.L. 2015). Ultimately, a total of 16 separate actions were transferred, 15 consumer cases (see supra note 34) and the Watkins competitor suit.[35]

After the cases were transferred, plaintiffs filed a consolidated and amended class action complaint against McCormick and Wal-Mart ("Amended Complaint").[36] (See Cons. Am. Class Action Compl., Mar. 2, 2016, ECF No. 34.) The Amended Complaint included fifteen named plaintiffs from eleven jurisdictions: California, Connecticut, the District of Columbia, Florida, Illinois, Iowa, Maryland, Missouri, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania.[37] It alleged that each named plaintiff had purchased a black pepper product that was part of McCormick's reduced-weight program and that these products contained nonfunctional slack-fill in containers without a visible fill line. It further alleged that by selling these products defendants had violated federal antitrust law (Count I), the consumer protection statutes of 24 states and the District of Columbia (Count II), and the unjust enrichment [22] law of all [35] One of the California cases, Esparza, had been consolidated into another California case, Bunting, before the transfers occurred.

[36] The Watkins case has proceeded independently of the consumer cases, and it is not part of the pending motion for class certification. See In re McCormick, 215 F. Supp. 3d 51, 62 (D.D.C. 2016) (granting in part and denying in part motion to dismiss in underlying case Watkins, Inc. v. McCormick & Co., No. 15-cv-2188).

[37] The named plaintiffs in the amended complaint were Julia Vladimirskiy, Bernard Ortiz, Hubert L. Gerstnecker, Cynthia Fernandez, Anne Marron, Scott Allan Bittle, Debbie Esparza, Nicholas Hilla, Carmen Pellitteri, Brenda Theis, Holly Marsh, Lillian Ferreri, Catherine Grindel, Sandra Robinson, and Paula Cole Jones. Several of the named plaintiffs from the transferred cases were not included and several new plaintiffs were added.

50 states and the District of Columbia (Count III). Plaintiffs brought all three types of claims on their own behalf and on behalf of putative classes of consumers.

Defendants moved to dismiss the Amended Complaint. The Court granted the motions as to the federal antitrust claim but denied them as to the consumer protection and unjust enrichment claims. See In re McCormick, 217 F. Supp. 3d 124, 129 (D.D.C. 2016).

Relevant to the pending motion for class certification, defendants argued in their motion to dismiss that legal variations among state laws and factual variations among individual purchasers precluded class treatment of the consumer protection and unjust enrichment claims. See id. at 139. The Court disagreed, concluding that dismissal on either ground would be premature given that plaintiffs had not yet moved for class certification. With respect to legal variations among state laws, the Court recognized that multi-state consumer protection and unjust enrichment classes were theoretically possible, so plaintiffs were entitled to try to demonstrate, through an extensive analysis of state laws, that there was a workable grouping. Id. at 140-42. As to defendant's argument that factual variations among [23] individual purchasers would preclude a consumer protection class because "the alleged injury depends on individual consumers' state of mind at the time they purchased the pepper," the Court concluded that the argument was "not fairly presented" because defendants made the argument without "specify[ing] any particular state consumer protection statute." Id. at 146. The Court noted, however, [*217] that it "expect[ed] to confront this issue again at class certification." Id. As to defendants' argument that the factual variations among individual purchasers would preclude an unjust enrichment class because unjust enrichment requires evaluation of plaintiffs' individual circumstances, the Court declined to address that argument because the parties had "not yet provided analyses of all fifty states' unjust enrichment law," so it could not "be certain that every state requires an individualized showing of injustice." Id. at 145-46.[38] For those states that did, though, the Court noted that it was "likely that plaintiffs' unjust enrichment claims against McCormick and Wal-Mart will require individualized factual inquiries that bar class treatment" because

> [s]ome plaintiffs presumably bought McCormick pepper with full knowledge [24] of the quantity of the pepper in the container, either because they understood that the listed weight had changed or because they had already purchased another container and seen the reduced quantity. Other plaintiffs might not have realized the quantity had been reduced but would have bought the pepper regardless. There would be no injustice in defendants' retaining what these plaintiffs paid for their pepper.

Id. at 145.

After the ruling on defendants' motion to dismiss, plaintiffs moved for leave to file a Second Amended Complaint in order to add new factual allegations aimed at addressing the deficiencies that had led to the dismissal of the antitrust claim. (See Pls.' Mot. for Recons., Dec. 9, 2016, ECF No. 105.) After the Court granted the motion, see In re McCormick, 275 F. Supp. 3d 218. 219 (D.D.C. 2017), defendants moved to dismiss the Second Amended Complaint. Defendants' motions focused on the revived antitrust count but also "renew[ed] by reference the arguments set forth as to [the] state law claims in McCormick's initial Motion to Dismiss." (See McCormick's Mot. to Dismiss 2d Am. Compl. at 2, Apr. 7, 2017, ECF No. 132; see also Wal-Mart's Mot. to Dismiss 2d Am. Compl. at 1, Apr. 7. 2017, ECF No. 134.) The Court again granted the motion [25] as to the antitrust claim and denied it as to the state law consumer protection and unjust enrichment claims. (See Order, June 13, 2017, ECF No. 146; Mem. Op. at 4, June 13, 2017, ECF No. 148.)

C. Current Plaintiffs and Remaining Claims

[38] In the alternative, defendants argued that the Court should dismiss claims under the laws of states where no named plaintiffs resided because they had no standing to pursue those claims. In re McCormick, 217 F. Supp. 3d at 142. The Court rejected this argument, concluding that "Mt is more logical to consider named plaintiffs' ability to raise other state-law claims as a question of commonality, typicality, and adequacy under Rule 23, rather than a question of standing." Id. at 144.

The Second Amended Complaint is now the operative pleading. In addition to adding new factual allegations, it eliminated four named plaintiffs, who had voluntarily dismissed their claims since the filing of the Amended Complaint, and added one additional plaintiff. As a result, there are now twelve named plaintiffs (instead of fifteen) from eight jurisdictions (instead of eleven): Deborah Esparza and Holly Marsh (California), Cynthia Fernandez (Connecticut), Paula Cole Jones (District of Columbia), Carmen Pellitteri (Florida), Scott Allan Bittle, Alexander Liberov, Brenda Theis and Julia Vladimirskiy (Illinois), Sandra Robinson (Maryland), Catherine Grindel (Missouri), and Hubert Gerstnecker (Pennsylvania).[39] The Second [*218] Amended Complaint alleges that each named plaintiff purchased a reduced-weight pepper product for personal use, believing that it was "full" or "substantially filled to capacity," and "did not know that in fact the tin contained just 75% [26] of the pepper that the tin was designed to hold[] and was actually deceived." (2d Am. Compl. ¶¶ 10-21.) The complaint further alleges, on behalf of the named plaintiffs and a putative class, that "[a]s a result of Defendants' actions, Plaintiffs and the Class were deceived when they paid for full tins of ground black pepper that in fact contained just 75% pepper and 25% air, or paid for full bottles of black peppercorns that in fact contained just 81% peppercorns and 19% air, and thus were overcharged, did not receive the benefit of the bargain and/or suffered out-of-pocket loss." (2d Am. Compl. ¶ 9; see also id. ¶ 52 ("[a]s a result of Defendants' blatantly misleading and deceptive use of traditional-sized, non-transparent metal tins and grinders with unlawful slack-fill, Plaintiffs and the Class have been deceived into believing that the containers contain the amount of ground black pepper that the containers are designed to hold").)

The counts that have survived allege that defendants' actions violated twenty-five state consumer protection statutes (Count II) and constituted unjust enrichment under the common law of all fifty states plus the District of Columbia (Count III). Specifically, [27] Count II alleges that by "selling black pepper in non-transparent containers containing nonfunctional slack-fill," defendants committed unfair, deceptive or fraudulent acts prohibited by state consumer protection statutes. (2d Am. Compl. ¶ 116.) Count II further alleges that plaintiffs and the proposed class members were "directly and proximately injured by Defendants' conduct and would not have paid for Defendants' black pepper had they known that the containers were under-filled," that "as a proximate result of Defendants' misrepresentations and omissions, Plaintiffs and the proposed Class members have suffered an ascertainable loss and are entitled to relief, in an amount to be determined at trial," and that they "are entitled to damages, restitution, disgorgement, and/or such orders or judgments as may be necessary to restore to any person in interest, any money which may have been acquired by means of such unfair practices and to the relief set forth below." (2d Am. Compl. ¶¶ 115-22.) Count III alleges that by selling "black pepper to Plaintiffs and the Class, in containers that included nonfunctional slack-fill while maintaining price levels for full containers," defendants "have [28] unjustly retained a benefit to the detriment of Plaintiffs and members of the Class," that "Defendants' retention of the benefit violates the fundamental principles of justice, equity and good conscience" because "Defendants did not disclose to Plaintiffs and the Class that the black pepper containers contained nonfunctional slack-fill," and that "[a]s a direct and proximate result of the Defendants' misrepresentations and/or omissions with respect to the nonfunctional slack-fill in the pepper tins and grinders, Plaintiffs and the Class have suffered damages in an amount to be proven at trial." (211 Am. Compl. ¶¶ 127-29.)

III. MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

Pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a) and (b)(3), plaintiffs now move for class certification of their consumer protection and unjust enrichment claims.

[*219] A. Proposed Classes

Each proposed class consists of individuals who purchased, for their personal or household use, a "Slack-Filled Pepper Product" - which plaintiffs have defined as the following 29 black pepper products:

[39] The named plaintiffs who voluntarily dismissed their claims without prejudice were Anne Marron, Nicholas Hilla, Bernard Ortiz, and Lillian Ferreri. Without these plaintiffs, the named plaintiffs no longer include anyone from Iowa, New Jersey, or New York. In addition, the case in which Marron was the sole plaintiff, No. 16-cv-00104 (D.D.C.), has been dismissed.
